PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

I AVAIL MYSELF of the opportunity of making a few corrections in this volume. They are not, indeed, of much importance. Some mistakes in the references have been detected, and these have been rectified. Five or six names which were inadvertently omitted have been supplied in their respective places; and the additions which appeared before in a page of Corrigenda are now transferred to the articles to which they properly belong.

The Plan of Jerusalem also has been corrected according to the late Ordnance Survey.

During the progress of the work I endeavoured to gather information from every available source. Books treating on Scripture history, criticism, and doctrine; books, too, illustrating the geography and antiquities of Scripture lands, are continually issuing from the press. Several of these add materially to our stores of knowledge; others have but little value. Of all the fresh matter serviceable for my purpose which appeared while the printing of my book went on I was anxious to make use; and but little was published which I did not more or less minutely examine. Doubtless some works escaped my notice; and some were not before the world till all I had to say on the topics they treated of was actually printed.

It is but a short time since this book first came out, yet in the interval advance has been made in investigating the geography and archæology of Palestine. An association has been formed, called 'The Palestine Exploration Fund;' and the results already obtained are of most hopeful augury for the future. Present discoveries, it is true, even had I previously known them, would have scarce at all modified any of the articles in this volume. But readers will feel it an advantage to receive now a succinct account of the expeditions which have been undertaken, and of the grounds on which much is expected from the continuance of these. And here I must again, as in my former preface, acknowledge my great obligations to Mr. George Grove, of Sydenham, the honorary secretary of the Fund, who has kindly supplied me with all the information I could desire.

The plan was altogether in embryo when this volume was originally published, so that it would have been useless—ridiculous indeed—to make then any reference to it. The first expedition, under Captain C. W. Wilson, R. E., left England early in November 1865, and reached Beyrout on the 23rd of that month. Some time was necessarily spent in immediate preparation before the actual work of exploring could be entered on. This was commenced at Damascus; and then the party travelled southwards, examining every point of interest so far as was practicable in their way down to Jerusalem. The approach of summer put a stop to their proceedings; they, therefore, left Jaffa, May 14, 1866, and arrived in England, June 9.

Much had been done in this time. Not fewer than forty-nine separate points between Beyrout and Hebron were examined, and their positions carefully settled, furnishing valuable data for correcting the maps of the country. Materials also were collected for constructing plans of various cities; drawings were made of the ruins of churches, tombs, and as many as seven Jewish synagogues. Many inscriptions, moreover—two of them in the Hebrew character—were copied. 'The most interesting remains,' says Captain Wilson's Report, 'are those of the synagogues at Tel Hum, Irbid, Kefr Birim, &c., which are somewhat similar to each other in arrangement and construction; they all lie north and south, have three gateways in the southern end, the interior divided into five aisles by four rows of columns, and the two northern corners formed by double engaged columns. The style of decoration does not always appear to have been the same: at Tel Hum and Kerazeh, Corinthian capitals were found;' elsewhere, some of mixed styles. . . . 'The faces of the lintels over the gateways are usually ornamented with some device. On one at Nebartein there is an inscription and representation of the seven-branched candlestick: at Kefr Birim the ornament has been purposely defaced, but appears to have been intended for the Paschal Lamb; and at Tel Hum there are the Pot of Manna and Lamb. A scroll of vine-leaves with bunches of grapes is one of the most frequent ornaments. Although no inscriptions were found, the presence of extensive remains, including those of a synagogue, at a place bearing the name of Kerazeh, seems to fix the position of the ancient Chorazin with some certainty.'

It is gratifying to find that the opinions I was led to adopt, after weighing different authorities in regard to certain disputed localities, are in more than one instance confirmed by Captain Wilson's researches. Thus the site of Capernaum has been doubtful. Robinson believes it to be at Khan Minyeh, mainly because there is a fountain there, 'Ain et-Tin, which he imagines identical with the fountain at Capernaum of which Josephus speaks. I ventured to follow Dr. Thomson and others, who are convinced that the fountain near Tel Hum, called now 'Ain Tâbighah, is the one in question (see p. 139). Captain Wilson speaks very decidedly, 'Neither 'Ain et-Tin or the Round Fountain answer to the account given by Josephus of the fountain of Cepharnome: they are too small, and hardly come into the scheme of irrigation, the former not at all; but, supposing it to be 'Ain Tâbighah, his allusion is at once explained by the copiousness of the supply, and the remarkable piece of engineering by which the water was carried into the plain: the fertilizing powers of the fountain are still attested by the rank vegeta tion around the mills, more noticeable here than at any other point on the lake.' Confirmation, moreover, is given to the view (see p. 309) that by Kerza was the spot where the herd of swine plunged into the lake of Gennesaret.

Another expedition has been despatched to Palestine, under the conduct of Lieut. Warren, R.E.; and several reports of the operations during 1867 have been received. Besides a survey of the plain of Philistia and the valley of the Jordan, researches have been prosecuted to the east of that river. A few sentences shall be quoted in regard to certain places and points which Lieut. Warren believes he has identified. It must be premised that an area of about 400 square miles in the district beyond the Jordan has been examined. 'We left Jerusalem the 17th ult. (July) . . . and, crossing the Jordan opposite Nimrin, came up to Nebbeh by Heshbon. I think there is little doubt about Nebbeh being the height of Nebo, as I came upon the ruins of an extensive fort and town about a mile west of Nebbeh, of the same name; and north of both, running west, is a deep wady with a spring named 'Ain Musa (spring of Moses). . . . I have also fixed the position of Maïn, which is generally described as being near Heshbon. I found it about ten miles to the south on Wady Zerka.' Again: 'On leaving Jerash we went westwards towards Reimûn. . . . Passing Mount Haggart (?) I climbed up to the top. . . . Mount Haggart is 5000 feet above the level of the Dead Sea: it is a few feet higher than Jebel Osha, and 1000 feet higher than Nebbeh (Nebo): I believe it to be Mount Gilead; and there are two villages close together in a gully to the north—Reimûn, on the top of a precipice, which I take to be Ramoth-gilead, and Sarchab, which is probably Mizpeh. Their close proximity may account for the name Ramoth-mizpeh. . . . I think Aram is, without doubt, Haram or Beth-Haran (or Libias). Nimrah (Nimrin) is four and a half miles to the north; and Suwaimeh (Beth-Jesimoth?) is four miles S.S.E., immediately under Nebbeh. Keferein may be Abel Shittim.'

These details are full of interest, as showing the actual work of the expedition on the east of the Jordan. Some places, it will be seen, are identified; and reasonable ground is furnished for believing that future researches will lay open yet more important facts connected with this district.

But it is to Jerusalem that the attention of the Christian and the antiquary is naturally most directed. Problems of the highest interest lie yet unsolved in Jerusalem and its vicinity. Travellers and biblical scholars cannot as yet agree upon the site of Calvary, and the exact location of the Temple. Various theories have been propounded; and yet all that can be said is, that this or that has great probability in its favour. The investigations now going on may settle for ever these and a multitude of other similar questions. The tomb of David and the kings of Judah, also the pool of Bethesda, the walls of the city, the towers of Hippicus, Mariamne, and Psephinus, the limits of Ophel and Bezetha, may all be discovered and identified, if sought for.

Many important results have been obtained within the last few months. Thus the courses of the three ancient city walls described by Josephus are being gradually traced. The foundations of the Temple, constructed of stones of enormous size, are being laid bare to the depth of 90 feet below the modern surface of the ground. The original form of the Tyropœon Valley, which separated the Temple from Mount Zion, is found to be entirely unlike the present surface, being for the greater part of its width flat and level, but descending immediately beneath the Temple wall into a narrow gully of great depth, crossed at a height of more than 100 feet by the bridge, of which some remains are still visible. The south-east corner of the Temple wall, possibly the base of one of its pinnacles, has still an elevation of 133 feet; so that the assertion of Josephus that the head grew dizzy in looking down from the vast height is no exaggeration. Sections of the ancient wall of Ophel have been exhumed, showing how it was joined to the south-east angle of the Temple. Aqueducts, moreover, cisterns, tanks, channels, and passages hewn in the rock, have been discovered within and round about the Haram, the thorough exploring of which will assuredly throw fresh light on the arrangements of the Holy House.

Such is, in brief, the work which has already been accomplished. Some short extracts from the detailed reports of Lieut. Warren will illustrate the account just given:—‘I have made what I consider to be a very important discovery, viz. an ancient aqueduct, south-east of the south-east corner of the Cœnaculum, and about 50 feet above the present aqueduct—I have no doubt the original aqueduct from Solomon’s Pools to the Haram area. . . . This channel cannot be so late as the Romans: it is evidently of most ancient construction. It is built in little spaces, as if the work had been commenced at two or three points, and had not been directed properly. . . . I presume it goes into the Haram, at a slightly higher level than the present aqueduct; if so, by following it we may arrive at some very interesting conclusions as to the original method of supplying the Temple with water. This channel must have been of great consequence in olden times, both from the distance it is driven underground, and from the well-cut shafts which lead to it. I think the question is to be hazarded whether the supply of Jerusalem was not obtained by this aqueduct, which is quite concealed from an enemy.’ Again: ‘The wall of Ophel at the top projects 7 ft. 6 in. beyond the visible east Haram wall; and it will be interesting to know how the junction is effected. This Ophel wall is now found to be at top 13 ft. thick, and at least 15 ft. thick at a depth of 60 feet.’ Again: ‘End of wall of Ophel about 5 ft. from [south-east] angle; shaft sunk 40 ft. without finding any signs of gateway in Ophel wall. At 28 ft. from surface a gallery was driven to angle; and it was found that the Ophel wall simply abutted on the south wall of Haram area; the Haram wall projecting 6 in. each course on the eastern face.’ Again: ‘We found ourselves in a passage running south from the Haram area. . . . It seems to start suddenly; and I can only suppose it to have been the examining-passage over an aqueduct coming from the temple. . . . This passage is on a level with the foundations of the Haram wall, which are rough hewn stones—perhaps rock—I cannot tell yet. The bottom is the enormous distance of 85 ft. below the surface of the ground; and, as far as I can see as yet, the wall at the south-west angle must be buried for 95 ft. underground; so that it must have at one time risen to the height of 180 feet above the Tyropœon gully.’ Once more, at a later date: ‘With reference to the south wall of Haram area . . . the south-west angle carries off the palm with regard to height. I was much astonished at the result of our labour, not expecting to find the Tyropœon gully more than 50 ft. deep, and it must be, I think, upwards of 100. The east side of this valley must break down in a very abrupt manner, if the lowest part is west of the Haram area. . . . No wonder the poor Queen of Sheba's spirit failed her when she saw the stupendous ascent which must have led over the Tyropœon gully.'

These extracts are necessarily disjointed, because but fragments of the work proposed have been yet accomplished. And a considerable time must elapse before all that is concealed beneath modern Jerusalem shall be uncovered. But fresh discoveries are being continually made. Thus the despatch from Lieut. Warren, dated Nov. 12, 1867, tells of a valley hitherto unknown, because filled up to the surface, running west to east, somewhat north of the Dome of the Rock. Possibly it may be what Josephus calls the Kidron ravine. And a later account (Nov. 22) describes the vast depth that must be reached before the actual bed of the brook Kidron can be discovered. From the last-received intelligence (published in 'The Times' of March 2, 1868) we learn, further, that the first pier of Robinson's arch (see View, p. 48) has been discovered: it is 42 feet below the present surface of the ground, 45 feet 6 inches from the Temple wall. Between this wall and the pier is a pavement, on which lie the great stones of the arch as they fell, probably at the siege by Titus. Wilson's arch (see p. 460), standing 500 feet farther north than Robinson's, springs also from the Temple wall, and is of nearly the same span. The remains of the viaduct are here very plentiful. The great arch is still perfect; and four more have been discovered in prolongation to the west, decreasing in height as they go westward, and terminating in an arched passage.

The explorations already made testify to the massive grandeur of the ancient structures of Jerusalem. And the future is full of promise. Besides the identification of sacred spots, we may obtain a clearer knowledge of the arts, the arms, the utensils, the domestic habits of ancient Israel. Botanical and geological information, too, will be sought. And, as Nineveh, long-buried and forgotten Nineveh, awoke so lately to give forth her voice, so may Palestine in like manner arise to add her audible testimony to the truth of the oracles of God.

THE general object of this work is to promote the intelligent use of the sacred volume by furnishing a mass of information respecting Palestine, and the manners, customs, religion, literature, arts, and attainments of the inhabitants; an account of the countries and races with which the Hebrews had relations more or less intimate; together with some notice of all the persons and places mentioned in the Bible and the Apocrypha. The history and authority of the books themselves are discussed conjointly and severally: the principles of biblical criticism are sketched, and the mode of sound biblical interpretation is indicated: the grounds also are exhibited on which Christianity is accepted as a religion coming from God.

It is obvious that, if such a range of topics is to be comprised in a moderate volume, many of them must be handled with brevity. I have endeavoured so to compose the work that, while persons and places of small importance are but just noted, matters of greater moment are treated with some degree of fulness. But even with these I have had very frequently to remind the reader that far more might be said, and to direct him to other sources for larger information. I hope that, in trying to condense abundant materials into limited articles, I have not made them disjointed or obscure.

The scholar who desires the complete discussion of a biblical subject must not be surprised to find much that he deems important passed over here. It has been necessary to state results without giving the process by which they were arrived at, to produce facts while little is said of the mode in which they were ascertained. The book is intended mainly for the general reader. But I have been anxious to study the best authorities for what is asserted, and to bring up the information to the most modern standard. I have not written hastily therefore, but have spent some years in the compilation of this volume.

I am of course greatly indebted to many well-known books. Among these I may particularly specify Winer's Biblisches Realwörterbuch, and Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. These are sources to which every one engaged in such an elucidation of scripture must necessarily refer. For the topography of the Holy Land, and the mode of life of its present inhabitants, I have made use of Robinson's Biblical Researches, 2nd edit., Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, 4th edit., Porter's Handbook for Syria and Palestine, Thomson's The Land and the Book, edit. London, 1860, Wilton's The Negeb, and various other works: I have also obtained some information from personal friends who have visited the East. The reader will find that I have most frequently been indebted to Dr. Thomson. His volume appeared to me written in a style which specially adapted it for citation in a work like this; and I have been assured, by persons very competent from actual investigation to judge, that it is thoroughly trustworthy. On critical and exegetical topics I have often referred to the Introductions (Einleitungen) of Hävernick, Keil, Bleek, and others; to the able Commentary on Genesis by Dr. Kalisch; to Dr. Alford's New Testament; and to that of Dr. Wordsworth; with a considerable number of other books, the names of which I have mentioned in the places where use has been made of them. When I have actually cited or followed closely the statements of a writer, I have, I believe, always acknowledged my obligation. But, when I have merely been directed to sources of information which I have investigated for myself, I have not deemed it needful always to indicate the channel through which I obtained my materials. I have scarcely ever taken references on trust. I have examined them all; a very few excepted, where the book or edition wanted has not been accessible. And I have not followed implicitly any one's opinion. I have been mainly solicitous to arrive at truth. I have therefore in all the articles weighed as carefully as I could the arguments, statements, and authorities within my reach, and have endeavoured to express an honest and independent judgment. Still, I have not deemed it right, when the opinions of the learned differed, to give my own view exclusively. Thus, while I am disposed to accept the usually-received site of the Holy Sepulchre as the true one, I have placed before the reader, as fairly as I could (pp. 459, 460), some other theories, supported certainly by plausible arguments. But, though I have consulted many books, there are others which I have been unable to use. Several important works have been published while these sheets were in the press. As a single instance, the article on Daniel was printed before Dr. Pusey's Lectures on Daniel the Prophet appeared. It will not, I trust, be imputed as a fault to me that I have repeatedly cited a work of my own, the last edition of Horne's Introduction, vol. ii., since I had expressed in it my opinions on some topics more fully than I can do here.

The arrangement of this volume is alphabetical. Every name, I believe, in the Bible and the Apocrypha finds a place in it. But a distinction is made between inspired and uninspired books by printing names from the former in Roman, from the latter in Italic capitals. Scripture names, too, precede those from the Apocrypha; and the two are never combined in a single article. Names of persons precede identical names of places. And all the persons and places of the same name (with the same meaning) are severally enumerated under one head, being ranged in the order of the scripture books in which each appears for the first time.

The interpretation of proper names is generally given. It is true that critics are not agreed as to many of these words; but the meanings of a large proportion of them are undoubted; and, as the Hebrews usually gave or adopted names for a special reason, it appeared undesirable to suppress this kind of information in regard to the many because it was questionable in cases comparatively few. I have for the most part followed Gesenius, but have sometimes preferred the suggestions of other philologists, and where there was reasonable doubt I have expressed it.

The proper names are accentuated. But here I have had a difficulty; and I must confess that I am unable to discover on what principle the accentuation is made in some works of deservedly-high estimation. I find the accent often placed on a syllable in English which is no syllable in Hebrew (the sheva being used there), and letters which belong to one syllable attached to another. To accentuate Zeb'ulun exhibits both these faults. I dare not hope that I have succeeded in always avoiding the errors into which I think others fall. Indeed in some instances it would seem pedantic strictly to follow the Hebrew model. The rule I have tried to observe is to accentuate according to what appears common usage in the more familiar and naturalized words, as Am'alek, Deb'orah; in others to follow as well as I could Hebrew vocalization and Greek quantity. I wish also the reader to remember that the vowel on which the accent falls is not thereby necessarily long.

I hope that the book as arranged by a single hand will be found consistent. Certainly in the course of compiling it, while endeavouring to impart knowledge, I have gained some; and it may be that in a few cases, on doubtful points, where my opinion inclined one way in an earlier article, it has by further thought or from larger information afterwards inclined another. But, if examples of this kind be detected, they are, it may be said, on matters of minor importance—a date, or the identification of a place. On the great facts of the Bible, and the doctrines revealed therein, additional reading only strengthens my convictions.

I have endeavoured, too, to preserve uniformity in the spelling of modern names of eastern places and countries. Unfortunately there is no recognized standard in this respect. Different writers spell at their pleasure; and I may, drawing from many sources, have unconsciously admitted variations. There is a similar perplexity in regard to natural history wherein diverse systems of nomenclature are in use.

It may be well, for the convenience of the reader, to remark here, that the evidences of Christianity are compendiously presented under such headings as CHRISTIANITY, MIRACLES, PROPHECY, REVELATION, &c., that accounts of both the structure and claims of the Bible are given under BIBLE, CANON OF SCRIPTURE, INSPIRATION, SCRIPTURE, &c., and that the just mode of interpreting it is discussed in INTERPRETATION, TYPE, &c. Information upon other theological topics will be readily found under leading words. I have carefully abstained from making this a controversial work. My views are entirely diverse from those commonly termed rationalistic; but I hope I have maintained them with temper, with no wish to inflict pain on those who conscientiously differ from me. Indeed on many inferior points which divide the Christian world—such, for example, as modes of church government—I have desired to state facts rather than to advocate opinions.

The alphabetical form of the book—into which it seemed, on the whole, best to throw it—has necessarily introduced some repetitions. I have avoided them wherever I could do so by references from one article to another.

Maps are added, and numerous illustrations introduced. Of the larger illustrations a notice is given in subsequent pages. For assistance in the choice of these I am deeply indebted to George Grove, Esq. of Sydenham. My thanks are also due to the artists who have taken pains to make the representations effective.

I have only to add that, if my labour should be found to contribute in any degree to the fuller understanding and appreciation of the sacred volume, I shall be most grateful to God. The plain popular information which I have endeavoured to convey may be acceptable to many general readers; and perhaps theological students may find this book serviceable as an introduction to more comprehensive works.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

WADY FASAIL . . . . . Frontispiece

This is a valley through which runs a stream, Ain Fasail, falling from the mountains of Ephraim into the Ghôr, south of Kurn Sârtabeh, about fifteen miles north of Jericho. The spring is hidden under high cliffs, and overshadowed by a dense jungle. Tradition somewhat favours the belief that this was the brook Cherith; and certain modern travellers are inclined to accept it. Others, however, prefer other localities: see CHERITH, and any identification of Cherith is hitherto but conjectural.

THE CEDARS OF LEBANON . . . . . Page 144

This is the ancient well-known grove on the western slope of the mountain; repeatedly visited and described by travellers. Other clusters of these trees have recently been found on the same chain: see pp. 525, 526.

DAMASCUS FROM THE WEST . . . . . 194

EGYPT: THE PYRAMIDS OF GHIZEH; FROM THE EAST . . . . . 240

The pyramids are among the most prominent of the wonders of Egypt, and are closely associated in every mind with the very idea of that remarkable land. In the fore-ground of the illustration is a stagnant sheet of water left by the receding Nile: this may be dried up by the summer's heat; but the point from which the view is taken can easily be identified by the traveller from the palm-grove visible. Rising out of the sand, in front of the left angle of the middle pyramid, is the Sphinx; and, crowning the low hill on which they stand are, on the left, the pyramid of Mycerinus, 218 feet high, in the centre that of Chephrenes or Chepherin, 454 feet high, and on the right that of Cheops, 480 feet in height. The lengths of the bases of these pyramids are 354, 707, and 764 feet, and their areas 125,316; 499,849; and 543,696 square feet respectively. The area of the great pyramid (upwards of thirteen acres) is more than twice that of St. Peter's at Rome. Even the third and least covers more ground than any of our Gothic cathedrals—York minster being estimated at but 63,800—and the mass of materials it contains surpasses that of any building in Europe.

GAZA; FROM THE SOUTH-EAST . . . . . 322

The noted Philistine city. The Mediterranean is seen in the distance.

GIBEON AND NEBI SAMUEL; FROM THE NORTH-WEST . . . . . 332

Gibeon, the modern el-Jib, is conspicuous on its hill in front; while at some distance to the right appear the ruins of Nebi Samuel or Neby Samwil. This place was very possibly the ancient Mizpeh of Benjamin, the city where Saul was elected king: see p. 601. Or it may have been Ramah, the birth-place and residence of Samuel: see RAMAH 2, p. 751.

This is a general view of the holy city from the north-east. In the fore-ground on the left is the mount of Olives, and in the distance the hill-country of Judah: the peak visible beyond Olivet is the Frank mountain. Between Olivet and the city the valley of the Kidron descends. Within the walls, on the left, are the Mohammedan Mosques; viz. the Kûbbet-es-Sakhrâh, or Dome of the Rock, and el-Aksa, in the enclosure of the Haram, where anciently the Temple stood. The first-named is commonly termed the Mosque of Omar; but that name more properly belongs to a small Mosque, regarded as of peculiar sanctity, abutting on el-Aksa to the east. In the wall opposite the Dome of the Rock is the Golden Gate. The road from the north-east is seen to divide, running on the left to the gate of St. Stephen, on the right to the gate of Damascus; nearly over which is the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

JERUSALEM: THE MOSQUES IN THE HOLY PLACE (THE TEMPLE AREA)
FROM THE NORTH-WEST . . . . . 458

The Dome of the Rock is the one which is most prominent: el-Aksa is that in the distance.

JERUSALEM: OLD OLIVE TREES IN GETHSEMANE; FROM THE SOUTH-EAST . . . . . 460

The east brow of the hill to the north of the Temple rises in the back-ground; and the north-east corner of the present wall of the city is seen above it.

JERUSALEM: EAST CORNER OF THE SOUTH WALL; FROM THE SOUTH-WEST . . . . . 462

Olivet appears on the right, crowned by the Church of the Ascension.

THE JORDAN: ON THE ROAD FROM NABLÛS OR NABLOUS TO ES-SALT 490

This view of the river is at a point somewhat nearer to the Dead sea than to the lake of Gennesaret; Nablous being the ancient Shechem, and es-Salt probably Ramoth-Gilead.

NAZARETH; FROM THE NORTH-NORTH-WEST . . . . . 620

The distant range of hills is to the south of the plain of Esdraelon.

ABRAHAM'S OAK IN THE PLAINS OF MAMRE . . . . . 640

The tree so called is described by Bonar (Land of Promise, pp. 83, 84) as 'a magnificent Ballût or prickly oak, somewhat isolated, yet with other trees not far off. The protruding knots of root at its base looked almost like pieces of dark brown rock. The stem is enormous, and as rough and shapeless as can be fancied. The branches, spreading widely in several detachments, and with their extremities drooping to the sward, throw their shade over a vast circle. It stands near the foot of an easy rising ground, in as pleasant a valley as one could wish to see, with terraced hills close at hand, before and behind. . . . As this is the month of February, and as the tree is in full leaf, we were satisfied that it was an evergreen. . . . We should say that it was considerably within a mile of the town' (Hebron). Dr. Hooker is of opinion that this tree is a Quercus pseudo-coccifera.

--	----------

The large stones in the near fore-ground, form the south-east angle of the most westerly pool. Nearly in the centre of the view is seen the middle pool, empty, and showing on the left the shelving rocks which form the bottom of the upper part of that pool, and the smooth plastered or cemented embankment on the east. In the distance is the east pool.

SAMARIA; FROM THE SOUTH-EAST . . . . .	780

The 'crown of pride,' the fruitful hill, now desolate, rises prominently in the centre of the view. On its slope is the modern village Sebastieh; adjacent to which, on the right, is the beautiful ruined church of St. John.

TREASURY OF BIBLE KNOWLEDGE.

A'ALAR (1 Esdr. v. 36).

A'ARON (exalted, perhaps mountaineer). The son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi. He was the elder brother (by three years) of Moses (Exod. vi. 20, vii. 7).

Of his early life we know nothing; but, when Moses was called out of Midian to require the deliverance of Israel from Pharaoh, Aaron was appointed his assistant and spokesman, as being naturally eloquent (iv. 14-16). Accordingly Aaron received a command from God to go into the wilderness to meet his brother (27); and after that time we find the two acting in conjunction; Aaron in subordination to but not entirely dependent upon Moses (Lev. x. 8; Numb. xii. 2). Thus it was by Aaron's hands that many of the miracles in Egypt were wrought (Exod. vii. 9, 10, 19, viii. 5, 6, 16, 17). After the passage of the Red sea we have several notices of Aaron while the people were on their way to Sinai (xvi. 6, 9, 10, 33, 34, xvii. 10-12, xviii. 12, xxiv.). And then, when he was left in charge of Israel while Moses was in the mount, he weakly and sinfully yielded to the people's demand to have some image of a deity for them to worship. The image he made was a calf after the form of the Egyptian Apis or Mnevis (xxxii.; Psal. cvi. 19, 20). It is remarkable that Aaron's own tribe either did not share this sin, or at least were the first to declare their abhorrence of it, and were used as the instruments of punishing the guilty (Exod. xxxii. 26-29). Moses prayed for Aaron (Deut. ix. 20); and, in spite of his transgression, the previous determination was carried out of appointing him and his children to the priesthood (Exod. xxviii., xxix., xl.; Lev. viii., ix.). An awful judgment was inflicted on Aaron's two elder sons, Nadab and Abihu, at the time of consecration: they offered strange fire before the Lord and were consumed; and the agonized father's meek submission has always been justly taken to mark peculiarly the power of divine grace in his heart (x.).

Aaron's history thenceforward is almost exclusively that of the priesthood. It was because this was restricted to his family that Korah rebelled; and a special sign of God's choice of Aaron was given (Numb. xvi., xvii.). Of his personal acts there are but two to be noticed; his jealousy (with Miriam) of Moses (xii.), and his joining in Moses' distrust at Meribah; for which both were excluded from Canaan. He died soon after on mount Hor (xx.), where his grave (as it is called) is still pointed out; the mount bearing Aaron's name. He was 123 years old at his death (xxxiii. 38, 39). The Mosera, where (Deut. x. 6) he is said to have died, was the station close by Hor. See HOR.

We may gather from the history that Aaron was of an impulsive character, leaning for the most part on his brother, but occasionally showing, as is not unfrequent with such minds, a desire to appear independent. His wife was Elisheba, of the tribe of Judah: of his four sons, Eleazar succeeded him in the high-priesthood (Exod. vi. 23; Numb. xx. 26, 28).

A'ARONITES. The family of Aaron, to whom the priesthood belonged (1 Chron. xxvii. 17).

AB (fruit). See MONTHS.

AB'ACUC (2 Esdr. i. 40). The prophet Habakkuk

ABADIAS (1 Esdr. viii. 35). Obadiah (Ezra viii. 9).

ABAD'DON (destruction). The Hebrew name of 'the angel of the bottomless pit,' called in Greek Apollyon (Rev. ix. 11).

ABAG'THA (given by fortune). One of the seven eunuchs in the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

ABA'NA (stony). A river of Damascus (marg. Amana), one of those which Naaman in his pride preferred to the waters of Israel (2 Kings v. 12). It has been identified with the modern Barada. It rises in the beautiful plain of Zebedany, issuing from a little lake, and receiving in its course the waters of two or three fountains. Quitting this plain the Barada dashes over a cliff, thirty feet high, and runs through a magnificent ravine, past the ancient Abila, and is afterwards joined by the stream from 'Ain-Fijeh, one of the largest springs in Syria. Having emerged from the mountains into the plains of Damascus, the Barada flows through orchards and meadows till it enters the city, and, passing through it, falls ultimately into the Bahret-el-Kibliyeh, or South lake.

At its rise the river is 3,343 feet above the sea, and 1,149 above Damascus, which is distant from the source about twenty-one or twenty-two miles. The extent of cultivated land it waters is estimated at 311 square miles, with a population of 150,000 (Journal of Sac. Lit., July 1853, pp. 245-262).

ABA'RIM (regions beyond). Mountains on the east of the Jordan in the territory of Moab, facing Jericho (Numb. xxvii. 12. xxxiii. 47, 48; Deut. xxxii. 49). Pisgah was probably a ridge of these mountains, of which Nebo was a prominent point or spur. The word occurs and is translated 'passages' in Jer. xxii. 20. Perhaps it would have been better to regard Abarim as a proper name there.

AB'BA (father). A Syro-Chaldaic word, retained with the Greek equivalent in the New Testament (Mark xiv. 36; Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6).

AB'DA (servant).—1. The father of Adoniram, one of Solomon's officers (1 Kings iv. 6).—2. One of the Levites (Neh. xi. 17); called also Obadiah (1 Chron. ix. 16).

AB'DEEL (servant of God). Father of Shelemiah (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

AB'DI (servant of Jehovah).—1. A Levite (1 Chron. vi. 44).—2. Another Levite (2 Chron. xxx. 12).—3. One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 26).

ABDI'AS (2 Esdr. i. 39). The prophet Obadiah.

AB'DIEL (servant of God). A chief of Gad (1 Chron. v. 15).

AB'DON (servile).—1. An Ephraimite, one of the judges of Israel (Judges xii. 13-15). It is probably he that is called Bedan (1 Sam. xii. 11).—2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 23).—3. Another Benjamite living at Gibeon (30, ix. 36).—4. One of Josiah's officers (2 Chron. xxxiv. 20); called also Achbor (2 Kings xxii. 12, 14).

AB'DON (id.). A city of Asher assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 30; 1 Chron. vi. 74). It may be identical with that called Hebron (Josh. xix. 28).

ABED'NEGO (servant of Nego, perhaps the same with Nebo, the planet Mercury, or, according to some, servant of splendour, i.e. of the sun). The Chaldean name given to Azariah, one of the Hebrew captives at the court of Babylon (Dan. i. iii.).

A'BEL (a breath, vanity). The second son of Adam and Eve. He was a keeper or feeder of sheep, and offered a sacrifice of the firstlings, the best, of his flock, when Cain his brother brought an oblation of the fruit of the ground (Gen. iv. 1-5). Cain's offering was rejected; while Abel's was accepted, because (we are told, Heb. xi. 4) it was offered in faith, recognizing, we may fairly suppose, the need of atonement for sin. Cain, displeased at the difference made, murdered his brother. In Gen. iv. 6 the literal translation of the Hebrew text is, 'And Cain said to Abel his brother; and it came to pass, &c. It appears as if a clause were wanting. Such a clause is supplied in the Samaritan text, the Targums, the Septuagint, Syriac, Vulgate, and other versions; and there can be little doubt that it is genuine, and that the verse ought to run,

'And Cain said to Abel his brother, Let us go out into the field. And it came to pass, &c. Our Lord refers to Abel as the first martyr (Matt. xxiii. 35). When it is said (Heb. xi. 4), 'by it, his faith, Abel yet speaketh,' there may be a reference to the crying of Abel's blood (Alford, note on the place); but certainly his faith gave testimony in the infancy of the world to the fact that without blood-shedding there could be no remission of sin. Other voices subsequently joined with it; and their united evidence has continued of precious value to strengthen the trust of those that came after them. In Heb. xii. 24 the blood of sprinkling is said to speak 'better things than Abel.' Some have supposed a contrast here between the vengeance that Abel's blood demanded and the mercy obtained by Christ's blood: it is preferable to suppose a comparison. Abel spoke in a typical and obscure way; Jesus better and more distinctly by the reality. The acceptance of Abel's sacrifice was a blessed proof of the divine mercy; how much greater the perfected atonement of the new covenant!

A'BEL (a grassy place, pasture, meadow, or, with different vowels, mourning). The name of several places, almost exclusively with some adjunct, to be supplied if not expressed, as in 2 Sam. xx. 14, 18.

A'BEL, THE GREAT STONE OF. There is, perhaps, an error of transcription in the passage (1 Sam. vi. 18) where this expression occurs in our version. As it stands, the literal translation is 'the great Abel,' i.e. meadow, or mourning (on account of 'the slaughter' made). But the alteration of a letter would make it 'the great stone;' and this is in accordance with the context (14, 15).

A'BEL-BETH-MA'ACHAH (meadow of Beth-Maachah). A city in the extreme north of Palestine, sometimes called simply Abel, to which the rebel Sheba fled (2 Sam. xx. 14, 15, 18). It was taken by Ben-hadad (1 Kings xv. 20), and by Tiglath-Pileser (2 Kings xv. 29). It was probably in the marshy district which drains into the lake of Merom, and may be at the modern Abil. It is called Abel-Maim in 2 Chron. xvi. 4.

A'BEL-MEHO'LAH (meadow of dancing). A place in or near the valley of the Jordan northward (Judges vii. 22; 1 Kings iv. 12). Here was the original residence of Elisha (xix. 16).

A'BEL-MIZ'RAIM (meadow, or probably mourning, of Egypt). The name given to 'the floor of Atad,' generally supposed to be to the east of the Jordan, where the mourning was made seven days for Jacob (Gen. l. 10, 11). But it is very unlikely that the funeral procession would take a circuit round the Dead sea and then cross the Jordan into Canaan. Jerome identifies the place with Beth-Hogla, on the west bank of the river: it is more likely to have been to the south of Hebron. See Kalisch, Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., pp. 776, 777; Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 580. It is corroborative of this view that the inhabitants of the neighbourhood are called 'Canaanites,' indicating those to the west of the Jordan.

'ABEL-SHIT'TIM (acacia meadow). The last station of the Israelites before entering Canaan (Numb. xxxiii. 49), in the low level of Moab by the Jordan. It is more generally called simply Shittim (xxv. 1; Josh. ii. 1). Acacia groves still remain in the vicinity.

'ABEZ (whiteness, or tin). A town of Issachar (Josh. xix. 20).

ABI' (whose father is Jehovah). The mother of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 2), called more fully Abijah (2 Chron. xxix. 1).

ABI'A (id.).—1. Abijah, king of Judah (1 Chron. iii. 10; Matt. i. 7).—2. The Greek form of Abijah, head of one of the courses of the priests (Luke i. 5). See ABIJAH.

ABI'AH (id.).—1. The second son of Samuel (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 28).—2. The wife of Hezron (ii. 24).—3. The son of Becher, Benjamin's son (vii. 8).

ABI-AL'BON (father of strength, i.e. strong). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 31). He is also called Abiel (1 Chron. xi. 32).

ABI'ASAPH (father of gathering, i.e. gatherer). A Levite, one of the sons of Korah (Exod. vi. 24). The same person is elsewhere called Ebiasaph (1 Chron. vi. 23, 37, ix. 19); in the first of which places he seems to be Korah's great-grandson. But it is questionable whether a great-grandson of Korah could have been the head of a family in the time of Moses. Perhaps, therefore, in 1 Chron. vi. 22, 23, Assir, Elkanah, and Ebiasaph are to be reckoned as sons of Korah; the line of Ebiasaph being first given (23, 24), and then that of Elkanah (25-28); or there may be some error of transcription.

ABI'ATHAR (father of abundance). The son of Ahimelech, the high priest whom Saul put to death on the charge of enquiring of the Lord for David (1 Sam. xxii. 11-19). Abiathar escaped to David 'with an ephod in his hand,' and accompanied him in his wanderings (20-23, xxiii. 6, 9, xxx. 7). Through David's reign Abiathar was high priest, and the king's faithful counsellor (1 Chron. xxvii. 34). He linked himself, however, with the party of Adonijah (1 Kings i. 7); it may be through some jealousy of Zadok, who, perhaps placed in the high-priesthood by Saul, had not joined David till that monarch's death (1 Chron. xii. 28), and who is generally afterwards mentioned with Abiathar (2 Sam. viii. 17, xx. 25). Zadok was of the house of Eleazar, the elder and more powerful; Abiathar of that of Ithamar, the younger branch, from which the high-priesthood was to pass on account of Eli's sin. And, therefore, though Abiathar seems to have continued chief, yet Zadok is generally named before him. Abiathar's offence was forgiven; and we still, when Solomon was on the throne, find him named as in his office (1 Kings iv. 4). But, shortly after, Adonijah made his second attempt; and Solomon, knowing or inferring Abiathar's connection with it, deposed and banished him to Anathoth (ii. 26). In 2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. xviii. 16, xxiv. 3, 6, 31, there are errors of transcription, 'Ahimelech' or 'Abimelech, son of Abiathar,' for 'Abiathar, son of Ahimelech.' Also, in Mark ii. 26, Abiathar is called 'high priest' during the life of his father. But most likely Abiathar was ministering with his father at the time; and, further, the word rendered here 'high priest' is frequently applied to other men of rank in the priesthood besides the single chief (see Matt. ii. 4).

AB'IB (a green ear). See MONTHS.

AB'IDA or AB'IDAH (father of knowledge). A son of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chron. i. 33).

AB'IDAN (father of the judge). Prince of Benjamin (Numb. i. 11, ii. 22, vii. 60, 65, x. 24).

AB'IEL (father of strength, i.e. strong).—1. The father of Kish and Ner, and consequently grandfather of Saul and Abner (1 Sam. ix. 1, xiv. 51). But, in 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39, Ner is said to have been father of Kish. Probably there is here some transcriber's error. See SAUL, 2.—2. One of David's warriors. See ABI-ALBON.

ABIE'ZER (father of help).—1. The son or nephew of Gilead (1 Chron. vii. 18) called by contraction Jeezer (Numb. xxvi. 30), of the tribe of Manasseh. The family of Abiezer would seem to have had their inheritance on the west of the Jordan (Josh. xvii. 2; Judges vi. 24, 34, viii. 2). Gideon was one of their descendants.—2. One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 27; 1 Chron. xi. 28, xxvii. 12).

ABIEZ'RITES. A family so called from Abiezer of Gilead (Judges vi. 11, 24, viii. 32).

AB'IGAIL (whose father is exultation, father's joy).—1. The prudent wife of Nabal, who appeased David's anger excited by her husband's churlishness. David married her after Nabal's death (1 Sam. xxv). She bore him a son called Chileab (2 Sam. iii. 3), and Daniel (1 Chron. iii. 1).—2. One of David's sisters, married to Ithra or Jether, and mother by him of Amasa, Absalom's commander-in-chief (2 Sam. xvii. 25; 1 Chron. ii. 17). There are variations in the spelling of this name in Hebrew.

ABIHA'IL (father of might, i.e. mighty).—1. The father of Zuriel, chief of the families of Merari (Numb. iii. 35).—2. The wife of Abishur (1 Chron. ii. 29).—3. The son of Huri, who appears to have been a descendant of Gad (v. 14).—4. The wife of Rehoboam, daughter or descendant of Eliab, David's elder brother (2 Chron. xi. 18).—5. The father of Esther (Esth. ii. 15, ix. 29). The spelling of this name occasionally varies in the original.

ABI'HU (to whom he, i.e. God, is father). The second son of Aaron (Exod. vi. 23; Numb. iii. 2); who, with Moses, Aaron, his elder brother Nadab, and seventy of the elders, was privileged to ascend Sinai and behold some manifestation of God (Exod. xxiv. 1, 9, 10). He, with his father and brothers, was consecrated to the priesthood (Lev. viii., ix.); but just after, presumptuously using strange fire, that is, not that which came from before the Lord (vi. 9, 12, ix. 24), he and Nadab were consumed (x. 1-6). It has been thought from the following verses (8-11) that they were then intoxicated.

ABIHUD (whose father is Judah, i.e. splendour or praise). One of the descendants of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 3).

ABIJAH (whose father is Jehovah).—1. The son of Jeroboam I., king of Israel. In him alone of that wicked house was 'good toward the Lord God' (1 Kings xiv. 1-18). He was therefore mercifully taken from the evil to come; and the people mourned his early death.—2. A king of Judah, son of Rehoboam and Maachah or Michajah, granddaughter of Absalom; the term daughter signifying descendant (xv. 2; 2 Chron. xi. 20, xiii. 2). Abijah, called also Abijam, made war on Jeroboam. The armies raised on each side were, according to the present text of Chronicles, enormous (3, 17); but there is reason to believe that the numbers are inaccurate. In various editions of the Vulgate version, they are put at 80,000, 40,000, and 50,000. Abijah made a vain-glorious speech to Jeroboam's forces before the battle, and was completely victorious. He was an ungodly prince. He did not, indeed, throw off the profession of religion, but was worldly, time-serving, and careless, like his unstable father Rehoboam (1 Kings xv. 3; 2 Chron. xiii. 21). He died after a reign of three years, 957-955 B.C.—3. The head of one of the courses of priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 10; Neh. xii. 17); termed Abia in Luke i. 5.—4. The mother of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 11). She is also called Abi (2 Kings xviii. 2).—5. A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 7).—6. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, or possibly the representative of the course of Abijah (xii. 4, 17). So the name attached to the covenant (x. 7) may have represented the course.

ABIJAM (father of the sea, i.e. a maritime person). The king elsewhere called Abijah (1 Kings xv. 1, 7, 8). See ABIJAH, 2.

ABILA (probably the same as Abel, a grassy place). A city called Abila of Lysanias, to distinguish it from other Syrian cities of the same name. It was in the centre of the Anti-libanus, eighteen Roman miles from Damascus on the road to Heliopolis or Baalbec, and was the capital of Abilene. Its site has been identified with Sak-Wady-Barada, a small village on the right bank of the river Barada, the ancient Abana, which breaks just by through a picturesque mountain gorge. Inscriptions have been found here; and there are the remains of a tomb called Kabr Habil, 'the tomb of Abil.' Abila was in Christian times a bishop's see, and was sacked by the Moslems 634 A.D.

ABILENE. A tetrarchy or small district among the eastern declivities of Anti-libanus, described by St. Luke (iii. 1) as under the government of Lysanias when John the Baptist commenced his ministry. It is hardly possible to determine its exact

ABIM'AEI (father of might, or my father from God). A descendant of Joktan (Gen. x. 28; 1 Chron. i. 22). He has been supposed to be the progenitor of a tribe settled at Mali in Arabia, perhaps the same as those called Manitea, or Minael.

ABIM'ELECH (father of the king, or royal father). This name was probably a common title of the Philistine kings, as Pharaoh among the Egyptians.

1. A Philistine king of Gerar, who took Sarah into his harem. Admonished by God in a dream, he restored her to Abraham, to whom he gave a thousand pieces of silver, saying 'behold, he (or it, the money) is to thee a covering of the eyes' (Gen. xx.). The meaning of Abimelech's expression is obscure. Many believe that it was a charge to purchase veils for Sarah and her attendants, who in tent-life had not worn them, that she might be known to be a married woman, exclusively belonging to her husband (Bush, Notes on Genesis, xx. 16). Kalsich (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 431) translates, 'he is to thee a protection, &c.; and thou wilt be recognized,' implying that Abraham was sufficient to protect Sarah from voluptuous eyes, and if she pretended to be his sister she would be known to be his wife by God's direct interference. Subsequently a treaty was made between Abraham and Abimelech (xxi. 22-32).—2. Another king of Gerar, of whom a somewhat-similar account is given in regard to Isaac and Rebekah (xxvi.).—3. The son of Gideon by a concubine. He murdered all his brothers but one, and reigned in Shechem. There is no ground for supposing, as some have done, that thus Shechem separated from the general government of Israel. There was no general government (Judges xvii. 6); and the federal bond between the tribes was very loose, as is clear by the fact that most of the various judges had authority over only a part of the land. Dissensions soon arose between Abimelech and the people; and he was ultimately killed at Thebez (ix.).—4. The name given, probably by error of transcription, as that of a son of Abiathar the high priest (1 Chron. xviii. 16). See ABIATHAR, AHIMELECH.—5. The name attributed (Psal. xxxiv., title) to a Philistine king, elsewhere called ACHISH, which see.

ABIN'ADAB (father of nobleness, or noble father).—1. A man in whose dwelling, at the hill of Kirjath-jearim, the ark of God was placed for many years (1 Sam. vii. 1; 2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; 1 Chron. xiii. 7).—2. The second son of Jesse (1 Sam. xvi. 8, xvii. 13; 1 Chron. ii. 13).—3. A son of Saul slain at the battle on mount Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 2; 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39, x. 2). See ISHUI.—4. The father of one of Solomon's officers (1 Kings iv. 11). This may possibly be the same with No. 2.

AB'NER (father of light). (1 Sam. xiv. 50, marg.). Elsewhere ARNER, which see.

ABIN'OAM (father of pleasantness). The father of Barak (Judges iv. 6, 12, v. 1, 12).

ABIRAM (father of loftiness or renown).

-1. A Reubenite who with Korah, Dathan, and others, resisted Moses and Aaron, and perished miserably (Numb. xvi.). See KORAH.
-2. The eldest son of Hiel the Bethelite; he died when his father laid the foundation of Jericho (1 Kings xvi. 34; comp. Josh. vi. 26).

AB'IRON (Ecclus. xiv. 18). See ABIRAM, No. 1.

AB'ISEI (2 Esdr. i. 2). A Greek form of Abishua.

AB'ISHAG (father of error). A beautiful Shunammite taken into David's harem in his old age. She was after his death asked in marriage by Adonijah (1 Kings i. 3, 15, ii. 17, 21, 22).

AB'ISHAI (father of a gift). One of the three sons of Zeruah, David's sister (2 Sam. ii. 18). He was of a bold impetuous character, and served David faithfully. He volunteered to go with him to Saul's camp, and would willingly have slain the king (1 Sam. xxvi. 6-12). He abetted his brother Joab in the murder of Abner (2 Sam. iii. 30). Placed in command of a brigade of the Israelitish army he defeated the Ammonites; while at the same time Joab gained a victory over the Syrians (x. 9-14). He was eager to punish Shimei (xvi. 9, xix. 21). He commanded a division in the battle with Absalom (xxviii. 2). He rescued David from Ishbi-benob (xxi. 16, 17). He had a high place among David's warriors (xxiii. 18; 1 Chron. xi. 20); and he seems to have materially contributed to the victory in the valley of Salt (2 Sam. viii. 13; 1 Chron. xviii. 12), probably commanding under David. We have no account of his death.

AB'ISHALOM (father of peace). The father of Maachah (1 Kings xv. 2, 10). He is called Absalom (2 Chron. xi. 20, 21), and was most likely David's son of that name.

AB'ISHUA (father of happiness).—1. The son of Phinehas the high priest, perhaps first himself (1 Chron. vi. 4, 5, 50; Ezra vii. 5).—2. A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 4).

AB'ISHUR (father of the wall, i.e. strong-hold or defence). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 28, 29).

AB'ISUM (1 Esdr. viii. 2). A form of Abishua.

AB'ITAL (whose father is the dew). One of David's wives (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Chron. iii. 3).

AB'ITUB (father of goodness). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 11).

AB'UD (whose father is Judah, or praise). A person in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Matt. i. 13).

ABLUTION. See PURIFICATION.

AB'NER (father of light). The son of Ner, who was brother to Kish the father of Saul. Abner was therefore Saul's cousin, and was made by him commander-in-chief of the Israelitish army (1 Sam. xiv. 50, 51, xvii. 55, 57, xxvi. 5, 7, 14, 15). After Saul's death we find him espousing the cause of Ish-bosheth, whom he carried over the Jordan, and established as king at Mahanaim, consolidating by degrees his authority, till at last the tribes generally, with the exception of Judah, acknowledged him their sovereign. Abner maintained also a war with David, and in one engagement killed, in self-defence, Asahel, the brother of Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. ii.). Perhaps he now had some idea of seizing the Israelitish throne for himself; for he appropriated a woman of Saul's harem, which Ish-bosheth interpreted as an overt act of rebellion. Abner, in high displeasure at having his proceedings questioned, resolved to seek a reconciliation with David. But he was treacherously murdered by Joab and Abishai, ostensibly because he had killed Asahel, really, we may suppose, through jealousy, as he would have at least rivalled Joab in position. David, though unable to punish the powerful brothers, solemnized Abner's funeral with great respect and general mourning, and uttered an elegiac lament over him (iii.). There are one or two further incidental notices of Abner: see 1 Chron. xxvi. 28, xxvii. 21. He is also called Abiner (1 Sam. xiv. 50, marg.).

ABOMINATION. This term is generally applied to anything impure or unclean according to the Mosaic law, especially to idol-worship. Two Hebrew words are for the most part used where our version has 'abomination.' They are nearly synonymous, save that one, shikkoots, is, with perhaps few exceptions (see, however, Isai. lxxvi. 17; Nah. iii. 6), spoken of some impurity caused or adopted by the Israelites themselves. It is found in such passages as 2 Kings xxi. 2, xxiii. 13; Ezek. vii. 20; Hos. ix. 10.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. This is spoken of by Daniel (ix. 27, xi. 31, xii. 11). His prediction would seem to have had a fulfilment when, under the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, an idol was set up on the altar of God, apostate Israelites concurring in the sin (1 Macc. i. 52-59). But the prophecy had, to say the least, a further reference. For our Lord appeals to it (Matt. xxiv. 15-18; Mark xiii. 14-16), and declares that its fulfilment was to be the warning for his disciples to flee from the doomed city. This would be simultaneous with the investment of Jerusalem (Luke xxi. 20, 21). Some have believed the investment (when Cestius Gallus first encamped around Jerusalem 66 A.D., and then withdrew) the abomination of desolation itself; the Roman standards (objects of worship to the soldiers) being then planted on holy ground. But these standards had been there before; and so it is more likely (see ABOMINATION; the word, shikkoots, there noted being used in Daniel) that the abominable thing was something done by the Jews themselves. Now Josephus (Bell. Jud. lib. iv. 3, §§ 7, 8, &c.) mentions a profanation by the Zelots who had got possession of the temple; and to this or some similar deed our Lord, we may suppose, referred. See Alford, The Greek Test. note on Matt. xxiv. 15. The Christians, it may be added, took the warning, the opportunity being afforded by the retirement of Gallus, and fled to Pella.

A'BRAHAM (father of a multitude). The patriarch selected to be the progenitor of a race of men who might be the depository of divine truth and the heirs of divine promise, in whom, too, God's great purpose of mercy to the world might be typified and furthered; the earthly blessings of the covenant with them prognosticating, and giving earnest of, and in a sense shaping, the spiritual and eternal blessings of a better future covenant.

Abram, for such was the patriarch's original name, was of the race of Shem. He was the son, probably the youngest, of Terah (Gen. xi. 26), who lived in Ur a city of the Chaldees. There is a legend that, having set himself to oppose the idolatry that prevailed around, he was cast by Nimrod into a furnace, whence he was miraculously delivered unhurt, the furnace changing into a meadow. Of such stories the scripture knows nothing. Terah was seventy years of age when the first of his three sons was born. Several years probably elapsed from the birth of the eldest to that of the youngest. For, if Terah was dead when Abram was seventy-five, as scripture implies (xii. 4; Acts vii. 4), then, as Terah lived 205 years (Gen. xi. 32), Abram was born when his father was 130. This is in a degree confirmed by the fact that Haran, Abram's brother, died in Ur, and that Haran's son Lot would seem to have been not so very much younger than his uncle Abram; while Haran's daughter Milcah was married to Nahor, her father's brother (27-29). Abram's immediate ancestors, and very probably his father Terah, were idolaters (Josh. xxiv. 2). Terah, however, obeyed the divine call given to his son to leave Ur, and with several members of his family proceeded to Haran on the road to Canaan, and there after some sojourn he died (Gen. xi. 31, 32).

Abram's proper history now begins. He was commanded to go into Canaan, receiving at the time a two-fold promise, that his seed should become a vast multitude, and that, a blessing himself, in his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed. Abram was become a wealthy chief, and, with the servants and the substance that belonged to him, accompanied by his wife Sarai and his nephew Lot, he entered Canaan (xii. 1-5). The country was already occupied by descendants of Ham. But, when Abram had traversed a considerable extent of it (for the expression 'passed through the land' seems to show that his march southward was west of the Jordan through the districts afterwards called Galilee and Samaria), and had pitched in the plain, or at the oak, of Moreh by Shechem, a fertile spot, there he had the assurance first given him that that land should be the possession of his seed, therein should be accomplished all the large promise before uttered of a multitudinous offspring, the blessing to the world. Henceforth the covenant had a definite location; and Abram had a home assigned him, if not in possession, yet to be held by faith, a goodly land on earth, precious, too, as the type to the church of God, through all the generations of her pilgrimage, of a yet goodlier home, 'a better country, that is, an heavenly' (Heb. xi. 13-16). In the spot where he was camping Abram erected an altar (Gen. xii. 6, 7); and we must henceforth view him as the patriarch of the covenant, the one that peculiarly 'had the promises,' the patriarch of faith so strong as to be 'held forth an example and a pattern to other ages, with the encouragement that they who were 'of faith' should be 'blessed with faithful Abraham' (Gal. iii. 9). And little is related of Abram's story save what tends to elucidate the provisions and promises of the covenant made with him.

We must briefly sketch his wanderings. Removing from Moreh he pitched on a mount to the east of Bethel, and journeying south he went down into Egypt (famine then afflicting Canaan), establishing there the first link of that mysterious chain which so long, through almost all their history, bound the chosen people for discipline and for warning to the Egyptians. But here, alas! Abram's faith wavered. Knowing that Pharaoh would not dare to take his wife from him, but in abhorrence of adultery would rather commit murder, fearing therefore that for Sarai's sake he should lose his own life, Abram, with some of that eastern cunning which more or less displayed itself in many of his descendants, disavowed his marriage. He was rescued by God's providence from the false position in which he had placed himself, and enriched by Pharaoh (who, as is not improbably supposed, might be of the Hyksos or dynasty of the shepherd-kings) he returned to Canaan (Gen. xii. 10-20). Abram was wealthy; and Lot was wealthy too. Had the land been empty, they might very well have extended their encampments in it. But the Canaanites and Perizzites were there too; and therefore uncle and nephew must separate. From a hill near Bethel, which it is said may still be identified, Abram and Lot surveyed the country; and Lot having his choice allowed him selected the rich valley of the Jordan for his abode, careless what kind of associates he would thus meet with; while Abram, with the renewed assurance that Canaan should be given to his seed, went southward to Mamre and dwelt there (xiii.). Lot was soon involved in the disasters of the neighbourhood he had chosen. He was made prisoner in the irruption of an eastern monarch, of whom something, it is said, is yet to be dimly traced in the deciphered Assyrian inscriptions (see CHEDOR-LOMER); and Abram resolved to attempt his nephew's rescue. On his victorious return he received the blessing of Melchizedek (xiv.).

But Abram's faith began to be sorely tried. The promise was to him in his seed; and as yet he had no child. Years rolled on; and the likelihood of his having offspring grew less and less. The promise was therefore reiterated: Abram believed it. And now, because his faith held on, not only when accomplishment seemed easy, but when it was delayed and seemed most difficult, well-nigh impossible, now, when there was the word alone, the bare promise, with no outward confirmation, and Abram still believed, God 'counted it to him for righteousness.' The trial of his faith was very very precious, 'much more precious than of gold that perisheth' (1 Pet. i. 7). And then there was a symbol vouchsafed him, and larger promise that his posterity should possess the whole extent of country between the river of Egypt and the Euphrates—a promise which was abundantly fulfilled; for, even if Israel appropriated not all that region (though David and Solomon governed it), yet certainly Abraham's seed, Midian, and Jokshan, and Edom, and Ishmael, overspread the wide territories enumerated (Gen. xv.). Sarai's faith, however, faltered, though Abram's did not; and, as the promise was not yet announced that the holy seed should come from Sarai's womb, she gave her husband her Egyptian maid, intending to adopt her child. Abram then had a son, Ishmael; but he was not the heir of promise (xvi.). Thirteen years passed on, perhaps spent at Mamre; and the purposes of God were ripening. The covenant was now made more definite: Sarai was included in the promise: the names of the pair were changed to Abraham and Sarah; and the sign of circumcision was added, to be a token throughout all generations that God had been with and was blessing Abraham his friend (xvii.). But there must be delay and trial still. The Lord held again mysterious conference with Abraham, just ere Sodom was destroyed (xvii.); and Abraham, perhaps in consequence of that catastrophe, journeyed south-west into the land of the Philistines at Gerar; and there the evil step in Egypt was repeated (xx.). O how hard it is for man, even at his best estate, to walk in the path of uprightness! Abraham showed again that he was 'of like passions and infirmities' with all his race.

At length God's time was come; and Sarah bare Abraham a son (probably at Gerar) in his old age. And then indeed there was joy; the promise long waited for being now fulfilled. The name given to the child, Isaac (laughter or sporting), indicated this. Once Sarah had laughed incredulously at the idea of her having a son, and Abraham had laughed too, his faith, strong as it was, being then inclined to fix on Ishmael as the heir of his name and blessing (xvii. 17, 18, xviii. 12); but now the happy parents laughed with thankful joy; and all their friends that heard the tidings laughed and rejoiced with them (xxi. 1-7). There was a feast made when Isaac was weaned; yet the mirth of that feast was dashed with heaviness. The son of the bondwoman, jealous perhaps of Isaac's happier lot, was discovered mocking; and Sarah insisted that he and his mother Hagar should be banished from the encampment. It was very grievous to Abraham; but God commanded him to yield; and Hagar and Ishmael went forth, their ejection symbolizing a gospel truth, and proving the best means of fulfilling the promise that Ishmael should become a great nation (8-21; Gal. iv. 22-31).

There were some petty troubles from Abimelech in the patriarch's life, but with this exception nothing is recorded of the space of perhaps twenty-five years. His residence was now at Beer-sheba. And then came a strange and crushing trial. To comprehend it, we must bear in mind that Abraham lived among idolaters, who ruthlessly made their children pass through the fire (Lev. xviii. 21, 24, 25; Deut. xviii. 9, 10). Many a time must Abraham have seen from afar the smoke of sacrifices, and known that human victims were offered there. And his heart must have glowed when he remembered that his God required no such homage; and perhaps he had to stand the scoff of those around, that he had chosen a very easy religion, demanding not the self-denying obedience which theirs did. For, surely, though they practised these cruel abominations, many hearts among them must have bled as their dearest were taken as victims; and though they yielded to the stern law it must have been with grief and bitter tears. Their obedience, then, they would say, was far deeper and more meritorious than Abraham's easy service. But then came the command, 'Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac whom thou lovest . . . and offer him for a burnt-offering.' It was not merely the laceration of domestic ties, not only the apparent blight of the promise so long waited for and then fulfilled—the whole basis of his trust seemed overturned, the character of the God he worshipped changed, his religion no better than that of the surrounding tribes. Imagination cannot conceive a harder trial. And faith most strong indeed it must have been, to hold on still, to be convinced that all this fearful mystery would be cleared up, and that the child of promise, even if he did slay him, would be the child of promise still, raised from the very dead, rather than that the word spoken concerning him should fail. So Abraham went steadily on, acting literally as God had told him; going to the mountain named Moriah, where the temple was afterwards built, it is generally supposed; though some believe it was Gerizim, thinking Jerusalem not far enough for the three days' journey, and the hill there not conspicuous at a distance; but this supposition Dr. Thomson, a competent authority, strongly opposes); and then, just at the last moment, when hope must have well-nigh died, faith was marvellously crowned; and Abraham received back his son from the dead 'in a figure' (Heb. xi. 17-19). The promises were again confirmed to him, now rendered surer than ever, the spiritual blessing in them being prominently exhibited; and, with gratitude which even the sacred historian does not attempt to describe, Abraham returned to Beer-sheba (Gen. xxii.). This great event was the most wonderful in the patriarch's life. Then it was, no doubt, that his eye was opened to perceive in the dim future another sacrifice, of a dearer Son yielded by a higher Father (and probably, as just said, on or near that very spot), a sacrifice actually consummated, by the virtue of which a propitiation of world-wide virtue was effected. Abraham rejoiced as he saw the glimmer of that coming day, when in his seed, in One of his line, all the families of the earth should have a blessing (John viii. 56). The lessons to be derived from Abraham's faith, how it was counted to him for righteousness, and how the reality of it was shown in the deeds it prompted, are frequently dwelt on in scripture (Rom. iv. 1-5; James ii. 20-23).

The rest of Abraham's history is comparatively scanty. He seems to have removed from Beer-sheba to Kirjath-Arba or Hebron; and there Sarah died when he was 137. He purchased for her sepulchre the field and cave of Machpelah from the princes of the land, to hold seisin, as it were, of the country his descendants should possess, by the bones of his family resting there. The bargain with Ephron is very characteristic of eastern manners to the present day. Some, misled by Ephron's courteous speech, have fancied that he really intended to offer his field to Abraham for a gift. But this is from sheer ignorance of oriental habits. Ephron was a shrewd man, who well knew how to drive a bargain; and a good one he made for himself (Gen. xxiii.). Abraham then took care that his son Isaac should not match with the idolatrous families around (xxiv.). And next there is the strange record that he had another wife, and children by her; and even 'concubines' are mentioned. Keturah was a secondary or inferior wife, not given to the patriarch by Sarah, as Hagar is. It may be, therefore, that, though the fact is noted so late, the children had been born much earlier. But we can hardly arrive at certainty on this matter. Be it as it may, Abraham sent away his other sons with gifts into the East, that they might not interfere with Isaac, to whom his great inheritance belonged. And then he died, having seen Isaac's sons, 'in a good old age, an old man, and full of years,' 175 years old, and was buried by Isaac and Ishmael, brothers no doubt now in affection, in the cave of Machpelah, where perchance his bones may still be lying.

Such briefly is the story of this father of the faithful, from whom the precious seed descended, and into whose bosom the faithful dead are said to have been conveyed (Luke xvi. 22). His faith we are to follow: his example we should diligently imitate.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM. A figurative expression, not implying preeminent favour to one individual (as in John xiii. 23), but denoting the happy condition in the intermediate state of all Abraham's real children (Luke xvi. 23), 'the happy side of Hades,' says Dr. Alford (note on the place), 'where all the fathers were conceived as resting in bliss.'

A'BRAM (father of elevation). The original name of ABRAHAM; which see.

AB'RECH (governor?) (Gen. xli. 43, marg.). This word is in the text of our version rendered 'Bow the knee.' It is very uncertain what its real meaning is. Possibly it expresses the dignity of Joseph, and is explained by the succeeding words of the verse. See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., note, pp. 652, 653.

AB'SALOM (father of peace). The third son of David, by Maachah, the daughter of Talmal, king of Geshur, born at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 3; 1 Chron. iii. 2). Absalom revenge the dishonour done to Tamar, his sister, by Amnon, his half-brother, by killing him at a feast, and then fled to his father-in-law, Talmal (2 Sam. xiii.). After three years, by means of Joab, he was enabled to return to Jerusalem, and in two years more fully restored to David's favour (xiv.). Absalom was now nourishing the ambitious scheme of supplanting his father. He was very beautiful and had extraordinary hair, which when cut every year weighed 200 shekels, the exact equivalent to which in our weights it is not easy to ascertain; or, possibly, the hair was of 200 shekels value. He took great pains to acquire popularity, and after four years (so probably we should read xv. 7) he raised the standard of revolt at Hebron. The history of this rebellion, its first success—there being evidently some ill-feeling in his own tribe of Judah towards David—with the iniquitous conduct of Absalom, and his final defeat, may be read in xv.-xviii. See DAVID. David wished to spare his unhappy son's life; but in the rout, his mule carrying him under the thick boughs of an oak, his head was caught; and Joab, being made aware of this, despatched him. Absalom had three sons and a daughter (xiv. 27); but it would seem that his sons died before him, as he erected a pillar to keep his name in remembrance (xviii. 18). A monument outside the walls of Jerusalem now bears

AB'SHAI (1 Chron. xix. 11, marg.). See ABISHAI.

ABSTINENCE. Abstinence and fasting are ecclesiastically distinguished: the last respects the quantity, the first the quality of food. But the word 'abstinence' is only once found in our version of the bible (Acts xxvii. 21), and there it must mean the not taking of food at all. The idea, however, of refraining from some particular kind of food is familiar to the scripture. Thus the prohibition laid upon Adam and Eve was of this character (Gen. ii. 16, 17). Possibly, before the flood, animal food was not allowed (i. 29). To Noah and his posterity blood was forbidden (ix. 4). Other customs and enactments concerned the Israelites (xxxii. 32; Lev. xi. xvii. 10-16). The priests, moreover, were to abstain from wine and strong drink in their ministrations (x. 8-11). See also the law of the Nazarite (Numb. vi. 1-8, 20). Many of these prohibitions were but temporary; and in the early Christian church the only injunction given was, to abstain from blood, things strangled, and meats offered to idols (Acts xv. 20, 29).

ACA'TAN (1 Esdr. viii. 38). Hakkatan (Ezra viii. 12).

ACCAD (fortress). One of the four cities which are said to have been the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen. x. 10). It is not easy to identify Accad. One supposition is that Nisibis on the Khabour occupies its site, 150 miles east of Orfa. Rawlinson (Herod. vol. i. p. 319) considers Akkad the name of the primitive Hamite race, whose original seat was Babylonia, and from whose language was derived the trunk Shemitic stream of tongues.

ACCARON (1 Macc. x. 89). Ekron.

AC'CHO (heated sand). A sea-port town on the coast of Palestine, situated on the northern headland of a bay to which it gives name; mount Carmel being at the other extremity. Accho was about thirty miles south of Tyre. It was in the allotment of Asher, but does not seem to have ever been occupied by the Israelites. The fertile plain in the neighbourhood is watered by the Belus, now Nahr Naaman, which falls into the sea close by the town. Accho was subsequently called Ptolemais (Acts xxi. 7), and is mentioned in the wars of the Maccabees. By the Romans it was made a colony: in modern times it is known by the name of St. Jean d'Acre, and is still a place of importance.

ACC'COZ (1 Esdr. v. 38). Koz (Ezra ii. 61).

ACCURSED. This word is sometimes used of those formally condemned by God's law, as in Deut. xxi. 23. It is also applied to persons cut off from the church, or irrevocably devoted to extermination. See ANATHEMA, EXCOMMUNICATION.

ACCUSER OF THE BRETHREN. Satan is so denominated (Rev. xii. 10). The applicability of the title is obvious from Job i. 9-11, ii. 4, 5; Zech. iii. 1. It is by the mighty power of Christ alone, 'by the blood of the Lamb' (Rev. xii. 11), that this enemy's accusations can be met and overcome.

ACEL'DAMA (field of blood). A piece of land called originally 'the potter's field,' which was purchased with the money given to Judas for betraying Christ. It would seem that there the traitor hanged himself, and that hence the place was known as the field of blood. It was afterwards appropriated to the burial of strangers (Matt. xxvii. 6-8; Acts i. 18, 19). It has been asserted that the two accounts are contradictory, but Dr. Alexander (Acts of the Apostles, note on i. 18) well says, 'Peter is here speaking, not as a historian, but as an orator, to those already well acquainted with the facts, and, therefore, in no danger of misapprehension. He contrasts the loss and gain of the betrayer: he had lost his office and his soul, and he had gained—a field, a piece of ground, which only served to perpetuate his infamy!' Various spots have been supposed to be the field of blood: that now bearing the name is on the southern face of the valley of the son of Hinnom, at the eastern end: a ruined edifice stands on it.

ACHA'IA. This was the original name of a district in the north-west of the Peloponnesus: in New Testament times it had a wider signification; for the Roman provinces of Achaia and Macedonia comprehended the whole of Greece. It is in this larger sense that Achaia must be understood (Acts xviii. 12, 27, xix. 21; Rom. xv. 26, xvi. 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 15; 2 Cor. i. 1, ix. 2, xi. 10; 1 Thess. i. 7, 8). Achaia was first a senatorial province, and had proconsuls. Tiberius changed it into a province imperial under procurators; and Claudius restored it to the senate. Hence Gallio, before whom Paul appeared, was proconsul. Corinth was the capital city.

ACHA'ICUS (belonging to Achaia). A Christian, perhaps one of the family or household of Stephanas of Corinth (1 Cor. xvi. 17).

A'CHAN (troubler). A man of the tribe of Judah, who at the sacking of Jericho appropriated, contrary to God's express command, a portion of the spoil. Hence the repulse before Ai. Achan's guilt being discovered, he was carried with his family and all his property into the valley of Achor, and there stoned and afterwards burned. Joshua, alluding, as he sentenced him, to his name, said, 'Why hast thou troubled us? The Lord shall trouble thee this day.' It would seem that Achan's family shared his punishment—how far they were involved in his crime we know not—and that his possessions were destroyed (Josh. vii.). He is also called A'CHAR (id.). (1 Chron. ii. 10).

A'CHAZ (Matt. i. 9). The Greek form of AHAZ; which see.

ACH'BOR (mouse).—1. The father of Baalhanan, an Edomite king (Gen. xxxvi. 38, 39; 1 Chron. i. 49).—2. One of Josiah's officers (2 Kings xxii. 12, 14). In 2 Chron.

xxxiv. 20 he is called Abdon. The same person is most probably meant in Jer. xxvi. 22, xxxvi. 12.

ACHIACH'ARUS.—1. (Tob. i. 21, &c.).—2. (xiv. 10).

ACH'AS (2 Esdr. i. 2).

A'CHIM. (This may be the same name with Jachin, whom God makes firm). One in the line of our Lord's ancestors (Matt. i. 14).

A'CHIOR (Judith v. 5, &c.).

A'CHISH (angry?). A Philistine king at Gath. David fled twice to him. The first time he was in some danger, from being recognized as one who had distinguished himself against the Philistines; he therefore feigned madness (1 Sam. xxi. 10-15). The second time Achish treated David kindly, gave him Ziklag, and took him to the campaign against Saul (xxvii., xxviii. 1, 2, xxix.). At a later period Shimei went to Achish in pursuit of his servants; it is doubtful whether this was the same king (1 Kings ii. 39, 40). In the title of Psal. xxxiv. he is called Abimelech.

ACH'METHA (station for horses, or perhaps fortress) (Ezra vi. 2). See ECBATANA.

A'CHOR (trouble). A valley near Jericho, now Wady el-Kelt, where Achan was stoned; and from the trouble Achan brought upon Israel it had its name (Josh. vii. 24, 26). Yet from that trouble sanctified a new career of victory began. With this idea we find the place and the circumstance afterwards adverted to (Hos. ii. 15). The valley of trouble was the door through which Israel entered Canaan first; and again through the valley of trouble would the Lord lead his ransomed people to peace and rest. The boundary-line of Judah ran by Achor (Josh. xv. 7); it is also mentioned in Isai. lxx. 10.

ACH'SA, ACH'SAH (anklet).—1. The daughter of Caleb. Caleb promised her in marriage to any one who should take Kirjath-sepher. Othniel, son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, took the city and gained the hand of Achsab, to whom her father gave an inheritance (Josh. xv. 16-19; Judges i. 12-15).—2. Daughter of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 49).

ACH'SHAPH (fascination). A city of Canaan (Josh. xi. 1, xii. 20), in the division of the land allotted to Asher (xix. 25). It is perhaps the modern Kesaf.

ACH'ZIB (deceit).—1. A city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 44; Micah i. 14); in the last-named place the prophet makes a play upon words, q.d., 'the houses of the lying town shall be a lie.' This is probably identical with Chezib (Gen. xxxviii. 5).—2. A town allotted to Asher (Josh. xix. 29); from which, however, that tribe did not expel the Canaanites (Judges i. 31); it is now Es-Zib.

ACIP'PHA (1 Esdr. v. 31).

ACRABATTINE (1 Macc. v. 3). See ARABATTINE.

ACRAB'BIM (Josh. xv. 3, marg.). See AKRABBIM.

ACRE. The word occurs in 1 Sam. xiv. 14; Isai. v. 10. The original Hebrew term denotes 'a yoke,' used in these places as a measure of land, i.e. as much as a yoke of oxen can plough in a day.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. The book so called is the fifth and last of the historical books of the New Testament; it connects the Gospels with the Epistles, being a fitting supplement to the former and a valuable introduction to the latter.

There can be no reasonable question that St. Luke was the writer of this book. It must have been composed by one man, because there is an unity of purpose traceable in it, and the style (which is very perspicuous) and manner are remarkably homogeneous. The Greek is comparatively classical, with peculiarities of diction resembling the third Gospel; while the turn of thought, also, is similar in the two treatises. When it is added that the second begins where the first ends, so that put together they form a continuous history, and that the author of the last expressly refers to a book he had previously written—a book just such as the Gospel—the two being, further, dedicated to the same individual, there is surely the strongest evidence that both were from the same pen. And these internal proofs are corroborated by the tradition of the early church, which unanimously ascribes the Acts of the Apostles to the evangelist St. Luke.

Its date is pretty well determined by the time at which its narrative closes—two years after St. Paul's being brought a prisoner to Rome. We may, therefore, with much probability assign it to 63 A.D.

The title 'Acts of the Apostles,' by which this book is commonly known, would seem to be a later addition. It does not describe accurately the contents. For the object of the evangelist was neither to give a complete history of the church during the period comprised, nor to record generally the labours of the apostles: it was rather to exhibit the fulfilment of promise in the descent of the Holy Spirit, and the consequent planting and growth of the Christian church among Jews and Gentiles by the establishment of centres of influence in various provinces of the empire, beginning at Jerusalem and ending at Rome. Keeping this idea steadily in view, we shall see that all the events recorded fall naturally into their places, and that any seeming abruptness is sufficiently accounted for.

This book divides itself into two main parts; each being grouped around a central figure.—1. The planting and extension of the church among the Jews by the ministry of Peter (i.-xii.). Subdivisions are (1) the organization of the church in Jerusalem (i.-vii.); (2) the branching forth of the gospel in various directions from the mother church (viii.-xii.).—2. The planting and extension of the church among the Gentiles by the ministry of Paul (xiii.-xxviii.). Subdivisions are (1) Paul's ministry at large (xiii.-xxii. 26); (2) his ministry in bonds (xxii. 27-xxviii.). It must be carefully observed that these two parts are closely connected as belonging to one great system. For it is Peter who first introduces a Gentile convert into the church; and Paul during the whole of his ministrations is careful to proclaim the gospel, in every place where he has opportunity, first to the Jews and afterwards to the Gentiles.

There is on the face of it a truthfulness in this book which strongly commends itself to the reader. Thus the speeches attributed to different individuals are in full accordance with their respective characters and the circumstances in which they stood. The author was himself present at several of the events which he narrates—and this he carefully notes by change of person and in the verbs and pronouns he uses; he had, moreover, as a companion of the apostles, the best opportunities of knowing accurately the things he did not personally witness. From information so acquired he was guided by the Holy Spirit to place on record those facts which testified to the divine origin of Christianity, and showed that the gospel was indebted for its success not to fraud or human favour, but to the wonder-working power of God, and the efficacy of the saving truths it promulgated. These were the same truths which were revealed in the Gospels, and illustrated in the apostolic letters, truths thoroughly adapted to the wants of those, both Jews and Gentiles, to whom they were brought. And the unity of God's purpose is exhibited in the frequent appeals made to the ancient scriptures; and the supernatural power possessed by the gospel is attested by the miracles which we find the apostles, in accordance with Christ's promise, were enabled to work.

It may be added that the researches of antiquaries, and the investigations of travellers, remarkably confirm in a variety of details the accurate truthfulness of the Acts of the Apostles. See Dr. J. A. Alexander's Acts of the Apostles Explained (Introduction).

AC'UB (1 Esdr. v. 31).

ADA'DAH (festival, according to some boundary). A town in the extreme south of the portion of Judah (Josh. xv. 22). Wilton considers the word an error for Ararah, and identifies it with the modern 'Ar'ar'ah (The Negeb or South Country of Script., pp. 78, 79).

A'DAH (ornament, beauty).—1. One of the wives of Lamech, of the line of Cain (Gen. iv. 19).—2. A name of one of Esau's wives (xxxvi. 2); she is elsewhere called Basemath (xxvi. 34).

ADAI'AH (whom Jehovah adorns).—1. Maternal grandfather of king Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 1).—2. A Levite (1 Chron. vi. 41).—3. A Benjamite (viii. 21).—4. A priest (ix. 12; Neh. xi. 12).—5. One mentioned in 2 Chron. xxiii. 1—6, 7. Two persons who had taken foreign wives (Ezra x. 29, 39).—8. A descendant of Judah (Neh. xi. 5), perhaps identical with No. 5.

AD'AM (red, red earth). The name appropriated to the first man, the father of the inhabitants of the world; used, however, sometimes more generally, as in Gen. v. 1, 2, where the woman is included in the same appellation. This name was probably chosen to remind the man of his earthy nature, seeing that out of the ground his body was taken, though his soul, the breath of life, was breathed into his nostrils by God's immediate act. The history of his creation is narrated in i. 26-30, ii. 7, 15-25, a single pair being formed, to whom the earth was given for a possession, to replenish it with their children, to enjoy the fruits of it, and to have dominion over the inferior animals. We are told that 'God created man in his own image' and after his 'likeness;' not with respect to bodily shape, or according to the form which as an archetype the second person of the Trinity would subsequently assume, but certainly with a likeness to God in moral attributes. This is implied by the expressions of St. Paul, who plainly considers righteousness and holiness the likeness of God (Eph. iv. 24; Col. iii. 10). The phrase must also denote the possession of dominion and authority; for immediately it is subjoined 'let them have dominion' (Gen. i. 26), explanatory, it would seem, of the term 'image.' And so St. Paul calls the man 'the image and glory of God,' on the ground of his being 'the head of the woman' (1 Cor. xi. 3, 7). In this view Gen. ix. 6 and James iii. 9 are easily explicable (see Bush, Notes on Genesis, i. 26). The high intellectual power with which man was endowed is illustrated by his giving appropriate names to the lower animals (Gen. ii. 19, 20). He was indeed a glorious creature, and would have been uninterruptedly, perhaps increasingly, happy, had he continued in his first estate of innocence. Adam's lamentable fall is next related (iii.). How long it was after his creation, ingenious men have puzzled themselves to discover, but in vain. By sin Adam lost his best prerogative. He had suffered spiritual death, and he was to suffer bodily death: dust as he was, to dust he should return. To his posterity he transmitted, therefore, a corrupted nature, which could be restored and recovered only by the power of the second Adam, a head of life and blessedness to all that believe in him (Rom. v. 15, 16; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22, 45, 47, 48). Of Adam's subsequent history we know little. We are expressly told that he had 'sons and daughters,' though the names of but three of his sons are recorded. He lived 930 years (Gen. iv. 1, 2, 25, 26, v. 3-5; 1 Chron. i. 1; Luke iii. 38). See MAN.

AD'AM (id.). A city near the Jordan, by which the waters were cut off when Israel passed over (Josh. iii. 16).

ADA'MAH (earth, so called from its reddish colour). A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36).

ADAMANT. This word is found twice in our version (Ezek. iii. 9; Zech. vii. 12), in both cases used metaphorically to signify firmness of character and purpose. The original word occurs again in Jer. xvii. 1, where it is translated 'diamond,' with which the writer's pen is said to be pointed. The term must signify some exceedingly hard stone; and diamond is the hardest we know. The Greek word for emery powder used in polishing is not improbably connected with this Hebrew one; the two are smiris or smuris, and shamer.

ADAMI (human). A border-town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33).

ADAR (greatness, splendour). A border-town of Judah (Josh. xv. 3). It would seem to be the same with Hazar-Addar (Numb. xxiv. 4), possibly 'Ain el-Kudeirât.

ADA'SA (1 Macc. vii. 40, 45). A place not far from Beth-horon.

AD'BEEL (perhaps miracle of God). A son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13; 1 Chron. i. 29).

AD'DAN (humble?). A place from which some who could not show their genealogy returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 59). It is called Addon in Neh. vii. 61.

AD'DAR (greatness?). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 3); called also Ard (Gen. xli. 21; Numb. xxvi. 40).

ADDER. Several different Hebrew words are so rendered in our version. That occurring Gen. xlix. 17 (arrowsnake, marg.) implies a gliding motion: it is supposed to be the Cerastes Hasselquistii, a small and very venomous snake, with two antennæ like horns, well-known in Egypt, accustomed to lie in wait in the sand and near paths. 'Adder' occurs also (Psal. lviii. 4, xci. 13) as the translation of another word, perhaps embodying the idea of twisting or twining. It is described as deaf to the charmer, and, as the same word is generally rendered 'asp' (e.g. Deut. xxxii. 33), it must have been venomous. It is probably the Egyptian cobra (naia haje). We find another Hebrew word (Psal. cxl. 3), which is compound, including the two ideas of coiling and lying in wait. It also was poisonous. There is one more word which implies hissing. It occurs several times (Prov. xxiii. 32; Isai. xi. 8, xiv. 29, lix. 5; Jer. viii. 17), but is rendered 'adder' in the text only in the first-named place, elsewhere 'cockatrice.' It seems to have lived in holes, to have been oviparous, and venomous. It may have been that called basiliſcus and regulus, a small venomous African serpent. But the two last-named have not been certainly identified.

AD'DO (1 Esdr. vi. 1). A form of Iddo, grandfather of Zechariah the prophet (Zech. i. 1).

AD'DUS.—1. (Esdr. v. 34).—2. (38).

AD'IDA (1 Macc. xii. 38, xiii. 13). A fortified town, perhaps identical with Adithaim.

AD'EL (ornament of God).—1. One of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 36).—2. A priest (ix. 12).—3. The father of David's treasurer (xxvii. 25).

A'DIN (delicate). One whose descendants returned from captivity (Ezra i. 15, viii. 6; Neh. vii. 20, x. 16).

AD'NO (2 Sam. xxiii. 8). See JASHO-BEAM.

AD'INUS (1 Esdr. ix. 48).

ADITHA'IM (double prey?). A city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 36).

ADJURE. This word as used in our version implies—1. Binding under the penalty of a curse (Josh. vi. 26; 1 Sam. xiv. 24).—2. An earnest charge or entreaty, sometimes equivalent to putting a person upon his oath (1 Kings xxii. 16; 2 Chron. xviii. 15; Matt. xxvi. 63; comp. 1 Thess. v. 27, Gr.). It is once used, but not by Christ or his apostles, for the casting out of a devil (Acts xix. 13). See EXORCIST, OATH.

AD'LAI (justice of God). The father of one of David's chief herdmen (1 Chron. xxvii. 29).

AD'MAH (red earth). One of the cities destroyed with Sodom (Gen. x. 19, xiv. 2, 8; Deut. xxix. 23; Hos. xi. 8).

ADMA'THA (perhaps earthy, dark-coloured; other interpretations have been proposed). One of the seven princes of Persia (Esth. i. 14).

AD'NA (pleasure).—1. A person who had married a strange wife (Ezra x. 30).—2. A priest (Neh. xii. 15); Adnah in some copies AD'NAH (id.). One of Jehoshaphat's captains (2 Chron. xvii. 14).

AD'NAH (favourite brother?). A chief of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 20).

ADO'NI-BE'ZEK (lord of Bezek). The king of Bezek, conquered by the tribe of Judah. He had his thumbs and great toes cut off, having himself inflicted the same punishment on seventy chiefs (Judges i. 4-7).

ADONI'JAH (my lord is Jehovah).—1. The fourth son of David, by Haggith, born at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Chron. iii. 2). When his father was old, he, being a man of fine person and probably popular, aspired to the crown, in order to exclude Solomon. He was joined by Joab and Abiathar, and seems to have had the countenance of his brothers. But David, being apprised by Bath-sheba and Nathan, immediately ordered Solomon to be anointed king; and the intelligence of this broke up the conspiracy. Solomon promised, if Adonijah remained quiet, that this offence should be overlooked (1 Kings i.). He did not remain quiet, but, after David's death, persuaded Bath-sheba to ask for him Abisbag, a woman of his father's harem. Solomon, convinced that this was a renewal of his attempt upon the crown, commanded him to be executed (ii. 13-25).—2. A Levite in Jehoshaphat's time (2 Chron. xvii. 8).—3. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 16).

ADONI'KAM (lord of the enemy). One whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 13, viii. 13; Neh. vii. 18).

ADONI'RAM (lord of altitude). An officer of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 6, v. 14). He is probably identical with Adoram (2 Sam. xx. 24; 1 Kings xii. 18), and Hadoram (2 Chron. x. 18), stoned at the secession of the ten tribes from Rehoboam.

ADO'NI-ZE'DEK (lord of justice). The Amorite king of Jerusalem, conquered and put to death by Joshua (Josh. x. 1-37).

ADOPTION. Adoption is when a person not naturally a son is taken into another's family, and acknowledged, treated, and endowed as his own child. Scarcely any examples of such a practice are to be found in the Old Testament. The reckoning of the sons of the concubine as those of the actual wife (Gen. xvi. 2, xxx. 3), and the operation of the levirate law (xxxviii. 8; Deut. xxv. 5, 6), are not instances in point. But Moses was adopted by Pharaoh's daughter (Exod. ii. 10); and, though in the line of Hebrew home history no parallel to this occurs, yet we have an instance when the Jews were removed into captivity in the case of Mordecai and Esther (Esth. ii. 7, 20). Adoption was common under the Roman law; according to which, by a formal act, a relationship was established exactly like that between a father and his own son. This custom has furnished St. Paul with a beautiful illustration of the Great Father's kindness to the estranged children of men (Rom. viii. 15, 23, ix. 4; Gal. iv. 5; Eph. i. 5). The family of Israel was originally selected, to whom God became a father; and in Christ Jesus every individual believer is permitted by the Lord's infinite mercy to regard him as his parent, and with the Spirit of adoption to call him 'Abba, Father.'

ADORA (1 Macc. xiii. 20). Perhaps the same with

ADORA'IM (double mound). A city of Judah which Rehoboam fortified (2 Chron. xi. 9). It appears to be the modern Dara, a village a few miles west of Hebron.

ADO'RAM (A contracted form of Adoniram, lord of altitude). See ADONIRAM.

ADORATION. This word does not occur in the scriptures. It is found in the Apocrypha, applied to the worship of an idol (Bel and Dr. 4). See BOWING, WORSHIP.

ADRAM'MELECH (splendour of the king, or possibly king of fire, i.e. the sun-god). —1. An idol god whose worship with that of Anammelech was introduced into Samaria by the Sepharvites (2 Kings xvii. 31). Some have imagined Adrammelech to be the sun; Anammelech the moon. Rawlinson, however, would regard the former as signifying the male, the latter the female, power of the sun (Herod. Append. Essay x. vol. i. p. 611). —2.—A son of Sennacherib, who with his brother Sharezer assassinated their father in the temple of Nisroch and fled into Armenia (2 Kings xix. 37; 2 Chron. xxxii. 21; Isai. xxxvii. 38).

ADRAMYTTIUM. A sea-port town of Mysia; it was an Athenian colony, and is now but a village, retaining the name Adramytti, with some trade. It was in a ship of Adramyttium that St. Paul on his voyage to Italy sailed from Cæsarea to Myra (Acts xxvii. 2-5).

A'DRIA. A part of the Mediterranean sea over which St. Paul was voyaging when he was shipwrecked on the island of Malta (Acts xxvii. 27). It was not just the modern Adriatic or gulf of Venice, but included, in that age, the whole of the waters between Greece, Italy, Sicily, and Africa; though, sometimes, the southern part was distinguished as the Ionian sea, the northern as the sea of Adria.

AD'RIEL (flock of God). The son of Barzillai the Meholathite, to whom Saul's elder daughter Merab was given in marriage, though she had been promised to David (1 Sam. xviii. 17, 19). His five sons, delivered up to the Gibeonites, are said to have been borne to him by Michal (2 Sam. xxi. 8). Either Michal took charge of them, or (see marg.) there is an error of transcription for Michal's sister.

AD'UEEL (Tob. i. 1).

ADUL'LAM (justice of the people). An ancient city in the plain country of Judah once the seat of a Canaanitish king (Josh. xii. 15, xv. 35). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 7). We find it afterwards mentioned (Neh. xi. 30; Micah i. 15. See also 2 Macc. xii. 38). There are caverns in the neighbourhood, one of which may have been the cave which David frequented (1 Sam. xxii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13; 1 Chron. xi. 15). But, as it is evident from the last-named references that the cave was near Bethlehem, it is more likely that, according to tradition, it was at Khureitan, between Bethlehem and the Dead sea. Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, pp. 606, 607) describes a cavern there, and produces some reasons to corroborate the tradition: 'Leaving our horses in charge of wild Arabs, and taking one for a guide, we started for the cave, having a fearful gorge below, gigantic cliffs above, and the path winding along a shelf of the rock, narrow enough to make the nervous among us shudder. At length, from a great rock hanging on the edge of this shelf, we sprang by a long leap into a low window which opened into the perpendicular face of the cliff. We were then within the hold of David, and, creeping half-doubled through a narrow crevice for a few rods, we stood beneath the dark vault of the first grand chamber of this mysterious and oppressive cavern. Our whole collection of lights did little more than make the damp darkness visible. After groping about as long as we had time to spare, we returned to the light of day, fully convinced that, with David and his lion-hearted followers inside, all the strength of Israel under Saul could not have forced an entrance, would not have even attempted it.'

ADUL'LAMITE. A resident of the city Adullam (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12, 20).

ADULTERY. A crime prohibited by the seventh commandment (Exod. xx. 14). It was illicit connection between a married woman and a man not her husband. If the woman were not married, it was considered, whether the man had a wife already or no, the inferior crime of fornication. This distinction necessarily arose from the allowance of polygamy; and, besides, it was only in the first-named case that there could be the aggravation of introducing spurious children into a family. That adultery as above defined was generally esteemed a heinous sin we may see from the fact that Abraham and Isaac did not apprehend that their wives would be forced from them, but that they should be put to death that their widows might be marriageable, and from the horror that Pharaoh and Abimelech expressed of anyone touching a married woman (Gen. xii. 10-20, xx., xxvi. 1-11). The punishment of this crime appears to have been burning in the earliest ages (xxxviii. 24), but by the Mosaic law it was stoning, and that whether the woman was actually married or only betrothed (Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22-27), provided she was free. If she was a slave, she was to be whipped, and possibly the man also, and he was to offer a trespass offering (Lev. xix. 20-22). In cases where a man had reasonable ground of suspicion against his wife, but no sufficient proof, a remarkable trial was permitted, in which the Lord would, by the effect of 'the bitter water' that the woman was to drink, show whether she was guilty (Numb. v. 11-31). It would seem that in later times this ordeal had passed almost out of use, and also that the crime of adultery ceased to be capital, at least that capital punishment was rarely inflicted (Matt. i. 18, 19); divorce being resorted to. Adultery is used metaphorically to describe the sin of Israel, God's peculiar people, honoured as a cherished spouse, in forsaking the Lord to worship and serve other gods (Jer. iii.; Ezek. xvi. 30-32; Hos. ii.); whence we see the wonderful forbearance of God in providing a means of pardon after such a sin (Jer. iii. 1).

ADUMMIM (the red, or bloody, or, according to some, red-haired men). 'The going up' or pass 'of Adummim' was a rising ground on the road from Jericho to Jerusalem. It was, and still is, the resort of robbers; hence perhaps the name. It was just upon the border between Benjamin and Judah (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 17: comp. Luke x. 30-36). It seems to have been on the south face of the gorge of the Wady el-Kelt.

ADVERSARY. The devil is so called (1 Pet. v. 8: comp. Zech. iii. 1). See SATAN.

ADVOCATE. One who appears in behalf of another, to conduct or plead his cause. In judicial proceedings in the Old Testament we find no trace of any such aid. But in later times the use of advocates might have passed from the Romans to the Jews. Christ is called our 'Advocate with the Father' (1 John ii. 1), the original term having that distinct signification. It is also the word used of the Holy Spirit (John xiv. 16, Gr.). See COMFORTER.

AEDYAS (1 Esdr. ix. 27).

ÆNE'AS or ENE'AS. A paralytic at Lydda whom Peter healed (Acts ix. 32-34).

ÆNON (springs). The place where John baptized near to Salim (John iii. 23). It appears to have been west of the Jordan; and a Salim has been found with copious springs near Nablous. Wady Farah, also, a little to the north-east of Jerusalem, is said to abound in streams; and a Wady Seleim is close by. It must be, at present at least, a question which of these places is identical with Ænon.

AFFINITY. See MARRIAGE.

AFFIRMATIVE. 'Thou hast said' (Matt. xxvi. 64) was a form of affirmation among the Jews, meaning 'Thou hast rightly said.' It is, however, probably somewhat stronger than a simple admission. See Alford, The Greek Test., note on Matt. xxvi. 64.

AG'ABA (1 Esdr. v. 30). The Hagab of Ezra ii. 46.

AG'ABUS (possibly locust). A prophet who predicted a famine (Acts xi. 28). This prediction most probably pointed to the dearth in Judæa which Josephus mentions (Antiq. lib. xx. 2, § 6, 5, § 2), which began about 44 A.D. The expression 'all the world' may very well be taken in a more restricted sense. Agabus also foretold the imprisonment of St. Paul (Acts xxi. 10, 11).

A'GAG (fire, flaming). This was probably the general title of the kings of the Amalekites, as Pharaoh of the Egyptians. We find it used at two different periods of history (Numb. xxiv. 7; and 1 Sam. xv.). For Saul's disobedience in not destroying Amalek, and in saving Agag, he was finally rejected.

AG'AGITE. Haman is called the Agagite (Esth. iii. 1, 10, viii. 3, 5, ix. 24). He was perhaps of the Amalekitish royal family.

A'GAR (Gal. iv. 24, 25). The Greek form of HAGAB, which see.

AGARENES (Bar. iii. 23). Descendants of Agar or Hagar.

AGATE. One of the precious stones in the high priest's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12). It is a variety of quartz, occurring in nodules, semi-transparent and uncrystallized, composed of parallel or concentric layers differently tinted. Agate is also the rendering of another Hebrew term (Isai. liv. 12; Ezek. xxvii. 16, where marg. 'chrysoptase'). But a transparent or sparkling stone seems meant by the word as here used; possibly it may be the ruby.

AGE. In the patriarchal times, and under the Mosaic dispensation, a long life was considered a peculiar blessing to the individual (Exod. xx. 12; Job v. 26), and as betokening prosperity in the state (Zech. viii. 4). Great respect was therefore paid to the aged in private life (Lev. xix. 32; Job xv. 10, xxxii. 6, 7; Prov. xvi. 31, xx. 29). In the redemption-payment for a vow, indeed, the old man was rated at a less sum than the young man (Lev. xxvii. 7); but this was natural, and, besides, was connected with the lighter burdens imposed on elder persons; the Levites, for example, being excused from the more laborious work of their office after the age of fifty (Numb. viii. 25). In regard to public affairs the counsel of the aged was specially to be regarded (1 Kings xii. 6-8).

AGGE'US (1 Esdr. vi. 1, vii. 3; 2 Esdr. i. 40). The prophet Haggai.

AGONY (Luke xxii. 44). The narrative of our Lord's agony in the garden evidently implies that the sweat as it dropped from his body to the ground was tinged or coloured with blood. Instances are not wanting of extreme terror or emotion producing such a bloody sweat. See Alford, The Greek Test., note on Luke xxii. 44.

AGRICULTURE. The cultivation of the ground was the first employment of man. When placed in the happy garden, he was to dress it and to keep it' (Gen. ii. 15). The fruit of the trees and the green herbs were to be his food (i. 29): these, therefore, he must tend. At first, it is obvious, the trees would demand little care; to the herbs Adam would naturally direct his chief attention. And, doubtless, those which were best suited for his sustenance, being indigenous, yielded their produce easily and plentifully, so as to make the necessary culture of them no hard or laborious toil. There was a change when man had lost his Innocence, and was driven from Eden, condemned in the sweat of his face to eat bread (iii. 17-19). The labour must have been heavy enough when 'Cain was a tiller of the ground' (iv. 2). Everything had to be done by hand; for, though Abel was 'a keeper of sheep,' we read nothing of the breeding of larger cattle till a later period (20); a considerable time, therefore, may have elapsed before beasts were trained to labour. Metallic tools were not yet invented (22); so that to break-up the soil, to clear away the thorns and thistles, and to perform the other necessary duties of agriculture, was grinding toil. Whether the ground was specially made sterile at the fall, and whether, if so, that curse was relaxed after the flood, may admit of question: it is at least evident that, as time passed on, and animals were subjected to the yoke, and proper implements were obtained by the working in metals, the labour of the early fathers of mankind must have been rendered progressively more easy, and the earth have yielded more largely her increase (v. 29, viii. 21, 22).

With the difficulties attending it, husbandry was perhaps little practised before the flood; but, when he left the ark, Noah, we find it recorded, 'began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard' (i. 20); and there are frequent notices afterwards of the cultivation of the ground, and of the large increase which it sometimes yielded (xxvi. 12, xxxvii. 7).

The regulations of the Mosaic law tended to encourage agriculture. The division of lands, the obligations on landed property, the very cycle of the religious festivals were closely connected with it. And Palestine, the promised inheritance, was in the highest degree fruitful, 'a good land; a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil, olive and honey; a land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness' (Deut. viii. 7-9); and in the facility of its cultivation it contrasted advantageously with Egypt, where fruitfulness was dependent upon the overflow of the Nile (xi. 10-12).

That among the ancient Hebrews agriculture reached considerable perfection, we may not unfairly conclude from the notices which the prophets have left us. Thus, after the ground was ploughed and the clods broken and levelled, we are told that the various seeds were differently sown ac-ording to their nature: the 'fitches' and the 'cummin' were scattered; while the 'wheat' and the 'barley' and the 'spelt' were planted in rows. In threshing, too, proper rules were observed: the fitches and the cummin were beaten out with a staff or rod; but the heavy threshing-instrument or cart was used upon the wheat, care being taken that it was not injured by the wheels, or the hoofs of the horses (Isai. xxviii. 24-28). There was the same orderly proceeding in the cultivation of the vine (v. 1, 2). Every seventh year the fields of Israel were to lie fallow. Besides the religious meaning of the regulation, no doubt the practice was, in more than one way, advantageous to the land. During this sabbatical year every part of the country was free: the poor might collect, anywhere they chose, the spontaneous product of the ground (Exod. xxiii. 10, 11); in the spirit of which enactment was the licence for a man who passed through his neighbour's vineyard, or his neighbour's corn-field, to eat his fill but not to carry grapes away, to pluck the ears but not to apply a sickle to the corn (Deut. xxiii. 24, 25). It is not expressly said that it was customary to burn the stubble; but we may infer the practice from the regulation in case of fire spreading from one field to another (Exod. xxii. 6). That manures were known we cannot doubt. The bodies of the wicked are spoken of as 'dung upon the face of the field' (2 Kings ix. 37; Jer. viii. 2). We may fairly suppose that the use of manure is here alluded to. The advantage of so applying the dung of the stock upon a farm must soon have become evident; and, besides, we have a special reference to straw mixed up therewith (Isai. xxv. 10). The irrigation of their fields, where needful, the Israelites must have learned from the Egyptians.

The chief kinds of grain cultivated by the Hebrews were wheat and barley. Sometimes it would seem that beans, and lentiles, and millet, and spelt, were used for bread (Ezek. iv. 9: comp. 2 Sam. xvii. 28); lentiles, however, were more generally the material for pottage (Gen. xxv. 29-34). Fitches and cummin were, as we have before seen, cultivated, and cucumbers or gourds; and, from the mention of the garden of cucumbers and the lodge in it, we may suppose that they were extensively grown (Isai. i. 8). Of the melons, and leeks, and onions, and garlic, which the Israelites remembered with regret they had eaten in Egypt (Numb. xi. 5), we have no further mention. They might, however, have been grown in the 'gardens of herbs,' in which wealthy persons delighted, and which required careful watering (Deut. xi. 10; 1 Kings xxi. 2). Rye and oats are not spoken of in scripture; and to the present day the former is hardly at all known in Syria. Flax was cultivated, for the garments of fine linen of which we frequently read. It is mentioned in Josh. ii. 6; and it was one of the materials, most likely of home production, which the notable housewife spun into clothing for her household (Prov. xxxi. 13). Whether cotton was in use may admit of doubt. See COTTON.

Both in Egypt and in Palestine the barley was first ripe (Exod. ix. 31, 32; Ruth ii. 23), in the first month of the Israelitish sacred year, Abib, the month of green ears, at the beginning or middle of April. The tilling of the fields had commenced about five months before, in the early part of November. For it was promised that so fruitful should the land of Israel be that hardly would the produce of one year (including the vintage) be gathered in before it was time to prepare the land for the seed of the next (Lev. xxvi. 5; Amos ix. 13). Now the feast of tabernacles was held, when all was gathered, on the 15th of the seventh month, lasting eight days (Lev. xxiii. 34, 39); and therefore this feast alone would intervene between the close of the abundant harvest and the labour for the fresh crop.

That the implements used by the husbandman were of iron is clear from the statement that in the beginning of Saul's reign the Israelites had to go down to the Philistine smiths to sharpen them (1 Sam. xiii. 19-21).

The first operation was the ploughing of the land. Oxen were yoked to the plough, it being forbidden to plough with an ox and an ass together (Deut. xxii. 10). Several ploughs were frequently at work at once under the general superintendence of the master (1 Kings xix. 19). See PLOUGH. The oxen were guided and stimulated by a goad, which was a formidable weapon; and, though some critics have imagined that it was furnished with a thong like a whip, and that the humanity of the Mosaic law would not allow the pricking of an ox with a sharp point, yet we can hardly help supposing that the ancient goads were similar to, and similarly used with, those at present in the hands of Syrian ploughmen. Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, pp. 322, 323) describes them, and the use made of them. See GOAD. The furrows made by the plough were long (Psal. cxxix. 3). And next followed a kind of harrowing, more to break up the clods and level the surface before the seed was sown (Job xxxix. 10; Isal. xviii. 24) than to answer the purpose of what we call harrowing, which now certainly is neglected in Palestine. Then came the sowing of the seed; which, as before observed, varied according to the nature of the grain. It was forbidden to sow with mingled seed (Lev. xix. 19). And this, while having its symbolical meaning, had also its present advantage. For, if the stalk of one kind was longer than that of another, this last would be overshadowed and weakened. We may suppose that the corn-fields were kept clear of weeds; but there is no special direction for weeding in scripture (see, however, Prov. xxiv. 30, 31). Seed seems to have been steeped in water; and perhaps the reason why if a dead carcase fell upon steeped seed it made it unclean (Lev. xi. 38) might be that such seed was more likely to receive any noxious taint than if it had been dry. Travellers have observed a modern analogous practice of watering the furrows at the time of sowing the seed.

The special dangers to be apprehended for the growing crop were the ravages of locusts, blasting, and mildew (1 Kings viii. 37). The justice of God sometimes inflicted these as a punishment for the evil-doings of the people. But ordinarily, under the divine blessing, the produce was abundant. Isaac's rich crops have already been alluded to; and our Lord speaks of a return, thirty, sixty, and even a hundred fold (Matt. xiii. 8). When the crops were ripe, the barley harvest being first, immediately succeeded by that of wheat, the ears were cut with a sickle, and thus gathered into the reaper's bosom (Psal. cxxix. 7). It has, however, sometimes been imagined that a scythe was the implement employed in reaping; perhaps both scythe and sickle were in use. When reaped, the corn was bound in sheaves (Gen. xxxvii. 7). But it is to be observed that the corners of the field were to be left, and the gleanings were not to be gathered in; and, even if a sheaf were passed over, it was not to be fetched; all these remnants were the property of the poor (Lev. xix. 9; Deut. xxiv. 19; Ruth ii.). A sheaf might easily be overlooked; for the stubble was left high, because there would then be more to burn for the benefit of the land, much straw not being wanted.

From the field the sheaves were taken in carts, at least in later days (Amos ii. 13), to the threshing-floor. This was in an open and exposed situation; as we may gather from the history of Gideon, who, when he had to thresh secretly for fear of the Midianites, had his corn in the wine-press (Judges vi. 11). The various modes of threshing have been already alluded to, by the flail or staff, by the heavy toothed dredge (Isai. xli. 15), and by the feet of animals. See THRESHING. One more operation closed the labours of the harvest. The corn must be separated from the chaff. This was done by the shovel and the fan (xxx. 24). Thus the weighty grains fell down into a heap, while the wind drove the chaff away (Psal. i. 4). See WINNOW. Finally, the sieve freed the corn from any admixture of dirt (Amos ix. 9).

After the corn harvest succeeded the vintage; of which some account will be given hereafter. See VINE, VINTAGE. There was also the gathering of the olives. See OLIVE TREE.

Such was the general course of agricultural labour; which was had in high estimation among the Hebrews; some of their kings and prophets being taken from the farm, as Saul and David, Elisha and Amos; while the encouragement given to it by others when on the throne is specially noted (2 Chron. xxvi. 10). Allusions are continually made to agriculture, particularly in our Saviour's parables (e.g. Matt. xiii. 3-40; 1 Cor. iii. 6), both to the operations of husbandmen and to the satisfying joy when the Lord had crowned the year with fatness (Isai. ix. 3). For, when the corn was safely housed, there was mirth and feasting (Ruth iii. 2, 3, 7). But it was not to be mere carnal mirth; God's hand was acknowledged in blessing the husbandmen's labour. To him the first-fruits were to be presented when the harvest began and when it concluded the people were to rejoice before him (Exod. xxii. 29, xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Lev. xxiii. 10-17; Deut. xvi. 13-15).

 AGRIP'PA. See HEROD, 7.

AGUE (Lev. xxvi. 16). The word here translated 'ague' is rendered 'fever' in Deut. xxviii. 22. It is derived from a root signifying to kindle fire, to burn. It may intend, therefore, burning fever. In the common ague, hot and cold fits alternate.

A'GUR (an assembler, one of the assembly, i.e. of wise men). A sage of whom nothing is known (Prov. xxx. 1). Some have believed this (but with no probability) a symbolical name of Solomon.

A'HAB (father's brother).—1. The son and successor of Omri king of Israel. His reign lasted twenty-two years (1 Kings xvi. 29), 918—897 B.C. He has the miserable character given him of doing 'evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him' (30). He not only maintained the worship of the calves set up by Jeroboam, but, having married Jezebel, daughter of Eth-baal king of the Zidonians, he yielded himself to her evil influence, and introduced the worship of Baal into Samaria. A persecution of the prophets of the Lord followed; many of them being destroyed by Jezebel. As a judgment, a drought was sent upon the land; and then came the solemn vindication of Jehovah's authority by the prophet Elijah before Ahab and the assembled people, and the punishment, according to the law of Moses, of the idolatrous prophets (xvii., xviii.). Jezebel was irritated to madness at the news of this catastrophe, and resolved to sacrifice Elijah; while Ahab was either unable or unwilling to interfere. Afterwards his wicked queen led him into one of his worst crimes. He seems to have been a man of cultivated taste. He built cities, and erected an ivory palace (xxii. 39), the walls being probably inlaid with ivory, and had pleasure-grounds by his house in Jezreel, which he wished to enlarge by the addition of a vineyard belonging to Naboth. Naboth, however, refused either to sell or to exchange his hereditary property; and Ahab, disappointed, manifested the temper of a spoiled child. The unscrupulous Jezebel then put him in possession of the coveted plot of ground by the judicial murder of Naboth; and Ahab went to view it, but was met by Elijah, who denounced on him a fearful judgment. On his repentance, superficial though it was, this sentence was partially revoked, and delayed till the days of Ahab's son (xxi.). In two wars with Syria this prince was successful, but he improperly spared Ben-hadad, the Syrian king (xx.). In a third campaign, having attempted, in alliance with Jehoshaphat, to re-take Ramoth-gilead, still occupied by the Syrians, Ahab, specially singled out by Ben-hadad (perhaps from the Syrian king's mortification at having been his prisoner), though he disguised himself, was mortally wounded; and the dogs licked up the blood washed from his chariot in the pool of Samaria (xxii.). Weak and unstable, Ahab let himself be made the tool of his wife; and his history is an instructive warning against such subser-vice to a dangerous influence.—2. A false prophet in Babylon (Jer. xxix. 20-23).

A'HARAH (after the brother). A son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 1); possibly the same with Ehi (Gen. xlv. 21), Ahiram (Numb. xxvi. 38), and Aher (1 Chron. vii. 12).

AHAR'HEL (behind the breastwork, sc. born). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8).

A'HASAI (probably a contracted form of Ahaziah, whom Jehovah holds). A priest (Neh. xi. 13). He may be the same with Jahzerah (1 Chron. ix. 12).

AHAS'BAI (I take refuge in Jehovah). The father of one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 34; comp. 1 Chron. xi. 35).

AHASHVE'ROSH (Ezra iv. 6, marg.). The Hebrew form of AHASUE'RUS (lion-king). A name which, in one of its Greek forms, is Xerxes. The identity is illustrated by the inscriptions of Xerxes on Persian and Egyptian monuments.

1. A king of Persia, to whom a complaint was made by the enemies of the Jews against the building of the walls of Jerusalem (Ezra iv. 6). If we are to take Ezra iv. in a strictly-chronological order, we must necessarily suppose that by this Ahasuerus Cambyses is intended. For the building of the temple was delayed from the time of Cyrus to that of Darius Hystaspis. Now the intervening kings were Cambyses and the Pseudo-Smerdis; and two kings are mentioned here in whose reigns the labours of the Jews were impeded—Ahasuerus and Artaxerxes. Ahasuerus, then, must be Cambyses, and Artaxerxes the Pseudo-Smerdis. But it is fair to say that Lord A. C. Hervey (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. 'Ezra, Book of') supposes Ezra iv. 6-23 wrongly placed, and that it refers to the building of the walls of Jerusalem (not of the temple), prohibited in the reign of Xerxes and in the earlier years of Artaxerxes Longimanus, but at length allowed by the last-named monarch on the solicitation of his cup-bearer Nehemiah. If the supposition be well-grounded, this Ahasuerus must be identical with the monarch so called No. 2, i. e. Xerxes.

2. A sovereign of this name is the king of Persia mentioned in the book of Esther. Various conjectures have been made respecting him. Darius, Xerxes, Artaxerxes Longimanus, have all had their advocates. But the question may be narrowed. It must be one of the last-mentioned two kings; for the name and character of Darius are far different. Now it is not easy to believe that Artaxerxes who gave in the seventh year of his reign a commission to Ezra, as we read (Ezra vii.), could be so ignorant in regard to the Jews as Ahasuerus was in his twelfth year (Esth. iii. 8-10). Besides, there are several notices in profane history which lead us to a safer identification. Ahasuerus made a great feast in the third year of his reign (i. 3). So, we know, did Xerxes hold a great assembly of nobles in his third year, prior to his Grecian expedition. Again, Ahasuerus was at Shushan in his seventh year (iii. 16). And Xerxes, after his ignominious return from Greece, was at Susa (Shushan) in his seventh year, giving himself up to sensual pleasures (Herodotus, lib. vii. 7, &c., lib. viii. 126, lib. ix. 107, 108). The character, too, of Xerxes, cruel, vain, unstable, and licentious, well agrees with that of the Ahasuerus of Esther. Most critics, therefore, now identify Ahasuerus with Xerxes.

3. Ahasuerus, father of Darius the Mede (Dan. ix. 1), was, in all probability, the Median king known in profane history as Astyages, father of Cyaxares and grandfather of Cyrus.

A'HAVA (water). A place, or a river, or perhaps a district where the Jewish exiles assembled who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 15, 21, 31). Various localities have been suggested; possibly it may be the modern Hit on the Euphrates, east of Damascus (Rawlinson, Herodotus, vol. i. pp. 316, 317).

A'HAZ (possessor).—1. The son and successor of Jotham king of Judah. He ascended the throne at twenty years of age (2 Kings xvi. 2; 2 Chron. xxviii. 1). Some versions, however, have twenty-five in Chronicles (see Keil, Comm. on Kings, Murphy's Transl., vol. ii. pp. 78, 79). Ahaz reigned sixteen years (741-725 B.C.). His reign was ungodly and unfortunate. Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah king of Israel, formed a league against Judah: they ravaged the country (2 Chron. xxviii. 5-15); and Rezin seized the sea-port Elath; but they could not take Jerusalem (2 Kings xvi. 5, 6; Isai. vii. 1-9). Ahaz sought for help from Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who attacked Rezin and killed him, and also occupied large districts of Israel, transporting the inhabitants to Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29, xvi. 7-9). But this help was dearly purchased. Rich gifts and tribute were sent by Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser, whose vassal he became, and whom he attended at Damascus. Besides, the Philistines and Edomites plundered Judah (xvi. 10; 2 Chron. xxviii. 16-21). Some critics have thought fit to believe the accounts of Tiglath-pileser's interference contradictory; but there is really not the shadow of a contradiction. The Assyrian king conquered some of the enemies of Ahaz, but was no more his friend and protector than the Saxons were of the Britons who called them in for defence against the Scots and Picts, but who were afterwards subjugated by them. The evil conduct and idolatry of Ahaz, increasing till he sacrificed to other gods, burnt his children in the fire (see Keil, ubi supr. pp. 35, &c.), and shut up the temple of the Lord, may be read in 2 Kings xvi.; 2 Chron. xxviii. When he died, his body was not brought into the sepulchres of the kings of Israel. He was succeeded by Hezekiah.—2. One of Saul's descendants (1 Chron. viii. 35, ix. 42).

AHAZIAH (whom Jehovah sustains).—1. The son of Ahab and Jezebel, who succeeded his father as king of Israel and reigned two years (897-896 B.C.). He followed the evil courses of his parents; and his short reign was an unhappy one (1 Kings xxii. 40, 51-53). At first he was in alliance with Jehoshaphat; and they prepared a fleet together to go to Ophir for gold; but, the vessels being wrecked, and Jehoshaphat reproved for uniting with one so ungodly (xxii. 48; 2 Chron. xx 35-37), the king of Judah refused to renew the alliance (1 Kings xxii. 49). Then the Moabites, taking advantage of Ahab's defeat and death at the battle of Ramoth-gilead, rebelled against Israel; and before Ahaziah was able to march against them he received a fatal injury by a fall through a lattice. In his mangled condition he sent to inquire of Baal-zebul, the god of Ekron; but his messengers were turned back by Elijah, who, after some vain and wicked attempts to apprehend him, came to the wretched king and pronounced his doom. So he died (2 Kings i.).—2. The son of Jehoram and Athaliah, Ahab's daughter. He succeeded his father as king of Judah at the age of twenty-two, and reigned wickedly one year (884 B.C.), following the way of the house of Ahab (viii. 24-27; 2 Chron. xxii. 1-4); the age forty-two in the last-named passage being a transcriber's error. Ahaziah joined his uncle Jehoram king of Israel in the Syrian war; and, when Jehoram was lying wounded at Jezreel, Ahaziah went to visit him. It was a fatal visit; for just at that crisis Jehu raised the standard of revolt, and, advancing hastily to Jezreel, was met by the two kings. Jehoram he at once killed; but Ahaziah fled 'by the way of the garden-house,' more properly Beth-Haggan, the modern Jentn, and endeavoured to hide himself in Samaria (not the capital city, but some place in the country). He was, however, hunted out, and met or was brought to Jehu, who ordered him on the instant to be smitten in the chariot. This was at 'the going up to Gur,' some steep place on the road from the plain of Esdraelon to Jentn. Mortally wounded, he was carried in a dying state to Megiddo, where he expired. He was buried at Jerusalem. The two accounts (2 Kings viii. 29, ix. 16-29; 2 Chron. xxii. 5-9) may thus be harmonized. Ahaziah is also called Jehoahaz (xxi. 17), and Azariah (xxii. 6).

AH'BAN (brother of the wise). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 29).

A'HER (after, following). A Benjamite (1 Chron. vii. 12). He is probably identical with AHIRAM, which see.

AHI' (brother, or possibly a contraction of Ahiah or Ahijah).—1. A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 15).—2. A chieftain of Asher (vii. 34).

AHIAH (brother, i.e. friend, of Jehovah) See AHIAH.

AHI'AM (perhaps for Ahiah, father's brother). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 33; 1 Chron. xi. 35). In some copies the name is given in the place last referred to as Ahiham.

AHI'AN (brotherly). A son of Shemidah (1 Chron. vii. 19).

AHIE'ZER (brother of help).—1. A prince of the tribe of Dan (Numb. i. 12, ii. 25, vii. 66, x. 25).—2. A Benjamite chief who joined David (1 Chron. xii. 3).

AHI'HUD (brother, i.e. friend, of Judah, or praise). A chief of the tribe of Asher (Numb. xxxiv. 27).

AHI'HU'D (brother, i.e. friend, of union).

A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 7).

AHI'JAH or AHI'AH (brother, or friend, of Jehovah).—1. A high priest (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18). See AHIMELECH, 1.—2. A scribe in Solomon's time (1 Kings iv. 3).—3. An eminent prophet of Shiloh, hence called the Shilonite, who announced, possibly to Solomon (xi. 11-13), and, as we are expressly told, both by symbol and in words to Jeroboam, the impending division of the kingdom (29-39, xii. 15; 2 Chron. x. 15). The symbol was the rending of his (Ahijah's) new garment, and the giving of ten pieces out of twelve to Jeroboam (comp. Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 192-195). A second remarkable prophecy was delivered by Ahijah to Jeroboam's wife, reaching beyond the immediate circumstances, and foreshadowing a time when Israel for their sins would be scattered beyond the river (1 Kings xiv. 1-18, xv. 29). He appears also to have left annals of Solomon's reign (2 Chron. ix. 29).—4. One of the tribe of Issachar, father of king Baasha (1 Kings xv. 27, 33, xxi. 22; 2 Kings ix. 9).—5. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 25).—6. A Benjamite (viii. 7); probably the same with Ahoah (4).—7. One of David's warriors (xi. 36).—8. A Levite who had charge of the consecrated treasures (xxvi. 20).—9. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 26).

AHI'KAM (brother of the enemy). The son of Shaphan the scribe, an officer at the court of Josiah and Jehoiakim. He protected Jeremiah the prophet, and was father of Gedaliah, who was made governor of the land after the taking of Jerusalem (2 Kings xxii. 12, 14, xxv. 22; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20; Jer. xxvi. 24, xxxix. 14, xl. 5, and elsewhere).

AHI'LUD (brother of one born, sc. before him). The father of Jehoshaphat and Baana, officers of David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 1 Kings iv. 3, 12; 1 Chron. xviii. 15).

AHIM'AAZ (brother of anger).—1. The father of Ahinoam, Saul's wife (1 Sam. xiv. 50).

—2. The son of Zadok the priest. He, with Jonathan, Abiathar's son, contrived to bring David intelligence, during Absalom's rebellion, of Ahithophel's counsel, and Hushai's endeavour to counteract it (2 Sam. xv. 27, 36, xvii. 15-22). When the royal forces had gained the victory, he offered to convey the news to David; but his request was refused by Joab because of Absalom's death. After Cushai had been despatched, Ahimaaz again solicited permission to run, and, having overcome Joab's reluctance, he started, outran Cushai, and preceded the king of the success achieved. In answer, however, to the inquiry respecting Absalom, he, not quite truthfully, replied that he had seen a tumult, but 'knew not what it was' (xviii. 19-30). After this we hear nothing more of Ahimaaz, and (comparing 1 Kings iv. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 8, 9, 53) it seems probable that he died before his father, and was never high priest.—3. One of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 15). We cannot suppose this person identical with No. 2.

AHI'MAN (brother of a gift).—1. One of the Anakim inhabiting Hebron (Numb. xiii. 22), expelled and slain by Caleb and the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 14; Judges i. 10).—2. A Levite porter (1 Chron. ix. 17).

AHIM'ELECH (brother of the king).—1. The son of Ahitub, who was Eli's grandson. He was high priest in the reign of Saul; and, for giving David the shew-bread, he was, with many other priests at Nob, murdered by Saul's command; Abiathar, his son, alone escaping (1 Sam. xxi. 1-9, xxii. 9-23, xxiii. 6, xxx. 7; Psal. liii., title). Ahimelech is generally identified with Ahiah (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18); and there are innumerable instances in scripture in which one person bore two names, or in which a transcriber's error may have introduced a change. But it is by no means an improbable conjecture that Ahiah and Ahimelech were brothers, and that the latter succeeded the former in the high-priesthood. It has been objected that 1 Sam. xiv. 18 is at variance with 1 Chron. xiii. 3. But we must understand the last-named passage as speaking only of the general custom, or of the latter part of Saul's reign. The ark was near Saul's headquarters at the time when he is said to have called for it; or by a copyist's error 'ark' may be put for 'ephod:' the Hebrew words are not unlike.—2. One of David's band when persecuted by Saul (1 Sam. xxvi. 6).—3. Ahimelech is named in 2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. xviii. 16, marg., xxiv. 3, 6, 31, where we should have expected Abiathar. Some have supposed that Abiathar had a son called Ahimelech; others, with greater probability, believe that the names have been accidentally transposed. See ABIA-THAR.

AHI'MOTH (brother of death). A Kohathite (1 Chron. vi. 25). A little after (35) he is called Mahath.

AHIN'ADAB (liberal or noble brother). One of Solomon's commissaries, who was stationed at Mahanaim (1 Kings iv. 14).

AHIN'OAM (brother of pleasantness).—1. The wife of Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 50).—2. One of David's wives (xxv. 43, xxvii. 3, xxx. 5; 2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 2).

AHI'O (brotherly).—1. One of the sons of Abinadab, who helped to remove the ark (2 Sam. vi. 3; 1 Chron. xiii. 7).—2. A Benjamite (viii. 14).—3. Another Benjamite (31, ix. 37).

AHI'RA (brother of evil). The prince of the tribe of Naphtali (Numb. i. 15, ii. 29, vii. 78, 83, x. 27).

AHI'RAM (brother of the high). A son of Benjamin (Numb. xxvi. 38). He is called Ehi in Gen. xli. 21, and is possibly the same with Aher (1 Chron. vii. 12).

AHIRAMITES. A family of Benjamin, descendants of Ahiram (Numb. xxvi. 38).

AHIS'AMACH (brother of support or help). A Danite, father of Aholiab (Exod. xxxi. 6, xxxv. 34, xxxviii. 23).

AHISH'AHAR (brother of the dawn). A Benjamite (1 Chron. vii. 10).

AHI'SHAR (brother of the singer or of the upright). The steward of Solomon's household (1 Kings iv. 6).

AHITH'OPHEL (brother of folly). A native of Giloh, a city of Judah, David's trusted counsellor (1 Chron. xxvii. 33, 34), who was induced to join the party of Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 12, 31, 34). His advice was intended to make the breach irreparable betwixt the father and the son; and, had his counsel immediately to pursue David been followed, it is possible that the king would have been cut off before he reached the Jordan. But by God's providence Hushai's counter-plan was preferred by Absalom; and Ahithophel, foreseeing the defeat of the rebellion, retired to his own city and hanged himself (xvi. 15-xvii. 23). Some have endeavoured to account for Ahithophel's treason by the supposition that, as it seems likely he was Bath-sheba's grandfather (xi. 3, xxiii. 34), he wished to revenge on David the evil done to her. But this is not reasonable. The success of Absalom would probably have been fatal to Bath-sheba; it would certainly have barred Solomon, Ahithophel's great grandson, from the throne. Perhaps there may be a reference in Psal. xli. 9, lv. 12-14, to Ahithophel, and possibly through him to a yet worse traitor, Judas.

AHI'TUB (brother, i.e. friend, of goodness).
—1. The grandson of Eli, and father of Ahiah or Ahimelech (1 Sam. xiv. 3, xxii. 9, 11, 12, 20). We do not know whether he ever exercised the functions of high priest.
—2. The father, or, possibly, grandfather of Zadok (2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. vi. 7, 8, 52, ix. 11, xviii. 16; Ezra vii. 2; Neh. xi. 11). It is probable from the expression used in the last-named place that he was actually high priest.—3. Another Ahitub is introduced in 1 Chron. vi. 11, 12, also called the son of Amariah, and father of Zadok. But it has been imagined that the names are introduced a second time by a transcriber's error. See Lord A. C. Hervey, Genealogies of our Lord Jesus Christ, pp. 287, 288.

AH'LAB (fatness, fertility). A place in the territory of Asher, from which the Canaanites were not driven out (Judges i. 31).

AH'LAI (O that! would God!).—1. A female descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 31, 34, 35).
—2. The father of one of David's chiefs (xi. 41). But perhaps this second Ahlai was the same with No. 1; a female being occasionally at the head of a genealogy.

AHO'AH (brotherhood?). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 4). This name is possibly another form of AHIAH, which see.

AHO'HITE. Some of David's warriors are thus designated (2 Sam. xxiii. 9, 28; 1 Chron. xi. 12, 29, xxvii. 4); perhaps they were descendants of Ahoah.

A'HOLAH (she has her own tent). A symbolical name for Samaria (Ezek. xxiii. 4, 5, 36, 44).

AHOL'IAB (tent of his father). An officer of the tribe of Dan, employed with Bezaleel in the construction of the tabernacle (Exod. xxxi. 6, xxxv. 34, xxxvi. 1, 2, xxxviii. 23).

AHOL'IBAH (my tabernacle is in her). A symbolical name for Judah (Ezek. xxiii. 4, 11, 22, 36, 44).

AHOLIBA'MAH (tent of the height).—1. One of the wives of Esau: she is called the daughter of Anah (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 5, 14, 18, 25). There can be little doubt that she is the same with Judith the daughter of Beeri (xxvi. 34). See ANAM, BEERT. She had perhaps Judith as her original name, and afterwards received that of Aholibamah.—2. The same name occurs as that of a man (xxxvi. 41; 1 Chron. i. 52); but it is probable that, as the dukes of Edom are enumerated 'after their places' 'according to their habitations,' the name may be that of a district, so called from Esau's wife, or from which she was water.

AHU'MAI (brother of water, i.e. dwelling near it). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 2).

AHU'ZAM (their possession). The son of Ashur, in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 6).

AHUZZATH (possession). The friend (bridesman according to the LXX) of Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gen. xxvi. 26).

AI (heap of ruins).—1. A royal city of Palestine, but of no great size. It is mentioned (as Hai) in Abraham's time (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3), and was, after a repulse before it, destroyed by the Israelites under Joshua (Josh. vii. 2-5, viii. 1-29, ix. 3, x. 1, 2, xii. 9). It must, however, have been afterwards rebuilt; Aiath (Isai. x. 28) is probably identical with it; and the men of Ai are said to have returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 28; Neh. vii. 32); it is also likely that it is the Ajja re-peopled by the Benjamites (Neh. xi. 31). It lay to the east of Beth-el; but its site has not been exactly determined. It may perhaps be at the Tell el-Haiyeh.—2. A town of the Ammonites, near Heshbon (Jer. xlix. 3); but possibly the word here is not a proper name.

AI'AH (hawk, falcon).—1. The father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (2 Sam. iii. 7, xxi. 8, 10, 11).—2. See AJAH.

AI'ATH (ruins) (Isai. x. 28). Most probably identical with AI, 1, which see.

AI'JA (id.) (Neh. xi. 31). Yet another form of AI.

AI'JALON (place of deer or gazelles).—1. (Josh. xxi. 24; Judges i. 35; 2 Chron. xi. 10). See AJALON.—2. A city of Zebulun (Judges xii. 12).

AI'JELETH-SHA'HAR (hind of the dawn, i.e. the morning sun scattering his first rays upon the earth). An expression found in the title of Psal. xxii. Various explanations have been given, as that it denoted a musical instrument, that it had some reference to the contents of the psalm, &c. But these are unsatisfactory. It rather means the melody to which the psalm should be sung. There was some poem or lyrical composition then extant which bore the name of Aijelet-shahar—similar names have frequently been given to poems in the East—and according to the well-known measure of that the chief musician was to sing or chant the psalm.

A'IN (eye or gushing spring).—1. A place, or more probably a fountain, mentioned as one of the boundary marks of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 11), to the east of which the line was to run. The Ain-el-'Azy, the main source of the Orontes, is in the position indicated.—2. A Levitical city, in the territory assigned first to Judah, afterwards to Simeon (Josh. xv. 32, xix. 7, xxi. 16; 1 Chron. iv. 32; see, however, 1 Chron. vi. 59). Possibly En-rimmon (Neh. xi. 29) may be the same place. The word Ain is joined with many names, as Ain-dor, and implies that there was a fresh spring at the place. It is then spelt in our version, En, as in En-dor.

AIR. Some expressions in which this word occurs seem to require notice. The phrase 'to beat the air' (1 Cor. xi. 26) alludes to a boxer who, instead of striking his antagonist, hits vainly into the air. 'Speaking into the air' (xiv. 9) is speaking uselessly, the words making no impression.

AIRUS (1 Esdr. v. 31).

A'JAH (hawk, falcon). A son of Zibeon (Gen. xxxvi. 24; 1 Chron. i. 40). In the last-named place the name is Alah in our version.

AJ'ALON (place of deer or gazelles, q.d., deer-field). A city of Dan allotted to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xix. 42, xxi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 69). It appears to have been on the border of the three tribes, Dan, Ephraim, and Benjamin; and hence we find it sometimes attributed to one, sometimes to another. It was on the slope of hills abounding with animals, and was held by the Amorites against the Danites (Judges i. 35). Saul pursued the Philistines to this point after a victory (1 Sam. xiv. 31); and we read of other contests in connection with Ajalon (1 Chron. viii. 13). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Chron. xi. 10); but the Philistines re-occupied it in the reign of Ahaz (xxviii. 18). The celebrated valley must have been just at hand (Josh. x. 12). And both the city and the valley have been clearly identified. Ajalon is the modern Yalo, on a long hill, about 14 miles from Jerusalem, on the south side of a broad fertile valley called Merj-Ibn Omeir. The Amorite kings, says Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 533), 'evidently fled from Gibeon down by the upper Beth-horon to the lower, and then southward into this Merj-Ibn Omeir. All these places are still found.'

AKA'N (distortion?) A descendant of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 27); in 1 Chron. i. 42 he is called Jakan.

AK'KUB (insidious).—1. One of David's descendants (1 Chron. iii. 24).—2. A porter (ix. 17; Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45, xi. 19, xii. 25).—3. One of the Nethinim (Ezra ii. 45).—4. A person joined with Ezra at the solemn reading of the law (Neh. viii. 7).

AKRAB'BIM (scorpions). The name of a pass, 'scorpion-pass,' forming the southern boundary of the land of Israel (Numb. xxxiv. 4). The territory of Judah reached to it (Josh. xv. 3, where 'Maaleh-acrabbin'); and here was the Amorite frontier (Judges i. 36). This pass must have been near the southern extremity of the Dead sea. Various attempts have been made to identify it; perhaps it is at the Wady es-Safeh.

ALABASTER. A calcareous spar, soft enough to be readily worked into boxes or vases. Some such vases have been discovered in Assyria and Egypt; and it is said that one at least was found to retain the odour of the perfume that originally filled it. The word occurs in Matt. xxvi. 7; Mark xiv. 3; Luke vii. 37. The expression 'brake the box' (Mark xiv. 3) means simply the breaking of the seal which closed the box. The name alabaster is derived from the Greek, and is said to signify 'without handles,' the vases originally being so formed.

ALA'METH (covering). A Benjamite (1 Chron. vii. 8).

ALAM'MELECH (king's oak). A town in the territory of Asher (Josh. xix. 26).

ALA'MOTH (maidens). This word occurs twice (1 Chron. xv. 20; Psal. xlvii., title). It has been supposed to denote an instrument; but perhaps a preferable explanation is that it signifies 'after the manner of maidens,' i.e. with the female voice, treble, soprano, as distinguished from the deeper voice of men.

AL'CIMUS (valiant). A Jewish high priest in the time of the Maccabees. He was confirmed and protected by Demetrius Soter; but his conduct was unprincipled and violent. It was in resisting his re-instatement, after he had fled from Jerusalem, that Judas Maccabeus was killed. Alcimus died of palsy (1 Macc. vii., ix.; 2 Macc. xiv.).

AL'EMA (1 Macc. v. 26).

A'LEMETH (covering). A descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 36, ix. 42).

AL'EMETH (id.). A town of Benjamin, allotted to the priests (1 Chron. vi. 60). In Josh. xxi. 18 it is called Almon. It has been identified with 'Almt' or 'Almuth,' near to 'Anata, the ancient Anathoth.

ALEXANDER.—1. One of the sons of Simon the Cyrenian who was compelled to bear our Lord's cross (Mark xv. 21). He was probably, at the time the evangelist wrote, a known disciple.—2. A Jewish councillor, one of the kindred of Annas the high priest (Acts iv. 6).—3. A Jew at Ephesus, put forward during the riot excited against the Christians (xix. 33, 34). It is quite uncertain whether the intention was for him to defend the Jews, or as a Christian to be exposed to the fury of the mob.—4. A nominal disciple, whom St. Paul censures as having with Hymeneus made shipwreck concerning faith (1 Tim. i. 20).—5. A copper-smith who had done St. Paul much harm (2 Tim. iv. 14). It is possible that he may be identical with No. 3 or 4.

ALEXAN'DER.—1. The celebrated king of Macedon, born 356 B.C., who, succeeding his father Philip, reigned twelve years and eight months, 336-323 B.C. He was a mighty conqueror, whose dominion, and overthrow of the Persian empire, were predicted by the prophet Daniel (Dan. vii. 6, viii. 5-8, 21, 22, xi. 3, 4). He is mentioned in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. i. 1-9, vi. 2). But the account there given of the disposal of his dominions differs from that of most historians; since he is represented as parting his kingdom among his generals. Oriental writers, however, as Winer has observed, make the same statement. See D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient., art. 'Eskander.' Josephus gives a remarkable narrative of Alexander's visit to Jerusalem (Antiq., lib. xi. 8, § 5). The Jews had refused allegiance to him while besieging Tyre. He therefore turned his march, not long after, towards the holy city. But Jaddua, the high priest, warned by a dream, went out in his sacerdotal robes at the head of a long train of priests and citizens, to meet the king. Alexander, it is said, to the astonishment of his generals, did reverence to the holy name inscribed on the high priest's tiara, and acknowledged that he had seen in a vision the Deity whom Jaddua represented, and had been promised by him victory in his Asiatic invasion. He entered the city, offered sacrifice there, was shown the prophecy of Daniel respecting himself, and granted the Jews everywhere the most important privileges. Gentile writers do not repeat this story; still, their silence is not conclusive against the truth of it, and some faint traces of something like it may be found. We can hardly venture to pronounce it altogether a fiction; though Josephus may have decked out the reality with additional circumstances.

natural advantage. The climate was considered healthy. The island of Pharos lay off the coast at a little distance, and was connected with the main-land by a dyke called the Heptastadium, in which there was at each end a passage for vessels between the two harbours thus formed. The port, bounded by the two promontories, the Pharos and Lochias, by the north-east part of the city, and by the Heptastadium, was called the Great Port. The other had the name of Eunostus (safe return). The lake Mareotis, connected by a canal with port Eunostus, was a secure inland haven. The Ptolemies made Alexandria the seat of their government, enlarged and embellished it, till it

2. Alexander, called Balas, was said to be a natural son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and claimed the crown of Syria in opposition to Demetrius Soter, 152 B.C. He succeeded ere long in defeating his rival, who was killed in battle; and then Alexander married Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy Philometor. But, after a while, Demetrius Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter, claimed his father's kingdom. Alexander had become odious through his luxury and misgovernment. His father-in-law, Ptolemy, took the field against him; and he was defeated, and fled into Arabia, where (though accounts differ) he was put to death. His son by Cleopatra became eventually king of Syria, under the name of Alexander Theus (1 Macc. x., xi.).

3. Alexander Jannæus was a prince of the Maccabean family. See MACCABEES, THE FAMILY OF MACCABEUS.

ALEXANDRIA. A very noted city of Egypt. It was founded 332 B.C. by Alexander the Great, who perceived the capabilities of the situation, and designed it as the mart in which the commerce of the east and the west might be most extensively developed. The result gave ample proof of the great king's sagacity. Alexandria (named after him) attained a degree of prosperity which placed it in the very first class of the cities of the ancient world. It was built on the tongue of land between the lake Mareotis and the Mediterranean sea, and was said to be shaped like a Macedonian chlamys, or military cloak, thirty stadia (between three and four miles) in length, and seven or eight stadia wide in the narrowest part. This city enjoyed every became not only the emporium of commerce, but also a most renowned seat of learning and the liberal sciences. Its population was so large that Diodorus Siculus (lib. xvii. 52), who visited Egypt about 60 B.C., reports that there were 300,000 free citizens upon the registers (there being, perhaps, an equal number of slaves). The famous library is said to have been founded about 284 B.C. It was in a quarter of the city called Bruchion; and connected with it was a kind of college, called the Museum, afterwards transferred to the Serapeion. This library (reported at one time to contain 700,000 volumes) suffered various catastrophes and spoliations, and appears to have finally perished in the Arab conquest. The magnificent light-house, on the island of Pharos, was another of the marvels of Alexandria, and indeed was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. It was built by Sostrates of Cnidus, and completed 283 B.C., in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus.

Alexandria was the capital of the Ptolemies till the Roman conquest, 30 B.C. It continued to flourish under the Roman emperors, and afterwards as a chief city of the eastern empire. In 640 A.D. it was captured by the Arabs under the caliph Omar. In 969, the Fatimite caliph gained possession of Egypt; and Alexandria sank by degrees into a place of secondary importance; and the discovery of the route to India by the Cape of Good Hope, in 1497, well-nigh extinguished its remaining commerce. Of late years, however, it has somewhat recovered; and the modern city, the only seaport of Egypt, lying on the route of what is called the overland passage to India, is an important station. It is about 125 miles north-west of Cairo, and occupies the neck of land which joins the continent to the ancient island of Pharos. The population is now estimated at 60,000. There are still some remains of antiquity: one of the most noticeable is the column of Diocletian, commonly called Pompey's Pillar, about 94 feet in height.

We have an interesting reference to the Alexandrian corn-trade with Italy in the New Testament. Egypt was one of the granaries of Rome; and the ships in which the wheat was conveyed from Alexandria were of large size. Their arrival at Puteoli was anxiously looked for; and they alone were not required, on entering the bay, to strike their top-sails (See Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, pp. 69-71, 151, 152). It was in one of these ships that St. Paul was wrecked, and in another that he was carried from Malta to Italy (Acts xxvii. 6-44, xxviii. 11-13).

There had always been a great Jewish population in Alexandria. Alexander himself allowed them large privileges; and the Ptolemies encouraged them. Julius Cæsar and Augustus both confirmed their franchises, and the last-named monarch appointed a council of Jews to manage their affairs according to their own laws. They had too, for a long time, a magistrate of their own; and their numbers always continued great, so that at the Arabian conquest they amounted to 40,000.

One result of the Jewish element among the population of Egypt was the translation at Alexandria of the sacred books into Greek; of which an account is elsewhere given. See VERSIONS. But there were influences at work which tended to separate the Alexandrian Jews from their brethren in Palestine. Some of these were political; the Jews of Palestine being under the supremacy of the Syrian kings. And the establishment of a temple at Leontopolis, where the worship resembled that at Jerusalem, would of course religiously divide off the Jews in Egypt. They continued, however, to pay the contribution for the temple-service at Jerusalem till the time of the Christian era, but they considered themselves, and really were, independent. They became, too, imbued with the Greek literature and Greek philosophy. Speculative and ascetic notions grew; and allegoric modes of interpreting the scriptures prevailed. Mr. Westcott traces the progress of this philosophy, and its bearing upon Christianity, in an article in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 45-49, and also in his Introduction to the Study of the Gospels. In the last-named work, he thus sums up the general character of what may be called Alexandrianism: 'This last growth of Judaism, if the fairest, was still premature and fruitless. In its essence, it was the idea of heathen religion, and the negation of Christianity, because it raised the soul in isolation from the earth, and excluded all regard to the outer work of life and redemption. It was equally partial in its application and in its scope. It adressed only one part of man's nature and one class of men. It suppressed the instincts of civil and domestic society, which Christianity ennobled; it perpetuated the barriers which Christianity removed: it abandoned the conflict which Christianity carries out to victory. Yet even thus the mystics of Egypt and Palestine maintained a practical belief in the necessity of a spiritual faith. Their own existence was a sign of "the last times;" but they could not interpret it. They witnessed that Judaism, in its literal acceptation, was insufficient to fulfil the desires of men, but they could not, like John the Baptist, proclaim the near approach of a coming kingdom' (p. 76). Some of the apocryphal writings were of Alexandrian origin: the 2nd book of Esdras is an example. The celebrated Philo, too, was an Alexandrian Jew, born probably some little time before our Lord's advent.

The 'eloquent' Apollon was a Jew of Alexandria (Acts xviii. 24-28). But we have no account in scripture of the planting of Christianity in that city. Ecclesiastical story reports that St. Mark preached and founded a church there. Alexandria was, in after times, one of the great metropolitan sees; and there are eminent names among the bishops who presided. It must be sufficient here to mention one—Athanasius.

ALEXANDRIANS. A synagogue of these is mentioned (Acts vi. 9). There are said to have been 460 or 480 synagogues in Jerusalem. It was reasonable, therefore, to expect that Alexandria, where so many Jews dwelt, would have a special synagogue for their worship in Jerusalem.

ALMUG (2 Chron. ii. 8, ix. 10, 11). See ALMUG.

ALIAH (wickedness) (1 Chron. i. 51). Another form of ALVAH, which see.

ALIAN (tall, thick) (1 Chron. i. 40). See ALVAN.

ALIEN. Aliens are properly foreigners belonging to and resident in another country, and are to be distinguished from strangers or sojourners, those foreigners who come to reside in a land not their own; but the distinction is not always observed in our translation (Exod. xviii. 3; Deut. xiv. 21; Isai. lxi. 5; Lam. v. 2). Certain foreigners, as the Ammonites and Moabites, were specially prohibited from entering into the congregation of the Lord (Deut. xxiii. 3). But there was nothing to prevent aliens from visiting Palestine; where some of the legal ordinances were binding on them, and provision was made for their worshipping God in the temple (1 Kings ix. 41-43); but all the prohibitions of the law did not extend to them (Deut. xiv. 21). St. Paul takes occasion to illustrate the mercy of God in bringing by Christ foreigners and aliens into his church and family (Eph. ii. 11-13). See PROSELYTE.

ALLEGORY. A figurative mode of discourse, which under the literal sense of the words used conveys a further meaning. Allegory is a Greek term (ἀλληγορία) derived from ἄλλο ἀγορεύεται, i. e. a different thing is said from what is meant. The narrative may be either supposititious, or, if descriptive of facts, describing them only in order to represent higher truths than the literal acceptance of them would imply. The allegory contains, therefore, an immediate and an ultimate signification; the first being merely introductory to the last. The purpose or value of the allegory consists in its application or moral. Bishop Lowth (Lect. on Hebr. Poetry, x., xi.) enumerates three forms of allegory: 1. That properly so called; which he inaccurately terms a continued metaphor. A metaphor, however, has but one meaning; an allegory two, the literal and the figurative; 2. The parable or similitude (see PARABLE); 3. The mystical allegory, when a double meaning is couched under the same words, or when the same prediction, admitting of different interpretations, relates to different events, distant in time and distinct in their nature. But this mystical or typical explication of scripture will be more suitably noticed elsewhere (see TYPE). The allegory, properly so called, will be alone described here.

Allergories have been divided into pure or perfect, in which no literal expressions are introduced to indicate the principal object, and impure or mixed, the application of which is more easily seen, because plain words are used or added, which lead to the ultimate meaning. Pure allegories are not often found in scripture. The story, however, of the prodigal son (Luke xv.) is an instance. Of the mixed allegory, there is a good example in Psal. lxxx. Rules have been given by various writers for the interpretation of allegories: they are, for the most part, plain observations, which commend themselves to the common sense of the student. Thus, (1) Historical statements of facts are not to be taken as allegorical. Some expositors have greatly erred in this respect; they have extracted allegorical meanings from the ordinary scripture narratives. (2) The literal meaning of the words should be ascertained before we proceed to the explanation of an allegory. (3) The main design of the whole must be examined by looking at the occasion which gave rise to it, the nature of the thing itself, with the scope and context of the passage in which the allegory occurs. But the comparison must not be extended to all the circumstances, which are often introduced as a kind of drapery to the principal figure. (4) The explanation must be consistent, not partly literal and partly figurative. If literal expressions occur, as in the mixed allegory, they are only to lead to the understanding of the principal object. The church of Rome violates this rule in applying 1 Cor. iii. 9-15 to the establishment of the doctrine of purgatorial fire.

ALLELUIA (Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6). The Greek form of HALLELUJAH, which see.

ALLIANCE. The Hebrews, a covenant people selected from the families of the earth to be the special depository of divine truth, were, by the position and nature of their country, and by the peculiarity of their institutions, less likely than other nations to form treaties of alliance with foreigners. But, as time rolled on, and particularly as great monarchies arose on either side of them, they had to enter into relations with their neighbours, which often, from their undue dependence upon human help, and their adopting the idolatrous customs of their allies, led to severe censures and national punishment. To give an account of their various alliances would be to trace out their whole history: it must suffice here to indicate a general principle, and glance at one or two particular events.

The first account we have of an alliance is in Gen. xiv. 1, 2, 13. The patriarchs formed them (xxi. 27-32, xxvi. 28, 29, xxxi. 44-54). When Israel came into Canaan, they were forbidden to make alliance with the people of the land; nevertheless, the Gibeonites, by fraud, obtained a treaty from them (Josh. ix.). The Hebrews were not to be an aggressive nation, and were to live in peace with surrounding nations: hence they had offered terms to Sihon and Og, which were rejected (Numb. xxi. 21-35); and hence the alliance with Tyre (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Kings v. 1-12). After the division of the kingdom, it was the policy of Israel and Judah to strengthen themselves, the one against the other, by alliances with foreign states (xv. 16-21; 2 Kings xvi. 7-9). But, for a time, the two were in alliance against foreigners (1 Kings xxii.; 2 Kings iii., viii. 28, 29). The treaties, however, with more powerful kingdoms brought the Israelites into a state of vassalage to Egypt or to Assyria; and it was the overshadowing influence of one or other of these great empires that led to so many of the calamities of Israelitish later history. Thus, Josiah appears to have opposed Pharaoh, in accordance with his treaty engagements with the Assyrian king (xxiii. 29). Further details must be sought in extended Jewish history.

Alliances were made by an oath between the parties, and sometimes a present was offered, with a sacrifice and a feast, and memorials were occasionally set up (see passages already referred to; also 1 Kings xv. 18-20; Isai. xxx. 6, xxxvi. 16; Jer. xxxiv. 18-20). An alliance once made must not be unjustly broken (2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2; Ezek. xvii. 16).

AL'LOM (1 Esdr. v. 34).

AL'LOM (an oak). The son of Jedaiah (1 Chron. iv. 37).

AL'LOM (id.). A place on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). But perhaps a better rendering of the passage would be 'the oak at or in Zaananim.' See ZAANAN-NIM.

AL'LOM-BA'CHUTH (oak of weeping). The oak tree under which Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried (Gen. xxxv. 8).

ALMO'DAD (perhaps extension). The son of Joktan, a descendant of Eber (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chron. i. 20). His posterity settled in Arabia Felix; but opinions vary as to the particular tribes they formed.

AL'MON (hidden). A sacerdotal city of Benjamin (Josh. xxi. 18). It is the same with Alemeth (1 Chron. vi. 60).

AL'MON-DIBLATHA'IM (concealment of the twin cakes). A station of the Israelites (Numb. xxxiii. 46, 47). It is probably identical with Beth-diblathaim (Jer. xviii. 22).

ALMOND-TREE. The Hebrew word for almond-tree signifies 'a waker,' because this is the first of all trees to awake from the sleep of winter (Jer. i. 11, 12). This tree, Amygdalus communis, is repeatedly mentioned in scripture (Gen. xliii. 11; Numb. xvii. 8; Eccles. xii. 5). The last-named passage is usually understood of the profuse flowering of the almond-tree, as illustrating the hoary hairs of age. Gesenius objects to this, and would translate, 'The almond is spurned by an old man because he is toothless.' The flower of the almond-tree is not white, but rose-coloured; so that it cannot represent (he says) grey hairs. But perhaps his objection is somewhat exaggerated. In Exod. xxv. 33, 34, xxxvii. 19, 20, we find the ornaments of the sacred candlestick made like the almond-flower, or fruit (Balfour, The Plants of the Bible, pp. 49, 50).

ALMS. In the earlier period of Hebrew history we do not find any licensed begging; but the duty of relieving the poor is repeatedly and emphatically prescribed (Lev. xxv. 35; Deut. xv. 7, 8). Then, the harvest was not to be fully reaped, nor all the grapes of the vineyard gleaned, that the needy might be supplied (Lev. xix. 9, 10, xxiii. 22). And every third year the tithe of the produce was to be devoted to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow (Deut. xiv. 28, 29). There are many illustrations of the way in which concern for the poor was evinced (as Job xxix. 11-16); and, in the Apocrypha, almsgiving was inculcated as a special part of righteousness (Tob. xiv. 11). After the captivity, a kind of rate seems to have been imposed; and voluntary offerings were encouraged. There were receptacles in the women's court of the temple; and the Pharisees were ostentatious in their charity, for which they were rebuked by our Lord (Matt. vi. 1-4). Mendicancy was common in New Testament times; and almsgiving was enjoined and commended (Luke xi. 41, xii. 33; Acts iii. 2, x. 2, 4, 31; 1 John iii. 17). See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Almsmen.'

ALMUG. A highly-valued tree (1 Kings x. 11, 12), called also Algum (2 Chron. ii. 8, almuggim, marg., ix. 10, 11), from which columns, balustrades, harps, and psalteries were made by Solomon. It is most generally supposed to be the red sandal-wood, Pterocarpus santalinus, of the east, or possibly the white sandal-wood, Santalum album, very fragrant, of which costly utensils are still made in India. The main objection to the supposition is that (2 Chron. ii. 8) it seems as if almug-trees grew on Lebanon; but possibly the passage may mean that almug-trees, imported from the east to Tyre, were to be supplied by Hiram, along with the trees felled on Lebanon.

ALNATHAN (1 Esdr. viii. 44). Elnathan (Ezra viii. 16).

ALOE. An odoriferous tree, called also 'lign aloë' (Numb. xxiv. 6; Psal. xlv. 8; Prov. vii. 17; Sol. Song iv. 14). It is usually identified with the Aquilaria agallochum, which grows in India, Siam, China, and other parts of Central Asia. Another species, Aquilaria secundaria, is said to be very fragrant. The aroma of the tree proceeds from its resin, especially when decaying. Aloe-wood is useful for perfuming rooms and clothing. We find it also, mixed with myrrh, used in burial (John xix. 39). See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Aloe, Aloeholz.' The expression, however, in Numb. xxiv. 6, would seem to imply that some tree in the vicinity was intended.

A'LOTH (perhaps milk-giving). A place or district apparently joined with Asher as a commissariat department (1 Kings iv. 16).

AL'PHA. The first letter of the Greek alphabet, corresponding to Aleph, the first Hebrew letter. These letters were used as numerals. Alpha, therefore, denotes one, the first. And, as Omega is the last Greek letter, our Lord calls himself Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last, implying his divine eternity (Rev. i. 8, 11, xxi. 6, xxii. 13; comp. Isal. xlv. 6. See Trench, Comm. on Epistles to the Seven Churches, pp. 17, 18, 2nd edit.).

ALPHÆ'US or ALPHE'US (exchange?). The father of James the Less, one of the twelve apostles (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). He was the husband of Mary, the Virgin's sister (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40, 47, xvi. 1; Luke xxiv. 10; John xix. 25); the Clopas in the last-named place being merely a variation of the original Hebrew name. The apostle Jude was also a son of Alpheus (Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13, compared with Jude 1). Levi (the apostle Matthew) is described as a son of Alpheus (Mark ii. 14); whether the same as the one just mentioned is a matter of doubt.

ALTANE'US (1 Esdr. ix. 33).

ALTAR. A structure on which sacrifices were offered to the Deity. Many altars were erected in patriarchal times (Gen. viii. 20, xii. 7, xiii. 18, and elsewhere), generally in places where some special event had occurred, or where there had been some divine manifestation, in order to consecrate, as it were, the spot by reverent worship. And in later times, even after the tabernacle service was established, though sacrifices properly were to be offered only in the place which God should choose, individuals erected altars (Judges vi. 24-28; 2 Sam. xxiv. 25; 1 Kings xviii. 30-32). And, as idolatry prevailed, numerous altars were placed according to the fancy of the worshippers, generally on high places. Sometimes altars were intended not for sacrifice, but as memorials (Josh. xxii. 10, 22-29). Of the materials of primitive altars we have no account. According to the Mosaic law, they were to be of earth or unhewn stone (Exod. xx. 24, 25). This, however, might be only a general direction, to guide those who under peculiar circumstances were justified in erecting additional altars. For the altars of the tabernacle were of different materials.

One of these was the altar of burnt-offering. It was a framework of shittim (acacia) boards, overlaid with brass (copper or bronze), five cubits in length and breadth, and three cubits high. As it was thus hollow, it has been supposed that, in accordance with the command above noticed, it was filled within with earth when the camp was stationary. There appears to have been a ledge or projection on which the priests stood while officiating: below this there was a brass grating or network, which was let down into the altar, possibly to support the fire; but on this opinions differ. Four rings were attached to this network, through which staves, likewise of wood overlaid with metal, might be passed when the altar was removed. There were also to be horns to the altar, which occasionally were sprinkled with blood (xxvii. 1-3, xxix. 12): to these horns the victims were tied (Psal. cxviii. 27); and a person fleeing for sanctuary laid hold of them (1 Kings i. 50, 51, ii. 28). As steps were forbidden (Exod. xx. 26), it has been thought that a slope of earth was made from the ground to the ledge. But it is not certain that the ledge was high enough from the ground to require it. Various utensils belonged to this altar, as pans to receive the ashes, shovels to clear anything away, basins to receive the blood, flesh-hooks to remove the parts of the victims, and fire-pans, perhaps censers. This altar was placed at 'the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation' (xl. 29). The fire on it was never to go out (Lev. vi. 9, 13). A larger altar of burnt-offering was constructed by Solomon for the temple: it was twenty cubits in length and breadth, and ten cubits high, and was entirely of brass (2 Chron. iv. 1). No detailed description is given of it; and it is uncertain whether the ascent to it was by steps or by a gradual slope. This was repaired by Asa (xv. 8), removed by Ahaz to make room for a new altar of Syrian fashion (2 Kings xvi. 10-16), cleansed by Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx. 18), and repaired again by Manasseh (xxxiii. 16). We hear nothing further of it. For the second temple the altar was erected before the temple itself was begun (Ezra iii. 2, 3), Josephus (Antiq. lib. xi. 4, § 1) says, on the spot where Solomon's had stood. This was profaned by Antiochus Epiphanes; and a new one was built by Judas Maccabeus, both being of stone (1 Macc. iv. 44-47). The altar made by Herod is described by Josephus (Bell. Jud. lib. v. 5, § 6): 'Before the temple stood the altar, fifteen cubits high, and equal in both length and breadth; each being fifty cubits. The figure it was built in was a square; it had corners like horns; and the passage up to it was by a gentle acclivity from the south. It was formed without any iron tool; nor did iron so much as touch it at any time.' The dimensions, however, are differently given in the Mishna. Various other details are recorded of it. From the south-west horn a pipe conducted the blood of the victims by a subterranean passage to the Kedron. Under the altar a cavity with a marble covering received the drink-offerings. On the north side were several iron rings for securing the victims; and there was a red line round the middle to show where the blood was to be sprinkled, above or below it.

The altar of incense was made of shittim wood overlaid with gold; whence it is called also 'the golden altar' (Numb. iv. 11). It was a cubit in length and breadth, and two cubits high. It had horns, occasionally sprinkled as those of the brazen altar (Lev. iv. 7). It had a 'top' or 'roof,' and a border of gold, and golden rings with wooden staves overlaid with gold to carry it. It was to stand in the holy place 'before the veil that is by the ark of the testimony' (Exod. xxx. 1-6, xl. 5). On this incense was to be burned every day; and once a year an atonement was to be made upon it (xxx. 7-10). This is the altar referred to in Isai. vi. 6; Rev. viii. 3, 5. In Solomon's temple it was of cedar overlaid with gold (1 Kings vi. 20, vii. 48; 1 Chron. xxviii. 18). We have no notice of it at the building of the second temple; but later we are told that Antiochus Epiphanes took it away, and that Judas Maccabeus restored it or made another (1 Macc. i. 21, iv. 49, 50).

Of the altars of heathen nations, erected to idol gods, little can be said here. It may, however, be observed that the type of oriental altars was generally square or oblong, that of those of Greece and Rome more commonly cylindrical. Altars of brick are censured (Isai. lxv. 3).

The altar which St. Paul saw at Athens (Acts xvii. 23) has afforded matter of discussion. It was inscribed 'To the unknown God.' It is not likely that Jehovah is meant, who was unknown at Athens. Profane writers tell us that, when misfortune happened, and the Athenians attributed it to some deity, they could not tell whom, they dedicated an altar by way of propitiation to the unknown one. The altar referred to must have been one of these, and it furnished fit opportunity for the apostle to declare Him whom indeed the heathen knew not, but whom properly to know was life eternal.

AL-TASCHITH (destroy not). These words are prefixed to Psalms lvii., lviii., lix., lxxv.; which are also inscribed 'To the chief musician.' Some critics have supposed them to refer to the subject of the psalm; but this notion is certainly inapplicable to lviii., lxxv. The more probable opinion is, that the words are the commencement of some song, to the melody or tune of which these psalms were to be chanted.

AL'USH (a crowd of men, a strong fort, or place of wild beasts). A station in the journey of Israel from Egypt, next before Rephidim (Numb. xxxiii. 13, 14).

AL'VAH (wickedness). A duke or chief of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 40). He is called also Alich (1 Chron. i. 51).

AL'VAN (tall, thick). A descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23), called also Allian (1 Chron. i. 40).

AM'AD (people of duration). A town of Asher (Josh. xix. 26).

AMADA'THA, AMADA'THUS (Rest of Esth. xii. 6, xvi. 10, 17).

A'MAL (labour, sorrow). A descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 35).

AM'ALEK (a people that licks up?). The son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 12, 16; 1 Chron. i. 36).

AMAL'EKITES. This tribe is first mentioned in connection with the expedition of Chedor-laomer (Gen. xiv. 7). We find them occupying the country between Palestine, Idumea, and mount Sinai, on the elevated plateau (Numb. xiv. 25, 40-45) now called er-Rakmah; their seats having at a very early period been probably farther eastward. The grandson of Esau was perhaps the progenitor of a clan, which was intermingled with an older race. The Amalekites were a nomad people, their towns but collections of tents: they were rich in flocks and herds, and seem to have acquired a vast power by their bold predatory habits. They attacked the Israelites in Rephidim, but were beaten off with signal slaughter (Exod. xvii. 8-16; Deut. xxv. 17-19). They subsequently, in conjunction with the Canaanites, defeated Israel, when in the reactionary movement after the ill report of the spies the tribes tried against the divine command to enter Palestine at once (Numb. xiv. 40-45). The destruction of this nation, threatened for their attacks upon the Israelites, was also predicted by Balaam (xxiv. 20). They joined in some of the expeditions into Palestine in the times of the Judges (Judges iii. 13, vi. 3-5), bringing, it would seem, their cattle and families, as if to settle there; and from some such settlement places appear to have preserved their name (xii. 15). They were almost exterminated by Saul (1 Sam. xv.); and afterwards only small troops of them or individuals are mentioned (xxvii. 8, xxx. 1, 13; 2 Sam. i. 8). Agag was the general title of their chief.

A'MAN (Tob. xiv. 10; Rest of Esth x. 7, xii. 6, &c.). The Greek form of Haman.

AMA'NA (fixed, perennial). A ridge or summit of Anti-libanus, in which it is presumed the river Amara or Abana has its source (Sol. Song iv. 8; comp. 2 Kings v. 12, marg.). See ABANA.

AMARI'AH (whom Jehovah spoke of, 1. e. promised).—1. The grandfather of Zadok the priest (1 Chron. vi. 7, 52).—2. Another in the line of priests (11); but it is believed that some of the names here are an interpolation: compare, however, Ezra vii. 3.—3. A Kohathite Levite (1 Chron. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23).—4. The high priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xix. 11); he may be the same with No. 2.—5. A priest or Levite in the time of Hezekiah (xxx. 15).—6. One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 42).—7. A man who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, and who (or his representative) sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 3, xii. 2); his representative in the days of Joiakim was Jehohanan (13).—8. A descendant of Judah (xi. 4).—9. An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i. 1). It has been supposed by some that Immer (1 Chron. xxiv. 14) is identical with Amariah; if so, the names under No. 7 designate his representatives.

AMARI'AS (1 Esdr. viii. 2). A Greek form of Amariah.

AMA'SA (burden).—1. The son of Ithra, or Jether, by David's sister Abigail (2 Sam. xvii. 25; 1 Chron. ii. 16, 17). It was he, probably, who joined David at Ziklag. See AMASAI, 2. He was made commander-in-chief by Absalom, and was intended by David, after his restoration, to supersede Joab. But, as he failed to collect forces against Sheba (through a natural distrust felt towards one so lately in arms against his sovereign), Abishai was commissioned; and Joab, joining the march, took occasion when Amasa came up to murder him (2 Sam. xix. 13, xx. 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, 12; 1 Kings ii. 5, 32).—2. An Ephraimite chief (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

AMA'SAI (burdensome).—1. A Levite, a descendant of Korah (1 Chron. vi. 25, 35).—2. A chief who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 18).—3. A priest in David's time (xv. 24).—4. A Levite of the family of Kohath in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron. xxix. 12).

AMASH'AI (id.). A priest (Neh. xi. 13).

AMATHE'IS (1 Esdr. ix. 29).

AM'ATHIS (1 Macc. xii. 25). A district probably identical with Hamath.

AMAZIAH (whom Jehovah strengthens).—

1. The son and successor of Jehoash, or Joash, king of Judah. He was twenty-five years old at his accession, and he reigned twenty-nine years, 838-809 B.C. His conduct was, at first, unexceptionable; but he afterwards declined from God's law, and brought misfortune and judgment upon himself and his kingdom. He punished the murderers of his father, but spared their children, in conformity with the Mosaic regulation (Deut. xxiv. 16). He made war on Edom, which had revolted from Judah in the reign of Joram, and, besides his own troops, hired 100,000 Israelites, but dismissed them at the command of a prophet. His expedition was perfectly successful. He defeated the Edomites, took their capital, and gave it the name of Joktheel, i. e. subdued of God. But this success proved his ruin. Infatuated with the Edomitish idolatry, he adopted it in his own kingdom, in spite of a divine warning. The Israelitish troops he had dismissed had, in revenge, ravaged some districts of Judah; and Amaziah, very probably provoked by their conduct, defied Joash, king of Israel. His army was routed; and he was himself made prisoner: Jerusalem, too, was entered and plundered by Joash. Of the remainder of Amaziah's reign little is said. But it does not appear that he repented. For the consequences of his idolatry still pursued him. His own subjects conspired against him, and, when he fled to Lachish, slew him there. He was succeeded by his son Azariah, or Uzziah (2 Kings xiv. 1-21; 2 Chron. xxv.).—2. A Simeonite (1 Chron. iv. 34).—3. A Levite (vi. 45).—4. An idolatrous priest of the golden calf at Bethel, in the reign of Jeroboam II. (Amos vii. 10-17).

AMBASSADOR. There are early examples of ambassadors—persons empowered to convey a message on the part of a nation or a sovereign (Numb. xx. 14, xxi. 21, xxii. 5, 15; Josh. ix. 4). They were often men of high rank, and were despatched sometimes with hostile purpose, sometimes with courteous congratulations, or inquiries; and injury done to them was considered a great affront (2 Sam. x. 1-7; 2 Kings xviii. 17, xx. 12, 13; 2 Chron. xxxii. 31). St. Paul designates those who are entrusted with the message of the gospel as Christ's ambassadors (2 Cor. v. 20).

AMBER (Ezek. i. 4, 27, viii. 2). Most likely the substance called 'amber' in our version is not that which is now known by that name. It is rather a metal. Some have believed it a mixture of brass (or copper) and gold, or brass with a gold-like brilliancy. But, according to the derivation of the original word preferred by Gesenius, who observes that we find 'burnished brass' in the same connection (i. 7), smooth and polished brass may be intended (comp. Rev. i. 15).

AMEN (firm, faithful, verily). The proper signification of this word is when one person confirms the words of another, and expresses his wish for the success and accomplishment of the other's vows and declarations. Thus it is used in Numb. v. 22; Deut. xxvii. 15-26; 1 Kings i. 36; Jer. xxviii. 6. Also, after ascriptions of praise (Psal. cvi. 48; Matt. vi. 13, and elsewhere). Again, we find it at the beginning of a sentence, to signify the firm certainty of what was about to be said, as very frequently in our Lord's addresses (Matt. xxv. 40; John iii. 3, 5, 11, and in other places), where it is usually rendered 'verily.' The promises of the gospel, too, are said to be 'yea and amen' (2 Cor. i. 20), to indicate their stability. And once the word is used as a proper name (Rev. iii. 14), applied to Him from whose lips every syllable is assured truth; so that, though heaven and earth should pass, nothing that he has spoken can remain unaccomplished (Matt. xxiv. 35).

AMETHYST. One of the precious stones in the high priest's sacred breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12). The oriental amethyst is a gem of great hardness and lustre, violet, and occasionally red: the occidental amethyst is a variety of quartz, of much beauty, but not difficult to cut. This stone had its Hebrew name, ahhlamah, from its supposed property of inducing dreams. Its Greek name (from which the English word comes) implied that it was a charm against drunkenness. The amethyst is mentioned as one of the foundations of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20).

AMMI (perhaps a corrupted form of Amon, a builder). One whose descendants, called children of Solomon's servants, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 57). He is termed Amon in Neh. vii. 59.

AMIN'ADAB (Matt. i. 4; Luke iii. 33). The Greek form of AMMINADAB, which see.

AMINON (faithful) (2 Sam. xiii. 20, marg.). See AMNON.

AMIT'TAI (true, veracious). The father of Jonah the prophet (2 Kings xiv. 23; Jonah i. 1).

AM'MAH (beginning, head).—1. A hill before or facing GIAH (which see), the point to which Joab pursued Abner after the skirmish near Gibeon (2 Sam. ii. 24).—2. (viii. 1, marg.) See METHEG-AMMAH.

AM'MI (my people). The word is used in Hos. ii. 1, to express God's returning favour to Israel, who, once disavowed by him, should again be acknowledged as his people. See LO-AMMI.

AM'MIDOI (1 Esdr. v. 20).

AM'MIEL (kindred, i. e. servant, of God).—1. The spy selected of the tribe of Dan (Numb. xiii. 12).—2. The father of Machir, in whose house Mephibosheth was brought up, and who supplied David with provisions during Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5, xvii. 27).—3. The father of Bathsheba (1 Chron. iii. 5), called Eliam in 2 Sam. xi. 3.—4. A porter, son of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xxvi. 5).

AMMI'HU'D (kindred, i. e. one of the tribe, of Judah).—1. The father of the chief of Ephraim in the wilderness, an ancestor of Joshua (Numb. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48-53, x. 22; 1 Chron. vii. 26).—2. One of the tribe of Simeon (Numb. xxxiv. 20).—3. A descendant of Naphtali (28).—4. The father of Talmal king of Geshur (2 Sam. xiii. 37).—5. One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ix. 4).

AMMI'HUR (kindred of nobles). A varied form of Ammihud (2 Sam. xiii. 37, marg.).

AMMINADAB (kindred of the prince).—1. The son of Ram or Aram, who was great-grandson of Judah. His daughter, Elisheba, was the wife of Aaron; and his son Naashon, or Nahshon, prince of Judah in the wilderness (Exod. vi. 23; Numb. i. 7, ii. 3, vii. 12, 17, x. 14; Ruth iv. 19, 20; 1 Chron. ii. 10).—2. A son of Kohath (vi. 22). This is possibly a transcriber's error, as elsewhere generally (Exod. vi. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 2, 18) he is called Izhar; but see Birks' Ezodus, chap. xiii. p. 152.—3. The chief in David's time of the sons of Uzziel, a Levite, son of Kohath (xv. 10, 11).

AMMINADIB (companions of the prince). This occurs Sol. Song vi. 12. But in the margin it is my willing people; and probably the word should not be taken as a proper name. Ginsburg (The Song of Songs, with a Comm., p. 175) renders 'to the chariots of the companions of the prince.'

AMMISHAD'DAI (kindred, i. e. servant, of the Almighty). The father of Abiezer, prince of Dan (Numb. i. 12, ii. 25, vii. 66, 71, x. 25).

AMMI'ZABAD (kindred of the giver, i. e. Jehovah). An officer in David's army (1 Chron. xxvii. 6).

AM'MON, AM'MONITES (strong people, or perhaps the same as Ben-ammi, son of my kindred). The nation descended from Ben-ammi, the son of Lot, born in incest (Gen. xix. 38). They are continually spoken of in conjunction with the kindred people of Moab, and they appear to have worshipped the same god, Chemosh (Numb. xxi. 29; Judges xi. 24), though Moloch or Milcom is specially called their 'abomination' (1 Kings xi. 5). They had expelled the Zamzumim from the region between the Arnon and the Jabbok, and had established themselves in the strong mountainous country about the sources of these streams (Numb. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 20). The Israelites were not to molest the Ammonites (19); the latter, however, joined with the Moabites in inviting Balaam to curse Israel; and, on account of this unfriendly conduct, neither they nor the Moabites were ever to be admitted into the congregation of the Lord (xxiii. 3-6). Hence we find the most virulent conflicts continually occurring between Israel and the Ammonites. The king of Moab, aided by the Ammonites, subjected the Israelites for eighteen years (Judges iii. 12-14). Fresh invasions followed (xi. 4; 1 Sam. xi. 11). Jephthah, Saul, and David, however, defeated them, and broke their power (Judges xi. 32, 33; 1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. x., xii. 26-31). They afterwards recovered strength, and attacked Jehoshaphat, but were defeated, and, somewhat later, were made tributary to Uzziah and Jotham (2 Chron. xx. 1-30, xxvi. 8, xxvii. 5). Their enmity still continued: they united with the Chaldeans to distress Judah, and occupied the territory east of the Jordan (2 Kings xxiv. 2; Jer. xlix. 1; Zeph. ii. 8): their king Baalis instigated the murder of Gedaliah (Jer. xl. 14, xli. 15): they harassed the Jews after their return from captivity (Neh. iv. 7, 8), and attacked them in the Maccabean wars (1 Macc. v. 6, 30-43). Yet marriages were occasionally made between Israel and Ammon: thus the mother of Rehoboam was an Ammonitess (1 Kings xiv. 31). The Ammonites appear to have been a nomad race: but a single city, Rabbah, is named among them; though others are referred to (2 Sam. xii. 31). In their incursions they exhibited great barbarity (1 Sam. xi. 2; Amos i. 13), and showed themselves regardless of the ordinary rules observed by nations at all civilized (2 Sam. x. 4).

AM'NON (faithful).—1. The eldest son of David (called also Aminon), by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess. He dishonoured his half-sister Tamar, and was in consequence murdered by Absalom (2 Sam. iii. 2, xiii.; 1 Chron. iii. 1).—2. One of the descendants of Judah (iv. 20).

A'MOK (deep). A priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 7, 20).

A'MON (the hidden). One of the eight principal deities of Egypt. His name is written on the monuments Amon-Re, 'Amon the sun; Re, the sun, being connected with various other gods. In the oases Amon assumed the attributes of Noum or Nef, the ram-headed god; whence the Greeks imagined that he was always ram-headed, and identified him with their Zeus or Jupiter; he was therefore called in classical story Jupiter Ammon. He was worshipped at Thebes as Amon-Re, represented wearing a cap with two long feathers, and Amon-Reka mut-ef, 'Amon the sun who is both male and female,' represented as the generative principle. In this last form he is accompanied by figures of trees or other vegetable products. See Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt, chap. xiii. vol. iv. pp. 243-249; Mod. Egypt and Thebes, vol. ii. pp. 367, 375; Rawlinson's Herodotus, App. to book ii. chap. iii. pp. 283, &c.; Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 61.

This deity is here figured in a gathered linen tunic fastened by a belt: on his head is a helmet or cap, in the front of which is the disk of the sun, surmounted by two long and richly-coloured plumes, and from which a bandlet hangs down to the ground: in his right hand is the symbol of life, in his left the staff with the head of the hoopoe, denoting tranquillity: his skin is of a blue tint.

The word Amon occurs in Nah. iii. 8 (marg. No-Amon, signifying Thebes. It is also found in Jer. xvi. 25, marg.; but in this place the textual rendering of 'the multitude' is preferable: comp. Ezek. xxx. 4, 10, 15).

A'MON (architect, builder, or possibly foster-child).—1. A governor of Samaria in Ahab's time (1 Kings xxii. 26; 2 Chron. xviii. 25).—2. The son and successor of Manasseh king of Judah. He was twenty-two years old when he began to reign, and he reigned two years, 641-639 B.C. He was an ungodly prince, practising shameless idolatry. He was assassinated by his servants; but the people put the murderers to death, and placed the king's youthful son Josiah upon the throne (2 Kings xxi. 18-26; 1 Chron. iii. 14; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 20-25; Jer. i. 2, xxv. 3; Zeph. i. 1; Matt. i. 10).—3. A person also termed AMI, which see.

AM'ORITE (mountaineer). A people descended from Canaan the son of Ham (Gen. x. 16; 1 Chron. i. 14). They were one of the nations of Canaan, perhaps the most powerful and numerous; their name being sometimes taken so as to include all the Canaanitish tribes (Gen. xv. 16, xlviii. 22; Deut. i. 20; Amos ii. 9, 10). Hence we sometimes find a city said to be occupied by Amorites, which appears elsewhere assigned to another tribe. Thus Jerusalem is Amorite (Josh. x. 3, 5), Jebusite (xv. 63)

More particularly, however, the Amorites occupied the mountains; while the Canaanites dwelt in the lowlands (Numb. xiii. 29). Besides their settlements in the west, they extended themselves to the east of the Jordan, from the Arnon to Hermon (which in their language they called Shenir or Senir). Here they formed two kingdoms under Sihon and Og, including all Gilead and Bashan, which, on Sihon's refusal to let the Israelites pass peaceably, Moses conquered and assigned to the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh (Deut. ii. 26-30, iii. 8-10). Five kings of the Amorites were destroyed by Joshua: still the nation was by no means exterminated. We find them in the period of the Judges (Judges i. 34-36, iii. 5), and even to the reign of Solomon, who subjected the remnant of them to bond-service (1 Kings ix. 20, 21). There is also a notice of them as existing after the captivity (Ezra ix. 1). Mr. Grove, in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 62, maintains that the name 'Amorite' was a local term, and not the name of a distinct tribe. His arguments are certainly strong, and deserve all consideration.

A'MOS (borne up, or burden) B.C. 810-785. The third of the minor prophets, according to the order of our bibles. He was a native of Tekoah, a small town of Judah, about twelve miles south of Jerusalem; at least, this was his ordinary dwelling-place. He was not trained in the prophetic schools, and is said to have been 'among the herdmen of Tekoah' (i. 1). He also describes himself as a keeper of cattle and 'a gatherer of sycamore fruit,' and says that he was taken from the flock (vii. 14, 15). But, though this seems to indicate a mean condition, and none but the poorest (we are told by travellers) now gather or use sycamore fruit in Palestine (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 23), yet it does not follow that Amos was uneducated, a mere working-man. David was taken from the sheepfolds (Psal. lxxviii. 70, 71); and the word used in Amos i. 1 is the same that is applied to Mesha, the tributary king of Moab (2 Kings iii. 4).

Amos prophesied early in Uzziah's long reign; for Jeroboam II. was at the time upon the throne of Israel. And, if the statement of 2 Kings xv. 1 is to be relied on, Jeroboam died in the fifteenth of Uzziah. But some critics are disposed to believe that an error has somehow crept into that text; so that Uzziah's accession was twenty-seven years before Jeroboam's death. Be this, however, as it may, we cannot suppose the earthquake (Amos i. 1) to have occurred (according to the story of Josephus) when Uzziah attempted to burn incense. That attempt was later. Else Jotham his son would have been too young to assume the reins of government, for he was not born till his father had been twenty-seven years upon the throne (2 Kings xv. 2, 5, 32, 33); and, further, some of the predictions in Amos i. were fulfilled by Uzziah; whose prosperity seems to have continued afterwards a considerable time (2 Chron. xxvi. 5-15). Of the personal history of Amos we know no more. The length of his prophetic course, the place and time of his death, cannot be ascertained.

AMOS, THE BOOK OF. These predictions were delivered on occasion of the oppression and low estate of the two Israelitish kingdoms through their idolatry and luxury. The punishment of the neighbouring nations was announced; and this was in a measure accomplished by the victories of Jeroboam and Uzziah (2 Kings xiv. 23-29; 2 Chron. xxvi. 6-15). The Israelites and Jews, too, might expect severe judgments; yet to those who humbled themselves in true repentance the promise of deliverance is made, and the future blessing of Messiah's kingdom predicted.

This book may be divided into two principal parts: 1. Plain declarations (i.-vi.): this portion comprises a denunciation of the sins of adjacent nations (i. 1-ii. 3), and a reproof of Judah and Israel (ii. 4-vi. 14).—2. Prophetic visions and symbolic announcements (vii.-ix.): the impending judgments are here pre-signified (vii. 1-ix. 10), which Amaziah, the idolatrous priest, misrepresents; and finally, consolatory promises are given (ix. 11-15).

The style of the book is forcible; and many of the images drawn from rural life are full of beauty. The composition would seem to show that Amos was not a coarse rustic, but a person of considerable attainments. His book is cited twice in the New Testament—Acts vii. 42, 43, xv. 15-17.

A'MOZ (strong). The father of the prophet Isalah (Isai. i. 1, ii. 1).

AMPHIP'OLIS (around the city). A city of Macedonia, on the river Strymon. The Athenians colonized it, and gave it its name because the river flowed on both sides (Thucyd. lib. iv. 102). A celebrated battle was fought here in the Peloponnesian war, in which both Brasidas, the Spartan commander, and Cleon, the Athenian, were killed. This city became, under the Romans, the chief town of Macedonia prima. Paul and Silas passed through it on their way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 1).

AM'RAM (kindred of the lofty one, i.e. God).—1. A Levite, father of Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Exod. vi. 18, 20; Numb. iii. 19, xxvi. 58, 59; 1 Chron. vi. 2, 3, 18, xxiii. 12, 13, xxiv. 20).—2. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 34).

AM'RAM (red?). A descendant of Seir (1 Chron. i. 41). Possibly an error for Heman (Gen. xxxvi. 26).

AM'RAMITES. The family of Amram the Levite (Numb. iii. 27; 1 Chron. xxvi. 23).

AM'RAPHEL (guardian of the gods?). A king of Shinar, who joined in the expedition of Chedor-laomer (Gen. xiv. 1, 9).

AMULET. It appears to have been a general custom in ancient times, by no means obsolete at the present day, for persons to endeavour to secure themselves against witchcraft, and specially the evil eye, also against disease, by the use of amulets or talismans. These were sometimes scrolls inscribed with sacred words; and doubtless many of this kind were among the Ephesian 'books' which were openly burned (Acts xix. 19): sometimes they were stones, or shells, or pieces of metal, on which cabalistic figures were engraved. The Hebrews were as fond of amulets as any other nation, and they attributed peculiar virtue to the phylacteries which they wore, sanctioned, as they conceived, by the command of Moses (Exod. xiii. 9; Deut. vi. 8-9). Among the ornaments of the women, amulets are to be reckoned; and of this nature were probably the ear-rings mentioned in various places (Gen. xxxv. 4; Isai. iii. 20; Hos. ii. 13). The wearing of amulets on the sabbath was prohibited by the Jewish rabbins, except of those which were specially approved, i.e. such as were known to have cured not fewer than three persons. Modern travellers have described and figured amulets still worn in Egypt; and tokens of the like superstition in our own country might be produced without difficulty.

AM'ZI (strong).—1. A Levite (1 Chron. vi. 46).—2. A priest (Neh. xi. 12).

A'NAB (place of clusters, q. d. grape-town). A place in the mountains of Judah where once the Anakim dwelt (Josh. xi. 21, xv. 50). It still exists about ten miles SSW. from Hebron, retaining its ancient name.

AN'AEL (Tob. i. 21).

AN'AH (an answer, answering). The son of Zibeon, grandson of Seir the Horite, and father of Aholibamah, Esau's wife (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 14, 18, 20, 24, 25, 29; 1 Chron. i. 38, 40, 41). It is questioned whether there were two, a son of Seir, and a son of Zibeon, who bore the same name, Anah. It may be so; but possibly a single person is meant, son being in the one case used for descendant. Further, it seems, from our translation, as if Anah was the daughter of Zibeon (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 14). But here daughter is used in a larger sense; Aholibamah, daughter of Anah and grand-daughter of Zibeon. Anah was identical with BEERI, which see.

ANA'HARATH (snorting, or, according to some, gorge). A city of Issachar (Josh. xix. 19).

ANAI'AH (whom Jehovah answers). One who stood with Ezra at the solemn reading of the law (Neh. viii. 4); possibly the same who sealed the covenant (x. 22).

AN'AK (long-necked, a giant). The son of Arba, and father of the giants of the south of Palestine. But perhaps Anak is to be understood rather of the race than as an individual (Numb. xiii. 22, 28, 33; Deut. ix. 2; Josh. xv. 13, 14, xxi. 11; Judges i. 20).

AN'AKIMS (Deut. i. 28, ii. 10, ix. 2; Josh. xiv. 15). A gigantic race, descended from Arba, located in the southern parts of Palestine, among the mountains of Judah and Ephraim (Josh. xi. 21, 22, xiv. 12), and specially in the neighbourhood of Hebron, where they were divided into three families, those of Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai. They were the dread of the Israelites, but were at length almost entirely extirpated; so that there remained some of them only in the Philistine cities of Gath, Gaza, and Ashdod. See REPHAIM.

ANA'MIM (probably responding waters). An Egyptian tribe, whose location can be merely conjectured (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chron. i. 11).

ANAM'MELECH (image of the king, or the shepherd and the flock, i. e. the constellation Cepheus: other derivations are proposed). One of the gods whose worship was introduced into Samaria by the Sopherites (2 Kings xvii. 31). See ADHAMMELECH, 1.

AN'AN (1 Esdr. v. 30). The Hanan of Ezra ii. 46.

ANA'NI (contracted form of Ananiah). A descendant of David (1 Chron. iii. 24).

ANANI'AH (whom Jehovah covers). Possibly a priest (Neh. iii. 23).

ANANI'AH (id.). A place where Benjamites lived after their return from captivity (Neh. xi. 32).

ANANI'AS (the Greek form of Hananiah, whom Jehovah has graciously given).—1. One who professed himself a Christian, and who, in order to gain the credit of liberality, sold, in conjunction with his wife Sapphira, a piece of land, part of the price of which he brought to the apostles, pretending it was all he had received by the sale. Peter was enabled to detect the fraud; and, at his stern rebuke, Ananias was struck dead. The same fate, for the same sin, shortly after befel Sapphira; an awful proof being given that the Lord is a jealous God, and that before his eye secret sins are laid bare (Acts v. 1-11). Perhaps Peter did not anticipate the judgment that followed upon Ananias' sin; or, though, in the case of Sapphira, he predicted her punishment.—2. A Jewish disciple at Damascus, to whom the fact of Saul's conversion was announced in a vision. He was a devout man, of unblameable character. He was commanded to go to Saul, and lay his hands upon him, that he might receive his sight, lost at the gates of Damascus. This Ananias did; and Saul was then baptized (ix. 10-18, xxii. 12-16). According to tradition, Ananias was afterwards bishop of Damascus.—3. The son of Nebedæus, appointed high priest by Herod, king of Chalcis, 48 A.D., succeeding Joseph, son of Camithus. He was sent to Rome 52 A.D. by the procurator Cumanus, on a charge of oppression, brought against him by the Samaritans, but was acquitted, and probably resumed his office. He was, however, deposed shortly before Felix quitted his government, and was ultimately assassinated at the beginning of the last Jewish war. St. Paul was arraigned before him (xxiii. 2-5, xxiv. 1). See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Ananias;' Wieseler, Chron. des Apost. Zeit., p. 77, and Chron. Synops., pp. 187, &c.

ANANIAS.—1. (1 Esdr. v. 16).—2, 3, 4, 5 (ix. 21, 29, 43, 48).—6. (Tob. v. 12, 13).—7. An ancestor of Judith (Judith viii. 1).—8. Haniah, i. e. Shadrach (Song of the Three Child. 66; 1 Macc. ii. 59).

ANANIEL (Tob. i. 1).

ANATH (an answer, sc. to prayer). The father of Shamgar (Judges iii. 31, v. 6).

ANATH'EMA. A Greek word signifying set apart, devoted, and hence accursed; being usually so translated in our version (e. g. Rom. ix. 3). It is equivalent to the Hebrew hherem, meaning so consecrated or devoted that it was not to be redeemed, but must belong to the priests, or be sacrificed (Lev. xxvii. 28, 29; Numb. xviii. 14). This word was used in devoting idolaters or the Canaanitish cities to destruction; the extermination being carried out to a greater or less extent (Exod. xxii. 20; Numb. xxi. 2, 3; Josh. vi. 17). The hherem was afterwards one of the three degrees of Jewish excommunication. See EXCOMMUNICATION. There were also three degrees in the Christian church; the admonition (comp. Matt. xviii. 15-17; Tit. iii. 10); suspension from the communion, or the lesser excommunication; and expulsion from the church, called the greater excommunication, anathema, and the like. A full account of these may be seen in Bingham, Orig. Eccles. book xvi. chap. ii. It can hardly be doubted that there was some solemn judicial excommunication practised in the apostolic times, and that St. Paul directs this in the case of the incestuous person (1 Cor. v. 3-5); where the delivering unto Satan (comp. 1 Tim. i. 20) probably indicates some special power possessed by the apostles which has not descended in the church (though other views of it are sometimes taken). But anathema does not seem to have always this judicial meaning. It must be used in a more general sense in such places as 1 Cor. xii. 3, marg.; Gal. i. 8, 9. And thus it may mean only strong dislike and condemnation in 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

ANA'THOTH (answers, sc. to prayers, echoes).—1. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. vii. 8).—2. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 19).

ANA'THOTH (id.). A city of Benjamin allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 60). It was to this place that Abiathar, of the family of Ithamar, was banished (1 Kings ii. 26); and here Jeremiah was born (Jer. i. 1, xi. 21, 23, xxxii. 7, 8, 9). Some of the people of Anathoth returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 23; Neh. vii. 27). It must have been on or near a great road to Jerusalem; for it is mentioned by Isaiah (x. 30) as a place in the onward march of the Assyrians. It has been identified with the modern 'Anata, about four miles north-east of Jerusalem. There are here some ancient remains.

ANCHOR (Acts xxvii. 29, 30). For an account of anchors used in vessels, see SHIP. The Christian hope is symbolized by an anchor (Heb. vi. 19).

ANCIENT OF DAYS. An appellation of the Divine Being, God the Father, to whom the prophet Daniel sees 'the Son of man' brought to receive the investiture of glorious dominion (Dan. vii. 9, 13, 22: comp. Psal. cx. 1, 2).

AN'DREW (manly?). One of the apostles, the brother (whether elder or younger is not known) of Simon Peter, with whom it would seem he lived (Mark i. 29). He was of Bethsaida, and became one of the disciples of John the Baptist, at whose word he followed Jesus, and afterwards brought his brother Simon (John i. 35-44). This was the first introduction of the brothers to Jesus; and it was not till a subsequent period that they were specially called to attend him (Matt. iv. 18-20; Mark i. 16-18), and were at length appointed apostles (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 14). The order in which Andrew is named varies in different places; but generally he stands next after the three chiefs, and is associated with Philip. There are but a few scattered notices of him in the evangelic history (Mark xiii. 3; John vi. 8, 9, xii. 22). After the resurrection he is enumerated with the rest of the eleven (Acts i. 13); and then we hear no more of him. Tradition has been busy with his later history; and he is said to have been crucified at Patræ in Achaia, on a cross formed like the letter X, which has hence been called 'St. Andrew's Cross.' See Winer, Bibl. RWB. art. 'Andreas.'

ANDRONICUS (victorious man?). A Christian at Rome, whom St. Paul salutes and calls his kinsman (Rom. xvi. 7).

crimes he was degraded and executed (2 Macc. iv. 31-38).—2. An officer left by Antiochus at Garizim (v. 23).

A'NEM (two fountains). A Levitical city in Issachar (1 Chron. vi. 73). It is probably the same with En-gannim (Josh. xix. 21, xxi. 29). See EN-GANNIM.

A'NER (a young man, or, perhaps, an exile). One of the three Amorite chiefs confederate with Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13, 24).

A'NER (id.). A Levitical city in the half-tribe of Manasseh west of the Jordan (1 Chron. vi. 70). In Josh. xxi. 25, this city is called Taanach: the two names might be easily confounded in Hebrew.

ANETHO'THITE, ANETO'THITE. A native of Anathoth (2 Sam. xxiii. 27; 1 Chron. xxvii. 12). See ANATHOTH.

ANGEL. The word so translated in both the Old and the New Testaments properly signifies 'messenger.' It is frequently used to designate an ordinary messenger (1 Sam. xl. 3; Job i. 14; Luke vii. 24, ix. 52): it is sometimes applied to a prophet (Hagg. i. 13); sometimes to a priest (Mal. ii. 7); sometimes to a Christian minister (Rev. i. 20). In most of these places, the word found in our version is 'messenger.' The term 'angel,' however, as we ordinarily understand it, implies an order of created beings superior to man, of vast power, knowledge, and dignity. Certain of these are said to have sinned, and are called evil angels (Jude 6). See DEVIL. Others are pure, and are called 'holy' or 'elect angels' (Matt. xxv. 31; 1 Tim. v. 21). Some have chosen to doubt whether there be indeed such an order of intelligences, and whether the passages of scripture which seem to describe them are not examples of Jewish figurative speech; just as the fancy of heathen nations personified powers and qualities, even dedicating temples to imaginary beings, as Fortune, &c. To this it may be replied that, as the Deity has not peopled our world with one class of creatures only, so it is not unreasonable to believe that in his vast dominions there are other orders, of a nature different from ours, but intelligent, and capable of doing Him, their Creator, active service. And there is proof positive of this in scripture. Our Lord, speaking of men's future existence, describes them as like 'the angels of God in heaven' (Matt. xxii. 30). The comparison would be futile, were there not other beings, apart from men, actually in existence. Again, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews argues the earnest heed due to the gospel, from the superiority of Christ over angels (Heb. i. ii.). Angels, then, there must be; or what kind of argument should we have here for our Lord's dignity?

It would seem that among those termed angels there are differences of rank. Indeed the title is occasionally given to One who is their Head and Lord. For, while some, when they appear, speak of their delegated authority (Luke i. 19), and refuse the too great reverence which those they visit would pay them (Rev. xxii. 8, 9), there is also an angel who speaks with paramount authority (Gen. xvi. 7-13, xviii. 16), and demands the most obedient worship (Exod. iii. 2-6, xxiii. 20, 21). This Being is generally called the 'Angel of the Lord,' or 'of Jehovah;' and, as 'no man hath seen the Father' (John vi. 46), we are justified in believing that he was the Second Person of the Trinity, to be afterwards manifested in human flesh. The term 'archangel,' though it has come to mean in ordinary parlance a superior created angel, one of the probably many chieftains of the angelic hosts, is not so used in scripture. It is never there found in the plural number, and never has a personal application except to Michael (1 Thess. iv. 16; Jude 9). Who, then, is Michael? Some have believed him to be the Son of God. Dr. Fairbairn supports this view with great force of argument (Herm. Man., part ii. sec. 2, pp. 208-210). And certainly the way in which Michael is described by Daniel, as 'one' or 'the first of the chief princes,' 'the great prince,' (Dan. x. 13, 21, xii. 1) seems strongly to point to such a conclusion. Yet it is hard to conceive that the divine Son would be spoken of in the way we find in Jude. And, therefore, whether or no he, the Lord of angels, is thus adumbrated in the use of prophetic symbol, it is perhaps more reasonable to conclude that, in the writings of apostles, a created angel is intended; archangel being not necessarily the designation of a separate rank, but simply a title of dignity equivalent to 'mighty angel.' Yet, that there are orders of the created angelic hosts seems well-nigh certain; else, why should the apostle give once and again distinctive names—'thrones' and 'dominions,' 'principalities' and 'powers' (Col. i. 16; comp. Rom. viii. 38; Eph. i. 21)? There is nothing unreasonable in the idea of a celestial hierarchy, aptly suited and harmoniously ranged; just as in a body—true type of Christ's redeemed church—there are many members, each with its peculiar function, yet fitly joined and compacted into one proportioned whole. When Saravia questioned Hooker, shortly before his peaceful death, what were his contemplations, he replied 'that he was meditating the number and nature of angels, and their blessed obedience and order, without which peace could not be in heaven' (Life by Walton). One other name there is, besides Michael, given to an angel. It was Gabriel who instructed Daniel as to the time of Messiah's coming (Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21): it was the same Gabriel who, when the time arrived, announced to Zacharias, and to Mary, their immediate appearance of the forerunner and of the King (Luke i. 19, 26).

Of the nature and personal state of angels it becomes us to speak with diffidence. Scripture is not intended to gratify speculative curiosity. Yet there are some particulars which we may reverently gather. Angels are commonly called 'spirits'; but, when they have appeared to men, they have worn the human form (Judges xiii. 6; Acts i. 10), the form actually assumed by their Lord. There are 'celestial bodies' as well as 'bodies terrestrial,' a 'natural body' and a 'spiritual body' (1 Cor. xv. 40, 44); it may be—we have no right to say with certainty—that to angels belongs some spiritual substance, some refined vehicle, the means and instrument of their actings. Of their multitude we may speak with more confidence; they are expressly said to be of numbers vast (2 Kings vi. 17; Psal. lxxviii. 17; Matt. xxvi. 53; Luke ii. 13). They are powerful also, excelling in strength (Psal. ciii. 20). And they are holy: they do God's will (21; Mark viii. 38): never did corruption touch them. And yet they may have had their trial, even as man had, some period of probation, some test applied, which certain of their fellows could not stand. For, as already noted, there were angels who kept not their first estate (2 Pet. ii. 4). And it may be that, as saved men owe their restoration to the Son of God, unfallen angels may owe their faithful stability to the same high Lord; 'elect' in him, bound to him, not alone for creation, but for preservation too, and thus more fitly said to be gathered into one in him with the redeemed saints of earth (Eph. i. 10; Phil. ii. 10; Col. i. 17, 20). Interested they certainly are in the progress of the church. Much they have learned from it (Eph. iii. 10), and eagerly do they watch its development (1 Pet. i. 12). For they acquire knowledge by degrees: of many things they are ignorant (Matt. xxiv. 36); and it adds to their blessedness, as their enlarging faculties apprehend more and more of the immensity of God; the wonders which they witness of his merciful dealing lighting up new joy in their hearts (Luke xv. 7, 10). They possess, then, a growing intelligence; and it shall grow on for ever. For they do not die (xx. 36); neither can disastrous change affect them: though they stand with humble reverence before their Creator (Isai. vi. 2), yet, most glorious of all privileges, 'they do always behold the face of' their 'Father which is in heaven' (Matt. xviii. 10).

Of the functions of angels much is said. Not only do they praise God, but they perform his work, occupied at his command with various commissions of mercy and of judgment. And, though there are long periods in scripture history during which we do not read of angels being visible, still it does not follow that their operations were suspended. They guarded Elisha in Dothan; and yet his servant, till his eyes were supernaturally opened, saw them not (2 Kings vi. 17). Neither must it be supposed, because angels have been employed, that natural or secondary causes were excluded. A pestilence ravaged David's kingdom, no doubt, according to its ordinary type; yet an angel directed the avenging scourge (2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 17; 1 Chron. xxi. 15-20, 27, 30). By the ministry of angels, punishment has been inflicted on the ungodly (Gen. xix.; 2 Kings xix. 35). But their more happy employment is to tend God's people (Psal. xci. 11, 12; Heb. i. 14). Thus they have delivered men from prison (Acts v. 19, xii. 7-10): they have given wholesome directions (xx. 5-7), and comforted those in danger (xxvii. 23, 24), and conveyed them to their peaceful rest (Luke xvi. 22). But the most wonderful part of their function was when they waited on their Lord. They ministered to him after his temptation in the wilderness (Matt. iv. 11), and strengthened him under his conflict in the garden (Luke xxii. 43). They rolled away the stone from his tomb at his resurrection (Matt. xxviii. 2-4), and attended at his ascension (Acts i. 10, 11). And they shall wait on him when he comes again in judgment, and arrange the order of that great day (Matt. xiii. 39, 41, 42, 49, 50, xxv. 31). If the servants of Solomon, which stood continually before him, were happy (1 Kings x. 8), much, infinitely more are they that are employed about the person of the great King. 'Praise ye him, all his angels: praise ye him, all his hosts!' (Psal. cxlviii. 2).

It has been disputed whether each man has his own particular guardian angel. There was an ancient belief of this (Acts xii. 15); but we can hardly infer it from the general tenor of scripture. It is one of those matters on which we may contentedly be ignorant.

ANGER. An affection sometimes attributed to God (e.g. Isai. v. 25, x. 5; Mark iii. 5), not as though he could be excited as we are, but to show that evil is hateful to him, and just punishment must be inflicted for it. Anger, in men, is an infirmity, and, if not controlled, a sin (Eph. iv. 26); it is reckoned, therefore, among those works of the flesh which are to be put off (Col. iii. 8).

ANGLE (Isai. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15). See FISHING.

AN'AM (sighing of the people). A descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 19).

AN'IM (fountains). A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 50).

ANISE (Matt. xxiii. 23). The marginal rendering is 'dill,' which we may believe to be here meant. This, Anethum graveolens, is an umbelliferous plant, producing a bright brown flower. The seeds have an aromatic flavour and a carminative quality. Both plant and seeds were anciently used as a condiment.

ANKLET. This word does not occur in our version; but we have the thing mentioned (Isai. iii. 18, 20), 'tinkling ornaments about their feet,' 'ornaments of the legs.' In the first case, ankle-bands, anklets properly so called, are meant. These were, and are now, in the east, frequently of value (gold and silver); poorer people having them of iron. In 20, the step-chains are described, that is, as Gesenius says, the short chains which oriental females wore attached to the ankle-band of each foot, so as to compel them to take short and mincing steps.

AN'NA (grace, or prayer). An aged prophetess of the tribe of Asher at the time of our Lord's birth (Luke ii. 36-38).

AN'NA. The wife of Tobit (Tob. i. 9, and elsewhere).

AN'NAAS (1 Esdr. v. 23). Senaah (Ezra ii. 35).

AN'NAS (a contracted form of Ananias, i. e. Hananiah). A high priest of the Jews. He was the son of Seth, and, in the thirty-seventh year after the battle of Actium, i. e. 7 A. D., was appointed to the office by Quirinus, then governor of Syria. But in the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, 14 A. D., he was removed by Valerius Gratus, the procurator of Judea, and was succeeded by Ismael, the son of Phabi. Soon after, Eleazar, the son of Annas, became high priest, and, a year later, Simon, the son of Camithus; and then, in another year, Joseph Caiaphas, Annas' son-in-law, was appointed, about 25 A. D., and held the dignity till 36 or 37. Annas continued to bear the title of high priest; and it is not easy to adjust the particular relation in which he and Caiaphas stood one to the other. Annas is sometimes named before Caiaphas; and it was to him that our Lord was first taken (Luke iii. 2; John xviii. 13, 24; Acts iv. 6). Some have imagined that Annas was Sagan, or deputy, to Caiaphas; others, that Annas was still president of the sanhedrim during the high-priesthood of Caiaphas. But perhaps the respect and power he evidently retained were owing to his age, and to his being father-in-law to the high priest. He lived to advanced years; and five of his sons enjoyed the same pontifical dignity with himself.

ANNU'US (1 Esdr. viii. 48).

ANOINT. Anointing, as an official act, was one part of the solemn consecration of persons to a dignity or charge. Kings were anointed. The practice is first mentioned in Jotham's apologue (Judges ix. 8, 15). The idea, therefore, was familiar before the Hebrews were actually under kingly rule. When monarchy was introduced, we find special notice of the anointings, sometimes private by a prophet, and sometimes repeated, of various kings, as of Saul (1 Sam. x. 1), of David three times (xvi. 13; 2 Sam. ii. 4, v. 3), of Absalom (xix. 10), of Solomon (1 Kings i. 39), of Jehu (2 Kings ix. 3, 6), of Joash (xi. 12); and we may fairly suppose that sovereigns to the end of the monarchy were similarly anointed, as Zedekiah is designated 'the anointed of the Lord' (Lam. iv. 20), and as the custom would seem to have prevailed in other nations. The anointing of Hazael as king of Syria is spoken of (1 Kings xix. 15); and Cyrus is called the Lord's anointed (Isai. xlv. 1). In both these cases, however, the expression may be figurative. The material of this unction appears to have been oil.

Priests also were anointed; that is, certainly the high priest; but it is very doubtful whether this unction was extended to the ordinary priests. It is true that Moses was commanded to anoint Aaron's sons as he anointed their father (Exod. xl. 13, 15); but this may mean only that the sons were to be similarly anointed when any of them succeeded to their father's office. For, in the record of the consecration, the pouring of the anointing oil is described as only upon Aaron's head (Lev. viii. 12), in accordance with the earliest direction given (Exod. xxix. 7); while nothing is said of anointing the heads of his sons, but merely of sprinkling the unguent on their garments (21; Lev. viii. 30). And afterwards the high priest is particularly designated as the one 'on whose head the anointing oil was poured' (xvi. 32, xxi. 10). The material used for this anointing was a preparation specially prescribed (Exod. xxx. 22-33).

It has been assumed that prophets were anointed, but with the faintest shadow of evidence; the only alleged reasons being the charge to Elijah (1 Kings xix. 16), which was, probably, spoken figuratively—for Elijah, so far as we know, did not anoint Elisha, but cast his mantle upon him (19); and the epithet 'anointed' said to be given to 'prophets' (Psal. cv. 15)—where a moment's consideration of the context shows that not prophets, properly so called, are meant, but the patriarchs mentioned just before, to whom the two terms are symbolically applied. Sometimes inanimate things were religiously anointed. Jacob poured oil upon the pillar at Beth-el (Gen. xxviii. 18); and the tabernacle, with all its vessels and appurtenances, and the priests' garments, had the sacred unguent sprinkled on them (Exod. xxx. 26-28; Lev. viii. 10, 11, 30).

Anointing was common in ordinary life (Deut. xxviii. 40; Ruth iii. 2); so that the abstaining from it was a sign of mourning (2 Sam. xiv. 2). Hence to be anointed meant to be prosperous and cheerful (Eccles. ix. 8). It was a mark of respect to a guest (Luke vii. 46; John xii. 3); and it was part of the preparation of a body for the tomb (Mark xlv. 1). Anointing the shield (Isai. xxi. 5) was to supple with oil the hides with which it was covered. Comp. Henderson, Isaiah, note, p. 186.

The anointing of the sick with oil (Mark vi. 13; James v. 14) was symbolical. The practice cannot be taken to authorize the administration in the Romish church of extreme unction. This ancient anointing was not as a preparation for death, but a token of recovery.

The anointing of the kings and priests had a typical reference to that great Anointed One, on whom peculiarly the unction of the Spirit was poured (Isai. lxi. 1), and who was anointed with the oil of gladness above his fellows (Psal. xiv. 7). He was designated as the Priest and King of his church; and in him, and through him, his true followers receive a holy unction (1 John ii. 20), and are made 'kings and priests unto God' (Rev. i. 6). To them, therefore, the expression of Psal. cv. 15 may in a spiritual sense be applied.

A'NOS (1 Esdr. ix. 34).

ANT. A well-known insect (Prov. vi. 6-8, xxx. 25). The observed habits of ants agree exactly with the description here given. They dwell in societies in a kind of republic. They pay the utmost attention to their young. The eggs are cleaned and licked till the worms are hatched, which are tended with the same care to their chrysalis state. And then the pupæ, which greatly resemble grains of wheat or rice, are brought out into the sun, carried again into the nests, heaped up there, so as to secure the proper degree of temperature, and carefully opened just when the transformation into the perfect insect takes place. It was for long supposed that ants gathered corn in summer and stored it for winter use. But this notion would seem unfounded: it probably arose from the resemblance, already mentioned, of the pupæ to grains of corn, and from a mis-interpretation of what Solomon says. He does not utter a word implying that ants store up grain, but simply observes that they, prudently industrious, collect their provisions in proper seasons; a happy illustration to enforce the propriety of availing one's self of the favourable time without delay. Dr. Thomson, however, says that they plunder the farmer, and abstract large quantities of grain (The Land and the Book, p. 337). Ants are for the most part carnivorous; they are fond also of saccharine matter, which they procure from the body of the aphides or plant-lice. See Kitto's Cycl. of Bibl. Lit. art. 'Ant.'

ANTICHRIST. An opposer of Christ; the ruling spirit of error, which is an enemy to the truth of the gospel as it reveals the person and dignity of Christ. St. John in his epistles utters a warning against Antichrist (1 John ii. 18, 22, iv. 3; 2 John 7). And other passages of scripture, such as 2 Thess. ii. 3-10, have been connected with what St. John says, and supposed to point to some evil personal power which should arise in the last days. For an examination of the theories propounded, the reader must be referred to books treating on the interpretation of prophecy.

ANTI-LIB'ANUS (Judith i. 7). See LEBANON.

ANTIOCH.—1. A very celebrated Syrian city called Antioch the Great, and Antioch Epidaphnes, or by Daphne (where were the laurel-grove and sanctuary of Apollo and Diana), in order to distinguish it from other places of the same name. It was founded by Seleucus Nicator 300 B.C., and named by him after his father Antiochus. It was seated, just where Lebanon and Taurus meet, in a plain well-watered and fruitful, on the river Orontes, 120 stadia from the sea. Part of it stood on the left bank, and part on an island in the stream; some portion also on the steep slope of mount Silpius. Antioch soon grew into a splendid town. The Syrian kings embellished it. Pompey made it a free city. Herod contributed to its adornment and convenience; and the Roman emperors added various structures. Many Jews were settled in Antioch. Seleucus had invited them thither; and they had special privileges conceded to them, being governed by their own ethnarch. The inhabitants generally were pleasure-seekers and luxurious, and are said to have been fond of inventing nicknames. Hence probably the designation 'Christians' given to the disciples of Christ (Acts xi. 26). Antioch is, next to Jerusalem, of greatest interest and importance in the apostolic history. Some of its people received the gospel (no doubt while away from home) very shortly after the ascension. For one of the seven was 'Nicolas a proselyte of Antioch' (vi. 5). But, when the disciples were scattered in the persecution after Stephen's death, certain of them came to Antioch, and, after preaching to the Jews alone, 'spake' also 'unto the Grecians,' founding here the first of the Gentile churches. Hither, therefore, when the intelligence reached Jerusalem, Barnabas was sent by the apostles; and he soon sought out Saul, and carried him with him to this new centre of gospel diffusion (xi. 19-26). Thenceforward Antioch stands prominently forth. Hither prophets resorted (27); here the most eminent pastors ministered (xiii. 1); hence was despatched that first missionary expedition, in which Christianity was planted throughout Asia (2-52, xiv.), and from which eventually came the introduction of the gospel into Europe (xv. 36, xvi. 12); here, too, were battles fought for the fundamental principles of the faith (xv. 1, 2; Gal. ii. 11-14). With this city were afterwards connected many most celebrated men, Ignatius, Chrysostom, and others; and Antioch was long one of the great patriarchates of the church, with Jerusalem, Rome, Alexandria, and Constantinople. It is still called Antakia; but war, and pestilence, and earthquake, have done their work; and it is now a mean town, with 10,000 inhabitants, among whom are some Jews and a few Christians. Ruins of its ancient grandeur, however, still subsist.

2. Antioch of Pisidia, originally founded by the Magnetes on the Meander, was re-established and named like the Syrian city by Seleucus Nicator. It was on a ridge of the Taurus: it became a colony under Augustus, and was named also Cæsarea. St. Paul, with Barnabas, visited it on their first missionary journey; and here was delivered, in the synagogue, an address largely reported by St. Luke. The Jews, however, raised a persecution against them; and the apostles were obliged to flee to Iconium (Acts xiii. 14-51, xiv. 19). They passed through Antioch again, on their return journey (xiv. 21-23); and it is very likely, though not expressly noted, that Paul was at this Antioch a third time on his second missionary tour (comp. 2 Tim. iii. 11 with Acts xvi. 1-4). The site of the Pisidian Antioch has been ascertained by Arundell and Hamilton to be at the modern Yalobatch. There are still some ruins visible of the ancient town.

ANTIOCHIA (1 Macc. iv. 35, vi. 63; 2 Macc. iv. 33, v. 21). See ANTIOCH.

ANTIOCH'IANS (2 Macc. iv. 9, 19). Inhabitants of Antioch.

ANTIOCHIS (2 Macc. iv. 30).

ANTIOCHUS (the withstander). A name borne by several persons.

1. Antiochus II. was a king of Syria, surnamed Theos, or 'the God.' He succeeded his father Antiochus I. (Soter) 262 B.C. He carried on a war (inherited from his predecessor) with Ptolemy Philadelphus; but (250 B.C.) peace was made, on condition of Antiochus putting away his wife Laodice and marrying Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy; and the first-born son of this marriage was to be declared heir of the Syrian throne. Berenice did not, however, long retain her place. In about a couple of years after the death of Ptolemy, Antiochus recalled Laodice, who, in jealous fear of dered Syria, and drove Seleucus II., Laodice's son, for a time from his throne; which, however, he recovered; and, after his death, his sons, Seleucus III. and Antiochus III. assembled forces for a fresh attack upon Egypt (Dan. xi. 7-10).

2. Antiochus III., surnamed the Great, succeeded his brother Seleucus III. 224 B.C. He continued the war against Egypt, at first with success, but (217 B.C.) was entirely defeated by Ptolemy at Raphia, near Gaza. Thirteen years afterwards, when Ptolemy was dead, and his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child, had succeeded to his throne, Antiochus, by the help of allies and aided by the factious Jews (Dan. xi. 14), re-occupied Palestine, and, after some fluctuations of fortune, inflicted a decisive defeat upon the Egyptian army at Paneas; and his success was welcomed by the Jews. It was then arranged that Ptolemy should marry Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus, with the dowry of Cœle-syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine. She favoured her husband's interests; and so Antiochus turned his attention to Asia Minor and Greece, where at first he was successful, but was at length routed by the Romans at Magnesia, and obliged to conclude a dishonourable peace. In 1 Macc. viii. 7, it is asserted that he was prisoner to the Romans; but this assertion is corroborated by no other historian. In order to raise the money he was to pay to Rome, Antiochus attacked a temple in Elymais, but perished in the attempt, 187 B.C. He was tolerant and liberal to the Jews; and his career, as briefly sketched, is seen exactly to fulfil the prophecy of Daniel (xi. 14-19).

3. Antiochus IV., surnamed Epiphanes, illustrious, and, in sarcasm, Epimanes, frantic, the second son of Antiochus the Great, obtained the crown of Syria, after the murder of his brother Seleucus Philopator, to the exclusion of Demetrius, the son of Seleucus, 175 B.C. On the first visit he paid to Jerusalem he was honourably received by Jason, who had corruptly been fresh misfortune, poisoned him, 246 B.C. Berenice and her child were also put to death. These events exactly fulfil Dan. xi. 6. Subsequently Ptolemy's son (Euergetes) re-versed the treatment of his sister, plunmade high priest (2 Macc. iv. 22), and who was afterwards as corruptly supplanted by Menelaus. Antiochus made four expeditions against Egypt, in order to secure himself in the possession of Cœle-syria and Phœnicia, which had been the dower of his sister Cleopatra (now dead) to Ptolemy Epiphanes. These expeditions were undertaken 171, 170, 169, 168 B.C. After the second, when he had ravaged a great part of Egypt, and taken Ptolemy Philometor prisoner, he went to Jerusalem, plundered the temple, and massacred numbers of the people, leaving, when he departed, a Phrygian governor there (1 Macc. i. 20-23; 2 Macc. v. 1-23). After his fourth Egyptian expedition, in which he was checked by the Romans, he sent troops to Jerusalem, who committed the most fearful excesses. The worship of God was prohibited, the temple profaned, on the 15th of Cisleu, 'the abomination of desolation,' i. e. an idol-altar, set up on the altar of God, and on the 25th of the month idolatrous sacrifice was offered (1 Macc. i. 29-64; 2 Macc. v. 24-28, vi., vii.). Many Jews apostatized; but there were those who were determined to maintain their faith. Mattathias and his sons resolved to take arms. After the death of Mattathias, his son Judas, surnamed Maccabæus, successfully carried on the campaign till he entered Jerusalem, cleansed and sanctified the temple, and restored the holy service (1 Macc. iii., iv., v.). Antiochus had meanwhile gone into the east. Having unsuccessfully attacked a rich temple in Elymais, he retired to Tabæ in Persia, where he came to his end, and none did help him, not, however, till he had learned the Maccabean successes (vi. 1-16). See Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Antiochus IV.' This history remarkably illustrates Dan. xi. 21-45. Many interpreters of the prophecy, however, regard it, at least the latter part, as reaching far below the age of Epiphanes.

4. Antiochus V., surnamed Eupator (of noble descent), was but a child when he succeeded his father Epiphanes, 163 or 164 B.C., under the guardianship of Lysias, with whom he marched against Jerusalem and gained some advantages over Judas Maccabæus. He concluded a peace, however, in order to oppose his father's friend Philip, who had occupied Antioch. Philip was defeated; but the next year Antiochus and Lysias fell into the hands of Demetrius Soter, who put them to death, 161 B.C. (1 Macc. vi. 14-63, vii. 1-4; 2 Macc. xiii., xiv. 1, 2).

5. Antiochus VI. was the son of Alexander Balas and Cleopatra, and after his father's death he continued some time in Arabia, but while yet a child was produced by Tryphon (called also Diodotus), an officer of his father, as a claimant to the throne of Syria against Demetrius Nicator, 145 B.C. The cause of Antiochus was successful, being supported by Jonathan Maccabæus; but Tryphon, who had used the young king's name for his own purposes, now threw off the mask, put Jonathan to death, then murdered Antiochus, and occupied the throne, 143 B.C. (1 Macc. xi. 39-74, xii. 30-xiii. 32).

6. Antiochus VII., surnamed Sidetes (of Side in Pamphylia), was the second son of Demetrius I. When his brother Demetrius Nicator was taken prisoner by the Parthians, Antiochus married his wife Cleopatra, 140 B.C., and, expelling the usurper Tryphon, gained possession of the kingdom of Syria, 138 B.C. He made a treaty with Simon Maccabæus on liberal terms, but afterwards withdrew his concessions, and, as Simon was not inclined to submit, sent Cendebeus against him. He was routed by Simon's sons; and then Antiochus marched in person into Judea, but granted terms to John Hyrcanus, who subsequently accompanied him in a campaign against the Parthians, in which Antiochus lost his life, about 130 B.C. (1 Macc. xv., xvi. 1-10).

7. The father of a Jewish ambassador (1 Macc. xii. 16, xiv. 22).

ANTIPAS (probably a contracted form of Antipater, for or like the father).—1. See HEROD, 3.—2. A faithful martyr in Pergamos (Rev. ii. 13).

ANTIPATER (1 Macc. xii. 16, xiv. 22).

ANTIPAT'RIS. A town in Palestine built by Herod the Great, on the site of Capharsaba, and named after his father Antipater. It is in a well-watered plain between Jerusalem and Cæsarea, forty-two Roman miles from the first-named, twenty-six from the latter place. There was, however, a nearer road from Jerusalem to Antipatris, by which possibly the soldiers conducted St. Paul (Acts xxiii. 31). It is now a village called Kefr Saba.

ANTO'NIA. A fortress or tower built by Herod, north-west of the temple. See JERUSALEM.

ANTO'THITE. A native of Anathoth (1 Chron. xi. 28, xii. 3). See ANATHOTH.

A'NUB (bound together, confederate). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8).

AP'AME (1 Esdr. iv. 29). A concubine of Darius king of Persia.

APE. An animal mentioned (1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21) as imported by the fleets of Hiram and Solomon. It is impossible to say what particular species of the ape or monkey family is intended; the name may be general, including several varieties. It is observable that in the tomb of Thothmes III., at Thebes, among the presents figured as brought to the king are animals which appear to be baboons or baboon-like apes.

APEL'LES. A Christian whom St. Paul calls 'approved in Christ' (Rom. xvi. 10). Tradition makes him afterwards bishop of Smyrna, or Heraclea. Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Apelles.'

APHAR'SACHITES, APHARSATH'CHITES. The name of certain tribes introduced as colonists into Samaria by the king of Assyria (Ezra iv. 9, v. 6, vi. 6). They have been supposed the same with the Parætaceni in Persia or Media of the Greek geographers.

APHAR'SITES. These were also colonists in Samaria (Ezra iv. 9). They have been believed to be the Parrhasii, a Median tribe; though Gesenius would have them the Persians.

A'PHEK (strength, a water-course).—1. A city whose king was destroyed by Joshua (Josh. xii. 18). Perhaps it may be identical with Aphekah (xv. 53).—2. A place in the north of Palestine (xiii. 4); probably the city assigned to Asher (xix. 30), called Aphik (Judges i. 31). This was, there can be little doubt, the Aphaca celebrated for its temple of Venus, now Aflca, in Lebanon.—3. A place where the Philistines pitched before the battle in which the ark was taken (1 Sam. iv. 1). We cannot be sure whether that mentioned in xxix. 1, is the same. Probably it was.—4. A city in the plain country of Syria, on the road to Damascus (1 Kings xx. 26, 30; 2 Kings xiii. 17). It is now a village called Fik, about six miles east of the sea of Galilee.

APHEKAH (id.). A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 53). See APHEK, 1. APHEREMA. One of the three governments added to Judea from Samaria and Galilee by Demetrius Soter (1 Macc. x. 30, xi. 34).

APHER'RA (1 Esdr. v. 34).

APH'AH (refreshed). An ancestor of King Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1).

A'PHIK (strength, or, perhaps, a torrent, or water-course). A city not subdued by the tribe of Asher (Judges i. 31). See APHEK, 2.

APH'RAH (awn, or probably dust). A place mentioned in Mic. i. 10. It has been supposed identical with Ophrah; but this is uncertain.

APH'SES (dispersion). A head of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 15).

APOC'ALYPSE. See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

APOCRYPHA. The name given generally to certain ancient books and parts of books often appended to the scriptures of the Old Testament; some of which are held by some divisions of the Christian church to be of canonical and divine authority.

The following extract from the sixth article of the English church will show both the names of these books and the point of view in which they are regarded by the church of England. After enumerating the canonical writings of the Old Testament, the article proceeds: 'And the other books (as Hierome saith), the church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet it doth not apply them to establish any doctrine [In Libr. Sal. Præf., tom. i. cols. 939, 940. Op. Par. 1693-1706]: such are these following:—

- The third book of Esdras } [Esdras
- The fourth book of Esdras } 1 & 2].
- The book of Tobias [Tobit].
- The book of Judith.
- The Rest of the book of Esther.
- The book of Wisdom.
- Jesus the son of Sirach [Ecclesiasticus].
- Baruch the Prophet.
- The Song of the Three Children.
- The story of Susanna.
- Of Bel and the Dragon.
- The Prayer of Manasses.
- The first book of Maccabees.
- The second book of Maccabees.

There are also some apocryphal writings claiming a place among the books of the New Testament; but, as these have never been recognized in the Christian church, they require no notice here.

The word apocrypha signifies generally 'secret' or 'hidden,' but it came by degrees to have a bad sense, and to mean 'spurious' or 'forged.' Various reasons have been alleged for the use of the term. Dismissing others as untenable, we may fairly suppose that books were denominated 'apocryphal' either because they were not read in public, being kept, as it were, in the background, or else because they were regarded as containing mysterious doctrines which were to be withheld from the multitude, and to be communicated only to those of understanding, to the initiated. Some there were of mythical character beyond any in the collection now known as 'Apocrypha:' to these such a designation would still more fitly apply. And, as several such books claimed to be the productions of illustrious men, prophets, and inspired, whose names, it was soon evident, were falsely assumed, both the propriety of the term is obvious, and the natural consequent devaluation of its meaning readily accounted for. The last-named reason, therefore, for the application of the word 'Apocrypha' would seem the more probable one.

Though the apocryphal books had not the high sanction of the canonical scriptures, and never formed a part of the Jewish canon, they yet were treated with respect by early Christian writers. They were cited, sometimes indeed as scripture was cited, and they received generally the name of 'ecclesiastical,' 'uncanonical,' or 'not fully received,' rather than that of 'apocryphal,' a term more specially given to writings of an inferior cast. It was as the light of the reformation began to dawn that the question stood out more definite and distinct. The imperfect authority of these works was more fully exposed; while the church of Rome, on the other hand, gave them that formal sanction which they had never before received, pronouncing all but the two books of Esdras, and the Prayer of Manasseh, sacred canonical scripture, and anathematizing those who should not so receive them (Concil. Trid. Sess. iv. Decret. de Canon. Script.). In the Romish canon, therefore, Tobit and Judith have their place with the historical books of scripture, Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus with the writings of Solomon; the Rest of Esther is made a part of the genuine book of that name; the story of the Three Children, Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon, are united to the canonical Daniel; and Baruch immediately follows Jeremiah. Whereas, in protestant bibles, in which these books find a place, they are relegated into a separate group, as peculiarly 'the Apocrypha,' and appended at the conclusion of the Old Testament.

Some reasons, gathered from their internal character and form, shall now be given, which force us to conclude that the Apocrypha is not inspired scripture. Proof that these writings have not had the sanction of the church, Jewish and early Christian, to rank with the canonical books, will be offered hereafter: see CANON OF SCRIPTURE; and notices of each portion separately will be found under their respective titles.

There are particular characteristics which more or less distinguish one of these compositions from another. But the following remarks will apply with considerable force to the whole of them.

They are not extant in Hebrew. And, though it has been conjectured on probable grounds that some were composed in Hebrew, or were based upon some Hebrew fragments, yet of a large proportion the original language, so far as it can be ascertained, was Greek; and there is the significant fact on all hands admitted that the biblical Hebrew terminates with the last canonical writer.

The prophetic spirit seems to have departed. In the canonical scriptures, contemporary and running along with the historical records, there was the chain of prophets, men who announced authoritatively the message of the Lord of Hosts, in the days of Israelitish independence, during the captivity, and after the return. And the latest in time, as the last in position, is that solemn strain which seems to close the sacred utterances with the warning that not again, till the day of Messiah was at hand, should the heavenly voice sound forth, and God's word be heard once more by men. The apocryphal writers, allowedly posterior in time, nowhere take up the fallen cadence. The prophetic tone is not even assumed. There is no burning word from the Lord in them, making itself heard above the voices of men, and foretelling things to come. Evidently none of them has re-kindled the lamp of the sanctuary.

There is a feeble and apologetic tone in these books. They do not teach with authority. The simple grandeur of even the scripture narrative is wanting. So far from claiming inspiration, they sometimes bewail the want of it, and make excuse for the imperfection of their own writings (Ecclus. Prologue 2; 1 Macc. iv. 46, ix. 27, xiv. 41; 2 Macc. ii. 23-32, xv. 38).

There is, further, an evident purpose, before alluded to, to father these productions on ancient distinguished men. Leaving the books of Esdras out of the question, which, as already noted, even the church of Rome gives up, we find pieces attributed to Solomon, to Jeremiah, to Daniel, to Baruch, when it is positively certain that they could not be the works of those writers.

There is the introduction of fictitious speeches, doubtful letters, and a romancing air in what seems intended to be a historical narrative. Even if the stories of Tobit, Judith, Bel and the Dragon, &c. could be made to fit in with known facts, there are yet unbecoming embellishments, mythological notions, careless inaccuracies, which betray not merely a lack of inspiration, but a lack of truth. See Tob. vi. 7, 14, viii. 2, 3; Rest of Esth. xvi. 10, 14; 2 Macc. i., &c. &c.

We may go farther. There are inexplicable contradictions, and demonstrable falsehoods, in many parts of the Apocrypha. Thus Nabuchodonosor and Balthazar, i.e. Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, are represented (Bar. i. 3, 9-12) as both alive at the time when Jerusalem was taken; which, if we are to adopt the view that Belshazzar is the Bil-shar-uzur of Sir. H. Rawlinson's discovery, is impossible. Also it is declared that no prophet was living at the time of the Babylonish captivity (Song of the Three Children 15). Two different and contradictory accounts, moreover, are given of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. vi. 1-16; 2 Macc. ix.). And a statement is made (1 Macc. viii. 16) that the Romans had but a single yearly magistrate. Many other such examples might be produced.

Doctrines, again, alien from those in scripture are inculcated; as the efficacy of prayers for the dead (2 Macc. xii. 43-45), and of prayers offered by the dead (Bar. iii. 4); a transmigration of souls (Wisd. viii. 20). There are also many assertions not in harmony with the doctrine of justification by faith (Tob. xii. 8, 9; Ecclus. iii. 3, 30, xvii. 22, xxxv. 3). Further, an act of suicide is mentioned in terms of strong commendation (2 Macc. xiv. 41-46).

It is, moreover, a significant fact that neither our Lord nor his disciples quoted the apocryphal books as they did those of the canonical scriptures. The most formal quotation, indeed, would have given them no authority; since even heathen writers were sometimes cited by apostles (Acts xvii. 28). It must not be concealed that some continental critics have of late diligently examined the Apocrypha, and have maintained that there are numerous allusions in the apostolic writings, and reminiscences, evidencing a familiarity with the Apocrypha. We may well admit this. It is reasonable to suppose that the Jews in our Lord's time were, many of them, well acquainted with so important a part of their national literature as the apocryphal compositions. But, if we grant, as demanded, that the New Testament writers showed their familiarity with them by reminiscences and allusions, the argument is materially strengthened against their canonical authority. For we can hardly believe that, with these books in their minds, the apostles would never once have cited them as the Lord's word, as sacred scripture, if they had really been the word of God, the scripture of truth. How is it that a sentence, a clause, is never introduced into the New Testament with the decisive, 'It is written'?

It is conceived that considerations like these tell very powerfully against any claim that can be advanced for including the Apocrypha among the canonical scriptures. But, in repudiating such a claim, there is no intention of unduly depreciating these books. They are very valuable as exhibiting the current of Jewish thought in the interval between the cessation of Old Testament prophecy and the advent of Messiah. They contain, several of them, many noble thoughts, and admirable maxims and precepts. They furnish a large contribution to an interesting period of Jewish history. Take them for what they really are, without requiring undue estimation for them, place them with other human writings, to be examined and sifted by the sacred record, without exalting them to an equality with that word, as a co-ordinate judge, and we may well thank God for them, and may gather from their treasury many goodly pearls. But we must beware of introducing any meaner material into the pure edifice of divine truth; lest, like the builders who daubed their wall with untempered mortar, we find the ill-assorted structure speedily broken down, and brought dislocated and shattered to the ground (Ezek. xiii. 10-15).

APOLLO'NIA (belonging to Apollo). This name was borne by various towns in Europe and Asia, as being dedicated to Apollo. That mentioned in Acts xvii. 1, was in Macedonia in the district of Mygdonia, between Amphipolis and Thessalonica, thirty Roman miles from the first-named, thirty-six from the other city. It was a colony of the Corinthians and Corycreans.

APOLLO'NIUS.—1. An officer of Antiochus Epiphanes, slain by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. iii. 10-12; 2 Macc. v. 24-26). He is thought to be the same as the chief collector of tribute (1 Macc. i. 29).—2. A governor of Cœle-syria, made general of Demetrius Nicator (x. 69-79).—3. The son of Thraseas, governor of Cœle-syria and Phenice under Seleucus III. (2 Macc. iii. 5-7, iv. 4).—4. The son of Menestheus, sent by Antiochus Epiphanes to the coronation of Ptolemy Philometor (21); he is probably identical with No. 1.—5. The son of Geneus, a lieutenant of Antiochus V. (xii. 2).

APOLLOPH'ANES (2 Macc. x. 37).

APOLLOS. A Jew of Alexandria, described as eloquent or learned and well acquainted with the scripture, who knowing only the baptism of John Baptist preached earnestly in the synagogues. He fell in at Ephesus with Priscilla and Aquila, and was more thoroughly instructed by them. He thenceforward became an efficient minister of the gospel (Acts xviii. 24-28). Having gone to Corinth he watered what Paul had planted; and many of the unsettled Corinthians were inclined to attach themselves to him as if he had been a mere party-leader (xix. 1; 1 Cor. i. 12, iii. 4-6, 22). It was probably on this account that he did not wish, though Paul requested him, to return to Corinth (xvi. 12), a sufficient refutation, one would think, of the strange notion entertained by some that the 'wisdom' which St. Paul censures was the doctrine of Apollos. He is mentioned once again (Tit. iii. 13), evincing the continued confidence the apostle had in him. Nothing more is certainly known of Apollos: according to tradition he was bishop of Cæsarea.

APOLL'YON (destroyer). The Greek name of 'the angel of the bottomless pit' (Rev. ix. 11). See ABADDON.

APOSTLE. The official designation, implying messenger, of the twelve disciples whom our Lord chose, 'that they should be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach.' These twelve were arranged in three groups, Simon Peter and his brother Andrew, with James and John, the two sons of Zebedee; then Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, and Matthew; and, lastly, James, the son of Alpheus, Lebbeus (called Thaddeus, Judas, and Jude), Simon Zelotes or the Canaanite, and Judas Iscariot (Matt. x. 1-4; Mark iii. 13-19; Luke vi. 12-16; comp. Acts i. 13). It is remarkable that the order of names in these groups varies in the different lists. Dr. Alford (Note on Matt. x. 2) draws out an illustrative scheme, which will be found in the next page.

Of the evangelists, while Matthew narrates the sending forth of the apostles to preach, Mark and Luke describe the choice of them; and this choice, it appears, was made upon a mountain, not improbably that well-known horned hill of Hattin where also the notable sermon on the mount was delivered (Ellicott, Hist. Lect. pp. 177, 178; Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, pp. 368, 369, 4th ed.). Some time after their appointment the apostles were sent forth to preach and perform miracles, a special charge being given them (Matt. x. 1, 5-42; Mark vi. 7-13; Luke ix. 1-6). They generally, however, accompanied their Master, witnessed his mighty works, heard the explanation of his parables, and were the selected company at the institution of the commemorative supper or eucharist. One, however, Judas, betrayed him; and when he was seized they all forsook him (Matt. xxvi. 47-56). One or two plucked up courage to attend his examination (John xviii. 15, 16), and one was present at his execution (xix. 26). But, so far as appears, they took no part in the Lord's burial, and could hardly be persuaded that he was risen. After his resurrection, the eleven, the traitor being no more, had frequent interviews with him, and witnessed his ascension (Luke xxiv. 50, 51). According to their Master's command, they continued at Jerusalem, waiting for the promised effusion of the Holy Ghost. But one other must be appointed to fill the place of Judas; and it was a necessary qualification that he must have been of the company that had from the early beginning of his ministry continuously attended the Lord. Two were nominated; and, a solemn appeal being made to God by lot, Matthias was chosen (Acts i. 15-26). After the day of Pentecost the apostles were different men. No longer fearful and temporizing, they preached boldly in the name of Jesus. They took the lead, as the acknowledged heads of the movement (v. 12, 13), specially devoted themselves to ministerial labour (vi. 2-4), exercised peculiar powers (viii. 14-18), and had primary authority in the church (ix. 27, xv. 2; 1 Cor. ix. 1, xii. 28; 2 Cor. x. 8, xii. 12; Gal. i. 17, ii. 8, 9). Two centres and two departments of apostolic working are described in the Acts of the Apostles, from Jerusalem among the Jews by Peter, from Antioch by Paul among the Gentiles. For Paul was extraordinarily appointed to the apostleship by Christ (i. 1); and others seem to have been added, as Barnabas (Acts xiv. 14); and according to the belief of some writers many more (see Bp. Jer. Taylor, Episcopacy Asserted, § 4, pp. 15-20, ed. 1647).

Scripture says little of the personal history of most of the apostles; but what is known of each will be found under their respective names. The title is once given to our Lord (Heb. iii. 1).

APOTHECARY (Exod. xxx. 25, 35, xxxvii. 29; Neh. iii. 8; Eccles. x. 1). The original word means rather a perfumer, a maker of unguents.

APPA'IM (the nostrils). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 30, 31).

APPEAL (Acts xxv. 11, 12, 21, 25, xxvii. 32, xxviii. 19). In the Hebrew commonwealth there seems originally to have been no power of appeal; for Moses, the highest authority, personally judged all the causes and questions which were brought to him (Exod. xviii. 13). But, at Jethro's suggestion, he established inferior courts, reserving the harder cases (and therefore sanctioning the principle of appeal) to himself (14-26; Deut. i. 17). And this principle was afterwards further carried out (xvii. 8-13). We find traces of appeal in the Israelitish history (Judges iv. 5; 2 Sam. xv. 2; 2 Chron. xix. 5-11; Ezra vii. 25); and, when the sanhedrim was instituted the final appeal lay to them; the previous regular stages of procedure being described by Jewish writers. Among the Romans appeal might be made from a magistrate to the people: under the emperors this was naturally to them. No sentence had been given against St. Paul; and therefore his appeal properly was not from an inferior verdict to that of the highest authority; but, as he had a right to be tried either by the local court, which Festus proposed to him (Acts xxv. 9), or by the emperor, he by his appeal withdrew the decision from the inferior tribunal, and claimed the judgment of the highest, the emperor himself.

AP'PHIA. A Christian lady addressed by St. Paul with Philemon (Philem. 2); very probably she was Philemon's wife.

AP'PHUS. A surname of Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Macc. ii. 5).

AP'PII FOR'UM (forum, or market-place of Appius). A well-known station on the Appian road, which led from Rome to Capua. It doubtless derived its name from Appius Claudius, who constructed the road. It was about 43 Roman miles from the great city; and its site is marked by some ruins near Trepont. A body of Christians from Rome met St. Paul at this place (Acts xxviii. 15).

APPLE, APPLE-TREE. A fruit and tree repeatedly mentioned in scripture (Prov. xxv. 11; Sol. Song ii. 3, 5, vii. 8, viii. 5; Joel i. 12). The apple is said to be little known in Palestine; and accordingly the quince, Pyrus cydonia, or preferably the citron, Citrus medica, has each been suggested as the tree intended. Evidently a fruit of rich colour and fragrant odour must be that in question. But Dr. Thomson declares strongly in favour of the ordinary apple. He says he has seen it flourishing near Askelon; adding that citrons are hard and indigestible, and the tree on which they grow so small and slender, that no one would ever think of sitting 'under its shadow;' whereas, 'as to the smell and colour, all the demands of the biblical allusions are fully met by these apples of Askelon; and no doubt, in ancient times and in royal gardens, their cultivation was far superior to what it is now, and the fruit larger and more fragrant' (The Land and the Book, pp. 545, 546). But a writer in the Quart. Review, July, 1863, p. 69, produces Dr. Hooker's authority for believing these so-called apples to be quinces.

AQUILA (eagle). A Jew of Pontus, who, with his wife Priscilla, left Rome in consequence of the decree of Claudius banishing the Jews, 50 or 51 A.D. He repaired to Corinth, where St. Paul found him (whether at that time a Christian or not is doubtful). And, as they were of the same craft, tent-makers, the apostle and Aquila worked together (Acts xviii. 2, 3). Subsequently Aquila and Priscilla accompanied Paul to Ephesus, and, being left there, they, when Apollos came, instructed him more thoroughly in the truth of the gospel (18, 19, 26). Aquila was at Ephesus when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written (1 Cor. xvi. 19): at a later period he had returned to Rome (Rom. xvi. 3-5); and, still later he was again at Ephesus (2 Tim. iv. 19). Nothing further is certainly known of these persons: tradition says they were beheaded.

AR (city). The principal city of Moab, not far from the frontier, about ten miles to the south of the river Arnon (Numb. xxi. 15, 28; Isai. xv. 1). It was also known as Rabbath Moab and Areopolis; and the ruins are still called Rabba. It is sometimes taken for the land of Moab generally (Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29); and it can hardly be doubted that it was to this city Balaam was brought (Numb. xxii. 36).

A'RA (lion). A chief of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 38).

A'RAB (ambush). A place in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 52).

ARA'BAH (a sterile region). A name mentioned in our translation in but one place (Josh. xviii. 19); but the word occurs repeatedly in the original, and is usually translated 'plain'; also 'wilderness,' or 'desert.' Sometimes it is used generally (Isai. xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 1); but more frequently, having the article prefixed, it denotes one particular district, and that is the sunken plain or ravine which stretched from the foot of Anti-libanus down to the eastern gulf of the Red sea, a length of not less than 250 miles. The whole of this tract was understood by the Israelites as comprised in the Arabah; but, as there is a break, a wall of cliffs crossing it about 10 miles south of the Dead sea, the modern Arabs call the part from the most northerly point to these cliffs the Ghor, while the southern portion is denominated Wady el-Arabah. The Ghor runs nearly due north and south; the Arabah north-east to south-west. Through the deep cleft of the Ghor the Jordan flows; and the 'plains' of Moab or of Jericho denote portions of the hot valley on the east or west of the Jordan (Numb. xxii. 1; Josh. iv. 13). The Wady el-Arabah is from 4 to 15 or 16 miles in breadth, shut in on both sides by chains of rugged mountains, those to the west 1200 to 1500 feet in height, the Tib, being most dreary and desolate, the eastern chain higher, 2000 to 2300 feet, and mount Hor rising to 5000, but cultivated and fertile. Wadies on each side from time to time penetrate the mountain walls. The surface of the Arabah is a frightful desert, with scarce any vegetation, and the heat often unbearable. But through this region it was that the Israelites passed; it possesses, therefore, a peculiar interest for the student of scripture (comp. Jer. ii. 6). It used to be a favourite theory that the Jordan originally drained into the Red sea; this it is now seen is impossible, the Red sea being on a level with the Mediterranean, while the Jordan and the Dead sea are far below that level; so that the northern portions of the Arabah drain to the Dead sea.

Much light is thrown upon various passages of scripture by the right understanding of what the Arabah or 'plain' really is: see Josh. viii. 14; 2 Sam. ii. 29; 2 Kings xxv. 4. Dr. Stanley has appended to his Sinai and Palestine, app. pp. 487, 488, a very useful table, exhibiting the different places in which Arabah occurs in the original, with the mode in which it is rendered in our version. This is for the most part 'plain,' or 'plains,' if the word be plural, except Deut. xi. 30, 'champaign,' and Ezek. xvii. 8, 'desert.' In the poetical books, according to this table, it occurs either with or without the article in the general sense of desert.

ARABATTINE (1 Macc. v. 3). A place in Idumea.

ARA'BIA (arid, sterile). A large country of Western Asia, more extensive as we understand it than the district so called in both the Old and New Testaments. The Hebrew name 'Arab,' most likely signifying (as noted above) 'sterile,' was applied to nearly the same territory as that called Kedem, 'the east' (Gen. x. 30, xxv. 6, xxix. 1), lying to the east of Palestine, but north of the Arabian peninsula. The appellation obtained gradually a wider scope.

Arabia was distributed by the Greek geographers into Arabia Felix, or the Happy, Petraea, or the Stony, and Deserta, or the Desert. But another nomenclature has been recently adopted: Arabia Proper, or the great peninsula as far as the northern wastes; Northern Arabia, or the vast Arabian desert, bounded by the peninsula, the Euphrates, Syria, and the desert of Petra; Western Arabia, comprising the peninsula of Sinai, and the desert of Petra, bounded by the Red sea, Egypt, Palestine, and Northern Arabia.

Arabia Proper consists, for the most part, of high table-land, declining towards the north. But along the whole extent of coast from the gulf of Akabah, or Elanitic gulf, to the head of the Persian gulf, the shores are low and flat. Nearly parallel, however, to the Red sea, is a chain of mountains. The districts of this great territory are variously numbered and limited. Generally they are said to be five: of which the Hedjaz is the most sacred, containing the holy cities of Mecca and Medina, and the Yemen the most fertile. It is the frankincense and spice country, with various mineral and metallic products. It yields most of the cereals; and even the more desert parts afford pasturage after the rains. Palms, vines, fig-trees, &c., are found here: the breeds of horses and camels are famous; and different kinds of domestic and wild animals abound. The Arabian tribes seem to have been mainly the descendants of Joktan, of the family of Shem (Gen. x. 25-29), identified according to their own traditions with Kahtan, whom they call the father of all the pure Arabians of Yemen; his grandson Saba giving birth to the founders of different noble tribes. Ishmael is said to have married one of Kahtan's descendants. But, besides the Shemitic race, an old Cushite people appear to have had settlements in the Arabian peninsula; and there are inscriptions yet remaining in the ancient cities and on buildings of the south which are thought to corroborate this.

Northern Arabia, the position of which has been indicated above, is a vast wilderness, divided into the deserts of Syria, of Arabia (or, more accurately, of Mesopotamia), and of Irak. It appears to be a high and hilly tract, the abode of serpents and wild beasts, burnt up by a cloudless sun. The vegetation is scanty; and the wells in the few oases are brackish and unpalatable. The heat is sometimes mitigated by colder nights, and by violent winds: these winds, however, carry along clouds of sand; and the terrible simoom occurs from June to September. Here, too, the phenomenon of the mirage especially mocks the wayfarer with that apparent water, which, when he reaches it, proves but glowing sand. This desert is traversed by wandering predatory tribes, descendants of Ishmael and of Abraham's sons by Keturah. Their camels find sustenance in the prickly shrubs which the soil produces; and after the rains there is pasture enough in the bottoms for flocks and herds. The Bedouins who range the Arabian desert often extend themselves beyond it, and are ready to plunder the neighbouring countries whenever occasion serves. We read of their incursions in scripture (2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17; Jer. iii. 2); sometimes, however, we find them subjected, and bringing tribute to Jerusalem (2 Chron. xvii. 11). And some trade seems to have passed through their hands, the productions, probably, of southern Arabia being transmitted by way of their country (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 28; Ezek. xxvii. 20-24).

Western Arabia, comprehending, as before said, the peninsula of Sinai, is traversed by chains of mountains, running for the most part from north to south, penetrated by defiles and valleys. Much of it is desert, and destitute of vegetation; but there are fertile districts and well-watered wadies. Serpents and lizards abound: quadrupeds are not numerous; but there are foxes, hyenas, and wild-goats on the lofty mountains. Palm-trees, acacias, &c., grow here. The climate in the sandy valleys between the walls of rock is in the summer very sultry; it is, however, considered healthy, though the average length of life of the inhabitants is not great. The dews are heavy on the sea-coasts. The original inhabitants of this part of Arabia were the Horites, or Horim of mount Seir; who were dispossessed by the children of Esau (Gen. xiv. 6; Deut. ii. 12, 22). So that afterwards it was peopled by the Edomites and Ishmaelites, the families having intermarried (Gen. xxviii. 9, xxxvi. 3). Hence the country was known as the land of the Edomites or Idumeans; and here were the settlements of the Nabathæans, generally supposed to be descendants of Ishmael's son, NEBAIOTH, which see. Petra was the chief city of the country, a flourishing place, through which the caravan traffic passed from the interior to the Eranitic gulf of the Red sea. See Winer, Bibl. RWB. art. 'Arabia.'

The origin generally of the Arabian tribes has been pointed out in the preceding sketch: the settlements of different families in various parts of Arabia, according to the scripture distribution, are noticed under the names of their respective founders. See, also, EARTH. It may be added that some peoples not properly Arabian have occupied some parts of the extensive Arabian districts. Such were the Edomites already named; such also were the Amalekites, whose seat was in Western Arabia. Between the pure Arabs and the clans which have been naturalized amongst them a distinction has always been made. But for more precise information as to the division of races, and the provinces or kingdoms into which Arabia has been distributed, other works must be consulted: it would obviously be out of place here; and, besides, much uncertainty exists in regard to several particulars.

Arabian manners and customs tend to illustrate those we find mentioned in the scripture. It must be remembered that there are two classes of Arabs—the wandering tribes, and others of more settled habits, dwellers in towns. It must be remembered, also, that by the mixture of nations the ancient special types have been largely modified, and that Mohammed confessedly borrowed Jewish observances. Still, to adopt the language of a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 97 (to whom this article is much indebted), 'no one can mix with this people without being constantly and forcibly reminded either of the early patriarchs or of the settled Israelites. We may instance their pastoral life, their hospitality (that most remarkable of desert virtues), their universal respect for age (comp. Lev. xix. 32), their familiar deference (comp. 2 Kings v. 13), their superstitious regard for the beard. On the signet-ring, which is worn on the little finger of the right hand, is usually inscribed a sentence expressive of submission to God, or of his perfection, &c., explaining Exod. xxxix. 30, "the engraving of a signet, Holiness to the Lord," and the saying of our Lord (John iii. 33), "He . . . hath set to his seal that God is true." As a mark of trust, this ring is given to another person (as in Gen. xli. 42). The ink-horn worn in the girdle is also very ancient (Ezek. ix. 2, 3, 11), as well as the veil. A man has a right to claim his cousin in marriage, and he relinquishes this right by taking off his shoe.

as the kinsman of Ruth did to Boaz (Ruth iv. 7, 8).'

Of Arabian history, it must suffice to say, this people were not subjected by the great monarchies which rose and fell in their neighbourhood. They were the independent confederates of the Persians; and it was not till 107 A.D. that Arabia Petræa yielded to the Roman power. Before the time of Mohammed the Arabians had never been united into one common mass. He formed them into a nation by giving them a common faith. Their early religion is supposed to have been fetishism, stone-worship, tree-worship, &c. They adored, also, the heavenly bodies (Job xxxi. 26-28). After the Christian era, the gospel made progress in Arabia: Judaism, too, was propagated; and the corruptions of both paved the way for the success of Mohammed. He founded a caliphate, which, in a single century, embraced Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, Egypt, Barbary, Persia, and Khorasan, and subsequently had a much wider extension. The caliphs of the Ommiade family ruled at Damascus from 670 to 750 A.D.: the Abbassides from 750 to 1258 at Baghdad, founded 762. Arabia was but a province of this vast empire; and after the removal of the seat of government to Baghdad it soon was divided again into petty states.

The Arabic language is the richest and most developed of all the Shemitic or Semitic tongues. Originally confined within the limits of Arabia, it has with the spread of Islamism largely extended itself through Asia and Africa. There were, unquestionably, many dialects of it. Thus, the Himsyitic in Yemen was simpler than that of central Arabia, and more nearly allied to the Hebrew. The Koreishite was the dialect of Mecca: it prevailed through north-western Arabia till it became emphatically the Arabic language, in which all Arabic literature is found. It flourished till the 14th or 15th century, when it degenerated into the yet-spoken vulgar Arabic, which is more simple, but corrupted with many foreign and especially Turkish words.

ARABIANS. Dwellers in Arabia (2 Chron. xvii. 11, xxi. 16, xxii. 1, xxvi. 7; Neh. ii. 19, vi. 1; Isai. xlii. 20; Jer. iii. 2; Acts ii. 11).

ARAD (wild ass). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 15).

ARAD (id.). A Canaanitish southern city, but to the north of the wilderness of Judah (Judges i. 16). Its king attacked the Israelites, and was destroyed (Numb. xxi. 1, xxxiii. 40); where the Hebrew text should be rendered 'The Canaanite king of Arad:' see Josh. xii. 14. Its site has been identified with the hill Tell 'Arad, eight hours south from Hebron.

ARADUS (1 Macc. xv. 23). Perhaps ARVAD, which see.

ARAH (wandering).—1. A chief of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 39).—2. A man whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 5; Neh. vii. 10).—3. One whose grand-daughter Tobiah had married (vi. 18); possibly the same with No. 2.

ARAM (high region).—1. A name among the sons of Shem (Gen. x. 22, 23; 1 Chron. i. 17).—2. A grandson of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 21).—3. A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 34).—4. A descendant of Judah (Matt. i. 3, 4; Luke iii. 33), called in the Old Testament RAM, which see.

A'RAM (id.). The name of the country which is ordinarily in our version rendered Syria. It stretched to the north-east of Palestine on to and beyond the Euphrates. For, though some make that river the boundary, yet it is clear (2 Sam. x. 16) that there were Syrian or Aramean tribes beyond the Euphrates. When first the name occurs (Gen. xxiv. 10) it is as Aram Naharaim, 'Aram of the two rivers' (Mesopotamia in our version) the highland region between the Euphrates and the Tigris, to the north of Babylonia. But see MESOPOTAMIA. Aram is frequently used alone for the land, or the people (Numb. xxxiii. 7). But sometimes we have Padan-Aram, the plain or cultivated district of Aram, usually believed to be the region below mount Masius, between the Khabour and the Euphrates (Gen. xxv. 20); though it must be admitted that some have arrived at a different conclusion. There were many small kingdoms, too, comprised in the country of Aram, distinguished each of them by some special name, as Aram Zobah (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 3, x. 6, 8); Aram Rehob, or Beth-rehob (6, 8); Aram Maachah (6, 8; 1 Chron. xix. 6); Geshur in Aram (2 Sam. xv. 8; comp. 1 Chron. ii. 23); Aram Damascus (2 Sam. viii. 5, 6); all these smaller states being Aram, or Syria generally; just as, in our own times, a number of inferior kingdoms, and petty principalities, form in the aggregate Germany. Damascus was by far the most powerful of them; and its influence gradually extended, till by Aram or Syria there came to be understood that monarchy of which Damascus was the capital (1 Kings xx. 1; Isai. vii. 1, 2). This great country was peopled by the descendants of Shem, and possibly some one of the smaller tribes might be the posterity of Nahor's grandson.

A'RAM-NAHARA'IM (Judges iii. 8, marg.; Psal. ix. title). See ARAM.

A'RAM-ZO'BAH (Psal. ix. title). See ARAM, ZOBAB.

ARAMITTESS. The concubine of Manasseh (as it would seem) is called an Aramitess in our version (1 Chron. vii. 14): the original word is generally rendered 'Syrian.'

A'ARAN (wild goat). A descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 28; 1 Chron. i. 42).

ARAN'IAH (2 Sam. xxiv. 18, marg.) See ARAUNAH.

AR'ARAT (holy land). The name of the mountains on which the ark rested after the flood (Gen. viii. 4). The same word occurs elsewhere (2 Kings ix. 37; Isai. xxxvii. 38; Jer. li. 27), but in the first two of these places it is rendered in our version ARMENIA, which see. The term would seem to mean the highlands of Armenia, an elevated plain rising 3,000 or 4,000, or more, feet above the level of the sea, looking down upon the low country through which the Araxes flows on the north, and the wide expanse of Mesopotamia on the south. This region may well be conceived the cradle of the human race. The vegetation is abundant of the kind best suited for pastoral and nomad tribes. The communications are easy with surrounding more inviting districts. And it appears that tradition has always pointed to this country as first occupied by Noah and his immediate descendants. The mountain which we call Ararat is denominated by the natives Massis, by the Turks Agri-dagh, and by the Persians Kuh-i-Nuh, i.e. Noah's mountain.

'Whether you view it distant or near,' says Kitto, 'the whole of its noble proportions, from the level of the plain to the summit, covered with snow even in the height of summer, are taken in at one view. It is, in fact, the culminating point, the gigantic cornerstone, of the ranges of mountains which bound the three great empires of Russia, Turkey, and Persia. Never had nations a more noble boundary; nor is there, perhaps, another object on earth, which, from its mere natural aspect, would seem so worthy to be regarded as a monument of the greatest event in the world's history—the bridge between the ante-diluvian and the post-diluvian world. "Nothing," as Mr. Morier well remarks, "can be more beautiful than its shape, more awful than its height: all the surrounding mountains sink into insignificance when compared with it: it is perfect in all its parts; no hard rugged features, no unnatural prominences, everything is in harmony, and all combines to render it one of the sublimest objects in nature." The valley from which it rises is that of the river Aras, the ancient Araxes. The rise of the mountain from its broad base is gradual, till it reaches the region of perpetual snow, which is somewhat more than one-third below the summit, when its shape becomes more conical and steep. The cone is surmounted with a crown of ice, which glitters in the sun with peculiar brightness, and becomes the cynosure of the traveller's eye for many days. This peak is, however, not alone in all this glory. It has near to, and arising from, the same broad base, "another self," alike most nearly, but lower and smaller in all its proportions; although, if not overlooked by its tall neighbour, it would be reckoned among high mountains. Hence, perhaps, it is that the sacred text speaks of "the mountains of Ararat" rather than of a single mountain' (Daily Bible Illustrations, Sixth week, Fourth day). The heights of these peaks are, respectively, 17,750 and 13,420 feet above the sea, and 14,573 and 10,435 feet above the plain. The country around shows evident traces of volcanic agency, which does not seem to be yet exhausted. July 2, 1840, a fearful earthquake occurred, destroying the village of Arguri on the slopes of the mountain and the monastery of St. James. There were clouds of sulphurous smoke evolved; and fragments of rock, ice, and snow were hurled to a vast distance.

The Armenians used to maintain that Ararat had never been ascended. Professor Parrot, however, a German, reached the summit in 1829, after two unsuccessful attempts. He found it a slightly-convex and almost-circular platform, about 220 feet in diameter, declining at the extremity steeply on all sides. It was a mass of ice unbroken by a single stone. To the east-south-east was the lesser peak, looking like the top of a square truncated pyramid, with rocky elevations jutting out at the edges and in the middle. It was a glorious sight in descending 'to behold the dark shadows which the mountains on the west cast upon the plain, and then the profound darkness which covered all the valleys, and which rose gradually higher and higher on the side of Ararat, whose icy summit was still illuminated by the beams of the setting sun.' Other ascents have since been made. On July 11, 1856, a party of five Englishmen set out for the summit of the Greater Ararat, and, to the no small astonishment of the inhabitants of the country, succeeded. The details, given by Major Robert Stuart, one of the party, will be found in the Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Oct. 1856, pp. 236-239.

It is probable that the ark rested either on the lower mountain, or in some depression between higher peaks. See Winer, Bibl. RWB. art. 'Ararat'; and Duns, Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. i. pp. 208-213.

AR'ARATH (Tob. i. 21).

ARAU'NAH (ark? a large ash or pine). A Jebusite, it has been supposed of royal race, from whom David purchased a threshing-floor as a site for an altar to the Lord (2 Sam. xxiv. 18-25). In 1 Chron. xxi. 18-28; 2 Chron. iii. 1, the name is Ornan. There is a discrepancy in the two accounts in respect to the price paid by David. According to the author of Samuel it was fifty shekels of silver; whereas in Chronicles we find the sum stated to be six hundred shekels of gold. But we may suppose the floor, oxen, and instruments purchased for the fifty shekels; the larger area, in which the temple was subsequently built, for six hundred. Or the first named sum was the price of the oxen, the last of the ground.

AR'BA, AR'BAH (hero of Baal). The ancestor of the Anakim, from whom Hebron had the name of Kirjath Arba, city of Arba (Gen. xxxv. 27; Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, xxi. 11).

AR'BATHITE. A native of the ARABAH, which see (2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chron. xi. 32).

ARBAT'TIS (1 Macc. v. 23). Some place or district in the north of Palestine, the location of which can be merely conjectured.

AR'BEL (Hos. x. 14). See BETH-ARBEL. ARBE'LA (1 Macc. ix. 2). A place in Galilee, not far from the western shore of the lake of Gennesaret. It would seem to be identical with the modern Irbid; and in the neighbourhood are many remarkable caves. Dr. Thomson thus describes them: Entering the Wady Hamâm, he says, 'Look up now to that cliff on the left. It is more than a thousand feet high; and a large part of it is absolutely perpendicular. It is perforated by a multitude of caverns, holes, and narrow passages, the chosen resort of robbers in former days. The walls and fortifications which united these caverns, and defended them against attack, are still visible. They are now called Kulaet im M'an, but anciently they bore the name of Arbela, from a village on the top, a little back from the precipice, the ruins of which are now named Irbid. Josephus has a graphic description of the capture of these caves by Herod the Great. After various expedients to expel them [the robbers] had failed, he let boxes filled with soldiers down the face of the precipice, and landed them at the entrance of the caverns. This was a most daring exploit, but it succeeded; and by fire and sword the robbers were entirely exterminated' (The Land and the Book, p. 423).

AR'BITE. Paaral, one of David's warriors, is called the Arbite (2 Sam. xxiii. 35), probably as a native of the city ARAB, which see. In the corresponding list (1 Chron. xi. 37) we have Naarai, the son of Ezbai.

ARBO'NAI (Judith ii. 24). A river, described as in or near Cilicia.

ARCH (Ezek. xl. 16). The word is rendered 'galleries' or 'porches' in the margin. See ARCHITECTURE.

ARCHANGEL (1 Thess. iv. 16; Jude 9). See ANGEL.

ARCHELA'US (prince of the people). The son of Herod the Great, by Malthace, a Samaritan lady. He and his brother Antipas were brought up at Rome. On his father's death he succeeded to his authority over Idumea, Judea, Samaria, including the important cities of Cæsarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem, with the title of ethnarch. When he went to Rome to receive investiture, the Jews sent a complaint after him; to which, however, the emperor Augustus paid no attention. To this journey our Lord may be supposed to allude (Luke xix. 12, 14). Archelaus was guilty of cruelty in his administration; so that in the ninth or tenth year of his government the Samaritans preferred charges against him; and he was consequently deposed and banished to Vienne in Gaul, where it is generally believed he died. He married Glaphyra, the wife of his brother Alexander. It was through fear of him that Joseph and Mary, under the divine sanction, carried Jesus into Galilee (Matt. ii. 22).

ARCHERY. See ARMS.

AR'CHEVITES. A tribe introduced as colonists into Samaria by the king of Assyria (Ezra iv. 9). They were probably from ERECH, which see.

AR'CHI (Josh. xvi. 2). See ARCHITE.

ARCHIP'PUS (master of the horse). A Christian teacher (it is generally supposed) at Colosse, and possibly the son of Philemon (Col. iv. 17; Philem. 2). Wieseler, however (Chron. des Apost. Zeit. p. 452), argues with considerable probability that Archippus resided at Laodicea.

AR'CHITE. The designation of Hushai, David's friend (2 Sam. xv. 32, xvii. 5, 14; 1 Chron. xxvii. 33), possibly as connected with the place or district called Archi (Josh. xvi. 2). But it is difficult to say what that place or district was. It has the article in the original there, just as in the word applied to Hushai. Perhaps it may signify 'the Archite district,' i.e. the district of Erech, which lay on the frontier of Ephraim; but this is merely a conjecture from the Hebrew form.

ARCHITECTURE. Some knowledge of building there must have been at a very early period of the world. The wants of men would soon lead them to construct habitations. And we find that Cain is said to have built a city, a collection of habitations, and to have given it a definite name (Gen. iv. 17). The progress of the mechanical arts is noted among Cain's posterity; and, while some are said to have dwelt in tents, as breeders of cattle, others are mentioned as practising metallurgy: these last were, of course, more likely to congregate in towns (20, 22). Considerable proficiency unquestionably must have been made for the completion of such a structure as the ark of Noah. Shortly after the flood cities were again built, and the materials used for them are specified (x. 10-12, xi. 1-9).

Passing by the architecture of other nations, it may be observed that, when the Israelites went to live in Egypt, they not only beheld the great buildings of that country, but were forced by their taskmasters to take part in their construction (Exod. i. 11). They must therefore have acquired some experience and skill. When freed, however, from servitude and settled in the land of Canaan, we find little notice of any of their buildings. They had, indeed, to fortify or make additions to some of the cities which they possessed (Numb. xxxii. 34-38), but for the most part—and they were reminded of the gratitude they ought to feel for it—they inhabited cities which they did not build and found houses which other hands had prepared (Deut. vi. 10-12). And these were of no mean character, as the still-existing habitations of Argob show, as well as the account given of Dagon's temple among the Philistines (Judges xvi. 23-30). It was not till the days of David that architecture was cultivated much among the Israelites. That monarch enlarged and strengthened Jerusalem, and built himself a palace there; but with the aid of foreign artizans (2 Sam. v. 9-11). Much more was done by Solomon. Besides the temple, and his palace, and that which was called the house of the forest of Lebanon, and the house for his wife, the daughter of Pharaoh (1 Kings vii. 1-12), he built or fortified various cities, and carried on a vast number of magnificent works (ix. 17-19). Great skill, it would seem, was shown in these structures, many of them being decorated with carvings, sculpture, and inlaid work. But then it was not merely native talent that was employed. Solomon, like his father, had to seek assistance, specially for the ornaments and furniture, from Tyre (vii. 13, 14; 2 Chron. ii. 7, 14). Later kings, of both Israel and Judah, encouraged architecture; so that the greater number of them, from Rehoboam and Jeroboam downwards, are mentioned as builders (xii. 25; 2 Chron. xi. 5-11, and elsewhere). The Jews who returned from captivity were able to re-build their temple (Ezra iii. 8-10, vi. 14, 15) and to fortify Jerusalem (Neh. iii., vi. 15); and afterwards many magnificent works were completed, as Herod's temple (Mark xiii. 1, 2) and other structures.

Of the character of Jewish architecture little can be said, unless we may judge from Assyrian, Egyptian, and Persian remains.

Arch. Remains of arch between Zion and Moriah, Jerusalem.
From photograph.

Some of the vast stones still to be seen at Jerusalem may have belonged to Solomon's or to Herod's temple. A very remarkable relic is a part of an arch in the bridge which another a little more than twenty, and the whole width of the bridge as about fifty-one feet, while its length across the Tyropæon to the perpendicular face of Zion could not have been less than 350. Of course there must have been several piers and arches. The whole causeway is supposed to have formed a magnificent passage from Zion to the south porch of the temple' (The Land united Zion to the temple, and on which it is believed that Titus stood while parleying with the Jews. Dr. Thomson describes one of the stones as 'twenty-five feet long, and the Book, p. 691). It may be added here that arches of a very early date, both in brick and stone, have been discovered in Egypt, also ancient arches of kiln-burnt bricks in the ruins of Nineveh. Some of the reservoirs yet existing in Palestine were most probably the work of Hebrew kings.

As to the sources whence materials were procured, there are quarries under Jerusalem, from which came much of the stone required for the temple and other buildings,

3. Arch in stone. Tomb at Thebes.

4. Arch-Gateways. From Nineveh marbles.

5. Arch. Tomb at Thebes, time of Thothmes I.

The traces of the workings there are of peculiar interest.

Of architectural tools we find a few mentioned in scripture, as the saw, the measuring-reed, and the plumb-line (1 Kings vii. 9; Ezek. xl. 3; Amos vii. 7, 8). See HOUSE, TEMPLE.

ARCTURUS (Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 32). The word rendered Arcturus in our version is given in the margin as 'ash' (perhaps a bier, or, according to some, a night-watcher). The constellation intended is the Great Bear, and the 'sons' (also called in Arabic 'daughters of the bier') are the three stars in the tail. See Carey, The Book of Job translated, Illustrations, Job ix. 9, pp. 439, 440.

ARD (fugitive?). 1. A son of Benjamin (Gen. xli. 21).—2. A grandson of the same patriarch (Numb. xxvi. 40); who is elsewhere called Addar (1 Chron. viii. 3). But is not improbable that only one person is meant, and that the word 'sons' is used in Gen. xli. 21 in a larger sense.

AR'DATH (2 Esdr. ix. 26).

ARD'ITES. A family of Benjamin, descendants of Ard (Numb. xxvi. 40).

AR'DON (fugitive). One of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 18).

ARE'LI (lion of my God, i. e. of heroic birth). A son of Gad (Gen. xli. 16; Numb. xxvi. 17).

ARE'LITES. A family of Gad, descendants of Areli (Numb. xxvi. 17).

AREOP'AGITE. A member of the court of the Areopagus (Acts xvii. 34).

AREOP'AGUS (Mars' Hill). A narrow naked ridge of limestone rock at Athens, sloping upwards from the north and terminating in an abrupt precipice on the south, fifty or sixty feet above a valley which divides it from the west end of the Acropolis. It had its name from the legend that Mars (Ares), the god of war, was tried here by the other gods on a charge of murder. Here sat the court or council of the Areopagus, a most ancient and venerable tribunal, celebrated through Greece. It took cognizance of criminal charges, as murder, arson, wounding; but the lawgiver Solon added to its functions and gave it also censorial and political powers. Those who had held the office of archon were members of this court, and they sat for life, unless guilty of some crime. The Areopagus was respected under the Roman dominion, and existed in the empire. Here it was that St. Paul made his memorable address (Acts xvii. 19-34); one of the council, persuaded by it or more fully instructed afterwards, becoming a Christian. But it does not appear that the apostle was, properly speaking, tried; rather he was placed on this spot in order that what he had to say might be more commodiously heard by the multitude. Sixteen stone steps from the agora (market) yet exist, and the stone seats forming three sides of a quadrangle looking southwards, also two blocks, appropriated, it is believed, to the accuser and the criminal. See Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, vol. i. pp. 440-444, 2nd edit.

A'RES (1 Esdr. v. 10). A form of Arah (Ezra ii. 5).

AR'ETAS. A king of Arabia Petraea, whose daughter Herod Antipas had married, and divorced at the instance of Herodias. Aretas consequently attacked and entirely defeated Antipas, who solicited help from Rome; and Vitellius, governor of Syria, was thereupon commanded by the emperor to march against Aretas. But before this command could be executed Tiberius died, 37 A.D.; and Antipas was soon after banished to Lyons. Though there is no distinct historical record of the fact, yet there is strong presumption that, during the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, Aretas was in possession of Damascus (see Wieseler, Chron. des Apost. Zeit. pp. 167-175). It was under an ethnarch or governor appointed by him that the endeavour was made to apprehend St. Paul (Acts ix. 24, 25; 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33). The name or title Aretas was borne by several Arabian chiefs or kings.

AR'ETAS (2 Macc. v. 8).

ARE'US (1 Macc. xii. 20). A king of Sparta, no doubt the first of the name, who wrote a letter to Onias, the high priest of the Jews.

AR'GOB (stony). A person killed with Pekahiah, king of Israel (2 Kings xv. 25). See Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl. vol. ii. pp. 30, 31.

AR'GOB (id.). A district to the east of the Jordan, formerly part of the ancient kingdom of Og. It is always called 'the region of Argob' (Deut. iii. 4, 13, 14; 1 Kings iv. 13); the word translated 'region' (once 'country') being a very peculiar one: indeed it signifies a 'cord,' and, applied to any district, would show that it had a very distinct boundary, like the sea-line of the Mediterranean coast; to designate which we have this same word (Zeph. ii. 5-7). Argob was allotted to the half-tribe of Manasseh, and was, in later times, called Trachonitis, the rough, and has been satisfactorily identified as the modern well-defined Lejâh. It is a most extraordinary tract of country, in the shape of an irregular oval, its eastern side nearly like the arc of a bow, about 22 miles from N. to S. and 14 from E. to W. Mr. Porter describes it as presenting a picture of the wildest desolation, a kind of Cyclopean city, completely prostrate, whose blackened and shapeless fragments were scattered rudely over the plain—a plain yet thickly studded with ruined cities and villages. 'Round the whole Lejâh the border is defined like a coast-line, which indeed it very much resembles with its inlets and promontories,' 'The physical features,' Mr. Porter adds, 'present the most singular phenomena I have ever witnessed: . . . it is wholly composed of black basalt, which seems to have issued from innumerable pores in the surface of the earth, and thence in a liquid state to have flowed out on every side till the whole plain was covered. Before cooling it was agitated by some fierce and powerful tempest or other such force, and then shattered by internal motions and vibrations. The cup-like pits from which the lava was projected are still seen, and also the wave-like aspect of a thick liquid which cools while flowing or is agitated while cooling.' Edrei and Kenath have been identified in this region; and, as already said, there are the ruins of many other cities. The whole aspect and circumstances of the Lejâh furnish a remarkable proof of the accuracy of the sacred writers. See Porter, in Journ. of Sac. Lit., July, 1854, pp. 295-302.

ARIARA'THES (1 Macc. xv. 22). A king of Cappadocia, sixth of the name. See Prideaux, Connect. vol. ii. pp. 218, &c., edit. 1858; Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Ariarathes.'

ARI'DAI (the strong, or of noble birth). The ninth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

ARIDA'THA (id.). The sixth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 8).

A'RIEH (lion). A person killed with Pekahiah, king of Israel (2 Kings xv. 25). See ARGOB.

A'RIEL (lion of God, or hearth, i.e. altar of God).—1. One of the chief men with Ezra on his return from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 16).—2. A symbolical name given to Jerusalem (Isai. xxix. 1, 2, 7). It is questioned whether Jerusalem is so called as signifying 'lion of God,' or 'altar of God.' The second meaning suits best with Ezek. xliii. 15, 16, where the word (though there are variations in the reading) twice occurs; and perhaps this may incline the balance in favour of the same signification in Isaiah. It may be added that Ariel is in the original of 2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Chron. xi. 22, where our version has 'lion-like men'; and it has been supposed that the word is here too a proper name, and that Benaiah slew the two sons of Ariel, a Moabite.

ARIMATHE'A (the heights). A city of Judea (supposed by some identical with Ramah, the residence of the prophet Samuel), the birth-place of Joseph, who begged the body of our Lord for burial in his own tomb (Matt. xxvii. 57; Mark xv. 43; Luke xxiii. 50, 51; John xix. 38). The modern village Renthieh is thought to be on the site of Arimathea. See RAMAH.

A'RIOCH (lion-like).—1. The king of El-lasar, confederate with Chedor-laomer (Gen. xiv. 1, 9).—2. The captain of Nebuchadnezzar's guard (Dan. ii. 14, 15, 24, 25).

A'RIOCH (Judith i. 6). The name ascribed to a king of the Elymeans.

ARI'SAI (lion-like?). The eighth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

ARISTAR'CHUS (excellent chief). A Thes-salonian Christian, who accompanied St. Paul on his third missionary journey (Acts xix. 29, xx. 4), was with him on his voyage to Rome (xxvii. 2), and is afterwards mentioned as his fellow-labourer and prisoner (Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24). According to tradition, he was bishop of Apamea.

ARISTOB'ULUS (excellent counsellor). A person to whose household at Rome St. Paul sends salutation (Rom. xvi. 10). Of himself nothing is known.

ARISTOB'ULUS. A Jewish priest in Egypt in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, to whom the Jews of Palestine addressed a letter (2 Macc. i. 10). Perhaps he was identical with the peripatetic philosopher of the same name; but Winer dissents from this opinion (Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Aristobulus, 1').

ARK, NOAH'S. See FLOOD.

ARK OF THE COVENANT. The sacred chest or coffer, deposited in the most holy place of the tabernacle and the temple, variously called the 'ark of the testimony' (Exod. xxv. 22) and the 'ark of God' (1 Sam. iii. 3). It was made of shittim or acacia wood, of oblong shape,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cubits in length,  $1\frac{1}{2}$  in breadth and depth. It was overlaid within and without with pure gold, with a border or edging also of gold. There were four golden rings attached, one at each corner, through which staves or poles like-wise of acacia plated with gold were passed to bear the ark when it was carried. These staves were never altogether removed, but were drawn out so far as to allow the ark to stand against the back wall, the other ends then reaching to the veil which separated the sanctuary from the most holy place (Exod. xxv. 15; Numb. iv. 6; 1 Kings viii. 8; 2 Chron. v. 9). The lid of the ark, fitting it in size, was called the mercy-seat, and was made of pure gold. Upon it at the two ends were two cherubim, also of gold, facing each other, and stretching out their wings as a kind of canopy, between which, upon the mercy-seat, was the symbolical presence of the Deity (Exod. xxv. 10-22, xxxvii. 1-9). In the ark were put the original tables of the law, a quantity of manna in a golden vessel, and Aaron's rod that had budded (Heb. ix. 4). It is true that the manna and the rod are said to be placed before the testimony (Exod. xvi. 33, 34; Numb. xvii. 10); but the assertion that in the time of Solomon (1 Kings viii. 9) the tables alone were in the ark would rather seem to imply that previously something else had been there (See Alford, The Greek Test., note on Heb. ix. 4). Before it was also laid a copy of the book of the law (Deut. xxxi. 26).

This ark was regarded with peculiar reverence, as the sacred resting-place of the Deity. When the tabernacle was moved, the priests were to cover the ark with a blue pall, after which it was carried on march by the Kohathite Levites (Numb. iv. 5, 6, 19, 20, vii. 9, x. 21); and the priests appear to have borne it into the sanctuary (1 Kings viii. 3, 4, 6). It was carried by priests across the Jordan (Josh. iii., iv.), and around the walls of Jericho (vi. 2-16). Doubtless as soon as the tabernacle was set up in Canaan the ark was placed in it. Thus we find it with the tabernacle at Shiloh (1 Sam. iii. 3); and thence it was sent for by the army, and in the defeat which followed it was captured by the Philistines (iv. 3-22). In their land it remained seven months, but was restored in consequence of the infliction of severe plagues. It first reached Beth-shemesh on its return, and was thence, after the punishment of the curious Beth-shemites, transferred to Kirjath-Jearim (v., vi., vii. 1, 2). Though stationary here for a while, it was perhaps occasionally brought out (xiv. 18), and carried back. And for some time it must have been little regarded. But David, actuated by better feelings, resolved to take it to Jerusalem. His first attempt, however, was unsuccessful, and marked by a sad catastrophe, the death of Uzzah, who had too boldly touched it. It was then deposited in the house of Obed-edom; and the Lord blessed his reverent treatment of the sacred symbol. Then three months afterwards, encouraged by what he heard of this blessing, David accomplished his pious purpose, brought up the ark with glad rejoicings, and placed it in a special tabernacle he had prepared for it (2 Sam. vi; 1 Chron. xiii., xv., xvi. 1-6). Thence it was solemnly transferred to the temple (1 Kings viii. 1-9; 2 Chron. v. 2-10). Some psalms appear to have been composed on one or other of these joyful occasions, e. g. xxiv., xlvii., cxxxii.

The ark ought always to have continued in the temple; but there is reason to believe that it was removed by Manasseh or Amon; for we find an injunction by Josiah to restore it to its place (2 Chron. xxxv. 3). In the sack of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, it doubtless perished; and the Jewish tradition respecting it (preserved 2 Macc. ii. 4, 5) is unworthy of credit. It was not in the second temple; and the want of the holy ark must have been grief to those who remembered the first house, and thought of Jehovah's visible presence there (Ezra iii. 12, 13). As a kind of substitute there was a stone basement in the sanctuary three fingers high, on which the high-priest placed the censor on the day of atonement. Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Bundelade.'

ARK'ITE (fugitive). The name of a branch of Canaan's descendants (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chron. i. 15). They probably inhabited Arca, a Phœnician town at the north-western base of Lebanon, where the worship of Astarte was practised. A temple was also erected here to Alexander the Great; and in this place (to which the name of Cæsarea Libani was given) the emperor Alexander Severus was born. The ruins still exist at Tel 'Arka, four miles south of the Nahr-el-Kebir, and twelve north of Tripoli.

ARM. This word is often used as a symbol of strength (Exod. vi. 6; 1 Sam. ii. 31; Psal. x. 15; Ezek. xxx. 21, 22, 24, 25). Sometimes the allusion is to the disengaging of the arm from the clothing, that its action might be freer and more energetic (Isai. iii. 10).

ARMAGED'DON (the hill, or, perhaps, the city of Megiddo). A symbolical name for the place where a final struggle between the hosts of good and evil must take place (Rev. xvi. 16). For an exposition of the apostle's meaning, the reader must be referred to commentaries: it will be sufficient here to say that there is an allusion to that great battle-field where Barak and Gideon conquered (Judges iv., v. 19, vi. 33, vii.), where Saul and Josiah fell (1 Sam. xxix. 1, xxxi.; 2 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20-24), the plain of Esdraelon, on the southern border of which Megiddo stood. See ESDRAELON. It was customary with the sacred writers to re-produce the scenes of former great events as the platform on which other events would occur: comp. Joel iii. 2, 12 with 2 Chron. xx. 22 26.

ARME'NIA. A region of elevated tableland in Western Asia, extending from the Caucasus in the north to the Taurus on the south, triangular in shape. From it rise lofty and snow-capped mountains, such as Ararat, not showing, however, their full height, because of the elevation of the base on which they stand. These mountains are rich in minerals. Eastward and westward Armenia sinks insensibly into the plains of Media and Asia Minor. The climate is cold, but healthy: meadow and pasture lands abound, where horses and mules were bred for exportation (Ezek. xxvii. 14); and in the valleys and more level districts, especially towards Media, there is rich vegetation. In the highlands of Armenia the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Araxes take their rise. The ancients divided this country into the greater and the lesser Armenia, the Euphrates being the boundary: the first of these is Armenia proper. Our translators have sometimes introduced the word Armenia as the rendering of Ararat (2 Kings xix. 37; Isai. xxxvii. 38). But other names seem rather to designate this country. Ararat may be the central region round the mountains known by that name; Minni (Jer. li. 27), perhaps the district Minyas, and then there is Togarmah (Gen. x. 3; Ezek. xxvii. 14, xxxviii. 6), of wider signification, a region which must, from the connection in which it is found, be identified with Armenia. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Armenien.'

ARMELET. An ornament worn upon the upper part of the arm (2 Sam. i. 10). See BRACELET.

Egyptian armlets. 'Description de l'Egypte.

ARMO'NI (belonging to a palace, imperial). A son of Saul by Rizpah (2 Sam. xxi. 8).

ARMOUR, ARMS. The progress of modern discovery has thrown much light upon the modes of attack and defence used by ancient nations. We are familiar with the weapons of the Greeks and Romans; and those of the Assyrians and Egyptians have either been preserved or are found represented in the still-existing sculptures and paintings of those peoples. But no arms used by the Israelites have yet been discovered: neither is any sculpture known to exist on which their weapons are depicted. We can only, therefore, gather from the notices in scripture, and by comparison with what we know of the habits of the neighbouring nations, the nature of the arms with which the Israelites fought.

Of offensive arms, the sword requires the first notice. It must have been one of the earliest weapons in use, as we find the mention of it at the very beginning of the sacred volume (Gen. iii. 24, xxxi. 26, xxxiv. 25, 26); and so commonly was it employed that it became synonymous with war (Ezek.

1, 2, 3. Egyptian swords. Rosellini and Champollion.

xiv. 17). The Hebrew word generally rendered 'sword' in our version is sometimes translated a 'tool' (Exod. xx. 25), that is, a graver or chisel, a 'knife' (Josh. v. 2, 3, where of flint; Ezek. v. 1), a 'dagger' a cubit long (Judges iii. 16). We may probably gather that the Hebrew sword was a light short weapon, though strong enough to inflict a fearful wound (2 Sam. xxi. 10), and that it had two edges (Psal. cxlix. 6). The fact that David was able to use Goliath's sword is an additional proof that the weapon was not a heavy one (1 Sam.

xvii. 51, xxi. 9). Swords, though very anciently they may have been of stone, must generally have been metallic, as their glittering or shining is mentioned (Deut. xxxii.

that—but running at him with it. This spear must have had a metallic strong point at its butt end; it could thus be with more facility stuck into the ground (xxvi. 7), 41: see also Isai. ii. 4). They were kept in a sheath, girded on the loins (2 Sam. xx. 8), and resting on or against the thigh (Psal. xlv. 3). To gird on the sword was to prepare for war (1 Sam. xxv. 13). The whetting or sharpening of the sword is also spoken of (Psal. vii. 12; Ezek. xxi. 9, 10). And the sword is said to 'devour' (2 Sam. ii. 26), because the Hebrew word for 'edge' is literally 'mouth' of the sword.

The spear was another offensive weapon. Of this there were different kinds. The most formidable is that which we find Goliath carrying. In his case, no doubt it was of extraordinary size; the shaft or staff a heavy piece of wood, the head made of metal (1 Sam. xvii. 7). This kind of spear Saul was in the habit of using (xxii. 6, xxvi. 7, 8, 11, 12, 16, 22; 2 Sam. i. 6), and it was this, called 'javelin' in our version, with which he tried to pin David to the wall (1 Sam. xviii. 10, 11, xix. 9, 10), not throwing it, as some have imagined, as a missile—the weapon was too ponderous for and it was with this point that Abner struck Asahel quite through his body (2 Sam. ii. 23). There was a lighter kind of spear, which, when not in use, was sus-ended from the shoulder (1 Sam. xvii. 6 where it is erroneously rendered 'target, and in the margin 'gorget,' also 'shield,' 45) This weapon was thrown after 'shaking' or poising (Job xli. 29). It was one of this kind that Joshua held in his hand, and with it he made a signal to his troops (Josh. viii. 18). Perhaps it had a flag affixed, like used by Phineas (Numb. xxv. 7): the original word is the same as that translated 'lancets' (1 Kings xviii. 28). Another was a missile weapon (2 Chron. xxiii. 10, xxxii. 5). And a third was a staff with a sharp point, with which Joab transfixed Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 14).

A 'battle-axe' is mentioned (Jer. li. 20). This seems to have been (as Henderson suggests, The Prophet Jeremiah, p. 260) 'the club' anciently used by warriors for the purpose of clearing away all with whom they came in contact.'

A very important weapon was the bow. This is mentioned very early with reference both to the chase and to war (Gen. xxi. 20, xxvii. 3, xlvi. 22, xlix. 23, 24). And we find that it was in common use in the armies of various other nations (Judges v. 11; 1 Sam. xxxi. 3; 1 Kings xxii. 34; 2 Chron. xxxv. 23) as well as among the Israelites. The warriors of the tribe of Benjamin seem especially to have practised archery (1 Chron. viii. 40; 2 Chron. xiv. 8, xvii. 17); but the bow is mentioned also as the weapon of other tribes (1 Chron. v. 18; Psal. lxxviii. 9). Bows were made of great strength, sometimes of steel or brass (xviii. 34); and considerable force was required to bend them: the Hebrew word for 'bend' signifies properly 'to tread'; the foot, therefore, was used. The bow-string is mentioned (xi. 2, xxi. 12). Arrows (and possibly also bows) were kept in a quiver (Gen. xxvii. 3; Psal. cxxvii. 5; Isai. xxii. 6). Care was taken to sharpen them (xlix. 2): sometimes possibly they were

are spoken of in the New Testament (Eph. vi. 16): these would seem to have been specially intended to set fire to buildings (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Bogen,' note 5). It has been suggested by a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i, p. 111, that bolts or stones, as well as arrows, were discharged from the bow. This is probably the meaning of 1 Chron. xii. 2. Such bows would be like the cross-bows of the middle ages. Larger engines for this purpose were devised by Uzziah's officers (2 Chron. xxvi. 15).

There was one more very effective weapon of offence—the sling. It was made of plaited thongs, broad in the middle, to hold the missile securely, and then was whirled two or three times round to deliver the stone or bullet with the greatest force. It was the natural weapon of a shepherd (1 Sam. xvii. 40, 49, 50); and the use of it as well as of the bow (mentioned above) must have been specially cultivated by the Benjamites, who could sling with either hand, and hit a mark with the nicest exactness (Judges xx. 16). Slingers are afterwards described as doing considerable execution against a town of Moab (2 Kings iii. 25).

A coat of mail, or a breast-plate. Various devices were employed to make body-armour strong enough to resist a blow or thrust, and to turn aside a missile. Sometimes leather, and sometimes metal in scales or rings was used. The corslet of Goliath is literally a harness of scales; that is, a scaled coat of mail, consisting of small plates (1 Sam. xvii. 5). It was a mailed coat that Ahab wore; and the arrow that killed him probably penetrated between the breast-plate, the close-fitting part, and that which hung more loosely down (1 Kings xxii. 34). The same original word is sometimes rendered 'habergeon' (Neh. iv. 16).

Another piece of defensive armour is also called 'habergeon' (Exod. xxviii. 32, xxxix. 23). It is supposed to have been of linen thickly woven or quilted, with a binding round the neck, and plated on the breast with mail. One of the priest's vestments had a similar hem or binding at the neck, to prevent its tearing. The meaning of the 'habergeon' of Job xli. 26 is doubtful: some suppose it an offensive weapon.

Greaves of brass (or rather of bronze or copper) are mentioned as being worn upon the feet, covering probably the shin or instep (1 Sam. xvii. 6).

Of shields there were two kinds, one very large, protecting the body (Psal. v. 12). This when not in actual use was borne by an at-tenant (1 Sam. xvii. 7). Another smaller shield or target seems to have been more especially employed by light-armed troops. The difference between these two pieces of armour is manifest by the greater weight of gold required for the first, rendered 'targets,' than for the others, translated 'shields,' which Solomon made (1 Kings x. 16, 17). Two other descriptions of shield are mentioned; one in 2 Sam. viii. 7; but it is quite uncertain whether a shield be meant here; the other in Psal. xci. 4, of which the shape perhaps was round. Shields were sometimes made of light wood, covered with bull's hide of two or more thicknesses bordered with metal: light ones were of wicker-work or osier, covered also with hide. Sometimes they were studded with nails or metal pins. They were grasped by a wooden or leather handle, and occasionally suspended by a thong from the neck. They were smeared with oil, both to preserve them from injury by weather, and to render them so smooth that missiles might more readily glance off. They were also kept in coverings till actually wanted. Hence, to 'anoint' or 'uncover' the shield was to prepare for battle (Isai. xxi. 5, xxii. 6).

Armour and weapons are sometimes employed symbolically. There is a battle to be fought by the Christian against his spiritual foes: it is natural therefore to represent him as supplied with armour for his protection (Eph. vi. 13-17). But Roman weapons are here referred to; such as the apostle was in the habit of seeing round him during his detention in Rome.

ARMY. When the Israelites were numbered, the enumeration included those only who had reached the age of military service. Thus, at the census noted at the beginning of the book of Numbers, the 603,550 was the number of the males 'from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war in Israel' (Numb. i. 45, 46). These men were not soldiers, nor were they generally armed or trained as soldiers: they were the raw material from which military forces when required might be drawn. It is true that to keep order in their encampments and in their journeyings through the wilderness something like military discipline was observed (ii. x.); but had this not been the case the tribes would have been confused into one tumultuous mass, and journeying and encampment have been alike impossible. When occasion of war arose, a draught was made from the numbers capable of bearing arms. Thus it was when the Amalekites attacked Israel in Rephidim (Exod. xvii. 8-10); and thus, yet more remarkably, when the trans-Jordanic tribes were held to have perfectly fulfilled their promise of marching with their brethren to the conquest of Canaan by detaching little more than one-third of their population fit for military service. For the total numbers of the two tribes and a half (reckoning Manasseh to be equally divided) were 110,580 (Numb. xxvi. 7, 18, 34); and the army they sent across the Jordan was but 'about,' that is, in round numbers, '40,000' (Josh. iv. 13). It is true that the whole population fit to serve were, in case of necessity, liable to serve. And accordingly we read ver often of general levies (Judges ix. 29, 30, xx. 1, 2; 1 Sam. xi. 6-8), necessary in a country where there was no standing army. But, after such a muster, the law allowed a wide latitude of exemption from actual service. Such as had built a house and had not dedicated it; such as had planted a vineyard and had not eaten the fruit of it; such as were betrothed to a wife and had not taken her, or were just married; and, above all, such as were fearful and did not choose to fight, were at perfect liberty to depart (Deut. xx. 5-8, xxiv. 5). We see the operation of this law in Gideon's army: the muster of 32,000 was speedily reduced to 10,000 (Judges vii. 2, 3); in that particular case there being afterwards by God's command a further reduction to 300 (4-7). We are not therefore to take the numbers furnished by the census rolls as the amount of the Israelitish armies brought into the field. See CENSUS.

At a time when there was no standing army the appointment of officers was not till forces were raised. This, it appears, was to take place after the muster had been made and exemptions allowed (Deut. xx. 9). The officers are styled 'captains of thousands' and 'captains of hundreds;' and it is likely that the marshalling of them and their men was according (as far as might be) to their tribes and families (Numb. xxxi. 4, 14; 1 Sam. xvii. 18; 2 Chron. xxv. 5). This mustering and marshalling would seem to have been under the direction of special functionaries called 'officers' (Deut. xx. 5-9), and afterwards 'scribes of the host' (2 Kings xxv. 19; 2 Chron. xxvi. 11). Directions were given in the law for the conduct of an army in the field. The priests were to accompany the troops and encourage them: conditions of peace, too, were to be offered to a hostile city before attacking it; and fruit-trees were not to be destroyed in a siege (Numb. x. 9; Deut. xx. 1-4, 10-15, 19, 20). These regulations must necessarily, however, have been modified by circumstances, as ambushes and surprises were not disallowed; and sometimes, in hope of securing the more solemn and effectual presence and aid of the Deity, the ark of the covenant was carried into the field.

When the monarchy was established, the nucleus of a standing army was formed. Three thousand men were embodied by Saul (1 Sam. xiii. 2, xiv. 52, xxiv. 2). David also retained a number of household troops. In his wanderings while persecuted by Saul, he had collected 400, afterwards swelled to 600, men (xxii. 2, xxiii. 13, xxv. 13, xxx. 9); and this corps seems always to have been kept distinct: there were also the Cherethites and Pelethites under a special commander (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18, xx. 7); the whole together forming a body like our regiments of guards. David also organized what may be called the militia of his kingdom. These amounted in all to 288,000, under twelve commanders; bodies of 24,000 being called out in turn each for a month of service (1 Chron. xxvii. 1-15). David, moreover, established a kind of military order of merit, in three classes, the first and second containing three respectively, and the third thirty. Among these were his most distinguished captains. Two lists of them are given (2 Sam. xxiii. 8-39; 1 Chron. xi. 10-47), with some variation, one list containing a greater number of names than the other; those possibly being added who succeeded to the places of such as had died. Then there was a class called shalishim, 'thirds,' whose exact character it is not easy to ascertain. They might have been connected with the 'threes' or the 'thirty' just noticed; and there are various other conjectures respecting them. They are enumerated in the military list of Solomon's army, and there called 'captains' (1 Kings ix. 22); which list seems to comprise the different ranks, 'men of war,' i.e. privates, sub-officers, captains, chiefs, and chariot and cavalry officers; the officering of the troops being now probably in the king's hands (2 Chron. xxv. 5). Whatever the shalishim were, their chief was a personage of high rank; as the name is given to that 'lord' who was in immediate attendance on the king of Israel in the siege of Samaria (2 Kings vii. 2, 17-20). At the head of the army was 'the captain of the host' (1 Sam. xiv. 50; 2 Sam. viii. 16, xix. 13; 1 Kings iv. 4, xvi. 16; 2 Kings iv. 13). This was a standing office; and it conferred great dignity and power. David himself was little able to control Joab his commander-in-chief (2 Sam. iii. 39; 1 Kings ii. 5).

The armies of Israel for long consisted only of infantry (1 Sam. iv. 10, xv. 4); which accounts for the fear they had of those nations who employed war-chariots (Judges i. 19, iv. 3). It was found, however, when they had to combat in their own plains and with the bordering nations, that chariots and horsemen would be of advantage. Accordingly, David, mindful probably of the warning in the law not to 'multiply horses,' (Deut. xvii. 16), reserved a few, and but a few, of the chariots and horses he took from the Syrians (2 Sam. viii. 4). Solomon largely increased this arm of his forces: he had 1,400 chariots, 4,000 horses for them, and a body of 12,000 cavalry, and he had depots for these in various towns of his kingdom (1 Kings ix. 19, x. 26; 2 Chron. i. 14, ix. 25). Elsewhere, indeed (1 Kings iv. 26), he is said to have had 40,000 stalls for his horses; but possibly there is some error of transcription in the last-named text.

After the division of the kingdom there are frequent notices of military affairs. War-chariots were used (xxii. 34, 35; 2 Kings viii. 21): horsemen are spoken of (xiii. 7); and frequently the numbers of men capable of bearing arms are recorded (e.g. 2 Chron. xiv. 8). But it is probable that armies were absolutely mustered in time of war exclusively, and that the standing force consisted only of bodies of guards, of which we have incidental notices (2 Kings xi. 4, 9, 11, 13, 15, 19).

Of the commissariat department we read little; but it would seem that there must have been some regular system pursued (Judges xx. 10). And we find during Absalom's rebellion that the country around David's head-quarters supplied him with provisions (2 Sam. xvii. 27-29; comp. xvi. 1). Sometimes mercenaries were hired (2 Chron. xxv. 6); but there is no mention of any pay being given to the ordinary troops: doubtless, therefore, armies were accustomed to raise supplies for themselves by plundering the country (1 Sam. xiii. 17, 18, xxvii. 8, 9, xxx. 16). The soldier was, however, at least at some periods, provided with arms (2 Chron. xxvi. 14); and there are notices of armouries (xi. 12, xxiii. 9; Neh. iii. 19; Sol. Song, iv. 4). So also there was a repository for the shields used not in war but on occasions of state (1 Kings xiv. 28).

Of the tactics of Israelitish armies in the field we know but little. Sometimes the forces were divided into two (2 Sam. x. 9-14), and sometimes into three bodies (Judges vii. 16, ix. 43; 1 Sam. xi. 11; 2 Sam. xviii. 2); the disposition in the last case being probably into a centre and two wings. We have also instances of ambushes (Josh. viii. 4, 9, 12; Judges xx. 29), night attacks (Gen. xiv. 15; 1 Sam. xiv. 36; 2 Kings viii. 21), and flank movements (2 Chron. xiii. 13), with the purpose of hemming the enemy in. And, when the onset was made, it was accompanied with loud shouts (1 Sam. xvii. 20).

In the view we have of Jewish wars in post-exilian times we see the Mosaic regulations well observed; the general appointing the inferior officers (1 Macc. iii. 46-56). In the Maccabean wars it was found necessary for the Jews to defend themselves on the sabbath day (ii. 31-41); and in those wars we first of all find any notice of regular pay being given to the soldiery (xiv. 32). A standing force seems to have been continued from that time; till ultimately the Jewish armies were assimilated to those of their Roman conquerors.

Little can here be said of the constitution of the Roman army; the account of which must be sought in other books. But a few particulars are needed to explain the references in the New Testament. The Romans were banded in legions; each of which comprised ten cohorts, each cohort three maniples, and each manipule two centuries, the century originally containing 100 men. See LEGION. The cohort is in our version usually called a 'band' (Matt. xxvii. 27; Acts x. 1, xxi. 31). In a legion there were six tribunes. Claudias Lysias, termed the 'chief captain' (31, 37, xxii. 24), was a tribune. The centurions were officers who commanded centuries. The 'captain of the guard' (xxviii. 16) was the commander of the Prætorian troops. Besides the ordinary cohorts of the legion, there were independent cohorts of volunteers; and it has been supposed that cohorts of this class served in Judea. The Roman head-quarters were at Cæsarea. A cohort was usually stationed at Jerusalem; but at the great festivals this force was increased, disturbances being then not unlikely; the more because the emblems on the Roman standards were considered idolatrous by the Jews, to whose feelings certain concessions were made.

For notices of the 'Italian band' and 'Augustus' band' see the articles under those names.

ARNA (2 Esdr. i. 2). A name answering to Zeriahah in the genealogy of Ezra (Ezra vii. 4).

AR'NAN (active). One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 21).

AR'NON (a noisy stream). A river rising in the Arabian or Moabitish mountains, and flowing with a westerly course into the Dead sea. It was the boundary between the Amorites to the north and Moab to the south; also it, or one of its affluents, would seem to have been the eastern boundary of Moab (Judges xi. 18). When the Israelites had conquered Sihon, the Arnon became their southern trans-Jordanic border; Moab still occupying the south of the stream. Arnon is very generally mentioned in connection with the city Aroer, which stood upon its north bank (Numb. xxi. 13-15, 24-28, xxii. 36; Deut. ii. 24, 36, iii. 8, 12, 16, iv. 48; Josh. xii. 1, 2, xiii. 9, 16; Judges xi. 13, 18, 22, 26; 2 Kings x. 33). There were fords of Arnon (Isai. xvi. 2), and also high places (Numb. xxi. 28), which may be those mentioned in Isai. xv. 2. See BAMOTH. Arnon seems, in later times, when the tribes had been removed by foreign conquerors, to have been reckoned a Moabitish river (Jer. xlviii. 20). There is no doubt that the stream el-Mojeb is the ancient Arnon, and the Wady el-Mojeb the ravine through which it flowed. This is a deep and romantic chasm, bounded by high perpendicular cliffs of red, brown, and yellow sandstone. Tamarisks, canes, &c., grow along the course of the stream, which is 80 or 90 feet broad, and from 4 to 10 feet in depth near its junction with the Dead sea. According to Burckhardt, there is a hill with ruins on pasture ground just at the junction of an affluent, the Lejam, with the Arnon, above Aroer: it is perhaps the site of 'the city by the river' (Deut. ii. 36), 'in the midst of the river' (Josh. xiii. 9, 16).

ARO'D (wild ass). One of the sons of Gad (Numb. xxvi. 17), called also

ARO'DITES. One of the Gadite families descended from Arod, or Arodi (Numb. xxvi. 17).

ARO'ER (ruins?).—1. A city on the north bank of the Arnon, assigned, after the conquest of Sihon, to the tribe of Reuben (Deut. ii. 36, iii. 12, iv. 48; Josh. xii. 2, xiii. 9, 16; Judges xi. 26; 1 Chron. v. 8). It was afterwards, with the rest of the trans-Jordanic territory, occupied by Hazael, and was subsequently in the possession of Moab (2 Kings x. 32, 33; Jer. xlviii. 19). Ruins have been found called 'Ard'er, on the old Roman road at the immediate brink of the Wady el-Mojeb, or ancient Arnon. They are doubtless the remnants of Aroer.—2. A town over against Rabbah of Ammon, built or fortified by the Gadites (Numb. xxxii. 34; Josh. xiii. 25; Judges xi. 33; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5). Perhaps this was the city mentioned in Isai. xvii. 2. See, however, Henderson, Isaiah, p. 156. The modern 'Ayra, 2 hours' south-west of es-Salt, may be the site of this Aroer.—3. A place in Judah (1 Sam. xxx. 28). This is thought to be in the modern Wady 'Ar'arah, 11 miles west-south-west from Bir es-Seb'a, on the road from Gaza to Petra.

A'ROM (1 Esdr. v. 16).

AR'PAD (prop, support). A city or province of Syria, generally named in conjunction with Hamath (2 Kings xviii. 34, xix. 13; Isai. x. 9; Jer. xlix. 23).

AR'PHAD (id.). A different form in our version of the name Arpad (Isai. xxxvi. 19, xxxvii. 13).

ARPACH'SHAD (Gen. x. 22, marg.). The same as ARPHAX'AD (strong-hold of the Chaldees). One of the sons of Shem, ancestor of Eber, and possibly of the Chaldeans (Gen. x. 22, 24, xi. 10-13; 1 Chron. i. 17, 18, 24). The name has been thought to be preserved in Arrapachitis, a province of northern Assyria, perhaps peopled by the descendants of Arphaxad.

ARPHAX'AD. A king of the Medes, said to have been slain by Nabuchodonosor (Judith i. 1-15). Some have tried to identify him with Phraortes; but the history of Judith is fable or allegory.

ARROWS. See ARMS, DIVINATION. The word is often used symbolically (e. g. Psal. xviii. 14, cxxvii. 4, 5; Prov. xxv. 18).

ARROWSNAKE (Gen. xlix. 17, marg.). See ADDER.

AR'SACES (1 Macc. xiv. 2, 3, xv. 22). A king of Parthia and Media, who, besides having the ordinary royal title of Arsaces, was called Mithridates. He took the Syrian king Demetrius Nicator prisoner, and detained him till his own death. See Prideaux, Connection, vol. ii. p. 244.

AR'SARETH (2 Esdr. xiii. 45). An extensive region said to be beyond Euphrates.

ARTAXERX'ES (mighty warrior, or king).—1. A name borne by a king of Persia (Ezra iv. 8, 11, 23). If the part of the book of Ezra in which this king is mentioned be chronologically in its place, Artaxerxes must be the Pseudo-Smerdis. See, however, AHASUERUS, 1. If Lord A. C. Hervey's theory be well grounded, this Artaxerxes will be Longimanus.—2. Another Artaxerxes is recorded as having, in the seventh year of his reign, commissioned Ezra to return to Jerusalem, giving him, and those who accompanied him, large privileges (Ezra vii. viii. 1). Ezra and Nehemiah were contemporary, the one charged with an ecclesiastical administration, the other a civil governor: we may, therefore, fairly conclude that it was the same Artaxerxes who in his twentieth year sent his cup-bearer Nehemiah into Judea (Neh. ii. 1); and that the Artaxerxes of Nehemiah is Longimanus is evident from the length given of his reign (v. 14, xiii. 6); for Xerxes, whom some suppose to have commissioned Ezra, reigned not more than 21 years. If we were to believe that Xerxes sent Ezra, and Artaxerxes Longimanus Nehemiah, there would be a distance of 33 years between their respective arrivals at Jerusalem. And this we cannot reasonably allow. It is more difficult to say who was the king meant in Ezra vi. 14, but perhaps he also was Longimanus.

AR'TEMAS (complete, or perhaps a contracted form of Artemidorus, the gift of Artemis, i. e. Diana). A companion of St. Paul (Tit. iii. 12).

ARTS. From their long residence in Egypt, the Hebrews must have acquired some knowledge of the arts practised by the Egyptians—more especially as they were employed as mechanics in certain of the works for which Egypt has been celebrated (Exod. i. 11). With architecture they must have been acquainted; and, when the tabernacle was to be constructed, we read that there were carvers, goldsmiths, engravers, embroiderers, dyers, &c., ready for the special requirements of their respective crafts. But the arts could not have been much cultivated in the Hebrew commonwealth; for, at a later period, we find artificers procured from Tyre (1 Kings v. 6, vii. 13). Many arts must have been carried to great perfection in Assyria (Ezek. xxiii. 12, 14, 15). See HANDICRAFT.

ARUB'OTH (windows, flood-gates). One of Solomon's commissariat districts, possibly in Judah (1 Kings iv. 10).

ARUMAH (elevated). A city apparently near Shechen. (Judges ix. 41): it is, perhaps, the same with Rumah (2 Kings xxiii. 36).

ARVAD (wandering, place of fugitives). A place belonging to Phœnicia, the inhabitants of which are mentioned as mariners contributing to the defence of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 8, 11). It is a small rocky island, (Aradus) off the north coast of Phœnicia, about two miles from the continent, opposite Antaradus, a little above the mouth of the Eleutherus, now Nahr-el-Kebir. The island is still inhabited by about 3,000 people, 'living by fishery and navigation, and preserving the traditional skill of drawing fresh water from submarine sources; whilst the name of the village, Ruad, recalls the original name; and the massive Phœnician walls, partly preserved in different points, bespeak its ancient power and magnificence.' Kalisch, Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., p. 273.

AR'ZA (earth). The steward of king Elah's house (1 Kings xvi. 9).

A'SA (physician).—1. The son and successor of Abijah, king of Judah, 955-914 B.C. His own mother was probably dead when he began his reign; consequently his grandmother Maachah continued to occupy the station of queen-mother. The first ten years of his reign he was unmolested, probably the consequence of the great victory his father had gained over Jeroboam. He set himself, therefore, to strengthen his kingdom by fortifying various cities, and by augmenting his army. Perhaps also he then commenced some of those religious reforms which he afterwards more fully carried out. But at length he was attacked by Zerah, king of Ethiopia, supposed to be Osorkon I., 2nd sovereign of the 22nd Egyptian dynasty, who advanced with a million of men to Mareshah. Asa besought God for help, and met and entirely defeated this mighty host, returning to Jerusalem enriched with plunder. He was welcomed by the prophet Azariah, son of Oded, who encouraged him to zealous exertions in Jehovah's service. Accordingly, Asa carried on his reforms very vigorously, rooted out abominations, and renewed the altar which was 'before the porch of the Lord,' which, we may suppose, had been desecrated, or fallen to decay. He destroyed also the high places of idol worship, though some appear to have remained—those, at least, where sacrifice was offered to Jehovah—and brought into the temple many things that both his father and himself had dedicated. And, because the influence of the queen-mother was exerted for evil, Asa did not spare her: he removed her from her eminent rank, burnt the symbol of her idolatry, and cast the ashes of it into the brook Kidron. So great was now his reputation for prosperity and godliness, that many out of Ephraim and Manasseh resorted to him; and he had possession of certain cities in mount Ephraim (1 Kings xv. 8-15; 2 Chron. xiv. xv). There was then peace till Asa's five-and-twentieth year (xv. 19), not the five-and-twentieth year of his reign, but after the disruption of Rehoboam's kingdom. Baasha, king of Israel, was alarmed at the drain from his dominions: to check it, therefore, he began to fortify Ramah, a Benjamite town, when Asa, in great consternation (Jer. xli. 9) sent large presents to Ben-hadad I., king of Syria, to induce him to attack Baasha. Ben-hadad fell upon the northern districts of Israel, and effectually stopped Baasha's project; so that Asa, seizing the materials that were at Ramah, fortified Geba and Mizpah with them (1 Kings xv. 16-22; 2 Chron. xvi. 1-6). But the prophet Hanani was sent to reprove the king for his seeking help from Syria, instead of relying, as he had done in the war with Zerah, upon God. Asa was not disposed to bear this reproof: he put Hanani in prison, and seems to have resorted to some other acts of arbitrary power (7-10). We read little more of him: in his latter years he was diseased in his feet; and it is said, 'in his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians.' But, when he died, he was lamented by his people, who 'made a very great burning for him' (2 Kings xv. 23, 24; 2 Chron. xvi. 11-14).—2. A Levite (1 Chron. ix. 16).

A'SAEL (Tob. i. 1).

ASAH'EL (whom God made).—1. The nephew of David, son of his sister Zeruah, and brother of Joab and Abishai. He was fleet of foot, and pursued Abner so keenly after a skirmish, that that warrior was reluctantly compelled, in self-defence, to kill him (2 Sam. ii. 18-32, iii. 27, 30, xxiii. 24; 1 Chron. xi. 26, xxvii. 27).—2. A Levite (2 Chron. xvii. 8).—3. Another Levite (xxx. 13).—4. Father of a person employed with Ezra (Ezra x. 15).

ASAHI'AH (whom Jehovah made). An officer of king Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 12, 14); he is also called Asaiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 20), which is the same name.

ASAIAH (id.).—1. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 36).—2. A Levite (vi. 30).—3. One of Judah's posterity (ix. 5).—4. A Levite of the family of Merar (xv. 6, 11).—5. See ASAIAH.

AS'ANA (1 Esdr. v. 31). A form of Asnah (Esra ii. 50).

A'SAPH (collector).—1. The father of Joah, recorder to king Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 18, 37; Isai. xxxvi. 3, 22).—2. A Levite musician, one of the leaders of the singers in the reign of David (1 Chron. vi. 39). He is called a 'seer,' and is said to have composed several of the Psalms; of which 1. and lxiii.—lxxxiii. are in the titles attributed to him; several of these must, however, be of later date than the times of David. His descendants, or a school of musicians founded by him, are called sons of Asaph; and some of these returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Esra ii. 41; Neh. vii. 44). We often find Asaph spoken of in later ages with distinction (2 Chron. xxix. 30; Neh. xii. 46).—3. The keeper of the king's forest to Artaxerxes (ii. 8).—4. A Levite (xi. 17).

ASAR'EEL (whom God hath bound, sc. by a vow). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 16).

ASARE'LAH (upright towards God). A musician (1 Chron. xxv. 2). In 14 he is called Jesharelah.

AS'ARITES. See ATARITES.

AS'CALON (1 Macc. x. 86). See ASHKELON.

ASCENSION. The glorious return of the Son of God, clothed in that assumed nature in which he had achieved the perfect triumph of humanity over every foe, to his Father's throne, there to sit till all things shall be subdued beneath his feet (Acts. i. 1-12). This the utterances of the ancient seers predicted (Psal. xxiv. 7-10, lxviii. 18). This our Lord himself pre-signified, as he taught in Capernaum (John vi. 62), and more fully announced to the apostles, as necessary for the establishment of the gospel dispensation, by the bestowal of the Spirit (xvi. 7-12, 28). As our Mediator and Forerunner hath Christ ascended (Heb. iv. 14, vi. 20, ix. 24-28), a fact of unspeakable consolation to the humble believer, and a continued admonition for him while on earth to set his affections on things above (Col. iii. 1, 2). Our Lord's words to Mary Magdalene in reference to his ascension (John xx. 17) have caused some difficulty. We must certainly understand by them a change in the kind of intercourse between him and his most attached followers. Love must not now be shown by earthly gestures; but yet there was also, as the reason of the prohibition, a cheering intimation, that a closer intercourse should, in its due time, be enjoyed; the love of his beloved ones being exalted and intensified into the pure spiritual touch of heaven. See Ellicott, Hist. Lect., p. 387.

AŠEB'A (1 Esdr. viii. 48). Hashabtah (Esra viii. 19).

AS'ENATH (she is of Neith, the Egyptian Minerva?). The daughter of Poti-pherah, priest or prince of On, given in marriage to Joseph by the king of Egypt (Gen. xli. 45, 50, xlvi. 20).

A'SER (Luke ii. 36). The Greek form of ASHER, which see.

AS'ERER (1 Esdr. v. 32). A form of Siserā (Esra ii. 53).

ASH (Job. ix. 9, marg.). See ARCTURUS.

A'SHAN (smoke). A city in the plain, at first assigned to Judah (Josh. xv. 42), but afterwards to Simeon (xix. 7; 1 Chron. iv. 32). It was given to the priests (vi. 59; comp. Josh. xxi. 16, where we find Ain instead of Ashan). It may be the Chorashan of 1 Sam. xxx. 30.

ASH'BEA (I adjure). A name in the genealogical lists of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 21).

ASH'BEL (determination of God, or fire of Baal?). One of the sons of Benjamin (Gen. xlv. 21; Numb. xxvi. 38; 1 Chron. viii. 1).

ASH'CHENAZ (1 Chron. i. 6; Jer. li. 27). See ASHKENAZ.

ASH'DOD (a strong-hold, castle). One of the five principal cities of the Philistines, originally assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 46, 47), but which does not appear to have been occupied by them (xi. 22; Judges iii. 3). It was there specially that the worship of Dagon was celebrated; for to Ashdod first the ark of God was carried and placed in Dagon's temple (1 Sam. v.). Uzziah dismantled it, and built some fortresses in the neighbourhood; but as late as Nehemiah's time it retained its peculiar language (Neh. xlii. 23, 24). Ashdod stood about 3 miles from the Mediterranean, midway between Joppa and Gaza, on the great high road from Egypt into Palestine. It was hence a place of importance, and was frequently besieged. Tartan, sent by Sargon, king of Assyria, attacked and took it (Isai. xx. 1); it underwent a long siege by Psammetichus, king of Egypt (possibly alluded to in Jer. xxv. 30). It is threatened (Amos i. 8, iii. 9; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 6): it was destroyed by the Maccabees (1 Macc. v. 63, x. 84), and was known in New Testament times as Azotus (Acts viii. 40). It is now an insignificant village, called Esdud.

ASH'DODITES (Neh. iv. 7), and ASH'DOTHITES (Josh. xiii. 3). Inhabitants of Ashdod.

ASH'DOTH PIS'GAH (out-pourings, i.e. ravines of Pisgah). Probably a district along the base of mount Pisgah, defining the territory of Reuben and Gad (Deut. iii. 17, iv. 49, where our translation gives 'springs of Pisgah'; Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 20).

ASH'ER (happy). One of the sons of Jacob by Zilpah, Leah's maid, so called because Leah considered herself happy at his birth (Gen. xxx. 12, 13). We know nothing of the personal history of this patriarch, further than that he had four sons and a daughter. Two grandsons are also mentioned (xlv. 17). Probably one of the sons, Ishuah, died without posterity; as, when the families of the tribe are enumerated (Numb. xxvi. 44, 45), they are but five, three from the sons, two from the grandsons. Jacob's prophetic blessing upon Asher is brief and expressive (Gen. xlix. 20), indicating the rich fruitfulness of his settlements. This tribe multiplied fast. At the first census they numbered 41,500 males fit for war (Numb. i. 40, 41), at the second 53,400 (xxvi. 47). The blessing of Moses on Asher was an amplification of that of Jacob. He was to be increased with children: the tribe was already numerous. He was to be acceptable to his brethren, dipping his foot in oil: the fruitfulness of his territory would render his descendants wealthy, so that they would be accounted by the rest of the nation as adding to the general welfare. His shoes were to be iron and brass: the mountains which closed in the district to the north were like iron or brazen walls; or perhaps, as some think, there may be a reference to the Phœnician metallic manufactures. As his days, so his rest was to be: his condition of rest or prosperity would be continued (Deut. xxxiii. 24, 25). The territory of Asher was in the north-western part of Palestine, reaching to the Mediterranean on the west, on the north bounded by Lebanon and Syria, on the east by Naphtali, on the south by Zebulun. Dr. Thomson reckons it at 60 miles in length with a mean breadth of 10 or 12 (The Land and the Book, p. 311). A particular description of it is given in Josh. xix. 24-31; but, as several of the places mentioned have not been identified, it is not possible to trace the frontier with precision. The coast line seems to have extended from the Shihor-Libnath (perhaps the Zerka) at least to Achzib, now Es-Zib. This territory, therefore, enclosing Tyre, reached northwards to Sidon. But the tribe did not conquer the whole of the portion allotted to it (Judges i. 31, 32): it probably enjoyed the advantages of the Phœnician commerce, and, satisfied with the fruitfulness of its own soil, it took little part in the troubles which distracted the more southern tribes. It did not even share with Zebulun and Naphtali in the victory over Jabin, but remained secure from molestation in its creeks, where the chariots of Sisera could not penetrate. Most likely the Asherites were infected with the idolatry of their Phœnician neighbours. The population seems gradually to have decreased. In the list of 1 Chron. vii. 30-40, the fighting men were but 26,000. Asher is not mentioned in the distribution of governments by David (xxvii. 16-22). And, though many of Asher came to Jerusalem at the call of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx. 11), yet their country must have been overrun successively by the Assyrian and Babylonian conquerors. No judge or eminent man is named of this tribe: the prophetess Anna, however, was an Asherite (Luke ii. 36).

ASH'ER (id.). A place on the border of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 7). The hamlet of Teyâsir may perhaps represent it.

ASHE'RAH (fortune, happiness, possibly straight). This word is rendered in our translation 'grove,' which it is clear must be an error (2 Kings xvii. 10). It appears to mean the symbol or image of the goddess Ashtoreth (xxi. 7, xxiii. 6), and was certainly made of wood, as it is described as cut down (Judges vi. 25, 26, 29, 30; 2 Kings xxiii. 14) and burnt. In shape it was probably a large pillar, planted or fixed in the ground. We find continual reference to these images from the time when the Israelites left Egypt (Exod. xxxiv. 13 and elsewhere). See ASHTOREH. ASH'ERITES (Judges i. 32). The descendants or tribe of Asher.

ASHES. After sacrifices had been offered on the altar of burnt-offering, they were, from time to time, to be collected and removed (Lev. vi. 10, 11). For this purpose, shovels and ash-pans were provided (Exod. xxvii. 3, xxxviii. 3). According to the Talmud, the priests undertook the service of removal by lot. On the great festivals, however, they remained till the following morning. The ashes which gradually accumulated from the altar of incense were similarly taken away by priests chosen by lot. From the ashes of the red heifer put into water a kind of lye was made, which was used for purification (Numb. xix.). We find another use of ashes mentioned. Persons in deep affliction, or intending to show their penitence for sin, put ashes on their head, or sat or sometimes rolled themselves in ashes (2 Sam. xiii. 19; Job xlii. 6; Matt. xi. 21).

ASH'IMA (a goat with short hair, otherwise heaven?). A deity worshipped by the men of Hamath (2 Kings xvii. 30), respecting which there are a variety of notions. It has been supposed to be the Phœnician Esmûn, the Greek Æsculapius. Other conjectures may be seen in Winer, Bibl. RWE., art. 'Asima.'

ASH'KELON, AS'KELON (migration?). One of the five cities of the Philistines, on the shore of the Mediterranean, between Gaza and Ashdod. It lay off the great road from Egypt, and was consequently of small importance in biblical history, and apparently little known. The exploit of Samson there is almost the only event noted as connected with it (Judges xiv. 19). It is also called Askelon (i. 18; 1 Sam. vi. 17; 2 Sam. i. 20). In the writings of the prophets this city is occasionally mentioned (Jer. xxv. 20, xlvi. 5, 7; Amos i. 8; Zeph. ii. 4, 7; Zech. ix. 5). In later times it was a place of importance, celebrated for the worship of Derceto, the Syrian Venus; and was of note in the Crusades; but now it presents only a mass of ruins, surrounded by an amphitheatre of rock. It is called El Jore; but the name Askelon is not quite forgotten. Orchards are still filled with fruit there, and produce figs and excellent apples; but see APPLE. The 'eschalot' or 'shallot,' it may be added, a kind of onion, was first brought from Ashkelon, whence it derives its name.

ASH'KENAZ (the meaning is uncertain). A son of Gomer, of the family of Japheth (Gen. x. 3), called also Ashchenaz (1 Chron. i. 6; Jer. li. 27). As the name is coupled with Ararat and Minni, the original seat of the descendants of Ashkenaz must have been in the neighbourhood of Armenia or the Caspian. Kalisch identifies it with the ancient city Rhagæ, in the eastern part of Great Media, a day's journey south of the Caspian. The ruins of this city exist at Rhey, not far from Teheran. The surrounding territory is high and cold (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 237, 238). Other conjectures would place Ashkenaz nearer to the Euxine, where places with some resemblance of name are found. The Jewish rabbis identify it with Germany.

ASH'NAH (the strong, fortified).—1. A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 33).—2. Another town in the same plain, probably to the south of the former (xv. 43).

ASH'PENAZ (possibly horse's nose). The master of Nebuchadnezzar's eunuchs (Dan. i. 3).

ASH'RIEL (vow of God). See ASRIEL.

ASHTA'ROTH (statues of Astarte?). A city, probably so called from the worship of Astarte there. It was one of the chief places in the dominions of Og, and was afterwards in the territory of the eastern Manassites (Josh. ix. 10, xii. 4, xiii. 12, 31). It is said to have been assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Chron. vi. 71); but elsewhere (Josh. xxi. 27) Beeshterah is mentioned: this, however, is probably only a variation of the name. See BESHTERAH. Ashtaroth is also called Astaroth (Deut. i. 4). See ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

ASHTA'ROTH (Judges ii. 13, x. 6; 1 Sam. vii. 3, 4, xii. 10, xxxi. 10). The plural of Ashtoreth, or statues of that goddess.

ASHTERA'THITE. The designation of one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 44), probably a native of ASH'TEROTH-KARNA'IM (Ashteroth of the two horns, horned Astarte). A place which was the abode of the Rephaim in the time of Chedor-laomer (Gen. xiv. 5). It is often supposed that it is identical with Ashtaroth; but there are reasons for questioning this. Ashteroth-Karnaim is doubtless the Carnaim or Carnion of Maccabean history.

ASHTO'RETH (star, the star Venus?). The principal female deity of the Phœnicians, as Baal was the chief god. The names of the two are frequently conjoined. The plural number of this word sometimes occurs: it possibly means images of the goddess, or it may imply that she was worshipped at different places under some different aspects or modifications. For, when it is intended to point out the special goddess of one place or people, the word is singular (1 Kings xi. 5, 33; 2 Kings xxiii. 13); as there are different ideas and different appellations of the Virgin Mary in the different churches where she is specially honoured; as 'our Lady of Loretto,' &c. The plural will therefore signify the Ashtoreths, and its use is easily to be explained. The Israelites did not select one particular form, which would have required the singular expression: they sought after the divinities, one and the same in themselves, of the different cities with which they came into contact. Ashtoreth, or Astarte, has been believed to be the moon-goddess, embodying the idea of productive power. She has also been identified with the Assyrian divinity Ishtar, who represented the planet Venus. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 123, considers that 'both the moon and the planet were looked upon as symbols, under different aspects and perhaps at different periods, of the goddess, just as each of them may in different aspects of the heavens be regarded as the "queen of heaven."' The worship was most likely identical with that of Venus. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Astarte'; Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., 1 Kings xi. 5-8, vol. i. pp. 188-190.

ASH-TREE. A tree mentioned only once (Isai. xlii. 14). It is not easy to say precisely what kind is intended. It may be the ash; it has also been supposed a thorny tree which grows in Arabia and produces bitter berries. But perhaps it is more reasonable, with ancient interpreters, to believe it a species of pine.

ASH'UR (blackness, black). One of the descendants of Judah, called the 'father,' i. e. builder or settler, of Tekoa (1 Chron. ii. 24, iv. 5).

ASH'URITES. A tribe mentioned as under the authority of Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. ii. 9). It is questionable who were intended. Some have imagined Geshurites; but they were certainly independent in the time of David (iii. 3, xiii. 37, 38). It is more likely that the Asherites, or children of Asher, are meant: a slight alteration of the original word, supported by manuscript authority, gives this meaning. The word occurs in our version of Ezek. xxvii. 6; but the rendering cannot be defended. See Henderson's Ezekiel, note on the place.

ASH'VATH (fabricated). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 33).

A'SIA. This word never occurs in scripture with the large meaning which we assign to it. In the Old Testament it is not found: in the New Testament it means the Roman province so called. Previously it was variously used. Thus Antiochus the Great is termed king of Asia (1 Macc. viii. 6), because his dominions included, besides Syria, the greater part of Asia Minor. And this title was given to several Syrian kings (xi. 13, xii. 39, xiii. 32; 2 Macc. iii. 3). The king of Pergamos appears also to have had it. Attalus III., sovereign of this country, left his dominions to the Romans, 133 B.C.; and then Asia became a Roman province. Its boundaries were from time to time changed; but generally it may be said to have comprised Phrygia, Mysia, Lydia, and Caria; and thus it must be understood in Acts vi. 9, xix. 10). Sometimes, however, the name is used in a more restricted sense; and Phrygia is distinguished from Asia (ii. 9, 10, xvi. 6). Asia was made by Augustus one of the senatorial provinces, and was governed, therefore, by a proconsul. It prospered under the emperors; and the gospel was propagated there by St. Paul (xix. 10; 1 Cor. xvi. 19). The seven cities, to the churches in which the apocalyptic epistles were written, were in Asia.

ASIAR'CHE. These are called in our version 'the chief of Asia' (Acts xix. 31). The Asiarchs were officers annually chosen by certain cities of proconsular Asia. They defrayed the expense of the games and spectacles; and their functions were, in a great measure, religious. They are thought after having once held the office to have retained the title. There were analogous names of similar officers in other provinces. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Asiarchen.'

ASIB'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 26).

A'SIEL (created of God). A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 35).

A'SIEL (2 Esdr. xiv. 24).
AS'IPHA (1 Esdr. v. 29). A form of Hapsupha (Ezra ii. 43).

AS'KELON (migration?) (Judges i. 18; 1
 Sam. vi. 17; 2 Sam. i. 20). See ASHKELON.

ASMODE'US (Tob. iii. 8). An evil spirit of whom various fanciful stories are related by the Jewish rabbins. See Wiener, Bibl.
RWB., art. 'Asmodi.'

ASMONE'ANS. See MACCABEES.

AS'NAH (thorn-bush, or, perhaps, store- house). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 50).

ASNAP'PER (perhaps leader of an army, or swift?). An Assyrian king or satrap who planted various bodies of colonists in Samaria (Ezra iv. 10). It is often supposed that this was another name of Esar-haddon
 (2); but we can merely conjecture.

A'SOM (1 Esdr. ix. 33). A form of Hashum (Ezra x. 33).

 xi. 8; Rom. iii. 13). See ADDER, SERPENT.

ASPAL'ATHUS (Ecclus. xxiv. 15). Probably some kind of spice. The Vulgate renders it balsamum aromatizans, i.e. balm.

ASPA'THA (perhaps from the Sanscrit, given by the horse, i.e. by Bramah in the form of a orse). The third son of Haman

AS'PHAR (1 Macc. ix. 33).

ASPHAR'ASUS (1 Esdr. v. 8). A form of Mispur (Ezra ii. 2).

AS'RIEL (vow of God). A son of Manasseh (Numb. xxvi. 31; Josh. xvii. 2); he is also called Ashriel (1 Chron. vii. 14).

AS'RIELITES. A family of Manasseh, descended from Asriel (Numb. xxvi. 31).

ASS. Several words are used in scripture to denote this useful animal. Athon is a she-ass: the word implies slow motion, and occurs in Gen. xii. 16, xxxii. 16; Numb. xxii.
 23. Some so designated may have been of a special breed and superior growth, hence selected for riding. For this word is used for the animal on which distinguished persons rode (Judg. v. 10); where the adjunct means a light reddish colour; actually white asses being very rarely found. Hhamor is believed to imply a reddish colour, and is the common term for a male ass (Gen. xii.
 16, xxiv. 35; Exod. xiii. 13). 'A'ir is derived from a root denoting heat, perhaps heat of running, so that the idea of swiftness may be implied. This word is used for an ass's colt, or a young well-grown male ass (Judges x. 4, xii. 14). There are two Greek words occurring in the New Testament for ass (Matt. xxi. 2, 5). All these names denote the domestic ass, employed by the Israelites as a beast of burden, for ploughing and for riding. Properly tended it is strong and active, and is held in much estimation in the east. It is worthy of remark that an ass and an ox were not to be put to plough together (Deut. xxii.
 10). Two words are used for the wild ass, 'arod and pèrè. They both occur in Job xxxix. 5. Some have imagined the two identical, each word implying swiftness; but perhaps two distinct species are meant (Asinus hemippus and Asinus onager?), though we can hardly identify them with precision. See a good account of the wild

ASSABTAS (1 Esdr. i. 9).

ASSAL'IMOTH (1 Esdr. viii. 36). Perhaps a form of Shelomith (Ezra viii. 10).

ASSAN'AS (1 Esdr. viii. 54). A form of Hashabiah (Ezra viii. 24).

AS'SHUR (a step). One of the sons of Shem (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chron. i. 17). His descendants peopled the land of ASSYRIA, which see. The same original word is generally translated 'Assyria;' though, in Gen.
 x. 11, it appears as if it were the name of a person: the verse should be rendered as in the margin: 'he went out into Assyria.'

ASSHU'RIM (steps). Descendants of De-dan; probably an Arabian tribe (Gen. xxv.
 3); they have been thought the same with the Ashurites (2 Sam. iii. 3) in the vicinity of Gilead. See ASHURITES.

ASSIDE'ANS (1 Macc. ii. 42, vii. 13, 2 Macc. xiv. 6). A name given to the more orthodox party among the Jews in Maccabean times. See Prideaux, Connection, vol.
 ii. p. 159, for an account of them.

AS'SIR (captive). 1. A Levite, son of Korah (Exod. vi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 22).—2. A descendant of David (iii. 17).—3. A descendant of Korah (vi. 23, 37).

AS'SOS. A sea-port in Mysia or Troas, over-against the island of Lesbos, twenty-four miles from the town of Troas. St. Paul, on his journey to Jerusalem, let the vessel go round, while he crossed by land from Troas and again embarked at Assos (Acts xx. 13, 14).

ASSUE'RUS (Tob. xiv. 15).

AS'SUR (Ezra iv. 2; Psal. lxxxiii. 8). See
ASSYRIA.

AS'SUR (1 Esdr. v. 31).

ASSURANCE. There is an 'assurance of understanding' (Col. ii. 2), a complete or perfect understanding; an 'assurance of hope' (Heb. vi. 11), that unmoved hope for which Christians were diligently to strive; an 'assurance of faith' (x. 22), a certainty of access to God by the new and living way, by the blood of Jesus. It is also said that the gospel came to the Thessalonians 'not in word only, but . . . in much assurance'
 (1 Thess. i. 5), assurance possibly of faith, being really accepted and laid hold of. The original Greek word is the same in all these passages. The term 'assurance' has come theologially to signify the certainty an individual entertains of his own salvation. It is not the place to enquire here whether or no scripture authorizes a man to entertain such assurance; but it is evident that the passages above referred to do not bear upon the question.

ASSYR'IA. One of the great monarchies of the ancient world. It exercised a powerful influence upon the Israelites, and is frequently alluded to in the sacred history, and in the writings of the Hebrew prophets. The name occurs first in our version as the equivalent of Asshur (Gen. ii. 14
 xxv. 18), and may be considered as applying both to a defined region, properly denominated Assyria, and to the empire enlarged and consolidated by the subjection of neighbouring districts, over which the king of Assyria had rule. The term is also applied, after the fall of the original state, to those kingdoms which succeeded, and which comprised countries formerly obedient to the Assyrian sceptre.

It is not easy to describe accurately the boundaries of Assyria properly so called. They have probably varied at different times. But it may be said generally that, at first but a small district, it afterwards comprised the region between the Tigris on the west and south-west, and the mountains of Kurdistan on the east. In the north it extended to the mountain-range of Armenia, probably including some districts of Mesopotamia north-west of the Tigris: to the south and south-east, it bordered on Babylonia and Susiana. This territory has been estimated at from 300 to 400 miles in length, with an average breadth of 150. Rawlinson computes the length diagonally from Diabekr to the alluvium of the lower valley, the point of separation from Babylonia, at 350 miles, the breadth from the Euphrates to the mountain-chain of Zagros as varying from 300 to 170 miles, comprising about 75,000 square miles. (Five Great Monarchies, Assyria, vol. i. chap. i. pp. 226, 227.) Some would make it larger, and give it a superficial area of about 100,000 square miles. Media, it will be seen, lay to the eastward of Assyria beyond the mountains of Kurdistan; and Persia extended far away to the south-east. This country contained many great cities, of which the most renowned was Nineveh. It presents in different parts a varied aspect. Lower ranges of hills on the north and north-east adjoin the chains of Armenia and Kurdistan: undulating districts succeed, sinking down into the great Mesopotamian flat, intersected by the beautiful limestone ridge of the Sinjar. The tracts on the right bank of the Tigris are almost desert; those on the left eastward are well-watered and more fertile; and there are still evident traces of ancient cultivation and prosperity (see Rawlinson, ibid. pp. 225-264).

Of the early history of Assyria little can be said. Profane historians differ; and scripture gives but scanty information; neither do the deciphered inscriptions carry us very far. We may, however, perceive that Babylon is older than Nineveh; that Babylon was the beginning of Nimrod's empire; but that, not content with the settlements he had acquired, he invaded the country called Asshur from the son of Shem, and there founded cities afterwards most famous (Gen. x. 8-12). So far the sacred record would seem to teach us. But it mentions no early Assyrian kingdom. And indeed there are incidental notices which seem inconsistent with the notion that such a kingdom subsisted. Thus certain eastern monarchs are named (Gen. xiv. 1, 9) as pushing their conquests westwards; but there is no record of an Assyrian king among them. In the times of the early judges, Chushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, subjected Israel (Judges iii. 8, 10): Mesopotamia, then, was not at that time overshadowed by the Assyrian power. Again, David and Solomon ruled over an extended empire: their authority reached to the Euphrates (2 Sam. viii. 3, x. 16-19, 1 Kings iv. 21, 24); and yet they never came into any collision with Assyria. It is a reasonable inference that it was not till later times that there was any formidable Assyrian monarchy, extending its sway over the neighbouring nations. Not till the reign of the Israelitish king Menahem do we find the scripture records noticing the growth of the Assyrian empire.

The following is a list of the kings whom the sacred writers mention. Their names only and approximate dates (according to Kalisch) are supplied here: more detailed accounts will be given of them in the articles under their respective names:—

B.C.

770. Pul (2 Kings xv. 19, 20; 1 Chron. v. 26).
 740. Tiglath-Pileser, or Tilgath-Pilneser (2 Kings xv. 29, xvi. 10; 1 Chron. v. 26; 2 Chron. xxviii. 16, 20).
 720. Shalmaneser (2 Kings xvii. 3-6, xviii. 9-12).
 717. Sargon, whose general was Tartan (Isa. xx. 1).
 712. Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii. 13—xix. 37; Isa. xxxvi., xxxvii.).
 696. Esar-Haddon (2 Kings xix. 37; Ezra iv. 2; Isa. xxxvii. 38).

These appear to form a connected series of kings. The names of nearly all of them are found in the Assyrian inscriptions. It may be desirable to give a list of the monarchs as preserved in those inscriptions. It must, however, be understood, that a great deal of uncertainty hangs over the history derived from monumental records. Names vary much; while corrections and additions are frequently made by those who are investigating them; so that at present they must be regarded as supplying merely the rough materials of history. The subjoined list is greatly abbreviated from that given by Dr. Kalisch (Comm. on the Old Test Gen., pp. 290-292).

B.C.

- 1250 (about). Derceto.
 1200. Divanukha (or Divanurish).
 1150. Tiglath-Pileser I. He was defeated by the Chaldean king Merodach-adan-akhi.
 1130. Anakbar-beth-hira (or Shimishbel-Bithkira).
 1050. Mardokempad (Mesessimordacus).
 1000. Adrammelech I.
 960. Anaku-Merodach (or Shimish Bar).
 930. Asshur-uchar-bal (or Asshur-akh-pal, or Sardanapalus?), the son of the preceding monarch, the builder of the north-west palace at Nimroud: he proceeded into Chaldea beyond Babylon.
 900. Silima-rish (the son of the former; also read Shalinanubar, Temenbar, or Divanubar) fought against Ben-Hadad, who was dethroned (?) like his successor Hazael: he received presents from Jehu, the son (i.e. later successor) of Omri, king of Samaria. He probably founded the central palace of Nimroud. He reigned more than 31 years.
 Anabaraxes.

865. Shamas-adar.
840. Adrammelech II. Baldasi. Ashurkish.
800. Shamas-phul, carried on wars against Asia Minor and Babylon: he reigned but 4 years.
774. Phulukh (Pul), invaded Syria, and received tribute from Samaria, Edom, and Philistia, marched against Menahem, king of Israel, and against the king of Damascus, which city was taken (in 750). Phulukh invaded Armenia and then Babylon, and received the homage of the Chaldeans.
747. Tiglath-Pileser II., probably an usurper, who dethroned his predecessor. He carried away the tribe of Naphtali, and became the ally of Ahaz against the Syrians (2 Kings xvi.). Among his tributaries were Menahem (Pekah?), king of Samaria, Rezin of Damascus (in 739), Hiram of Tyre, and others. He died in 729.
- 729 to 721. Shalmaneser. His name does not appear on the monuments, which seem to have been mutilated by his successor, Sargon, who usurped the throne. He besieged Samaria unsuccessfully in 724-723.
- 721 to 703. Sargon took Samaria in 721, and carried away many Israelites into Assyria. He waged war with Merodach-Baladan, king of Babylon, with Susiana, Armenia, and Media, with Carchemish, Hamath, and Damascus, with Ashdod, Jabneh, Gaza, and with African tribes: he received tribute from the Pharaoh of Egypt, the queen of the Arabs, and the chief of Sheba: he made also an expedition to Cyprus. He built the greater part of the palaces at Nimroud.
- 703 to 680. Sennacherib, or Sanherib, founded the palace at Kouyunjik. He subdued Merodach-Baladan, who had recovered Babylon, and took all the Chaldean towns. In the third year of his reign he crossed the Euphrates, attacked the Syrians (Hittites), defeated the kings of Tyre and Sidon, and took many towns on the sea-coast. The people of Ekron had dethroned their king, Padiya, an Assyrian vassal, and delivered him to Hezekiah, king of Judah. Tirhakah, king of Egypt, sent an army into Judea; but Sennacherib defeated it, restored Padiya to his throne, took 46 cities and fortresses, and imposed a tribute on Hezekiah, carrying off many captives. He undertook another expedition against Merodach, and made his son ruler over Babylon, whence he returned with rich spoil, which he employed mainly in the erection of temples and palaces at Nineveh. At last he was murdered by his sons.
680. Esar-Haddon, also his son, waged war against Phœnicia, Syria, Asia Minor, Armenia, Media, Susiana, and Babylonia, sent a queen to rule over the Arabs of Edom, made an expedition into Africa, and was, therefore, called the 'conqueror of Egypt and Ethiopia.'

660. Asshur-bani-bal (Sardanapalus III.), his son, undertook a campaign against Susiana and Elam, and added a second palace at Kouyunjik.
630. Asshur-ebid-ilut. He was probably the last Assyrian king; for Cyaxares, king of Media, and Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, destroyed Nineveh in 625.

We can rely but little on the accounts given by secular historians. They are both fragmentary and contradictory. Otesias carries the origin of the empire to a very early date; while Herodotus places it comparatively late. A king, Sardanapalus, is mentioned, devoted to luxurious indulgence. A rebellion was organized, which he was unable to suppress; and, being besieged in Nineveh with no hope of relief, he set fire to his palace, and perished with his wives and treasures in the conflagration. The first Assyrian empire was thus dissolved; but a second arose, over which Pul, Sennacherib, and others reigned, till it, too, came to an end. Mr. Rawlinson, in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 130, while admitting that some change or revolution occurred, adduces reasons for doubting the asserted dissolution of the empire by the catastrophe of the so-called Sardanapalus. He observes that there is no apparent loss of vigour, that succeeding monarchs were as powerful as any of their predecessors, unsurpassed in authority, wealth, or splendour. The second Assyrian kingdom, therefore, was really greater and more glorious than the first.

Whatever be the obscurities resting on the early rise or later fortunes of this monarchy, we may readily trace in general the Assyrian progress to empire. At first confined within narrow limits, it became at length, by the addition of neighbouring districts, a formidable state. It does not appear that the districts so conquered were absolutely incorporated into a single body. Left under the sway of their own chiefs, who were reduced to vassalage, they continually had or took occasion for revolt. And hence the deportations of captives, to break the independent spirit of feudatory states, and render rebellion more difficult and hopeless. The Assyrian empire, at its widest extent, seems to have reached from the Mediterranean and the river Halys in the west, to the Caspian and the Great Desert in the east, and from the northern frontier of Armenia south to the Persian gulf.

The fortunes of this empire are the more interesting as they are the theme of inspired prophecy. The dark cloud threatening Israel and Judah for their unfaithfulness to God is described in strains of solemn warning. Sometimes 'the nations from far' are spoken of; and their terrific might and mode of warfare are detailed without naming them (Isai. v. 26-30). Sometimes in express words the king of Assyria is said to be summoned as the Lord's executioner, and the desolation he should cause is vividly depicted (viii. 17-25). Samaria would fall; and her fall might well admonish Judah. Judah should deeply suffer. The invader should march through her territory; but the Lord would effectually defend Jerusalem (x. 5-34). Passages from scripture history have already been referred to, showing how exactly these predictions were fulfilled. The Assyrian king, in the might of his power, subjected the ten tribes, and carried multitudes of them into the far east: he passed also like a flood over the country of Judah, taking many of the cities throughout her territory; and in his presumptuous boldness he conceived that no earthly power could resist him, and even defied Jehovah, the God of Jacob. 'But the virgin the daughter of Zion' laughed him to scorn: 'the daughter of Jerusalem' had 'shaken her head' at him. And the firm purpose of the Lord was to defend that city to save it, for his own sake and for his servant David's sake. The catastrophe is related with awful brevity: 'Then the angel of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred and fourscore and five thousand; and, when they arose early in the morning, behold they were all dead corpses' (xxxvii.). There is a trace of some great disaster in Herodotus (lib. ii. 141); but of course the Assyrian inscriptions do not notice it.

The empire attained afterwards probably its greatest power and widest extension. But it was doomed. It was an ungodly empire. And when it had done its work it would perish. He who rules justly in the world would destroy Assyria (which had been long before warned by Jonah), as Assyria had destroyed other kingdoms. Accordingly, in the prophecies of Nahum and Zephaniah, we find denunciations predicting the entire downfall of this haughty power. The language is fearfully precise. Nineveh was to be utterly waste: the Assyrian nobles were to dwell in the dust. And it should be no temporary ruin, to be afterwards repaired. 'The Lord hath given a commandment concerning thee, that no more of thy name be sown. . . . I will make thy grave.' 'There is no healing of thy bruise: thy wound is grievous: all that hear the bruit of thee shall clap the hands over thee.' 'This is the rejoicing city that dwelt carelessly, that said in her heart, I am, and there is none besides me: how is she become a desolation, a place for beasts to lie down in! Every one that passeth by her shall hiss, and wag his hand' (Nah. i., ii., iii.; Zeph. ii. 13-15). We have few details of the result. The work of destruction seems to have been effected by the Medes and Babylonians. Assyria fell, and was never again reckoned among the nations; the very places being for long centuries unknown where her proudest cities had stood. (See, for an interesting account Vance Smith's Prophecies relating to Nineveh and the Assyrians, 1857.)

The excavations which have been so successfully prosecuted have supplied a fund of information as to the manners and habits of the Assyrians. The sovereign was the despotic ruler and the pontiff, and the palaces contained also the temples. With no limitation of the monarch's power, the people were kept in a servile condition; and the usual consequences of such a state of things were visible in their moral degradation. The chief officers of state were eunuchs. The conquered provinces being placed under the authority of dependent princes, insurrections were frequent; and the sovereign was almost always engaged in putting down some struggles for independence. War was waged with ruthless ferocity. Cities were attacked by raising artificial mounds: the besieging armies sheltered themselves behind shields of wicker-work, and battered the defences with rams. In the field they had formidable war-chariots. And the sculptures exhibit the modes of cruelty practised upon those that were subdued. They were flayed, they were impaled: their eyes and tongues were cut out: rings were placed in their lips; and their brains were beaten out with maces (comp. Ezek. xxvi. 7-12).

The Assyrians worshipped a multitude of gods. Asshur (probably the Nisroch of the scriptures, and the eagle-headed deity of the sculptures), was the chief. But there were 4,000 others, presiding over the phenomena of nature and the events of life. Anu is said to have been lord of the mountains, or of foreign countries. Then there were San, Merodach, and Bar, Nebo, Dagon a fish-god, Bel and his consort Mylit, Shamesh and Ishtar (Kalisch, ubi supr. p. 301); but see BABEL, closing part of the article, p. 85.

The architecture of the Assyrians was of a vast and imposing character. But a notice of their buildings will come more properly under the head of NINEVEH, which see. In the fine arts they had made considerable proficiency. Their sculptures are diversified, spirited, and faithful. They had, however, little knowledge of perspective, and did not properly distinguish between the front and the side views of an object. Animals, therefore, were represented with five legs; and sometimes two horses had but two fore-legs. The later sculptures are found in advance of the earlier. The Assyrians were skilled in engraving even the hardest substances. They were familiar with metallurgy, and manufactured glass and enamels: they carved ivory, and varnished and painted pottery. They indulged in the luxuries of life. Men wore bracelets, chains, and ear-rings, flowing robes, ornamented with emblematic devices wrought in gold and silver: they had long-fringed scarves and embroidered girdles. The vestments of officials were generally symbolical: the head-dress was characteristic; and the king alone wore the pointed tiara. The beard and hair were carefully arranged in artificial curls; and the eyebrows and eyelashes were stained black. Of the women there are few representations. The weapons of war were richly ornamented, especially the swords, shields, and quivers. The helmets were of brass, inlaid with copper. The chariots were embellished, and the horses sumptuously caparisoned. Their literature, so far as we at present know, was confined to mere annals, panegyrics on conquerors, and invocations of the gods. Little indeed can be expected from a series of inscriptions, dictated by the ruling powers, who did not hesitate sometimes to falsify the records of their predecessors.

The wealth of Assyria was derived from conquest, from agriculture, for which their country was favourably circumstanced, and from commerce, for which they had peculiar facilities. But these advantages, as they contributed to wealth, fostered luxury, and that corruption, under (as has been observed) a grinding tyranny, which is the sure precursor of an empire's ruin (Kalisch, The Old Test. Gen., pp. 301-303).

ASSYRIANS. The inhabitants of Assyria (Isai. x. 5, 24, and elsewhere).

ASTA'ROTH (images of Asarte). (Deut. 1. 4). See ASHTAROTH.

ASTROLOGERS (Isai. xlvii. 13; Dan. i. 20, ii. 27, iv. 7, v. 7). See DIVINATION.

ASTRONOMY. Asia was probably the cradle of astronomy, in the knowledge of which the Chaldeans are said to have excelled. We have no accounts in scripture of the progress made by the Hebrews in this science. But the starry heavens were naturally the object of admiration; and they saw therein evidence of that mighty hand which had created such wonders (Psal. viii. 3, xix. 1). Names were given to some of the stars (Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 46, vol. ii. pp. 72-74) and the worship paid to them by idolaters is noticed. See STARS.

ASUP'PIM (collections, hence, with 'house,' a storehouse). It is questionable whether this word should be taken as a proper name (1 Chron. xxvi. 15, 17: comp. marg.). In Neh. xii. 25, it is rendered 'thresholds,' and, marg., 'treasuries' or 'assemblies.'

ASYN'CRITUS (incomparable). A Christian at Rome to whom St. Paul sends salutation (Rom. xvi. 14).

ATAD (the southern buckthorn, Christ's thorn). The threshing-floor of Atad was the place where a solemn mourning was made for Jacob, lasting seven days (Gen. l. 10, 11). It was in consequence called ABEL-MIZRAIM, which see.

ATA'RAH (a crown). One of the wives of Jerahmeel, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 26).

ATAW'GATIS (perhaps an opening). A goddess, whose temple at Carnaim or Carnion (Ashteroth-Karnaim) was destroyed by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. v. 43, 44; 2 Macc. xii. 26). She was the Syrian Derceto, represented with the body of a woman and the tail of a fish, and had celebrated temples at Hierapolis and Askelon.

She has been identified with the heavenly Venus and other deities, and seems to have been considered as the cause and generative power producing things from moisture. A singular ceremony was performed in her temple at Hierapolis. Twice a year water, brought from a distance, was poured into a chasm, because it was said the waters of the deluge drained away through that chasm.

AT'ARITES (1 Chron. ii. 54, marg.), in some editions 'Asarites.' This is the marginal variation of ATAROTH, THE HOUSE OF JOAB, which see.

ATA'ROTH (crowns).—1. A town, apparently in Gilead, assigned to and fortified by the Gadites (Numb. xxxii. 3, 34).—2. A town on the border of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 2, 7): it is possibly the same with Ataroth-Addar.

ATA'ROTH-AD'AR (crowns of Addar, or greatness). A place on the border of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 13), which is called also ATA'ROTH-AD'DAR (id.), and marks the border of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 5). It may be the same with Ataroth, 2.

ATA'ROTH, THE HOUSE OF JOAB. This appears in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 54). Nothing certain can be said of it. Perhaps it was a place.

A'TER (shut up, bound, perhaps dumb).—1. A person, termed 'of,' possibly a descendant of, 'Hezekiah,' whose children returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21).—2. Another, whose descendants, called porters, also returned (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).—3. One, perhaps the representative of the posterity of No. 1, who sealed the covenant (x. 17).

ATEREZ'IAS (1 Esdr. v. 15). A corrupted form of Ater of Hezekiah (Ezra ii. 16).

A'THACH (lodging-place). A place in Judah, to the inhabitants of which David sent presents (1 Sam. xxx. 30).

ATHA'IAH (probably the same with Asaiah, whom Jehovah made). A descendant of Judah (Neh. xi. 4).

ATHAL'IAH (whom Jehovah afflicts).—1. The daughter of Ahab by Jezebel. She was married to Jehoram, king of Judah; and, when her son Ahaziah was slain by Jehu, she destroyed the rest of the royal family except Joash, an infant, who was concealed in the temple by his aunt Jehoshabea (most likely not Athaliah's daughter), the wife of Jehoiada the high priest. Athaliah usurped the throne for six years, 884-878 B.C. In the seventh year, Jehoiada resolved to produce the young prince. Accordingly, having concerted measures with the principal officers, Levites, and leading men of the kingdom, and having properly disposed the guard on the appointed day, he presented Joash to the persons assembled, anointed and crowned him, and delivered the testimony, or book of the law, into his hand. The matter had been so well arranged, that Athaliah, probably engaged in her idolatrous worship in the house of Baal, had no intelligence till it was too late. When she heard the shouts of the people, she rushed into the temple, and saw the young king standing by, or perhaps on, a pillar or platform; but he cry of 'treason' only caused her own arrest and deserved execution (2 Kings viii. 18, 26, xi.; 2 Chron. xxii. 2, 10-xxiii. 21, xxiv. 7).—2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 26).—3. One whose son, with many of the same family, returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 7).

ATHAR'AS (1 Esdr. v. 40).

ATHAR'IM (regions). This is the proper name of a place in the south of Palestine, though rendered in our version 'by the way of the spies' (Numb. xxi. 1). Wilton interprets 'the way of the merchants,' i.e. the caravan-road. (The Negeb, p. 129 note).

ATHENIANS. The inhabitants of Athens, whose character is described in Acts xvii. 21, 22.

ATHENO'BIUS (1 Macc. xv. 28, 32, 35).

ATHENS. Little can here be said of this most celebrated city; a full account of which would obviously be out of place in a work like the present. The student will naturally consult books specially treating on classical geography and antiquities.

Athens, the chief town of Attica, was visited by St. Paul on his second missionary journey, after he had been sent away, for safety, from Berea (Acts xvii. 13-15). Athens, in the time of the apostle, was included in the Roman province of Achaia, but was a free city, retaining some of the forms which had belonged to it in its palmy days. The Athenians, curious and inquisitive, as they had ever been, mockingly desired St. Paul to give them some account of the new doctrine he was setting forth. For both in the Jews' synagogue, and also in the agora or market-place, he had disputed with those who came to him, and had preached the gospel of Jesus raised by God's mighty power from the dead.

Within the city were four notable hills, three northwards, forming almost a semi-circle. The Acropolis, or citadel, was the most easterly of these: it was a rock about 150 feet high. Next, westward, was a lower eminence, the Areopagus or Mars' Hill, and then the Pnyx, where the assemblies of the people were held. To the south of these three hills was a fourth, the Museum. The agora lay in the valley between the four. It has been supposed that there were two market-places, but it is now satisfactorily proved that there was but one. The localities, therefore, which Paul frequented, are readily understood. He was taken from the agora, and brought up to the Areopagus, where he delivered his wonderful address (18-31). His preaching made no great impression: the philosophers despised it. Some, however, clave to him; and a Christian community was formed, of which Dionysius the Areopagite (32-34) is said to have been the first bishop.

Athens, situated about five miles from the sea, its port being the Piræus, has been made the capital of the modern kingdom of Greece.

ATH'LAI (whom Jehovah afflicts). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 28).

AT'IPHA (1 Esdr. v. 32). A form of Hatipha (Ezra ii. 54).

ATONEMENT. A certain mode of appeasing anger, and so satisfying for offence committed, as to make those at one who were at variance. In the notion of atonement that of substitution is very commonly implied. It is understood that, if the full penalty of a fault is not exacted, something is offered or something endured instead, in order to pacify and reconcile. In theological speech, atonement has respect to offence committed against the Deity.

Human language is imperfect, and human conceptions are at fault, when applied to the Most High. He is not touched with anger, resentment, &c., in the gross sense in which we commonly use the terms. We have, therefore, to take care that we do not represent him as hard to be mollified, with a thirst of vengeance to be slaked by the suffering of a victim. Nowhere does scripture assert that the Father had a purpose of burning wrath against the world, which was changed by the interposition of the Son, on whom it lighted, so that, satiated by his punishment, he spared mankind. The scripture rather teaches that 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whoso believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life' (John iii. 16). 'God is love' (1 John iv. 16). But God cannot allow sin, which is rebellion against his authority (Habak. ii. 13). It is consequently impossible that he can pass over it. Hence he threatens to visit it with a penalty: 'the soul that sinneth it shall die' (Ezek. xviii. 4). His infinite holiness and justice, and the intrinsic demerit of sin, require this. And therefore 'nothing could render it consistent with the divine glory to pardon and save sinners, which did not exhibit God's justice and holiness in as clear a light in showing them mercy, as these attributes would have appeared in, had he executed the threatened vengeance' (Scott's Essays, Ess. vi.). The proper notion, then, of an atonement, theologically, is that which brings the forgiveness of transgressors into harmony with all the perfections of the Godhead. One of these perfections must not be exalted to the depression of another: all must be equally and fully honoured.

This, devised in the counsels of the eternal Three, was carried forward by the Son of God, who took human flesh, that in the nature that had sinned he might make satisfaction for sin. He made this satisfaction by his obedience unto death, perfectly fulfilling the divine law, for he 'did no sin;' and enduring the penalty of it, for 'his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree' (1 Pet. ii. 22, 24). In such a sacrifice, God's judgment against the evil and desert of sin was most illustriously displayed. As no other sacrifice of like value could be found, proof was given to the universe that sin was the most disastrous evil, and that its 'punishment was not the arbitrary act of an inexorable judge, but the unavoidable result of perfect holiness and justice, even in a Being of infinite mercy' (Scott, ubi supr.).

God's plan was formed from the beginning; and the earlier revelations were intended to prepare the world for the declaration of his righteousness, 'that he might be just and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus' (Rom. iii. 26). Thus the ordinances of the Mosaic law shadowed forth the great work which Christ was to accomplish. When a man had sinned, he was to bring a victim, and lay his hand upon its head, putting upon it, as it were, his sins, which, in some cases, were to be confessed over it; and then the victim, being slain, was offered to the Lord (Lev. i. 2-9, iv. 2-12, xvi. 21). Thus was purification made under the law: 'almost all things are, by the law, purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission' (Heb. ix. 22). The sacrifices of the law, however, 'could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience' (9). They cleansed from ceremonial pollution; but, while they were a means, divinely appointed, of present worship, they were 'a figure,' pre-signifying and pointing to some better sacrifice. And from their virtue, such as it was, the sacred writer takes occasion to argue as to the efficacy of Christ's blood-shedding: 'If the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works, to serve the living God!' (13, 14). Such reasoning would be very inconclusive, if no real atonement were made by Christ, if his death were only an example of obedience to God, a pattern for his servants to follow. It is not enough to reply that the teachers of Christianity adopted the language they found in use among the Jews, without intending to sanction the inference thence yielded that Christ's blood-shedding was a satisfaction for sin. For, in that case, they would advisedly have spoken in a way likely to mislead those whom they addressed. And, besides, the terms of the introductory covenant would, on such a supposition, have been more precise than those of the evangelical dispensation, which it was the great object of revelation to unfold to the world—that is to say, more pains would have been bestowed on the temporary scaffolding than on the permanent structure. It must, then, be admitted that the argument fairly holds from the preparatory typical rites to the actual completed work; and that argument is most weighty for the doctrine of the reality of Christ's atonement.

But we are not left to a deduction, however forcible. There are plain declarations of the New Testament, made yet plainer by our knowledge of the way in which those to whom they were immediately spoken would interpret them: 'He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him' (2 Cor. v. 21): 'Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us' (Gal. iii. 13). Again: 'Ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold . . . but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot' (1 Pet. i. 18, 19). Again, in a passage before referred to: 'Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree . . . by whose stripes (the language of the Old Testament being appropriated) ye were healed' (ii. 24). And once more: 'Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood' (Rev. v. 9). Here a purchase is spoken of: men are said to be redeemed: a price is paid for their deliverance; and this price is Christ's blood; and in the shedding of it he is said to be made a curse for us, to be made sin, though really he knew no sin. And the understanding of these expressions is facilitated and fixed by those legal types, as before said, which had rendered familiar to the mind of a Jew the idea of a victim dying for the people's sin; the clean animal being substituted for the guilty man, and being represented as having his (the man's) iniquities laid upon it. The Jewish mind had thus been schooled in the belief of an atonement. Surely, it may be repeated, the apostles would not have so spoken, if they did not intend to teach that Christ was a true propitiation, and really made satisfaction in his death for the sins of men. And, indeed, if their language, used under such circumstances, does not imply the verity of an atonement, it may not unreasonably be said that no language could be made definite enough to express it beyond the possibility of a cavil.

The crushing grief of our Lord's death is most hard to be explained, if he was giving merely an example of sublime devotion to the Father's will. Many of his followers have triumphed in the pangs their persecutors inflicted: why was he, the Master, so unutterably sorrowful, if some mysterious burden was not laid upon his soul? Indeed, why did he die at all? Few will say that he died merely as a martyr. And it hardly could be necessary that he should be subjected to an unjust death for the sake of showing unreserved obedience. How could God's justice require such submission?

The objections urged against the doctrine of the atonement, as if a vicarious sacrifice for sin were irrational, or placed the character of the Deity in an unamiable light, are not, when sifted, found to be very cogent. It must always be remembered that Christ's atonement was not to induce God to show mercy, but to make the exercise of his love to sinners consistent with the honour of his law and the pure glory of his name. Sin is therein especially branded; and God's wisdom, righteousness, holiness, faithfulness, and mercy, are most eminently displayed. And, whereas it is said that he must forgive freely without requiring satisfaction, because he commands his creatures freely to forgive, it is forgotten that the cases are not parallel. Private offences are to be forgiven freely. But a ruler must execute his just laws. And so God is a great King, and as a king he administers public justice.

and will not arbitrarily clear the guilty. Doubtless there is much in his purposes and plans which we are incapable of rightly estimating. Enough is revealed to show us that 'God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them' (2 Cor. v. 19). But we shall do well to recollect that, 'as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his ways higher than our ways and his thoughts than our thoughts' (Isai. lv. 9).

The atonement is a vast subject, and would require a volume to illustrate it fully. Here it is not possible to introduce more than a few of the briefest hints and suggestions in regard to it.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF. A day, the 10th of the 7th month, on which a great annual solemnity was observed by the Israelites. The services of it are particularly described in Lev. xvi. It was to be 'a sabbath of rest,' on which they were to 'afflict their souls, that is, to humble themselves with fasting (xxiii. 27-32). After the usual morning sacrifice, the high priest went into the holy place, with a bullock for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, for himself and his family, and, having bathed, he put on his plain white linen garments (xvi. 3, 4). He then received two kids from the congregation for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, on the part of the people (5). Sacrificing the bullock for himself and his house, he took some of its blood, and, having a censer heaped with burning coals from the brazen altar, and incense in his hands, he went into the most holy place, threw the incense on the burning coals that a cloud of fragrant smoke might rise to shadow the mercy-seat, and sprinkled the blood either upon or before the mercy-seat eastward, or both, seven times. On the two goats, supplied by the congregation, and presented at the tabernacle, lots were cast: one of them thus was to be 'for the Lord,' the other 'for Azazel,' or 'for the scape-goat' (7, 8). The goat for the Lord was killed as a sin-offering for the people; and the high priest carried some of its blood into the most holy place, and did with it as he had done with the blood of his own bullock (9, 15). Then, coming from behind the veil, he made atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of Israel, sprinkling the horns of the altar of incense there with the blood (16; Exod. xxx. 10). And, while he was doing this, no man but himself was to be in the tabernacle (Lev. xvi. 17). And then the priest was also to sprinkle in a similar way the altar of burnt-offering, thus purifying, it would seem, the whole tabernacle (18, 19). It must, however, be observed that many critics imagine the altar last spoken of to be the altar of incense, said above to be purified. After all this, the remaining goat was to be brought; and the priest, laying both his hands upon its head, confessed over it the sins of the people, and sent it by a proper person into the wilderness, there to be let go, and to carry off the iniquities laid upon it into a land not inhabited (20-22). The high priest then, returning into the tabernacle, put off the whitelinen garments, bathed, and resumed his ordinary robes. He next offered the two rams, burnt-offerings for himself and for the people, also the fat of the sin-offerings, while their flesh and skins and dung were burnt without the camp; the man that burnt these, and the man who let loose the scape-goat, both having to wash their clothes and to bathe before they were re-admitted into the camp (23-28). The supplementary offerings were probably made at the time of and with the ordinary evening sacrifice (Numb. xxix. 7-11). In the ceremonies performed the gradation, as Winer has remarked, was very observable: first the high priest and his family were purified; then, by the ministrations of the priest so made clean, the sanctuary and the altar; and afterwards the whole congregation (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Versöhnungstag').

The typical intention of these ceremonies is clear and very instructive. The purification of the priest, and his entrance (then only allowed) into the holiest with blood, the atonement for the holy place which had symbolically contracted defilement from the uncleanness of the children of Israel, might all receive a lengthened explanation. It must, however, be sufficient here, referring the reader for fuller particulars to other books (such as Dr. Fairbairn's Typology of Scripture, book iii. chap. iii. sect. 5, vol. ii. pp. 307-317), to note the particular lessons taught by the two goats, one of which was sacrificed, the other sent into the wilderness.

These two (we have a similar case in the two birds at the cleansing of the leper, Lev. xiv. 4-7) constituted but one type, two things having to be shown, viz. the blood-atonement, and the carrying away of sin. One of the goats was to be slain for a sin-offering, and the other presented alive before the Lord, not, as our version has it, 'to make an atonement with him' (xvi. 10), but to be atoned for, that afterwards the atoned-for iniquities of the people might be laid upon him and carried far away into the wilderness—a most striking exhibition of the deep and lasting 'oblivion into which (as Dr. Fairbairn observes) the sins of God's people are thrown, when once they are covered with the blood of an acceptable atonement' (comp. Psal. ciii. 12; Mic. vii. 19). Surely this symbolical action illustrates the doctrine laid down in the preceding article, and would have little meaning if it were not the shadow of that high sacrifice in which, as we hold, the sins of men were laid on Christ, atoned for by his precious blood-shedding, and carried away, no more to be remembered against the pardoned transgressor. And thus the ancient interpreters rightly regard both the goats as typifying Christ, the one in his death, the other in his resurrection, 'who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification' (Rom. iv. 25). The notion of some modern writers, that the goat set free betokened Barabbas released while Jesus was crucified, need not be here discussed.

Various particulars of the proceedings on the day of atonement are given by Josephus (Antiq. lib. iii. 10 § 3 : comp. Winer, as cited above) : these, however, cannot be here dwelt on. But it may be interesting to know how the festival is observed by modern Jews in England. On the previous day 'the most pious go to the synagogue about two o'clock and remain there until four. Having returned and breakfasted, the ceremony of keparoth, or atoning sacrifices, takes place. The sacrifice consists of a cock for a male, and a hen for a female. . . . The ceremony is performed by the head of the family, for himself first, and then for his household. After repeating a cabalistic prayer composed for the occasion, he takes the cock in his hand. . . . He then moves the atonement round his head, saying, "This is my atonement : this is my ransom. This cock goeth to death ; but may I be gathered and enter into a long and happy life, and into peace." All this is repeated three times. Having done so for himself, he does in like manner for the members of the family, introducing the alterations that are to be made for the other persons. As soon as the prescribed order is performed, they lay their hands on the atonement, as was usual with the sacrifices, and immediately after it is given to the shochet to be slaughtered. . . . The synagogue is . . . lighted up with numerous candles, and the evening service commenced, which brings in the great festival of yom kippur, or day of atonement. The service begins with kol nidrei, a form of absolution from all vows, oaths, &c., and is done in the following manner. The chief rabbi, accompanied by two other rabbis, ascend the reading-desk, and say, "With the cognizance of the Omnipresent, and the congregation of the celestial and terrestrial assemblies, we declare it permitted to pray with transgressors." The chazan (reader), with a solemn tremulous voice, then says, "All vows, obligations, oaths, or anathemas . . . they shall all be deemed absolved, forgiven, annulled, void, and made of no effect. . . ." The vows, &c., here intended are described as purely religious, affecting only a person's own conscience, and with no reference to obligations between man and man. 'The chazan repeats it three times, to which the congregation respond three times, "And it shall be," &c. (Numb. xv. 26). The service continues about three hours. . . The following morning, i.e. the morning of the day of atonement, the service commences about six o'clock, and continues all day until the evening. The shachrith, or morning service, consists of prayers, supplications, &c., adapted for the day, near the end of which the law is taken out and read, as on the sabbath, to five persons. The portion is Lev. xvi. To the maphtir (reader of the lesson from the prophets) is read Numb. xxix. 7-11 ; and the portion from the prophets is Isai. lvii. 14 to lviii. After a few more prayers, the shachrith is over, having lasted . . . about six hours. The musaph (additional prayers) is next rehearsed, making mention of the additional sacrifice of the day (Numb. xxix. 7), together with supplications to the Al mighty to seal them to life. Near its close, the blessing of the cohanim (priests) is pronounced, and is performed in the following manner. A silver basin and jug with water are brought into the synagogue, which each one present takes, and pours over the hands of each of the cohanim, and gives them a towel, wherewith to dry the hands. This being over, they walk up and stand in a row in front of the ark, enveloping their heads and faces in their talithim (scarves) : turning to the congregation, they repeat the blessing, as recorded in Numb. vi. 23-27. The musaph being finished, which generally lasts till about four o'clock, they begin the minchah (afternoon service), when the law is taken out . . . and read to three persons. The portion is Lev. xviii. The last of the three is the maphtir, who reads the portion from the prophets, which is the whole book of Jonah. Several prayers are added, and these end the afternoon service. Next follows the nengilah . . . which is considered the great conclusion prayer. It lasts till after sunset, when the shophar (trumpet) is blown, as a signal that the duties of the day are over ; the whole closing with the words, "Next year we shall be in Jerusalem !" To this other prayers are added, which last about half an hour. The festival is then concluded, after their having fasted from twenty-four to twenty-six hours, and having continued in the exercise of their service upwards of twelve hours, without the least intermission. Every Jew who has the least feeling of Judaism attends the synagogue on the day of atonement. . . . Leather shoes, or anything made of calf-skin, are not allowed to be worn on this day, in sad remembrance, we are told, of the golden calf worshipped by their forefathers (Exod. xxxii.). Consequently the majority wear cloth boots or shoes ; whilst those who are not so provided go with only stockings on their feet. Neither are they allowed to adorn themselves with any gold ornaments, in remembrance of the material of which the above-mentioned calf was made' (Mills, The British Jews, chap. vi. pp. 168-174).

Nothing has as yet been spoken of the name of the 'scape-goat,' which is said to be 'for Azazel' (Lev. xvi. 8, marg.). This will be more properly noticed elsewhere. See SCAPE-GOAT.

AT'ROTH (crowns). Most probably this word should be connected with Shophan, which follows. Atroth-Shophan (the crowns of Shophan) was a city of Gad, so called to distinguish it from Ataroth, named just before (Numb. xxxii. 34, 35).

AT'TAI (opportune).—1. A descendant of Judah (I Chron. ii. 35, 36).—2. A Gadite chief (xii. 11).—3. A son of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 20).

ATTALIA'. A sea-port of Pamphylia, built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos (159-138 B.C.), whence the name. Paul and Barnabas, returning from their missionary journey, sailed from Attalia to Antioch (Acts xiv. 25, 26). This city still exists under the name of Satalia.

ATTHARATES (1 Esdr. ix. 49). Perhaps a corruption for the Tirshatha (Neh. viii. 9).

AUGIA (1 Esdr. v. 38). The name attributed to the daughter of Berzelus (Bartzilai), from whom some of those who could not establish their claim to the priesthood were descended: comp. in the canonical scripture Ezra ii. 61.

AUGUSTUS. The first Roman emperor. He was the son of Caius Octavius, by Atia, Julius Cæsar's niece, and was born 62 B.C. Being adopted by his great-uncle, and Deut. xix. 6). There were various regulations wisely introduced into the Mosaic law to restrain this custom. See CITIES OF REFUGE, MURDER.

A'VIM, A'VIMS (inhabitants of ruins). An ancient people, originally dwelling in the south-west of Palestine, whence they were driven by the Capthorim (Deut. ii. 23). They are again mentioned, probably as located farther to the north, among the tribes yet remaining unsubdued in Joshua's old age (Josh. xiii. 3), where they are called Avites. Nothing more is known of them: see, however, Wilton's Negeb, p. 159.

Coin of Augustus.

made his general heir, he came into Italy as Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus. He formed one of what is called the second triumvirate, with Mark Antony and Lepidus. Lepidus was soon set aside, and Antony entirely defeated at the battle of Actium, 31 B.C. After this victory, Octavius was saluted emperor (imperator) by the senate, and, 27 B.C., had the designation or title Augustus. It was he who confirmed Herod as king of the Jews, and enlarged his dominions. In his reign our Lord was born (Luke ii. 1). He died at Nola in Campania in the 76th year of his age, 14 A.D.

AUGUSTUS' BAND. There was a band or body of men called Augustani, identical, very probably, with the veterans specially summoned (evocati) to service by the emperors, who formed Nero's body-guard when he went into Greece. To this band Julius would seem to have belonged (Acts xxvii. 1). See Wieseler, Chron. des Apost. Zeit., note, pp. 389-393.

AURA'NUS (2 Macc. iv. 46).

AUTEAS (1 Esdr. ix. 48). A corrupted form of Hodijah (Neh. viii. 7).

AV'A (overturning, ruin). A place or district in Assyria, whence colonists were brought into the cities of Samaria (2 Kings xvii. 24). The locality cannot be identified. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Avva.'

AV'ARAN (1 Macc. ii. 5). The surname of Eleazar, one of the Maccabean family.

A'VEN (nothingness).—1. The name applied to the city elsewhere called On, or Heliopolis (Ezek. xxx. 17).—2. A contracted form (Hos. x. 8) of Beth-aven (5) i.e. Beth-el.—3. A place mentioned by Amos (i. 5), and called in the margin Bikath-Aven. It seems to be the great plain of Lebanon, in which Baalbek is situated, still called el Bukd'a.

AVENGER OF BLOOD. In a rude state of society, the nearest relative of a person slain was conceived bound to put the slayer to death (Numb. xxxv. 19, 21, 24, 25, 27

A'VIM (ruins). A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23). Some have imagined that a remnant of the people called Avim may have lived in it.

A'VITES.—1. (Josh. xiii. 3). See AVIM.—2. The inhabitants of Ava (2 Kings xvii. 31). See Ava.

A'VITH (ruins). A city where the Edomite king Hadad reigned (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Chron. i. 46).

AWL. A tool mentioned only in connection with the boring of a slave's ear (Exod. xxi. 6; Deut. xv. 17).

AXE. There were undoubtedly different kinds of this instrument among the Hebrews. A word very commonly employed for it embodies the idea of sharpness. Such an axe was used for felling trees and the like, and had probably a heavy head (Judges ix. 48; 1 Sam. xiii. 20; Psal. lxxiv. 5; Jer. xlvi. 22). Another word was derived from cutting (Deut. xix. 5, xx. 19; 1 Kings vi. 7; Isai. x. 15). This too was used for cutting wood; but we may gather from the first-named passage that the head was attached to the handle in the way usual with modern axes, or more probably fastened with thongs, which might readily slip. Egyptian axes so constructed have been found. In 2 Kings vi. 5; Isai. x. 34 an axe is signified by the word 'iron,' a proof that the heads were of that metal, not, as in various Egyptian specimens, of bronze. Another word translated 'axe' (Isai. xlv. 12, marg.; Jer. x. 3), means a carver's knife. Some others occur.

AZ'ÆL (1 Esdr. ix. 14). A form of Asahel (Ezra x. 15).

AZÆ'LUS (1 Esdr. ix. 34).

A'ZAL (noble, root, or declivity of a mountain?). The place to which the cleft in mount Olivet is, according to Zechariah's prophecy (xiv. 5), to extend.

AZALI'AH (whom Jehovah reserved). The father of Shaphan the scribe (2 Kings xxii. 3; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8).

AZANI'AH (whom Jehovah hears). A Levite (Neh. x. 9).

AZ'ARA (1 Esdr. v. 31).

AZA'RAEL (whom God helps). A musician (Neh. xii. 36).

AZA'REEL (id.).—1. A Benjamite (1 Chron. xii. 6).—2. A chief singer (xxv. 18); he appears to be the same with Uzziel (4).—3. A chief of the tribe of Dan (xxvii. 22).—4. A man who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 41).—5. A priest, (Neh. xi. 13) possibly the same with Azarael.

AZARI'AH (whom Jehovah helps).—1. The son or grandson of Zadok, high priest in Solomon's time (1 Kings iv. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 9).—2. A chief officer under Solomon (1 Kings iv. 5).—3. A king of Judah (2 Kings xiv. 21, xv. 1, 6, 7, 8, 17, 23, 27; 1 Chron. iii. 12). He is more generally called UZZIAH, which see.—4. A descendant of Judah by Zerach (ii. 8).—5. Another of Judah's posterity (38, 39); perhaps the person mentioned (2 Chron. xxiii. 1) as son of Obed.—6, 7. Two others in the line of high priests, the first grandson of the before-named high priest (1 Chron. vi. 10, 11, 13, 14; Ezra vi. 1, 3).—8. A Levite (1 Chron. vi. 36; comp. 24).—9. A priest of the line of Zadok (ix. 11), perhaps the same with the one mentioned in Neh. vii. 7, called Seraiah in Ezra ii. 2; Neh. xii. 1: he or his representative sealed the covenant (x. 2).—10. A prophet who encouraged Asa (2 Chron. xv. 1-7).—11, 12. Two sons of king Jehoshaphat (xxi. 2).—13. The king of Judah generally known as Ahaziah (xxii. 6).—14. Son of Jeroham, one of the captains with whom Jehoiada concerted the crowning of king Joash (xxiii. 1).—15. The high priest who resisted Uzziah in his attempt to burn incense (xxvi. 17-20). It is doubtful whether this priest was one of those before-mentioned.—16. An Ephraimite chief (xxviii. 12).—17, 18. Two Levites (xxix. 12).—19. A high priest in the reign of Hezekiah (xxx. 10, 13). It is also uncertain whether he was one of those before-mentioned.—20. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 23, 24). This may be the same person elsewhere referred to (viii. 7, xii. 33).—21. One of the chiefs who determined against Jeremiah's warning to go into Egypt (Jer. xliii. 2).—22. The original name of one of Daniel's companions in Babylon, called there Abed-nego (Dan. i. 6, 7, 11, 19, ii. 17).

AZARTAS.—1. (1 Esdr. ix. 21).—2. (43).—3. (48).—4. (2 Esdr. i. 1).—5. The name assumed by the angel said to accompany Tobias (Tob. v. 12, and elsewhere).—6. (Song of Three Child. 2, 66).—7. A captain in the Maccabean wars (1 Macc. v. 18, 56, 60).

A'ZAZEL (strong). A Reubenite (1 Chron. v. 8).

AZA'ZEL (Lev. xvi. 8, marg.). See ATONE-MENT, DAY OF, SCAPE-GOAT.

AZAZI'AH (whom Jehovah strengthens).

1. A musician (1 Chron. xv. 21).—2. An Ephraimite chief (xxvii. 20).—3. An overseer of offerings and tithes (2 Chron.

AZBAZ'ARETH (1 Esdr. v. 69). Probably a corrupted form of Esar-haddon.

AZ'BUK (strong devastation, q.d. a strong place devastated). The father of Nehemiah (not the governor) (Neh. iii. 16).

AZE'KAH (dug over, broken up). A place to which Joshua's pursuit of the Amorites extended after the battle for the relief of Gibeon (Josh. x. 10, 11). It stood in the plain country of Judah, to which tribe it was allotted (xv. 35). In later times, we find the Philistines pitching near it (1 Sam. xvii. 1): it was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 9), and was one of the last towns taken by Nebuchadnezzar in Zedekiah's reign before Jerusalem fell (Jer. xxxiv. 7). It was again inhabited after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 30). It has not yet been satisfactorily identified; but it must have been very near Beth-horon.

A'ZEL (noble). A descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 37, 38, ix. 43, 44).

A'ZEM (strength, bone). A city allotted at first to Judah, afterwards to Simeon (Josh. xv. 29, xix. 3). In 1 Chron. iv. 29, it is given as Ezem. Wilton considers 'Im and Azem' as designating one place—Ije-Azem, and identifies it with the modern el-Aujeh of the 'Azâzimeh Arabs (The Negeb, pp. 154-157).

AZEPH'RITH (1 Esdr. v. 16).

AZE'TAS (1 Esdr. v. 15).

AZ'GAD (strong in fortune).—1. A person whose descendants returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 12, viii. 12; Neh. vii. 17).—2. A man who sealed the covenant (x. 15): possibly the representative of the posterity of No. 1.

AZI'A (1 Esdr. v. 31).

AZ'EI (2 Esdr. i. 2).

AZI'EL (whom God consoles). One of the Levite porters, appointed to play on the psalter (1 Chron. xv. 20). The name is a contracted form of Jaaziel (18).

AZI'ZA (strong). One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 27).

AZMA'VETH (strong as or to death).—1. One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chron. xi. 33).—2. A descendant of Saul (viii. 36, ix. 42).—3. A Benjamite (xii. 3); perhaps identical with No. 1.—4. David's treasurer (xxvii. 25).

AZMA'VETH (id.). A place probably in Benjamin, about which the singers settled after the return from the captivity (Neh. xii. 29). Some of the inhabitants of Azmaveth returned from Babylon with Zerubabel (Ezra ii. 24). In Neh. vii. 28 it is called Beth-Azmaveth.

AZ'MON (strong). A place on the southern boundary of Palestine (Numb. xxxiv. 4, 5; Josh. xv. 4); the modern Wady el-Kusâineh.

AZ'NOTH-TA'BOR (ears, i.e. summits, of Tabor). A place on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34).

A'ZOR (a helper). One in the line of our Lord's ancestors (Matt. i. 13, 14).

AZO'TUS (Acts viii. 40). The Greek form of ASHDOD, which see.

AZO'TUS, MOUNT (1 Macc. ix. 15).

AZ'RIEL (whom God helps).—1. A chief of the trans-Jordanic half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. v. 24).—2. The father of a chief of Naphtali (xxvii. 19).—3. The father of Seraiah, one of Jehoiakim's officers (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

AZRIKAM (help against the enemy).—1. One of the descendants of David (1 Chron. iii. 23).—2. A descendant of Saul (viii. 38, ix. 44).—3. A Levite (ix. 14; Neh. xi. 15).—4. The governor of the house of king Ahaz (2 Chron. xxxiii. 7).

AZUBAH (forsaken, ruins).—1. The mother of king Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 42; 2 Chron. xx. 31).—2. A wife of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 18, 19).

AZUR (helper).—1. The father of Haniah, the false prophet of Gibeon (Jer. xxviii. 1).—2. The father of a person in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. xi. 1). This name is identical with Azzur.

AZURAN (1 Esdr. v. 15).

AZAH (the strong) (Deut. ii. 23; 1 Kings iv. 24; Jer. xxv. 20, xlvii. 1, marg.) See GAZA.

AZAN (very strong). A chief of Issachar (Numb. xxxiv. 26).

B

BAAL (lord, possessor). The supreme God of the Canaanitish and Phœnician nations. The word is sometimes used in the plural, Baalim; and it may be observed that, in the original, the name of the deity, whether singular or plural, is always distinguished by the article, unless when it has some qualifying adjunct. The worship of Baal seems to have extended to several neighbouring countries. Thus, the Babylonian Bel is generally considered as identical with Baal, the word being contracted. On this point, however, see Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. i. pp. 318, 594, &c., 627, &c. Traces of this worship are found at Carthage; the names of men being frequently compounded with that of the god, as Hannibal. Baal has often been taken as the representative of the sun; but still there are diversities apparent, for the Babylonian god is identified with the planet Jupiter. It is probable that, the general idea being that of lord or sovereign owner of the universe, different modifications were occasionally introduced, and different notions held in regard to which of the heavenly bodies it would be more fitting to identify with such a ruler. The Israelites came in contact with Baal-worship when on the borders of Moab and Midian (Numb. xxii. 41, xxv. 3); and very soon after their establishment in Canaan they yielded to this evil influence (Judges ii. 11-13). Through the time of the judges it appears to have more or less prevailed, though checked now and then by some energetic magistrate, till the days of Samuel (vi. 25-32, viii. 33, ix. 4, x. 6, 10; 1 Sam. vii. 4). In later times, we find the worship of Baal openly practised in the northern kingdom of Israel, being sanctioned by the alliance of Ahab with Jezebel (1 Kings xvi. 31, 32); and, in spite of the exertions of Elijah (xviii.), and the policy of Jehu (2 Kings x. 18-28), it prevailed till the period of the carrying away of the ten tribes (xvii. 16). Judah, too, was grievously infected with the same idolatry (xi. 18, xxi. 3; 2 Chron. xxviii. 2). We may easily gather from the sacred writers a notion of the pomp and ceremonies of Baal-worship. There were temples, images, and altars, on eminences and on house-tops (1 Kings xvi. 32, xviii. 20; 2 Kings x. 26, xi. 18; Jer. xi. 13, xxxii. 29). There were multitudes of priests, whose mode of addressing the god is specified (1 Kings xviii. 19, 26-28): they offered incense and even human sacrifices (Jer. vii. 9, xix. 5), and thus provoked to anger the God of heaven. No wonder that his judgments at length descended on such a people.

Baal is often used in composition with other words for the names of both men and places. It is not always, however, that, so compounded, it has reference to the idol-god: it frequently implies merely the notion of possession.

BAAL (lord).—1. A man of the tribe of Reuben (1 Chron. v. 5).—2. A descendant of Benjamin (viii. 30, ix. 36).

BAAL (id). A town in the territory of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 33). It appears to be the same with Baalath-Beer (Josh. xix. 8).

BAAL-BERITH (covenant-lord). The name under which Baal was worshipped by the Shechemites (Judges viii. 33, ix. 4; comp. 46). It was not as the god of covenants, but as in covenant with them, that they so honoured the false deity.

BAAL-GAD (lord of fortune). A place in the valley of Lebanon, on the northern or north-western boundary of Palestine (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7) which remained unconquered at the division of the land (xiii. 5). It has often been supposed that Baal-Gad was Baalbek; but it is more likely to have been Banias, where there was for a long time a sanctuary of the god Pan. And perhaps Baal was worshipped in this place under the character of Gad, 'good fortune.'

BAAL-HAMON (place of multitude). A place at which Solomon is said to have had a vineyard (Sol. Song viii. 11). The situation can only be conjectured.

BAAL-HANAN (lord of grace).—1. A king in Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 38, 39; 1 Chron. i. 49, 50).—2. An overseer of olive and sycamore trees in the time of David (xxvii. 28).

BAAL-HAZOR (having a village or hamlet). A place 'by Ephraim,' where Absalom had a sheep-farm (2 Sam. xiii. 23).

BAAL-HERMON (place of Hermon). This may be only another name of Hermon

(Judges iii. 3; 1 Chron. v. 23): by some it is supposed the same with Baal-Gad. See Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., arts. 'Baal-Gad,' 'Baal-Hermon.'

BA'AL-ME'ON (place of dwelling). A town built or fortified, with a change of name, by the Reubenites (Numb. xxxii. 38; 1 Chron. v. 8). It appears to have been afterwards possessed by the Moabites (Ezek. xxv. 9). This town is also called Beth-Baal-Meon, Beth-Meon, and, in a contracted form, Beon, though this last name may be put for Meon. It was about three miles south-east of Heshbon; and its ruins still bear the name of Miän, or Maein.

BA'AL-PE'OR (lord of the opening, there being an allusion to the character of the rites of worship). The god of Moab and Midian, sometimes called Peor only (Numb. xxv. 3, 5, 18; Deut. iv. 3; Josh. xxii. 17; Psal. cvi. 28; Hos. ix. 10). Baal-Peor has been identified with Priapus: his worshippers were guilty of fornication and all uncleanness.

BA'AL-PERA'ZIM (place of breaches, or burstings forth, i.e. defeats). A place near the valley of Rephaim, where David defeated the Philistines (2 Sam. v. 20; 1 Chron. xiv. 11). It was so called because David said that the Lord had 'burst like a rush of waters' upon his enemies. It is alluded to in Isai. xxviii. 21.

BA'AL-SHA'LISHA (lord of Shalisha, place of Shalisha, or of three). A place probably no great distance from the Gulgai (2 Kings iv. 38, 42) mentioned in Elisha's history.

BA'AL-TA'MAR (place of palm-trees). A place near Gibeah of Benjamin (Judges xx. 33).

BAAL-ZEBUB (lord of the fly, fly-destroyer). Baal was worshipped in this character at Ekron (2 Kings i. 2, 3, 6, 16). The multitude of flies in hot climates will account for the designation.

BA'AL-ZE'PHON (place of Typhon, or sacred to Typhon, otherwise lord of the north, or place of a watch-tower). A point near to which the Israelites crossed the Red sea, and therefore on its western shore; but it is difficult to fix on the exact position (Exod. xiv. 2, 9; Numb. xxxiii. 7).

BA'ALAH (mistress).—1. Another name for the city of KIRJATH-JEARIM, which see, and therefore in the territory of Judah (Josh. xv. 9, 10; 1 Chron. xiii. 6). The mount Baalah on the border of Judah (Josh. xv. 11) was probably at some distance.—2. A town in the south of Judah (xv. 29); it is also termed Balah (xix. 3), and Bilhah (1 Chron. iv. 29). See BIZJOTHJAH.

BA'ALATH (id.). A town in the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 44). This has been thought to be the place that Solomon built or fortified (1 Kings ix. 18; 2 Chron. viii. 6).

BA'ALATH-BE'ER (having a well). A town in the territory of Simeon (Josh. xix. 8), probably the same with Baal (1 Chron. iv. 33). Mr. Wilton, who supposes this another form of Bealoth (Josh. xv. 24), identifies it with 'the ruined site called Kurnab, on the southern declivity of the swell, or low ridge which bears the name of Kubbet el-Bawi.' He considers this the Baalath that Solomon fortified, being a frontier town, one of the limits of the Simeonite territory. He also thinks that it was called Ramath of the South, as another appellation (xix. 8), being the 'South Ramoth' (1 Sam. xxx. 27) to which David sent some of his booty (The Negeb, pp. 89-97).

BA'ALE OF JUDAH (citizens of Judah). A name given to the city Kirjath-Jearim (2 Sam. vi. 2). See BAALAH, 1.

BA'ALI (my lord). The name which Israel was no more to call the Lord when restored to his favour (Hos. ii. 16); the word having reference to the idol-god. 'God says, So wholly do I hate the name of idols, that, on account of the likeness of the word Baal, my lord, I will not be so called, even in a right meaning. . . . Yet withal God says that he will put into her mouth the tenderer name of love, Ishi, lit. my man. In Christ, the returning soul, which would give herself wholly to God, however far she had wandered, should not call God so much her Lord as her Husband' (Dr. Pusey, Minor Prophets, pp. 19, 20).

BA'ALIM (lords) (Judges ii. 11, iii. 7, viii. 33, x. 6, 10, and elsewhere). The plural form of BAAL, which see.

BA'ALIS (son of exultation). A king of the Ammonites (Jer. xl. 14).

BA'ANA or BA'ANAH (son of affliction).—1. A Benjamite, one of the murderers of Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 2, 5, 6, 9).—2. The father of one of David's warriors (xxiii. 29; 1 Chron. xi. 30).—3, 4. Two officers under Solomon (1 Kings iv. 12, 16).—5. One who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).—6. A person whose son took part in re-building the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 4). He may be identical with the one who sealed the covenant (x. 27).

BA'ANA (1 Esdr. v. 8).

BAAN'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 26). A form of Benaiah (Ezra x. 25).

BA'ARA (brutish, according to some, new-moon). A wife of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 8).

BAASEI'AH (work of Jehovah).—A Levite, one of the ancestors of Asaph (1 Chron. vi. 40).

BA'ASHA (wickedness, or, as some suppose, in the work). Son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar. He was probably of mean origin. At the siege of Gibbethon, he conspired against Nadab, king of Israel, killed him and all his family, and possessed himself of the throne. He attempted to fortify Ramah, with a view, it would seem, of preventing the access of the Israelites into Judah (2 Chron. xi. 14, 16); but his design was frustrated by a Syrian invasion, instigated by Asa, king of Judah. Baasha's evil conduct provoked the denunciation of God's judgments upon his house, as predicted by Jehu the prophet. He reigned 24 years, 953-930 B.C., and was buried in Tirzah, his capital. (1 Kings xv. 16-22, xvi. 1-7, xxi. 22; 2 Chron. xvi. 1-6; Jer. xli. 9).

BA'BEL (confusion, or gate of Il, a Babylonian deity). The name of the place afterwards celebrated as Babylon, the great capital of the Chaldean monarchy. Its origin is related by Moses. Some time after the flood, when men had begun to multiply, and perceived that the natural consequence of multiplication would be the dispersion and estrangement of those who had hitherto formed but one community, they determined to erect a mighty tower, which should serve as a rallying-point and centre of union for their families, the metropolis of an universal monarchy. Fanatical motives have frequently been ascribed to these projectors; but their intention is plainly enough declared by the sacred writer. Their tower was not designed to protect them against another flood, nor was it to be the vast temple of some idol. Rather they were influenced by a thoroughly-sensual desire of glory, to be attained by gigantic monuments and by earthly dominion. They said 'Let us make us a name.' The place where they were settled was favourable to their plan. They had journeyed in the east from that Armenian region near Ararat which has justly been considered the cradle of the human race, and they were now in the plains of Shinar. Bricks they could make of the pure clay they found there; and asphalt or bitumen was abundant for cementing their materials together. They were all, too, of one 'lip,' their speech and their intonation the same, so that they could plan and work concordantly together. Therefore they began to build a tower; and a city was to cluster round it. And no doubt their structure was assuming large dimensions—though how long they were employed on it we have no means of judging—when God disappointed their ambitious purpose, confounded their language, and thus dispersed them, according to their families, through various regions (Gen. xi. 1-9). That this was a sudden catastrophe is evident from the tenor of the sacred narrative. If we are to believe the record, therefore, the diversity of tongues did not grow out of a mere natural development, according to the ordinary circumstances which, in the lapse of time, mould the languages of various tribes. Much was, no doubt, left to that development; and the difference, first stamped by some immediate exercise of divine power, was permitted to increase and multiply into the vast variety of dialects now existing in the world. But, when those who speculate on the origin and divergence of language demand an almost-incalculable number of years for reaching the present state, they must be reminded that he, that made the mouth and distinguished man with the power of articulate speech, could, as easily as he created, change the forms of utterance, and that here we are expressly told that, on an occasion when it seemed good to his wisdom, he did so interfere, and produced at once an alteration which otherwise ages might not have been long enough to consummate.

God does not, be the expression used with all reverence, needlessly expend supernatural power. We are not obliged to suppose that he formed the complete system of the world's languages: it is enough to believe that, after the direction was given, external agencies and influences did their work. So that we may trace a relation still manifest of the daughter-dialects to the parent-speech. Research more and more illustrates this, and shows the high probability that there was some primitive single Asiatic language. More cannot safely be said. The judgment of scholars differs as to the one which represents most nearly the original type. Many, however, are inclined to point, as most probable, to the Sanscrit.

Thus, then, the pride of those builders was chastised. And the name fixed upon their unfinished work was Babel. Very impressive are the words of Kalisch: 'The future character of the overbearing city is clearly mirrored in the history of its beginning: the same boastful spirit, which the prophet Isaiah chastises in the Babylonian prince, who speaks in his heart, "I will ascend up to heaven, above the stars of God will I erect my throne" (Isai. xiv. 13), prompts here the exclamation, "Let us build a city and tower, whose top may reach to heaven;" but, just as there the arrogance is crushed by the words, "but thou descendest into the grave, and into the deepest pit" (15), it is here checked by the simple but emphatic remark, "and they left off to build the city" (Comm. on the O. T. Gen., p. 314).

From the beginning a cloud lowered over Babylon; and in her history a striking lesson is read to the world. She became very great, the full-blown development of confident vanity, the example of what arrogant ambition might grow to, the embodiment of scornful strength, the image of careless security; the worldly spirit being paramount in her, acknowledging even in the heavens no superior (Dan. iv. 30, 32). But the judgment of God was travelling on. In her hour of pride-inspired prophets foretold her ruin. And the present utter desolation of this mistress of kingdoms continues to deliver the impressive warning that God will bring down the haughtiness of men, and that those that exalt themselves against him shall be abased. He may use them as his instruments for a time; but their day shall come. We should read the story of Babylon in vain, if we did not carry along with us this principle, and see how it knits together the narrative, and vindicates itself in the ultimate catastrophe, 'Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen.'

Nimrod appears to have established here the first strong-holds of his empire; and hence Babylonia was called 'the land of Nimrod' (Mic. v. 2). Additional towns he founded in Shinar, as Erech, and Accad, and Calneh. Afterwards, probably grasping at more dominion, he went into Assyria, and there built Nineveh and other cities (Gen. x. 10-12).

Later Babylonian kings mentioned by the sacred writers are the following; their names and approximate dates alone being given here: further information respecting them will be found in the articles appended to their respective names.

B.C.

- 2130 ? Amraphel, called king of Shinar, one of the confederate monarchs who invaded Canaan in the days of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 1-16).
720. Merodach-Baladan, otherwise Bero-dach-Baladan, who was contemporary with Hezekiah (2 Kings xx. 12, 13; Isai. xxxix. 1, 2).
607. Nebuchadnezzar, or Nebuchadrezzar, the great monarch under whom Babylon attained its highest pitch of power, and who captured and burnt Jerusalem (2 Kings xxiv. xxv. 1-26; 2 Chron. xxxvi.; Jer. xxxix., lii. 1-30; Dan. i., ii., iii., iv.).
562. Evil-Merodach, who released Jehoiachin (2 Kings xxv. 27-30; Jer. lii. 31-34).
541. Belshazzar, who was slain when Babylon was taken (Dan. v., vii. 1, viii. 1).

It is evident that there are considerable gaps in this list; several monarchs having reigned of whom the sacred record makes no mention. But there is a most important document, known as the canon of the geographer Ptolemy, which arranges in chronological order, with the length of each reign, the kings of Babylon from Nabonassar down to Darius Codomannus, that Persian monarch whom Alexander the Great subdued. This, so far as it bears upon the scripture history of Babylon, shall be given here:—

B.C.	Era of Nabonassar.	Length of reign.
747	1 Nabonassar	14
733	15 Nadius	2
731	17 Chinzinus and Porus	5
726	22 Elulæus	5
721	27 Mardocepalus [Merodach-Baladan]	12
709	39 Arceanus	5
704	44 Interregnum	2
702	46 Belibus	3
699	49 Aparanadius	6
693	55 Regibelus	1
692	56 Mesesimordacus	4
688	60 Interregnum	8
680	68 Asaridanus [Esar-Hadadon]	13
667	81 Saosduchinus	20
647	101 Cinneladanus	22
625	123 Nabopolassar	21
604	144 Nebuchadnezzar	43
561	187 Illoarudamus [Evil-Merodach]	2
559	189 Nerigassolassarus	4
555	193 Nabonadius	17
538	210 Cyrus	9

Much additional light has been thrown upon the history of Babylon, and the succession of the kings, by the discoveries which have of late years been made there, and the progress in deciphering the inscriptions on the monuments examined. Uncertainty, however, still exists in regard to these: the researches are as yet little more than tentative; but it is most satisfactory to know that the scripture record is already materially illustrated and confirmed; and doubtless further investigations will clear up many difficulties still remaining. The following table of Babylonian kings is abridged from that given by Dr. Kalisch, Comm. on the O. T. Gen., pp. 280-290.

B.C.

2230. Urukh was the first great Chaldean builder. His name appears on the masonry of Mugeyer, Wurka, Nifer, and Senkereh. Ilgi, associated in the inscriptions with Urukh. Shinti-khak, probably of Elamite descent. His name is on the bricks of Wurka.
1950. Kudur-Mapula, i.e. Ravager of the West. His name occurs at Mugeyer. He has been supposed identical with Chedor-laomer (Gen. xiv.) See, however, CHEDOR-LAOMER.
1850. Isni-Dagon, a Chaldean king. There is then a long line of kings, from the ruins on the lower Tigris and Euphrates, not fewer than 25. The principal are Ibil-anu-duma } Of whom only the Gurguna } names are known.
1800. Purna-puriyas. His name occurs on bricks at Senkereh. Durri-galazu, his son. He repaired the temple of Sin, or the moon, at Ur of the Chaldeans.
1500. Khammurabi. He built a palace at Kalwada, near Baghdad. His bricks have been discovered in Mugeyer and Senkereh. Shamsu-Iluna. His name is on the clay tablets of the tombs of Tel Sifr. Sin-shada. He repaired the palace at Wurka. Zur-sin. Rim-sin. A stone tablet bearing his name was found in Mugeyer. Naram-sin. The last four monarchs, bearing the epithet Sin, were especial devotees of the moon-god.
1150. Merodach-adan-akhi. He defeated the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser I.
800. Babylon was invaded by Shamas-phul; and in 774 by Phulukh (Pul), who received the homage of the Babylonians; in 720 by Sargon, who defeated Merodach-Baladan; and in 700 by Sennacherib.
- The Babylonian empire was, during the whole of this period, at least since about 1300, alternately free from Assyria and dependent on it. It was materially weakened, probably subjugated, by Sennacherib. Afterwards Babylonia was conquered by the Chaldeans from Kurdistan; and a new Babylonian empire was founded under Nabopolassar. The succeeding monarchs are therefore of the Chaldean dynasty.
- 625 Nabopolassar. His name has been to read on tablets from Wurka. He 604. reigned 21 years.

B.C.

- 604 Nabu-kuduri-uzur (Nebuchadnezzar). to He repaired the temple of the seven 561. spheres in Birs Nimrud, originally erected by Merodach-adan-akhi. The inscriptions enumerate the various works he executed, detail his western conquests, and record the subjection of the countries on the Mediterranean: they contain, also, an obscure allusion to his temporary insanity; but there is no mention made of the captivity of the Jews. This monarch's name is also inscribed on tablets of Wurka. He reigned 43 years.
561. Evil-Merodach, or Elvarodam.
Bel-adin-ingar (or Bel-shum-ingar:
comp. the Samgar-Nebo of Jer. xxxix. 3). He had been provincial governor under Nebuchadnezzar, and probably was never really king, though so styled to give a colouring to his son's claim to the throne.
559. Nergal-shar-uzur (Neriglissar: see Jer. xxxix. 3). On the monuments, he studiously avoided mentioning Nebuchadnezzar's name, whose officer he had been, referring to him merely as a former king. He had married Nebuchadnezzar's daughter; so that Evil-Merodach, against whom he fought, was his brother-in-law.
555. Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king.
He built a temple to the moon at Ur of the Chaldees. The prayer on the monuments is for Belshar-ezer (Belshazzar), his eldest son, whom he probably made co-regent. The name of Nabonidus is also on the bricks of the red mound of Senkerch.
538. Babylon was taken by Cyrus, who established the Persian empire.

From these different sources, a tolerable outline of Babylonian history may be constructed. At an early period a powerful kingdom, Babylon declined before the rising empire of Assyria. Nevertheless it was not absorbed into that monarchy. It had still its own monarchs, and, though sometimes obliged to bend, and even conquered by its mighty neighbour, it was generally gathering strength till, on the fall of Nineveh, Babylon became the great Asiatic power, the head of the countries over which Assyria had reigned. In this period of prosperity Babylon was proud and luxurious; but at length the Persian invasion came; and then the great city began to sink into the ruin from which she never emerged. The defences after Cyrus's conquest were dilapidated and neglected. It is true that Babylon was still one of the capitals of the new monarchy; and the Persians made it a place of royal residence. But it revolted, and was subdued again and again, twice in the reign of Darius Hystaspis, once in that of Xerxes. Each conqueror lowered it; and the process of decay went on, till, when Alexander the Great desired to restore it to splendour the task was found almost hopeless. All such plans, however, were frustrated by Alexander's death. And it ceased to be a metropolis. The Seleucidæ (Syrian kings) made Antioch their capital: a new city, Seleucia, was founded near Babylon; and for it, and for various other towns from time to time rising in its vicinity, Babylon furnished materials, till its inhabitants perished from it, and its most magnificent structures became unsightly heaps.

The descriptions we have of ancient Babylon show it to have been of vast size and astonishing magnificence. Herodotus and Ctesias both saw it, if not in its greatest glory, at least when it had suffered comparatively little. Their accounts do not exactly tally; yet the main features of them are the same. They describe Babylon as built upon the Euphrates; that river running through it. It was four-square, surrounded by a deep moat, and enclosed within a vast circuit of double walls, measuring, Herodotus says, 480 stadia, i.e. about 56 miles. Ctesias, however, gives a smaller measurement, 360 stadia, or about 42 miles. Probably Herodotus, who speaks of an outer and an inner wall, means the circuit of the outermost; while Ctesias, who mentions only one, may have referred to that which was the inner. The height of these walls must have been enormous; 200 royal cubits, or 337½ feet, according to Herodotus, 50 fathoms, or 300 feet, according to Ctesias; and, though other authorities diminish these estimates, yet writers well qualified to judge believe them trustworthy. Herodotus describes the thickness of the walls as 50 royal cubits, or about 85 feet. Smaller measurements are given by others; but perhaps these referred to the interior walls specially declared by Herodotus to be narrower than the outer ones. Two hundred and fifty towers are said to have been placed at irregular intervals along the walls, to strengthen the weakest parts; and there were one hundred gates of brass, with brazen side-posts and lintels. If these descriptions be thought exaggerated, it must be observed, that in several points they are corroborated by scripture testimony. The brazen gates are mentioned by Isaiah (Isai. xlv. 1, 2); and the massive walls are commemorated by Jeremiah (Jer. l. 15, li. 53, 58).

The city was divided by great streets, crossing each other at right angles, those which led to the river being closed with brazen gates, through which access to the quays was gained. These quays lined the banks of the Euphrates along its whole course through the city. The stream was crossed by a bridge, at each extremity of which was a royal palace; that at the eastern side being larger and more magnificent than the other. This palace was nearly seven miles in circuit, enclosed by three lofty walls with prodigious towers. The second wall was 300 feet high, the interior still higher, of coloured brick, representing figures and hunting-scenes. The smaller palace had a high wall 3½ miles in circumference, and was similarly embellished. These structures were united by, besides the bridge, a tunnel under the river. A magnificent temple is also described. This, the temple of Belus, rose from a base of 200 yards every way. It was of pyramidal form, eight square compartments or stages being placed one upon another. A winding ascent, passing round all the stories, led to the platform on the summit, on which stood a chapel or shrine, containing no statue, but where the god was believed to dwell. Hanging-gardens are, moreover, mentioned, rising in terraces, on the top-most of which grew trees of a vast size (Prideaux, Connexion, vol. i. pp. 80-89; Newton, Diss. on Proph. Diss. x.; 'Ruins of Babylon' in Amer. Bibl. Repos., July, 1834, pp. 158-189; Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Babel'.)

Such is a condensed summary of the size and splendour of this mighty city. The accounts differ, as above acknowledged, in detail, but substantially they agree. So that it is clear that Babylon, vast and powerful, defended by the strongest bulwarks, and garrisoned by a multitudinous population, standing in the very highway of the world's business, might fairly have been expected to last out through all ages, or, if she lost her empire, at least to have retained her existence. Why should not Babylon, as well as Damascus, Hebron, Joppa, Jerusalem, be still the abode of men?

Were any one now to proclaim of the great cities of the earth, of London, Paris, &c., not merely that they should suffer, or be plundered, but that where their crowded millions congregate there should be desolation, no human habitation within their precincts, doleful creatures alone frequenting their ruins, and that at no distant date, their time of fall being near to come, their days not to be prolonged, 'I presume,' as Bishop Newton says, 'we should look upon such a prophet as a madman, and show no farther attention to his message than to deride and despise it.' Yet it was in the palmiest days of Babylon, it was even before she had attained her full splendour, that the history of her entire and disgraceful fall was predicted by the Hebrew prophets. Surely it is not possible to read their words of Babylon's then-future doom, and to compare them with the result, without a full conviction that these men fetched their knowledge of things to come from the secret communications of the Most High.

We must examine some of these predictions. Isaiah describes in emphatic terms the haughtiness of Babylon, 'Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency' (Isai. xiii. 19); 'the golden city,' claiming godlike power, 'Thou hast said in thine heart. . . I will ascend above the heights of the clouds: I will be like the Most High' (xiv. 4, 13, 14); boasting in her security, 'Thou saidst, I shall be a lady for ever. . . thou that art given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thy heart, I am, and none else besides me: I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children.' (xlvii. 7, 8). But even then the nations were designated that should destroy her: 'The noise of a multitude in the mountains, like as of a great people; a tumultuous noise of the kingdoms of nations gathered together: the Lord of Hosts mustereth the host of the battle.' 'Behold I will stir up the Medes against them' (xiii. 4, 17): 'Go up, O Elam, besiege, O Media' (xxi. 2); and the very warrior is addressed by his title who should pour his victorious legions on the devoted city: 'Thus saith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whose right hand I have holden, to subdue nations before him; and I will loose the loins of kings, to open before him the two-leaved gates; and the gates shall not be shut' (xlv. 1, 2). And the awful sentence is read, 'Babylon . . . shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their fold there; but wild beasts of the desert shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures; and owls shall dwell there, and satyrs shall dance there, and the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces' (xiii. 19-22). It must be observed that certain critics, swayed mainly, it may almost be thought, by an indisposition to believe that God could so long beforehand reveal futurity to his prophets, 'declaring the end from the beginning' (xvi. 10), have maintained that some of the chapters of Isaiah were really written by one who lived in the time of the captivity. This theory will not bear investigation. It has been proved untenable. See ISAIAH. But, even supposing it were just, little difference would be made in the argument. If all the seers that foreboded the doom of Babylon could be shown to have lived at the captivity, what then? Babylon was still at her height of power; and the prophetic utterances look far onward, receiving more completely their fulfillment in subsequent ages, and testifying to what our own eyes can see of the state of Babylon. It is not merely that prophecy declares that the city should be taken and should fall; it describes its utter wasteness and world-long desolation. And here is the moral wonder, that this should so long ago have been portrayed.

Let us add a few more predictions, taken from Jeremiah, who lived in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, and can hardly be supposed to have survived that great monarch. 'It shall come to pass, when seventy years are accomplished, that I will punish the king of Babylon, and that nation, saith the Lord, for their iniquity, and the land of the Chaldeans, and will make it perpetual desolations' (Jer. xxv. 12). And actual details are given: 'Babylon is taken: Bel is confounded: Merodach is broken in pieces: her idols are confounded: her images are broken in pieces. For out of the north there cometh up a nation against her, which shall make her land desolate; and none shall dwell therein: they shall remove, they shall depart, both man and beast' (l. 2, 3). 'Babylon is suddenly fallen and destroyed: howl for her: take balm for her pain, if so be she may be healed

We would have healed Babylon; but she is not healed. . . . O thou that dwellest upon many waters, abundant in treasures, thine end is come, and the measure of thy covetousness. . . . The mighty men of Babylon have forborne to fight, they have remained in their holds: their might hath failed: they became as women: they have burnt her dwelling-places: her bars are broken. One post shall run to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to show the king of Babylon that his city is taken at one end, and that the passages are stopped, and the reeds they have burnt with fire, and the men of war are affrighted. . . . And Babylon shall become heaps, a

All this ruin fell upon Babylon, as it had been foretold. The golden city became heaps of rubbish. And so completely was its magnificence swept off by the 'besom of destruction,' that the very site of it was for long a perplexing mystery. Modern investigations, while they have exactly discovered what once was Babylon, have shown us yet more satisfactorily how the threatened doom was executed.

It would require a volume to describe the ruins of this great city. Only some brief particulars can be detailed here. On the banks of the Euphrates,' says Kalisch (p. 314), 'about 40 miles south-west of Baghdad, lies the town Hillah, which, dwelling-place for dragons, an astonishment and an hissing, without an inhabitant. . . . The sea is come up upon Babylon: she is covered with the multitude of the waves thereof. Her cities are a desolation, a dry land, and a wilderness, a land wherein no man dwelleth, neither doth any son of man pass thereby. . . . for the Lord God of recompences shall surely requite. And I will make drunk her princes, and her wise men, her captains, and her rulers, and her mighty men; and they shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake, saith the King, whose name is the Lord of hosts. Thus saith the Lord of hosts: The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken; and her high gates shall be burnt with fire; and the people shall labour in vain, and the folk in the fire, and they shall be weary' (li. 8, 9, 13, 30-32, 37, 42, 43, 50-58).

though next to Baghdad and Basra the greatest in the pashalik, is meanly and irregularly built, narrow and dirty, with dilapidated mosques and public baths; but it is enclosed by a strong wall, and well protected by a garrison, towers, and a battery, and contains a population of about 10,000 Jews and Arabs, carrying on a rather-animated commerce on the Euphrates. This town is in almost all directions surrounded by immense ruins, appearing the work of nature rather than of men, shapeless heaps of rubbish, lofty banks of ancient canals, fragments of glass, marble, pottery, and bricks, mingled with a nitrous soil which impedes all vegetation, and renders the neighbourhood "a naked and hideous waste," re-echoing only the dismal sounds of the owl and jackal, of the hyena and the lawless robber. These piles mark the area once occupied by the mistress of the ancient world.' The ruins are chiefly on the left or eastern bank of the Euphrates; the town of Hillah being on the western side. The most remarkable are two long lines of rampart which meet at a right angle: these form, with the river, a kind of triangle, and thus enclose most of the plain, and is tolerably flat at the top. It is composed chiefly of unbaked bricks; but Dr. Layard has shown (Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 503-505) that it was originally coated with fine burnt bricks, cemented with good mortar. It was probably built in stages. In the excavations which have been made here, coffins with skeletons, noted masses. Subtending the angle at which these ramparts meet are two other parallel lines running nearly due north and south. Between these and the river are the principal ruins. But the remarkable mass of Babil lies without the ramparts to the north: next, proceeding southward, is the Kasr; after that the mound of Amran-ben-Ali; and at some distance to the southwest on the western side of the Euphrates is the Birs Nimrud.

The mass called Babil, or Mujelibeh, 6 or 7 miles north of Hillah, is oblong in shape, about 200 yards long and 140 broad. It rises to the height of 140 feet above the

The Kasr, probably the great palace of Nebuchadnezzar, is an irregular square of about 700 yards. In the centre rises a solid mass of masonry, in which architectural ornaments are still to be seen, piers, buttresses, and pilasters. The walls are of burnt brick, of a pale yellow colour, united by a fine lime cement, and on each are the name and titles of Nebuchadnezzar. 'This wonderful piece of masonry is so perfect and so fresh in colour, that it seems but the work of yesterday, although it is undoubtedly part of a building which stood in the midst of old Babylon.' The rest of the ruins are masses of rubbish, and have contributed for many generations materials for the building of neighbouring towns. In this rubbish, however, have been found some slabs inscribed by Nebuchadnezzar, with an account of the construction of the edifice; also enamelled bricks of various colours. These colours, brilliant blue, red, deep yellow, white, and black, retain much of their original brightness; and portions of figures are still traceable in them. There are other remarkable features of the Kasr, a subterranean passage walled and floored with bricks, a huge lion standing over a man with out-stretched arms, &c., which many travellers have described.

The mound called Amran-ben-Ali has its ing-place. Here have been found curious terra-cotta bowls. Round their inner surface are inscriptions in old Chaldee, but written in strange mixed characters. They appear to have been charms against evil spirits. They are believed to date from the third century before Christ to the fifth century after Christ.

Some of the less important remains in the immediate neighbourhood of those which have been just described are thought to indicate the site of the smaller palace, of the bridge over the Euphrates, &c. But there is one more distant structure of imposing proportions, which was long supposed to be the ruined tower of Babel. This is called the Birs Nimrud, about six miles to the south-west of Hillah, and consequently west of the Euphrates, and about the same distance from it; and it seems to be pretty well ascertained that it did not belong to Babylon itself, but to the neighbouring town of Borsippa. This vast mass is described as consisting of two distinct name from the domed tomb of a Mohammedan saint, which stands upon its summit. According to Rich, it is an irregular parallelogram, 1,100 yards by 800; but others give it a different shape, and describe it as of different dimensions. No masonry is visible; and the materials of it are thought to be of an inferior description. It has been supposed to be the remains of the ancient hanging-gardens: if so, it must be of the palace also to which they were attached, as the mass is far larger than the site occupied by the gardens. Mr. Rawlinson, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 154, says: 'Most probably it represents the ancient palace, coeval with Babylon itself, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks in his inscriptions as adjoining his own more magnificent residence. It is the only part of the ruins from which bricks have been derived containing the names of kings earlier than Nebuchadnezzar, and is therefore entitled to be considered the most ancient of the existing remains.' This mound served, in later times, for a bury-parts, but both enclosed by the same wall. The western portion, though lower, is the larger of the two, 1,200 feet in diameter: it is traversed by ravines and water-courses, and has upon its summit two small Mohammedan mosques. The higher mound rises abruptly on the western face, but on the other side are a series of gradations or stages. The walls are of vast thickness, and allow at half their height a circuit round the ruins. The bricks of the exterior are for the most part kiln-burnt: those of the interior are mixed with chopped straw and baked in the sun; and the whole mass is pierced with square holes. The highest part is a wonderful specimen of Babylonian architecture, a solid piece of masonry 28 feet broad and 35 feet in height, so compacted that a piece cannot be separated from the rest. It has been shattered and cloven by some catastrophe, probably by fire; but it still stands erect. The view from the top is said to present a scene of most striking utter desolation. From a careful examination of the Birs in its present state, the form and character of the original building may be reasonably conjectured. It must have been a kind of oblique pyramid; 'Upon a platform of crude brick, raised a few feet above the level of the alluvial plain, was built of burnt brick the first or basement stage, an exact square, 272 feet each way, and 26 feet in perpendicular height. Upon this stage was erected a second, 230 feet each way, and likewise 26 feet high, which, however, was not placed exactly in the middle of the first, but considerably nearer to the south-western end, which constituted the back of the building. The other stages were arranged similarly; the third being 188 feet, and again 26 feet high; the fourth, 146 feet square, and 15 feet high; the fifth, 104 feet square, and the same height as the fourth; the sixth, 62 feet square, and again the same height; and the seventh, 20 feet square, and once more the same height. On the seventh stage there was probably placed the ark, or tabernacle, which seems to have been again 15 feet high, and must have nearly, if not entirely, covered the top of the seventh story. The entire original height, allowing 3 feet for the platform, would thus have been 156 feet, or, without the platform, 153 feet. The whole formed a sort of oblique pyramid, the gentler slope facing the north-east, and the steeper inclining to the south-west. On the north-east side was the grand entrance; and here stood the vestibule, a separate building, the débris from which, having joined those from the temple itself, fill up the intermediate space, and very remarkably prolong the mound in this direction' (Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. ii. pp. 582, 583). This was called the Temple of the Seven Spheres; and the different stages were appropriated to the heavenly bodies, and were differently coloured according to the rules of Sabæan astrology: thus, the lowest was black, as dedicated to Saturn; the second, to Jupiter, was orange; the third, red, in honour of Mars; the fourth was devoted to the sun, and was gold-coloured; the fifth, white (or, according to some, yellow), to Venus; the sixth, blue, consecrated to Mercury; while the seventh belonged to the moon, and was silver-coloured, or silvery green. According to the inscriptions, this temple was founded more than 1100 years B.C. by Merodach-adan-akhi. He did not, however complete it; and the portions he erected fell into decay. Nebuchadnezzar, some centuries after, repaired and finished it. It was partially destroyed by Xerxes. Alexander the Great determined to restore it; but, after considerable labour had been bestowed in trying to clear away the rubbish he abandoned the design. And so it mouldered on. Various relics have been discovered here.

Such has been the fall of haughty Babylon. Who shall say that the word of the Lord spoken by his servants the prophets has not been literally and most marvelously fulfilled?

A few words must be said in regard to the religion of the Babylonians or Chaldeans. It was nearly allied to that of the Assyrians (some of whose gods have been already named: see ASSYRIA); the same beings, though with some difference of name or of position, being revered by both peoples.

The religion of Chaldea, according to Rawlinson, was to a certain extent astral. The heaven itself, the sun, the moon, the five then-known planets, all had their representatives as chief objects of worship. But this astral element was partial. The religion was not mere Sabæanism, the adoration of the heavenly host; and the gods corresponding to the sun and moon and planets were more than simple representations of those natural objects. They had a life and history attributed to them, as in classical mythology, and seem to have denoted deified heroes rather than celestial bodies.

At the head of the Pantheon was Il or Ra, considered the fount and origin of deity. In Assyria, however, Asshur was the chief. Next to Il came a triad: Ana, Bil or Belus, and Hea or Hoa; answering to the classical Pluto, Jupiter, and Neptune respectively. Each of these was coupled with a female principle, or wife: that of Ana was called Anat; of Bil, Multa or Beltis; of Hea, Davkina. Another triad succeeded: Sin or Hurki, the moon-god, married to one whose name is unknown, but who is designated as 'the great lady'; San or Sansi, the sun, married to Ai, Gula or Anunit; and Vul (?) the god of the atmosphere, whose wife was Shala or Tala. Five inferior deities then followed: Nin or Ninip (Saturn), Merodach (Jupiter), Nergal (Mars), Ishtar (Venus), Nebo (Mercury), some of them having wives. These were the principal gods, among whom a certain relationship existed. After them come the second and third orders, in which vast numbers were reckoned. Many of these deities had their special places of worship in particular cities. Thus, Babylon was under the protection of Il; though in the great temple there Bil, and, in later times, Merodach, was peculiarly honoured. But possibly the same deity may have been intended by both names. And it must be understood that there is as yet some uncertainty in regard to the mythology of both Assyria and Babylon. Bil has usually an adjunct, Nipru; and Bil-Nipru (hunter-lord, perhaps Nimrod) was worshipped chiefly at Nipur (Niffer) or Calneh. Ana was adored at Erech (Wurka). The moon-god had his principal shrine at Ur (Mugheir); the sun-god, at Larsa or Ellasar, and Sippara. Nin, the fish-god, had one famous temple at Nineveh and another at Calah (Nimrad?). The chief seat of Nebo's worship was at Borsippa, where the Birs was dedicated to him. Nergal's emblem was the man-lion of the sculptures: Cutha was his particular city.

Among the follies and fables of Babylonian idolatry some trace of original truth may be discerned. Thus, they had traditions of the Creation and of the Flood, based, it would seem, on scripture history. There was also a remembrance preserved of the great tower erected on the plains of Shinar, and of the events connected therewith. See Rawlinson's Five Great Monarchies, chap. vii. vol. i. pp. 138-188; also Herodotus, App. book i. essay x. vol. i. pp. 584-642.

BABEL, TOWER OF. See BABEL.

BA'BI (1 Esdr. viii. 37). A form of Bebai (Ezra viii. 11).

BAB'YLON. The Greek form of BABEL, which see.—2. A place where there was a Christian church, from which St. Peter sends a salutation (1 Pet. v. 13). It has been much disputed whether the apostle meant the great city so called: it is most probable that he did. See PETER, EPISTLES OF.—3. The word is frequently used symbolically (Rev. xiv. 8, xvii. 5, xviii.).

BABYLO'NIANS. The inhabitants of Babylon (Ezra iv. 9). A colony of them had been planted in the cities of Samaria.

BABYLO'NISH (Josh. vii. 21). Belonging to Babylon. The original is 'garment of Shinar.'

BA'CA (weeping, lamentation). A valley in Palestine, probably sterile (Psal. lxxxiv. 6). The pilgrim-journeys to Jerusalem are here described. Those who so go up, 'passing through the valley of weeping, make it a spring,' i.e. the sterile land becomes to them a watered valley. The plural of this word is rendered 'mulberry trees' in 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chron. xiv. 14, 15.

BAC'CHIDES. A governor of Mesopotamia, whom Demetrius Soter sent into Judea. Three expeditions of his are mentioned; in the second of which Judas Maccabeus was defeated and slain: the result of the last was a peace concluded with Jonathan, the brother of Judas (1 Macc. vii., ix).

BACCHURUS. A singer (1 Esdr. ix. 24).

BAC'CHUS, or Dionysus. The name of the god of wine in classic mythology. Nicanor threatened to erect a temple to him on the site of the temple at Jerusalem (2 Macc. xiv. 33). And the Jews were forced by Antiochus Epiphanes to go in procession, carrying ivy at his feast (vi. 7).

BACE'NOR. Probably captain of a troop under Judas Maccabeus (2 Macc. xii. 35).

BACH'RITES (Numb. xxvi. 35). A family of Ephraim, through BECHER, which see.

BADGER. The word occurs generally in connection with skins (Exod. xxv. 5, xxvi. 14, xxxv. 7, 23, xxxvi. 19, xxxix. 34; Numb. iv. 6, 8, 10, 11, 14, 25). The ancient versions supposed it significative of a colour; but for such a supposition there is no sufficient ground. It must have denoted the skin of some animal, which was used as an outer covering for the tabernacle and its appurtenances, and as shoes for females (Ezek. xvi. 10). And, though certainly there are reasons which make in favour of considering the animal in question literally a badger, yet we may much more probably suppose that the seal is intended. Seals were numerous on the shores of the peninsula of Sinai: tents were covered with seal-skins (Pliny, Hist. Nat. lib. ii. 56); and to this day shoes are made of them.

BAG, BAGS. 'This is the earliest indication,' says Dr. Kitto, Pictorial Bible, on 2 Kings xii. 10, 'of a still-subsisting eastern custom, under which, to save the trouble of repeated counting, a certain sum is put up in a bag, which, being sealed and properly labelled, passes current (in Turkey under the name of "a purse") for the amount it contains. It is the authority of the seal which gives the bag currency; for the seal is that of a public officer, or of a person of known responsibility; and, if, when at length opened, any deficiency should appear, he is bound to make it good, if the claimant can prove that the bag was previously free from any marks of violence, and that the seal remained unbroken.' The word is elsewhere used in our version for a scrip, wallet, purse, &c.

BA'GO (1 Esdr. viii. 40). A corrupted form of Bigvai (Ezra viii. 14).

BAGO'AS. An eunuch under Holofernes (Judith xii. 11).

BA'GOI (1 Esdr. v. 14). A corrupted form of Bigvai (Ezra ii. 14).

BAHARU'MITE, or BARHU'MITE. A native of Bahurim (1 Chron. xi. 33). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 31 the word is Barhumite.

BAHUR'IM (young men). A village apparently belonging to Benjamin, not far from Jerusalem, beyond Olivet to the east, on one of the roads leading to the Jordan, from which Shimei came out to curse David (2 Sam. xvi. 5), and where Jonathan and Ahimaaaz were hid in a well (xvii. 17-21). Azmaveth, called the Barhumite (xxiii. 31) and the Baharumite (1 Chron. xi. 33), was probably a native of this place.

BA'JITH (house, or temple). This word has the article in the original (Isai. xv. 2); it is not, therefore, a proper name, but signifies 'the temple,' doubtless the principal one, of Chemosh. It is probably identical with the 'sanctuary' (xvi. 12).

BAKBAK'KAR (wasting of the mount, or, according to some, diligent searching). A Levite (1 Chron. ix. 15).

BAK'BUK (a bottle). The children of Bakkuk, Nethinims, returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

BAKBUK'AH (emptying or wasting of Jehovah). A Levite (Neh. xi. 17, xii. 9, 25). It is not certain that the Bakkukiah of the last place is the individual mentioned in the former two.

BAKER, BAKING. See BREAD.

BA'LAAM (foreigner, otherwise destruction of the people). Balaam was the son of Beor (Bosor, 2 Pet. ii. 15); and his dwelling was at Pethor in Mesopotamia (Deut. xxiii. 4). He gained so great a reputation as a prophet, that it was believed that his blessings or curses could influence the destinies of nations. Accordingly, when the Moabites and Midianites apprehended danger from the advance of Israel, they sent to Balaam with offers of reward if he would go and curse the Hebrew tribes. The prophet was unwilling to lose the opportunity of aggrandisement, though he professed obedience to God, who warned him that the Israelites were blessed, and rebuked him by an angel, and by the portent of his ass speaking. Some expositors imagine that this was not a real event, but a vision, because Balaam expressed no surprise, and his companions do not seem to have witnessed it, and also because he afterwards speaks (according to our version, the accuracy of which may be questioned) of falling into a trance (Numb. xxiv. 3, 4, 15, 16). But the testimony of the apostle Peter (2 Pet. ii. 16) seems decisive as to the actual occurrence of the fact. It is true that the genuineness of 2 Peter has been suspected, but not on sufficient grounds. See PETER, EPISTLES OF. The humble believer, therefore, need not question the miraculous interposition of the Deity at such a critical point in the history of his chosen people.

When Balaam came to Balak, instead of pronouncing curses, he uttered, under divine inspiration, blessings upon Israel, and, being dismissed by the king of Moab in anger, he delivered a remarkable prediction reaching to the times of Messiah (Numb. xxii., xxiii., xxiv.). Some difficulty has been felt because, in xxiv. 25, we are told that Balaam 'returned to his place,' while, in xxxi. 8, 16, he is said to have given evil counsel to the Midianites, and to have fallen in the war of that nation with Israel. But we may suppose that he went to his own home, and afterwards returned to Midian; or, more probably, as the elders of Midian as well as of Moab invited him at first, that on his journey homewards (see a somewhat-similar expression in Jonah iv. 2; for Jonah did not really reach Tarshish) passing into Midian he lingered there, perhaps afresh incited by eager greed, and there gave that fatal counsel which proved his own destruction; so that he is a beacon to warn the world that the highest gifts may be possessed, nay, even the prophetic spirit, and yet the possessor be graceless and a castaway. Balaam is referred to in Micah vi. 5; Rev. ii. 14. The meaning of Nicolaus, the name of the founder of the sect condemned in the last passage, is identical with Balaam. Bishop Butler has a noteworthy sermon (vii.) on the character of Balaam.

BA'LAC, for Balak (Rev. ii. 14).

BAL'ADAN (Bel is his lord, i.e. worshipper of Bel). The father of Merodach-Baladan, king of Babylon (2 Kings xx. 12; Isai. xxxix. 1).

BA'LAH (perhaps bashfulness). A town in the territory of Simeon (Josh. xix. 3). It is the same with Baalah (xv. 29), and Bilhah (1 Chron. iv. 29). See BIZOTHAH.

BA'LAK (emptier, spoiler). The son of Zippor, king of Moab, who hired Balaam to curse the Israelites (Numb. xxii.-xxiv.; Josh. xxiv. 9; Judges xi. 25; Micah vi. 5).

BA'LAMO (Judith viii. 3). This has been supposed identical with Baal-Hamon. It is, however, but a conjecture.

BALANCES. The Hebrews were commanded to have 'just balances' (Lev. xix. 36). The word from which the name in the original is derived signifies 'to poise;' we may conclude, then, that these scales resembled those in ordinary use among ourselves. Wilkinson, describing the Egyptian balance, says, 'The principle of the common balance was simple and ingenious; the beam passed through a ring suspended from a horizontal rod immediately above and parallel to it; and, when equally balanced, the ring, which was large enough to allow the beam to play freely, showed when the scales were equally poised, and had the additional effect of preventing the beam tilting when the goods were taken out of one and the weights suffered to remain in the other. To the lower part of the ring a small plummet was fixed; and this, being touched by the hand and found to hang freely, indicated, without the necessity of looking at the beam, that the weight was just' (Anc. Egypt, vol. ii. p. 240). There was another word employed, of which the original signification was the 'making level.' It is used with the former (Prov. xvi. 11, translated 'weight;' Isai. xl. 12, translated 'scales'), and has been thought to be a 'steel-yard.' The balance is a symbol of justice and fair dealing (Job xxxi. 6; Psal. lxxi. 9; Dan. v. 27). The notion implied, however, in Rev. vi. 5, 6, was that of scarcity.

BALAS'AMUS (1 Esdr. ix. 43).

BALDNESS. Natural baldness must have been uncommon among the Israelites, as it provoked derision (2 Kings ii. 23). Besides, a suspicion of leprosy might attach to it, as we gather from the minute directions of Lev. xiii. 40-43. But the head was sometimes shaven, as at the accomplishment of a Nazarite or other vow (Numb. vi. 18; Acts xviii. 18). And this was a sign of mourning and degradation (Isai. iii. 24, xv. 2; Jer. xlvii. 5, xlvi. 37; Ezek. vii. 18). The producing of artificial baldness was forbidden to the priests, and, in some measure, to the Israelitish people, as being an imitation of heathen practices (Lev. xxi. 5; Deut. xiv. 1; Ezek. xlv. 20).

BALM, BALSAM-TREE. The gum of a tree or shrub mentioned as growing in Gilead; elsewhere also in Palestine. It was considered a choice product, used in healing wounds, and was an article of export (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11; Jer. viii. 22, xlv. 11, li. 8; Ezek. xxvii. 17, where 'rosin' marg.). The original word is tzēri, or tzōri; and naturalists are not fully agreed as to the plant with which it is to be identified. Duns, however, says: 'After much discussion and countless theories, it may now be concluded that the tzēri is the produce of a shrub known to botanists as the Balsamodendron Gileadense, the generic name being that given to it by Theophrastus (balsamon dendron). It belongs to the natural order of dicotyledonous plants Amyridaceæ, or myrrh family, a group remarkable for their fragrant resins. . . A spurious article is manufactured in Palestine from the fruit of one of the oleasters, called by the natives zukum, and sold to travellers as the famous balm of Gilead' (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. i. pp. 466-471). Jahn (Bibl. Antiq., part i. chap. iv. 74) speaks of balm being distilled from a tree indigenous near Mecca and Medina. The sap extracted from the trunk is opobalsamum, that from the branches cut off and boiled xylobalsamum, the juice of the fruit carpobalsamum.

BALNU'US (1 Esdr. ix. 31). Probably a corrupt form of Binnui (Ezra x. 30).

BALTHASAR. A form of Belshazzar (Bar. i. 11, 12).

BA'MAH (high place). This word, frequently occurring in the Hebrew scriptures, is regarded as a proper name only in Ezek. xx. 29. The place is obscure, but seems to imply that, in spite of God's reproof, the people still spoke of and honoured the high places where they were accustomed to sacrifice.

BA'MOTH (heights). A station of the Israelites in the territory of Moab (Numb. xxi. 19, 20; comp. 28); it is probably alluded to in Isai. xv. 2, and would seem to be the same with

BA'MOTH-BA'AL (heights of Baal) (Josh. xiii. 17; comp. Numb. xxii. 41). This place was allotted to Reuben. The site may be on the present Jebel Attârûs.

BAN (1 Esdr. v. 37).

BANAFAS (1 Esdr. ix. 35). A form of Benaiah (Ezra x. 43).

BAND. The 'band' (Matt. xxvii. 27) was the cohort, the tenth part of the Roman legion. Accompanying this band were the officers of the council, with servants and others from the high priest (John xviii. 3, 12, 18). See Alford, The Greek Test., note on Matt. xxvi. 47.

BA'NI (built).—1. A Gadite, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 36).—2. A Levite, of the line of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 46).

—3. A descendant of Judah (ix. 4).—4. One whose posterity returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 10, x. 29, 34), called also Binnui (Neh. vii. 15).—5. One of those sons of Bani who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 38).—6. A Levite (Neh. iii. 17).—7. Another Levite (viii. 7, ix. 4, 5, x. 13).—8. One who sealed the covenant, perhaps as representing the sons of Bani (x. 14).—9. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (xi. 22), possibly the same with No. 6 or 7.

BA'NID (1 Esdr. viii. 36).

BANISHMENT. See PUNISHMENTS.

BANK (Luke xix. 23). See MONEY-CHANGER.

BANNAIA (1 Esdr. ix. 33).

BANNER (Exod. xvii. 15, marg.; Psal. xx. 5, lx. 4; Sol. Song ii. 4, vi. 4; Isai. xliii. 2). See STANDARD.

BAN'NUS (1 Esdr. ix. 34): comp. Ezra x. 33.

BANQUET. Festal entertainments among the Hebrews had often a religious aspect; thus, they accompanied those great solemnities of worship when the people were to appear before the Lord in the place where his sanctuary was (Deut. xvi.: comp. Tob. ii. 1); they were usual, also, at the ordinary sacrifices (1 Sam. ix. 12, 13, xvi. 2, 3; 1 Kings iii. 15), and, besides, at the making of covenants (Gen. xxvi. 30, xxxi. 46, 54).

The more domestic occasions on which banquets were given were at the weaning of children (xxi. 8); at weddings (xxix. 22; Judges xiv. 10; John ii. 1-11); on birthdays, specially those of kings (Gen. xl. 20; Job. i. 4; Matt. xiv. 6); at certain rural anniversaries, as sheep-shearing (1 Sam. xxv. 2, 36; 2 Sam. xliii. 23-29), harvest (Ruth iii. 2, 3, 7; Isai. ix. 3), vintage (Judges ix. 27); at funerals (2 Sam. iii. 35; Jer. xvi. 7; Ezek. xxiv. 17; Hos.

ix. 4); and in the exercise of hospitality on the arrival or departure of friends, or even strangers (Gen. xviii. 2-8, xix. 3, xxxi. 27; 2 Sam. iii. 20, xii. 4; 2 Kings vi. 22, 23; Luke v. 29, xv. 23, 24). Banquets were generally held in the evening; and the beginning to feast early in the day is censured (Eccles. x. 16; Isai. v. 11, 12).

Invitations were sent by servants (Prov. ix. 3; Matt. xxii. 3); and fitting preparations were made, by killing oxen, mingling wine, and furnishing the table (Prov. ix. 2; Isai. xxii. 13; Matt. xxii. 4). It was then customary, when everything was ready, to send again to the invited guests. This practice survives to the present day, 'not very strictly among the common people, nor in cities where western manners have greatly modified the oriental; but in Lebanon it still prevails. If a sheikh . . . invites, he always sends a servant to call you at the proper time. This servant often repeats the very formula mentioned in Luke xiv. 17, "Come; for the supper is ready." The fact that this custom is mainly confined to the wealthy and to the nobility is in strict agreement with the parable, where the certain man who made the great supper and bade many is supposed to be of this class' (Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 125).

The guests, when they arrived, were bound to appear in befitting dress (Eccles. ix. 8; Matt. xxii. 11, 12). Sometimes the master of the house bestowed robes on those he entertained. It is not intended to say that this was ordinarily the custom, yet there can be little doubt that on special occasions, particularly by sovereigns, it was done (2 Kings x. 22). An oriental monarch now presents a robe of honour to persons admitted to his court. The guests were received with a kiss (Luke vii. 45): water was offered for their feet if they had come from a journey (Gen. xviii. 4, xix. 2, xliii. 24): rich perfumes were poured upon their head, beard, clothes, and sometimes feet (Psal. xxiii. 5; Amos vi. 6; Luke vii. 38, 46; John xii. 3); and they were, it would seem, occasionally crowned with flowers (Wisd. ii. 7, 8). Persons were arranged at table (at which the ancient Hebrews sat; though afterwards the custom of reclining was introduced) according to their rank and the honour intended to be paid them (Gen. xliiii. 33; 1 Sam. ix. 22; Mark xii. 39; Luke xiv. 7-10). Portions were selected by the master of the feast for each guest; and a double or even five-fold portion, or some peculiar dainty, was taken to those who were specially honoured (Gen. xliiii. 34; 1 Sam. ix. 23, 24). Joseph at his entertainment to his brethren sat at a separate table (Gen. xliiii. 32), and to this circumstance, probably, the sending of messes is to be attributed: in ordinary cases, where all sat at one board, the custom in this respect might differ little from our own, save that it was probably the ancient practice, as it certainly is at the present day, for an oriental entertainer, in his politeness, to pick out of the dish some choice morsel for an honoured guest, and even occasionally to insist on putting it into his mouth. Portions were sometimes sent from the banquet to poor friends (Neh. viii. 10, 12; Esth. ix. 19, 22); but this seems to have been more on occasions of general festivity than at an ordinary social entertainment. The entertainer did not always preside; for we find a 'governor,' or 'ruler of the feast,' distinct from the bridegroom who furnished the wedding entertainment (John ii. 8-10). This 'governor' was generally some chosen friend; and his duty was to take charge of the provision and to direct the servants.

The sumptuousness of a banquet was exhibited in the multitude of the guests, the daintiness and profusion of the viands, the richness of the wines, often mixed with spices, and the music, dancing, and varied revelry, carried frequently to an excess of luxurious debauchery, which we find the prophets and apostles censuring in the strongest language (2 Sam. xix. 35; Isai. v. 11, 12, 22; Amos vi. 3-6; Matt. xiv. 6; Rom. xiii. 13; 1 Pet. iv. 3; 2 Pet. ii. 13). A wedding banquet lasted a week (Gen. xxix. 27, 28; Judges xiv. 10-18); riddles being sometimes proposed for the entertainment of the company. Occasionally it seems to have been extended to fourteen days (Tob. viii. 19, 20); though, according to the rabbins, if the bride were a widow, three days ought to be the limit. Royal banquets were sometimes very protracted. The festival celebrated by Ahasuerus (Xerxes) lasted half a year, being wound up by a special entertainment continued for seven days (Esth. i. 3-5). At this feast the sexes were separated (9). But at Belshazzar's banquet his wives and concubines were present (Dan. v. 2). In the New Testament we read of women being admitted to the room where a banquet was given (Luke vii. 37, 38; John ii. 1-5): it is, however, sometimes noted that they waited on the guests (xii. 2). The custom of reclining at meals gave opportunity for anointing a person's feet (3): it also explains how the head of one was close upon the breast of him who was immediately above him (xiii. 23).

Besides the general warnings against excess, others were needed in apostolic times. For Christians living in the midst of heathens might appear, when food that had been offered to an idol was placed on the table, to be paying respect to that idol. St. Paul's direction is wise and explicit (1 Cor. x. 27-31). Comp. Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Gastmahle.'

BAN'UAS (1 Esdr. v. 26).

BAPTISM. A rite instituted by our Lord, in order to admission into his church, by the symbolical application of water.

A kind of baptism had, there is reason to believe, been practised among the Jews prior to Christ's advent. Proselytes, if men, submitted to circumcision and baptism, and presented an oblation; if they were women, the ceremonies were baptism and the oblation. Such persons were baptized in the day-time by immersion, and were instructed in certain parts of the law while they stood in the water. The whole family of a proselyte, infants included, were baptized with him. It is questioned, indeed, whether proselyte-baptism was in use so early as above stated; and many critics have argued for its later introduction. But, as Dr. Alford very well says, 'the baptism or lustration of a proselyte on admission would follow as a matter of course, by analogy, from the constant legal practice of lustration after all uncleanness; and it is difficult to imagine a time when it would not be in use. Besides, it is highly improbable that the Jews should have borrowed the rite from the Christians, or the Jewish hierarchy from John' (The Greek Test., note on Matt. iii. 6). Still, this much must be conceded: if proselyte baptism were indeed practised so early, it was but of secondary importance: it was not the special initiatory rite by which an alien was grafted into the Jewish church: it was rather one of the ablutions obligatory upon those already members of that church, than an ordinance in order to their becoming so. (See the question argued by Dr. M. Stuart, Amer. Bibl. Rep., vol. iii. pp. 338-355).

We must, therefore, take some wider basis for the baptism of John. The custom of ablu-tion, as already observed, was frequent under the law. The Jewish mind was familiarized to it as a symbol of purification from disease and pollution. When Naaman, therefore, was to be cleansed from his leprosy, and his flesh to come again as that of a little child, he was to wash in Jordan. The command was very significant. It was a test of humble obedience: his compliance with it was the crisis of an incipient new and healthy life. Very natural, therefore, and very apposite was the language of the prophets, when describing the admirable nature of the new covenant. Clean water, it was said, was to be sprinkled on those to whom, by the power of the Spirit, a heart of flesh would be given (Ezek. xxxvi. 35-37): a fountain was in that day to be opened for sin and for uncleanness (Zech. xiii. 1). Hence the Jews would regard baptism as a symbol of the approach of the Messianic kingdom; and hence their questioning of John why, if he were not Elias, the immediate herald of Messiah, he presumed to baptize (John i. 25). John had received a direct commission from God (33). It was not that, finding such lustration in use, he adopted it as deeming it a fit symbol of his mission, but that God, taking, as he so often does, the idea already familiar to the nation, invested it with new significance when he sent John to baptize with water, and stirred up thereby the expectations of the Jews for the near appearance of the Christ. John baptized unto repentance, and was surprised when Jesus sought baptism at his hand. But, though Jesus, who had no sin, needed no repentance or purification, it became him in this way to 'fulfil all righteousness' (Matt. iii. 13-15). He came to bear our sins, for which he endured the curse of the law; and, being in the likeness of sinful flesh, it was fit that he should 'go through those appointed rites and purifications which belonged to that flesh' (Alford). It was, too, his consecration to his public ministry, on which he was now to enter—the inaugural rite, with the descent of the Spirit and the testimony of the Father, of that new dispensation of which he was to be the Mediator.

The distinct assertions of the evangelists that supernatural circumstances occurred at our Lord's baptism must not be qualified or explained away (Matt. iii. 16, 17; Mark i. 10, 11; Luke iii. 21, 22). Nor are the accounts of the first Gospels inconsistent with that in the fourth (John i. 33, 34). Whether others besides Jesus and John were present at the time we know not, or whether, if there were, they were cognizant of the miracle (comp. Acts ix. 7). Yet it was no mere vision, no figurative expression that was used: the facts as recorded must be reverently accepted. The Father's voice, the Spirit's form, were really heard and seen.

The baptism of John was introductory to the higher baptism instituted by Christ (Matt. iii. 11; Acts xviii. 25, 26, xix. 2-5). And we find that very early in his ministry our Lord began to baptize, through his disciples, those that resorted to him (John iii. 22, 26, iv. 1, 2). Just before his ascension, too, he gave a solemn charge to the apostles that they should make disciples in all nations, 'baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost' (Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15, 16). Thenceforth the practice ever prevailed. And we find the sacred writers dwelling in the strongest terms on the privileges and obligations of baptism. Men were baptized into Christ's death: they were buried with him by baptism into death: baptized into Christ, they had put on Christ (Rom. vi. 3, 4; Gal. iii. 27). It was to be the beginning of a new life: planted in the likeness of Christ's death, they were to be also in the likeness of his resurrection (Rom. vi. 5).

The different opinions which have been maintained respecting the efficacy of baptism must be sought in other works. They have been widely divergent in different sections of the Christian church; and much sharp controversy has been provoked. It must be sufficient here to cite the well-weighed language of the 27th article of the Anglican church: 'Baptism is not only a sign of profession, and mark of difference, whereby Christian men are discerned from others that be not christened, but it is also a sign of regeneration or new birth, whereby, as by an instrument, they that receive baptism rightly are grafted into the church; the promises of forgiveness of sin, and of our adoption to be the sons of God by the Holy Ghost, are visibly signed and sealed: faith is confirmed and grace increased by virtue of prayer to God.'

There is also disagreement as to the persons entitled to receive baptism. Without defining minor variations of judgment, it must be enough to say that some deny the rite to children. Children, however, were capable of church-membership among the Jews; for circumcision was performed on the eighth day after birth. We can hardly suppose that Christianity withdrew this privilege. And, if it did, we should expect to find Jewish cavillings on this account. It is superfluous to say that not a trace of these is apparent in the New Testament. Further, the baptism of households is noted by the sacred writers: were there no children in any of these households? Lydia alone is said to have had her heart opened. But Lydia and her household, it is added, were baptized (Acts xvi. 14, 15). Moreover, not only so far as we can judge from the remains of antiquity were children baptized in the primitive church, but—and this is very noteworthy—when men began, as some did, early to object to infant baptism, they never argued against it on the ground of novelty, introduced after the apostolic age, and contrary to apostolic custom. More cannot be said here on this point.

The mode of baptism, moreover, has been disputed—whether it should be by sprinkling, by affusion, or by immersion; or, as has sometimes been the practice, by affusion after immersion. This has been keenly argued. But it may fairly be said that the manner of applying the water can be of but little consequence. In the English church all the three modes are recognized. Immersion is prescribed, and pouring permitted, in the rubric of her baptismal service; while, by long custom, sprinkling is very frequently practised.

There is a baptizing for the dead spoken of in scripture (1 Cor. xv. 29), the explication of which has puzzled commentators. It would be tedious to recount the various notions which different theologians have entertained. Some have imagined that a custom of the Marcionites mentioned by Chrysostom is alluded to. These, it seems, placed under the bed of a dead catechumen a living man, who answered for the deceased, and was baptized in his stead (In Epist. i. ad Cor., hom. xl. tom. x. p. 378, edit. Bened.). But there is no proof that such a custom existed in St. Paul's days, and all presumption that (if it did) he would not have mentioned it without censure. Some, again, believe that another custom is alluded to, that of baptizing over the monuments or graves of the martyrs who died for the faith in hope of a future resurrection. But this, too, was a post-apostolic custom. Other suggestions may be seen in Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xi. chap. iv. sect. iv.; Alford, The Greek Test., note on 1 Cor. xv. 29-34, and elsewhere. In so great a diversity of opinion it is impossible to speak with any confidence. But the view, substantially that of Olshausen, seems not unworthy of consideration—they are baptized in the place of the dead. If there were no resurrection, if those who die live not again, who would stand forward to fill up their ranks? But, when they die in hope that the body sown in weakness shall be raised in power, as knowing that it is through the grave and gate of death that they pass to their joyful resurrection, we may well believe that fresh combatants will press forward over those that fall, that they will take on service with Christ, and undauntedly assume his badge. The death of their predecessors disarms them not: the certainty of their own death does not quench their ardour: they are 'baptized for the dead,' 'in sure and certain hope of the resurrection to eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

BARAB'BAS (son of Abba). A man who had been engaged in an insurrection or riot in Jerusalem shortly before our Lord's passion. He, with his accomplices, was lying under sentence of death, when Pilate, who was bound by custom to release a prisoner at the passover, proposed this man or Jesus to the choice of the people. He was, doubtless, persuaded that common decency would oblige them to prefer the innocent Saviour to so notorious a malefactor. But the people, instigated by the priests, demanded Barabbas, who was set free, while Christ was delivered to be crucified. It has been imagined that Barabbas was merely the head or promoter of some patriotic resistance to the Roman rule. But in that case Pilate would not have proposed him; for he would have been sensible that the Jews would naturally prefer him. Besides, he is called a robber and a murderer (Mark xv. 7; Luke xxiii. 25; John xviii. 40; Acts iii. 14).

BA'RACHEL (whom God hath blessed). The father of Elihu (Job xxxii. 2, 6).

BARACHI'AH (whom Jehovah hath blessed). A form, in some copies of our version, of Berechiah (Zech. i. 1, 7). See BERECHIAH.

BARACHI'AS (Matt. xxiii. 35). The Greek form of Barachiah, or BERECHIAH, which see.

BA'RAK (lightning). A general whom God raised up to deliver Israel from the oppression of Jabin, king of Canaan. This oppression was a judgment for their sins, and it lasted for twenty years (Judges iv. 1-3); a sufficient proof, if the credibility of the sacred narrative is at all to be maintained, that we have not in the history of Barak's victory (as some have imagined) only a repetition of Josh. xi. 1-12. Barak was the son of Abinoam of Kedesh-naphtali, and he was directed to muster 10,000 men of Naphtali and Zebulun towards mount Tabor. He refused, however, unless Deborah would accompany him. To this she consented, but assured him that he would not, in consequence, have the whole honour of the victory. Accordingly Deborah and Barak marched together. The result shall be told in the words of Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, pp. 435, 436): 'On the morning of that eventful day, probably long before it was light, Deborah set the little army in motion with the energetic command and animating promise, "Up; for this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thine hand. Is not the Lord gone out before thee?" (Judges iv. 14.) Rapidly they descend the mountain, cross over by Nain into the valley of Jezreel, then incline to the left to avoid the low and marshy ground, and by the first faint light of the morning they are upon the sleeping host of the Canaanites. This assault, wholly unexpected, threw them into instant and irrecoverable confusion. But half-awake, the whole army fled in dismay down the plain, hotly pursued by the victorious Barak. No time was allowed to recover from their panic. God also fought against them: "The earth trembled: the heavens dropped; the clouds also dropped water." Josephus adds, that a storm from the east beat furiously in the faces of the Canaanites, but only on the backs of the Jews. The storm is required by both the narrative of the action and the song of victory. It was to this, I suppose, that Deborah alluded—"Is not the Lord gone out before thee?"—and this it certainly was which swelled the Kishon, so that it swept away and drowned the flying host; for it never could do that except during a great rain. The army of Sisera naturally sought to regain the strongly-fortified Harosheth of the Gentiles, from which they had marched up to their camping-ground a short time before. This place is at the lower end of the narrow vale through which the Kishon passes out of Esdraelon into the plain of Acre; and this was their only practicable line of retreat. The victorious enemy was behind them: on their left were the hills of Samaria, in the hand of their enemies; on their right was the swollen river and the marshes of Thora; they had no alternative but to make for the narrow pass which led to Harosheth. The space, however, becomes more and more narrow, until within the pass it is only a few rods wide. There, horses, chariots, and men become mixed in horrible confusion, jostling and treading down one another; and the river, here swifter and deeper than above, runs zigzag from side to side of the vale, until, just before it reaches the castle of Harosheth, it dashes sheer up against the perpendicular base of Carmel. There is no longer any possibility of avoiding it. Rank upon rank of the flying host plunge madly in; those behind crushing those before deeper and deeper in the tenacious mud. They stick fast, are overwhelmed, are swept away by thousands. Such are the conditions of this battle and battle-field, that we can follow it out to the dire catastrophe.' See HAROSHETH. After the battle, Deborah and Barak celebrated it in a divine ode; and Israel had many years' rest from enemies (Judges iv., v.). The date is difficult to determine. Barak was possibly contemporary with or a little posterior to Shagar. Browne (Ordo Saecul., p. 261) places him a century later. He is mentioned by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 32).

BARBARIAN. This term is commonly used in the New Testament to denote those who were not Greeks (Rom. i. 14); just as the Israelites called all other nations Gentiles. At first, indeed, it signified persons who spoke a foreign (Acts xxviii. 2, 4; the dialect was Punic) or unknown (1 Cor. xiv. 11) language. Afterwards it conveyed the notion of ferocity; and so the Romans, who had acquiesced in the Greek meaning of the word, excepted themselves, and regarded those as barbarians who were neither Greeks nor Romans. See Winer, Bibl. Rwb., art. 'Barbaren.'

BARBER (Ezek. v. 1). See BEARD.

BARHUMITE (2 Sam. xxiii. 31). See BAHARUMITE.

BARIAH (a fugitive). One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 22).

BAR-JE'SUS (son of Jesus) (Acts xiii. 6). See ELYMAS.

BAR-JO'NA (son of Jona) (Matt. xvi. 17). See PETER.

BAR'KOS (painter). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 53; Neh. vii. 55).

BARLEY. A well-known species of grain. The Hebrew word implies 'bristling,' appositely descriptive of the bearded ears of barley; and when used in the singular it signifies barley in growth (Exod. ix. 31; Deut. viii. 8; Job xxxi. 40; Isai. xxviii. 25; Joel i. 11); when in the plural, the grain after threshing (2 Sam. xvii. 28; 1 Kings iv. 28; Jer. xli. 8; Ezek. iv. 9). Barley was of course not so much valued as wheat; a remarkable illustration of which is the fact that, whereas the ordinary meat-offering was of fine, that is, wheat-flour (Lev. ii. 1), the offering of the woman suspected of adultery was to be of barley-meal (Numb. v. 15; comp. Hos. iii. 2). Barley-harvest was earlier than that of wheat; this grain being usually cut in April. The barley generally grown in Palestine is our own common kind, Hordeum distichum.

BAR'NABAS (son of exhortation, or of consolation). The surname given by the apostles to Joses or Joseph, a Levite of Cyprus. Whether he was a personal disciple of our Lord we have no information; he is first named as being at Jerusalem shortly after the ascension, and selling his land to bring the price into the common fund of the church (Acts iv. 36, 37). It has been said—but the authority is not very good—that he was a fellow-student with Paul under Gamaliel. Be this as it may, the two had probably some early intimacy; for, after Saul's conversion, when he came to Jerusalem, all the disciples were afraid of him, till Barnabas took and introduced him to the apostles (ix. 27). We next hear of Barnabas when tidings reached the church at Jerusalem of the work of grace at Antioch. They deemed it right to send thither some eminent man; and Barnabas was selected for the charge, which he undertook with high commendation of the sacred writer as 'a good man and full of the Holy Ghost,' and with great success; so that, desiring a coadjutor, he sought out Saul and carried him to Antioch, where they both continued a year, till on the prophecy of a coming famine they were sent to convey relief to the brethren in Judea (xi. 22-30). Returning to Antioch they were accompanied by John Mark, Barnabas's nephew (xii. 25). Next we find them (and it is observable that Barnabas is still named first) designated by the Holy Ghost for missionary service. Accordingly, a solemn service was held, to consecrate them with imposition of hands—not to the ministry; teachers they were before, and, besides, St. Paul declares that he received his ministry and apostleship neither 'of man nor by man' (Gal. i. 2),—but for this special work. They went first to Cyprus, the country of Barnabas, accompanied by Mark (who, however, soon left them), and then, returning to the continent, preached the gospel through Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Lycaonia, where Barnabas, possibly from the gravity of his aspect, was supposed by the ignorant people to be Jupiter, and afterwards came back to Antioch. Through this journey they were both recognized as apostles; but Paul, after his rebuke of Elymas the sorcerer, took the lead, and is almost always afterwards named before Barnabas (xiii., xiv.). The next notice we have of Barnabas is his going with Paul, on account of the dissensions respecting circumcision, to Jerusalem, where a council was held and a decree made, with which they returned to Antioch (xv. 1-35). And possibly during the stay at Antioch after this return may have occurred the visit of Peter and the faltering of Barnabas (Gal. ii. 11-13). Then Paul proposed to him a fresh missionary journey. Barnabas, however, was anxious to have Mark with them, which Paul declined; and, alas! the contention was sharp between them; and they separated, and, so far as we know, met no more. Barnabas went with Mark to Cyprus; and here the scripture notice of him ends (xv. 36-39); save that we may conclude that he was alive when St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, and that he, like Paul, maintained himself by his own labour (1 Cor. ix. 6). There are sundry traditions of his later life, but none that can be relied on. And there is an epistle extant under his name; but the chief modern critics properly disbelieve its genuineness.

BARO'DIS (1 Esdr. v. 34).

BARRENNESS. It was regarded as a great misfortune among the Hebrews to be barren. Among the blessings, therefore, promised by the Lord to the covenant people, if they were faithful to the covenant, was this, that there should be no sterility among them or their cattle (Exod. xxiii. 26; Deut. vii. 14). Sons, rather than daughters, were specially desired, for perpetuating a man's lineage and establishing him a house; but it was also in the hope of becoming the parent of Messiah, for the realization of which many an Israelitish woman ardently longed. We find various illustrations in scripture history of the wish for children; and strange expedients were sometimes resorted to for procuring them. (Gen. xxi. 6, 7, xxv. 21, xxx. 1-4, 16, 17; Deut. xxv. 5, 6; Judges xi. 37-39; 1 Sam. i. 4-11).

BAR'SABAS (son of Saba). 1. (Acts i. 23). See JOSEPH, 10.—2. (xv. 22). See JUDAS, 7.

BAR'TACUS. The father of Apame, a concubine of Darius (1 Esdr. iv. 29).

BARTHOL'OMEW (son of Talmai). One of the twelve apostles selected by our Lord (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13). Under the name Bartholomew nothing more is recorded of him in scripture; but, if we may identify him with Nathanael (a name found only in St. John's Gospel), for which there is much probability, we are told that he was of Cana in Galilee, that he was brought to Jesus by Philip, and had the high commendation of Christ, 'Behold an Israelite indeed' (John i. 47). See NATHANAEL. According to varying traditions Bartholomew preached the gospel in India, perhaps Arabia, or Armenia, and was flayed alive there, and then crucified with his head downwards.

BARTIMÆUS, or BARTIMEUS (son of Timeu). A blind man, the son of Timeus. Our Lord restored him to sight in the neighbourhood of Jericho (Mark x. 46-52). If this narrative be compared with Matt. xx. 29-34; Luke xviii. 35-43, some differences appear. For St. Matthew speaks of two of these. According to some writers, as Greswell and Ebrard, our Lord healed one of these (as in Luke) on entering Jericho, and another (Bartimeus, as in Mark) on leaving it; and Matthew has, with characteristic brevity in recording miracles, combined both these in one. For other modes of solution see Horne's Introd. to Script., edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 473, 474.

BARUCH (blessed). 1. The son of Neriah (Jer. xxxii. 12, 13, 16), most probably the brother of Seraiah, chamberlain to king Zedekiah (li. 59). He is called 'the scribe' (xxxvi. 26), and was the attendant and amanuensis of the prophet Jeremiah (4). Baruch is said by Josephus to have shared Jeremiah's imprisonment during the siege of Jerusalem (Antiq., lib. x. 9, § 1). He was certainly afterwards with the prophet among the people who were preparing to go into Egypt, and was accused of having prompted Jeremiah in the message he delivered from God to charge them to remain in Judea (Jer. xliii. 3). He was also carried into Egypt (6, 7), where, according to one tradition, he died, while, according to another, he went after Jeremiah's death to Babylon and died there. There is a special message to him in xlv., with a promise that his life should be preserved through the calamities of the time.—2. A person who helped to re-build the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 20).—3. A priest who sealed the covenant (x. 6), possibly the same with No. 2.—4. One of the descendants of Judah (xi. 5).

BARUCH, THE APOCRYPHAL BOOK OF. The author of this book obviously claims to be the same with Jeremiah's friend; but forgery is apparent on the face of it. For, though it is not agreed what date is intended in i. 2, yet, if it were the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, Jerusalem was not then burnt; if the time of the capture and destruction of Jerusalem be meant, Baruch was not then in Babylon; it is questionable whether he was there in the fifth year after; and, besides, the temple worship was then at an end, whereas this is represented (7, 10) as still subsisting. Moreover, there was no such high priest at that time as Joachim. Other proofs fatal to the authority of the book might be produced; but these are sufficient.

It at present exists in Greek and in some translations from it. But it has been maintained that the original language was Hebrew. Among the reasons alleged for this opinion is the fact that (1. 14) we find a direction that the book should be read in the temple; and it is scarcely conceivable that any one writing in Greek would have introduced such an injunction. But then there are linguistic differences between the former and latter portions of the work. It is not improbable, therefore, that the original of i. 1—iii. 8 was Hebrew, and that another writer, perhaps the Septuagint translator of Jeremiah (the same peculiarities of language found in both being hardly otherwise to be accounted for), took up this fragment, turned it into Greek, and completed the book as we have it in that tongue. For that in its present shape it proceeded from one hand cannot reasonably be doubted. The date of this production can only be conjectured: it has been thought that the Hebrew portion was composed towards the end of the period of the Persian rule, and that the last author rendered and completed it in the time of the Maccabean wars, about 160 B.C. Chap. vi., or 'The Epistle of Jeremy,' is a separate later piece. The Jews have never esteemed the book of Baruch: there are no references to it in any of the apostolic fathers; but Irenæus and subsequent writers occasionally quote it (including the Epistle of Jeremy); and it is found in some of the early catalogues of canonical books. According to bishop Cosin, however, 'the book of Baruch' does not necessarily intend this apocryphal work, but 'those passages of him which are comprehended in the book of Jeremy' (Hist. of Canon, chap. vi. No. lxi.). It was placed in the Romish canon by the council of Trent; but protestants justly deny its canonical authority. There are Syriac and Arabic versions of Baruch, a Syro-hexaplaric text from the celebrated MS. in the Ambrosian library at Milan, and two Latin translations; that of the Vulgate is very literal.

This book consists of two portions:—I. i. 1—iii. 8, comprising introduction (1. 1-14), confession and prayer (15—iii. 8); II. iii. 9—v. 9, containing an address to Israel (iii. 9—iv. 8), Jerusalem's lament (9-29), and a response of consolatory exhortation to her 30—v. 9). Chap. vi. is entitled 'The Epistle of Jeremy.' There is no reason why it should be appended to Baruch. It seems to have been written in Greek, perhaps in the first century before Christ; though some respectable critics would place it much earlier. It is a declamation against idolatry. In the Paris and London polyglotts there is a first epistle of Baruch to the nine and half tribes printed in Syriac and Latin. This is supposed to be the production of a Syrian monk.

BAR'ZELAI (1 Esdr. v. 38, marg.).

BARZIL'LAI (of iron). 1. A rich Gileadite who supported David in the rebellion of Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 27, xix. 31-39).—2. A Meholathite, whose son Adriel married Saul's daughter Merab (1 Sam. xviii. 19; 2 Sam. xxi. 8).—3. A man whose children returned from Babylon and claimed the priesthood. He had married one of the daughters of Barzillai the Gileadite, and was called by their name (Ezra ii. 61, 62; Neh. vii. 63, 64).

BAS'ALOTH (1 Esdr. v. 31). A corrupted form of Bazzuth (Ezra ii. 52).

BAS'CAMA. A place in Gilead where Jonathan Maccabeus was killed by Tryphon and buried (1 Macc. xiii. 23).

BA'SHAN (light sandy, or plain, or rich soil). A district east of the Jordan. The name has generally the definite article prefixed to it in the original: it is sometimes called 'the land of Bashan' (1 Chron. v. 11).

Bashan was the kingdom of Og, and was subdued by the Israelites in the last year of their wanderings after their conquest of Sihon the Amoritish king (Numb. xxi. 33-35; Deut. iii. 1-10). The decisive battle was fought at Edrei; and the destruction of Og and his people was complete. This district (together with a part of Gilead) was assigned by Moses to the half tribe of Manasseh (Numb. xxxii. 33; Deut. iii. 13; Josh. xiii. 29-31); but it must also have been at least partially occupied by Gadites (1 Chron. v. 11-16). Bashan appears soon after to have been comprehended under the general name Gilead (Josh. xxii. 9; Judges xx. 1); it is mentioned, however, as one of Solomon's districts, over which an officer was appointed (1 Kings iv. 13), and as overrun by Hazael king of Syria (2 Kings x. 32, 33). It is, no doubt, included in the country conquered by Tiglath-pileser (xv. 29): it had remained therefore in the possession of the Manassites about 710 years, from 1450 to 740 B.C. The early inhabitants were Amorites; some of whom were men of gigantic stature (Deut. iii. 11-13, iv. 47).

The limits of Bashan are defined as Gilead on the south (the Hieromax or Yarmuk separating the two regions), and mount Hermon on the north: the Jordan valley was on the west; and the district extended to Salcah or Salchah and the border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites on the east (10, 13, 14; Josh. xii. 4, 5, xiii. 11, 12; 1 Chron. v. 23). The principal cities were Golan, Ashtaroth or Beeshterah, Edrei, and Salcah (Josh. xii. 4, 5, xxi. 27; 1 Chron. vi. 71). Bashan was in later times divided into four provinces: Gaulanitis, the modern Jaulân; Trachonitis, the ancient Argob, now the Lejâh; Aurantia, the Hauran; and Batanea, Ard-el-Bathanyeh. The examination of this region bears, we are informed, remarkable 'testimony to the faithfulness and minute accuracy of bible narrative and description. The vast ruins scattered over its surface tell of its former populousness, and are the present memorials of its celebrated cities, whose numbers, except to him who has wandered among its mountains and across its plains, would seem almost incredible. Its rich pasture-lands (Psal. xxii. 12) and wide champaigns of waving corn still proclaim its wondrous fertility. The oak forests cover its mountain-sides, as in days of old (Isai. li. 13; Ezek. xxvii. 6), with a garment ever fresh and green. The ancient names, too, cling to it still: we have Batanea, and Golan, and Kenath, and Salcah, and Hauran, and Edrei, but little changed by the lapse of long centuries. Thus does it appear that, the more extensive our research and the more minute our enquiries, the more full and accurate will be our illustrations of the sacred scriptures' (Rev. J. L. Porter in Journ. of Sac. Lit. July, 1854, p. 313: comp. Graham, Cambridge Essays, 1858, pp. 155-164).

BA'SHAN-HA'VOTH-JA'IR (Bashan of the villages of Jair) (Deut. iii. 14). See HAVOTH-JAIR and JAIR.

BASH'EMATH (fragrant). One of the wives of Esau (Gen. xxvi. 34, xxxvi. 3, 10, 12, 17). But there is a difficulty. For, while Bashemath is in the first-named place said to be the daughter of Elon, she is called in the last the daughter of Ishmael, who is elsewhere (xxviii. 9) named Mahalath. Various solutions have been proposed, as that Esau married more than three wives, that their names were changed, &c. Or, possibly, there may have been some mistake of transcription. See AHOLIBAMAH.

BASIN. The word in our translation most frequently denotes vessels for the tabernacle or the temple, e.g. to hold the blood of a victim (Exod. xii. 22, xxiv. 6): these seem generally to have been of metal (1 Kings vii. 40, 45; 1 Chron. xxviii. 17; 2 Chron. iv. 8, 11; Jer. lii. 19). It is used also of vessels for domestic or culinary purposes (2 Sam. xvii. 28). There are several words in the original which are rendered basins, bowls, &c.; and it is not possible now to distinguish the exact shapes of these, or to explain with any precision in what they differed. The basin in which our Lord washed the disciples' feet (John xiii. 5) must have been a large and deep vessel, doubtless the one usually at hand for such purposes.

BASKET. There are various Hebrew words rendered in our version 'basket.' The baskets in which the heads of Ahab's sons were put (2 Kings x. 7) were, of course, of large size. The same word is translated 'pots' in Psal. lxxxi. 6: it means probably those baskets in which heavy burdens were carried by two men on a pole resting on their shoulders. A word is elsewhere used (Deut. xxvi. 2, 4, xxviii. 5, 7) which possibly designated a smaller basket, and, being coupled with 'kneading-trough' (marg.), we may suppose it something serviceable for domestic purposes. Another word occurs but once (Jer. vi. 9): it appears to have been a grape-basket. The fruit-basket of Amos viii. 1, 2 was probably of wicker-work with a lid; for in Jer. v. 27 it is put for a bird-cage. Another basket is mentioned in Gen. xi. 16, 17: from the derivation of the original term, we might believe it constructed of twigs or osiers; but, as it was also used (Judges vi. 19) for holding cooked meat, it must, occasionally at least, have been of some other material, possibly metal. In the New Testament we have the large basket, made of rope, in which St. Paul escaped from Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 33). Another word is used, in Acts ix. 25, for the same, and also for the seven baskets of fragments taken up after one of our Lord's miracles (Matt. xv. 37; Mark viii. 8). It is worthy of remark that, after the other similar miracle, twelve 'baskets' (a different word) were carried away (Matt. xiv. 20; Mark vi. 43; Luke ix. 17; John vi. 13). And in Matt. xvi. 9, 10; Mark viii. 19, 20 the difference is remarkably exhibited. The uniform application of one term to the 'basket' of one miracle, and of another to the 'basket' of the other, is a strong proof of the credibility of the narratives: 'Such uniformity,' says Prof. Blunt, 'marking very clearly the two miracles to be distinctly impressed on the minds of the evangelists as real events; the circumstantial peculiarities of each present to them, even to the shape of the baskets, as though they were themselves actual eye-witnesses, or at least had received their report from those who were so' (Undesigned Coincidences, part iv. 12, p. 277, edit. 1856).

BAS'MATH (Fragrant). A daughter of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 15). This name is the same with Bashemath.

BAS'SA (1 Esdr. v. 16). A corrupted form of Bezai (Ezra ii. 17).

BAS'TAI (1 Esdr. v. 31). A corrupted form of Besai (Ezra ii. 49).

BASTARD. A bastard was not to enter into the congregation of the Lord to his tenth generation (Deut. xxiii. 2). This regulation did not apply to the children of concubines. See CONCUBINE.

BAT. An animal pronounced unclean (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18); it is also mentioned in Isai. ii. 20. The Hebrew name is very descriptive of the habits of the bat, signifying that which flies in the dark. Bats are common in the East, clustering in caverns, or among ruins, or in the dense foliage of large trees. Many travellers have given graphic accounts of the annoyance they have experienced from them. Bats (of which there are many species) belong to the class of mammals; but they are naturally placed in the Mosaic lists with fowls, in consequence of their being able to fly.

BATH (defined, a measure). (1 Kings vii. 26, 38; Isai. v. 10; Ezek. xiv. 10, 11, 14; comp. Luke xvi. 6, marg.). See MEASURES.

BATHE. Bathing was frequently prescribed by the Mosaic law, as a part of the purification from every kind of uncleanness (e. g. Lev. xiv. 8, xv. 5, xvii. 15); it was used after mourning (2 Sam. xii. 20); and we often find anointing joined with it (Ruth iii. 3; Matt. vi. 17). Regulations were made for the bathing or washing of the high priest and the other priests (Exod. xxix. 4; Lev. xvi. 4, 24); which Jewish writers, after their manner, have exaggerated. A laver was provided in the tabernacle for the priests' use (Exod. xxx. 18-21), and a molten sea in the temple (2 Chron. iv. 2-6), which held water in readiness for their ablutions. The houses of the wealthy were, no doubt, supplied with baths, often, perhaps, placed in gardens (2 Sam. xi. 2); and it is likely that some of the pools mentioned as provided with arcades were fitted for public bathing (John v. 2). Besides its religious signification indicating purity, the practice of bathing was peculiarly necessary for health in the climate of Palestine.

BATH-KOL (daughter-voice). See PRO-PHECY.

BATH-RAB'BIM (daughter of many). A gate of the city Heshbon, near to which were pools or tanks (Sol. Song vii. 4). But this is probably not a proper name, and may simply mean 'the populous gate,' i. e. that through which multitudes pass.

BATH-SHEBA (daughter of the oath). The daughter of Eliam (2 Sam. xi. 3), otherwise called Ammiel (1 Chron. iii. 5), Ahitophel's son (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). She was the wife of Uriah the Hittite. She was defiled by David; her husband was treacherously murdered; and after his death she was taken into the king's harem (xi.). The child of this adulterous intercourse died. But subsequently Bath-sheba became the mother of Solomon (xii. 24), and of three other sons (1 Chron. iii. 5). When Adonijah desired to secure his succession to the crown, the prophet Nathan employed Bath-sheba to apprise David (1 Kings i. 11-31); and in Solomon's reign it was through her interference that Adonijah fatally for himself, sought to obtain Abishag (ii. 13-25). According to Jewish tradition, Bath-sheba composed Prov. xxxi. She is also called Bath-shua.

BATH-SHUA (daughter of wealth).—1. Judah's wife, termed in our version 'the daughter of Shua,' or 'Shuah' (Gen. xxxviii. 2, 12; 1 Chron. ii. 3).—2. A variation of Bath-sheba (iii. 5).

BATHZACHARIAS. A place where Judas Maccabeus encamped (1 Macc. vi. 32, 33). The modern name is Beit Sakarieh, about nine miles north of Beit Sâr, that is, Beth-zur.

BATTERING-RAM (Ezek. iv. 2, xxi. 22) See ENGINES.

BATTLE. See ARMY, WAR.

BATTLE-AXE. See ARMS.

BATTLEMENT (Deut. xxii. 8; Jer. v. 10) See HOUSE.

BATUS (Luke xvi. 6, marg.). See MEASURES.

BA'VAI (son of wishing, i. e. the wisher? or possibly the name is of Persian origin). One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 18).

BAY-TREE (Psal. xxxvii. 35). This has been supposed a laurel, or a cedar. But it is properly a 'native' tree, i. e. one that has grown in its own soil, and has never been transplanted; prosperous, therefore, and undecaying.

BAZ'LITH, BAZ'LUTH (a stripping). A man whose children were among the Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54).

BDEL'LIUM. A substance said to be found in the land of Havilah (Gen. ii. 12). We have very little information in scripture as to its nature. It is only said that the manna, like the hoar-frost (Exod. xvi. 14), or coriander-seed in size, was like bdellium in colour (Numb. xi. 7). There are several opinions as to the substance meant. Some would have this bdellium a precious stone: some give it a vegetable origin, a kind of gum exuding from a tree. And this, indeed, is the ordinary meaning of that which ancient writers commonly call bdellium. But the Hebrew original may intend something else. Gesenius denies that it is a stone: if it were, he thinks that, as tc onyx, so to it the word 'stone' would be added. He does not believe it to be a gum, which is not valuable enough to be ranked with gold and gems. He supposes, then, that the pearls found in abundance on the shores of the Persian gulf will answer the conditions of the sacred text. There is much probability in this opinion; but it cannot be said to be distinctly proved.

BEACON (Isai. xxx. 17). The meaning of the word is a mast, or signal-pole.

Benjamite chief who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5).

BEA'LOTH (corporations, citizens). A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh xv. 24); probably identical with BAALATH-BEER (xix. 8), which see.

BE'AN, THE CHILDREN OF. A predatory tribe, destroyed by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. v. 4, 5).

BEANS. This vegetable was among the provisions furnished to David's troops while he lay at Mahanaim (2 Sam. xvii. 28), and was to be a material for Ezekiel's bread (Ezek. iv. 9). Beans are a common article of food in the East at the present day. The kinds most common in Syria are the white horse-bean and the kidney-bean.

BEAR. This animal, Ursus Syriacus, is nearly allied to the common brown bear, being only somewhat lower and longer, with the head and tail more prolonged, the colour a dull buff or light bay clouded sometimes with darker brown. It has a ridge of long hairs semi-erect, running from the neck to the tail. It is said still to be found in some parts of the Lebanon. The habits of this animal are often alluded to in scripture (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 36, 37; 2 Sam. xvii. 8; 2 Kings ii. 24; Prov. xvii. 12, xxviii. 15; Isai. xl. 7, lix. 11; Lam. iii. 10; Hos. xiii. 8; Amos v. 19; Rev. xiii. 2). The bear was the symbol of the second kingdom of Daniel's vision (Dan. vii. 5).

BEARD. The nations of western Asia paid great attention to the beard. In this respect they differed from the Egyptians, who shaved, except when mourning (Gen. xli. 14); though they had the custom of wearing false beards, made of plaited hair, and graduated according to rank. For private persons these were small, about two inches long; for kings, much longer and square at the bottom; while gods had beards of which the lower part curled up. The Hebrews probably preserved their beards when in Egypt; and we find in their subsequent history that neglect of them was a proof of slovenliness, and allowable only in seasons of distress (2 Sam. xix. 24). They were carefully trimmed and perfumed (Psal. cxxxiii. 2). They were not to be touched by others, except by intimate friends, with the right hand, in a way of affectionate reverence, to be respectfully kissed (2 Sam. xx. 9); and any indignity offered to them by pulling, spitting, or the like, was highly resented. Hence there could have been no greater insult than that shown by Hanun to David's ambassadors (x. 4). Shaving the beard, or cutting it off, was a sign of the deepest degradation (Isai. xv. 2; Jer. xli. 5); hence the threatening in Isai. vii. 20 was full of significance. There are some notices of the beard in the Hebrew ritual. Thus, the recovered leper was to shave off his beard on the last day of his cleansing (Lev. xiv. 9); and generally the corners of the beard were not to be marred (xix. 27, xxi. 5). This prohibition is supposed to be directed against shaving the beard where it joins the hair. Some Arabian tribes, it seems, did this in devoting themselves to an idol-god (see Jer. ix. 26, xxv. 23, xlix. 32).

BEASTS. The following names of beasts or (almost all) land animals occur in scripture: an account of each distinct kind is given under their respective names. Some references are subjoined here to the places in which the animals are mentioned.

- Ape (1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21).
- Ass (Gen. xii. 16).
- wild (Job xxxix. 5).
- Badger (Exod. xxv. 5)—seal?
- Bat (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18).
- Bear (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 36, 37).
- Behemoth (Job. xl. 15-24)—hippopotamus?
- Bison (Deut. xiv. 5, marg.).
- Boar (Psal. lxxx. 13).
- Bull, bullock (Lev. i. 5; Psal. xxii. 12).
- wild (Isai. li. 20).
- Calf (Gen. xviii. 7).
- Camel (Gen. xii. 16; Lev. xi. 4).
- Cat (Bar. vi. 22).
- Chameleon (Lev. xi. 30).
- Chamois (Deut. xiv. 5).
- Colt (Gen. xxxii. 15; Matt. xxi. 5).
- Coney (Lev. xi. 5; Deut. xiv. 7).
- Cow (Lev. xxii. 28).
- Dog (1 Kings xxi. 23, 24; 2 Kings ix. 35, 36).
- Dromedary (1 Kings iv. 28; Esth. viii. 10; Jer. ii. 23).
- Elephant (1 Kings x. 22, marg.).
- Ewe (Gen. xxxii. 14).
- Fallow-deer (Deut. xiv. 5).
- Ferret (Lev. xi. 30)—gecko?
- Foal (Gen. xxii. 15; Matt. xxi. 5).
- Fox (Judges xv. 4)—jackal.
- Goat (Deut. xiv. 4).
- wild (Deut. xiv. 5).
- Greyhound (Prov. xxx. 31).
- Hare (Lev. xi. 6; Deut. xiv. 7).
- Hart (Deut. xiv. 5).
- Heifer (Gen. xv. 9).
- Hind (Job xxxix. 1; Prov. v. 19).
- Horse (Exod. xv. 1).
- Kid (Gen. xxxviii. 17).
- Lamb (Gen. xxvii. 7, 8).
- Leopard (Sol. Song iv. 8).
- Leviathan (Job xli.)—crocodile?
- Lion (Gen. xlix. 9; 1 Sam. xvii. 34, 36, 37).
- Lizard (Lev. xi. 30).
- Mole (Lev. xi. 30)—chameleon?
- Mouse (Lev. xi. 29).
- Mule (2 Sam. xviii. 9).
- Ox (Deut. xiv. 4).
- wild (Deut. xiv. 5).
- Pygarg (Deut. xiv. 5)—a kind of antelope.
- Ram (Gen. xxii. 13).
- Roe (2 Sam. ii. 18).
- Roe-buck (Deut. xiv. 5).
- Sheep (Gen. xli. 16).
- Sow (2 Pet. ii. 22).
- Swine (Lev. xi. 7).
- Tortoise (Lev. xi. 29).
- Unicorn (Numb. xxiii. 22)—rhinoceros?
- Weasel (Lev. xi. 29).
- Wolf (Jer. v. 6).

From the earliest times we find a distinction between clean and unclean beasts; the distribution being made first according as they might be sacrificed or not (Gen. vii. 2, viii. 20), and afterwards with reference to food (Lev. xi. 2-11, 27-31; Deut. xiv. 4-8). See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

Beasts are used symbolically in prophecy to designate kingdoms or powers (Dan. vii. 3-28; Rev. xiii.).

The word rendered 'beasts' in Rev. iv. 6-9, v. 6, 8, 11, 14, vi. 1, 3, 5, 6, 7, should be translated 'living ones.'

BE'BAI (paternal). One whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubabel (Ezra ii. 11; Neh. vii. 16). At a later period others of them, headed by Zechariah, specially called Bebai's son, accompanied Ezra (viii. 11). Four of his clan had married foreign wives (x. 28); and the name of their family or representative was attached to the covenant (Neh. x. 15).

BE'BAI. A place mentioned in Judith xv. 4.

BE'CHER (first-born, or young camel).—1. One of the sons of Benjamin (Gen. xli. 21; 1 Chron. vii. 6, 8). It is, however, somewhat remarkable that, when the families of Benjamin are enumerated, Becher is altogether omitted (Numb. xxvi. 38-41). So afterwards (1 Chron. viii. 1) Becher does not appear.—2. A son or grandson of Ephraim (Numb. xxvi. 35). He is also called Bered (1 Chron. vii. 20).

Lord A. C. Hervey (Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 175, 176) has proposed a very ingenious conjecture respecting Becher. Many of Ephraim's family had been slain by the men of Gath, to the bitter grief of Ephraim their father (1 Chron. vii. 21, 22). It might be that the daughters of his house would consequently become heiresses; so that a man of another tribe marrying such a daughter would be ranked as the son of her father. Examples of this are not wanting. Jair was lineally of Judah (ii. 21, 22), but he was reckoned among the tribe of Manasseh (Numb. xxxii. 41). Now, if Becher, the son of Benjamin, married a daughter of Ephraim, and so became virtually an Ephraimite, we have a reason why no family of Bachrites appears in the tribe of Benjamin, while there is such a family in Ephraim (xxvi. 35). But no positive proof can be given for this supposition.

BECHO'RATH (first-birth, first-born). An ancestor of Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1).

BE'CILETH. The name of a plain lying between Nineveh and Cilicia (Judith ii. 21).

BED. That there were chambers specially reserved for sleeping, and that these were a most private part of a house, is evident (Exod. viii. 3; 2 Kings vi. 12; Eccles. x. 20). And in those used by the master of the house and the family some kind of low frame or bedstead was placed (1 Sam. xix. 15; 2 Kings iv. 10). In Arabia and Egypt such a frame is rudely made of palm-sticks, and in Palestine of boards. Og's bedstead was of iron (Deut. iii. 11). The frame is sometimes carried to the flat top of the house during the season when persons sleep there. But accommodation for the night is much more simply provided in a large reception-room. The divan or platform at the end or side of the apartment serves the purpose of a bedstead. On this a mat or padded quilt is laid, and then a quilt of finer material; or perhaps, in summer, a thin blanket forms the coverlet. Poorer persons use their ordinary clothing, sometimes wrapping it round their bodies without any kind of mattress beneath. Hence the prohibition against detaining a garment in pledge after sunset (Exod. xxii. 26, 27; Deut. xxiv. 13). Indeed, generally the Orientals do not change their dress in going to bed. They are satisfied with taking off the upper garment and loosening the girdle. It will easily be understood, from what has been said, how Christ could command those he healed to 'take up' their bed and walk (Matt. ix. 6).

Occasionally we find beds of an ornamental character spoken of; the bedstead being very probably a light couch carved or inlaid (Prov. vii. 16, 17; Amos vi. 4). Solomon's magnificent 'bed' (Sol. Song iii. 9, 10, marg.) was a litter or palanquin.

We read of the use of pillows. Jacob is said to have placed the stones at Beth-el for pillows, covered, doubtless, with some of his garments (Gen. xxviii. 11). That put by Michal in David's bed was made of goat's hair (1 Sam. xix. 13). Similar pillows are still common—skins stuffed with cotton or other soft substance. Our Lord was sleeping on a pillow in a storm (Mark iv. 38): this was probably a rower's cushion.

The 'bolster,' several times mentioned (1 Sam. xxvi. 7, 11, 12, 16; 1 Kings xix. 6, marg.), may also be regarded as a pillow: the original word implies a place for the head. And very likely Saul and Elijah used their skin water-bottles, 'a cruse of water,' for the purpose.

BE'DAD (separation, part). The father of Hadad, a king of Edom (Gen. xxxv. 35; 1 Chron. i. 46).

BE'DAN (perhaps servile). 1. A judge of Israel referred to by Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 11), but of whom nothing is said in the book of Judges. There have been various conjectures about him; some supposing that Barak, others that Samson is meant. But many eminent persons, no doubt, lived in Israel whose names are not recorded in the compendious history preserved to us. Bedan may have been one of these. Or, if he necessarily must be some one mentioned before, he is most likely identical with Abdon (Judges xii. 13-15). There are several examples of a similar abbreviation of names.—2. A descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 17).

BEDEI'AH (in the protection of Jehovah, or servant of Jehovah). A man who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 35).

BEE. A well-known insect of the hymenopterous order, gregarious in its habits, living under a queen. There are many species: the Apis mellifica, or honey-bee, is common among us. Bees must have abounded in Palestine, since it is called a land 'flowing with milk and honey.' And they abound still: see Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 299. Reference is frequently made in scripture to the way in which bees swarm for the attack of any hostile object (Deut. i. 44; Psal. cxviii. 12; Isai. vii. 18). Wild bees are noted as depositing their honey in hollow places, clefts of rock, &c. (Judges xiv. 8; Psal. lxxxii. 16). The lion's carcass in the first-named place was, no doubt, quite dried up, maybe the mere skeleton left.

BEELI'ADA (whom the Lord knows). One of David's sons (1 Chron. xiv. 7). He is also called Eliada (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii. 8).

BEEL'SARUS (1 Esdr. v. 8). A corrupt form of Bilshan (Ezra ii. 2).

BEELTETH'MUS (1 Esdr. iii. 16, 25). The name, or rather official title, of one of the officers (Rathumus or Rehum) of king Artaxerxes. It is a corrupted form of the Chaldee words rendered 'chancellor' in Ezra iv. 8, 9, 17.

BEEL'ZEBUB. A name applied by the Jews to the prince of the devils; by whose aid they chose to say our Lord cast out devils (Matt. x. 25, xii. 24, 27; Mark iii. 22; Luke xi. 15, 18, 19). Possibly this name is borrowed from that of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron (2 Kings i. 2). But then the correct reading in the Gospels is Beelzebul; and various reasons have been suggested for the change of b into l. It may have been for euphony, or it may have been to infix a name of reproach upon a false god or demon. For Beelzebul probably signifies lord of dung, dung-god. It might, however, mean lord of the house; and this would be specially appropriate in Matt. x. 25. But if, as it has been thought, the 'fly' of which the god of Ekron was lord was a dung-beetle, Scarabæus pillularius, then the connection between the 'fly-god' and the 'dung-god' is evident. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Beelzebul'; Alford, Greek Test., note on Matt. x. 25. It is questioned why the Jews called Beelzebul, or Beelzebul, the chief of the devils; and no sufficient answer has yet been given. The solution by a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. 'Beelzebul,' is not satisfactory.

BEEL'ZEBUL (Matt. x. 25, and elsewhere, marg.).

BE'ER (a well). 1. A halting-place of the Israelites after they had crossed the Arnon. It was so called because of the well which the princes dug there according to God's command and promise (Numb. xxi. 16-18). This place was probably identical with BEER-ELIM, which see.—2. A town to which Jotham the son of Gideon fled from his brother Abimelech (Judges ix. 21). Its position is quite uncertain: possibly it may be identical with Beeroth.

BEER-E'LIM (well of heroes). A place on the Moabish border mentioned by Isaiah (xv. 8). If identical with Beer, 1, it must have been on the northern frontier of Moab.

BEER-LAHAI-ROI (well of the living one that sees me; or of seeing God and living). The fountain where the angel of the Lord appeared to Hagar, who had fled from her mistress Sarai, and promised her a large posterity (Gen. xvi. 7-14). It was in the south country, between Kadesh and Bered, and has been supposed to be at Mouhâhî, on the road from Gaza to Suez. Some have objected that the etymology of Beer-Lahai-Roi, as given by the sacred writer, does not accord with the formation of the name; but the objection is of little weight. Kalsch translates: 'For she said, Do I even still see [live] after seeing [God]? Therefore the well was called Beer-Lahai-Roi [the well of seeing God and living].' It is afterwards mentioned as merely Lahai-Roi in our version (xxiv. 62, xxv. 11).

BEER'SHEBA (well of the oath, or of seven). A place in the south of Palestine, first mentioned in the history of Abraham. He must have been dwelling there when Hagar finally left his tents (Gen. xxi. 14). The name, however, was subsequently imposed. Abimelech, king of Gerar, came to make a covenant with Abraham; and, either from the oath sworn by the two, or from the seven lambs which he desired Abimelech to receive in token that he (the patriarch) had dug a well, the possession of which was disputed, the place was called Beer-sheba (22-34); and for some time Abraham continued to reside there (xxii. 19), where he had planted a tamarisk and worshipped 'the Lord, the everlasting God.' Many years later Isaac sojourned in Gerar, and was obliged to leave it in consequence of the jealousy of the Philistines, who strove with him for the wells which both his father and himself had digged. The then Abimelech, however, followed him to Beer-sheba, thinking it politic to bind down so great a chief as Isaac had become by an oath of friendship. Isaac entertained him hospitably: the covenant was made: the oath was sworn; and, just after the king's departure Isaac's servants informed him of the discovery of a fresh well. With the solemn oath he had sworn fresh in his mind, the patriarch called it 'the oath-well,' Beer-sheba. The name had existed before; but there was an additional propriety in it now; and the town, of which nothing was previously said, from this (perhaps gradually) took the appellation which it ever afterwards retained (xxvi. 12-33). Whether the well discovered by Isaac's servants was the one used by Abraham is questioned—probably not; the expressions in the text seem to designate a fresh source of water. And it is observable that in the modern Wady es-Seba there are two large wells, besides five smaller ones, still existing; while the ruins of a town, Btr es-Seba, appear on some low hills to the north of the larger wells. Beer-sheba is again mentioned in the patriarchal history (xxviii. 10, xli. 1, 5). On the apportionment of Canaan, it was assigned first to Judah, afterwards to Simeon (Josh. xv. 23, xix. 2) and it is frequently mentioned afterwards in proverbial expressions, 'from Dan even to Beer-sheba,' to describe the whole extent of Canaan (Judges xx. 1, and elsewhere), and 'from Geba to Beer-sheba,' to denote the extent of the separate kingdom of Judah (2 Kings xxiii. 8). In later times it seems to have been a seat of idolatry (Amos v. 5, viii. 14); but it was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 27, 30). The district round must have borne the name of the place; thus, 'wilderness of Beer-sheba' (Gen. xxi. 14).

BEE'RA (well, fountain). A descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 37).

BEE'RAH (id.). A prince of Reuben, carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. v. 6).

BEE'RI (the well-man). 1. The father of Judith or Aholibamah, one of Esau's wives (Gen. xxvi. 34). He was identical with Anab, who found the warm springs in the wilderness for this is the true translation of xxxvi. 24), and was thence designated Beerl. There is an apparent discrepancy in his being termed here a Hittite, and afterwards (xxxvi. 2) a Hivite. But Hittite often stands (see Josh. i. 4; 1 Kings x. 29; 2 Kings vii. 6; comp. also Gen. xxvii. 46 with xxviii. 1) in a more general sense for an inhabitant of Canaan. As to the term Horite (xxxvi. 20), that designates persons, not according to their race, but according to their mode of life.—2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos. i. 1).

BEE'ROTH (wells). One of the Hivite cities that made peace with the Israelites (Josh. ix. 17). It was afterwards allotted to Benjamin (xviii. 25; 2 Sam. iv. 2); and some of its inhabitants returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29). It has been identified with el-Bireh, about ten miles north of Jerusalem on the road to Nablous. According to tradition, it was at this place that Jesus was missed when returning from Jerusalem (Luke ii. 44). To the present day travellers going northward often halt after the first day's journey from Jerusalem at this spot.

BEE'ROTH-BENE-JA'AKAN (the wells of the sons of Jaakan). One of the stations of the Israelites in the desert (Deut. x. 6). It is called also Bene-Jaakan (Numb. xxxiii. 31, 32).

BEE'ROTHITES. The inhabitants of Beeroth. The original residents, i.e. those who had made a treaty with Israel, or their posterity, had quitted the city for Gittaim; and the Benjamites occupied it (2 Sam. iv. 2, 3, 5, 9, xxiii. 37). It is Berothite in 1 Chron. xi. 39.

BEESH'TERAH (house of Astarte). A city of Bashan, allotted from the district of the half-tribe of Manasseh to the Gershonite Levites. It is also called Ashtaroth (1 Chron. vi. 71).

BEE'TLE. The original word so translated (Lev. xi. 22) signifies a leaper. The Israelites were permitted to eat this creature; but beetles do not appear to have ever been an article of food. The probability is that some winged and edible species of locust was meant.

BEGGARS. See ALMS, POOR.

BEGINNING OF THE CREATION OF GOD. An appellation assumed by Christ (Rev. iii. 14). He was the beginner or the origin of all created things: comp. Col. i. 15.

BEHEADING. See PUNISHMENTS.

BEHE'MOTH (the great beast; or, if it be supposed an Egyptian word, it may mean the water-ox). A stupendous animal, described in Job xl. 15-24. The identification of behemoth has puzzled innumerable critics, and the strangest conjectures have been propounded. It will be enough to say that the mammoth or other extinct quadruped has been thought behemoth by some; while others maintain it is the elephant; and some would take the word as having a symbolical meaning. Perhaps the weight of evidence is in favour of the hippopotamus. As leviathan is most likely the crocodile, it is not unreasonable to suppose that behemoth is, like the crocodile, an inhabitant of the Nile; and that, as leviathan is amphibious, behemoth must be amphibious too, a conclusion which is strengthened by the comparison of 15, 21, 22 with 24. Mr. Carey (The Book of Job translated, &c., Notes on Job xl. pp. 402-406) considers the description in detail, and points out various particulars in which the animal intended differs from the elephant and corresponds with the hippopotamus. See HIPPOPOTAMUS.

BE'KAH (a part, half). See WEIGHTS.

BEL (contracted from Baal) (Isai. xlvi. 1 Jer. i. 2, li. 44). See BAAL, BABEL.

BEL AND DRAGON. See Daniel, Apocryphal Additions to.

BE'LA (a swallowing up, destruction). 1. An early king who reigned in Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 32, 33; 1 Chron. i. 43, 44).—2. The eldest son of Benjamin (Numb. xxvi. 33, 40, 1 Chron. vii. 6, 7, viii. 1, 3). He is also called Belah (Gen. xlvi. 21).—3. A Reubenite (1 Chron. v. 8).

BE'LA (id.). One of the five cities of the plain, spared, at the intercession of Lot, from the destruction which befel Sodom and the others. It was called Zoar as being a small place (Gen. xiv. 2, 8). See ZOAR.

BE'LAH (id.). A son of Benjamin (Gen. xlvi. 21), identical with BELA, 2, which see.

BE'LAITES. A family of Benjamin descended from Bela (Numb. xxvi. 38).

BE'LEMUS (1 Esdr. ii. 16). Probably a corrupt form of Bishlam (Ezra iv. 7).

BE'LIAL (without usefulness, good for nothing). Our version very frequently treats this word as a proper name (e.g. Deut. xlii. 13; Judges xix. 22; 1 Sam. ii. 12, xxv. 17), but incorrectly. 'Sons of Belial' are worthless, vile, and profligate persons. Belial, or Beliar, has been adopted in the New Testament as an appellation of Satan or Antichrist (2 Cor. vi. 15).

BELL, BELLS. Small golden bells (according to the rabbins, 72 in number) were attached, alternating with pomegranate-shaped knobs or tassels, to the hem of the high priest's robe, the robe of the ephod (Exod. xxviii. 33-35, xxxix. 25, 26). These would sound as the high priest entered the holy place, announcing, so to speak, his approach to the palace of the great King, and they would notify to the people without that he was performing his sacred functions. They were to be worn under pain of death. In Zech. xiv. 20, another word is used. It has been supposed that, instead of actual bells, these last were rather pieces of metal (comp. Judges viii. 21), attached for ornament to the necks of the horses; they would tinkle as the animals moved.

BELLOWS. The word does not occur till somewhat late in the sacred volume (Jer. vi. 29); but the instrument must have been in use in much earlier times. Wilkinson describes bellows from an ancient Egyptian picture, of the age of Thothmes III., probably contemporary with Moses. 'They consisted of a leather bag, secured and fitted into a frame, from which a long pipe extended, for carrying the wind into the fire. They were worked by the feet; the operator standing upon them, with one under each foot, and pressing them alternately, while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string which he held in his hand' (Ancient Egypt, vol. iii. p. 338). See FURNACE.

BEL'MAIM, and BEL'MEN (Judith iv. 4, vii. 3). These two places have not been identified.

BELSHAZ'ZAR (Bel's prince). This monarch has been supposed to be the last king of Babylon, identical with Labynetus, otherwise called Nabonnedus, Nabonidus, or Nabonadius. But, according to Berossus, Nabonnedus had retired to the neighbouring city of Borsippa, and was blockaded there; and, at length surrendering to Cyrus, he had his life spared, and a principality in Carmania bestowed on him, where he died. The scripture narrative is very different. It tells of a sumptuous feast made by Belshazzar in the city of Babylon, when in the midst of revelry a hand supernaturally appeared and wrote the doom of the kingdom, which Daniel only could interpret, and which was accomplished that very night, Belshazzar being slain. If this was at the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus, the account given by Xenophon (Cyrop. lib. vii. cap. v.) to a great extent agrees with the biblical record. For he speaks of the capture of the city during a night of feasting, and of the death of the king, whom, however, he does not name. But, in spite of this corroboration, modern writers have chosen to stigmatize the sacred story as false, and to deny that a king called Belshazzar ever existed.

Two replies have been made to such objections. It has been observed that the scripture nowhere calls Belshazzar the last king of Babylon; further, that it is not necessarily to be understood that the taking of the kingdom by Darius immediately followed Belshazzar's death; and, besides, that the expression 'took the kingdom' (Dan. vi. 31) reads more like a peaceable succession than the fresh rule of a conqueror just after a night of confusion and blood. It is, moreover, remarked that Evil-Merodach, Nebuchadnezzar's son, perished just as Belshazzar did, coming to a violent death after a reign as long as that ascribed to Belshazzar. Zündel, therefore, argues with great force that, as we know a single individual often bore two names, Evil-Merodach (so called very probably not till after his miserable end) must have been the Belshazzar who was slain in the night of his impious revelry (Krit. Unters. über die Abfassungzeit des B. Daniel, pp. 26-34). But, in 1854, a remarkable discovery was made by Sir H. Rawlinson at Mugheir, or Mugeyer, the ancient Ur. Documents were brought to light which prove that Nabonnedus, during the last years of his reign, associated his son Bil-shar-uzur with himself in the government, and allowed him the royal title. He, then, may have conducted the defence of Babylon within the walls; while the father commanded without. Bil-shar-uzur was very young at the time; but princes as young as he have held high command in the east. Thus Herod the Great was governor of Galilee at 15. And the interference of the queen is some presumption of the king's youth. If Nabonnedus married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, and if Belshazzar was the issue of that marriage, the expressions of Dan. v. 11, 13, 18, 22 are accounted for. Also, as there were two sovereigns, it is seen why Daniel was proclaimed third ruler of the kingdom (7, 16, 29). Here is proof, then, from independent sources, that a Belshazzar reigned; and certainly the impugners of scripture veracity may learn a lesson of modesty therefrom. See Rawlinson, Hist. Evidences of Script. Rec., lect. v. pp. 168-171, 442-444, 536-538; Loftus, Chaldea and Babylonia, pp. 132, 133.

BELTESHAZ'ZAR (Bel's prince, i.e. whom Bel favours). An Assyrio-Babylonish name given to Daniel at the court of Babylon (Dan. i. 7, ii. 26, iv. 8, 9, 18, 19, v. 12, x. 1). See DANIEL.

BEN (a son). A Levite porter of the second degree (1 Chron. xv. 18).

This word is frequently used as a prefix in the composition of names, as the following articles show.

BEN-ABIN'ADAB (son of Abinadab). One of Solomon's commissariat officers, who married Solomon's daughter Taphath (1 Kings iv. 11, marg.). See ABINADAB.

BEN-AM'MI (son of my own kindred, or people). The son of Lot's younger daughter, from whom the Ammonites were descended (Gen. xix. 38).

BEN-DE'KAR (son of Dekar). One of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 9, marg.). See DEKAR.

BEN-GE'BER (son of Geber). Also one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 13, marg.). See GEBER.

BEN-HA'DAD (son, or worshipper, of Hadad, probably the sun).—1. The son of Tabrimon, son of Hezion, king of Syria. He was a powerful monarch; the smaller principalities around Damascus being at the time subject to its sovereign. His alliance was courted by Baasha and Asa; and, on receiving a large present from the last-named prince, he attacked and overran the northern part of the Israelitish territory (1 Kings xv. 18-20; 2 Chron. xvi. 2-4: comp. 1 Kings xx. 34).—2. The son of the preceding. He was generally at war with Israel, and was once taken prisoner (xx). In a battle with him, three years later, Ahab was killed (xxii. 1, 31-37). It was he that, in the reign of Jehoram, sent a letter to that king demanding the cure of Naaman's leprosy (2 Kings v. 5-7). He afterwards besieged Samaria, but broke up his army in consequence of a sudden panic (vi., vii.). He was ultimately murdered by his successor Hazael (viii. 7-15); though some critics doubt whether, according to the exact meaning of the passage, Hazael was guilty of this crime. This Ben-hadad was worsted in three great battles by the Assyrian king Sillma-rish, or Shalmanubar, whose victories are recorded on the famous black obelisk now in the British Museum.—3. The son of Hazael, named Ben-hadad, succeeded his father. His reign was, on the whole, disastrous. He suffered three defeats from king Joash of Israel; and Jeroboam II. even subjected Damascus (xiii.

3, 24, 25, xiv. 28; Amos i. 4). In the last-named passage and Jer. xlix. 27, the palaces of Damascus are called 'palaces of Benhadad.'

BEN-HA'IL (son of the host, i.e. warrior). One of the princes of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 7).

BEN-HA'NAN (son of one gracious). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

BEN-HE'SED (son of Hese'd). One of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 10, marg.). See HESED.

BEN-HUR (son of Hur). Another of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 8, marg.). See HUR.

BEN'-JAMIN (son of the right hand). See BENJAMIN.

BEN-O'NI (son of my sorrow). The name which Rachel gave to her second son (Gen. xxxv. 18). Jacob changed it into Benjamin.

BEN-ZO'HETH (son of Zoheth). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

BENAI'AH (whom Jehovah hath built up).

—1. The son of Jehoiada, of Kabzeel, in the south of Judah, called a 'chief priest' (1 Chron. xxvii. 5). If the original word be here accurately rendered priest, Benaiah must be supposed of the tribe of Levi; but it possibly means also a high officer; as when David's sons are so described (2 Sam. viii. 18). Benaiah held several military posts under David, and, having proved his fidelity when Adonijah made his attempt upon the crown, he was by Solomon appointed captain of the host, or commander-in-chief, in the place of Joab (xx. 23, xxiii. 20-23; 1 Kings i. 8, 10, 26, 32, 36, 38, 44, ii. 25, 29, 30, 34, 35, 46, iv. 4; 1 Chron. xi. 22-25, xviii. 17, xxvii. 5, 6). His son Jehoiada is said to have been after Ahithophel, the king's counsellor (34); it has been thought, however, that 'Jehoiada the son of Benaiah' here is a transposition, by error of copying, for Benaiah the son of Jehoiada.—2. A Pirathonite of Ephraim, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chron. xi. 31, xxvii. 14).—3. One of the chiefs of the Simeonites (iv. 36).—4. A Levite porter appointed to play on the psaltery (xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).—5. A priest who blew the trumpet (xv. 24, xvi. 6).—6. A Levite of the family of Asaph (2 Chron. xx. 14).—7. A Levite, one of the overseers of the oblations in Hezekiah's reign (xxx. 13).—8, 9, 10, 11. Four persons who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 25, 30, 35, 43).

BENE'-BERAK (sons of lightning). A city allotted to Dan (Josh. xix. 45).

BENE-JA'AKAN (sons of Jaakan). A natting-place of the Israelites (Numb. xxxiii. 31, 32). See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN.

BENEFACITOR (Luke xxii. 25). This designation, in Greek Euergetes, was given to various kings; e.g. to two of the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt. Our Lord's observation has, therefore, a special point.

BINI'NU (our son). A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 13).

BEN'JAMIN (son of the right hand).—1. The youngest son of Jacob, born in Palestine, not far from Beth-lehem, after the return from Padan-aram. Rachel his mother died in giving him birth, and named him Ben-oni, son of my sorrow. Deep was the sorrow of the bereaved Jacob; but his affection centred more intensely on the nursing who survived, whom he called Benjamin, and who became afterwards the still more cherished child of his old age, when Joseph (as he thought) was not, and this was the only offspring of his darling Rachel (Gen. xxxv. 16-20).

Of Benjamin's personal character and history little is recorded. His brothers, touched perhaps with some sense of their cruel wrong to Joseph, seem to have treated him with tenderness. And, when they first went down to Egypt to buy corn, he was left at home (xlii. 3, 4, 13). Joseph, however, required that he should be brought, and, to ensure the return of the brethren, kept Simeon as a hostage (14-20, 33, 34). Jacob was struck with dismay when his nine sons brought him the demand of the governor of Egypt, and at first determinately refused compliance (36-38). The subsequent history, Jacob's consent hardly wrested from him by Judah, the journey to Egypt, the presentation of Benjamin to Joseph, the distinction given him, the charge of theft, Judah's noble defence of him, the recognition, and the joyful tidings carried back to Jacob, make up an unrivalled narrative, most touching and most true to nature (xliii-xlv).

When the house of Israel went to sojourn in Goshen, Benjamin must have been young—we know not his exact age; still he was married, and had children. Ten are enumerated (xvi. 21); but some of these, called 'sons,' according to a common use of the word, have been thought to be really grandsons (1 Chron. vii. 6-12, viii. 1-5); if so, they must have been born after the descent into Egypt. See, however, an ingenious mode of reconciling the different statements in Birks' Exodus of Israel, pp. 15, 16. The tribe ultimately consisted of seven great families, deriving their names, some from sons and some from grandsons of the patriarch (Numb. xxvi. 38-40).

The prophetic blessing pronounced by Jacob upon Benjamin (Gen. xlix. 27) describes most significantly the future tribe's indomitable courage, shrewd cunning, and fierce ambition, exemplified in the common action, or in the behaviour of individual chieftains. At the first census in the wilderness, the Benjamite males of military age were 35,400; and their place in the camp was on the west of the tabernacle, massed with their brethren of the house of Joseph; their captain being Abidan, the son of Gideon (Numb. i. 36, 37, ii. 22, 23). In the later census they had increased to 45,600 (xxvi. 41). The blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 12) was significative of the location of the tribe between Ephraim and Judah, on the hills where 'the joy of the whole earth,' the city of the great King, was afterwards established, a safe and happy dwelling-place 'between His shoulders.' The territory allotted to the Benjamites extended from the Jordan eastward to the frontier of Dan in the west. (For an explanation of the obscure expression, i'

'compassed the corner of the sea,' see BETH-HORON). Southward it was separated from Judah by the valley of Hinnom, and in the north it was contiguous to Ephraim (Josh. xviii. 11-20). It was a compact oblong about 26 miles in length by 12 in breadth: it is said to have been a fertile territory; and it was admirably situated for the development of the characteristics of the tribe. Its great distinguishing features were its passes and its heights. 'The latter were of considerable elevation, being 2,000 feet and upwards above the level of the maritime plain; and the former, caused in part by the torrents which ran down either side of this lofty water-shed, were the only means of access to the land of the Philistines on the east, and to the fords of the Jordan on the west.' Various remarkable events occurred in some of these passes during the conquest, as the battle of Ai in the lower part of one of them to the east, and the rout of Beth-horon down another to the west. 'And in later times they were the scenes of other conflicts not less important in the general history of the land. Indeed, all the leading events in the fastnesses of the tribe of Benjamin received a special character from the heights or the passes of the territory assigned to it; and some of those events appear far more striking when viewed in connection with the physical aspects of the localities where they occurred' (Smith, Hist. of Joshua and his Times, p. 196). Two groups of cities, twelve and fourteen respectively in number, are mentioned as belonging to this tribe (Josh. xviii. 21-28); among them are several of note, Beth-el, Gibeon, and specially Jerusalem. But the Benjamites were not able to subdue the fortress of the last-named city: they obtained only some part of it; the Jebusites holding the rest till it was ultimately taken by David, and thenceforth was considered as belonging as much to Judah, whose frontier came close up to it, as to Benjamin (Judges ii. 21; 2 Sam. v. 6-9). The Benjamites at some periods of their history seem to have occupied towns beyond their own boundary (1 Chron. viii. 12, 13; Neh. xi. 35).

The Benjamites excelled as archers (1 Chron. xii. 2; 2 Chron. xvii. 17); while among the rest of Israel archery was (at least it has been so supposed) at one time neglected (2 Sam. i. 18); and their skill in slinging with either hand is particularly noted (Judges xx. 16).

The greatest misfortune that ever befel the tribe occurred not very long after the settlement in Canaan. A fearful crime had been committed in one of their cities; and they refused at the requisition of Israel to deliver up the culprits. A disastrous civil war ensued, in which the Benjamites, fewer than when they crossed the Jordan, fought in unequal conflict against the other tribes. After some early successes, they were entirely defeated and destroyed: their cities were burnt; and there survived of the whole tribe but 600 men, for whom the oath of the Israelites rendered it difficult to provide wives when the angry passions of the nation had settled down (xix-xxi).

Restored to their inheritance this remnant must have been wealthy proprietors; they would therefore multiply rapidly and gain influence in the nation, so that three of the families are mentioned (it is not quite clear at what period) as supplying 59,434 men of military age (1 Chron. vii. 6-11). Accordingly the first monarch of Israel was a Benjamite; and no doubt his own tribe would be specially favoured (1 Sam. xxii. 7). But the Benjamites never showed much attachment to Saul or his family. From the place just referred to it appears that they obstinately refused to betray David. Indeed, many of them joined David while yet in hold (1 Chron. xii. 1-7); and it seems that it was with some difficulty that Abner preserved the allegiance of the tribe to Ish-bosheth; nor did he dare to fix Ish-bosheth's residence in Benjamin (2 Sam. ii. 8, 9); and it was by Benjamites that that ill-fated prince was murdered (iv. 2-8). Shimei, it is true, one of the tribe, reviled David; and Sheba, also a Benjamite, after the rebellion of Absalom was suppressed, tried to organize another (xvi. 5-8, xx. 1, 2); but 1,000 Benjamites went with Judah to welcome David back at the Jordan (xix. 16, 17), and Sheba's insurrection was soon suppressed. We thus see the drawings of Benjamin towards Judah, which issued in the firm union of both the tribes when the kingdom was divided. Thenceforward the history of the two is identical: both went into captivity, and both returned (Neh. xi. 31-36). The separation of the kingdom in some respects diminished Benjamin's territory; thus, Beth-el, and perhaps Jericho, belonged to the northern realm (1 Kings xii. 29, xvi. 34); but there were extensions in other directions, in the districts of Dan and Simeon; and, when the militia was numbered under Jehoshaphat, a very large proportion were reckoned of Benjamin (2 Chron. xvii. 17, 18). Of the eminent men of the tribe, besides those already noticed, may be mentioned Ehud (Judges iii. 15). It has been already said that little regard was paid to Saul, the Benjamite king, or his house. His pedigree, it is true, is preserved (1 Chron. viii. 33-40, ix. 39-44); but his name does not recur in Benjamin (if that be any test) for hundreds of years, when the greatest of Benjamites, Saul of Tarsus, bore it during his earlier life (Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iif. 5).

2. A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. vii. 10).—3. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 32).—4. Benjamin is mentioned as taking part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 34). It would seem as if an individual were intended.

BENJAMIN, GATE OF. One of the gates of Jerusalem so called (Jer. xx. 2, xxxvii. 13, xxxviii. 7; Zech. xiv. 10). It must have been in the north wall of the city; and probably opposite to it was a gate of the temple, that called in the first passage cited 'the high gate of Benjamin.'

BENJAMITES. The posterity of Benjamin (Judges iii. 15, xix. 16, and elsewhere).

BEN'O (his son). A Levite (1 Chron. xxiv. 26, 27).

BE'ON. A contracted form of BAALMEON, which see.

BE'OR (torch, lamp).—1. The father of Bela, an ancient king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 32; 1 Chron. i. 43).—2. The father of Balaam (Numb. xxii. 5, xxiv. 3, 15, xxxi. 8; Deut. xxiii. 4; Josh. xiii. 22, xxiv. 9; Mic. vi. 5). He is called Bosor in 2 Pet. ii. 15.

BE'RA (son of evil?). A king of Sodom, on whom Chedor-laomer made war (Gen. xiv. 2).

BERA'CHAH (blessing, benediction). A Benjamite chief who joined David (1 Chron. xii. 3).

BERA'CHAH (id.). The valley in which Jehoshaphat assembled his people to bless and praise God after the victory over Moab, Ammon, and the people of mount Seir (2 Chron. xx. 26). The place is no doubt identical with Bereikât, which lies to the west of Tekoa, between Beth-lehem and Hebron.

BERACH'AH (whom Jehovah hath blessed). The father of Asaph (1 Chron. vi. 39), called also Berechiah (xv. 17).

BERA'AH (whom Jehovah created). A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. viii. 21).

BERE'A. A city in the third region of Macedonia, not far from Pella, at the foot of mount Bermius. There were many Jews resident there, whose character the sacred historian commends. Paul and Silas visited Berea when driven by persecution from Thessalonica; but, though their preaching was successful, as their persecutors followed them with mischievous intent, it was deemed prudent to send Paul on to Athens (Acts xvii. 10-15). Sopater, subsequently a companion of the apostle, was of Berea. This city was afterwards called Irenopolis, and is now Kara Feria, or Verria. The population is reckoned to amount to 15,000 or 20,000.

BERE'A.—1. (1 Macc. ix. 4). A place not far from Jerusalem.—2. (2 Macc. xiii. 4). This is said to be the modern Aleppo.

BERECH'AH (whom Jehovah hath blessed).—1. A descendant of David (1 Chron. iii. 20).—2. A Levite (ix. 16).—3. The father of Asaph (xv. 17). He is also called Berachiah (vi. 39).—4. A door-keeper for the ark (xv. 23).—5. A chief of Ephraim in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).—6. The father of one who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4, 30, vi. 18).—7. The father of Zechariah the prophet (Zech. i. 1, 7), printed in some copies Barachiah.

BE'RED (hail). A son or descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 20); perhaps identical with Becher (Numb. xxvi. 35).

BE'RED (id.). A place in the south of Palestine (Gen. xiv. 14). Beer-Labai-Roi lay between it and Kadesh. Some have supposed it the modern el-Khulasah; this, however, is more probably Chesil or Bethel.

BERENICE. See BERNICE.

BE'RI (well-man). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 36).

BERI'AH (in evil, son of evil, or, according to some, a gift).—1. A son of Asher (Gen. xlv. 17; Numb. xxvi. 44, 45; 1 Chron. vii. 30, 31).—2. A son of Ephraim, so named because just before a great calamity had befallen the patriarch's family (20-23). This must have occurred of course in Egypt; and it seems likely that the men of Gath were settled in the neighbourhood. Ephraim's sons attacked them, why we can only conjecture, intending to seize their cattle. But the men of Gath resisted, and slew some of the assailants. What sons of Ephraim were killed does not appear from the narrative.—3. A Benjamite chief; he, and his brother Shema, settled in Aijalon, and peopled it, expelling the inhabitants of Gath (viii. 13).—4. A Levite of the family of Gershon (xxiii. 10, 11).

BERI'TES. A family of Asher, descended from Beriah, 1 (Numb. xxvi. 44).

BE'RITES. A people mentioned in 2 Sam. xx. 14; they evidently lived in the north of Palestine; but it is uncertain who they were. Possibly they might be the inhabitants of Beer, 2. In the Vulgate translation the word is not taken as a proper name.

BE'RITH (a covenant) (Judges ix. 46) See BAAL-BERITH.

BERNICE or BERENICE. The eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I, and sister to Herod Agrippa II. (Acts xxv. 13, 23, xxvi. 30), married first to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, after whose death she lived under suspicious circumstances with her brother. She then became the wife of Polemon, king of Cilicia. This connection was soon dissolved; and she returned to Agrippa, and was subsequently the mistress, first of Vespasian, then of Titus. See Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Bernice.'

BER'ODACH-BAL'ADAN (Berodach, worshipping of Bel) (2 Kings xx. 12). See MERO-DACH-BALADAN.

BERE'A. See BERE'A.

BE'ROTH (1 Esdr. v. 19). A form of Beeroth (Ezra ii. 25).

BE'ROTHAH (my wells, according to some, a species of fir).—A place mentioned as the northern border of the Holy Land (Ezek. xlvii. 16). We can decide nothing certainly respecting it. It is not improbable that it was identical with BE'ROTHAI (my wells, or, possibly, place of cypresses). A town from which David took much brass (2 Sam. viii. 8), called also Chun (1 Chron. xviii. 8). Some have imagined it the modern Berât; but that must lie too much to the west.

BE'ROTHITE. An inhabitant of Beeroth (1 Chron. xi. 39). See BEEROTH, BEEROTHITES.

BERYL. A precious stone, one of the gems in the high priest's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13). Mention is elsewhere made of this stone: thus the hands of the spouse are likened to 'gold rings set with the beryl' (Sol. Song v. 14): 'the wheels and their work' in Ezekiel's vision were in colour like beryl (Ezek. i. 16, x. 9): this, too, was one of the gems in the covering of the king of Tyre (xxviii. 13; where 'chrysolite,' marg.): the body of the heavenly being Daniel saw was like the beryl (Dan. x. 6); and this was one of the foundations of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20). The Hebrew name of the stone in question is tarshish; and Gesenius imagines it to be so called because it was brought from Tarshish, i.e. Tartessus in Spain. He is inclined therefore to believe it the topaz, still found in Spain. Some would prefer interpreting it chrysolite; but chrysolite is mentioned additionally in Rev. xxi. 20. Perhaps after all what we call beryl is intended; which is described as a gem of the genus emerald, but not equal in value to the emerald properly so called. It is greyish green, or blue, sometimes yellow or almost white.

BERZELUS (1 Esdr. v. 38). A corrupted form of Barzillai (Ezra ii. 61).

BE'SAI (perhaps sword, or victory). A man whose descendants were among the Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 49; Neh. vii. 52).

BESIEGING TOWNS. SEE ARMY, ENGINES, FENCED CITIES, WAR.

BESODEI'AH (in the secret of Jehovah). The father of Meshullam who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6).

BE'SOR (cool). A torrent flowing into the Mediterranean near Gaza. (1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21).

BESTEAD (Isai. viii. 21). Distressed.

BETHAH (confidence). A Syrian city from which David took much brass (2 Sam. viii. 8). In 1 Chron. xviii. 8, it is called Tibbath.

BETHANE. The name of a place, perhaps south of Jerusalem (Judith i. 9).

BET'EN (belly, perhaps valley). A border town of Asher (Josh. xix. 25).

BETH (house). This word signifies generally a habitation, both a fixed abode, and also occasionally a tent or tabernacle, a home, then tropically the household, family, and so the descendants: it also implies a house of worship. The reader will hence easily understand the force it has in combination with other words. Such combinations are frequently used to form the names of places; as in the following articles.

BETH-AB'ARA (place of passage, the ferry). A place beyond, that is, on the east of the Jordan, where John the Baptist was baptizing (John i. 28). It would be reasonable to believe that it was identical with Beth-barah (Judges vii. 24), if there were not doubts as to the accuracy of the ordinary reading of the text. Some of the most ancient manuscripts for Bethabara have Bethany; so that it is at least probable that this last is the true name of the place. But, if so, it must be carefully distinguished from the Bethany by Jerusalem.

BETH-ANATH (house of response, or echo). A town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38; Judges i. 33).

BETH-ANOTH (id.). A town among the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 59), probably the modern Beit-annân.

BETH'ANY (house or place of dates). A well-known village about two miles from Jerusalem, on the eastern slope of the mount of Olives in a hollow near the place where the road to Jericho begins to descend more steeply to the Jordan valley. Fruit, and other trees grow around, olive, almond and oak, giving the spot an air of seclusion and repose. Few places are more endeared to the Christian's heart than Bethany: it was here that his Lord lived in social intercourse with the family he loved: here he manifested the tenderest sympathies of our nature: here he performed the stupendous miracle of raising the dead Lazarus; and from some neighbouring spot on the slopes of Olivet he gloriously ascended, a cloud receiving him from the wondering gaze of his assembled disciples (Matt. xxi. 17, xxvi. 6-13; Mark xi. 1, 11, 12, xiv. 3-9; Luke xix. 29, xxiv. 50, 51; John xi. 1-46, xii. 1-8). Bethany is now called el-Azartiyeh, a mean village containing about twenty families. The people pretend to show the house of Lazarus, with his tomb, also the house of Simon the leper; but these traditions are very unsatisfactory.

BETH-ARA'BAH (house of the desert). One of the six cities enumerated as belonging to Judah in the wilderness (Josh. xv. 6, 61). But it is elsewhere assigned to Benjamin (xviii. 22). It was on the border of the two tribes.

BETH-A'RAM (house of the height, mountain-house). A city in the territory of Gad, east of the Jordan (Josh. xiii. 27), called also Beth-haran (Numb. xxxii. 36). In later times it was named Libias in honour of the empress Livia.

BETH-A'RABEL (house of God's ambush). A place destroyed by Shalman, or Shalmaneser (Hos. x. 14). It is probably identical with Arbela, Irbid, in Galilee; there are, however, other opinions in regard to it.

BETH-A'VEN (house of nothingness, i.e. of idols). A town of Benjamin to the east of Beth-el (Josh. vii. 2, xviii. 12, where 'the wilderness,' possibly moor or pasture-land about it, is spoken of (1 Sam. xiii. 5, xiv. 23). Hosea in sarcasm playing upon the name transfers it to the neighbouring town of Beth-el (iv. 15, v. 8, x. 5, 8).

BETH-AZMA'VETH (house strong as death). A town probably in Benjamin (Neh. vii. 29). See AZMAVETH.

BETH-BA'AL-ME'ON (house of Baal-Meon). A city of the Reubenites (Josh. xiii. 17), called also BAAL-MEON, which see.

BETH-BA'RAH (place of passage). A place near the Jordan to the west, where the Ephraimites took 'the waters,' the streams perhaps from the uplands, to intercept the Midianites (Judges vii. 24). Some have identified this place with BETH-ABARA, which see.

BETH-BA'SI (1 Macc. ix. 62, 64). A place repaired by Jonathan and Simon Maccabees.

BETH-BIR'EI (house of my creation). A town of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 31). It is probably the same with Beth-lebaath (Josh. xix. 6), and Lebaath (xv. 32).

BETH-CAR (house of pasture). A place to which Israel pursued the Philistines after the victory of Mizpeh, to the west of which it must have been (1 Sam. vii. 11).

BETH-DA'GON (house or temple of Dagon). —1. A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41). —2. A border town of Asher (xix. 27). There are several places which still bear this name, Beit Dejan, probably built or consecrated by the Philistines when they overran the country.

BETH-DA'GON (1 Macc. x. 83). This is not a place but a building, as in 1 Sam. v. 2.

BETH-DIBLATHA'IM (house of the twin cakes). A town of Moab, probably the same with Almon-diblathaim (Jer. xlviii. 22).

BETH-E'DEN (house of pleasantness). This name appears in Amos i. 5, marg.: in the text of our version it is rendered 'the house of Eden.' It was either the seat of a petty prince, or more probably an occasional residence of the kings of Syria. Perhaps it was the Paradisus of Ptolemy (Geograph. lib. v. cap. 15).

BETH-E'KED-HARO'IM (house of the shepherd's hamlet). This is translated in our version of 2 Kings x. 12, 14 'the shearing-house.' It must have been between Jezreel and Samaria.

BETH-EL (house of God).—1. The place where Abraham pitched his tent (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3). The name, however, was first actually given by Jacob to the spot close by the city of Luz, where he had his marvellous vision, and where he set up a stone pillar, pouring oil upon it (xxviii. 11-22). On his return from Padan-aram, Jacob again visited the spot, built an altar there, and again consecrated a pillar, renewing and confirming the name he had before given it (xxxv. 6-15). It has been objected that the name Beth-el was given twice; but there is nothing but what is natural in the whole of this account. Jacob, when there first, was a fugitive, and in fear: when he returned to it he was a powerful chief. The remembrance of the blessing he had asked, and which God had given him, would come in full tide upon his mind; and it was to be expected that he would dedicate that spot afresh, and afresh devote himself to the Lord, who a second time, it would seem, appeared to him here. And the name would be treasured in the hearts of Jacob's descendants; so that it is no wonder that Moses, noting Abraham's history, describes his encampments by using, as we have seen, the word sacred already to Israel, rather than the Canaanitish name of a city, which, besides, did not stand upon the exact spot designated. 'When Jacob,' says Kalisch, 'had consecrated the altar in Bethel, God not only repeated the material promises before made to himself and to his ancestors, but chiefly confirmed the spiritual dominion which his seed should exercise; therefore the significant change of Jacob's name into Israel is repeated; and this constitutes the principal "blessing." To commemorate this new vision Jacob erected a monument of stone, sanctified it by a libation of wine and an ointment of oil (comp. xxviii. 18; Exod. xxiv. 4; Josh. xxiv. 27), and called the place Beth-el, just as he had before, on a similar occasion, given the same appellation to a spot equally remarkable' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 537, 538). In Joshua of course we find the hallowed name (Josh. vii. 2, viii. 9, 12, 17, xii. 9); but the distinction between Beth-el, as afterwards settled, and Luz, is marked (xvi. 1, 2); and, when the place was assigned to the tribe of Benjamin (xviii. 13, 22), no doubt the new buildings collected round the sacred spot; and whereas there had been Luz, there now was Beth-el, occupying virtually the position of the old city, and yet not precisely on the original site. The capture of Luz is recorded in Judges i. 22, 23. Thenceforth Beth-el was a holy city. Possibly the tabernacle might for a while be here (xx. 18, 26, 31, xxi. 2, 19, where the word Beth-el, generally in our version 'the house of God,' is perhaps a proper name). It was one of the places where Samuel went on circuit (1 Sam. vii. 16), and is repeatedly mentioned in the subsequent history.

Though Beth-el belonged to Benjamin, it was occupied by Ephraimites (1 Chron. vi. 28); and Jeroboam set up here one of his idolatrous calves (1 Kings xii. 29-33, xiii.). It seems to have been recovered by Abijah (2 Chron. xiii. 19); but the possession of it by Judah was evidently but temporary. Perhaps, however, it belonged to the southern kingdom when a school of the prophets was at Beth-el; but the people were depraved, as is clear from the insult offered to Elisha (2 Kings ii. 2, 3, 23-25). The calf-worship is still mentioned (x. 29); and probably even yet more sinful rites were practised here (Amos iii. 14, iv. 4, v. 5, 6, vii. 10, 13), when the city seems to have become an Israelitish royal residence. In Beth-el one of the priests was stationed, who taught the ignorant Samaritans (2 Kings xvii. 28); here, too, Josiah, who evidently had authority over the district, fulfilled prophecy by polluting the idolatrous altars (xxiii. 15-18). Men of Beth-el returned from the Babylonish captivity (Ezra ii. 28; Neh. vii. 32, xi. 31).

Beth-el is now Beitn, twelve miles north of Jerusalem, a mass of ruins: the hill, it is said, is yet distinguishable where Abraham built his altar, and where he probably stood with Lot when they agreed to separate. Various legends have been told of the stone which was Jacob's pillar.

2. A town in the south of Judah or Simeon (Josh. xii. 16; 1 Sam. xxx. 27), perhaps identical with BETHUL, which see.

BETH'ELITE. An inhabitant of Beth-el (1 Kings xvi. 34).

BETH-E'MEK (house of the valley). A border town of Asher (Josh. xix. 27).

BETH-ES'DA (house of mercy). A pool or tank at Jerusalem, described as being in or by the sheep-market, or sheep-gate, with five porches, a kind of colonnade, where infirm people lay waiting for the supernatural 'troubling of the water.' Whoever then first stepped in was cured of his infirmity. This was the scene of a remarkable miracle performed by our Lord, and objected to by the Jews, as if the sabbath had been broken (John v. 2-16). Bethesda is generally supposed to be the pool now called Birket Israil, within the walls of the city, close by St. Stephen's gate, to the north-east of the area of the great mosque. Dr. Robinson, however, is inclined to identify it with the fountain of the Virgin, some distance above the pool of Siloam.

BETH-E'ZEL (house of firm root, or fixed dwelling). A place, according to Ephraem Syrus, near Samaria, but more probably in Philistia (Mic. i. 11).

BETH-GA'DER (house of the wall). A place in Judah (1 Chron. ii. 51). Possibly the same with Geder (Josh. xv. 36).

BETH-GA'MUL (house of the weaned). A Moabite town (Jer. xviii. 23), now Um el-Jemal. See Graham's very interesting account of it in Cambridge Essays, 1858, p. 162. It is a large place, the ancient houses still very perfect.

BETH-GIL'GAL (house of Gilgal). 'The house of Gilgal,' or Beth-gilgal, occurs in Neh. xii. 29. See GILGAL, 3.

BETH-HAC'CEREM (house of the vineyard). A town on a hill between Jerusalem and Tekoa, where was a beacon-station (Jer. vi. 1). The word 'part' prefixed to it (Neh. iii. 14) probably means district.

BETH-HAG'GAN (the garden-house). The place by the way of which Ahaziah, king of Judah, fled from Jehu. In the English version it is translated as if it was not a proper name (2 Kings ix. 27), but in the Septuagint it is Baithgan. It is the modern Jemtn. See AHAZIAH, 2, ES-GANNIM, 2.

BETH-HA'NAN (house of grace). See ELON-BETH-HANAN.

BETH-HA'ARAN (house of the height). A city of Gad (Numb. xxxii. 36). See BETH-ARAM.

BETH-HOG'LA or HOG'LAH (partridge-house). A city of Benjamin on the border of Judah (Josh. xv. 6, xviii. 19, 21). There are a ruin and a spring to the south-east of Jericho, called Kasr-hajla and 'Ain-hajla, which probably mark the site.

BETH-HO'RON (house of the hollow). The name of two places, the upper and the nether, said to have been built by Sherah, a daughter or descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 24). It was along the road of Beth-horon that the pursuit and slaughter of the Amorites took place in the great day of Gibeon. The road from Gibeon, about four miles to the upper Beth-horon, is mainly an ascent, just answering to the account given (Josh. x. 10); from thence the rugged descent commences, mostly along a kind of ridge, for three miles to the nether village on a lower eminence; and this was 'the going down to Beth-horon' (11); whence there is a short steep fall to the plain country. Beth-horon was on the boundary between Benjamin and Ephraim (xvi. 3, 5, xviii. 13, 14); 'the corner of the sea southward' (14), being supposed by Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, pp. 669, 670) to refer not to the Mediterranean, to which we cannot well imagine that the territory of Benjamin extended, but to the pool or small lake just below Gibeon; for the term 'sea' is often applied to an inconsiderable body of water. Beth-horon, belonging locally to Ephraim, was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 22; 1 Chron. vi. 68). We find it afterwards occasionally mentioned (one or other of the two places) in the sacred history. It was fortified by Solomon, as commanding an important road (1 Sam. xiii. 18; 1 Kings ix. 17; 2 Chron. viii. 5, xxv. 13). It was the scene of a victory by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. iii. 13-24), and, in the last Jewish war, of the defeat of the Roman general Cestius Gallus. The modern villages Beth 'ur el-Foka and et-Tahta occupy the sites of Beth-horon, the upper and the nether respectively.

BETH-JESHI'MOTH (house of desolations). A town east of the Jordan, in the downs or plain country, allotted to Reuben (Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 20). It afterwards belonged to Moab (Ezek. xxv. 9). It is also found as BETH-JESI'MOTH (Numb. xxxiii. 49).

BETH-LEBA'OTH (house of lionesses). A town, called also simply Lebaoth, originally allotted to Judah, but afterwards transferred to Simeon (Josh. xv. 32, xix. 6). See BETH-BIRI. Its site was perhaps at the ruin called el-Beyadh.

BETH-LEHEM (house of bread).—1. The original name of this place was Ephrath, or Ephratah (Gen. xxxv. 16-20, xlvi. 7), an appellation which we find afterwards as that of a female in connection with the family who settled at Beth-lehem (1 Chron. ii. 19, 50, iv. 4). The first mention of Beth-lehem is on a melancholy occasion. It was just when Jacob and his household were journeying on towards Hebron that Rachel travelled with her last son. Yet a little space, and they would have reached Beth-lehem, when Benjamin was born, and Rachel died; and there in the way did Jacob bury her, and set a pillar on her grave; nor did he ever forget that sad day, but, even when his own heart and flesh were failing, and he too must pass from the land of the living, when he looked on Joseph's sons, his thoughts went back to her he had lost, whom he should soon follow into the world of spirits.

There is little note of Beth-lehem in the early Israelitish history: it is not even numbered in the list of the towns belonging to Judah. But Salma or Salmon, and Hur, both of the tribe of Judah, are said to have been each 'the father of Beth-lehem' (ii. 51, iv. 4), that is, to have colonized it. Neither do we know when, or on what account, the name Beth-lehem was first given: it may have existed early in conjunction with Ephrath; as we occasionally find afterwards the two names conjoined, as well as another compound appellation given it, Beth-lehem-Judah. It is mentioned in Judges as connected with two fearful stories, the idolatry of Micah and of the northern Dan, and the murder of the Levite's concubine (Judges xvii. 7-9, xix. 1, 2). But soon after it appears in a more pleasing history. It was the town of Elimelech, whither his widow returned with the noble-hearted Moabitish damsel, where the liberal Boaz lived, and where the line was settled which produced the royal David (Ruth i. ii. iii. iv.). Thenceforth Beth-lehem was a place of note, the cradle of the kingly house, the destined birth-place of him who, David's Son and David's Lord, was to extend his dominion over the universal world (Mic. v. 2). Many interesting events in David's life are of course connected with Beth-lehem. On the neighbouring hills he fed his flocks: from the wild gorges near came up the savage beasts that he slew: here in his father's house he was anointed by Samuel; and hence he went forth to combat the giant (1 Sam. xvi., xvii.). And, when he became a man of war, faint one day and weary, it was for the water of the well just by the gate of Beth-lehem that he longed; and three of his mighty men broke through the Philistine host, and brought it him; but he would not drink (2 Sam. xxiii. 13-17; 1 Chron. xi. 15-19). Some have wondered that David did not make Beth-lehem his capital instead of Hebron, or Jerusalem. But, though it might be a strong position, yet it never was largely enough supplied with water to become a great city; and so Beth-lehem continued 'little among the thousands of Judah.' Its sons, however, were fierce and fearless men, Joab, Abishai (2 Sam. ii. 32), and others. And so are the Beth-lehemites, it is said, to the present day, hardy and lawless, noted for turbulence and rebellion. Beth-lehem was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 6); and it was the last resting-place of the rebellious remnant that after the destruction of Jerusalem would go down into Egypt (Jer. xli. 17); and the Old Testament history of it closes with the notice that some of its 'children' returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 1; Neh. vii. 26).

It was in New Testament times that Beth-lehem had its highest honour. Thither Joseph and Mary, according to the decree of the Roman emperor, had to repair, as descendants of David, to David's city. There, in the adjoining fields, the angelic host announced the glad tidings of a Saviour's birth; and there was that wonderful event consummated, the taking of human flesh into union with the Godhead, when the child Jesus was born of a mortal mother. Thither also came the eastern sages to present their offerings; and there was the cruel slaughter of the little ones by Herod, awakening, as it were, again Rachel's lamentation (Matt. ii. 1-18; Luke ii. 1-20).

Beth-lehem lies a little east of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, about six miles from the first-named city. There is a long limestone-hill running east and west, with deep valleys to the north and south. The east end of this hill is bold; on the west it slopes gradually to the valley. On the sides of the hill are terraced gardens, with olive-trees, fig-trees, and vines; and on the top to the east and north-east lies the village, now called Beit-lahm, with a population of about 3,000. In the most easterly part is the celebrated church of the nativity, which owes its foundation to the empress Helena, mother of Constantine the Great. It is enclosed within the walls of the convent, which is now parcelled out among the Greek, Latin, and Armenian monks. Two spiral staircases lead down to the cave or grotto of the nativity, twenty feet below the floor of the church. This cave is lined with Italian marble; and in a small semi-circular niche, the exact spot marked by a star inlaid in the marble, corresponding to the point in the heavens where the star appeared to the magi, is a Latin inscription stating that Jesus was born here. A row of lamps are always burning. Opposite is a large irregular cavity, where it is said the manger stood, a block of white marble being hollowed out in it like a manger. Here, too, is the altar of the magi. And other lamps are suspended. There are also shown the sepulchre of the Innocents, the grotto or crypt where St. Jerome lived and studied, and chapels dedicated to Joseph and other saints. The probability of our Lord's being born in a cave need not here be discussed. A long current of tradition is in favour of it; and no doubt it is possible that the place where Mary took shelter, there being 'no room in the inn,' might be one of the caverns in the limestone-rock. But certainly the place where the eastern sages visited the Saviour was a 'house' (Matt. ii. 11). The traditional scene of the angels' appearance to the shepherds is a plain about a mile away, where is a miserable village, called Beit-Sahur; while the traditional well of David is half a mile to the north of the town; but, according to Dr. Robinson, there is 'no well of living water' near. The associations of Beth-lehem are well illustrated by Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 644-650.

2. A town in the territory of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15). This was probably the Beth-lehem to which Izbaz belonged (Judges xii. 8-10). It still exists as a poor village, called Beit-lahm, about six miles west of Nazareth.

BETH-LEHEMITE. An inhabitant of Beth-lehem (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 18, xvii. 58; 2 Sam. xxi. 19).

BETH-LO'MON (1 Esdr. v. 17). A corrupted form of Beth-lehem (Ezra ii. 21).

BETH-MA'ACHAH (house of oppression). A place or district near to or in which was the city of Abel (2 Sam. xx. 14, 15). See ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH.

BETH-MAR'CABOTH (house of the chariots). A town of Simeon (Josh. xix. 5; 1 Chron. iv. 31).

BETH-ME'ON (house of habitation). A Moabite town (Jer. xlviii. 23). See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-MIL'LO (house of Millo) (2 Kings xii. 20, marg.). See MILLO.

BETH-NIM'RAH (house or place of limpid and sweet water). A town on the east of the Jordan, allotted to the tribe of Gad, who built or fortified it. It is also called Nimrah (Numb. xxxii. 3, 36; Josh. xiii. 27.) This place is said to have been situated about five miles to the north of Libias. There are some ruins south of es Salt, at the mouth of Wady Shoab, which still bear the ancient name, the stream discharging itself into the Jordan. Some have connected the waters of Nimrim (Isai. xv. 6; Jer. xlviii. 34) with Beth-nimrah; but these waters were probably more to the south.

BETH-ORON (Judith iv. 4). Probably Beth-horon.

BETH-PA'LET (house of Pelet, or escape). A town in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 27, called Beth-phetet in Neh. xi. 26). Mr. Wilton is disposed to attribute its foundation to Peleth (1 Chron. ii. 33), and to identify it with the ruin Jerrah (Negeb, pp. 134-137).

BETH-PAZ'ZEZ (house of dispersion). A town of Issachar (Josh. xix. 21).

BETH'-PEOR (temple of Peor). A place where the worship of Baal-peor had prevailed (See BAAL-PEOR), in the district allotted to Reuben (Deut. iii. 29, iv. 46; Josh. xiii. 20). It was in a ravine over against Beth-peor that Moses was buried (Deut. xxxiv. 6).

BETH'-PHAGE (house of unripe figs). A village on the road between Jericho and Jerusalem, upon a shoulder of the mount of Olives, and evidently very near to Bethany (Matt. xxi. 1; Mark xi. 1; Luke xix. 29). But its precise position has not been ascertained; and it is an undecided question whether Bethphage was east or west of Bethany. Mr. Porter is inclined to believe them different quarters of the same village (Handb. for Syria and Palest., p. 188).

BETH-PHE'LET. The same with Beth-palet (Neh. xi. 26).

BETH-RA'PHA (house of the giant). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 12).

BETH'-REHOB (house, or region of the street, or streets). A place near which was the valley in which Laish or Dan was situated (Judges xviii. 28). It was a considerable distance from Zidon, and formed probably one of the smaller principalities of Aram or Syria; for the children of Ammon are said to have hired the Syrians of Beth-rehob (2 Sam. x. 6). It is sometimes called Rehob (Numb. xiii. 21; 2 Sam. x. 8), and has been supposed to be the modern Hunin, overlooking the plain of the Haleh; but Dr. Thomson doubts.

BETH-SA'IDA (house or place of fishing).—1. A town of Galilee, not far from Capernaum, on the western shore of the lake of Gennesaret (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13). It was the city of the apostles Philip, Andrew, and Peter (John i. 44, xii. 21). By comparing Mark vi. 45 with 53 we may infer that it stood in the land or plain of Gennesaret; but its exact position has not yet been satisfactorily ascertained. Mr. Porter, however, identifies it with et-Tabighah (Handb. for Syria and Palest., pp. 428, 429).—2. Another town at no great distance, at the north-eastern extremity of the lake, just upon the point where the Jordan enters it. This was in Gaulanitis, and, being re-built and enlarged by the tetrarch Philip, was by him called Julius, in honour of the daughter of Augustus. Here Philip was buried. We may conclude that there were two places of the same name, for the following reasons. The scene of the miracle of multiplying the five loaves was in a desert place belonging to Bethsaida (Luke ix. 10). This place, according to Dr. Thomson, can be exactly identified. There is a bold headland, Bu-taiha, running into the lake. Close by is a little cove, and at the foot of the rocky mountain a piece of level greensward. From this spot, near and belonging to Bethsaida-Julias, our Lord, we are told, sent off his disciples by ship to the other side to Bethsaida (Mark vi. 45). And, again, Dalmanutha was on the western side of the lake. But, after being at this place, Jesus crossed to the other side, and came to Bethsaida (viii. 10, 13, 22). These reasons seem conclusive for the fact of there being two Bethsaidas. Dr. Thomson, however, imagines there was but one, Bethsaida-Julias; that it was built on both sides the Jordan, and therefore partly in Galilee; that, the desert place being at some little distance, our Lord might well send his disciples thither by boat; that the storm which arose prevented them from making Bethsaida, or even Capernaum; and that therefore, though they had set out for Bethsaida, they were carried to the land of Gennesaret (The Land and the Book, pp. 372-374; comp. Ellicott's note, Hist. Lect., p. 207).

BETH'-SAMOS (1 Esdr. v. 18). Probably a corrupted form of Azmaveth (Ezra ii. 24).

BETH'-SHAN (house of quiet) (1 Sam. xxxi. 10, 12; 2 Sam. xxi. 12); identical with BETH'-SHEAN (id.). A city allotted to Manasseh, though locally within the territory of Issachar; the Manassites, however, were not at first able to subdue it (Josh. xvii. 11, 16; Judges i. 27; 1 Chron. vii. 29). To the wall of this place the Philistines fastened the body of Saul after the disastrous battle on Gilboa. Beth-shean was included with the neighbourhood, 'all Beth-shean,' in one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 12). It was subsequently called Scythopolis (2 Macc. xii. 29); a colony being left here from the great Scythian irruption. It is now Beisan, with extensive remains, situated just where the great plain of Esdraelon begins to descend to the Jordan valley. Its natural position is very strong, and it is well watered. Dr. Thomson describes it, and remarks on the exploit of the men of Jabesh-gilead: 'Jabesh-gilead was on the mountain east of the Jordan, in full view of Beth-shan; and these brave men could creep up to the Tell, along Wady Jalad, without being seen, while the deafening roar of the brook would render it impossible for them to be heard. I have often been delighted with this achievement' (The Land and the Book, pp. 453-457).

BETH-SHE'MESH (house of the sun).—1. A city on the frontier line of Judah (Josh. xv. 10), afterwards allotted to the priests (xxi. 16; 1 Chron. vi. 59). Beth-shemesa, being not far from Ekron, was the place to which the ark of God was first brought when sent away by the Philistines. It was received with joy; but because of the irreverent curiosity of the people a terrible judgment was inflicted. Opinions have varied in respect to the number slain; for a copyist's error has been supposed. But, however this may be, the deaths were many enough to strike an awful terror on the survivors; and that hill-side which had lately resounded with songs of gladness, echoed now but lamentation and woe (1 Sam. vi.). Beth-shemesh is mentioned in the arrangement of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 9). It was again the scene of sad disaster when the power of Judah under Amaziah went down beneath the conquering arm of Israel under Joash (2 Kings xiii. 11-13; 2 Chron. xxv.

21-23); and the last we hear of it in scripture is in the unhappy reign of Ahaz, when this, with other neighbouring places, was occupied by the Philistines (xxviii. 18). But it still survives: it is the modern Ain Shems, on the north-west slopes of the hills of Judah, two miles from the Philistine plain, and seven from Ekron. It has been thought identical with Ir-shemesh (Josh. xix. 41). But Ir-shemesh belonged to Dan. Still, if not the same, they must have been very close. Also mount Heres (Judges i. 35) may have been another name, or the appellation of some neighbouring eminence where there was the worship of the sun.—2. A city on the border of Issachar (Josh. xix. 22).—3. A town of Naphtali, from which the original inhabitants were not at first expelled (ix. 38; Judges i. 33).—4. A place in Egypt, probably identical with Heliopolis or On (Jer. xliii. 13). See ON.

BETH'SHEMITE. An inhabitant of Beth-shemesh, 1 (1 Sam. vi. 14, 18).

BETH-SHITTAH (acacia-place). A place to which the Midianites fled from Gideon (Judges vii. 22). It must have been near the Jordan; Porter suggests at Shutta, Handb. for Syria and Palest., p. 648.

BETH-SUR (1 Macc. iv. 29, 61, and elsewhere). A town frequently mentioned in the Maccabean history: it was no doubt Beth-zur.

BETH-TAP'PUAH (apple or citron-place). A town in the mountain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 53). It is identical with the modern Teffah, about five miles west of Hebron, where olive-groves and vineyards abound.

BETH'ZUR (house of the rock). A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 58; 1 Chron. ii. 45); fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 7). Its ruler is mentioned as helping to repair the wall of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. iii. 16). It was known in the Maccabean times as Bethsura, and is now Beit Sar.

BE'THER (section or separation). We have no certain information respecting 'the mountains of Bether' (Sol. Song, ii. 17): perhaps they were mountains divided by valleys, or mountains that separated the two persons implied in the text; the word 'Bether' not being a proper name. There was, however, a Bether celebrated in later Jewish history; and Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 665) thinks the reference is to the hills in its neighbourhood. 'The allusion,' he says, 'is natural enough; for I myself have seen beautiful roes leaping upon those mountains, skipping upon the hills.'

BETHU'EL (perhaps man of God?). The son of Abraham's brother Nahor, and father of Laban and Rebekah (Gen. xxii. 22, 23, xxiv. 15, 24, 47, 50, xxv. 20, xxviii. 2, 5). On the insignificant part Bethuel appears to play in his own family, see Prof. Blunt (Undesigned Coincidences, part i. 4, pp. 35-37, edit. 1856).

BETHU'EL (id.). A town of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 30); called also the Chesil of Josh. xv. 30; it may be the ruin now called el-Khulasah. See CHESIL.

BETHULIA. The chief scene of the events described in the book of Judith (Judith iv. 6, &c.). Attempts have been made to identify the site: it was 'over against Esdraelon, near to Dothaim'; but no certain result has been attained.

BETO'LIOUS (1 Esdr. v. 21). Perhaps corrupted from Beth-el (Esra ii. 23).

BETOMAS'THEM or BETOMES'THAM (Judith iv. 6, xv. 4).

BETO'NIM (pistacio-nuts). A boundary-town of Gad (Josh. xiii. 26).

BETROTHING. See MARRIAGE.

BEU'LAH (married). A name symbolically applied to the land of Israel, when, desolate no more, it shall again be the Lord's delight (Isai. lxii. 4).

BE'ZAI (victory?). One whose children returned from the captivity (Esra ii. 17; Neh. vii. 23). This name, perhaps being that of their representative, occurs among those who sealed the covenant (x. 18).

BEZAL'EEL (in the shadow, i.e. protection, of God).—1. A person, son of Uri and grandson of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, to whom was confided the execution of the works for the tabernacle in the wilderness (Exod. xxxi. 2; 1 Chron. ii. 20). He was specially skilled in working in metals, and in carving stone and wood, and he had an associate, Aholiab, whose department it was to engrave and embroider (Exod. xxxv. 30-35); but Bezaleel appears to have had the general superintendence, and is always mentioned first (xxxvi. 1, 2, xxxvii. 1, xxxviii. 22, 23; 2 Chron. i. 5).—2. One who had married a foreign wife (Esra x. 30).

BE'ZEK (lightning).—1. A city in the allotment of Judah, where Adoni-bezek lived, whom the Israelites, having defeated the Canaanites and Perizzites, took prisoner (Judges i. 3-5).—2. A place where Saul reviewed his troops previously to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (1 Sam. xi. 8): it was within a day's march of Jabesh (9).

BE'ZER (ore of precious metal). A descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 37).

BE'ZER (id.). A city in the plain country of Reuben, allotted to the Levites of the family of Merari, and made one of the three cities of refuge east of the Jordan (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8, xxi. 36; 1 Chron. vi. 78).

BE'ZETH (1 Macc. vii. 19). A place probably near Jerusalem.

BI'ATAS (1 Esdr. ix. 48).

BIBLE. The term by which we ordinarily understand the collected canonical writings of the Old and New Testaments. It is proposed to give in the present article some account of the name, and of the arrangement and divisions of the various parts of the bible.

This word, emphatically signifying 'the book,' does not occur in the holy volume itself. Separate books had of course separate titles; but the whole that was comprised in the Jewish canon was termed by our Lord and the apostles 'the scripture,' or 'the holy scriptures,' with slight variation of phrase (Matt. xxii. 29; Luke xxiv. 27; John v. 39; Acts xvii. 11; Gal. iii. 22; 2 Tim. iii. 15, and elsewhere). The title

Old Testament' or 'Covenant,' is applied to the book of the law (2 Cor. iii. 14); and, the 'New Testament' or 'Covenant' (6) being contrasted with the Old, these two distinctive terms came soon, as we shall see, to designate the collections of respectively the Jewish and the Christian scriptures. Among the later Jews, a term signifying 'reading' or 'that which was read,' i.e. 'the reading-book,' was applied to their entire sacred book; just as 'the Koran' with the same signification has been made the name of the Mohammedan authoritative volume (Bleek, Einleit. in A.T. p. 30). The plural word 'books,' rather 'the books,' is used by Daniel (Dan. ix. 2), indicating there, it would seem, all the sacred writings down to his time; and in the second prologue to Ecclesiasticus we find 'the law itself, and the prophets, and the rest of the books.' But in neither of these cases has the word 'books' any peculiar distinctive meaning. The early Christian writers naturally adopted the expressions of Christ and the apostles; and 'the scripture,' 'the divine' and 'the holy scripture,' are the terms constantly occurring in their works. The inspiration of the New Testament writers being acknowledged, their books in time began to occupy the same position in the mind of the church with those of the Jewish canon. It is not intended to discuss here the manner in which the canon in either case was formed (see CANON OF SCRIPTURE), but simply to note the fact that the two collections grew into one connected whole, equally entitled to the appellation of scripture.

Thus the expression of the apostle (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16) is very remarkable. And the earliest post-apostolic Christian writers, without defining what books were or were not inspired, evidently place those which they received as inspired among 'the scriptures.' These appear to have been very early read, like the law and the prophets, in religious assemblies; and so we find a body of New Testament writings recognized, and these with the Old regarded and called 'the two Testaments,' 'the whole scripture' (see Tertull., Adv. Prax. capp. 15, 20; and other and yet earlier authorities might be given). Ere long the phrase, ta biblia, 'the books,' was used. Chrysostom, for example, frequently saying 'holy scripture,' uses also the words above mentioned, 'the holy books' (In Cap. i. Gen., Hom. x. 8. Op. Ed. Ben. tom. iv. p. 81). And then biblia, a plural form, being transfused into Latin, and made singular, was adopted with slight modification in modern European languages. With us it did not appear till after the Norman conquest.

The arrangement of the various books of the bible is not chronological; but a certain kind of classification has been adopted in both Testaments. The Jews divided their scriptures into three parts, the Law, the Prophets, and the Khethubim or holy writings. This division existed in the time of our Saviour, who speaks of 'the law, the prophets,' and 'the psalms' (Luke xxiv. 44), intending by 'the psalms' the whole of the khethubim, popularly cited by the name of the book that stood first in the class. This same threefold division is found in the second prologue to Ecclesiasticus, above quoted, and in Josephus (Contr. Apion., lib. i. § 8).—1. The law comprised the Pentateuch or five books of Moses. Whether these were originally one connected volume, or five, as we at present have them, is a matter on which scholars disagree. The names by which they are now respectively known are evidently of Greek origin, and perhaps were prefixed by the Septuagint Greek translators. The Jews usually designate them by their initial words.—2. The prophets included, besides those strictly prophetic, several historical books; the annals of the Hebrew commonwealth being frequently compiled by prophetic men (1 Chron. xxix. 29; 2 Chron. ix. 29, xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32), and intended to teach by history as the prophets did by word of mouth. And these prophets were divided into former and latter (with a reference, it has been believed, to Zech. i. 4): the former comprised Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel (one book) 1 and 2 Kings (also one book); the latter, three greater prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, twelve minor (one book).—3. The khethubim, called also from the Greek hagiographa, or holy writings, comprehended the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations of Jeremiah, Ecclesiastes, Esther (the five last-named being termed the five megilloth or rolls), Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah (one book), 1 and 2 Chronicles (also one book). In all, according to this mode of reckoning, the sacred books were twenty. Various reasons have been conjectured why Daniel should be placed not among the prophets, but in the third division. Some have chosen to regard it as a proof of the later date and inferior authority of the book; but such an inference cannot be justly drawn. The Psalms are in the same class; and their authority is not thereby depreciated. A more reasonable supposition is that Daniel did not exercise his prophetic office in the restricted and proper sense of the term 'prophecy'; he was not professionally a prophet; besides, there is a marked difference in character between his writings and those of the prophets generally: see DANIEL, BOOK OF.

The order of the various books differs in Hebrew manuscripts, according as they are Talmudical or Masoretic. The following is the Talmudical arrangement: The law; the prophets, viz., Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, the twelve minor prophets; the khethubim, Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Lamentations, Daniel, Esther, Ezra with Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles. By the Masoretes in the prophets Isaiah is made to precede Jeremiah and Ezekiel; and the khethubim are thus arranged; Psalms, Proverbs, Job, the five megilloth, viz. Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, then Daniel, Ezra with Nehemiah, 1 and 2 Chronicles. The Talmudic order is generally adopted by the German and French Jews; the Masoretic by the Spanish. But, according to Keil, the Masoretic arrangement of the khethubim is in use among the Germans (Einleit. § 159, pp. 551, 552). De Wette gives another Masoretic order in manuscripts of the khethubim, viz. Chronicles, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther, Daniel, Ezra (Einleit. § 110, p. 141; comp. Keil, Einleit. § 175, p. 592). The order in the Septuagint varies considerably from that of the Hebrew. The books which we term the Apocrypha are not classed by themselves, but interspersed with those that are canonical; and the lesser prophets precede the greater. The Latin Vulgate follows nearly the same order, making, however, the greater prophets come before the lesser. Protestant versions put the Apocrypha separately; consequently the arrangement of our bibles is fourfold: the Pentateuch; the historical books, Joshua to Esther inclusive; the doctrinal or poetical books of Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon; the prophetic books, Isaiah, Jeremiah with his Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the twelve minor prophets.

The books of the New Testament may be classed as historical, doctrinal, and prophetic. The historical, viz. the four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, always stand first. Of the doctrinal class, some leading manuscripts (including the Alexandrine and Vatican) make the catholic epistles precede those of St. Paul; the Hebrews following 2 Thessalonians. The western church has generally placed the Pauline epistles first, viz. those to churches in the order of their relative importance, then those to individuals, with the Hebrews last as being anonymous, and the author, according to many, uncertain. The prophetic book, the Revelation, always closes the sacred volume.

It is probable that the Hebrews did not at first divide one word from another in their writing. And, when the separation of words came into use, it would seem to have been in some degree arbitrary. For it is obvious that the authors of the Septuagint version divided many words in a way different from the modern custom. In the Talmud, however, directions are given for spaces between words in synagogue rolls. Paragraphs began to be marked in early times. In the Pentateuch there were 669 called perashioth. They are certainly prior in date to the Talmud, and by some scholars are supposed to have originated with the sacred writers themselves. They were divided into open, where a fresh line was begun, and a greater break of the sense perceptible; and closed, where there was only a small blank space within the line, and the sense was more continued. These different kinds of sections were denoted by two Hebrew letters, Pe and Samech, placed respectively at the beginnings of each. There were, further, other divisions, larger perashioth, 54 in number, mentioned for the first time in the Masorah; one of these was to be read every sabbath-day. But ther are traces of some such divisions even in New Testament times. For the chapter of 'the bush' is referred to (Mark xii. 26; Luke xx. 37); and that of 'Elias' (Rom. xi. 2); a section or period is also mentioned (Acts viii. 32, 33); and there are indications of a calendar or cycle of lessons (Luke iv. 17-19; Acts xiii. 15, 27, xv. 21). When the divisions of the larger perashioth correspond with those of the smaller, the Hebrew letters above-mentioned are tripled. Besides these sections of the Pentateuch there were haphtaroth, paragraphs or reading-lessons taken from the prophets. They were most probably introduced with the intention of improving the public services by adding the instruction of the prophets to that of the law. Long afterwards there were sedarim, divisions like our chapters, adopted in Jacob Ben Chayim's edition of the bible (the second Bomberg). They are 447 in number for the whole of the Old Testament. There were also much more minute divisions. These must, many of them (e. g. in the alphabetical poems), have existed from the beginning. And generally in the poetry of the Old Testament we find pesukim, rhythmical members marked off into separate lines. A division into periods with the same name was introduced also into the prose. And, though possibly no marks were at first employed to distinguish these periods, yet their existence is noted in the Mishna; and they appear to have been nearly coincident with modern verses.

There have also been different kinds of divisions in the New Testament. Chapters, kephalaia, are early spoken of. But perhaps the oldest mode of division of which we know anything is that peculiar and good one adopted in the Vatican manuscript. This is a distribution into sections of very unequal length; the breaks being regulated by the sense. St. Matthew has 170 of them, St. Mark 61, St. Luke 152, and St. John 80. In the second century Tatian formed a harmony of the Gospels; and a century later Ammonius of Alexandria carried the same plan farther, dividing each Gospel into such sections as would answer to certain other portions in one or more of the other Gospels. These are called the Ammonian sections. In the early part of the fourth century, Eusebius of Cæsarea made them the basis of his harmonizing tables, known as the Eusebian canons; according to which the facts narrated in the Gospels are classed as they are found in all the four evangelists, in three, in two, or in a single one. Tables of this kind were chiefly for students who desired to compare the narratives. Other sections therefore were also formed; such as some called tilloi, which were probably portions for public reading. Of these there were 68 in St. Matthew, 48 in St. Mark, 83 in St. Luke, and in St. John 19. Each of these sections, except the first, with which of course the book began, had a title from one of the first or principal subjects mentioned in it; while the beginning of the book had a general inscription. The Acts and the Epistles were similarly divided into kephalaia, the Acts by Pamphilus the martyr, and the epistles of St. Paul by some unknown person: the divisions in the catholic epistles have been ascribed, but perhaps without sufficient reason, to Euthalius the deacon of Alexandria, afterwards bishop of Sulca. The Revelation was divided into 24 portions called logoi, and into 72 smaller ones, kephalaia; both being attributed to Andreas of Caesarea in Cappadocia. The Greeks adhered to these ancient divisions till after the taking of Constantinople in 1453 A.D.; subsequently the Latin chapters were adopted. Something like verses, also, were anciently introduced. It is true that in Greek manuscripts, as in Hebrew, the words were not at first separated; but in the fifth century the use of a dot to divide sentences had become general. In 453 A.D. Euthalius, mentioned above, put forth St. Paul's epistles divided into stichoi or lines, each comprising a member of a sentence; in 490 A.D. he also put out the Acts and catholic epistles similarly divided. But it is not certain that he was the real author of the system. And indeed it would seem that the same kind of division had been previously made in the Gospels.

With regard to our modern divisions of chapters and verses, the following appears to be briefly the history. About the middle of the thirteenth century cardinal Hugo de Sancto Caro, or Hugh de St. Cher, having projected a concordance to the Latin Vulgate, distributed the Old and New Testaments into chapters: they are those we now have. He also distinguished smaller sections or verses (following in the Old Testament the Masoretic divisions), placing the letters A, B, C, D, E, F, and G in the margin, for facility of reference. A Hebrew concordance on the same plan was compiled by rabbi Mordecai Nathan, a celebrated Jewish teacher, in the fifteenth century, who retained the cardinal's divisions, substituting Hebrew numeral figures for the marginal Roman letters. The Latin version of the bible published by Xantes Pagninus at Lyons, in 1528, is the first in which verses are throughout marked by Arabic numerals. In the Hebrew Pentateuch, Megilloth, and Haphtaroth, printed at Sabionetta in 1557, every fifth verse was distinguished by a Hebrew numeral. Each verse of the Hebrew text in the Antwerp polyglott of 1569-1573 has an Arabic numeral. In the New Testament, however, there were no Masoretic verses; and therefore Robert Stephen undertook the minute subdivision, which he accomplished while on a journey from Paris to Lyons. He printed the first Greek Testament with his verses at Geneva in 1551. The English New Testament divided into both chapters and verses appeared at Geneva in 1557; and the first whole English bible so divided is that executed at the same place by William Whittingham, Anthony Gilby, and Thomas Sampson, published in 1560; and the same divisions have been adopted generally ever since.

It cannot be denied that the divisions in our ordinary bibles are sometimes unskillful and erroneous. But it is more easy to point out the fault than to amend it.

Attempts have been made to construct paragraph bibles, so as to exhibit more clearly the connection and the sense of scripture. The motive deserves all praise; but the success of the attempts hitherto made is more than doubtful. And there is but too much reason for the grave censure of Dr. McCaul: 'The sacred text has been either cut up into shreds with a separate heading, or a number of chapters welded together into one unmanageable mass, so as to perplex and weary the reader; especially as, from want of verses, these portions present one dull and disheartening mass of type, unpleasant to look at.' (Reasons for holding fast the authorized English version of the Bible, p. 13).

BICH'RI (youthful, or possibly descendant of Becher). A Benjamite, the father of the rebel Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 1).

BID'KAR (son of stabbing, i.e. stabber). A captain (one of those called shalishim, see ARMY), or chariot-officer of Jehu or Jehoram; who had before served under Ahab (2 Kings ix. 25).

BIER. See BURIAL.

BIG'THA (gardener, or possibly given by fortune). One of the seven chamberlains or eunuchs of the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

BIG'THAN, BIGTHA'NA (gift of fortune). A chamberlain or eunuch of Ahasuerus who with Teresh conspired against his sovereign's life (Esth. ii. 21, vi. 2). The conspiracy was detected by Mordecai.

BIG'VAI (husbandman, or, perhaps, happy).—1. A person who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).—2. One whose descendants returned (Ezra ii. 14; Neh. vii. 19). It was probably the representative of this family who sealed the covenant (x. 16).

BIK'ATH-A'VEN (plain of Aven) (Amos i. 5, marg.) See AVEN.

BIL'DAD (son of contention, i.e. quarreller). One of Job's friends, called the Shuhite (Job ii. 11, viii. 1, xvii. 1, xxv. 1, xlii. 9). He is abrupt, almost unfeeling in the part he takes in the discussion with Job; and his arguments are not always to the point. See JOB.

BIL'EAM (foreign). A city of the half-tribe of Manasseh, west of the Jordan, allotted to the Levites (1 Chron. vi. 70). It is probably identical with Ibleam (Josh. xvii. 17); but in xxi. 25 Gath-rimmon is substituted.

BIL'GAH (cheerfulness).—1. The head of the fifteenth course of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 14).—2. A priest who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 5, 18).

BIL'GAI (id.) A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 8); probably identical with the preceding, or the representative of his family.

BIL'HAH (bashfulness). Rachel's handmaid (Gen. xxix. 29). She bore Jacob two sons, Dan and Naphtali (xxx. 3-8, xxxv. 22, 25, xli. 25; 1 Chron. vii. 13).

BIL'HAH (id.) A town of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 29). It is identical with Baalah (Josh. xv. 29) and Balah (xix. 3). See BIZJOTH-JAH.

BIL'HAN (bashful).—1. A descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 27; 1 Chron. i. 42).—2. A Benjamite chief (vii. 10).

BIL'SHAN (son of the tongue, i.e. eloquent). One who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).

BIM'HAL (son of circumcision, i.e. circumcised) A descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 33).

BIND AND LOOSE (Matt. xvi. 19). 'This same promise is repeated (xviii. 18) to all the disciples generally. . . It was first, however, verified, and in a remarkable and prominent way, to Peter. Of the binding, the case of Ananias and Sapphira may serve as an eminent example; of the loosing, "such as I have give I thee," to the lame man at the Beautiful gate of the temple. But, strictly considered, the binding and loosing belong to the power of legislation in the church committed to the apostles.' (Alford, The Greek Test., note on Matt. xvi. 19.)

BINEA (a gushing forth, fountain). A descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 37, ix. 43).

BIN'NUI (a building). 1. A Levite (Ezra viii. 33).—2, 3. Two persons who had married foreign wives (x. 30, 38).—4. A Levite who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem, the same perhaps who sealed the covenant (Neh. iii. 24, x. 9). He may be the person mentioned in xii. 8.—5. One whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (vii. 15), called also Bani (Ezra ii. 10).

BIRDS. The following is a list of the birds mentioned in scripture. Notices of each will be found under their respective names. Attempts at identification are, generally, reserved to such articles.

Bittern (Isai. xiv. 23).

Cock (Matt. xxvi. 34).

Cormorant (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 17).

Crane (Isai. xxxviii. 14; Jer. viii. 7)—swallow.

Cuckoo (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15)—gull.

Dove (Gen. ix. 8-12).

Eagle (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12).

Gier Eagle (Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 17).

Glede (Deut. xiv. 13).

Hawk (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15).

Hen (Matt. xxiii. 37).

Heron (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18).

Kite (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13).

Lapwing (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18)—hoopoe.

Night Hawk (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15).

Ospray (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12).

Ossifrage (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12).

Ostrich (Job xxxix. 13).

Owl (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15).

— great (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 16).

— little (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 16).

— screech (Isai. xxxiv. 14).

Partridge (1 Sam. xxvi. 20).

Peacock (1 Kings x. 22).

Pelican (Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 17).

Pigeon (Lev. i. 14).

Quail (Exod. xiv. 13; Numb. xi. 31, 32).

Raven (Lev. xi. 15; Deut. xiv. 14).

Sparrow (Psal. lxxxiv. 3, cil. 7).

Stork (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18).

Swallow (Isai. xxxviii. 14; Jer. viii. 7)—crane.

Swan (Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 16).

Turtle Dove (Lev. i. 14).

Vulture (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13).

Birds were occasionally to be offered in sacrifice when any one was too poor to bring a more costly victim (Lev. v. 7; Luke ii. 22-24). In the cleansing of the leper birds were used (Lev. xiv. 1-7). The art of snaring birds is occasionally referred to (Psal. cxxiv. 7; Prov. i. 17). There is a very humane regulation in regard to birds' nests in Deut. xxii. 6, 7. See FOWL, FOWLING.

BIRD-CAGE. See CAGE.

BIR'SHA (son of tumult, or wickedness). A king of Gomorrah (Gen. xiv. 2).

BIRTH. The customary treatment of a child at its birth is described in Ezek. xvi. 4. At the birth of a boy, the mother was unclean for seven days; and thirty-three more must elapse before she was purified. If the child was a girl, these times were doubled. She must then bring a lamb for a burnt-offering, and a turtle-dove or young pigeon for a sin-offering. If she was poor, a pigeon or turtle-dove might be substituted for the lamb (Lev. xii.). We see this law obeyed at the birth of our Lord, and may mark the poverty of Mary, who brought two doves, or pigeons (Luke ii. 22-24).

BIRTH-DAY. It was an ancient custom to celebrate birth-days; and there are many examples of the usage to be found in scripture (Gen. xl. 20; Job i. 4). 'The day of our king' (Hos. vii. 5) was probably his birth-day; and so there can be little doubt was that translated 'Herod's birth-day,' though some have on small grounds imagined it the day of his accession. Such days were observed as times of festivity and banqueting.

BIRTH-RIGHT. The eldest son of a family had in several respects special preeminence. It has been said that the priesthood descended to him; but this is doubtful: scripture is silent on the point. Great respect was certainly paid him; and, when the family had multiplied the first-born by lineal descent had large authority over the tribe. By the Mosaic law he was to have a double portion of the father's substance (Deut. xxi. 15-17); and of this caprice could not deprive him. Still the birth-right might be transferred, as Esau's was to Jacob, by sale and purchase (Gen. xxv. 29-34), or forfeited, as Reuben's was for his incest, being assigned to Joseph, whose posterity had a double portion by forming two tribes in Israel (1 Chron. v. 1, 2). The double portion of Elijah's spirit which Elisha asked seems thus explained (2 Kings ii. 9, 10). It is sometimes asserted that the birth-right extended to the kingdom; but this is questionable. It is true that Jehoshaphat is said to have left his kingdom to Jehoram, because he was the first-born (2 Chron. xxi. 3); and very naturally the eldest son would have superior opportunities for obtaining the crown. But, so far as scripture shows, a younger son frequently succeeded. Solomon, for example, was a younger son. So it is to be presumed was Abijah (xi. 18-22). So certainly was Jehoahaz (2 Kings xxiii. 31, 36).

BISH'LAM (son of peace). A Persian officer in Palestine (Ezra iv. 7).

BISHOP. The translation of a Greek word signifying 'inspector' or 'overseer.' We find the name in Greek history given to certain officers or commissioners: it was also introduced among the Romans. Being employed by the Septuagint translators to designate persons exercising authority, or charged with some function in the Israelitish church or polity, it was adopted for certain officers in the Christian church. In our version, the word is once rendered 'overseer' (Acts xx. 28). St. Paul uses it in addressing the Philippians (Phil. i. 1), and elsewhere describes the befitting character and conduct of those who are to hold the office (1 Tim. iii. 1-7; Tit. i. 7-9). St. Peter applies the title to our Lord (1 Pet. ii. 25). But it cannot be doubted that the same persons were in the New Testament called also 'presbyters' or 'elders.' For we do not find bishops and elders spoken of as distinct ministers of the church, as we do bishops and deacons. And, besides, those who are called 'bishops' in one place are termed 'elders' in another (comp. Acts xx. 17 with 28; and Tit. i. 5 with 7). It is impossible therefore to argue, from the occurrence of these two words, that there were different orders or ranks in the ministry. That a superior power was exercised by the apostles few will be disposed to question. And that the apostles delegated to specified persons certain functions, as in the cases of Timothy and Titus, in discharging which they had a higher authority than ordinary ministers of a church, is as little open to doubt. But whether the apostolic office was in its most important functions conveyed to successors, who were to become a standing order, and to whom at length the designation of bishop was specially restricted, has been keenly disputed. Before the close of the New Testament canon, we find individuals addressed as responsible for the condition of the churches they represented (Rev. i. 20, ii. iii.). Some interpreters believe that celestial angels charged with a certain care of these churches are intended. There are grave objections against such a theory; and, if this theory be not admitted, we can scarcely avoid the conclusion that there was in each church a first, a presiding minister. But in what his priority or presidency consisted is another question. The subject of episcopacy as a form of church-government is not to be debated in these pages. The reader must be remitted to other books. Bingham, in his Orig. Eccles., book ii., has gathered a mass of evidence from early writers to illustrate the various ministerial orders in the primitive church. The functions of those called 'bishops' or 'elders' in the New Testament seem to have been two-fold, comprising the exercise of authority, and the duty of giving instruction. See ELDERS.

BISON (Deut. xiv. 5, marg.). See PYGARG.

BITH'IAH (daughter, i.e. worshipper, of Jehovah). A daughter of Pharaoh, wife to Mered, a man of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 18). The date of this alliance is purely conjectural. Some have supposed it before or about the time of the exodus.

BITH'RON (section, i.e. a mountain-gorge). A defile in the Jordan valley, or Arabah, through which, after crossing the river to the east, Abner and his troops returned to Mahanaim (2 Sam. ii. 29).

BITHYN'IA. A province of Asia Minor, formerly an independent kingdom; the last sovereign of which, Nicomedes III., re-established in his dominions (of which Mithridates, king of Pontus, had dispossessed him) by Pompey, bequeathed Bithynia to the Romans about 74 B.C. After the death of Mithridates, the western part of his kingdom was added to Bithynia. The province was subsequently again increased by Augustus, so that on the north it reached the Euxine, was separated on the east by the river Parthenius from Paphlagonia, and bordered on Phrygia and Mysia on the south, and on the west on the Thracian Bosphorus, the Propontis, and Mysia. The hills of this region were well wooded; and its valleys were productive and afforded rich pasturage. The principal cities were Nicomedia, Chalcedon, Heraclea, Nicea, Prusa. None of these are mentioned in scripture, and Bithynia itself only incidentally (Acts xvi. 7; 1 Pet. i. 1).

BITTER HERBS (Exod. xii. 8; Numb. ix. 11). See PASSOVER.

BITTERN. A bird or animal mentioned in the threats of the desolation of Babylon (Isai. xiv. 23), Idumea (xxxiv. 11), and Nineveh (Zeph. ii. 14). Gesenius, following the Septuagint, imagines that a hedgehog is intended; but the context in all the passages would lead us to expect a bird. The bittern, Botaurus stellaris, is a solitary bird, and frequents marsh lands. We may with reason therefore believe that it is meant in the passages referred to.

BIZJOTH'JAH (contempt of Jehovah). A town in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 28). Mr. Wilton would unite this word to Baalah (29) as the compound name of a city where that worship of Baal was practised which Jehovah contemned (see BAALAH, 2). He supposes it the modern village Deir el-Belah (The Negeb, pp. 149-154).

BIZ'THA (eunuch). One of the seven chamberlains or eunuchs of the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

BLACK. See COLOURS. In Mal. iii. 14, marg., the expression 'in black' occurs. In the text it is 'mournfully.' The allusion is to the custom of wearing dirty or squalid garments when mourning (comp. Jer. viii. 21).

BLAINS. Pustules rising in the skin. There was first an inflamed ulcer and boil; and then the pustules, or blains, broke out upon it. This was one of the most fearful plagues inflicted upon the Egyptians. We may conceive its intensity, when we find that it utterly disabled the magicians who were affected with it from meeting Moses (Exod. ix. 8-11). It has been thought to be the black leprosy, a virulent kind of elephantiasis, 'the botch of Egypt,' 'a sore botch that cannot be healed' (Deut. xxviii. 27, 35), that same disease which afflicted Job (Job ii. 7).

BLASPHEMY. Irreverent or insulting language in regard to God (Psal. lxxiv. 18; Rom. ii. 24; and elsewhere). But the original words in scripture had often a wider signification, and meant evil-speaking, slander, reviling generally (Matt. xv. 19; Luke xxii. 65, and elsewhere). The punishment prescribed by the Mosaic law for the crime of actual blasphemy was death by stoning. This we find executed on the son of Shelomith (Lev. xxiv. 10-16); and it was on this charge that our Lord and Stephen were condemned (Matt. xxvi. 65, 66; Acts vi. 11). It sometimes happens that our version does not accurately express the meaning of the original, as when, in a passage referred to above, those that held our Lord are said to have spoken 'blasphemously' against him. Reviling words knowingly uttered against Christ are indeed blasphemous; but, when the Jews and Roman soldiers reviled him, as they were not aware of his divine nature, such revilings, though highly sinful, were not blasphemous in them, because they knew not what they did. It may be added that, if Jesus had not been the Son of God, his assumption of equality with the Father would have been blasphemous. That assumption was true; but the Jews accused him of blasphemy because they knew not who he was.

Questions have been raised in regard to blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. The essence of this fearful sin seems to have been that the Jews, shutting their eyes to the grand proof of miracles which Christ gave, daringly attributed those good and blessed works to an unclean spirit (Mark iii. 28-30). No obstinacy could be more frightful. It was the resolute determination not to be convinced by any amount of evidence. Their blood was therefore upon their own heads. So a desperate resistance to the gracious motions of the Holy Spirit shuts up the soul to irretrievable ruin. It is not that the blood of Jesus Christ could not cleanse such a sinner, but that the man defeats the kind purpose that would lead him to it. He never applies to the fountain of unlimited virtue; and so he remains uncleaned for ever.

BLASTUS (germ, sprout). The chamberlain of Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xii. 20).

BLEMISH. Certain blemishes or imperfections unfitted the sons of Aaron from executing the priestly office. Blemishes, too, were not allowed in victims for sacrifice (Lev. xxi. 17-23, xxii. 19-25; Deut. xv. 21). All this had a spiritual meaning. The purity of Christ as a sacrifice for sin was thus illustrated (1 Pet. i. 19), and the holy blamelessness which those must cultivate who approach the Lord (Phil. ii. 15; Tit. i. 7).

BLESSING. This word is variously used. Sometimes God is said to bless his creatures. This is not merely the expression of a wish for their welfare, but the actual bestowal of some good, or the means towards a good (Gen. i. 22, xxxii. 29; Job xlii. 12; Acts iii. 26; and elsewhere). Sometimes creatures are said to bless their Creator, when they acknowledge his kindnesses, and seek to show forth his praise (Psal. ciii. 1, 2, cxxxiv. 1, 2). Sometimes men bless their fellow-creatures, when they express their gratitude for favours received, pray for a blessing upon them, or predict their prosperity (Gen. xiv. 18-20, xxviii. 1-4, xlvii. 8; Numb. xxiv. 10; Job xxix. 13). And, as thus to bless is the expression of gratitude or kindness, so a token of gratitude or kindness, that is, a gift, is sometimes called a blessing (2 Kings v. 15).

BLINDING. See PUNISHMENTS.

BLINDNESS. The prevalence of blindness in the east impresses every traveller. Particles of sand, through the dryness of the climate, getting into the eye, the glare of light, the multitude of insects, the neglect and filth in which the people live, the ravages of small-pox, are among the reasons why ophthalmia is endemic in Egypt, extending also into neighbouring countries. Blind persons are frequently mentioned in the New Testament (Matt. ix. 27, 31, xii. 22, xx. 30-34, xxi. 14; Mark viii. 22-26; John v. 3); and our Lord's wonderful power and beneficence in opening their eyes was one great proof that he was the Messiah (Matt. xi. 5). The gradual way in which the miracle was sometimes wrought, and the process which Christ sometimes saw fit to use, cannot in the slightest degree detract from the miraculous character of the cures. Occasionally blindness was penally inflicted (Gen. xix. 11; 2 Kings vi. 18-20; Acts ix. 8, xiii. 11). In some of these cases, possibly, it was not total blindness but rather confused vision. And occasionally it is threatened as a judgment (Deut. xxviii. 28). Kindness to the blind was commanded by the Mosaic law (Lev. xix. 14; Deut. xxvii. 18). Blindness, moreover, is sometimes used figuratively for ignorance, specially of spiritual things (Isai. vi. 10, xlii. 18; Matt. xv. 14; 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4; Rev. iii. 17, 18).

BLOOD. The blood of an animal is declared to be 'the life' of it (Gen. ix. 4; Lev. xvii. 11). And hence God may be said to have reserved it to himself: it was not to be eaten: it was that by which sacrificial atonement was made; and all the cleansings of the law being by the shedding and sprinkling of blood (Heb. ix. 18-22). In this respect it had a typical meaning. The bloodshedding of the Mosaic victims prefigured that greater and more efficacious bloodshedding, when Christ gave his life for mankind (Matt. xx. 28; 1 John iii. 16); so that his blood 'cleanseth from all sin' (1 John i. 7). Further, when blood was shed wantonly, a curse was incurred. The blood of a bird or animal was to be poured upon the ground and covered up (Lev. xvii. 13); and the blood of a man cried for vengeance against the murderer (Gen. iv. 10, 11). Hence the command to Noah that a murderer must be put to death (ix. 6), a command sanctioned in the Mosaic legislation (Numb. xxxv. 30, 31, 33), a command which it would be hard to prove not intended to be binding as an universal law upon the world. And, if any one was slain, and the slayer could not be found, the nearest city was to make an atonement (Deut. xxi. 1-9).

BLOOD, AVENGER OF. See AVENGER OF BLOOD, CITIES OF REFUGE.

BLOOD, ISSUE OF (Lev. xv. 19-30; Matt. ix. 20; Mark v. 25; Luke viii. 43). Menstruation, or fluxus uteri. So long as it continued there was ceremonial uncleanness. The case mentioned in Acts xxviii. 8 was dysentery.

BLUE (Exod. xxv. 4, xxvi. 1, 31, 36, xxvii. 16; Numb. xv. 38; 2 Chron. ii. 7, 14; Esth. i. 6, viii. 15; Ezek. xxiii. 6, and elsewhere). See COLOURS.

BOANER'GES (sons of thunder). A surname given by our Lord to James and John, the sons of Zebedee (Mark iii. 17); probably on account of their zealous temper (comp. Matt. xx. 20-22; Mark ix. 38; Luke ix. 53, 54).

BOAR. This animal is named but once in our version (Psal. lxxx. 13); elsewhere the original word is rendered 'swine.' The wild boar of the east is commonly smaller than the old breeds of domestic swine, though occasionally it grows to a large size. It is very ferocious when roused, and commits great ravages in the vineyards. Boars are said to abound about the sources of the Jordan, and near its mouth; they are also common on Carmel and elsewhere in Palestine.

BOAT (John vi. 22, 23; Acts xxvii. 16, 30, 32). See SHIP.

BO'AZ (alacrity). A wealthy inhabitant of Beth-lehem who according to the principles of the Levirate law married Ruth the widow of his kinsman Mahlon; a nearer relative having yielded up his right. Boaz was considerably older than Ruth; but he had by her a son, Obed, the ancestor of David (Ruth ii., iii., iv.; 1 Chron. ii. 11, 12). In the New Testament he is called Booz (Matt. i. 5; Luke iii. 32).

BO'AZ (id., or in him, i. e. the Lord, is strength). One of the brazen pillars set up before the portico of the temple. Its height is variously stated (1 Kings vii. 15-22; 2 Kings xxv. 13, 16, 17; 2 Chron. iii. 15-17; Jer. lii. 17, 20-23); most probably because sometimes the capital and the ornamental work uniting it to the shaft are included; sometimes the height of the shaft alone is given. Boaz stood on the left, perhaps the north side of the entrance. Besides their purpose as architectural ornaments, these pillars had, it is likely, a symbolical meaning. See JACHIN.

BOC'CAS (1 Esdr. viii. 2). A form of Bukki (Ezra vii. 4).

BO'CHERU (the first-born is he). A son of Azel (1 Chron. viii. 38, ix. 44). The Septuagint translators have not considered this a proper name.

BO'CHIM (weepers). A place, probably not far from Gilgal, where the Israelites wept when rebuked by an angel (Judges ii. 1, 5).

BO'HAN (thumb). A Reubenite. A memorial stone was called after him: it was on the borders of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 6, xviii. 17).

BOILS (Exod. ix. 9-11; Lev. xiii. 18-23). See BLAINS, LEPROSY.

BOLLED (Exod. ix. 31). The proper meaning of the original word so translated here is the calyx or corolla of flowers: the flax was in the calyx, i. e. in flower.

BOLSTER. See BED.

BONDAGE, BONDMAN. See SERVANT.

BONNET. See DRESS, HEAD-DRESS.

BOOK. See WRITING.

BOOK OF LIFE. This is a figurative expression. As the names of men were inserted in books or rolls of genealogy, so there is a register, as it were, kept of those who are to live for ever—God's book which he keeps of his chosen (Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5). Similarly books of remembrance and of judgment are spoken of (Mal. iii. 16; Rev. xx. 12).

BOOTHS. See TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.

BOOTY. When the Israelites entered Canaan, they were commanded utterly to exterminate Jericho, the first city attacked, and to touch none of the booty or spoil: all was to be destroyed; metallic articles only being reserved for the treasury of the Lord (Josh. vi. 17-19). With respect to other cities, as at Ai, the domestic spoil and the cattle might be taken as a prey (viii. 2). In the conquest of Canaan all the inhabitants were to be extirpated; but in wars elsewhere, if a city resisted, the males only might be killed; and then the women and children might be appropriated, together with whatever property the city should contain (Deut. xx. 12-18). Occasionally, however, as in the expedition against Amalek, an exception was made (1 Sam. xv. 3). As to the division of the booty, the half was to go to the combatants, one-fifth per cent. of it being consecrated to God, and given to the priests; the other half to the people, two per cent. being consecrated to God (Numb. xxxi. 26-47). An additional regulation was established by David, that in an army those who guarded the baggage should share equally with those who were actually in the battle (1 Sam. xxx. 22-25).

BO'AZ (Matt. i. 5; Luke iii. 32). See BOAZ.

BO'RITH (2 Esdr. i. 2). A corrupt form of Bukki (Ezra vii. 4).

BORROW. This word is improperly used in Exod. iii. 21, 22, xi. 2, 3, xii. 35, 36. The hard service of Israel demanded a recompence from their Egyptian masters: this the Israelites required; and by God's overruling providence the demand was readily and generally complied with. See LOAN.

BOS'CATH (stony region, height). A town in the plain country of Judah, the native place of Josiah's mother (2 Kings xxii. 1). In Josh. xv. 39, it is Bozkath.

BOSOM. A fold in the bosom of the robe, which was wide above the girdle, was used to hold any precious thing (Isal. xl. 11; Luke vi. 38). In some cases the word is used when reference is made to the custom of reclining at meals; the head of one being thus almost upon the breast of the person immediately above him (xvi. 22, 23; John i. 18, xiii. 23, 25).

BO'SOR (2 Pet. ii. 15). The Greek form of BEOR, which see.

BO'SOR (1 Macc. v. 26, 36). A place in Gilead.

BOS'ORA (1 Macc. v. 26, 28). Perhaps Bozrah.

BOSS (Job xv. 26). The exterior convex part of a shield. See ARMS.

BOTCH (Deut. xxviii. 27, 35). Probably the black leprosy, endemic in Egypt, or elephantiasis. See LEPROSY.

BOTTLE. Several words are used in scripture which our translators have rendered 'bottle.' The skins of kids and further incision. The skin is tanned with acacia bark: the legs then serve for handles, and the neck as the mouth of the 'bottle,' being tied up when the wine or water, as the case may be, has been poured in. The hairy side is outward. These bottles are still in constant use in Syria and the adjacent countries, and are very common also in Spain. We may easily hence understand the wine-bottles of the Gibeonites 'old and rent and bound up' (Josh. ix. 4), and also comprehend the allusion of our Lord to the danger of putting new wine, brisk and fermenting, into old bottles, which it was likely would then burst (Matt. ix. 17). And so the single 'bottle' of wine brought by Ziba (2 Sam. xvi. 1), instead of being out of proportion to the bread and fruits, contained very probably a large quantity. The comparison, moreover, of 'a bottle in the smoke' (Psal. cxix. 83), shrivelled and dried up, is very intelligible. Besides these skin-bottles, others of glass, metal, and earthenware were also in use. Some of these have been discovered in Egypt and Assyria. And there were tear-bottles, in which the tears of mourners were collected. Many of these have been dug up, thin glass or plain pot tery, with a bulbous body, a long slender neck, and a funnel-shaped mouth. Hence the allusion of the psalmist (Psal. lvi. 8).

BOTTOMLESS PIT (Rev. ix. 1, 2, 11, xi. 7, xvii. 8, xx. 1, 3). See HELL.

BOW. See ARMS.

BOWELS. Bowels are sometimes put for the internal parts, expressing figuratively the inner man, just as the heart does with us. Hence the bowels are considered as the seat of compassion or affection (Gen. xliii. 30; Isai. lxiii. 15; 2 Cor. vi. 12, vii. 15, marg.; Phil. 1. 8, ii. 1; Col. iii. 12; Philem. 7, 12, 20, and elsewhere). Sometimes, too, the inward parts are made the seat of wisdom, as in Job xxxviii. 36.

BOWING. An act of courtesy (Gen. xxiii. 7, 12; 1 Kings ii. 19), which, when paid to a superior, sometimes became prostration (Gen. xxxiii. 3; 2 Sam. xiv. 22). It is occasionally spoken of as an act of worship to God (Psal. xc. 6; Eph. iii. 14; Phil. ii. 10). See SALUTATION.

BOWL. Several Hebrew words are thus translated. That in Eccles. xii. 6; Zech. iv. 3 signifies a vessel of a globular shape. The same word is used to describe the ornaments, very likely spherical, on the top of columns (1 Kings vii. 41; 2 Chron. iv. 12, 13), translated 'bowls' and 'pommels.' The word occurring in Judges vi. 38 denotes a shallow dish or basin. It is rendered 'dish' in v. 25, and is found nowhere else. Another word translated 'bowls' conveys the idea of purification; it must therefore mean sacrificial dishes or bowls for libation (Exod. xxxvii. 16; Numb. iv. 7). There is also a word derived from a root signifying to sprinkle; we may suppose that it meant basins from which the blood of victims was sprinkled (vii. 13); it is sometimes rendered 'basin' (iv. 14); and occasionally it means wine-bowls (Amos vi. 6). The 'bowls' of 1 Kings vii. 50 are the same with the 'basin' of Exod. xii. 22, and the 'cup' in Zech. xii. 2. See BASIN. For the 'bowls' (Exod. xxv. 31, 33, 34) in the sacred candlestick, see CANDLESTICK.

BOX (2 Kings ix. 1, 3). The original word is that translated 'vial' in 1 Sam. x. 1. It signifies flask or bottle. The box in Matt. xxvi. 7 was a cruse with a long narrow neck, sealed at the top.

BOX-TREE. The word so rendered signifies erectness, tallness, hence a tall tree (Isai. xli. 19, lx. 13); it has been thought to be a species of cedar growing in Lebanon, called sherbim, distinguished by the smallness of its cones, and the upward direction of its branches. Henderson, believing that this tree is intended in Ezek. xxvii. 6, by a slight alteration in the text, translates, 'Thy deck they made of ivory inlaid in cedars' (see The Book of Ezekiel, p. 134); 'the Ashurites' of our version being unintelligible. But, after all, it is not improbable that the box, Buxus sempervirens, is really the tree meant.

BO'ZEZ (shining). A rock near Gibeah (1 Sam. xiv. 4).

BOZ'KATH (stony region, height) (Josh. xv. 39). See BOSCATH.

BOZ'RAH (fortress, sheep-fold).—1. A city of Edom, first mentioned as the residence of one of the early kings (Gen. xxxvi. 33; 1 Chron. i. 44). We find it again in connection with Edom (Isai. xxxiv. 6, lxiii. 1; Jer. xlix. 13, 22; Amos i. 12; Micah ii. 12). It is the modern el-Busaireh, a small place with about fifty houses, but with ruins around indicating the site of a large city. It stands on a height to the south-east of the Dead sea, about half-way between that sea and Petra.—2. A town of this name is mentioned among the cities of the plain country of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 24). It is not likely to be the Edomitish Bozrah, but it is not noticed in scripture elsewhere. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Bozra.' Porter believes it to be the modern Busrah, which has still a very imposing appearance at a distance; but other authorities are not satisfied with this identification.

BRACELET. The 'bracelets' which we find mentioned in scripture were sometimes properly armlets (Numb. xxxi. 50; 2 Sam. i. 10), still common in the east, worn by princes and distinguished men, as well as by females. They were of gold and other costly materials, enriched with jewels according to the wearer's ability; while the very poor now have them of glass or even earthenware. See ARMLET. But, besides the armlets on the arm, bracelets were worn by men also, as well as women, on the wrists. One of the words so rendered means a fastening (Gen. xxiv. 22, 30, 47; Numb. xxxi. 50; Ezek. xvi. 11, xxiii. 42). The 'bracelets' in the catalogue of Isai. iii. 19, are wreathen or twisted chains. In Exod. xxxv. 22 hooks, or clasps, or brooches, probably to fasten the garments, are meant rather than bracelets; while the 'bracelets' in Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25 would seem to be the cord by which the signet was commonly suspended in the bosom.

BRAMBLE. See THISTLE, THORN.

BRANCH. This word is often used figuratively. A branch is a descendant from a tree the parent (Isai. xi. 1); or it signifies one united to or dependent upon another. Thus, Christ is the vine; and his disciples are the branches (John xv. 5). Hence St. Paul's metaphor (Rom. xi. 17-24) is easily understood. Beside the more general symbolical meaning, the term 'branch' is sometimes specifically applied to the Messiah, as in Jer. xxiii. 5, xxxiii. 15; where the promise runs that, from David's royal stock, a branch of righteousness, a righteous descendant, shall spring. And the same exalted personage is again predicted (Zech. iii. 8, vi. 12), the Branch that shall grow and flourish, and become glorious, and endure for ever.

BRASS. It is very evident that the 'brass' frequently spoken of in scripture cannot be that compound metal to which we give the name of brass; for it is described as dug from the mine (Deut. viii. 9; Job xxviii. 2). Very frequently copper is meant: see COPPER; and, no doubt, also bronze, which is a composition of copper and tin, while brass is copper and zinc. Napier, in his Ancient Workers and Artificers in Metal, gives some interesting information: see particularly, for copper, pp. 53-70, for brass, pp. 84-122. Copper can be toughened; and an ancient spear-head was found on analysis to be almost entirely of this metal, containing of copper 99·71, of sulphur 28. An Egyptian bronze chisel contained of copper 94, of tin 5·9, of iron 1; while a bowl from Nimroud was composed of copper 89·57, of tin 10·43. The 'fine brass' in Rev. i. 15 is probably burnished brass, glowing as in a furnace: see abp. Trench, Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, pp. 36, &c. The word is often used metaphorically, implying hardness, strength, roughness, and the like (e. g. Deut. xxviii. 23; Job vi. 12; Jer. i. 18, vi. 28; Zech. vi. 1).

BRAZEN SEA (2 Kings xxv. 13; Jer. lii. 17). See LAVAR.

BRAZEN SERPENT. See SERPENT.

BRAYING IN A MORTAR (Prov. xxvii. 22). See PUNISHMENTS.

BREAD. This word is often used in a comprehensive sense to signify food in general (Gen. iii. 19, xxviii. 20); hence 'to eat bread' is to partake of a meal (xliii. 25). In some respects this wider application of the term is familiar to ourselves; for we commonly speak of a man's 'earning his bread,' i. e. his subsistence.

Bread in its proper sense was generally of wheat; but barley and other species of grain were also used; and sometimes there was a mixture (Ezek. iv. 9). It has been said that barley bread was eaten only by the very poor, or in time of scarcity. To a certain extent this may be true (John vi. 9): the luxurious Solomon, we read, gave barley to his horses (1 Kings iv. 29). But, when we find also that Boaz, a man of wealth, in a time of plenty, presented barley to Ruth, whom he was intending to marry (Ruth iii. 15: comp. i. 6), we cannot suppose that barley was the food of only mean people.

After the wheat had been ground in the mill, the flour was made into dough or paste in a small wooden bowl or trough: an ephah, or three measures, is the quantity often specified (Gen. xviii. 6; Judges vi. 19; 1 Sam. i. 24; Matt. xiii. 33), probably enough for what we might call a fair family-baking, or for the capacity of an ordinary oven. A leathern bag is now often used for the same purpose by the Bedouin Arabs. Leaven was added afterwards; and then the mass stood to ferment (Luke xiii. 21); consequently, if any sudden necessity of removal occurred, cakes would be hastily baked, or the dough carried off in its unfermented state (Exod. xii. 34). In towns it would seem likely that there were public ovens; for a bakers' street in Jerusalem is mentioned (Jer. xxxvii. 21: comp. Hos. vii. 4). And it is a custom at the present day in the east for bakers by trade not only to dispose of the bread they have themselves prepared, but also to receive and bake the dough entrusted by others to them. A portion of this is retained for their remuneration. These public ovens, and such as are in large private houses, resemble those among ourselves. But smaller portable ones are common. They are of stone, earthenware, or copper, like large jars open at the top; heated inside with wood (1 Kings xvii. 12; Isai. xlv. 15; Jer. vii. 18), or grass (Matt. vi. 30). When the fire has burnt out, small loaves are placed inside, or else thin cakes or biscuits are baked by being applied outside. There is another mode of baking, common enough in rural districts. A kind of pit is formed in the floor of the principal room of a house, a yard wide, and four or five feet deep. Its sides are lined with cement; and, when they have been heated by a fire kindled at the bottom, pieces of dough are thrown against them, and soon baked there. So also the dough is laid on heated stones; or a fire is kindled on a smooth spot, the embers afterwards raked aside, the dough laid down, and the embers heaped over it; or it is placed between layers of dried dung (Ezek. iv. 15). Great care is necessary in turning such cakes (Hos. vii. 8). A pan, too, was used (2 Sam. xiii. 8, 9), very probably similar to that now called tajen by the Arabs, flat, or slightly convex, usually of metal, placed upon a slow fire. Thin flaps of dough are soon baked upon it. Sometimes a metal-plate is put over a cavity in which are burning embers; and on this the bread is baked. By these or the like methods, now practised, the bakings of the bread of which we read in several instances (Gen. xviii. 6; 1 Kings xvii. 13, xix. 6) were no doubt customarily performed among the ancient inhabitants of Palestine. The cakes used in the offerings, whether baked in an oven or on a pan, appear to have been prepared with oil (Lev. ii. 4, 5, vi. 20, 21, vii. 9), sometimes perhaps only dipped in oil (Exod. xxix. 2). Oil, too, was occasionally used for ordinary bread (1 Kings xvii. 12-14). Bread was sometimes round, a finger's breadth thick; sometimes in other shapes, as Egyptian monuments show. Some cakes were punctured, and probably had seeds sprinkled on them; and some, as the cakes which Tamar made (as of open-work; and these were carried in a tray by the baker on his head (Gen. xi. 16, 17). Most of the kinds of bread in use must have been crisp; hence we read so continually of the breaking of bread.

It has been inferred (Luke xi. 5) that three common loaves were sufficient for a man's ordinary meal: the inference is but fanciful. David required five, and had attendants a little way off, for whom also he wished provision (1 Sam. xxi. 2, 3; Mark ii. 26). He took ten for his three brethren (1 Sam. xvii. 17). Two hundred loaves was a fair quantity for a body of troops (xxv. 18; 2 Sam. xvi. 1). Women seem to have been generally employed in making bread (1 Sam. viii. 13; Jer. vii. 18); but the bakers by trade were men (Hos. vii. 4, 6). Loaves in Egypt were placed in baskets, probably abundant in the Mesopotamian plain. Bricks appear to have been, in Egypt and at Nineveh, very generally sun-dried: for the Babylonian buildings they were more commonly burnt in kilns. The clay was sometimes mixed with chopped straw to increase the tenacity and compactness of the bricks; and this was the more needful when the material was the Nile mud (Exod. i. 14, v. 6-19). Egyptian bricks, with dates upon them, are still preserved as fit for use as when they were first made. They are of a large size, varying from  $14\frac{1}{2}$  to 20 inches in length;  $6\frac{1}{2}$  to  $8\frac{1}{2}$  inches in breadth; and in thickness  $4\frac{1}{2}$  to 7 inches. The burnt bricks employed in buildings exposed to water were smaller than those merely sundried. In the Necropolis at western Thebes there is a remarkable painting in the tomb of Rekshe, architect in the reign of Thothmes III., about 1400 years B.C., which represents the process of brick-making. Some of the labourers are digging and preparing the clay, others moulding, carrying, piling the bricks, while taskmasters are superintending the work. They are captives who are employed: possibly Hebrews may be intended (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, vol. ii. p. 197). Babylonian bricks are more like tiles, 12 or 13 inches square, and  $3\frac{1}{2}$  thick. Some of them are glazed or enamelled, and various-coloured patterns are impressed upon them. Many of these have been found bearing the name of Nebuchadnezzar. In the Assyrian ruins there are also bricks both kiln-burnt and sundried. Inscriptions are on many of them.

Brick-kilns are mentioned in 2 Sam. xii. 30; Jer. xliii. 9. There is an allusion to the severity of the labour in them in Nah. iii. 14, 15.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM. See MARRIAGE.

BRIDGE. There is no mention of a bridge in the scriptures. But in the Apocrypha we read of a bridge connected with a town situated near a lake, which Judas Maccabeus besieged (2 Macc. xii. 13-16). Fords are frequently spoken of (Gen. xxxii. 22; Josh. ii. 7; Judges iii. 28, vii. 24, xii. 5; Isai. xvi. 2); and it was by fords that the Hebrews appear generally to have crossed their rivers. But it is remarkable that a district of Syria is called by a name signifying 'bridge'; and this district, Geshur, lay in a quarter not far from which there is now existing a bridge called 'the bridge of the sons of Jacob.' The Romans made bridges over the Jordan and other Syrian rivers, of which there are some remains.

BRIER (Judges viii. 7, 16; Isai. v. 6, vii. 23, 24, 25, ix. 18, x. 17, xxvii. 4, xxxii. 13, lv. 13; Ezek. ii. 6, xxviii. 24; Mic. vii. 4; Heb. vi. 8). See THORNS.

BRIGANDINE. A coat of mail (Jer. xlv. 4, li. 3). See ARMS.

BRIMSTONE. The Hebrew word for brimstone properly means resin or pitch, but comes to signify other combustible substances, especially sulphur or brimstone. It was employed in the destruction of the cities of the plain; the soil of that district abounding in sulphur and bituminous matter (Gen. xix. 24; Deut. xxix. 23). Hence the use of the term figuratively to describe the divine vengeance (Job xviii. 15; Psal. xi. 6; Isai. xxxiv. 9; Ezek. xxxviii. 22; Rev. xix. 20, xx. 10, xxi. 8).

BROIDED, BROIDERED. In 1 Tim. ii. 9 the older rendering is 'broided,' explained in the Geneva translation 'to curl, to crisp, to broid, to fold, to bush, to plait, or to lay it curiously.' See EMBROIDERY.

BROOK. There are several Hebrew words so rendered. That in Psal. xlii. 1, is a rushing torrent. Another often used (e.g. Judges xvi. 4; comp. marg.) implies both the stream and its dry bed, just equivalent to the modern Wady. Most of the brooks of Palestine are torrents flowing only in the winter or after rains. Thus in Job vi. 15 the allusion is to a stream which dries up at once, and disappoints the traveller. See RIVER. The 'brooks' in Isai. xix. 6, 7, 8, are the canals of Egypt.

BROTH. It is a common practice in the east to dip bread into the gravy of meat; which is therefore sometimes served up in a separate vessel (Judges vi. 19, 20; Isai. lxv. 4), or placed in the middle of the meat-dish. See FOOD.

BROTHER. A term frequently used, like others expressive of relationship (e.g. father, son, &c.), in an extended sense. Gesenius enumerates the following meanings of the word in the Old Testament.—1. A brother literally, either by the whole blood, or a half-brother (Judges viii. 19, ix. 21).—2. A kinsman in any degree (Gen. xiv. 16): Lot was really Abraham's nephew.—3. One of the same tribe (Numb. viii. 26; 2 Sam. xix. 12).—4. A fellow-countryman, applied also to kindred tribes (Gen. xvi. 12; Exod. ii. 11; Numb. xx. 14; Judges xiv. 3).—5. An ally, spoken of confederate nations, or those of the same religion (Isai. lxvi. 20; Amos i. 9).—6. A friend (1 Kings ix. 13; Job vi. 15).—7. Any one of the same nature, a fellow-man (Lev. xix. 17).—8. Metaphorically, as expressing likeness of disposition or habits; as 'I am a brother to jackals,' i.e. I cry or howl like them (Job xxx. 29; comp. Prov. xviii. 9).

The usage of the word in the New Testament is very similar, including kinsmen, countrymen, those of the same faith, &c., &c. (Matt. xii. 46-50; Acts xi. 12, xvii. 6, 10; Rom. ix. 3, xii. 1; Heb. iii. 1, and elsewhere). It is employed also as a term of endearment (2 Cor. ii. 13; Philem. 20). The relationship is moreover held up as an incentive and rule for kindness and consideration to others (Heb. xiii. 1; 1 Pet. iii. 8). The modern custom among ourselves differs but little from that we find in the scriptures. We use the term 'brother' in various senses, as indicating different kinds of relationship, e.g. a brother Englishman, a brother clergyman, a brother of the craft, &c. &c.

BUCKLER. See ARMS.

BUILD. See ARCHITECTURE. The word is also used figuratively (e.g. 2 Sam. vii. 27; 1 Cor. iii. 9-12).

BUK'KI (wasting).—1. The chieftain of Dan selected to superintend the division of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 22).—2. A descendant of Aaron in the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. vi. 5, 51; Ezra vii. 4). It is very uncertain whether Bukki was ever actually high priest.

BUKKI'AH (wasting from Jehovah). The chief of the sixth division of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 13).

BUL (rain). See MONTHS.

BULL, BULLOCK. Several different Hebrew words were employed to indicate this well-known animal. Bākār is a generic word implying the notion of ploughing, comprising male and female, ox and cow. It is generally used collectively for oxen, cattle, a herd (Gen. xii. 16; Lev. i. 2, 3, 5). Shōr, also significant of ploughing, denotes an animal of the ox kind, without reference to age or sex, and usually (though not always) an individual as opposed to bākār, a herd (Numb. xviii. 17; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Hos. xii. 11). The Chaldee form of this word is tōr (Ezra vi. 9, 17). Par, implying to bear the yoke, generally signifies a young bullock (Exod. xxix. 1), but once a bullock seven years old (Judges vi. 25): it is used metaphorically of princes (Jer. l. 27). 'Egel, 'eglah (fem.), are words descriptive of a young bullock, a steer (Jer. xxxi. 18), and a heifer (Deut. xxi. 4, 6; Isai. vii. 21). Abbrēm, implying strong ones, is occasionally introduced to denote bulls (Psal. xxii. 12). These words are used of cattle domesticated, which naturally formed a large part of the possessions of an agricultural people. 'Wild bull' occurs Isai. li. 20. See OX.

BULRUSH. 'Bulrush' and 'rush' are used interchangeably in our version. A Hebrew word derived from 'marsh,' because the plant grows in marshy places, is rendered 'rush' (Isai. ix. 14, xix. 15); the phrase 'branch and rush' signifying 'high and low.' But this same word is 'bulrush' in lviii. 5. Then there is another word, expressive of a porous character, which denotes properly the Egyptian papyrus, Papyrus Nilotica. It was serviceable for many purposes. The Egyptians made clothing, shoes, baskets, various utensils, and specially boats or skiffs of it. Of this was formed the ark in which Moses was exposed (Exod. ii. 3; comp. Isai. lviii. 2). But it is also sometimes translated 'rush' (Job viii. 11; Isai. xxxv. 7).

BUN'NI (built).—1. A Levite (Neh. ix. 4).—2. One who sealed the covenant (x. 15).—3. A Levite probably of earlier date than No. 1 (xi. 15).

BURDEN. The word generally rendered 'burden' in our version at the head of a prophecy signifies both 'burden' and 'oracle.' It thus denotes sometimes a message of judgment (Isai. xiii. 1; Nah. i. 1), sometimes an annunciation of good (Zech. xii. 1; Mal. i. 1). These two meanings give occasion to the rebuke (Jer. xxiii. 33-40). The people chose to represent the Lord's message as always prognosticating evil.

BURIAL. We have in the earlier scripture several records of the calm and hopeful deaths of the holy patriarchs, a proof that they 'died in faith' (Heb. xi. 13), looking for a better country. 'Let us,' says Hooker, 'beg of God that, when the hour of our rest is come, the patterns of our dissolution may be Jacob, Moses, Joshua, David; who, leisureably ending their lives in peace, prayed for the mercies of God to come upon their posterity, replenished the hearts of the nearest unto them with words of memorable consolation, strengthened men in the fear of God, gave them wholesome instructions of life, and confirmed them in true religion, in sum, taught the world no less virtuously how to die than they had done before how to live' (Eccles. Pol., book v. 46).

When the spirit had returned to God, the first duty to the departed was to close the eyes; an office usually performed by a child or other near and dear kinsman (Gen. xlv. 4). The natural sorrow evinced itself in tears (l. 1), in the rending of the clothes, and putting on of sackcloth (2 Sam. iii. 31, 35), and various other modes of outward expression (xiii. 31; Ezek. xxiv. 17). Heathen practices, however, were forbidden (Lev. xix. 28; Deut. xiv. 1). The time of special mourning for a relative appears to have been seven days. This, indeed, is expressly stated by an apocryphal writer (Eccles. xxii. 12); and we find these seven days observed at the funeral of Jacob (Gen. l. 10); even though there had previously been a general mourning in Egypt for seventy days (3). So the people of Jabesh-gilead fasted and mourned for Saul seven days (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). And this was the space of time that uncleanness from the touching of a corpse lasted (Numb. xix. 11, 14). For Moses and Aaron the mourning was thirty days (xx. 29; Deut. xxxiv. 8); and doubtless for near relations, and in particular cases, the period was much prolonged. The priests were exempt from the ordinary practice, since it involved ceremonial defilement. The high priest was not to mourn for any one, the inferior priests only for their nearest relatives (Lev. xxi. 1-3, 11). Friends were in the habit of visiting the bereaved to condole with them (Job ii. 11; John xi. 11); and this is still customary. But it would seem that it was not till later days that hired mourners were employed. We find them mentioned by the prophets (Jer. ix. 17, 18; Amos v. 16); and in our Lord's time minstrels had been introduced (Matt. ix. 23; Mark v. 38). Dr. Thomson describes the practice as still existing in Palestine: 'There are in every city and community women exceeding cunning in this business. These are always sent for and kept in readiness. When a fresh company of sympathizers comes in, these women "make haste" to take up a wailing, that the newly-come may the more easily unite their tears with the mourners. They know the domestic history of every person, and immediately strike up an impromptu lamentation, in which they introduce the names of their relatives who have recently died, touching some tender chord in every heart; and thus each one weeps for his own dead; and the performance, which would otherwise be difficult or impossible, comes easy and natural; and even this extemporaneous artificial sorrow is thereby redeemed from half its hollow-heartedness and hypocrisy' (The Land and the Book, p. 103). There is some allusion in scripture to the custom of collecting the tears of the mourners in bottles (Psal. lvi. 8). Such bottles or lachrymatories are often found on opening ancient tombs. They are of thin glass or simple pottery, not always baked or glazed: they have a slender body, with a broad flat bottom and funnel-shaped top. They do not now contain anything but dust.

The funeral preparations were made at once among the Hebrews, to bury their dead out of their sight (Gen. xxiii. 4). It was a great dishonour and calamity to be deprived of burial, threatened sometimes against enemies and the wicked (1 Sam. xvii. 44; 1 Kings xiv. 11, xxi. 24; Psal. lxxix. 2; Jer. xiv. 16, xxii. 19, xxxvi. 30). Of washing and swathing the corpse we read nothing in the Old Testament: both are noticed, however, in the New (Acts ix. 37). The grave-clothes were probably the ordinary garments, or folds of linen wrapped round the body, with a separate napkin bound about the head (John xi. 44, xx. 5-7). Prior, however, to this involution, the body was anointed, and spices were placed between the folds of the linen (xix. 39, 40). But embalming, properly so called, was not usual. See EMBALMING. In our Lord's case it was necessary that the entombment should be hasty; and therefore additional spices and ointments were intended to be afterwards used (Luke xxiii. 55, 56). Asa was laid upon a bed of spices (2 Chron. xvi. 14); and no doubt peculiar honours were paid, and additional cost incurred, in the funerals of exalted personages. Burnings are spoken of. These were of the great piles of aromatics; and probably the bed, furniture, and other things belonging to the deceased. If a monarch had been unpopular, this mark of respect was not paid him (2 Chron. xxi. 19). And it is observable that it was specially promised to Zedekiah that they should burn odours for him, though dying in captivity, like to the burnings of his fathers (Jer. xxxiv. 5). It has been questioned whether sometimes the body was not itself burnt; the aromatics being used to overpower the smell of the burning flesh. There is one indubitable instance of this. For, when the men of Jabesh-gilead had recovered the bodies of Saul and his sons, they burnt them, we are expressly told (1 Sam. xxxi. 12), burying afterwards the remains. There is another passage (Amos vi. 10) which seems to allude to such a custom. It has been strangely proposed to interpret 'he that burneth him,' by 'the burner of perfumes in his honour;' as if in a time of such public calamity any such luxurious rite would have been indulged in! But the case was no doubt exceptional, and cannot be taken to prove that burning rather than burying was customary. See Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr. cap. 56, vol. ii. pp. 146, 147.

The next of kin superintended the funeral rites; though it is thought that in later times there were persons specially appointed to the office—a body, so to speak, of public buriers (Acts v. 6, 10). We may doubt, however, whether, in the history of Ananias and Sapphira, any clear allusion is made to such persons. It was natural that, after an awful catastrophe, Peter should direct those present, the younger as most fitted for the office, to prepare the stricken dead at once for burial without the usual formalities. The reference to a prophetic description (Ezek. xxxix. 14) in proof of the custom is obviously inconclusive. Coffins were but rarely used. The corpse was carried to the tomb on an open bier or bed by near relatives, attended very often by a large concourse of people and mourners (Luke vii. 11-15).

The burial-places were in gardens, fields, or on the sides of mountains, in natural caves, or artificial excavations. And a point was made of interment in the family-sepulchre; so that it is noted as a kind of disgrace when a man was not buried with his fathers (Gen. xlvii. 30; 1 Kings xiii. 22; 2 Kings xxi. 18). Yet sometimes a wish was expressed to be buried, even if it were away from the family-tomb, with an honoured individual (Ruth i. 17; 1 Kings xiii. 31). Sepulchres, finely termed by the later Jews 'the house of the living,' were often of large size, containing courts with various subterranean chambers, corridors, and niches for the reception of the bodies, which could be closed with stones. Some of these are yet remaining, as the so-called 'Tombs of the kings,' 'Tombs of the judges,' 'Tombs of the prophets,' &c. near Jerusalem. These, of course, have been explored; and plans of them have been constructed. Cupolas were sometimes built over sepulchres; and no doubt under these or in the courts of entrance the demoniacs found shelter (Matt. viii. 28). It was considered a work of piety to adorn and embellish tombs (xxiii. 27, 29); and it is said to have been customary to whiten them once a year, just before the passover. There were, according to Jewish writers, public cemeteries for those who possessed no private burying-place. Possibly in such cemeteries were 'the graves of the common people' (Jer. xvi. 23; comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 6). They were to be not less than 2,000 cubits from a Levitical city, and a considerable space, i.e. more than fifty cubits, from other towns. Care generally was taken to bury even criminals and strangers (Deut. xxi. 23; 2 Kings ix. 34; Matt. xxvii. 7). And it would seem that there were inscriptions upon tombs (2 Kings xxiii. 17). See Kitto's Pict. Bible, note on 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4.

A funeral feast succeeded Hebrew burials. This is alluded to in the case of Abner's funeral (2 Sam. iii. 35). Of this Jeremiah speaks, mentioning 'the cup of consolation' which men had 'to drink for their father or their mother,' and 'the house of feast ing,' where this entertainment was made (Jer. xvi. 5, 7, 8). Hence the phrases 'bread of men' (Ezek. xxiv. 17), and 'bread of mourners' (Hos. ix. 4). These funeral feasts are still kept up in Syria. 'Crowds of relatives, friends, and acquaintances assemble on these occasions. The largest gatherings ever seen in Lebanon are on these occasions. For all these guests refreshments must be provided; and not a few from a distance tarry all night, and must be entertained. Then these gatherings and feasts for the dead are repeated at stated times for forty days. . . . On certain days after the funeral large quantities of corn and other food are cooked in a particular manner, and sent to all the friends, however numerous, in the name of the dead. . . . When one of their number (Bedouin Arabs) dies, they immediately bring his best ox or buffalo, and slaughter it near the body of the deceased. They then cook it all for a great feast with burghûl (cracked wheat), rice, and whatever else good to eat they may possess. The whole tribe, and neighbours also, assemble for the funeral, and go direct from the grave to this sacrificial feast. The vast piles of provisions quickly disappear. . . . Every one must partake at least of a morsel. It is a duty to the departed, and must be eaten on behalf of the dead. Even strangers passing along are constrained to come and taste of the feast. . . . This custom is so binding that it must be observed, though it consume every item of property and of provisions the man possessed, and leave the wife and children to starve. It is the feast of the dead' (The Land and the Book, p. 105). This usage remarkably illustrates the fidelity of him who for calls like these had not touched the hallowed things devoted to God (Deut. xxvi. 14).

After a person had been buried it was customary for surviving friends to visit the sepulchre and weep there (John xi. 31). This custom has not ceased. Women still visit the cemeteries; and tents are sometimes pitched over the graves which are to be wept at. But all such persons are not veritable mourners: they are hired to make their lamentations.

Elegies were composed in honour of distinguished persons. Those of David for Saul and Jonathan, and for Abner, are preserved (2 Sam. i. 19-27, iii. 33, 34); and it has been inferred (2 Chron. xxxv. 25) that there were collections of this kind of composition. The lamentation, however, made by Jeremiah for king Josiah is not extant.

The following ceremonies are observed at the death and funeral of modern British Jews. Funerals are managed by a body called 'the Burial Society.' Four of this body watch a sick man day and night till he breathes his last. They are to repeat certain sentences when he is expiring, one of which is 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord.' The closing words 'one Lord' must be uttered at the moment of death. For eight minutes the corpse must not be touched: then a feather is laid on the upper lip; and, when it is clear that the breath is altogether gone, each person present makes a small rent in one of his garments. After an hour, the body is placed on the floor with its feet towards the door. A small bundle of straw or a pillow is put under the head: the hands and feet are set in a straight position; and a black cloth is thrown over the corpse. A pewter plate with salt in it is then placed on the breast, a basin of clean water and a towel set by it, and a lighted candle at the head. The water and towel are to remain for seven days, the candle for thirty. All the water in the house, and in the next three houses on each side, at the time of death, must be poured away. The relations are to abstain from meat and wine till the interment, and must attend to some other observances.

The officers of the synagogue fix the time of burial, which must be, if possible, within twenty-four hours of death. The body is washed with lukewarm water, poured upon a sheet which covers it, and purified by cold water poured on the bare flesh. It is then dressed, and placed in a very plain deal coffin without ornament; a quantity of Jerusalem earth being put with the dead. Before the coffin is removed, relations and friends come to pay their last visit. The face and feet being uncovered, each takes hold of the large toes, and asks the deceased pardon for every injury done to him, and his favourable mention in the other world. Each then makes a rent, ordinarily on the right side, on the death of a parent on the left, in nearly all the garments he may have on. The rent may be stitched up in seven days, and properly repaired in thirty; but those made for the parents must not be stitched up for thirty days, and never thoroughly repaired.

Many attend the body to the tomb. In the hall called 'the house of the living' the coffin is opened to adjust anything displaced; it is then carried on a bier to the grave. When borne a few paces, the procession stops, and all say, 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast formed you (i.e. the dead) in judgment, fed and cherished you in judgment, and killed you in judgment, and knowest the number of you all in judgment, and in a future time wilt cause you to live again in judgment. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the restorer of life to the dead.' The grave lies north and south; and, when the corpse is being lowered into it, all say, 'Let it come in peace to its appointed place.' When they return from the grave each plucks some grass, and says, 'They shall spring forth from the city as the grass of the earth.' Then, washing their hands at a pump, they add, 'He (Messiah) will swallow up death for ever; and the Lord God will wipe away the tears from off all faces; and the rebuke of his people will he remove from off all the earth; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.'

After the interment, the seven days' mourning begins. This is very strict. No work must be done, or amusement engaged in. Friends make visits of condolence, for whose reception the door stands open. On the sabbath, the mourners may dress and go to the synagogue, but do not enter till a particular part of the service; they then sit upon what is called 'the mourners' bench.' Then afterwards there are thirty days (for parents thirty-one) in which ordinary avocations may be resumed, but recreations must be avoided. And, when these days are ended, for twelve months usual pleasures must not be indulged in. And every son (not a daughter) must for eleven months after a parent's death attend synagogue morning and evening, and repeat the kaddish, which is a form of praise to God. Also, the anniversary of a parent's death is to be kept, usually by feasting: a lamp, too, or candle, is lighted, and kept burning all day. And, besides this, a child must on the three great festivals every year make a prayer for departed parents, and also present offerings. Prayers are similarly made for other deceased relatives. It may be added that females watch the sick Jewess, and perform the duties to the corpse till it is placed in the coffin (see Mills, British Jews, pp. 33-48).

BURNING (Gen. xxxviii. 24; Lev. xx. 14, xxi. 9; Josh. vii. 25; Jer. xxix. 22; Dan. iii. 6); see PUNISHMENTS. (2 Chron. xvi. 14, xxi. 19; Jer. xxxiv. 5); see BURIAL.

BURNT-OFFERING. See OFFERINGS.

BUSH (Mark xii. 26; Luke xx. 37). The words rendered 'in the bush,' 'at the bush,' mean that section of scripture which comprises the account of the appearing of God in the bush to Moses.

BUSHEL (Matt. v. 15; Mark iv. 21; Luke xi. 33). See MEASURES.

BUTLER (Gen. xi. 1, and elsewhere). See CUP-BEARER.

BUTTER. The word so rendered in our version very frequently means curds, curdled or sour milk (leben), which has in this state an inebriating power (Gen. xviii. 8; Judges v. 25; 2 Sam. xvii. 29; Isai. vii. 22). In some places it is put for milk in general (Deut. xxxii. 14; Job xx. 17, xxix. 6; Psal.

lv. 21). In Prov. xxx. 33 Gesenius would render cheese. Butter, indeed, as we understand and use it, is not known in Syria; it would soon become rancid and unfit for food. But there is a process of churning which Dr. Thomson describes. A bottle is made by stripping off entire the skin of a young buffalo. This is filled with milk, kneaded, wrung, and shaken, till, such as it is, the butter comes. This butter is then taken out, boiled or melted, and put into bottles made of goats' skins. In winter it resembles candied honey; in summer it is mere oil (The Land and the Book, pp. 255, 256). Probably it is this substance, and this mode of churning, that is alluded to in Prov. xxx. 33.

BUZ (contempt).—1. A son of Abraham's brother Nahor (Gen. xxii. 21).—2. A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 14).

BUZ (id.). A territory, it is not unlikely so denominated from Nahor's son (Jer. xxv. 23). It was perhaps in the northern part of Arabia Deserta.

BU'ZI (sprung from Buz, a Buzite). A priest, the father of Ezekiel the prophet (Ezek. i. 3).

BU'ZITE. Elihu is so designated (Job xxxii. 2, 6); the descendant probably of Buz, the son of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 21).

BYS'SUS. A term used in the Septuagint version for fine linen. See LINEN.

C

CAB (hollow) (2 Kings vi. 25). See MEASURES.

CAB'BON (cake, according to some, bond). A town in Judah (Josh. xv. 40).

CA'BUL (limit, boundary, or perhaps as nothing).—1. A place on the boundary of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 27). The name is still retained by a village 8 or 9 miles east of Acre.—2. A district containing twenty towns which Solomon gave to Hiram king of Tyre, but which Hiram did not like (1 Kings ix. 10-13). Some have connected this district with No. 1, and have supposed that it was one of the cities in question. It may have been so; but then a part of the land of Israel would have been yielded to the stranger, which must have been unlawful. Possibly these might be foreign cities conquered by Solomon; for we find that, after being restored by Hiram, the Hebrew king, when he built or fortified them, had to colonize them with Israelites (2 Chron. vii. 2).

CAD'DIS (1 Macc. ii. 2). The surname of Joannan, one of the five sons of Mattathias, father of the Maccabean family.

CA'DES (1 Macc. xi. 63, 73). A form of Kedesh in Naphtali.

CA'DES-BAR'NEA (Judith v. 14). Kadesh-barnea.

CAD'MIEL (1 Esdr. v. 26, 58). Kadmiel (Ezra ii. 40, iii. 9).

CÆ'SAR. The appellation of a noble Roman family, the most distinguished of whom, Caius Julius Cæsar, obtained supreme power as dictator. This power was consolidated by his grand-nephew Caius Octavius (who assumed the name or title of Augustus) and transmitted to successors at first of his own family. By Cæsar in the New Testament is always understood the Roman emperor, as the actual sovereign of the country (John xix. 15). To him tribute was paid: to him Roman citizens had the right of appeal. So far as the historical part of the New Testament reaches, the events fall within the reigns of Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero (Luke ii. 1, iii. 1; Acts xi. 28, xxv. 11; Phil. iv. 22). In the two places last referred to Nero is intended. Caligula is not mentioned at all in scripture.

CÆSARE'A. A celebrated city of Palestine lying on the Mediterranean sea-coast, on the great road from Tyre to Egypt, about 70 miles north-west of Jerusalem. It is usually said that it was first inhabited under the name of Strato's tower; Dr. Thomson, however (The Land and the Book, pp. 491-496), finding most extensive quarryings of the limestone-rock in the neighbourhood, is persuaded that there must have been an important town here at a much earlier date, a frontier town probably of the Phœnicians. But all memorial of it has perished. Cæsarea was built in ten years by Herod the Great, who named it in honour of the emperor Augustus; it was sometimes called Cæsarea Stratonis, or Cæsarea Palestina, to distinguish it as a magnificent city, and Josephus describes it as a magnificent city, and speaks of an artificial harbour formed by a noble pier or breakwater, with convenient landing-wharves (Antiq., lib. xvii. 5, § 1). But Dr. Thomson is convinced that the historian has greatly exaggerated, and says that the whole extent of the harbour can now be traced, and that such a pier as Josephus speaks of was simply impossible for want of room. There can, however, be no doubt that Cæsarea was large and populous, and many of its buildings imposing. There was a temple conspicuous from the sea, dedicated to Cæsar and to Rome, an amphitheatre, and a theatre; the latter the scene of Herod Agrippa's fatal stroke (Acts xii. 20-23). This city was the official residence of the kings of the Herodian family, and the Roman metropolis of Judea, where the procurators generally lived: it was the military head-quarters, and was made a Roman colony by Vespasian, who was first proclaimed emperor here. He gave it the jus Italicum, Italian privileges. Cæsarea is frequently mentioned in the apostolic history (viii. 40, ix. 30, x. 1, 24, xi. 11, xii. 19, xviii. 22, xxi. 8, 16, xxiii. 23, 33, xxv. 1, 4, 6, 13). Here the door of the gospel was first opened to a Gentile: an outbreak between the Jews and Greeks here was one of the first events in the last Jewish war: here was the scene of Origen's labours; so that it must ever be regarded as a place of the highest interest. But it has perished. The site is still called Kaisariyeh, and it is desolate.

CÆSARĒA PHILIP'PI. It is very probable that this town was originally Baalgad (Josh. xi. 17). It was afterwards known as Panium, where the heathen god Pan had a sanctuary, as testified by yet-remaining inscriptions. Herod the Great beautified it, and built a temple here to Augustus. It then became a portion of the dominion of Philip tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis: he further embellished it and called it partly after the emperor, partly after himself, Cæsarea Philippi; while, later, Agrippa II. termed it Neronias. The older name, however, survived, as coins on which Cæsarea Paneas appears sufficiently prove, and it is even now called Banias, being but a village. This appears to have been the northernmost limit of our Lord's journeyings (Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27); and it was probably on some spur of the neighbouring Hermon that he was transfigured. 'The situation,' says Dr. Robinson (Bib. Res., vol. iii. pp. 404, 405), 'is unique, combining in an unusual degree the elements of grandeur and beauty. It nestles in its recess at the southern base of the mighty Hermon, which towers in majesty to an elevation of 7,000 or 8,000 feet above . . . The abundant waters of the glorious fountain spread over the terrace luxuriant fertility and the graceful interchange of copse, lawn, and waving fields.' About an hour's ride from Banias, and 1,000 feet above it, is a magnificent castle called Subeibah, famous in the wars of the crusaders. It is thought to be of extreme antiquity, possibly of the Phœnician times.

CAGE (Jer. v. 27), or COOP (marg.). A trap-cage, in which a bird is caught. In Rev. xviii. 2, a hold or cage considered as a place of confinement.

CAI'APHAS (depression). This person, called also Joseph, was son-in-law of Annas and was appointed high priest by the Roman procurator Valerius Gratus, about 27 or 28 A.D., in succession to Simon, the son of Camithus. He held the office during the whole administration of Pilate, but was deposed by Vitellius the proconsul, 36 A.D., and succeeded by Jonathan, the son of Ananus or Annas. Dr. Alford gives the dates of his appointment and deposition as 25 and 37 A.D. Caiaphas it was who counselled our Lord's being put to death (John xi. 49, 50), and presided at his trial (Matt. xxvi. 57; John xviii. 24). It was before him, too, that Peter and John were carried after the miracle of healing at the Beautiful gate of the temple (Acts iv. 6). Nothing is known of Caiaphas subsequent to his deposition. The stories that he was identical with Josephus the historian, and that he became a Christian, are mere fables.

CAIN (possession, acquisition: some prefer a lance, a smith). The first-born of Adam and Eve. He was so named because at his birth Eve said, 'I have acquired a man from Jehovah,' or 'even Jehovah.' It is not easy to explain these words satisfactorily. Some, in view of the meaning of the word Jehovah, 'He who shall be,' suppose that Eve considered her son as the promised one who should be the deliverer from the curse, with no idea of that deliverer's being the Lord, or intention of using Jehovah as a divine name (See Tyler, 'Jehovah the Redeemer God,' pp. 19-23). The more general opinion is that Eve regarded the child as obtained from or by the help of the Deity, and but an earnest of a future greater Seed. Cain was a tiller of the ground, and, jealous that his brother Abel's burnt-offering was accepted, while his own oblation of fruits, a mere thank-offering, was rejected, he murdered Abel, for which he became an exile, and settled in the land of Nod, where he built a city. His descendants are noted as herdmen, artificers, and musicians (Gen. iv.). The 'mark' set upon Cain was probably no more than the promise given him, a guarantee that the life of the first murderer would be untouched by the hand of man. Cain is repeatedly alluded to in the New Testament (Heb. xi. 4; 1 John iii. 12; Jude 11).

CAINAN (perhaps nest). This word has the article prefixed. It was a city, named possibly from its position, and appears to have been in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 57).

CAI'NAN (possession; but, according to some, lancer, or smith).—1. An ante-diluvian patriarch, the son of Enos; he lived 910 years (Gen. v. 9-14; Luke iii. 37). He is also called Kenan (Gen. v. 9, marg.; 1 Chron. i. 2).—2. A son of Arphaxad placed in the line of patriarchs between Abraham and Noah (Luke iii. 36). This name is with much probability regarded as an interpolation. It does not appear in any Hebrew copy of the genealogies (Gen. x., xi.; 1 Chron. i.); it is, however, in the present copies of the Septuagint (except in 1 Chron. i. 24). One ancient MS. of St. Luke omits it. We must suppose either that it by some means slipped out of the Hebrew text, or that there is a corruption in the Septuagint. Perhaps the latter is the more likely supposition. St. Luke then gave the genealogy as he found it in the Greek bible; or, according to the belief of some, the word crept into the Gospel, and was introduced into the Septuagint at a later date.

CAKE. See BREAD.

CALAH (old age). A city of Assyria, founded by Asshur, or rather Nimrod (Gen. x. 11). Sir H. Rawlinson believes that its site was among the Nimroud ruins, and that for long it was the royal Assyrian residence, till Sargon built a new city where Khorsabad now stands. Dr. Layard, on the other hand, is disposed to find Calah at Kalah Sherghat, a vast ruin (4685 yards round) on the Tigris, about fifty miles below its junction with the Zab, but does not venture to speak with certainty. He discovered tombs there, and a sitting figure mutilated, which is now in the British Museum.

CALAMOLALUS (1 Esdr. v. 22).

CALAMUS. One of the ingredients of the holy anointing oil (Exod. xxx. 23); it is also mentioned among perfumes (Sol. Song. iv. 14), and said to be one of the articles of Tyrian commerce (Ezek. xxvii. 19). The 'sweet cane' of Isai. xliiii. 24; Jer. vi. 20 is the same substance. It is the Andropogon aromaticus, fragrant beard-grass, also called Calamus odoratus; a plant growing in India and Arabia; and either this, or at least a similar scented cane, has been found in a valley of Lebanon. The root, the stem, and the leaves, when bruised, are very fragrant; and an aromatic oil is distilled from them.

CALCOL (sustenance). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 6). He is probably the same with Chalcol (1 Kings iv. 31). See CHALCOL.

CALDRON (1 Sam. ii. 14; 2 Chron. xxxv. 13; Job xli. 20; Jer. lii. 18, 19; Ezek. xi. 3, 7, 11; Mic. iii. 3). Several words in the original are thus rendered in our version; the general meaning being a vessel for domestic or ceremonial purposes, used to boil flesh in.

CALEB (dog).—1. The son of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah, and father of Hur (1 Chron. ii. 9, where Chelubai, 18, 19, 42, 46, 48).—2. The son of Jephunneh, a chief selected from Judah, with one of every other tribe, to search the land of Canaan. He is also called the Kenezite (Numb. xxxii. 12; Josh. xiv. 6, 14). No further trace of the genealogy of his father Jephunneh is given; and from this circumstance Lord A. C. Hervey (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 242) supposes that the family were Gentiles, incorporated into Israel as proselytes. Kenaz is certainly an Edomite name (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15); and some other things might seem to favour the idea. But we have to set against it the great improbability that the year after the exodus an adopted stranger would be selected as a chief of Judah. Be this, however, as it may, Caleb and Joshua were the only two spies who on their return did not discourage the people by representing the inhabitants of the land as too strong to be overcome. It was for the rebellion of Israel on this occasion that the forty years' wandering in the wilderness was denounced; and the ten unfaithful spies died soon after. Caleb and Joshua were the only persons of that generation who should live to enter Canaan (Numb. xiii., xiv.; Deut. i. 22-46). Caleb had thus the promise that the land his feet had trodden should be his and his children's after him, because he had 'wholly followed the Lord.' And he held that promise in faith through the weary years that succeeded; and, when at last Canaan was entered and well-nigh subdued, he, that old man, twenty years older than the rest of the nation (save Joshua), still strong, as in the day when he first explored the country, stood before Joshua to claim his inheritance. 'Give me this mountain,' he said, 'whereof the Lord spake in that day.' The Anakim were still there; but, the Lord helping him, he knew he could drive them out. And he did drive them out and possessed their habitation. It was Hebron he thus conquered; and, though the city was assigned to the priests, yet the fields, and the villages, and the district round became according to promise his whom God had thus kept alive, to prove in him his faithfulness to his word. Caleb's posterity long preserved his inheritance (Josh. xiv. 6-15, xvi. 13-15, xxi. 10-12; 1 Sam. xxv. 2, 3, xxx. 14). This inheritance, specially that part of it which Caleb settled on his daughter Achsah (Josh. xv. 13-19) may yet be traced. Mr. Wilton refers to Dr. Robinson's account of Kurmul, the ancient Carmel of Judah: 'The ruins of the town lie around the head and along the two sides of a valley of some width and depth; the head of which forms a semi-circular amphitheatre shut in by rocks. . . . The bottom of the amphitheatre is a beautiful grass-plot, with an artificial reservoir in the middle, measuring 117 feet long by 74 feet broad. The spring from which it is supplied is in the rocks on the NW., where a chamber has been excavated. The water is brought out by an underground channel, first to a small basin under the rocks, and then five or six rods further to the reservoir. It is only necessary to add . . . that there is no living water within the territory of the Jehalm (an Arab tribe) except at Kurmul . . . in order to complete the chain of evidence which goes to prove that this rich plain . . . is the very "field" desired by Achsah; and that the fountain of Kurmul, with its excavated chamber and basin high up among the rocks, and its capacious reservoir in the grassy amphitheatre below, is identical with those "upper and nether springs" which so richly supplemented the dowry of Othniel's bride' (The Negeb, pp. 16-18; comp. Bib. Res., vol. i. p. 496).—3. A Caleb is mentioned (1 Chron. ii. 50) as son of Hur. If we are to take 'son' here literally, he was the grand-son of No. 1. Or, if 'son' merely mean descendant, it is possible he may be identical with the spy.

CAL'EB-EPHRA'TAH. A place once mentioned (1 Chron. ii. 24), and otherwise unknown. Hezron is said to have died there. But he most probably died in Egypt. The LXX seem to have read the text differently. And the addition of a letter or two in the Hebrew would make the meaning to be that it was after Hezron's death that Caleb (comp. 19) married Ephrath or Ephratah.

CALF. The young of oxen, often stalled, regarded as choice food (Gen. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24; Amos vi. 4; Luke xv. 23, 27, 30).

Some of the Egyptian deities, as Apis and Mnevis, were honoured under the similitude of a calf. And there were two notable occasions on which calf-like images were set up by the Israelites for worship. The first was when Aaron, at the demand of the people, made of their golden ear-rings a molten calf, hollow probably, or of gold plating upon wood. After the metal was cast, it was fashioned, finished or ornamented, with a graving tool. Moses, when he saw it, burnt and reduced this image to powder (by means of natron very likely), cast it into the water, and made the Hebrews drink it (Exod. xxxii.). Some centuries later Jeroboam set up golden calves at Dan and Bethel, which thus became, and long continued, centres of unhalloved worship (1 Kings xii. 28-30). It is questioned whether in these cases there was the actual adoration of Egyptian idols, or whether it was not rather intended to honour Jehovah by visible symbols. There are reasons why we should believe this last the real meaning of the service. Aaron proclaimed 'a feast to the Lord' (Exod. xxxii. 5); and Jeroboam, we may fairly believe, never hoped to keep his subjects from resorting to Jerusalem, by at once setting up a god in downright opposition to Jehovah. His object was to persuade them that their worship would be as acceptable by means of his symbols as in the ceremonial of the temple.

There are some places in which calves are mentioned which require a word of explanation. The passing between the divided parts of a calf (Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19) has reference to an ancient mode of ratifying a covenant: comp. Gen. xv. 10, 17. Again, the 'calves of lips' is a symbolical expression (Hos. xiv. 2), indicating a sacrifice (as animals are sacrificed) of praise (Heb. xiii. 15).

CAL'TAS (1 Esdr. ix. 23, 48). A form of Kelita (Ezra x. 23; Neh. viii. 7).

CALLING. A word frequently used in different forms to imply the gospel invitation (1 Cor. i. 9, 24, 26; Eph. iv. 1, 4). It is illustrated by our Lord's parable of the marriage-supper (Matt. xxii. 2-14). The invitation is general; but the reception it meets with is various. There are those who by their perverseness and to their ruin disregard it; some accept it only so far as outward profession goes; others, however, by God's grace, really avail themselves of the mercy offered. It is not all, therefore, who receive the calling that obey it. Yet, as men are often described as being what they ought to be, and as doing what they are bound to do, so by 'calling,' 'the called,' a compliance with the invitation is sometimes to be understood, and 'the called' are those who have accepted the call (Heb. iii. 1, ix. 15). Of the question of effectual calling, on which theologians have disputed so much, nothing can be here said: it is enough to remind the reader of our Lord's warning: 'Many are called, but few chosen,' and of the apostle's admonition: 'Give diligence to make your calling and election sure' (2 Pet. i. 10).

CALLIS'THENES (2 Macc. viii. 33).

CAL'NEH (fortified dwelling, or fort of the god Ana, or Anu). One of the original cities of Nimrod's empire (Gen. x. 10; Amos vi. 2), apparently the same with Calno (Isai. x. 9) and Canneh (Ezek. xxvii. 23). It is probably the modern Niffer, about 60 miles SSE. of Babylon, on the eastern bank of the Euphrates.

CAL'NO (Isai. x. 9). See CAL'NEH.

CAL'PHI (1 Macc. xi. 70).

CAL'VARY. This word occurs but once (Luke xxiii. 33), to indicate the place of our Lord's execution. It is the adoption into English of the Latin word for 'skull,' answering to the Greek kranion, which is itself the translation of the Hebrew Golgotha. The appellation has been supposed to be taken from the fact that, executions being performed there, skulls very likely lay about. It is more probable that it was a bare round spot, something in shape like a skull; hence, perhaps, the notion that it was a hill, being ordinarily called 'Mount Calvary.' The tradition that Adam was buried here, and that his skull gave name to Golgotha, is hardly worth the mention. There is no topographical question more keenly disputed than whether the spot now venerated as the site of the holy sepulchre is really the ancient Golgotha or Calvary; and it is not to be imagined that it will ever be satisfactorily settled. The notices in scripture are merely these. The places of the crucifixion and of the burial were contiguous. Golgotha was outside the city-gate (Matt. xxvii. 32; Heb. xiii. 12); yet it was near to the city (John xix. 20); it was also close to a public road; for the crowd met Simon the Cyrenian passing on as he came out of the country (Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26); and there was a garden just by (John xix. 41). These are the indications serving to identify the locality. They can be only just mentioned here; a probable conclusion from them will be afterwards presented. See JERUSALEM.

CAMEL. A well-known most useful animal, belonging to the order of ruminants, that is, those which chew the cud. There are two species of the camel. One is the Camelus Bactrianus, or Bactrian camel, which has two humps on its back and is found spread through central Asia to China. The other is the Camelus Arabicus or dromedarius, common in North Africa, Arabia, Syria, and elsewhere. This was the species used by the Israelites and neighbouring nations, both for riding and for carrying loads, as at present (Gen. xxiv. 64; 2 Kings viii. 9). Camel's furniture is mentioned (Gen. xxxi. 34), perhaps a kind of litter or canopied seat; and it is not improbable that the panniers or baskets which are suspended on both sides of the animal were employed anciently as now. The dromedary (Isai. lx. 6) was the same species, but of a finer breed.

The camel has been called by the Arabs 'the ship of the desert.' Its organization is wonderfully adapted to the service it has to render to man, just fitted to the arid deserts over which it travels. 'The pads or sole-cushions of the spreading feet, divided into two toes without being externally separated, which buoy up, as it were, the whole bulk with their expansive elasticity from sinking in the sand on which the animal advances with silent step, the nostrils so formed that the animal can close them at will, so as to exclude the drift sand and the parching simoom, the beetling brow and long lashes which fringe the upper lid, so as to screen the eyes from the glare of the sun, the cleft prehensile upper lip, and the powerful upper incisor teeth for browsing on the dry tough prickly shrubs of the desert, the hunch acting as a reservoir of nutriment against a time of long abstinence, and the assemblage of water tanks in the stomach—these are all proofs of design' (Nat. Cyclop.). And it is thus that Dr. Robinson speaks: 'The longest trial to which we subjected our camels in respect to water was from Cairo to Suez, four days (they had been fed in Cairo with green clover, and had not drunk, it was said, for twelve days before our departure); yet some of them did not drink even then, although they had only the driest fodder. But at all times the camel eats and drinks little, and secretes little: he is a cold-blooded, heavy, sullen animal, having little feeling, and little susceptibility for pain. Thistles, and briers, and thorns he crops and chews with more avidity than the softest green fodder; nor does he seem to feel pain from blows or pricks, unless they are very violent. . . . I was surprised to find them travelling with so much ease and safety, up and down the most rugged mountain-passes. They do not choose their way with the like sagacity as the mule, or even as the horse; but they tread much more surely and safely, and never either slip or stumble. In all our long journeys with them, I do not recollect a single instance; and yet no roads can be worse than the passes in going and returning between Hebron and Wady Musa' (Bibl. Res., vol. ii. p. 210).

The camel is ill-tempered, vindictive, and obstinate; but its value to man may be estimated by what has been said. The ordinary strong working animal will go 24 miles a day, while the higher-bred and better-trained, or dromedary, will, it is said, traverse 200 miles in 24 hours. This quadruped was forbidden as food to the Hebrews (Lev. xi. 4; Deut. xiv. 7): the flesh, however, especially the hump, is now liked by the Arabs: the milk is considered a cooling nutritious drink; and the dung is much used for fuel. The camel was well known in early ages (Gen. xii. 16, xxiv. 64, xxxvii. 25). It was used in war, at least by predatory bands (Judges vi. 5; 1 Sam. xxx. 17); and coarse garments were made of its hair (Matt. iii. 4; Mark i. 6).

The word occurs in various proverbial expressions, as in Matt. xix. 24; similar to which are some used in the Talmud; also in xxiii. 24, where the early English versions have very properly 'strain out.'

CAMEL'S HAIR (Matt. iii. 4; Mark i. 6). See CAMEL, DRESS.

CA'MON (full of stalks or grain). The place where Jair the judge was buried (Judges x. 5). It was most probably in Gilead.

CAMP. See ENCAMPMENT.

CAMPFIRE (Sol. Song i. 14, iv. 13). There is every reason to believe this to be the hemra of the Arabs, a shrub rising five or six feet high, with fragrant whitish flowers growing in clusters (Lawsonia alba). The powder of the leaves mixed with water and made into a paste is used by females to stain their nails a reddish colour. Ladies are fond, too, of placing branches of the sweet-smelling flowers of this shrub in their bosom. Dr. Thomson imagines that a very fragrant species of grape that flourished in the vineyards of En-gedi is intended (The Land and the Book, pp. 602, 603).

CA'NA (reefy). A village or town of Galilee. Shortly after our Lord's baptism he was returning with five disciples into Galilee. His mother was not at Nazareth, but a guest at a marriage in Cana. Thither Jesus directed his steps, either previously invited, or 'called' with his disciples as soon as his coming was known. At this marriage-feast he performed his first miracle of changing water into wine; the propriety of which is illustrated by the fact that it was not uncommon for guests on such occasions to make presents of wine, if there was likely to be a deficiency (John i. 43, ii. 1-11). Christ subsequently performed another miracle when at Cana (iv. 46-54); and to this place Nathanael belonged (xxi. 2). According to tradition the modern village Kefr Kenna,  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles north-west of Nazareth, is on the site of Cana, but it is more probably identified with Kaná el-Jelil, now deserted, about 9 miles from Nazareth.

CA'NAAN (low region, merchant, servant?) One of the sons of Ham (Gen. ix. 18; 1 Chron. i. 8). On occasion of his irreverent conduct, a prophetic curse was denounced by Noah on Ham's posterity through Canaan (Gen. ix. 25-27). We know not how far this took effect on Canaan personally: it had its fulfilment in his descendants, only because it was deserved and drawn down upon them by their sins (See Bush, Notes on Genesis, pp. 107, 108; and, for a discussion on its accomplishment, Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 225-230). Canaan was the progenitor of the nations who peopled Palestine, west of the Jordan (Gen. x. 6, 15-18; 1 Chron. i. 13-16).

CA'NAAN, LAND OF. The territory so called extended from the boundary of Syria in the north to Gaza in the south, and from the Jordan eastward to the Mediterranean on the west (Gen. x. 19). It has been questioned whether it included Phœnicia, and the Philistine plain along the southern coast. But the Phœnicians appear to have used the name on their coins, and their descendants the Carthaginians to have retained it (August. Op., Epist. ad Rom. Exp. Inch. 13, tom. iii. pars. ii. col. 932, edit. Bened.) And so in scripture the Phœnician territory is called Canaan (Isai. xxiii. 11; where in our translation 'merchant-city:' comp. Henderson, Isaiah, p. 209). The Philistine country also—at a late period, it is true—is termed Canaan (Zeph. ii. 5).

The word implies low land; and the region was probably so denominated to distinguish it from the high table land on the east of the Jordan. And, though a great deal of it is really elevated, yet it never gives, so travellers assure us, the idea of elevation. For the eye looks continually over the wide maritime plain on the one side, and down into the Jordan valley on the other; and, besides, there is almost always in view the high mountain line of the country beyond the Jordan, in comparison of which the hills of Canaan are dwarfed: see Mr. Grove, in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 246. The territory of the trans-Jordanic tribes, it will hence be seen, was no part of Canaan; and it is generally named in opposition to it (Numb. xxxiii. 51, xxxv. 10; Deut. xxxii. 49; Josh. xxii. 11; Judges xxi. 12).

By the Greeks, the appellation Chna was anciently given to the entire region between the Jordan and the Mediterranean up to Sidon, afterwards termed by them Phœnicia, a name which by degrees came to be confined to the northern coast district, or Phœnicia Proper.

In general parlance, the land of Canaan is regarded as equivalent to the land of Israel, or PALESTINE, which see.

The conquest of Canaan by Israel has sometimes been denounced as unjustifiable and cruel. Objectors have chosen to forgo that God taught thereby the great moral lesson that depravity deserves and must suffer punishment. As well might every other procedure of his providence be censured—the famine, the pestilence, the death which prevail in the world. Sin introduced these evils: sin rendered the inhabitants of Canaan liable to punishment; and God was not unrighteous in taking vengeance and employing human instruments as his executioners. To assert this would be to strip him of his authority over the world he made. The question is well argued by Dr. Fairbairn, Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iv. sect. i. vol. ii. pp. 428-438.

CA'NAANITES. The inhabitants of Canaan. In the largest sense they may be considered as comprising the various tribes enumerated as descended from Canaan, the son of Ham (Gen. x. 15-18). But, more precisely, they were a leading people among the early (though not the original) inhabitants of Palestine. They were the lowlanders, and are described as dwelling 'by the sea and by the coast of Jordan' (Numb. xiii. 29). A while later the Canaanites are said to be 'on the east and on the west,' i.e. along the sea-coast and in the Jordan valley, while the Amorites and others were 'in the mountains' (Josh. xi. 3), occupying the central highlands. And, after the Israelites had possessed themselves of a large part of the country, the Canaanites yet lingered in their ancient seats, 'in the land of the valley' (xvii. 16), and in the plains of the north (Judges iv. 2). Still, though the Canaanites had their special location, yet, as being a leading tribe among the inhabitants of the land, their name was sometimes generally used as including other tribes. Thus Hebron, called Amorite or Hittite when Abraham dwelt there (Gen. xiii. 18, xiv. 13, xxii. 2, 3, 5, 7), is afterwards said to be Canaanite (Judges i. 10). This, however, may be partly owing to the change of settlements by conquest or emigration. The Canaanites were a warlike people; and the Israelites found it difficult to expel them (i. 27-33). Their iron chariots are specially mentioned (iv. 2, 3). They had also strong and well-built cities (Numb. xiii. 28; Deut. vi. 10). Probably also they were a commercial people; for their name came to be synonymous with merchant (Job xli. 6; Prov. xxxi. 24); the original word in both these cases being 'Canaanite:' see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Canaaniter.' The language they spoke, though they were Hamites, was Hebrew; for the patriarchs and their descendants required no interpreter in Canaan as they did in Egypt (Gen. xlii. 23). Possibly the Canaanites adopted the dialect of earlier settlers in the land.

CANDA'CE (sovereign of slaves?) This appellation was rather the title of Ethiopian queens than the name of an individual (Acts viii. 27), like Pharaoh, as given to the kings of Egypt. A man of authority under one of these queens, called an 'eunuch' or 'chamberlain,' who had the charge of all her treasure, just as the 'chamberlain' of London is the city treasurer, was met on the road between Jerusalem and Gaza by Philip the evangelist, who expounded to him the scripture he was reading. He believed in Christ, was baptized, and went on his way rejoicing. He is said—and it is most probably the truth—to have propagated the gospel in his own country (Euseb. Hist. Eccles., lib. ii. cap. 1). There are also other traditional accounts of him.

CANDLE. The word occurs often in our version (Job xviii. 6; Psal. xviii. 28; and elsewhere), where rather a lamp is meant. So also in the New Testament. But candles made of wax or tallow, with the pith of a kind of rush for a wick, are said to have been generally used by the Romans before they were acquainted with oil-lamps. In later times these candles were found only among the poor; the houses of the wealthy being lighted by lamps. See Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Antiq., under the word.

CANDLESTICK. The candelabrum, or lamp-stand, which Moses was commanded to construct, according to the pattern shown him, for the service of the sanctuary. There are two very particular descriptions of it (Exod. xxv. 31-40, xxxvii. 17-24). It was made of pure gold, and with the utensils belonging to it required a talent (5,475*l.*) for its construction. It was of beaten work, wrought and not cast, and consisted of a base, of a straight shaft rising from this base, of six arms or branches, which were placed three on each side of the shaft, and of seven lamps supported on the summits of the central shaft and the six arms, these summits being all of equal height, and disposed in a single row. In each branch were three kinds of ornaments, called by names signifying bowls or cups, globes, and flowers, so arranged that first came a golden cup, above which was a globe or knop, and above that a flower. The shaft was similarly ornamented; besides which, under each pair of branches, was a globe or knop. The height of the candlestick is said to have been about five feet, and the distance between the two exterior lamps  $3\frac{1}{2}$  feet. It stood on the south side of the holy place opposite to the table of shew-bread (xxvi. 35, xl. 24). Pure olive-oil was burnt in the lamps (xxvii. 20); but it is a question whether the lights were ever extinguished. The probability is that they were, and that the burning 'always' meant always at the appointed times, being lighted in the evening, and when they went out in the morning dressed with golden snuffers or tongs, the snuff being taken away in golden dishes (xxvii. 21, xxx. 7, 8; Lev. xxiv. 3, 4; 1 Sam. iii. 3; 2 Chron. xiii. 11). In Solomon's temple were ten candlesticks, five put on the right, five on the left of the holy place (1 Kings vii. 49; 2 Chron. iv. 7). These seem to have been in addition to the ancient candlestick made by Moses: they were all taken away to Babylon (Jer. lii. 19). In the second temple there was but one (1 Macc. i. 21, iv. 49, 50), and but one was carried away and exhibited in the triumphal procession of Titus. It is figured, though perhaps not with perfect accuracy, on the existing arch of Titus. It is said to have been taken to Carthage by Genseric, 455 A.D., to have been recovered by Belisarius, and ultimately placed in the Christian church of Jerusalem 533 A.D. Its subsequent fate is unknown.

Symbolically a candlestick signifies a church (Rev. i. 12, 20: comp. Zech. iv. 2; Rev. xi. 4).

CANE (Isai. xliii. 24; Jer. vi. 20). See CALAMUS.

CANKER-WORM (Joel i. 4, ii. 25; Nah. iii. 15, 16). The same original word is rendered 'caterpillar' in Psal. cv. 34; Jer. li. 14, 27. It may perhaps designate the locust just when it has quitted its caterpillar, and is in its pupa state. See LOCUST.

CANNEH (a plant or shoot?). A place mentioned only in Ezek. xxvii. 23. Possibly Canneh is intended.

CANON OF SCRIPTURE. By this phrase is to be understood that collection of holy writings which contains the authoritative rule of the faith and practice of the church. Into the origin of the word 'canon' (a rod or testing-rule) used in Gal. vi. 16, and its particular applications, it is not necessary to enquire here. It easily came to be metaphorically used; but it does not occur in the exact theological sense which is now given to it till the fifth century after Christ, when it is found at the end of Amphilochius's catalogue of the sacred books. Adjectives signifying 'canonical' and 'uncanonical,' i.e. coming up to, or not up to, the rule, were in use before the substantive.

The settlement of the canon of scripture is obviously a matter of great importance. If God has been pleased to make a revelation of his will to men, we must know where that revelation of his will is to be found. And to have a clear and exact knowledge of it we must be able to distinguish those books which teach it by divine authority from other sources of instruction. The full consideration of the subject would comprise very many particular details. We possess a book which is ordinarily taken to contain a message from God: we should have to examine its general contents, and the arrangement and distribution of its various parts. For such an account, see BIBLE. Then, as these parts bear the names of, or are ascribed to, trustworthy authors, we must enquire whether such assumptions are well-grounded. For proofs of the authority and credibility of the sacred books, see SCRIPTURE; and for a special examination of each see them under their respective titles. We should want to know, besides, whether the writers communicated merely their own impressions, or whether they were divinely guided in what they said. For this the reader must be referred to INSPIRATION. But then, presuming these points settled, we must also know whether our bible contains more or less than the body of writings intended as the church's standard. Books in our bible are said to have been placed there in error. For other books the same rank is claimed as for those we deem canonical. It is necessary, therefore, to investigate the reasons we have for believing that we admit none that has no right to be admitted, and that we exclude none that has. This, then, must be the special subject of the present article, to exhibit in a compendious way the proof there is that the books of our ordinary bible, and they only, are canonical.

The subject naturally divides itself into two branches; and these shall be examined separately. We must see what grounds there are for accepting the canon—1. Of the Old Testament.—2. Of the New.

On the Old Testament Canon.—A list of the books contained in it is given in the sixth article of the Anglican church. They are the books which we find in our ordinary bibles; the very books that the Jews have always exclusively recognized as sacred. It is a patent fact that their most learned writers agree in this; and the exceptions which have been found or fancied to their testimony appear when examined of but little consequence (see Keil, Einleit. § 217, pp. 687-689). The Palestinian Jews held fast the settled book, nor did they ever allow even works of acknowledged merit produced from time to time among them afterwards to be added to the sacred canon. This is matter of unquestionable history. And, though it might be thought that the Alexandrian Jews, apart in some respects from their brethren in Judea, were not at one with them in their limitation of the scripture canon, since certain other pieces were appended to the Septuagint or Alexandrian Greek translation, yet it will be found that, if with less definite appreciation, certainly in substantial agreement the same rule was held. Thus the grandson of the author of Ecclesiasticus, in his prologue to that book, implies the identity; and Philo, the eminent Alexandrian, evidently acquainted with apocryphal works, from which he has occasionally borrowed ideas, nowhere cites them, as he does almost every book of canonical scripture (see the evidence drawn out in Hävernick, Einleit. edit. Keil, § 13, vol. i. l. pp. 80-83).

It is very evident, from the expressions we continually meet in the New Testament, that a certain body of writings was at that time considered to be 'scripture.' The various terms employed—'the scripture,' 'the scriptures,' 'the holy scriptures,' 'the holy writings' (2 Tim. iii. 15, Gr.), &c.—presuppose this. And sometimes various parts of a whole are spoken of—'the law and the prophets,' 'the law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms'—showing the distribution of the several writings into well-known classes (comp. Matt. v. 17, xv. 3-9; Mark xii. 24; Luke xxiv. 27, 44, 45; John v. 39, x. 34, 35; Rom. iii. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Pet. i. 10-12; 2 Pet. i. 19-21). There is also contemporary secular evidence as to the several books which made up the collection of the scriptures. Josephus lived at the time of the apostles, and declares that the Jews 'had only twenty-two books of scripture, which might justly challenge credit and belief among them; whereof five were the books of Moses, containing little less than 3,000 years; and thirteen the books of the prophets, wherein they wrote the acts of their times, from the death of Moses to the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia; and four more, containing both hymns to God, and admonitions to men for the amendment of their lives; but, from the time of Artaxerxes, that, though certain books had been written, yet they deserved not the same credit and belief which the former had, because there was no certain succession of prophets among them: in the meanwhile, what belief they had of the true scriptures which they only acknowledged, and how faithful they were towards them, was from hence most manifest, that, though they were written so long time before, yet durst never any man presume either to add or diminish, or alter ought at all in them, it being a maxim engrained into every one of that nation from their youth, and in a manner born with them, to hold these writings for the oracles of God, and remaining constant to them, if need were, willingly to die for them' (Centr. Apion. lib. i. § 8). The translation above given is that of Bishop Cosin, Schol. Hist. of Canon, chap. ii. 24. The twenty-two books of which Josephus speaks are thus made up:—

Books of Moses :

Genesis Exodus Leviticus Numbers
Deuteronomy

The Prophets :

Joshua
Judges, with Ruth
1 and 2 Samuel (reckoned as one book)
1 and 2 Kings (one book)

Isaiah
Jeremiah, with Lamentations
Ezekiel
The twelve minor prophets (one book)
Daniel
Job
Ezra and Nehemiah (one book)
Esther
1 and 2 Chronicles (one book)	13
Hymns and Admonitions :
The Psalter
Proverbs Ecclesiastes
Song of Solomon	4

There is therefore, it may fairly be said, the strongest proof which the nature of the case admits, that the Old Testament (as we call it) was, at the beginning of the Christian era, revered as the rule of faith containing the communications of God to man, and, further, that it was composed of the same books or parts which compose it now.

We can trace it higher. It is clear, from books of the Apocrypha written before our Lord's advent, that there was at an earlier date a collection recognized as the sacred code of the Jewish church. Some proof of this has been already given in the reference made to the prologue to Ecclesiasticus. But the following passages may also be consulted : Ecclus. xxiv. 23 ; Bar. iv. 1 ; 1 Macc. i. 56, 57, ii. 50-68, xii. 9 ; 2 Macc. vi. 23. The holy books of scripture are expressly named as in the hands of the people in the time of Jonathan Maccabeus ; and for these books the Jews contended as earnestly then as at any period of their history. Many other passages there are more or less directly referring to the contents of those books, and leading us to the conclusion that those which were 'the scriptures' of those times are identical with 'the scriptures' of a later date.

The Septuagint or Alexandrian Greek version of the scriptures is another testimony. This version, comprising all the books of the Jewish canon, was in existence and credit before the Christian era. It is true that the complete translation was not made at once ; that the Pentateuch was first rendered into Greek, about 286 or 285 years B.C., and that the versions of other books succeeded at intervals, perhaps for a century ; also that there are certain additions of things not in the Hebrew text, tending afterwards to complicate the question ; yet, as before observed, we have no reason to believe that originally the Alexandrian canon differed from that of Palestine. And the great fact is proved that some centuries before Christianity arose there was a body of sacred writings held to be the authoritative standard of the Jewish faith.

The Old Testament gives evidence that its contents were preserved with care. We are told that the book of the law was delivered to the Levites to be placed beside the ark of the covenant (Deut. xxxi. 9, 25, 26). The diligent writing by Joshua of other 'words' is noted (Josh. xxiv. 26). And collections seem from time to time to have been made, as of proverbs (Prov. xxv. 1), of Jeremiah's writings (Jer. xxxvi. 2-4, 32 ; see also xv. 16). Then, again, 'the book of the Lord' is spoken of (Isa. xxxiv. 16 ; comp. xxx. 8). So Daniel had 'the books' (Dan. ix. 2 ; the article being in the original) ; and after the return from Babylon 'the law' and 'the former prophets' are referred to as if they were a known collection (Zech. vii. 12 ; comp. i. 4). Very remarkable, too, are the expressions in the Psalms. David could hardly have penned that commendation of 'the law of the Lord' (Psal. xix. 7-11), had that law not been in a written form ; and later psalm-writers have spoken of loving the law, and the testimonies, and the word of God, taking them as a guide, meditating upon them day and night (cxix. 97, 99, 105, 149 ; comp. cxxxviii. 2, cxlvii. 19). Surely there must have been at the time some well-understood body of divine writings to justify language like this.

It was not to be expected that the sacred books themselves could give a definite account of the settlement of the canon. Indications such as have been exhibited are all that could be looked for in them. But other testimony points to the times of Ezra and Nehemiah, the life-time of the last prophets of the Jewish church, as the period when the holy writings were definitely gathered and recognized as the completed standard of God's teaching. Traditions of the apocryphal books (2 Esdr. xiv. ; 2 Macc. ii. 13). These testimonies certainly are not intrinsically of much value ; but they show the prevailing impression of men of those days that Ezra and Nehemiah revised, and, so to speak, edited the holy book. There is an extraordinary statement of this kind (though of later date) in the Talmud. It is to the following effect. The question is first put, Who wrote these books ? And to this the answer is given : 'Moses wrote the Pentateuch and Job ; Joshua his book and eight verses in Deuteronomy ; Samuel the books of Samuel, Judges, and Ruth ; David the book of Psalms by ten men ; Jeremiah his book, Lamentations, and the books of Kings ; Hezekiah and his college Isaiah, Proverbs, Solomon's Song, and Ecclesiastes ; the men of the great synagogue Ezekiel, the twelve minor prophets, Daniel, and Esther ; Ezra his book, and the genealogies of Chronicles ; and Nehemiah completed the Chronicles' (Baba Bathra, fol. 13.2, in Hävernick's Einleit. § 9. vol. i. l. pp. 40, 41). It is questioned what is the precise meaning of 'wrote' in this place. It cannot well be interpreted in the sense of original composition ; for no one imagines that Hezekiah, with those he employed, composed the prophecies of Isaiah. It must rather be understood (comp. Prov. xxv. 1) to imply transcription or collection, the preparing and placing the several books in the condition in which they were to go authoritatively forth.

If the testimonies produced are thought faint and uncertain, it must be remembered that the books of the Old Testament are of extreme antiquity, that no contemporaneous Hebrew literature exists, nay, that these very books constitute the entire remains of the Hebrew language. Such proof as might be properly demanded under other circumstances, in another age, cannot for the reasons assigned be produced here. And yet, with every disadvantage, most remarkable is the chain of evidence—indications in the writings themselves, that when produced they were committed to the care of a specially-commissioned body of men, presumptions in the later parts that those previously written were recognized and regarded with reverence, all of them claiming to be not posterior to the latest prophets, the collection acknowledged and described in works written anterior to Christ, the various books in it distinctly named just as they are in our lists, by an author contemporary with the apostles, with the addition that no part was composed after the cessation of prophecy, the practice of our Lord and of his disciples of citing the collection as well known, noting sometimes its three great constituent parts, the singular unanimity in regard to this canon of the two in some respects rival branches of the Jewish church, and lastly the venerable tradition which assigns to the times of Ezra and Nehemiah the completion of the book of God, neither needing nor accepting any further addition; surely there is here a mass of proof not easily to be set aside. It is to this conclusion substantially that Zündel, in his elaborate enquiry into the time when the book of Daniel was composed, comes. He places no great reliance on the tradition: he carefully sifts all the evidence that can be produced, but expresses himself convinced that the canon was closed, that the various books as we have them were gathered and recognized by the end of the fourth century before Christ (Krit. Unters. über die Abfass. Daniel, pp. 226-239): comp. Westcott, Introd. to Gospels, note, pp. 51, 52. It is not meant that any man or set of men (the 'great synagogue' they have been called) admitted to or excluded from the canon at their will, judging what was or what was not inspired, but that they laid apart those which had always been known to be so, authenticated from the very time of composition as parts of the message and the memorial of God to his people. The work of such men was declaratory, that the canon might be guarded against groundless claims. It was acknowledged as an ascertained fact among the Jews that the last strains of prophecy died out with Malachi: no inspired man arose after his days; and therefore no book could be added to those already venerated. The precise time when the final gathering and recognition occurred, in other words, when the canon was closed, may be uncertain—some may deem it earlier and some later; but the conclusion seems irresistible that from about the times of the later prophets, not long after the return from captivity, the Jews have had a collected body of holy books which they retain without addition or diminution to the present day. Investigations into the date and authority of each separate book of both the scripture and the Apocrypha, so far as we can make them, confirm this judgment. Details of this kind, however, cannot be given in this place.

But it is necessary to enquire how far the Christian church has accepted the Jewish canon. Something has been already said on the sanction given to it by our Lord. Still it is urged that the apostles occasionally cited those books which are called apocryphal, giving proof thereby that the canon had in their view a wider range. But the argument tells the other way. Mere citation of an author does not prove that that author was regarded as canonical. If there are references in the apostolical writings to the Apocrypha, it shows indeed that those writings were known to the sacred penmen, but, as they are never cited as scripture, in the mode and with the formulæ used in citing scripture, it shows too that the New Testament penmen knowingly and deliberately made a distinction between these writings and those they considered canonical.

It is granted that some of the Christian fathers cited as scripture books not belonging to the canon. They generally used the Septuagint version of scripture, to which other compositions, as stated above, had been annexed. Justin Martyr is an exception. He was conversant with Palestine. And nowhere in his works does he use any of the apocryphal writings (Cosin, Schol. Hist. of Can., chap. iv. 48). There are early Christian catalogues extant of the books of the Old Testament. And these exactly, or with an exception not difficult to be accounted for, coincide with the Jewish canon. Jerone, the most important witness, agrees exactly. Melito of Sardis, in the second century, took special pains to obtain an accurate list (Euseb. Hist. Eccles., lib. iv. cap. 26); and his list is identical with that of the Jews, save that he does not separately mention Esther, which, however, was probably as well as Nehemiah included under Ezra (See Bp. Marsh's Comp. View of Churches of England and Rome, chap. v. pp. 106, 107, 2nd edit.). Origen makes an addition: he enumerates Jeremiah with the Lamentations and the Epistle (Euseb. Hist. Eccles., lib. vi. cap. 25). This epistle has been taken to be that appended to the apocryphal book of Baruch. It may be with at least equal probability regarded as that genuine letter found in Jer. xxix. These are the only discrepancies from the Hebrew canon which early catalogues present. Mr. Westcott, therefore, well says (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 255): 'During the first four centuries, this Hebrew canon is the only one which is distinctly recognized, and it is supported by the combined authority of those fathers whose critical judgment is entitled to the greatest weight. In the meantime, however . . . the common usage of the early fathers was influenced by the position which the apocryphal books occupied in the current versions; and they quoted them frequently as scripture, when they were not led to refer to the judgment of antiquity.'

It was not till the time of Augustine that any real divergence manifested itself. The Septuagint was the parent of the Latin version; and thus uncanonical books were found in the Latin bibles. It was with the Latin version that Augustine was conversant; and hence his catalogue includes apocryphal books. Still, though not always consistent with himself, it would seem that he intended to make a distinction (See Cosin, ubi sup. chap. vii. 79-81); and, while Augustine's influence had great weight in leading the mind of the western church, there were always, down to the very spring of the reformation, many of the most learned divines who adhered to the integrity of the Jewish canon. Lists of such men may be found in Bleek's Einleit., vol. i. p. 697, and elsewhere.

It was reserved for the council of Trent to decree that the Hebrew canon must be enlarged, and that other books must be accepted as equal in authority with the inspired writings (Decret. de Canon. Script., Sess. iv. Apr. 8, 1546). Here, then, there is a fundamental difference as to the basis of faith between the Roman-catholics and ourselves.

On the New Testament Canon. The writings of the New Testament are circumscribed by a narrow period of time. They were not, like the sacred books of the Hebrews, spread over many ages; they were composed by men who were contemporaries, who were more or less known to each other; some of whom were close and intimate friends and colleagues. And yet they were not the result of counsel and agreement. At first the body of Christian doctrine was to be found in the oral teaching of the apostles, and of those instructed by them, received and further propagated by the various communities of the faithful whom they taught. But circumstances showed by-and-by the expediency and necessity of committing certain truths to writing; and exigencies arose requiring communications from the apostles by letters to the churches to which they could not personally speak. These churches were in different parts of the Roman world. And, as a history written specially for one class would not immediately pass into the hands of others, and an epistle directed to a church in the east would not from the nature of the case be at once known to a church in the west, so, though composed almost contemporaneously, it could only be by a gradual process that the books of the New Testament would be brought together, and acknowledged to be not an incongruous collection of writings of the age, but, as Mr. Westcott well calls them, 'the sum of the treasures of apostolic teaching stored up in various places. The same circumstances,' he proceeds, 'at first retarded the formation, and then confirmed the claims of the catholic church and of the canon of scripture' (Hist. of the Canon of the N. T., Introd., p. 6).

There are some indications in different parts of the New Testament that the writers were aware of the position their productions were to occupy. They speak with authority (1 Cor. vii. 7, xiv. 37; 2 Thess.

iii. 6; 1 Tim. iv. 1); they require their writings to be publicly read (Col. iv. 16; 1 Thess. v. 27); they deliver truth only to be divinely known for the instruction of the faithful, pronouncing a blessing on those who shall read and obey, and a curse on those who shall add to or subtract from what they have said (Rev. i. 1, 3, xxii. 18, 19); they refer to the writings of their fellows under the significant name of scripture (2 Tim. v. 17; 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16; to which Gausson would add Rom. xvi. 26 (Canon of the Holy Script., part i. book ii. chap. 11, pp. 279, 280, Engl. Transl.). No great stress, perhaps, is to be laid on these passages; and exception may be taken to some of them; nevertheless they are valuable for showing (as similarly with the Old Testament) the first foreshadowings of the establishment of a New Testament canon.

It is freely acknowledged that no particular time can be specified when the books of the New Testament were collected and formally recognized. We have, rather, to feel our way along the course of Christian history and literature. But, as Mr. Westcott says, 'if it can be shown that the epistles were first recognized exactly in those districts in which they would naturally be first known, that from the earliest mention of them they are assumed to be received by churches, and not recommended only by private authority, that the canon as we receive it now was fixed in a period of strife and controversy, that it was generally received on all sides, that even those who separated from the church, and cast aside the authority of the New Testament scriptures, did not deny their authenticity; if it can be shown that the first references are perfectly accordant with the express decision of a later period, and that there is no trace of the general reception of any other books; if it can be shown that the earliest forms of Christian doctrine and phraseology exactly correspond with the different elements preserved in the canonical epistles, it will surely follow that a belief so widely spread throughout the Christian body, so deeply rooted in the inmost consciousness of the Christian church, so perfectly accordant with all the facts which we do know, can only be explained by admitting that the books of the New Testament are genuine and apostolic, a written rule of Christian faith and life' (ubi sup. pp. 17, 18). Anything like a full investigation or proof of all these particulars would, it is manifest, require a volume. Here there can be given only a brief outline, with a few of the more prominent illustrations.

We possess writings of Clement, Ignatius, Polycarp, and others, men who had some of them conversed with the first disciples, and who flourished in the Christian church but a little later than the apostles. These writers make frequent references to portions of the New Testament, and quotations from it. And, if they do not at once cite the New Testament exactly as they do the Old, the reason is to be found in the considerations already suggested. But indisputably they recognize a distinction between themselves as ordinary writers, and those from whom the books of the New Testament proceeded as of far higher authority.

Thus Clement, writing to the Corinthians, alludes to James iv. 1; Eph. iv. 4; Rom. xii. 5, quotes Matt. xviii. 6, xxvi. 24, and reminds those he addresses how St. Paul 'divinely inspired' had sent them an epistle (Epist. ad Cor. 46, 47). Ignatius cites Matt. iii. 15 (Epist. ad Smyrn. 1), Matt. x. 16 (ad Polycarp. 2), and tells the Romans that he does not lay injunctions on them like Paul and Peter (ad Rom. 4). Polycarp quotes Acts ii. 24; 1 Pet. i. 8; Eph. ii. 8, and says that neither he nor any like him can attain to the wisdom of St. Paul (ad Philip. 1, 3). And these are but specimens of the many citations and allusions to be found in the works of these early writers.

The testimony of Justin Martyr, born about the close of the first century (89 A.D.) is very important. Some of the spurious Gospels were probably extant in his time; but his references are not to them, but to those of Matthew, Mark, and Luke certainly, and it can hardly be doubted to that of John. He speaks also of the memorials or memoranda of the apostles being read with the writings of the prophets in public Christian assemblies for worship (Apol. 1, 67). Heretics were rising at this time in the church; but they appealed to the sacred books. Of two of these some notice must be taken. Basilides (about 125 A.D.), though he certainly used some other writings than those of our canon, yet treated the genuine scriptures with the utmost reverence, and appears to have been the first who distinctly cited them in the same manner as those of the Old Testament (see Westcott, ubi supr. chap. iv. pp. 322, 323). Heracleon, a Gnostic, about the same date wrote commentaries on the Gospels, and would seem to have been the first commentator on the New Testament (ibid. pp. 333, 334). Two more important witnesses of the second century must be referred to, one representing the eastern, the other the western church. The Peshito Syriac version comprises all the books of the New Testament, except 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and the Revelation: the Muratorian fragment, as it is called, of Roman origin (about 170 A.D.) includes all but Hebrews, James, and 2 Peter: it notices also the partial reception of an apocryphal work called the Revelation of Peter. This fragment is in Mr. Westcott's Appendix, pp. 558-563. The two taken together comprise every book but 2 Peter.

Later authorities are, as might be expected, still more explicit. Irenæus, toward the close of the second century, speaks of the scriptures collectively (the New Testament as well as the Old) as 'perfect, being delivered by the word of God and his Spirit' (Adv. Hær. lib. ii. 28, 2). Clement of Alexandria nearly at the same time describes the blessed gospel as with the law and the prophets ratified by the authorization of Almighty power (Strom. lib. iv. 1). And Tertullian distinctly mentions the New Testament (Adv. Prax. 15). The testimonies of these three writers are the more weighty, because they speak as representatives of respectively the western, the Alexandrian, and the African churches.

The stream of evidence cannot here be further traced. It must suffice to say that Eusebius at the beginning of the fourth century reckons as acknowledged by all the four Gospels, the Acts, the Pauline Epistles, 1 John, 1 Peter, and it would seem the Revelation. He then enumerates as doubted by some, James, Jude, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John; and afterwards names many writings, confessedly spurious (Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. 25). The special evidence for those books thus noted as doubtful must be sought in the articles particularly dedicated to them. It is sufficient to observe here that the very hesitation with which some churches received them is a proof of the watchful care taken, lest any unauthorized writing should be accepted as canonical.

A list of other catalogues will be found collected in Mr. Westcott's Appendix, pp. 565-584; exhibiting the general consent of the Christian church.

The fair conclusion therefore is that, seeing the books of the New Testament began very early to be called scripture (possibly even by the apostolic fathers: see Polycarp, ad Philip. 12), and were revered as possessing an authority which belonged to no other compositions, that they were publicly read in religious assemblies, that they were appealed to by heretics, that commentaries were written on them as the text-book of the gospel, that versions were early made of them, and catalogues formed, agreeing in the main, with discrepancies not difficult to account for, surely we are justified in regarding these as the authentic records, the canonical standard of the Christian religion.

It is, as noted above, a mere outline of this great subject that can by possibility be given here. But the student will have found in the preceding observations reference to various easily-accessible works on the scripture canon which may be consulted with advantage. Such are Cosin's Scholastical History of the Canon, an excellent book which, appearing first two centuries ago, has never yet been superseded; Gausson's Canon of Holy Scripture; Westcott's History of the Canon of the New Test., 1855. To these may be added Moses Stuart On the Old Testament Canon.

CANTICLES. See SONG OF SOLOMON.

CAPERNAUM (city of consolation?). A place in Upper Galilee on the borders of Zebulan and Naphtali (Matt. iv. 13), by the sea of Gennesaret (John vi. 17), not far from the influx of the Jordan into it. Capernaum appears to have lain on the great commercial route from Damascus to the Mediterranean; and it has been suggested that we have here the explanation of 'the receipt of custom' (Matt. ix. 9), duties being levied on the commodities carried along this road. Capernaum was a town of importance: it had a synagogue, in which Jesus taught (John vi. 59); and it was for some time our Lord's ordinary residence after quitting Nazareth (Matt. iv. 13; Luke iv. 30, &c.); so that it was called his 'own city' (Matt. ix. 1; Mark ii. 1, where 'in the house' means at home). Here, therefore, many of his miracles were wrought (Matt. viii. 5-17, ix. 1-8; Mark i. 23-27): here, by the lake-side, he called Simon and Andrew, James and John (16-21): here, too, he called Matthew (Matt. ix. 9): here, indeed, so many wonders were performed, and so much divine teaching was delivered, that Capernaum incurred more guilt by the impotence and unbelief it manifested than even Sodom; and fearful was the doom which the Lord denounced against it (xi. 23, 24). That sentence was executed. The once-flourishing and favoured Capernaum has been so brought down that the site of it cannot be perfectly ascertained.

Travellers, however, have done their best to identify the spot; and it would seem that Capernaum must have stood either at Khan Minyeh, or at Tell Hâm. At the former place is a mound, showing that buildings once existed there. It is at the northern extremity of the plain of Gennesaret, and hard by a fountain called 'Ain et-Tîn, 'fount of the fig-tree,' which is just upon the lake. Dr. Robinson believes Khan Minyeh to have been Capernaum mainly because Josephus speaks of a fountain there, which the doctor identifies with 'Ain et-Tîn. See his proofs, at length, Bibl. Res., vol. iii. pp. 348-358. They are, questionless, weighty; but some travellers pronounce for Tell Hâm, and with perhaps a greater show of probability. The ruins there are more extensive; and the tradition of both the Arabs and the Jews is in favour of that place. Dr. Thomson argues strongly for it. The very name may seem to be a fragment of Capernaum, which, in the language of the country Kefr na hâm, would, when the place fell into ruin, change Kefr, 'village,' into Tell, a term usually applied to a deserted site: hence it would be natural to call it simply Tell Hâm. And, while Tell Hâm is close upon the north end of the lake, there are a little way below it springs at Tâbighah, which may be supposed to correspond with the fountain Josephus mentions. 'I was delighted,' says Dr. Thomson, 'to find small creeks or inlets between this and Tell Hâm, where the ship could ride in safety only a few feet from the shore, and where the multitudes, seated on both sides, and before the boat, could listen without distraction or fatigue. As if on purpose to furnish seats, the shore on both sides of these narrow inlets is piled up with smooth boulders of basalt. Somewhere hereabouts, also, Andrew and Peter were casting their nets into the sea, when our Lord, passing by, called them to follow him, and become fishers of men. And, in one of these identical inlets, James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, were mending their nets, when they, being also called, immediately left the ship and their father Zebedee, and followed Jesus (Matt. iv. 18-22). Here—yes, right here—began that organization, which has spread over the earth, and revolutionized the world. Viewed in this relation, is there a spot on earth that can rival this in interest?' (The Land and the Book, p. 356).

CAP'HAR (a covering, shelter). This word is used to signify a village or hamlet. It is not found alone as designating any particular place, and therefore does not appear as a proper name in the authorized version; but it occurs in composition (see the next article), being used like the modern Arabic Kefr.

CAPHEN'ATHA (1 Macc. xii. 37).

CAPHI'RA (1 Esdr. v. 19). A form of Chephirah (Ezra ii. 25).

CAPHTHO'RIM (1 Chron. i. 12). See CAPHTORIM.

CAPH'TOR (chaplet, knop; but probably the word is of Egyptian origin). A region which appears to have been the original seat of the Philistines (Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xvii. 4; Amos ix. 7). The inhabitants were the Capthorim (Gen. x. 14). Various opinions have been advanced as to the locality of Capthor. Dismissing unsatisfactory conjectures, we may most reasonably suppose it to have been in Upper Egypt. The similarity of name seems to point to the Coptite nome; and there still subsists a place called Kouft or Keft, the ancient Coptos, a few miles north of Thebes. This city was of great antiquity: it flourished long, being admirably situated for the purposes of commerce, and through the Roman period maintained its importance. Some of its people may be believed at a very early period to have joined the Casluhim in emigrating to the southern part of Palestine: they expelled or extirpated the ancient inhabitants, and settled down under the name of Philistines, strangers or emigrants (see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 267, 268). The evidence of Egyptian monuments tends to confirm this view. Miss Corboux, however, would regard the Capthorim rather as a family settled in the Delta, who, by their migration into southern Palestine and junction with the Philistines, rendered that people more powerful to extend their possessions northward. The later Philistines, therefore, augmented by the new comers, differed considerably from those so called in the time of Abraham (Journ. of Sac. Lit. Oct. 1851, pp. 161, 162, July 1852, pp. 324-326). It may be noted that, though the term 'isle' is applied to Capthor (Jer. xvii. 4, marg.), the word by no means implies necessarily an island: it designates generally maritime countries, insular or continental.

CAPHTO'RIM. Descendants of Mizraim (Gen. x. 14); called also Caphthorim (1 Chron. i. 12), and Capthorims (Deut. ii. 23). See CAPHTOR.

CAPPADO'CIA. The most easterly region of Asia Minor, bounded by the lesser Armenia on the east, Phrygia and Paphlagonia on the west, the Euxine on the north, and separated on the south by the chain of Taurus from Cilicia. The northern part of this district was a distinct satrapy under the Persian dominion, and became afterwards the independent kingdom of Pontus; the south part, also constituted a kingdom, was then alone called Cappadocia. In New Testament times, by Cappadocia was to be understood a Roman province (so made in 17 A.D.), comprising also the lesser Armenia. Cappadocia was well-watered, but was not a particularly fruitful country. The highlands were cold, and the plains chiefly pasture; but, having good grazing land, it was celebrated for its breed of horses. The Cappadocians are thought to be of Syrian origin: they had the character of being faithless and indolent. Cappadocian Jews were at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 9); and St. Peter directed his first epistle to the Christians there and in the neighbouring regions (1 Pet. i. 1).

CAPTAIN. The rendering of a Hebrew word generally signifying a military officer. There were various ranks, from the captains of fifty to the captain of the host (or commander-in-chief (1 Sam. xvii. 18; 2 Sam. xix. 13; 2 Kings i. 9, xi. 15). Captains of the guard are also mentioned (Gen. xxxvii. 36; 2 Kings xxv. 8). These were great functionaries, charged, it would seem, with the defence of the royal person, and with the execution of sentences pronounced by the king: comp. 1 Kings i. 29-34, 46. The officer so called in Acts xviii. 16 was probably the commander of the prætorian troops at Rome. There is another Hebrew word translated sometimes 'captain' (Josh. x. 24), sometimes 'ruler' (Isai. iii. 6), which denotes both a military and a civil officer. The captain of the temple (Luke xxii. 4; Acts iv. 1, v. 24) was not a military man, but the chief of the priests and Levites that watched in the temple at night (comp. Psal. cxxxiv. 1). The word 'captain' applied to our Lord (Heb. ii. 10) has not a military signification.

CAPTIVE. Prisoners taken in war were severely treated in ancient times. Sometimes they were mutilated (Judges i. 6, 7), or blinded (1 Sam. xi. 2; 2 Kings xxv. 7: see illustration in article EYE). Generally a conquered people was reduced to servitude (Deut. xxviii. 68), or transplanted into other countries (2 Kings xvii. 6, 24). Cruelties were practised also upon women and children (viii. 12, xv. 16; Psal. cxxxvii. 9). It is a remarkable fact that, though the Israelites dealt in many instances harshly with those they captured, yet their conduct stood out in contrast to that of heathen nations; so that the humanity of even some of their worst kings was reckoned upon by their conquered enemies (1 Kings xx. 31-34).

CAPTIVITY. This word is frequently used in a wide sense for subjection and distress, not only by enemies, but through disease, destitution, or other kind of trouble (Job xlii. 10; Psal. xiv. 7, this psalm being ascribed, and with great probability, to David; Judges xviii. 30?). In a more special sense it implies the being conquered by a foreign foe. And such conquests and consequent servitude the Hebrews frequently underwent—as by the Moabites, Midianites, Philistines—from almost the very beginning of their possession of Palestine. But these were partial and temporary calamities. On account of repeated transgressions and impotence, there were severer judgments in store. Moses had predicted them (Lev. xxvi. 31-39; Deut. iv. 25-28, xxviii. 63-68); and to the full were these threatenings accomplished. The Jews are accustomed to reckon four great captivities—the Babylonian, the Median, the Grecian, and the Roman; these four empires ruling over them in turn. Understanding, then, by the term captivity the deportation of the people from their native country, we may gather the following notices as we find them in the scripture history.

It is very likely that the Assyrian power was early felt in Palestine. Inscriptions which have been deciphered go to show that the northern kingdom was tributary to the Assyrian monarch in the time of Jehu. But it is not till a later period that we have any record of the Israelites being carried away from their own land. Of course the blow fell first upon the ten tribes. There were Assyrian invasions, first by Pul (2 Kings xv. 19, 20), in the reign of Menahem; and afterwards by Tiglath-pileser, in the days of Pekah. Then it was that the northern and north-eastern provinces were overrun; and their population, Galilee and the trans-Jordanic tribes, were deported into Assyria (xv. 29; 1 Chron. v. 26). Later, Shalmaneser twice invaded Israel: the king Hoshea pacified him the first time by submission and the payment of tribute, but afterwards treacherously rebelled; and, in consequence, Samaria was besieged and taken, and the inhabitants of the kingdom generally were removed into Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 3-23). It would seem that, though certainly not all, yet a large mass of the people were thus deported; for various tribes were brought from the east to colonize the country, and even then the population was not large enough to keep down the wild beasts, which as a judgment from God molested them. See SAMARITAN. Various kinds of idolatry prevailed among the mixed peoples; and, though some sort of reverence was paid to Jehovah, yet his worship was debased and polluted by the conjoint worship of false gods. Samaria was never again inhabited by the Israelitish race (24-41).

The southern kingdom of Judah was not left unmolested. In Hezekiah's reign Sennacherib seized all the fortified cities, and forced the Jewish monarch to pay a large sum as the price of sparing Jerusalem (xviii. 13-16). The scripture does not state that the Assyrian then carried off any captives: it is probable that he did (see Sir H. Rawlinson, Outline of Assyrian History, pp. 24, 25). But the fatal blow supernaturally inflicted on Sennacherib's army checked any further purpose of Judean conquest (2 Kings xix. 35-37). And then Judah had a respite. Manasseh was carried to Babylon, and was restored, on his repentance, to his throne (2 Chron. xxxiii. 10-13). But, as the people generally, in spite of partial reformations, continued rebellious against God, they were ultimately given up. Nebuchadnezzar repeatedly invaded the kingdom, deporting each time many of the inhabitants. In the third year of Jehoiakim, Daniel and others were sent to Babylon (Dan. i. 1). Je hoiachin's short reign was ended by his being carried away with a great number of the people (2 Kings xxiv. 8-16; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, 10). Ezekiel went then, and the ancestor of Mordecai (Ezek. i. 1, 2; Esth. ii. 5, 6). There were other deportations when Jerusalem was burnt, at the end of Zedekiah's reign (2 Kings xxv. 8-12; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17-20; Jer. lii. 15, 16); and the numbers taken at three different times are afterwards given (28-30), showing that the process of deportation went on as opportunity served. But the desolation of Judah was hardly so entire as that of Israel. The principal persons were removed; but very many of the inferior classes remained, and might have lived peaceably under a governor of their own nation, Gedaliah, had he not been treacherously murdered. This caused a fresh migration into Egypt (Jer. xl. xli.). Of the condition of Judah during the years that followed, till the decree of Cyrus, we have no account. The ten tribes when carried away were strongly leavened with idolatry; and they very probably, in exile (according to the prediction of Moses before referred to), lapsed almost entirely, and mingled with their heathen masters. When Judah was afterwards deported, the few faithful Israelites would naturally become incorporated with them. Hence, perhaps, the difficulty of identifying the descendants of Israel. But something more will be hereafter said respecting them.

The Jews seem to have been on the whole treated with consideration. According to their tradition, one of their own chiefs held authority over them as 'captain of the people,' or prince of the captivity (2 Esdr. v. 16). Be this as it may, they had their elders (Ezek. xx. 1): they often rose to posts of dignity (Neh. i. 11; Esth. viii. 2; Dan. ii. 48, 49); and the generality of them were quite able to enjoy domestic comforts (Jer. xxix. 5, 6). Still they naturally longed for their own land, consecrated by so many recollections and hopes, and assured by divine promise as their lasting inheritance (Psal. cxxxvii.), more especially as, though they preserved many of their rites, they could not sacrifice out of Judea.

And at length deliverance came. The decree of Cyrus allowed the return of those that chose. And the chief of Judah and Benjamin with the Levites returned (Ezra i. 1-6), 42,360, as they are reckoned (ii. 64; Neh. vii. 66), besides their servants. The families of about 30,000 of these are specified; the rest were perhaps Israelites of the ten tribes (Ezra vi. 17). Another caravan was led by Ezra (viii.); and thus the cities of Judea were again inhabited by their own people, but the race was not so purely Jewish as before. Galilee was also, though with greater intermixture of Gentiles, reoccupied by the sons of Jacob; but Samaria remained in the hands of strangers. Many Jews, however, chose to continue in Assyria and Babylonia; and colonies of them were diffused through various countries. They retained their faith, and their tie to their own country, which many of them visited at the feasts, and were known afterwards as 'the dispersed,' or dispersion (John vii. 35). The fate of the ten tribes is involved in greater uncertainty. A multitude of guesses have been propounded concerning them. Some maintain that the Affghans are descended from them: some fix on the Nestorians; while others have ingeniously argued that they are the North American Indians. Wilder conjectures, and such there have been, need not be mentioned here. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible (vol. i. p. 277), supposes that some returned and mixed with the Jews (Luke ii. 36); some were left in Samaria; many remaining in the east were fused with the Jews there, and recognized as an integral part of the dispersion (Acts xxvi. 7); while most apostatized and were swallowed by the nations around. This is nearly the view suggested above.

A more fatal captivity yet awaited the Jews. They rejected Messiah; and the Romans came and took away their place and nation. At the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, 70 A.D., multitudes perished, and many captives were made; and at a subsequent overthrow by Adrian, 135 A.D., thousands were sold or transported, besides vast numbers that were slain. Since then the Jews have been scattered through all lands, as we see them, a standing wonder to the world, not so much in the fact itself as in the correspondence of that fact to predictions known to have been delivered centuries before.

CARABA'SION (1 Esdr. ix. 34).

CARBUNCLE. One of the gems in the high priest's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10); it is also mentioned in Ezek. xxviii. 13. It must, from the derivation of the Hebrew word, have been a bright flashing gem. Some have supposed it the emerald. Carbuncle occurs again as the rendering of another term in Isai. liv. 12. The original words here may mean 'sparkling stones;' perhaps the Oriental garnet is intended. But Duns imagines that the jewel in the priest's breast-plate was garnet (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 56).

CAR/CAS (severe). One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

CAR/CHAMIS (1 Esdr. i. 25). A form of CAR/CHEMISH (fortress of Chemosh). A city on the Euphrates, commanding the passage of that river; the possession of which was therefore of great moment to the neighbouring powers. Pharaoh would seem to have occupied it after the battle of Megiddo, and Nebuchadnezzar to have possessed himself of it about three years afterwards (2 Chron. xxxv. 20, where in some copies Charchemish; Jer. xlvi. 2). It has generally been supposed identical with Circesium; but Rawlinson places it higher up the Euphrates, close to Hierapolis, or Mabug; comp. Dr. Hincks in Journ. of Sac. Lit., July, 1854, note, pp. 408, 409.

CARE/AH (bald-head). The father of Johanan (2 Kings xxv. 23). Elsewhere the name is spelt Kareah.

CAR/IA. A district in the south-western part of Asia Minor, not itself named in scripture. Some of the cities, however, mentioned in the New Testament were in Caria, as Cnidus, and Miletus (Acts xx. 15, xxvii. 7). Caria is described in the Maccabean history as the residence of Jews (1 Macc. xv. 23).

CARMA'NIANS (2 Esdr. xv. 30). Inhabitants of an Asiatic region.

CAR'ME (1 Esdr. v. 25). A corruption of Harim (Ezra ii. 39).

CAR'MEL (garden, or park).—1. A ridge of hills, the highest point of which is 1,728 feet above the sea, extending ten or twelve miles nearly north and south. It commences with a bold bluff headland, about ten miles to the south of Acre, or Ptolemais, forming the south boundary of the bay of Acre, and, dividing the plain of Sharon from Esdraelon, presents also a bold but much lower height at its south-eastern extremity, with an abrupt descent to the hills of Samaria. The ridge of Carmel is for the most part composed of limestone, in which are nodules of flint, and it is perforated with almost-innumerable caves. In the division of the land these hills were included in the territory of Asher, which we are told extended to them and still farther south to Dor (Josh. xvi. 11, xix. 26).

Carmel stands prominently out in sacred story as connected with the prophet Elijah. The Tishbite was returning at God's command along the road from Zarephath to Megiddo, when he met Obadiah seeking grass to keep the beasts alive in the marshy grounds at the bottom of Esdraelon. Ahab, though he had gone in another direction, was evidently not far off; and the prophet and the king stood face to face near the foot of Carmel. And then the challenge was given that the multitudinous priests of Baal and Ashtaroth should be confronted with the solitary servant of the Lord, that each should call upon their God, and that he that answered by fire should be acknowledged before the assembled thousands of Israel the alone supreme. Ahab dared not refuse the demand. The priests were gathered; and never was there a more awful trial of strength. But Baal, invoked in vain, regarded not his worshippers. And then Elijah repaired the altar of the Lord; for it would seem that worship had been offered there before. And the place can even now, there is little doubt, be identified. It bears the name of el-Mukhrakah, the place of burning. There is a natural platform of naked rock, surrounded by a low wall: the sea behind is just visible: the great plain (for it is at the south-eastern extremity of Carmel) lies in front, with Jezreel in the distance, and Kishon just at the mountain foot. There is a well of water near; and from this it has been supposed that the water was obtained which Elijah had poured on his sacrifice and in the trench about the altar. But Dr. Thomson says that he has seen that almost dry: he thinks, therefore, that it could not have continued through the long drought, and that the water was brought from the perennial sources of the Kishon (The Land and the Book, p. 484). At Elijah's prayer, the fire of God descended; and the loud shout of the assembled Israelites proclaimed 'The Lord, he is the God! The Lord, he is the God!' By the prophet's command, the idolatrous priests were seized, hurried down the track still visible to the Kishon by a knoll now called 'Tell Kussis,' 'hill of the priests,' and there, according to the law, were put to death. Then Ahab and Elijah most likely returned to the Mukhrakah, 'Ahab to partake of the feast prepared, and spread somewhere near at hand, which always formed part of these sacrifices, and Elijah to pray for rain. This is implied by the words of the prophet to the king, "Get thee up, eat and drink," and again, "Get thee down, that the rain stop thee not." From this spot Elijah's servant would have but a little way to go to command a full view of the sea. And, when the cloud, like a man's hand was seen, Ahab was bidden to ascend his chariot, and the prophet tightly girded preceded him as a runner to Jezreel, twelve miles distant (1 Kings xviii.). This place has always been deeply venerated. Pythagoras is said to have visited it: Vespasian offered sacrifice there; and to this day it is held sacred by Jews and Christians and Moslems alike. There can be no reasonable question of the identity of the spot. It has been thought—and it is not unlikely—that it was on Carmel that Elijah called down fire upon the two fifties sent by Ahaziah to apprehend him (2 Kings i.). Elisha repeatedly visited it, sometimes perhaps residing there (ii. 25, iv. 25-27). Subsequently it occurs frequently in the illustrations used by the Hebrew prophets (Isai. xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 2, xxxvii. 24, and elsewhere).

There is a convent now on Carmel; and the mount is still wooded and variegated with flowers. Dr. Thomson describes it as very difficult in some parts to force a way through the almost-impenetrable jungle. But, when the summit is reached, the view commanded is most impressive. 'In front,' says Dr. Kitto, 'it extends to the distant horizon, over the dark-blue waters of the Mediterranean: behind stretches the great plain of Esdraelon, and the mountains of the Jordan and of Judea: below on the right hand lies the city of Acre, lessened to a mere speck; while in the far distance beyond the eye rests upon the high summits of Lebanon' (Daily Bible Illustr., week xvi. day 4). Carmel is now generally called Mar Elyas.

2. A place in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 55). Here Saul, after his expedition against Amalek, erected a monument or trophy (1 Sam. xv. 12). This was where Nabal dwelt (xxv. 2, 5, 7, 40): it was from this place, therefore, that Abigail was called the Carmelitess (xxvii. 3). And it was most likely in this Carmel that Uziah had his husbandmen and vire-dressers (2 Chron. xxvi. 10). There are extensive ruins of it, with a conspicuous fort, at Kurmul, ten miles south-east of Hebron. See CAL'BE, 2.

CAR'MELITE, CAR'MELITESS (1 Sam. xxvii. 3, xxx. 5; 2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 3; 1 Chron. iii. 1). In all these places a resident at Carmel, 2, is meant; and perhaps also in 2 Sam. xxiii. 35; 1 Chron. xi. 37.

CAR'MI (wine-dresser).—1. A son of Reuben (Gen. xli. 9; Exod. vi. 14), the head of one of the families of the tribe (Numb. xxvi. 6).—2. A descendant of Judah, and father of Achan (Josh. vii. 1, 18). The person mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 1 may be the same.

CARNA'IM (1 Macc. v. 26, 43, 44). Probably Ashteroth-Karnaim.

CARNAL. Having reference to the flesh, or body; hence worldly property as needful for the support of the body (Rom. xv. 27; 1 Cor. ix. 11). So the word is applied to the ceremonial law as reaching only to the purification of the flesh (Heb. ix. 10). It also describes the natural state of man as distinguished from and opposed to the spiritual mind of the true believer (Rom. viii. 7); likewise the condition of those in whom the old corruption yet has power (1 Cor. iii. 3). It must be observed that a substantive is sometimes found in the original where our translation gives the adjective 'carnal.'

CARN'ON (2 Macc. xii. 21, 26). The same place with Carnaim.

CAR'PUS (fruit). A person with whom St. Paul left a cloke at Troas (2 Tim. iv. 13).

CARRIAGE. Various words in the original are thus rendered in our version. In Numb. iv. 24, marg., the clause may be rendered 'for serving and for bearing.' In Judges xviii. 21 the word used implies 'wealth,' i.e. what they had acquired. In 1 Sam. xvii. 20, marg., xxvi. 5, 7, the meaning is 'a waggon-rampart,' that is, a bulwark formed of the vehicles of the army. In 1 Sam. xvii. 22; Isai. x. 28, 'baggage' is intended. In xli. 1 we may translate 'the things borne by you are loads.' And in the New Testament (Acts xxi. 15), where there are various readings, the sense is (according as one or other is preferred) either 'having opened out,' or 'having packed or prepared our baggage.'

CAR'SHENA (spoiler, illustrious, according to some, black). A prince of highest rank in the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 14).

(1 Sam. vi. 7-14; 2 Sam. vi. 3; 1 Chron. xii. 7; Isai. xxviii. 28; Amos ii. 13) for the conveyance of persons, burdens, or produce.

Syria; and the only carts used in western Asia have two wheels of solid wood, such as may be seen in Spain; but ancient carts are figured in the Egyptian monuments with two or four wheels with spokes. See WAGGON, THRESHING.

CARVING (Exod. xxxi. 5, xxxv. 33). See HANDICRAFT.

CASIPH'IA (silver?). A place, it would seem, on the route between Babylon and Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 17). Nothing is certainly known of it.

CAS'LEU (1 Macc. i. 54, iv. 52). Identical with Chisleu. See MONTHS.

CASLU'HIM (fortified). A people descended from Mizraim, of the family of Ham (Gen. x. 14; 1 Chron. i. 12). They have generally been supposed to be the Colchians, whom Greek writers call a colony from Egypt; but there is little to support this conjecture. They were more probably settled somewhere in Egypt. A difficulty has been felt, as the sacred text seems to represent the Casluhim as progenitors of the Philistines, who are believed to have sprung from Caphtor. Kalisch suggests the Egyptian town Chemnis, later called Panopolis, as the seat of the Casluhim, and says we may 'suppose that the earliest colonizers of Philistia emigrated from the same once-powerful and populous district; but, as they are in some passages represented as settlers from the Caphtorim, they may have been increased from that source; and Caphtor may for some time have been the abode of Casluhim also, who later joined their kindred in Philistia, when the latter had here acquired territory and power, (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 266, 267). See CAPHTOR.

CAS'PHON (1 Macc. v. 36).

CAS'PIS (2 Macc. xii. 13).

CASSIA. Two Hebrew words are translated cassia: one, implying to 'split,' is a name given to the substance in question, because its rolls are split (Exod. xxx. 24; Ezek. xxvii. 19); the other has the sense of peeling, because the bark is stripped off (Psal. xlv. 8). Most probably these two words refer to the same thing, the rind or bark of an aromatic plant not so fine or fragrant as cinnamon, but much resembling it. This may be the Cinnamomum cassia, a native of India and China: see Duns, Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. pp. 63, 64. Cassia was one of the ingredients in the holy anointing oil: it was used to perfume garments; and it was an article of merchandise at Tyre.

CASTLE (Acts xxi. 34, 37, xxii. 24, xxiii. 10, 16, 32). A fortress at the north-west corner of the temple in Jerusalem. It was called by Herod the tower of Antonia, in honour of his patron, Mark Antony. The temple was a kind of citadel that guarded Jerusalem; and so the tower of Antonia was a fortress that commanded the temple. See also FENCED CITIES.

CAS'TOR AND POL'LUX. These, in heathen mythology the sons of Jupiter and Leda, were regarded as the tutelary deities of sailors. Ancient ships had at the prow a representation of that from which they took their name, and at the stern one of their tutelary deity. These were sometimes, as it would seem in the case of St. Paul's vessel, the same (Acts xxviii. 11). See Alford, The Greek Test., note on Acts xxviii. 11.

CAT (Baruch vi. 22). The cat is not mentioned in the holy scriptures, but only in the Apocrypha.

CATERPILLAR (Joel i. 4, and elsewhere). See LOCUST.

CATHU'A (1 Esdr. v. 30).

CAUL. The lobes of or over the liver (Exod. xxix. 13, 22; Lev. iii. 4, 10, 15, iv. 9, vii. 4, viii. 16, 25, ix. 10, 19). See LIVER. But in Hos. xiii. 8 the parts around the heart, the pericardium. In Isai. iii. 18, an article of dress. See DRESS.

CAUSEY (Prov. xv. 19, marg.; Isai. vii. 3, marg.). An ancient form of the word causeway.

CAVE. Palestine is a rocky country: it therefore abounds in natural caverns, used sometimes as habitations (Gen. xix. 30), sometimes as places of refuge from invaders (Judges vi. 2; 1 Sam. xiv. 11), or from earthquakes (Isai. ii. 19, 21); also as tombs (John xi. 33). Various words are found in Hebrew designating these caverns, or dens, or holes, according to one or other of the prominent ideas implied, as expressing the use, position, mode of construction, &c. From several of these words places or people have taken their names. Thus Hauran is cave-land; and Horites are dwellers in caves: see HAURAN, HORITE. Some of these natural caverns are very large. David and his numerous body of followers were not merely contained in one of them, but able so to conceal themselves in its recesses that Saul, when he entered it, could not perceive that any one was there (1 Sam. xxiv. 3). Occasionally caves were enlarged and fashioned by art, to make them more serviceable for different uses, as cisterns for water, receptacles where goods might be stored, places of confinement, &c. &c.; for all which purposes we find mention made of them (Josh. x. 16-18; Isai. xxiv. 22; Jer. xl. 8, 9; Zech. ix. 11). Very many caves are specially named in scripture, as those of Adullam, Machpelah, &c. &c.; of which notices will be found under their respective names. Some of these can yet be identified. Caverns, however, are now shown as the places where remarkable events occurred, such as those of Mary at Nazareth, of the nativity at Bethlehem, &c. Little credit can be attached to the traditionary accounts of many of these.

CEDAR. A tree frequently mentioned in scripture. It derives its Hebrew name, erez, from a word signifying to be compact or compressed, expressive therefore of the firmness of its roots. We learn that it was lofty (Ezek. xxxi. 3-5) with large and spreading branches (Psal. lxxx. 10, xcii. 12; Ezek. xxxi. 6-9), durable, and therefore fit for beams, boards, pillars, ceilings (1 Kings vi. 9, 10, vii. 2; Jer. xxii. 14), for masts (Ezek. xxvii. 5), for carved images (Isai. xlv. 14), fragrant also for purifications (Lev. xiv. 4; Numb. xix. 6). Cedars were anciently very abundant in Palestine (1 Kings vi. 27): we have notice that the wood was used by the early Hebrew kings (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chron. xiv. 1; 2 Chron. ii. 8), also by the Jews of later times (Ezra iii. 7), and, as we learn from secular histories, for many structures in various parts of the east.

The genus Cedrus belongs to the natural order of plants Conifereæ, and comprises various species. It has been questioned whether a single kind of tree possesses all the qualities noted above as belonging to the cedar. The Cedrus Libani and the Cedrus deodara perhaps most nearly answer the conditions; but the latter, plentiful in the Himalayan mountains, is not found in Syria. The Cedrus Libani, cedar of Lebanon, must therefore be taken generally to represent the cedar of scripture. But this was not well adapted for masts: possibly the Pinus Halepensis, which is said to grow in Lebanon, might be the tree from which masts were procured. Also the use of 'cedar' for purification was first enjoined in the wilderness, where the cedar of Lebanon does not occur. It has been suggested that some species of juniper might be intended, the Juniperus sabina, savine, or the Phœnician juniper, oxycedrus, which is abundant in the desert, striking its roots in the crevices of the rocks: the wood of it is aromatic, and was therefore suitable for purifyings (see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 286). It is, further, worth notice that, though Solomon asked Hiram generally for 'cedars,' Hiram understood the request to include firs (1 Kings v. 6, 8), and that, while the word 'cedar' is thought sufficient in one place to describe the timber wanted, we find the more detailed account below specifying also 'fir-trees and alghum-trees' (2 Chron. ii. 3, 8). It is therefore very likely that varieties of pine and yew may be included under the name. The cedar has wide-spreading roots, a tapering trunk, and branches thickest and longest nearest the ground. The wood is formed by the yearly addition of concentric rings, and is hardest inside. The tree is an evergreen, with long, narrow, and pointed leaves. The cones are oblong, and the wood highly resinous.

It was on the loftier ranges of Lebanon that cedars flourished; and they are said to be found now only in a single locality; though some moderns profess to have discovered them elsewhere. The well-known cedar grove has of course been visited and described by many travellers, who differ exceedingly in their estimate of the number of the trees; some counting those only of great age, and others also the younger ones. Duns has given a curious table of those numbered, from 23 ancient trees by Belon, in 1550 A.D. to 400 of all sorts, by Hooker in 1860 (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 269). The following is Dr. Thomson's description: 'They are situated high up on the western slope of Lebanon, ten hours south-east from Tripoli. . . . In no other part of Syria are the mountains so alpine, the proportions so gigantic, the ravines so profound and awful. . . . There are several routes to them, and all wild, exciting, delightful. . . . The platform where the cedars stand is more than 6,000 (6,172 according to Dr. Hooker) feet above the Mediterranean, and around are gathered the very tallest and greyest heads of Lebanon. . . . the space covered by them does not exceed half a dozen acres. . . . There is a singular discrepancy in the statements of travellers, with regard to the number of trees. Some mention 7, others 13, intending, doubtless, only those whose age and size render them biblical, or at least historical. It is not easy, however, to draw any such line of demarcation. There is a complete gradation, from small and comparatively young to the very oldest patriarchs of the forest. I counted 443; and this cannot be far from the true number. . . . The wood, bark, cones, and even leaves of the cedar, are saturated, so to speak, with resin. The heart has the red cedar colour; but the exterior is whitish. It is certainly a very durable wood, but is not fine-grained, nor sufficiently compact to take a high polish, for ordinary architectural purposes, however, it is perhaps the best there is in the country. . . . The branches are thrown out horizontally from the parent trunk. These, again, part into limbs which preserve the same horizontal direction, and so on down to the minutest twigs; and even the arrangement of the clustered leaves has the same general tendency. Climb into one, and you are delighted with a succession of verdant floors spread around the trunk, and gradually narrowing as you ascend. The beautiful cones seem to stand upon, or rise out of, this green flooring' (The Land and the Book, pp. 197-200).

CEILING. The ceiling of the temple and Solomon's palace is described in 1 Kings vi. 9, 10, 15, vii. 3; 2 Chron. iii. 5. It was of cedar or fir planks, laid on beams or rests in the walls. But such ceilings did not exhibit the mere wood: they were coloured and ornamented; for the prophets refer to them as evidencing the luxury of the people (Jer. xxii. 14; Hagg. i. 4). The Egyptian monuments furnish us with illustrations. They display ceilings with elegant patterns painted in rich colours. And still ceilings in the east are profusely ornamented, sometimes with curious panelling, or inlaid-work; and, in localities where wood is scarce, we are told that they are made of fine plaster with tasteful mouldings, coloured and relieved with gilding.

CEN'CHREA or CENCHRÆ (millet). The eastern harbour of Corinth, from which it was distant about nine miles. St. Paul sailed from this port when returning to Jerusalem and Antioch from his second missionary journey (Acts xviii. 18); and somewhat later we gather that a church had been organized there (Rom. xvi. 1). The modern village of Kikries occupies the site of Cencrea; and some remnants of the moles are still visible. The millet, also, from which the name was derived, is said yet to grow in the neighbourhood.

CENDEBE'US (1 Macc. xv. 38-xvi. 10).

CENSER. There are two Hebrew words so translated, mahhtah and niktereth; the latter occurring only in the later books (2 Chron. xxvi. 19; Ezek. viii. 11). It was a vessel or metal fire-pan to take up coals on which the incense could be placed. It was portable, and probably had a long handle. Censers are described among the furniture of the altar—the brazen altar, not the altar of incense (Numb. iv. 14); and a special charge is given for the use of the censer on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 12). Probably those of the ordinary kind were of brass or copper (comp. Exod. xxvii. 3); but the Jews suppose that the one used by the high priest was of gold; and this supposition is to a certain extent corroborated by the fact that Aaron is bidden to use some particular censer—the definite article being prefixed to the word (Lev. xvi. 12; Numb. xvi. 46). Korah and his company had censers (6, 17, 37, 38, 39); but they were doubtless of the common sort. Solomon made golden censers (1 Kings vii. 50; 2 Chron. iv. 22). A golden censer is mentioned in the New Testament (Heb. ix. 4). It is questioned, however, whether the golden altar is not rather meant: on this difficult point see Dr. Alford's remarks (The Greek Test. note on Heb. ix. 4). The Greek word rendered 'censer' in Rev. viii. 3, 5 is derived from frankincense, implying that frankincense was burnt therein. The 'vials' (v. 8) have been thought to mean similar vessels.

CENSUS. It is frequently found desirable in well-ordered states to number the population. This was specially needful among the Israelites; because God would make it manifest that he had fulfilled his promise of largely multiplying a single family (Gen. xii. 2), and because in the division of Canaan, though the lot was to be cast, yet as a general principle the most numerous tribes were to have the larger inheritance (Numb. xxxiii. 54). Other necessities there were, such as the substitution of the male Levites for the first-born males of all Israel (iii. 40, 41), &c. &c. But yet a census was not to be taken merely for vain-glorious display; and it was provided that, when the people were numbered, half-a-shekel a-head should be paid by every man above twenty, redemption or atonement money (Exod. xxx 11-16).

The first numbering or census of which we have an account was on the going down of Jacob's family into Egypt. They were then said to be in all three-score and ten (Gen. xli. 8-27). The list given probably contains the names of some not then born; it being the object of the sacred writer to enumerate those who would be heads of families in the different tribes.

A census was taken not long after the Israelites left Egypt for the purpose of obtaining silver, by the payment of the bekah, or half-shekel, for the erection of the tabernacle. The number of the males over twenty years of age is stated at 603,550 (Exod. xxxviii. 25, 26). Exactly the same number is recorded as the result of an enumeration said to be made on the first day of the second month of the second year after the departure from Egypt. The purpose of this census was the mustering of the men capable of military service: it excluded the tribe of Levi. Some difficulty has been felt in consequence of the numbers being the same at apparently two enumerations made at the interval of several months. There are various modes in which this difficulty may be met. It has been supposed, and the supposition is not unreasonable, that the births and deaths of the few months in question just balanced. Or the Levites, who were not included on the last occasion, may have been numbered on the first, so that there was an increase in the total of the population, that increase being equal to the whole number of male Levites above twenty years of age. Or, and this appears the most reasonable solution, the two statements refer to a single census. It is remarkable that the command to ascertain the numbers for military purposes was given on the first day of the second month, and that (apparently) the numbers were declared the same day (Numb. i. 1-4, 17, 18). We can scarcely imagine that the whole process was completed in so brief a space; it may well be believed, therefore, that on this day there was simply the solemn promulgation by chosen men, one of each tribe, of the result of the census previously made; about the various addings up of which (as we know is the case with ourselves) much time had necessarily been spent. The number of the male Levites, from a month old and upwards, was 22,000, and these were taken as devoted to the Lord in lieu of 22,273, the first-born males of the other tribes, a composition being accepted for the surplus 273 (iii. 39-51). It will be observed that the numbers of the three great Levitical families are given separately, and that the sum of these separate families is 22,300; possibly, as letters were used for numerals, some error of transcription has occurred; or, it is not unlikely that the 300 Levites were the first-born of their tribe, and thus, being by birth devoted to God, they could not be substitutes for other persons. It has been objected that the number 22,273 of first-born is disproportionately small, when the total number of the people was so great. To meet this objection it has been said that, when the first-born males of Israel were enumerated, manifestly only those born after the giving of the command to sanctify the first-born to God are meant (Exod. xiii. 2, 11-15); the ordinance being to commemorate the sparing of Israel when the first-born of every family in Egypt were destroyed. Perhaps this reply is not satisfactory. There is more weight in the observation that such first-born as were themselves heads of families were not reckoned as those to be redeemed. Besides, all eldest sons are not first-born; and in many a large family the first-born would have died in infancy. A son can be re-placed; a first-born cannot. See the question fully argued in Birks' Exodus of Israel, chap. vi. pp. 64-77. Another census was taken in the fortieth year after the deliverance from bondage. The total number of males fit for military service was then 601,730; while the Levite males from a month old were 23,000. The following table will show the increase or decrease of the respective tribes.

		(Numb. i., iii., xxvi.)

Objection has been made to the statement of the enormous increase of Israel during the sojourn in Egypt. It has been thought that the time of that sojourn, generally reckoned at 215 years, was too short for such a multiplication, and therefore that a longer period must have elapsed; hence some have interpreted Exod. xii. 40, 41, as if the 430 years there mentioned were the time of the residence in Egypt, instead of commencing from the divine communication to Abraham (Gen. xv. 13), or from his departure from Haran (comp. Acts vii. 6; Gal. iii. 17). This is a question fairly open to discussion. But there have been rash and irreverent writers, who have thought fit to charge the scriptures with untruthfulness. It is, therefore, necessary to show that it was very possible for the population to increase as we are told it did, in the shorter term of 215 years. This matter has been investigated by many, but by no one more sensibly and satisfactorily than by Mr. Ashpitel (The Increase of the Israelites in Egypt shown to be probable from the Statistics of Modern Populations, 1863). He finds that, without making allowance for modifying circumstances, the Israelites must double every 15½ years in order to reach the numbers of the first census. He then examines modern statistics, and he produces instances in which populations have doubled in 20, in 19, in 17½, in 15 years, &c. There were, however, causes which would promote a rapidity of increase among the Israelites, which do not exist among the modern nations examined. These are the facts that the Hebrews were placed among another people with whom they must have largely intermarried (Lev. xxiv. 10), that they adopted bond-servants and children born from them in the house into the number of their own people (1 Chron. ii. 34, 35; comp. Gen. xiv. 14, xvii. 27, xxx. 43, xlvii. 1), that the practice of polygamy prevailed, increasing the magnitude of families, that the age of puberty is early in the east, the number of generations in a given time being thereby multiplied, and that the duration of life was in that age greater, so that elder persons would not die off so quickly as in our days.

Taking all these points into consideration, Mr. Ashpitel's conclusion is: 'On comparison with the statistical facts, the rate of increase thus becomes slower than what Humboldt observed throughout the whole of New Spain for 50 years, allowing for extraordinary checks only, is little more than the mean increase of the United States for 20 years together, and has very decidedly exceeded in more favoured parts' (p. 21). Mr. Ashpitel deals very well with the objections which have been urged on the other side, and shows how hasty reasoners have fallen into the portentous mistake of inferring that, because some individuals of the fourth generation from Jacob were alive at the date of the exodus, no more generations had existed to that time. Those who can be satisfied with such an inference must be credulous enough to believe that no children were born in the families of Ephraim and Manasseh for the space of 145 years—the period from the death of Joseph to the departure from Egypt; for 'Joseph saw Ephraim's children of the third generation: the children also of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were brought up upon Joseph's knees' (Gen. l. 23). The fact is that, while there were but few links between Jacob and certain of those that departed from Egypt, to the mass of the people there were many links; as we find it expressly stated in regard to Joshua (1 Chron. vii. 20-27). The same thing happens continually now-a-days. The great-grandfather of the present writer was born nearly two centuries ago; but who would be so simple as to conclude from this fact that there are only three or four generations in 200 years?

The population of Israel increased largely after their settlement in Canaan. We have no account for a long time of a regular census of the nation. But it is clear that at least partial enumerations were not unfrequently made. For among the lists of pedigrees we find the number of males in different tribes, at various periods (v. 18, vii. 1-11, 40); and something of the kind we gather from incidental notices, scattered here and there through the history, of the size of armies, and of the amount of persons killed in battle (e.g. Judges xii. 6, xx. 2, 15, 44-47; 1 Sam. xi. 8, xv. 4). David, however, resolved to number his people. His census was unauthorized, and undertaken in a proud vain-glorious temper. Hence he was punished by a special judgment from the Lord. According to this census the population of Israel was 800,000 males of military age, of Judah 500,000 (2 Sam. xxiv. 9). The numbers are differently given elsewhere (1 Chron. xxi. 5). Israel 1,100,000, Judah 470,000; and Levi and Benjamin were not reckoned. The apparent discrepancy between the two accounts has been explained by the supposition that the troops, in monthly rotation as guards, with a body attendant on the princes of the tribes, in all 300,000 (probably the regular army), are in the one case omitted, in the other reckoned to Israel; while a corps of observation, 30,000, on the Philistine frontier, is similarly to be added to or abstracted from Judah. See Horne's Introd., ed. Ayre, vol. ii.

pp. 462, 463. Solomon numbered the strangers or remnant of the Canaanitish nations. The census of them (the males able-bodied for service as of Israel) gave 153,600. Reckoning the persons so numbered at one-fourth of the whole population, there would be of Israelites 6,280,000, and the total with the strangers would reach to 6,894,400.

Similar enumerations must have been made afterwards; as we find repeatedly statements of the numbers able to bear arms in Judah. Thus, Abijah had 400,000 in his kingdom; while Jeroboam, in Israel, had 800,000 (2 Chron. xiii. 3). Not, we may suppose, that all these were absolutely mustered, but they were the available numbers from whom armies might be drawn. It is true that, in the campaign between Abijah and Jeroboam, 500,000 of Israel are said to have perished (17). Possibly there may be an error in this number: some versions unquestionably give only 50,000. Or it may be that by the ravages of war Israel was so depopulated that, instead of 800,000, there remained but 300,000 fit for military service. Certain it is that subsequently the Israelitish armies, so far as we gather from occasional statements of their numbers, seem to have been far less than those that could be raised by Judah.

The population of Judah was greatest in the reign of Jehoshaphat. The number of men in his kingdom fit for military service was 1,160,000, besides some troops in garrisons. It must be remembered that the kingdom of Judah was consolidated and gradually extended over the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin. Multitudes flocked in from the northern kingdom, weakening it and strengthening Judah (xi. 13, 14, 16, 17); and this influx continued to such an extent as to alarm the kings of Israel, so that Baasha attempted, by fortifying Ramah, to check it. Besides, as Simeon's portion was in that of Judah, much of Simeon would be appropriated; and we also find Danite towns in the hands of the southern monarch—as Zorah, Ajalon (Josh. xix. 41, 42; 2 Chron. xi. 10; xxviii. 18). Perhaps, also, Jehoshaphat's census rolls included Edom, which was subject to him. These facts will tend to explain the superior populousness of Judah.

It has been urged, however, that the reports which show numbers so large must be exaggerated. In answer to which it may be said that the whole area of Palestine (Kiepert, Bibel-Atlas) is reckoned at 13,620 square miles. Some deduction might have to be made for the coast territory of the Philistines; but this would leave the country as large as the sum of our six northern counties, Northumberland, Durham, Westmorland, Cumberland, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, 12,965 square miles. Some of these counties are but thinly populated; yet the census of 1861 gave a total of 5,579,943 inhabitants in them. The increase in ten years was nearly a million; and who would be surprised if in ten years more another million were added to the present mass? There is no reason, therefore, to imagine that the scripture account of the population of Palestine is incredible.

The inhabitants of the country diminished, as their sins provoked the Lord to punish them by the incursions of neighbouring states. The northern kingdom was reduced most rapidly, as it was continually harassed by Syria; and portions of its territory were laid waste or appropriated by the Syrian kings. Some writers have been led into the mistake of attributing to it an excessive decline by confounding armies actually in the field with the population fit for military service. Thus the state of Israel under Ahab has been contrasted with that of Judah under Jehoshaphat, and the 7,000 of one (1 Kings xx. 15) set over-against the 1,160,000 of the other. Jehoshaphat, it must be repeated, never actually raised an army of this strength; and the 7,000 of Ahab were merely the garrison of a besieged town.

It is not needful to chronicle all the statements of numbers which may be found in Israelitish history (e.g. 2 Kings xiii. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 5, 6, xxvi. 11-13, xxviii. 6, 8). The northern kingdom was destroyed; and Judah must have been greatly weakened before the great catastrophe of the taking of Jerusalem. Some lists are given of those who were deported at various times (2 Kings xxiv. 14, 16, xxv. 11, 12; Jer. lii. 28-30). We have the enumeration also of those who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel and Ezra (Ezra ii. 1-67, viii. 1-20; Neh. vii. 6-68).

Afterwards we do not hear of any census: but the population of the country was doubtless large under the Persian and Syrian rule, and when the Jews had re-established their independence. In our Lord's time it appears to have been crowded with populous towns and villages; and the multitude of those who perished in the last war with the Romans was, after all the deductions which can fairly be made for the exaggeration of historians, unquestionably very large. And, though the Holy Land is now thinly peopled, and in large tracts uncultivated, yet there are still evident traces of a great population in ancient times, and proofs that the soil was fertile enough to sustain very many inhabitants.

Attempts have been made to estimate the number of the Jews at the present time. But, dispersed as they are through all countries of the world, it is manifest that any calculation must be very vague. Some have reckoned them at four, five, or six millions. In England they are very few. The census of 1851 did not give their actual numbers, but it showed that they had 53 synagogues, accommodating only 8,438 worshippers.

CHAFF. The husk of the wheat separated from the grain by winnowing, which was accomplished by throwing it up against the wind. The heavier grains of corn fell down: the lighter chaff was blown away. Hence an expressive image to describe the wicked as swept off by the breath of God's displeasure (Psal. i. 4, xxxv. 5). But the word translated chaff in Isai. v. 24, xxxiii. 11 is rather dry grass or hay, and that in Jer. xxiii. 28 is straw chopped into small pieces. The Chaldee word (Dan. ii. 35) for chaff means a bit of straw or chaff which flies into the eye and blinds it. In Matt. iii. 12; Luke iii. 17, the straw chiefly, or the whole refuse, is intended.

CHAIN. Chains were anciently worn as marks of dignity or official distinction, as they are still among ourselves. Thus Joseph was invested with a gold chain (Gen. xli. 42). Egyptians of rank wore 'a gold chain resembling a string, to which generally a stone scarabæus was appended. The same ornament, the torques of the Romans, and the torc of the Britons and ancient Irish, was worn by the noble Persians and Gauls, by the Celtic tribes, and other Asiatic and European nations, even in battles; and it often formed one of the chief parts of the spoil of the victorious army: soldiers received a neck-chain for their valour' (Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 650). The principal judge also, in Egypt, wore a chain of gold, to which was attached a jewelled image of Truth. So Daniel received a gold chain from Belshazzar when appointed third ruler in the kingdom (Dan. vi. 7, 16, 29). Chains were, moreover, used as ornaments both by men and women (Prov. i. 9; Sol. Song i. 10). The chain mentioned in Ezek. xvi. 11 was for ornament, and not, as a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible says, 'the symbol of sovereignty.' There were also step-chains, ornaments for the legs: see ANKLETS; and from the neck-chains various trinkets were suspended, such as pieces of metal in a crescent shape (Isai. iii. 18), which were sometimes put upon the necks of camels (Judges viii. 21, 26). Often neck-chains consisted of pearls, pieces of coral, &c. on a string. Chains were employed, further, for sacred purposes, as in the dress of the high priest (Exod. xxviii. 14, 22, xxxix. 15-18). And so in the construction of idols (Isai. xl. 19): 'In many of the Egyptian idols holes are found, through which chains passed for the purpose of suspending them on the wall' (Henderson, Isaiah, p. 324). Chains, again, were used for the security of prisoners (Judges xvi. 21; 2 Sam. iii. 34; 2 Kings xxv. 7; Jer. xxxix. 7, lii. 11). These were probably fetters, connected by a chain, upon the ankles. Handcuffs were also put on captives (xl. 4). The Roman custom was to handcuff a prisoner, attaching him by a chain to one or two guards (Acts xii. 6, 7, xxi. 33, xxviii. 16, 20; 2 Tim. i. 16).

Chain is sometimes employed metaphorically to express tribulation (Lam. iii. 7).

CHALCEDONY. One of the stones described as forming the foundation of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19). Chalcedony is ordinarily understood to be a species of agate, milky white or pale yellow, often with a wavy internal structure. But opinions differ as to the exact character of the stone so called. Some liken it in colour and want of transparency to skimmed milk. Another description represents it as of the colour of a pale flame, shining out of doors, obscure in a house, not easily cut, and attributes to it the power of attracting light substances. Also it has been supposed to be turquoise, carbuncle, or ruby, or an inferior kind of emerald. The origin of the name is uncertain: see Schleusner's Lexicon sub voce.

CHAL'COOL (sustenance) (1 Kings iv. 31): see CALCOL.

CHALDE'A. A celebrated eastern country. Originally it was but a small district which bore this name, the southern part of Babylonia, lying almost entirely on the right bank of the Euphrates. There is some difficulty in determining whence Chaldea derived its appellation. The Hebrew word Chasdim is used both for the people and for the country which they inhabited; though more frequently the latter is termed the 'land of the Chasdim' or 'Chaldeans' (e.g. Jer. xxv. 12). Some have imagined this tribe descendants of Chesed, the son of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 22). Dr. Kalisch inclines to this opinion, believing them a Shemitic nomad race who led a predatory life, 'in the parts of Arabia Deserta, bordering on the southern course of the Euphrates almost down to the Persian gulf,' generally occupying part of the Babylonian territory, and possibly also districts in the north-east of the Euphrates. And, though 'Ur of the Chaldees' is mentioned at an earlier period, Kalisch supposes that this was so called by anticipation (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 450, 451). It seems, however, more probable that this people were of Cushite origin, and that their primitive seat was in that mountainous region which is now occupied by the Kurds (whose name has been thought identical with theirs; as Gesenius suggests that the original form of Chasdi was Chardi). Under the Assyrian sway they may be thought to have migrated into Mesopotamia and Babylonia, which they afterwards mastered (see Isai. xcviii. 13, and Henderson's remarks thereon, Isaiah, p. 210). Rawlinson (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 292) would connect Chaldea with Kabvadaha, which he thinks the Chilmad of Ezek. xxvii. 23. The derivation of the Chaldeans from Arphaxad (Gen. x. 22) is very fanciful.

Chaldea, in its wider scriptural sense, must be taken to include the alluvial plain watered by the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, bounded on the east by the last-named stream, but extending across the Euphrates westward to Arabia, and from the Persian gulf running northward to about the 34th degree of latitude. This region was probably 400 miles in length, with an average breadth of 100. Early Chaldean kings are mentioned in the deciphered inscriptions; but it was not till a comparatively-late period that this people obtained imperial power, under Nabopolassar, who conquered Assyria, and founded the Chaldean dynasty of the kings of Babylon 625, B.C. Thenceforward the land of the Chaldeans comprised all Babylonia; and the Chaldeo-Babylonian empire extended widely its sway, till ultimately it fell before the arms of Cyrus.

This country was heretofore most rich and productive. The greatest industry was employed in its irrigation. Many large canals were constructed with smaller branches, draining the marshy lands, and conveying water wherever needed. Thus the natural fertility of the soil, in which wheat, barley, &c. are said to have grown wild, was abundantly augmented; and the return to the sower has been asserted to be 200 or 300 fold. Palm-trees were abundant, and various other natural productions. And, as the land was fertile, so the population was large. Here were the greatest cities of antiquity, the teeming hives of men, 'Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh' (Gen. x. 10), and numerous others, the sites of which, many of them having been identified, are indicated by extensive heaps. But now this once-fruitful land is little better than a desolate waste. Parts of it are dry and barren for want of water; and parts are dismal marshes. There is little cultivation; the inhabitants subsisting mainly on the dates yielded by the palm-trees which grow near the rivers.

A late traveller has graphically described the contrast. 'In former days,' says Mr. Loftus, 'the vast plains of Babylon were nourished by a complicated system of canals and water-courses, which spread over the surface of the country like a net-work. The wants of a teeming population were supplied by a rich soil, not less bountiful than that on the banks of the Egyptian Nile. Like islands rising from a golden sea of waving corn stood frequent groves of palm-trees and pleasant gardens, affording to the idler or traveller their grateful and highly-valued shade. Crowds of passengers hurried along the dusty roads to and from the busy city. The land was rich in corn and wine. How changed is the aspect of that region at the present day! Long lines of mounds, it is true, mark the courses of those main arteries which formerly diffused life and vegetation along their banks; but their channels are now bereft of moisture and choked with drifted sand: the smaller offshoots are wholly effaced. "A drought is upon her waters," says the prophet; "and they shall be dried up." All that remains of that ancient civilization, that "glory of kingdoms," "the praise of the whole earth," is recognizable in the numerous mouldering heaps of brick and rubbish which overspread the surface of the plain. Instead of the luxuriant fields, the groves, and gardens, nothing now meets the eye but an arid waste: the dense population of former times is vanished; and no man dwells there' (Chaldea, pp. 14, 15).

CHALDE'ANS (Isai. xxiii. 13, and elsewhere). The inhabitants of Chaldea, and so for the most part to be understood in scripture. It would seem (see the preceding article) that the Cushite tribe, originally so designated, were located in the southern region of Babylonia, and that the name came by degrees to include other neighbouring tribes, till it was commensurate with what was ultimately called Chaldea. Still the whole of the ancient Cushite language was retained as a literary and sacred tongue. So that those who acquired the learning of the Chaldeans studied it in this language (Dan. i. 4). Hence, by a very natural mode of speaking, persons who were proficient in such studies came to be specially termed Chaldeans; and in this sense we find the name continually used in the book of Daniel (e.g. ii. 2, 4, 10) as synonymous with Magi, or astrologers; and Daniel himself is called the 'master of the Chaldeans' (v. 11). The studies they pursued were probably at first astronomy and the kindred sciences, which afterwards degenerated into mere sorcery or soothsaying, so that the name of Chaldean was used by way of reproach. They appear to have been gathered into schools or academies, of which the principal seats were Babylon, Ur, Borsippa, &c.

CHALDEES (Gen. xi. 28, and elsewhere). See CHALDEANS.

CHALK STONES (Isai. xxvii. 9). Stones of lime.

CHAMBER, CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY. In one of the visions of Ezekiel we find that the prophet, having seen various idolatries committed at Jerusalem, was directed to break through a wall in the court of the temple. He then discovered a door into a secret chamber, which he found on entering was closed against the sun-light, but no doubt illumined by lamps. On the walls of this he found portrayed beasts and reptiles of every kind; and before them were seventy elders of Israel, each man with a censor in his hand burning incense to the honour of these abominable things. No wonder that the wrath of God was kindled against those who worshipped in such 'chambers of imagery' (Ezek. viii. 7-12).

The description applies exactly to the inner chambers and sanctuaries of the Egyptian cells and tombs and temples. 'The walls,' says Dr. Kitto, 'are covered with representations, sculptured or painted in vivid colours, of sacred animals, and of gods represented in the human form, and under various circumstances, or in various monstrous combinations of the animal and human forms.' And, in illustration of the prophet's narrative, he quotes, from Madden's Travels in Turkey, Egypt, &c., an account of the exploration of the great temple at Edfou, over which, it seems, a village has been built. An old man, who had received medical help from the traveller, showed him, in return, a secret passage. 'Considerably below the surface of the adjoining buildings, he pointed out to me a chink in an old wall, which he told me I should creep through on my hands and feet: the aperture was not two feet and a half high, and scarcely three feet and a half broad: my companion had the courage to enter first, thrusting in a lamp before him. I followed. . . After proceeding about ten yards in utter darkness, the heat became excessive: breathing was laborious: the perspiration poured down my face; and I would have given the world to have got out; but my companion, whose person I could not distinguish, though his voice was audible, called out to me to crawl a few feet farther, and that I should find plenty of space. I joined him at length, and had the inexpressible satisfaction of standing once more on my feet. We found ourselves in a splendid apartment of great magnitude, adorned with sacred paintings and hieroglyphics' (Pict. Bible, note on Ezek. viii. 10).

CHAMBERLAIN. The word so translated in Esth. i. 10, 15, ii. 3, 14, 15, 21, iv. 5, vi. 2, vii. 9 properly signifies an eunuch, and it is sometimes thus rendered in the margin. Eunuchs were employed in various offices in oriental courts; and it may be, that the word came occasionally to signify an officer, without reference to its original meaning. The 'chamberlain' of Acts xii. 20 corresponds in some degree to a lord of the bed-chamber with us; while Erastus, 'the chamberlain of the city' (Rom. xvi. 23), was the public treasurer.

CHAMELEON. One of the animals, the flesh of which was not to be eaten (Lev. xi. 30). The original word signifies strength: this, therefore, is probably the large strong lizard, Lacerta Nilotica, sometimes found in Palestine.

CHAMOIS (Deut. xiv. 5). An animal, the flesh of which might be eaten. It is generally supposed to be a species of deer or antelope. But Kitto (Pict. Bible, note on Deut. xiv. 5) is inclined to identify it with the wild sheep, or sheep-like goat, Ovis tragelaphus, well known in Arabia, Egypt, and throughout northern Africa, where it bears the name of kebsch. This is often represented in the Egyptian monuments. It is not more bulky than a sheep, but it stands higher, and is covered with fine rufous hair, while the throat, breast, and upper part of the fore-legs, are enveloped in a mass of the same kind of hair, so long as to give the animal the appearance of being bearded.

CHA'NAAN (Acts vii. 11, xiii. 19). See CANAAN.

CHA'NAANITE, for Canaanite (Judith v. 16).

CHANCE (1 Sam. vi. 9). A word used by the Philistine priests and diviners, ignorant of the guiding providence of God. Properly speaking, nothing occurs by chance; but the expression sometimes occurs in a popular and unobjectionable sense (Eccles. ix. 11; Luke x. 31).

CHANCELLOR. A title given to the Persian governor in Samaria (Ezra iv. 8, 9, 17). The literal meaning of it is 'lord of judgment.'

CHANEL-BONE (Job xxxi. 22, marg.). This is in the text simply 'the bone:' that bone of the upper arm which is above the elbow is intended.

CHA'NOCH (Gen. iv. 17, marg.). See ENOCH.

CHANNUNUS (1 Esdr. viii. 48).

CHANT (Amos vi. 5). See MUSIC. But the word here rendered 'chant' means rather chatter, spoken contemptuously.

CHAPEL. Beth-el is called 'the king's chapel' in Amos vii. 13. It was one of the seats of the idolatrous worship of the calves (1 Kings xii. 28, 29).

CHAPTER. There are three Hebrew words translated 'chapter,' the first signifying something which surrounds; the second an ornament; the third is the ordinary word for head or top. It is the upper part of a pillar, answering to what is now called the capital, or a kind of moulding round the top of a column or utensil, probably carved into the representation of flowers or fruits (Exod. xxxvi. 38, xxxviii. 17, 19, 28; 1 Kings vii. 16-20; 2 Kings xxv. 17; 2 Chron. iii. 15, iv. 12, 13). The 'pommels' of the chapters were convex projections or mouldings.

CHARAATH'ALAR (1 Esdr. v. 36).

CHAR'ACA (2 Macc. xii. 17).

CHARA'SHIM (craftsmen). A valley so called (1 Chron. iv. 14). In Neh. xi. 35 the word is translated. It would seem to be near Lod (Lydda), to the east of Jaffa.

CHAR'CHAMIS (1 Esdr. i. 25).

CHAR'CHEMISH (2 Chron. xxxv. 20). See CARCHEMISH.

CHAR'CUS (1 Esdr. v. 32). A corruption of Barkos (Ezra ii. 53).

CHAR'EEA (1 Esdr. v. 32).

CHARGER. The Hebrew word so translated in Numb. vii. 13, &c., is derived from a root signifying depth. These chargers, therefore, must have been deep vessels. The same word is also rendered 'dishes' (Exod. xxv. 29, xxxvii. 16). A different word is used in Ezra i. 9: the chargers here were perhaps more shallow, slaughter-vessels, to receive the blood of victims. The charger in which John Baptist's head was placed (Matt. xiv. 8, 11; Mark vi. 25, 28) was probably a dish or trencher.

CHARIOT. Several Hebrew words occur which are rendered 'chariots' in our version: some may be taken to include the horses. Chariots were used both for war, and also on occasions of state, and for ordinary conveyance from one place to another. The following supply examples of the latter uses (1 Sam. viii. 11; 2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 Kings xii. 18, xviii. 44, 45; Isai. xxii. 18). Chariots, too, there were in idol-worship; since we read that Josiah removed the horses and burnt the chariots of the sun—the superstition having probably been derived from the Assyrians (2 Kings xxiii. 11), among whom, as among other nations, it was practised (see Kell, Comm. on Kings, transl. vol. ii. p. 148). The use of chariots among the Egyptians, Syrians, and Ethiopians, for peaceful purposes, is noted in several places (Gen. xli. 43, xli. 29, l. 9; 2 Kings v. 9; Acts viii. 28). They were war-chariots with which the Egyptians pursued the Israelites (Exod. xv. 6-26; and we read of the Canaanitish nations similarly possessing war-chariots, perhaps armed with scythes; of the Philistines also, the Syrians, Ethiopians, Assyrians, and Persians (Josh. xvii. 16, 18; Judges i. 19, iv. 3; 1 Sam. xiii. 5; 2 Sam. x. 18; 1 Kings xx. 21, xxii. 31; 2 Kings xix. 23; 2 Chron. xii. 3, xv. 9; Isai. xxii. 6; Ezek. xxiii. 24). The Israelites had no war-chariots till the time of David (2 Sam.

viii. 4). Solomon increased the numbers of them (1 Kings x. 26); and we find them afterwards in general use (xxii. 24; 2 Kings ix. 16, 21, 27, 28, xiii. 7, xxiii. 30). See ARMY. In Solomon's reign chariots were imported from Egypt; the price of one being 600 shekels of silver (1 Kings x. 29), to which there possibly may be a reference in Isai. xxxi. 1. An Israelitish chariot, therefore, no doubt, resembled one of Egypt; which is described as an almost semi-circular wooden frame with straightened sides, resting posteriorly on the axle of a pair of wheels; a rail of wood or ivory being attached to the frame by leathern thongs, and a wooden upright in front. The back of the car was open, and the sides were strengthened and embellished with leather and metal binding: the floor was of rope network, to give a springy footing to the occupants. On the off-side were the bow-case, sometimes the quiver, and spear-case, crossing diagonally, the last-named inclined backwards. If two warriors were in the chariot, there was a second bow-case. The wheels had usually six spokes, fastened to the axle by a lynch-pin, secured by a thong. The horses had a breast-band and girths attached to the saddle, but were without traces. They wore head-furniture, often ornamented, with a bearing-rein. The driving-reins passed through rings on each side of both horses. Two persons generally were in a chariot; but there was sometimes a third, holding the umbrella of state (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. vol. i. pp. 335-359, vol. iii. pp. 178, 179). The Assyrian war-chariots were nearly similar: sometimes a third horse was attached; but in later times this was laid aside; the chariot was made higher, and the quiver placed in front instead of on the side (Layard, Nineveh, vol. ii. p. 350, 352).

CHARITY. This word has come popularly to signify almsgiving. But, though this is a duty frequently inculcated in scripture, the term 'charity' in such passages as 1 Cor. xiii. signifies something more. In the elder English versions it was 'love.' And love, indeed, is meant, that high Christian love, of which the love of God in Christ is the source and pattern, and which is exhibited in beautiful and tender concern for the welfare of those around us (1 John iii. 16, iv. 11, 16, 20, 21).

CHARMIS (Judith v. 15, viii. 10, x. 6).

CHAR'AN (Acts vii. 2, 4). See HARAN.

CHAS'EB (1 Esdr. v. 31).

CHA'VAH (Gen. iii. 20, marg.). A form of EVE, which see.

CHE'BAR (length). A river in Babylonia, on the banks of which some of the Jewish captives were located (Ezek. i. 1, 3, iii. 15, 23, x. 15, 20, 22, xliii. 3). This is by many supposed to be the Chaboras, now the Khabour, which flowed into the Euphrates at Circesium. But it has been also thought, and perhaps with more reason, that the Chebar was the Nahr Malcha, or royal canal of Nebuchadnezzar, in the cutting of which the exiles were, it is likely, employed.

CHE'BEL. A Hebrew word, signifying ordinarily a rope or cord (Josh. ii. 15); hence a band or string of men (1 Sam. x. 5, 10); see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 298. It is also used for the line of sea-coast, and is the term always applied to the region of Argob, surrounded or girt, as it were, with a definite boundary like the coast-line. See ARGOB.

CHEDOR-LA'OMER (handful of sheaves). A king of Elam, who in the time of Abraham, uniting with other chiefs, subjected the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah and neighbouring kings. After some time they rebelled, but were totally defeated by Chedor-laomer, who, having carried away Lot, was in turn defeated, and perhaps slain by Abraham (Gen. xiv. 1-17). In the monumental records of Babylonia mention has been found of a king, apparently of Elamitic origin, who was paramount in that country about the time of Abraham, and whose name seems identical with at least the first part of Chedor-laomer. He bears, too, the significant title of Apda Martu, 'Ravager of the West.' See Rawlinson, Hist. Evid. of the truth of the Scripture Records, lect. ii. pp. 56, 57; and note. Later researches, however, would seem to render the identification questionable.

CHEEK. Smiting upon the cheek was regarded by the Hebrews as a great indignity (1 Kings xxii. 24; 2 Chron. xviii. 23; Job xvi. 10; Lam. iii. 30; Mic. v. 1; Matt. v. 39; Luke vi. 29).

CHEE'NETH (Ezra iv. 10, marg.). In the text this word is rendered 'at such a time.' It is a formula probably implying 'and so forth.'

CHEESE. The cheese at present made in the east is of very indifferent quality: it is best when new and soft, as it soon becomes hard and dry. Cheeses are formed into small cakes, white in colour, and exceedingly salt. In scripture we find cheese mentioned three times, as the translation of three different Hebrew words. The first means a cutting (1 Sam. xvii. 18), 'ten sections of curds,' soft cheese. The second is derived from a root signifying to scrape (2 Sam. xvii. 29): the cheese, if cheese it was, was grated and pounded fine. The third implies curdled milk (Job x. 10). Perhaps this cheese was coagulated buttermilk.

CHE'LAL (perfection). A man who had taken a strange wife (Ezra x. 30).

CHEL'CI'AS. 1. (Bar. i. 1).—2. (6) A corrupt form of Hilkiah, the high priest in Josiah's time.—3. The father of Susanna (Hist. Sus. 2, 29, 63).

CHELLIANS (Judith ii. 23). Inhabitants of Chellus.

CHEL'LUH (completed, consumed). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 35).

CHEL'LUS (Judith i. 9). A place to the west of the Jordan; its exact position can only be conjectured.

CHE'LOD (Judith i. 6).

CHE'LUB (a trap-cage, a basket). 1. One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 11).—2. The father of Ezri, one of David's officers (1 Chron. xxvii. 26).

CHELU'BAI (perhaps dog). A son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 9), identical with Caleb (18, 42).

CHEMA'RIM, CHEMA'RIMS (those who go about in black, ascetics. But see Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl. vol. ii. pp. 143, 144). A name which appears to be restricted to the priests of idol-worship (2 Kings xxiii. 5, marg.; Hos. x. 5, marg.; Zeph. i. 4), the non-Levitical priests who sacrificed to the calves of Jeroboam, and on the forbidden high places.

CHE'MOSH (subduer). The national god of the Moabites, who are sometimes called 'the people of Chemosh' (Numb. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 7, 13, 46). He was worshipped also by the Ammonites (Judges xi. 24). Solomon built a high place for Chemosh near to Jerusalem (1 Kings xi. 7, 33), which was defiled by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 13). There are various conjectures concerning this false god; some identifying him with Mars, others with Saturn.

CHE'NAAN (Gen. ix. 18, marg.). See CANAAN.

CHENA'ANAH (merchant, a feminine form).—1. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah (1 Kings xxii. 11, 24; 2 Chron. xviii. 10, 23).—2. A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 10).

CHENA'NI (protector, or perhaps a contracted form of Chenaniah). A Levite (Neh. ix. 4).

CHENANI'AH (whom Jehovah hath set). A chief among the Levites (1 Chron. xv. 22, 27, xxvi. 29). The spelling varies in the Hebrew.

CHE'PHAR-HAAMMO'NAI (village of the Ammonites). A place in the tribe of Benjamin, possibly built or occupied by the Ammonites in some incursion (Josh. xviii. 24).

CHEPHIRAH (village). One of the Gibeonite towns (Josh. ix. 17), which was afterwards assigned to Benjamin (xviii. 26). See Ezra ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29. It is identical with the modern Kefir.

CHE'РАН (tyre). A son of a Horite chief (Gen. xxxvi. 26; 1 Chron. i. 41).

CHE'REAS (2 Macc. x. 32, 37).

CHE'ETHIMS (Cretans?) These are mentioned in connection with the Philistines (Ezek. xxv. 16). They are identical with the Cherethites (1 Sam. xxx. 14; Zeph. ii. 5), and seem to have been located in the south of Palestine near the sea-coast.

CHE'ETHITES and PEL'ETHITES (executioners and couriers). The body-guard of David were called Cherethites and Peluthites, either as collected during his residence in Philistia [see CHE'ETHIMS], or, according to the derivation given, because they were employed in fulfilling the royal mandates (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18, xx. 7, 23; 1 Kings i. 38, 44; 1 Chron. xviii. 17). They are sometimes mentioned with the Gittites, who came after David from Gath.

CHE'WITH (a cutting, separation). A brook by which Elijah was directed to hide himself during the first part of the three years' drought (1 Kings xvii. 3-7). Robinson identifies it with Wady Kelt, behind Jericho. Others suppose it to be the east of the Jordan.

CHE'UB, CHER'UBIM (strong, a warder: various other meanings have been proposed). These beings are first mentioned in the narrative of the fall of man, where they are said to have been placed 'at the east of the garden of Eden' (Gen. iii. 24). They are afterwards spoken of either as living creatures, or as sculptured or painted figures. Thus, cherubim were represented in both the tabernacle and the temple. When the sacred ark was made, attached to the two ends of the mercy-seat or cover of it, were cherubim of beaten gold (Exod. xxv. 17-22, xxxvii. 6-9). Whether these were preserved till the time when the ark was placed in the temple, or whether those larger ones which Solomon made 'within the oracle' of wood overlaid with gold (1 Kings vi. 23-28), were intended to re-place them, has been questioned. The probability is that the cherubim of Solomon were additional. Each cherub over the ark lifted his wings on high: his face was inwards toward his fellow, bending down to the mercy-seat (Exod. xxv. 17-22, xxxvii. 6-9). Hence, as the symbolic presence of the Lord was upon the mercy-seat, He is often described and addressed as dwelling between the cherubim (Numb. vii. 89; 1 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Kings xix. 15; Psal. lxxx. 1; Isai. xxxvii. 16; Heb. ix. 5). On the curtains, also, of the tabernacle cherubim were represented (Exod. xxvi. 1, xxxvi. 8); and on the walls and doors of the temple were carved figures of them (1 Kings vi. 29, 32, 35; they appear, too, with the symbolic oxen and lions on certain articles of the temple furniture (vii. 29, 36). We further find an appearance of cherubim in the vision vouchsafed to Ezekiel, which was in some degree a manifestation of the divine glory. Four living creatures are described with a marvellous intercommunication of wheels and four-fold faces; and they are repeatedly termed cherubim (Ezek. i., x., xi. 22). St. John, too, beheld heaven opened, and One sitting in majesty upon a throne; and amid his train were four living creatures (unfortunately in our translation rendered 'beasts'). We can have no difficulty in identifying these with the cherubim of Ezekiel, though the name is not applied to them. There is the four-fold face, and the multitude of eyes, which had marked the living ones of the earlier visions (Rev. iv. 6-8).

Cherubim, then, appear when God's majesty shines forth. The flaming sword, whatever that was, that kept the tree of life, had attendant cherubim. So, when God would sensibly reveal himself, either as sitting in the solitude of the most holy place, or as commissioning a prophet, or disclosing the secrets of the upper sanctuary, there, we find it recorded, are the cherubim. And we may well suppose that the glorious creatures whom Isaiah saw ministering before Jehovah were, though denominated 'seraphim' (Isai. vi. 1-7), the same beings.

When Moses was commanded to make the cherubim of gold, no minute description was given of their shape; nor are those figured on the hangings of the tabernacle, or the walls of the temple, described. It may be that the form was so well known that description was unnecessary; or it may more probably be that there was some deep mystery, and that human lips were not to utter, nor human pens to delineate, the marvellous conformation of those exalted beings. And the expression of Ezekiel: 'I knew that they were the cherubims' (Ezek. x. 20) may be taken to indicate that, but for a divine illumination, he would not have recognized them.

Animal forms were in some measure introduced. But it is remarkable that, when the four faces are mentioned, and one is said to be that of a man, one that of a lion, and another that of an eagle, one is described as 'the face of a cherub,' the corresponding description being 'the face of an ox' and the likeness of 'a calf' (i. 10, x. 14; Rev. iv. 7). Was there, then, any resemblance to those winged bulls, with which the process of Assyrian excavation has made us familiar? Little can be said in reply to such a question, save that God is not likely to have borrowed the adornments of his sanctuary from heathens. Symbols, indeed, he does use, common to various nations; but it is because they have been naturally fitted to convey certain ideas. So that, if there be a likeness in the cherubim of glory to the Egyptian or Assyrian sculptures, we are by no means to infer that these last were patterns which the former followed. Rather we may believe that heathen nations derived many of their ideas, and stories, and representations from Hebrew sources, or from that ancient tradition of the original fathers of mankind, which was continued, though debased and distorted, in so many lines of their posterity.

Instead of curiously speculating on the cherubic figures, we may better employ ourselves in enquiring what they were meant to symbolize. Most discordant have been the views of different critics. Laying aside those which would give the cherubim a mere mythic character, it may be remarked that some see in them a representation of the Trinity; some the embodiment of the divine attributes; while others regard them as intended not to image the Creator, but the Creator's manifested glory (see Fairbairn, Typol. of Script. book ii. chap. 2, vol. i. pp. 241-247). There are objections to all these views. As God is said to dwell between the cherubim, they could hardly symbolize the Deity himself; neither do we find any worship ever paid them, so that they could by no means have been regarded as embodying the idea of the Godhead.

We must consider what the figures, so far as they are described to us, would naturally indicate. The predominating form is that of man (Ezek. i. 5, 8, 10), erect in posture, joining intelligently in the praises of God (Rev. iv. 8). Besides, there were the characteristics of certain animals, the lion, the ox, and the eagle. And of these the Jewish proverb says: 'Four are the highest in the world—the lion among wild beasts, the ox among tame cattle, the eagle among birds, man among all (creatures); but God is supreme over all. 'The meaning is,' says Dr. Fairbairn, 'that in these four kinds are exhibited the highest forms of creature-life on earth; but that God is still infinitely exalted above these . . . So that a creature compounded of all these—bearing in its general shape and structure the lineaments of a man, but associating with the human the appearance and properties also of the three next highest orders of animal existence—might seem a kind of concrete manifestation of created life on earth, a sort of personified creaturehood' (p. 225). Dr. Fairbairn concludes, from the nature of this compounded form, man, the centre of the whole, augmented with the highest attributes of other creatures, the lion, the eagle, the ox, peerless strength, king-like motion, productive energy, that human beings in a nobler grade, instinct with the highest and most perfect life, the life of God in the soul, must have been symbolized by the cherubim. And he sees hence an admirable fitness in their being placed in the garden of paradise, when Adam and Eve had been driven thence for their sin, not merely by way of defence, or for a token of exclusion, as the flaming sword of terror, but more chiefly to hold, as it were, paradise in pledge, affording the sure hope that men, quickened and purified and exalted, would again be placed as denizens there, to eat of its tree of life, and drink of its crystal streams. In the sanctuary, too, God dwelt between the cherubim, so regarded, as a covenant God. It was shown that spiritual and holy life must be the characteristic of those who are admitted to his immediate presence; a most instructive lesson being thereby read as to the necessary disposition and nature of men in whom and among whom the glorious Lord will walk and dwell. Impurity he cannot abide. The common notion of the cherubim being the support of Jehovah's throne finds little authority in scripture. It is true that God is represented as riding upon a cherub (Psal. xviii. 10), and that (Ezek. i. 26, x. 1) his throne is placed in or above the firmament over the heads of the cherubim. But for this there was a reason. The manifestations were not, as in the tabernacle and the temple, for mercy, but for judgment: creatures therefore were properly then beneath the feet of the divine Avenger. Dr. Fairbairn sums up his opinion in the following words. 'The cherubim were in their very nature and design artificial and temporary forms of being. . . They were set up for representations to the eye of faith of earth's living creaturehood, and more especially of its rational and immortal though fallen head, with reference to the better hopes and destiny in prospect. From the very first they gave promise of a restored condition to the fallen; and by the use afterwards made of them the light became clearer and more distinct. By their designations, the position assigned them, the actions from time to time ascribed to them, as well as their own peculiar structure, it was intimated that the good in prospect should be secured, not at the expense of, but in perfect consistence with, the claims of God's righteousness; that restoration to the holiness must precede restoration to the blessedness of life; and that only by being made capable of dwelling beside the presence of the only Wise and Good could man hope to have his portion of felicity recovered. But all this, they further betokened, it was in God's purpose to have accomplished, and in the process to raise humanity to a higher than its original destination, in its standing nearer to God, and greatly ennobled in its powers of life and capacities of working' (pp. 240, 241).

Dr. Fairbairn's views are entitled to great deference. But one of the proofs on which he relies as showing that the cherubim were distinct from angels must not be pressed. In our version, according to the received text, the living ones, identical with cherubim, are represented as giving thanks for their own redemption (Rev. v. 9, 10). There is great probability that the true reading of the passage does not include them among the redeemed by blood. Perhaps, therefore, though on a subject so mysterious it is most unbecoming to dogmatize, angelic creatures are symbolized. They, when man was expelled from Eden, kept the way of the tree of life, for they are ministering spirits for man's behoof (Heb. i. 14); they bent reverently upon the mercy-seat, for they desire to look into the wondrous plans of covenant mercy made for man's redemption: their ministrations the Lord made use of when he would commission his prophets, for his dispensations were ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator (Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2): they raise the jubilant song of adoring praise for man's redemption; for is there not joy among them over every sinner that repenteth (Luke xv. 10)? The lessons of instruction that Dr. Fairbairn deduces on his supposition are well-nigh as forcible on this, since there will be one day but one large assembly, 'just men made perfect' with the 'innumerable company of angels' (Heb. xii. 22, 23); and through all that vast congregation and in every member of it the tokens of condescending love are seen, in that the Highest deigns to dwell with and take into his own fellowship any of his creatures.

There is a remarkable application of the term 'cherub' to the king of Tyrus (Ezek. xxviii. 14, 16). The idea is borrowed from the cherubim of the sanctuary. They with their far-extending wings covered the ark; so he was placed, as it were, for a defence and covering to the land of Israel. It was a privilege: it might have been life and blessing to be 'upon the holy mountain of God.' He was insensible to all this; and he and his nation must be cast out as 'profane.'

CHERUB (id.). A place in Babylonia, from which some Jews who could not prove their pedigree returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61).

CHES'ALON (confidence). A place on the border of Judah, said to be on the side or flank of mount Jearim (Josh. xv. 10). There is a village called Kesla on the western mountains of Judah, about six miles north-east of 'Ain-Shems: perhaps it may mark the site of Chesalon.

CHES'ED (gain). A son of Nahor (Gen. xii. 22). See CHALDEA.

CHES'SIL (a fool, ungodly). A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 30). It is most likely identical with Bethul (xix. 4). Mr. Wilton imagines that it was the place where Abraham worshipped, and that, afterwards desecrated by idolatry (astral worship), it received in contempt the name of Chesil. Its site is probably at el-Khulasah, the Elusa of the Greeks and Romans, a few miles south-west of Beer-sheba. The ruins are extensive (The Negeb, pp. 181-198).

CHEST. The term is found in 2 Kings xii. 9, 10; 2 Chron. xxiv. 8, 10, 11, to denote the coffer into which contributions were cast for the repair of the temple. It is observable that the original word, wherever else it occurs, implies the sacred ark, except once (Gen. i. 26), where it is used for Joseph's coffin. The chests of rich apparel in Ezek. xxvii. 24 are treasure chests, where valuables are stored.

CHESTNUT-TREE (Gen. xxx. 37; Ezek. xxxi. 8). The tree intended is thought to be the plane-tree, Platanus orientalis. It grows to a large size, with a mass of rich foliage. The stem is lofty, covered with a smooth bark, which annually falls off. The flowers are small, and come out a little before the leaves. This tree is a native of western Asia, but is found as far east as Cashmere. It is now common in England, and grows here to a considerable size.

CHESUL'LOTH (hopes). One of the towns of Issachar (Josh. xix. 18). Porter imagines it may be Iksal (Handb. for Syria, &c., p. 359); but it is as likely that this marks the site of Chisloth-Tabor.

CHE'TIIM (1 Macc. i. 1). A form of Chittim.

CHE'ZIB (false). A town where Judah was when his third son Shelah was born (Gen. xxxviii. 5). It is probably identical with Achziv.

CHID'DON (javelin). The name given (1 Chron. xiii. 9) to the threshing-floor where Uzzah put forth his hand to prevent the ark from falling, and was struck dead. In 2 Sam. vi. 6 it is called Nachon's threshing floor. Perhaps the spot had passed from one owner to another; or one word might be the name of the place, the other of the proprietor.

CHILDREN. It was the earnest desire of every Hebrew to have children, sons especially. By them the house was built up; and they were the honour and strength of their parents (Psal. cxxvii. 3-5). Accordingly, we find various means resorted to, and a barren wife even giving a concubine to her husband that she might own the children born of such intercourse (Gen. xvi. 1-3, xxv. 21, xxx. 1-8; 1 Sam. i. 1-11). It has been suggested as a reason for this desire, that each woman of Israel hoped she might be the mother of Messiah. See BARRENNESS. No doubt there is truth in this belief; but it is not the whole. Eastern women are to the full as anxious now for offspring, that is sons, the birth of a daughter being often regarded as a calamity, as ever they were in old time. Dr. Thomson gives some curious details on this subject, how vows and pilgrimages are made in order to obtain children, and how, when a son is born, the parents cease to bear their proper names, and are known by their relation to the child, e.g. Abu-Besharah, Em-Besharah, 'father of Besharah,' 'mother of Besharah' (The Land and the Book, pp. 123, 124). As soon as a child was born, its umbilical cord was cut; it was then washed, and rubbed with salt, and put into swaddling-clothes (Ezek. xvi. 4; Luke ii. 7). A name was immediately given (Gen. xxxv. 18); though, in later times, the naming of sons appears to have been at the time of circumcision, which was the eighth day (xvii. 10-12; Lev. xii. 3; Luke i. 59). After the circumcision the mother was unclean for 33 more days. If the child were a girl, the mother was not purified till the end of 66 days, reckoned from the close of the second week after the birth (Lev. xii. 3-5). Mothers generally nursed their children (Gen. xxi. 7; 1 Sam. i. 23; Sol. Song viii. 1); though sometimes we hear of a nurse (Gen. xxiv. 53, 59; 2 Sam. iv. 4). The period of nursing lasted from two to three years (2 Macc. vii. 27); and when a child was weaned it was customary to make a feast (Gen. xxi. 8), and according to their age children were called babes, sucklings, weaned children, little ones, youths and maidens (Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 64, vol. ii. pp. 213, 214). In their earlier years children of both sexes were under the care of the mother (Prov. xxxi. 1): after the fifth year the father took the boys; while the girls, till their marriage, continued with the mother. In rich families governors or tutors were employed, it would seem from early childhood (Numb. xi. 12; 2 Kings x. 1); and, at 12 or 13, children were considered of legal age, admissible to all the rites of religion, and competent to give testimony (John ix. 21). Parents had great authority over their children; and respect was enjoined to the mother even after they were taken from her special charge (Gen. xxviii. 11, 24; Exod. xxi. 15, 17; Deut. xxi. 18-21; Prov. xv. 20). We find too, a child is bound for the parent's debts 2 Kings iv. 1). The first-born son was devoted to God, and to be redeemed (Exod. xiii. 1, 13; Numb. xviii. 15). See FIRST-BORN. The inheritance descended to the sons, if there were no sons to the daughters, who then must not marry out of their own tribe (xxvii. 8, xxxvi. 8). The term 'children' is used sometimes metaphorically to denote a certain relationship (Luke xx. 36).

CHIL'EAB (perhaps like to his father). A son of David by Abigail (2 Sam. iii. 3). He is also called Daniel (1 Chron. iii. 1).

CHIL'ION (a pining). One of the sons of Elimelech, and husband to Orpah (Ruth i. 2-5, iv. 9, 10).

CHIL'MAD. A country or place mentioned with Sheba and Asshur (Ezek. xxvii. 23). Its situation and the signification of the name are unknown. But see CHALDEA.

CHIM'HAM (pinning, longing). The son or near relative of Barzillai the Gileadite, who accompanied David on his return to Jerusalem, after the defeat of Absalom (2 Sam. xix. 37-40; 1 Kings ii. 7). It would seem that the king gave him some possession near Beth-lehem (Jer. xii. 17).

CHIM'HAN (2 Sam. xix. 40. marg.).

CHIN'NERETH (lyre). A city of Naphthali (Josh. xix. 35). It cannot be ascertained whether it gave name to the lake so called, or was named from it.

CHIN'NERETH, SEA OF (Numb. xxxiv. 11; Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xiii. 27). See GENESARET, SEA OF. It is also called CHIN'NEROTH (Josh. xi. 2, xii. 3).

CHIOS. A beautiful and fertile island in the Ægean sea between Samos and Lesbos, belonging to Ionia in Asia Minor. It was celebrated anciently for its wine. St. Paul passed it when on his voyage from Asia, going up to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 15). It is now called Scio.

CHIS'LEU (perhaps languid). Carey imagines that the name is from the constellation Chesil, i. e. Orion (The Book of Job, p. 441). See MONTHS.

CHIS'LON (confidence). The father of Elidad, the Benjamite commissioner for the division of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 21).

CHIS'LOTH-TA'BOR (loins or flank of Tabor). A place on the border of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 12). There is a village called Iksal, about two miles and a-half west of mount Tabor: possibly it may mark the site of Chisloth. See CHESULLOTH.

CHIT'TIM (Cyprians; but the primitive meaning is uncertain: it is thought by some to be equivalent to Hittites). A son, or rather a race, descended from Javan, of the family of Japheth (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chron. i. 7; where the name is given as Kittim). It appears that the Phœnicians carried on an extensive commerce with Cyprus, which produced timber, copper, and other mineral treasures, and abounded in oil, wine, and honey. This island, too, was a convenient station, intermediate between Tyre and the more distant ports to which Tyrian vessels traded. Hence Phœnician settlements were made in Cyprus; one of them being Citium on the south-eastern coast, among the ruins of which Phœnician inscriptions have been discovered. The inhabitants of Citium were called Kittai by the Greeks; and therefore we may reasonably look for Chittim here. The name, given to this locality, attached to the whole island and to the people, Grecian or Asiatic immigrants, who subsequently occupied settlements which had been Phœnician; and these were properly the descendants of Javan, the Phœnicians being a Hamite race. Hence Chittim denoted many of the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean, Greece, Italy, Sicily, and Macedonia (Numb. xxiv. 24; Isai. xxiii. 1, 12; Jer. ii. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 6; Dan. xi. 30). And in 1 Macc. viii. 5 we find Perseus called 'king of the Citims,' i. e. Chittim. By race, therefore, Chittim is connected with Greece, by locality with Phœnicia.

CHI'UN (statue, image) (Amos v. 26). See REMPHAN.

CHLO'E (green herb). A Christian female, from whose household St. Paul had received an account of the dissensions at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 11).

CHO'BA (Judith iv. 4). A place possibly identical with CHO'BAI (Judith xv. 4, 5).

CH'ENIX (Rev. vi. 6, marg.). See MEASURES.

CHOR-A'SHAN (smoking furnace). One of the places which David and his men went to haunt (1 Sam. xxx. 30). It may be identical with Ashan (Josh. xv. 42, xix. 7).

CHORA'ZIN (district of Zin?) A town of Galilee mentioned with Bethsaida and Capernaum as the scene of some of our Lord's mighty works (Matt. xi. 21; Luke x. 13). Robinson places it at the ruins Tell Hâm; but Dr. Thomson finds it two miles to the north, still bearing the name Khorazy (The Land and the Book, p. 359).

CHOSAME'US (1 Esdr. ix. 32).

CHOZE'BA (lying). Probably the same place with Achzib, or CHEZIB, which see. The men of Chozeba are mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 22.

CHRIST (anointed). A word synonymous with the Hebrew Messiah, used generally of those who were officially anointed, as kings, priests, and, as some believe, prophets, and more specifically of the Anointed One, who was to be the great King, and Priest, and Prophet of his people. He, according to prophecy, was to be specially anointed with the Holy Spirit (Isai. lxi. 1). This prophecy Jesus of Nazareth applied to himself (Luke iv. 21); and the disciples recognized him as really anointed, not indeed by external act (unless we may suppose this in his baptism, Matt. iii. 16, 17), but with the Holy Ghost and with power (Acts iv. 27, x. 38); so that he was the expected Christ or Messiah, for whom those that looked for redemption in Israel were anxiously waiting. Hence the great aim of the apostles in preaching to the Jews was to convince them that Jesus was the Christ (ii. 36, ix. 22); and hence their anxiety to show, as Jesus himself taught them from the ancient scriptures (Luke xxiv. 26, 46), that the expected Christ would have to suffer (Acts xvii. 2, 3). From this the Jewish mind recoiled: those whose eyes were fixed upon a conquering king, who was to be 'a light to lighten the Gentiles,' and to be 'the glory of his 'people Israel,' refused to recognize him in the despised and rejected one; and hence a notion which has sometimes prevailed among them, when forced to acknowledge that the prophets described a sufferer, that there would be two, a suffering and a triumphant Christ. With us Christ has, through use, become a kind of surname ordinarily attached to Jesus; but it was the junction of these two names that formed the hard knot for the Jews. The meaning of the word being kept in view, it is easy to understand our Lord's prediction that there would be false Christs, persons wrongfully claiming the high office of God's Anointed (Matt. xxiv. 23, 24). This prediction has been abundantly fulfilled. One of these was Simeon Bar Coelba, or Barcochebas, the son of the star, who occupied Jerusalem about 132 A.D., and was defeated and killed by the Romans in 135. Many other such impostors have arisen. See JESUS, MESSIAH.

CHRISTIAN. The name by which the professed followers of Christ are distinguished. Believers at first were exclusively Jews; and no peculiar appellation was necessary. But, when they began to be a company gathered from Jews and Gentiles, separated from both by special principles and special worship, then a name very naturally was fixed upon them, a name as naturally taken from the Master whom they served. This name was first applied in Antioch (Acts xi. 26). We may conclude that it was not assumed by believers themselves, or imposed by divine command; else it would be difficult to explain why it was not at once in regular use among the Christians, who throughout the whole New Testament style themselves 'the brethren,' 'disciples,' 'believers,' 'the faithful.' And it is impossible to suppose that the Jews invented it; since they specially denied that Jesus was Christ, and their common name for Christians was 'Nazarenes,' or 'Galileans.' It must, therefore, have had a Gentile origin; and the people of Antioch, we are told, were fond of imposing names for derision or reproach. The word is used only twice more (xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16), in each case as coming from those without the church. Of course it was ere long a name of honour; and those who bear it may well be reminded by it that they are bound obediently to follow that Master whose holy appellation is upon them.

CHRISTIANITY. The religion professed by the followers of Jesus Christ. It is matter of historical notoriety that the Christian faith had its beginning upwards of 1800 years ago in the city of Jerusalem. The first teachers of it were a few of the personal followers of Jesus. Their Master had been put to death on a charge of blasphemy. But they maintained that he rose from the dead, and that, after being repeatedly seen by them alive, he visibly ascended into heaven. They taught that all that had happened to him was the fulfilment of ancient Hebrew prophecy; so that their doctrine was but the development and completion of that held by the Jews; whose rites, they said, prefigured and prepared the way for the Christian revelation. They were met with determined opposition, first by the Jews, and then through several generations by the heathen. The power of the Roman empire was unsparingly exerted to crush them. But they persevered; and their religion spread, till it became what we now see it, the faith of the most civilized nations of the world. And it is observable that we have to recur to its oldest records for the best account of its requirements. So that Christianity presented itself at once as a matured and complete system. If, therefore, it be not truth, it is altogether a deliberate and planned imposture, mature at once, not developed gradually into shape and substance, or modelled beyond the first idea according to circumstances, but announced originally in its present form, its principles and demands all sharply defined by its founders, men who lived in a keenly inquisitive age, who devised their system in a degraded country, who held even among their own people no position of influence, who had to contend, with no prospect of worldly reward, against the most formidable obstacles, and who, therefore, were most unlikely to palm imposture on mankind.

It is not intended to touch what are called the external evidences of Christianity in the present article: the observations made will rather be directed to the internal marks it has of truthfulness. And, in illustrating these, it will be necessary to examine the nature and tendency of the Christian religion, as exhibited in its authorized books: some notice of its effects upon the world may properly be subjoined.

I. Its nature, including (1) the character of its Author, and (2) the complexion of its teachings.—In investigating the nature of Christianity, our first attention should be paid to the character and portrait of its Author. Jesus left no writings of his own; but his sayings and doings are recorded in the gospel history. Now in this history we have the delineation of a perfect character. The behaviour of Jesus is described in a variety of minute details, his conduct to his relatives and associates, his habits of life, his journeys through various parts of Judea, his wisdom in the midst of snares for him, his kind and compassionate actions, his deportment on his trial and at his execution, his conversations, too, and discussions on almost every conceivable topic, his position as a teacher never lost in his familiar intercourse with those around him as a man—in all this we can detect neither presumption, nor weakness, nor mistake, nor folly. The portrait, too, is not a laboured one: it is a simple description of words and deeds, with no artistic effort or parade, with scarcely even a single remark added to call the reader's attention to any particular feature, or expression, or event. Every man knows how hard it is to delineate a faultless character. The best writers of fiction have not succeeded. Their most happy attempts have always had some flaw. Besides, there is this peculiarity in the history of Jesus. We have four accounts of him, written by independent persons, contemporaries it is true, but not acting in concert, with regard to whom, it is yet questioned by some critics, whether any one saw the production of any other before he penned his own. These four writers evince perceptible differences of style: the work of each has its special character and tone. With much that is common to all, each introduces also additional facts and speeches of the Personage described. Yet no one mars the portrait that the rest have respectively drawn: no one introduces discordant features. Each has succeeded in producing a perfect exemplar; and yet each presents him in a different aspect. And, though if we had but one or two of the accounts we should say that we had the portrait complete, yet the four taken together present it, without redundancy, yet with higher perfection, a whole of marvellous consistency and entire keeping. The Jesus of Matthew is the Jesus of Mark, of Luke, and of John, not a single touch of one or other violating the proportions of the central figure. If it were a wonder that one should so succeed, how much more wonderful that four contemporaries should be equally successful. Moreover, these men were not professed writers. They had little advantage of education. One was a fisherman, another a custom-house officer: the one of whom most might be expected was, it is thought, a physician.

We do not apprehend the full force of this extraordinary fact, unless we note also the glaring failure of other similar attempts. Besides the works of the four evangelists, there are still extant other Gospels. Several of these are confessedly of great antiquity, though they can be traced neither to apostles nor to apostolic men. They profess to be histories of Jesus, and to relate his doings and sayings. But place one of these apocryphal books beside the Christian Gospel, and the most ordinary eye perceives it to be a vulgar daub. It has no symmetry in itself: it has no cohesion with the authorized books. So that we have here the result of what imposture could do: we see how lamentably legendary writers, men who indulged their own fancy, failed. By the contrast, the trustworthiness of the gospel history is the more manifestly displayed.

For there is no reasonable account to be given of the success of the four evangelists in delineating a perfect character, except that they drew it according to the truth, as it was before their eyes. It could be no fancy picture: it could only be reality accurately caught and marvellously preserved.

It would be easy to enlarge on this part of the subject; but only a single trait or two can be noticed here. Jesus is placed before us in a few vigorous touches as a perfect youth. Those who are familiar with the descriptions of infant prodigies will appreciate this aspect of the character of Jesus. Again, he harmonizes opposite qualities: always grave, he is never austere: in poverty and privation he does not lose his dignity: on those most nearly admitted to his intimacy his character grows. And this is just the reverse of all experience of men. The greatest hero, philosopher, philanthropist leaves the impression more and more deeply fixed in the minds of those around him, that after all he is but human, with very many mortal imperfections: the estimation of Jesus, on the contrary, is continually heightening: he is, he must be, more than man: there is something in him divine. How, it must again be asked, how could this be a fancy picture?

In estimating the claims of Christianity upon us, it is necessary, further to examine the character of its teachings. We may consider these, both as they are in themselves, and in their adaptation to the state of mankind.

Regarded merely as a theory the teachings of the gospel are the most admirable for the sublimity of the doctrines they propound, and the excellence of the precepts they inculcate. The Deity is described, far different from the gods of heathenism, as possessed of every righteous, every attractive quality. He is not debased by the passions of men, he is pure and spiritual, and yet not cold and far away from sympathy with his creatures, but with a loving heart caring for their welfare, providing for their necessities, repairing the ruin which sin has caused. The mode of that reparation as revealed in Jesus Christ, by which mercy is extended to the guilty, while justice remains inviolate, the more wonderful the more it is examined, is with reason held to transcend human conception. It is philosophy of the highest cast. And the worship of this pure Being is spiritual, with none of the licentious rites which men, left to themselves, have delighted to practise, none of the petty observances which are calculated just to amuse, none of the austerities which have been deemed necessary to appease resentful powers. It is the worship of the heart and affections which is prescribed; and only this can be worship in spirit and in truth. For the motives propounded are those which alone can influence the whole man. The fear of expected vengeance is repellent rather than attractive; and the hope of credit for superior sanctity, or of reverence for deeper wisdom, may stimulate the devotion which is to be seen of men, but will never secure the real allegiance of the heart. The motive propounded in the Christian system is love, kindled by a sense of vast evils averted and vast benefits bestowed, and purified by an appreciation of the Object to be loved, deserving for his own sake the entire affection of all that can approve that which is really excellent. The history of Christianity attests the superiority of the Christian motive, under the influence of which men, not in the excitement of fanaticism, or through Stoic apathy, but calmly counting the cost, have loved not their lives unto the death. The destiny, too, of man as pictured in the gospel rises above that promised by every other scheme. Life and immortality are brought to light. And, while the nature of the intelligent happiness to be enjoyed is sufficiently revealed, every description of it is seen to fall below the grandeur of the idea it tries to embody. That idea was too vast for the intellect of the Athenian sages, who scoffed doubtfully at the mention of a resurrection. The littleness of their thoughts failed utterly to grasp the notion of a perfect consummation and bliss of both body and spirit.

Besides the greatness of its principles, Christianity teaches the most admirable precepts. Indeed the two are most intimately combined, so that from the one the other naturally flows: from the high revelation of the attributes and dealings of the Deity, and of the course and destiny of man, flow those sufficient directions which require his obedience to God and regulate his intercourse with men. And, though the doctrine be high, yet the practical effect is never doubtful or unclear. So plain is the path prescribed that it may be truly said, 'the wayfaring men, though fools' need 'not err therein' (Isai. xxxv. 8). Let the ethics of the gospel as comprehended in the sermon on the mount be examined, and their high superiority must be acknowledged. Placed beside other moral systems, those systems I mean which have not drawn some of their spirit from the very Christianity which they disavow, they wonderfully commend themselves to the enlightened mind and conscience. Vice is not palliated because it has assumed a specious name: internal purity is insisted on, and evil tracked down to its original seat, the heart, and branded as it deserves there where it is as open to the all-seeing Eye as if it had fully flaunted its rank fruit in the sight of men.

But principles may be exalted and yet be inapplicable to the condition of those to whom they are propounded; precepts may be excellent and yet impracticable, beyond the appreciation and ability of the men on whom they are imposed. It is not so with those of Christianity. Its doctrines have their exact adaptation to the state of the world, a world in which, by the confession of all whose opinion is worth listening to, evil is existent. The grand characteristic of Christian doctrine is that it propounds a remedy for this existing evil: it bears emphatically upon the world's wants, and offers ample relief. It would not be needed among beings whose purity was unstained: it would not be fitted for those entirely-reprobate whose moral sense was extinct, and who had no faculties for better things: it has a marvellous suitability for creatures such as we are, fallen but capable of restoration, made mortal by sin but with a longing after immortality, with faculties and attributes which may feed for a while indeed upon vanity, but which sooner or later turn unsatisfied away and can be filled and gratified only by that which Christianity reveals. The constitution of the human mind and the promises of the gospel fit in together in singular correspondence. And equally suited are its precepts to the subjects of them: they are just such as, if obeyed, redound to the honour of God, the pure, the faithful, the righteous, the merciful, the holy One, and enlarge the capacity for true enjoyment of those whom they influence. It is no mean evidence of the truth of Christianity if we find that both as regards its principles and its practice it deals fairly with men, being adapted to their state in relation to God and in relation to each other. This must be conceded as regards both the present and the future existence. It has just been shown how Christianity conducts onwards to the ultimate good of man. And this by no visionary scheme, which careless of present things would deal only with anticipation: it is through the present, so the gospel teaches, that the future is to be reached: its principles, therefore, make its precepts effective for the world. Had it been a contrived imposture, it hardly could have helped legislating for some particular class, sacrificing one interest for the advantage of another. Whereas it comprehends the whole family of man; inculcating upon all the reasonable service of the Creator, from which none is too high to be exempt, none too mean to be excused, and adjusting the due claims of each individual upon his fellows. It is adapted not only to a world of sinners, for whom it provides remission and restoration, but also for a world of rich and poor, of intellectual and ignorant, of parents and children, of rulers and subjects, with all the various intercommunications and complications which naturally arise and subsist among beings endowed as we are. It puts itself in contact with the thousand springs of action according to which the business of life goes on, and it never fails any man, in whatever crisis of difficulty he may be, with a principle for his right guidance, with a direction by which he may walk without stumbling. Nor is it a mere record of what ought to be, or a dry detail of what must be done, but there is with the principle and precept a kind of power supplied, which, without overriding a man's own actings, enables him, if he will yield to it, to attain that which at first seems too high, and to conquer that which might appear insuperable. A system, so mighty for its grasp on great things, so particular for the evolution of the smallest details, and thus exactly corresponding to what we are and what we see—if it be a planned imposture—must be for that very reason more marvellous than if it were grounded on the reality of truth.

Such, then, very briefly is Christianity in its nature as developed in the character of its Author, and in its teachings as admirable in themselves, and as suited to a world such as ours.

II. Its tendency.—We may, still further, examine its tendency, which cannot but be of a salutary kind. Such views as are given of the Deity, as a merciful and holy Being, demand a worship befitting him to whom it is paid, and influencing beneficially those who offer it. A system of false belief would be sure to have a degrading tendency: it would darken the understanding: it would corrupt the conduct; whereas a religion like that which has been just delineated, elevated in itself and suited to man's condition, prescribing no cruel rites to mollify a vengeful Deity, no sensual ceremonies to gratify and inflame the grosser appetites, revealing to us the Godhead clothing himself with man's nature so as fully to sympathize with us—and yet not, as in the mythological stories of heathenism, debased with human vices, but in that union rather setting before men a perfect and intelligible pattern—such a religion, surely, must elevate their thoughts and refine their conduct. And there is no jarring contrast in the character represented. All is high, all is excellent: all his qualities combine to make the Christian's God an object of the loftiest and most intelligent adoration. One who can be revered and loved and confided in. The peculiar doctrines of the gospel all contribute to enhance this. There is not only the care evinced which a beneficent Creator might well bestow upon the work of his hands, not only the good order which a moral governor would, we might suppose, well maintain among those beneath his sway—there is much more, the infinite love displayed in the recovery of lost man, the wisdom which, while mercy is indulged, would not have justice trampled on, the power of that admirable purpose, which, by its spiritual working, avails to overcome every difficulty and secure a blessed result—all the Christian doctrines are of a magnitude and perfection, such that man is elevated in the scale of being by the knowledge of such a Deity, and by being brought, in worship and holy service, into communion with him. The tendency, therefore, of the Christian representation of God's character is to improve and purify the conduct of mankind. It has been acknowledged, even by those who have doubted the divine origin of the gospel, that its principles, if carried out, would be beneficial. For not only does it teach that an all-seeing eye is marking men's actions for future judgment, but, having supplied an adequate motive for the love of God, which is the love of rectitude, it educes an imitation of the divine character, and by consequence all benevolent feeling towards men. For, if its first cardinal precept be, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind,' there is another resting on the same basis, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Matt. xxii. 37, 39). And this is to extend into all the ramifications of social and domestic life. So that the precepts of Christianity tend to make men good citizens, good parents, good children, good neighbour, to check envy and discontent, to encourage charity and forbearance, and to render every virtue not a mere show but a reality. It is useless to object, as some have done, that there are certain virtues, as patriotism, not specially insisted on in the gospel. There is the principle of everything good laid down; and every virtue, so far as it is a virtue, stripped of all the meaner elements which human passions have introduced, is fully sanctioned, and sufficiently encouraged.

The conclusion from all this would seem very easy: if the tendency of Christian teaching, so far as it defines the relation of man to his Maker, is pure and elevating; if, so far as it would regulate the intercourse of man and man it is beneficent, and calculated to cherish virtue and promote the general well-being, it cannot have been devised by impostors or evil-disposed persons. Impostors do not act without adequate motive: they would never try to build up a system which promised no advantage to themselves or to their class. And surely depraved men could not if they would, and would not if they could, propound and enforce principles sanctioning that which they disliked, and strongly condemning their own conduct. A thief is not likely to be strict in defining the law of property; nor would a sensualist prescribe chastity, not of mere outward behaviour, but of the heart. We have proof enough before our eyes of the tendencies of religious systems devised by interested men. The immoralities sanctioned by the religions of Greece and Rome, of Syria and Egypt, the foul superstitions of India and Polynesia, the intolerant fierceness of Mohammedan power, and the follies and sensualities of Mormonism, are sufficient evidence of what the tendency will be of systems growing out of worldly motives, self-indulgence, the grasping of power, or fatuous speculation. According to the source so will be the stream; and the happy promise of the ripening grains proves certainly that genuine seed was sown. True it is that some men are worse than their principles; and there are some, too, that are better than theirs. It is granted that there have been devout heathens; but such have not taken all the licence which their religion would allow: while certainly depraved Christians are condemned by the spirit and principle of the gospel they dishonour.

III. Its effects.—This, however, will be better illustrated by an examination of the effects which Christianity has produced in the world.

Its propagation from the feeblest beginnings is a great fact. And, to estimate it rightly, the difficulties must be looked at which were in the way of its extension. Admirable in itself, it required an enlightened eye to appreciate its excellencies. It did not fall in with the current notions of the world. Its peculiar teachings—the spiritual nature of the Deity, the incarnation, the new birth, the resurrection of the body; the graces it inculcated—humility, repentance, faith, forgiveness of injuries—were in broad contrast to the ruling principles of the time. The prevailing languages had no words accurately to express the ideas which must be dominant in the Christian system. To erect it out of the materials at hand would have tasked the mightiest intellect, and have proved too long for the most learned leisure to elaborate. But Christianity was confessedly broached by a company of ill-educated men, by men who had been earning their livelihood by the labour of their hands till the very time when they came forth as teachers of the new faith. And then, as might be expected from the facts just noticed, their pretensions were assailed by a storm of ridicule, of obloquy, and of persecution. Jews, and heathens stirred up by them, opposed the gospel. The passions of the multitude were inflamed against it; and magistrates were nothing loth to use the sword. Yet it steadily won its way, won every step of progress by determined conflict. And the result of its success was that wicked men, depraved, sensual, licentious, became holy and without blame. Its march was not that of the worldly conqueror, devastating where he subdued, and leaving the track of his career in misery and blood. The gospel has spread blessing around its onward path; it has recruited its most gallant soldiers from the ranks of its foes: it has promoted the best interests of those whom its peaceful proclamations have subdued. The apostle Paul, himself taken from amid the bitterest opposers of Christianity, appealed to the Corinthian converts: 'such—fornicators, idolaters, adulterers, thieves, covetous, drunkards, revilers, extortioners—such were some of you; but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God' (1 Cor. vi. 9-11). Effects do not occur without adequate causes. And what would be an adequate cause for the transformation here described? A system of fanaticism, of imposture, of mere priestcraft, would fail in effecting it.

Nor is this the coloured testimony of a hot partizan. Though we cannot from the nature of things produce very strong testimonies from contemporary heathen history, yet we are not without proof that the heathens who persecuted Christians could substantiate no charge of crime against them. They were fools, they were obstinate, they were unsocial; such is the character given of them; but they were not vicious, they did no harm. This is the purport of the celebrated letter of Pliny to the emperor Trajan. And the emperor Julian, who had renounced Christianity, yet could not help commending their virtues to the imitation of pagans. No man can deny that the gospel has promoted social happiness. It has abolished polygamy, and has assigned to the female her due position: it has mitigated private tyranny, has cherished domestic love, has given tenderness to family relationships, and has promoted charity between man and man. Where were there to be found in ancient Rome any counterparts to the benevolent institutions of our own metropolis, called forth and maintained by enlightened Christian principle? Look again at the political state of the world, and see the touch of the gospel in the discountenancing, and in many lands the abolition, of slavery, in the mitigation of the horrors of war, especially in the treatment of prisoners, in the milder systems of civil government, and the better administration of civil justice.

The topic might be pursued to any extent; and innumerable proofs and examples might be produced—of which the reclaiming of the South Sea islanders from cannibalism and other unutterable vices by the preaching of Christ's gospel is not the least impressive—facts, I say, might be collected to any extent, proving to demonstration the benign effects of Christianity wherever it has been fairly applied. It is futile to object that evils yet exist in Christian nations, and that vices still prevail among so-called Christian men. No system is responsible for the faults of those who do not cordially embrace it; and the sins which yet stain us are because we have too little Christianity, not too much. With the increase of its influence experience shows that these blemishes will be diminished. It is futile also to allege that religious intolerance has frequently manifested itself, and that the rancour of one class of Christians against another has sharpened the sword of persecution. If such evils were in accordance with the teaching of the New Testament, the text-book of Christianity, doubtless the charge would be just. But, when the New Testament censures these enormities as strongly as it does the vices of heathenism, no fair opponent can believe that the gospel is itself to blame. Let it obtain a wider and a more thorough expansion; let the love of God which it inculcates be generally a ruling principle; let the love of a man's neighbour which it prescribes be the just standard of human society; let its tendencies have their full development, and every candid reasoner must admit that the condition of mankind would be materially ameliorated. It is the evil heart (for which Christianity alone propounds a sufficient cure) from which all perversion of good proceeds. 'From whence,' asks the apostle, 'come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members' (James iv. 1)? Christianity stands herein in marked contrast to heathen systems. Evil was the natural fruit of them. The more devoted their votaries, the more demoralized was their conduct.

We have in discussions of this kind to deal mainly with acknowledged facts: the conclusion therefore may be safely reached. The origin, the establishment, the effects of Christianity are plain, they are facts. The portrait of the Author of it is readily to be studied: the tendencies of his teachings are embodied in an authentic document. And the question is, Can any satisfactory explanation be given of the whole on the supposition that Christianity was devised by weak and interested men? Were weak men, we must ask again and again, likely to achieve a task in which the acutest men had failed? Would impostors try to persuade the world into a belief which was their own condemnation and ruin? Reasons have been alleged for the success of Christianity apart from its supernatural origin. And some of these have weight. Secondary causes always cooperate in bringing about any result. But the real question is not touched by such theories. Gibbon alleges the inflexible and intolerant zeal of the first Christians, the earnestness with which they urged the doctrine of a future life, the miraculous powers ascribed to the primitive church, the pure and austere morals of the original converts, and the disciplined union of the Christian republic, forming a kind of independent state in the heart of the Roman empire, as causes of the large diffusion of Christianity. But, allowing these their fair influence, it is gratuitous to suppose that they would have sufficed had Christianity had no true basis. Or, if they had sufficed, if these alone were the reasons why a religion overspread the world, we may safely conclude that that religion would not have exhibited the pure features of Christianity: they might perhaps build up Mohammedism: the Christianity produced by no deeper motive would have been but a caricature of our holy faith.

Considering then the moral grandeur of its principles, and the high purity of its precepts, looking at the account of its originator, and seeing how it has prevailed against difficulties the most formidable, and triumphed over opposition the most pertinacious, weighing all the benefits it tends to produce, and marking its actual effect upon mankind, the most reasonable explanation of all these phenomena is that the gospel is the great power of God unto man's salvation. Any other solution involves the greatest improbabilities.

It must be carefully remembered that the view here taken is but a partial one. It has been confined to a single aspect of the question. When it is added that there are other lines of proof (see MIRACLES, PROPHECY, RESURRECTION, REVELATION, SCRIPTURE), and that they all concur, other arguments which all speak the same language, and supply accumulated evidence, the result may be confidently stated: 'We have not followed cunningly-devised fables.'

Very many excellent works have been written on this great subject: it may be sufficient to direct the reader to those by Dr. Chalmers, Christian Evidences, and by Bishop M'Ilvaine, The Evidences of Christianity.

CHRONICLES, THE TWO BOOKS OF. Among the ancient Jews these formed but one book, though they are now divided in Hebrew bibles, as well as in our own, into two. They were called The Words of Days, i.e. Diaries or Journals. The Septuagint translators denominated them Paraleipomena, Things omitted; and from Jerome we have derived the name 'Chronicles.' They are an abridgement of the whole of the sacred history, more especially tracing the Hebrew nation from its origin, and detailing the principal events of the reigns of David and Solomon, and of the succeeding kings of Judah down to the return from Babylon. The writer goes over much of the same ground as the author of the books of Kings, with whose work he was probably acquainted. He does not, however, merely produce a supplement, but works out his narrative independently after his own manner. The following table, taken from Keil, will be of service as exhibiting the parallels between the Chronicles and the books of Samuel and Kings:—

It will be seen, however, on collation, how much difference there is between the two histories. There are omissions in Chronicles, as, for instance, David's adultery (2 Sam. xi. 2—xii. 25): there are facts added, as David's preparations for building the temple (1 Chron. xxii.): there are fuller details of matters shortly noticed in the parallel history, as in the account of the removal of the ark from Kirjath-jearim (comp. 1 Chron. xiii. 2, xv. 2-21, xvi. 4-43, with 2 Sam. vi.), besides briefer additions, explanatory remarks, reflections, and the omission of a few words in a narrative, differences of spelling, &c., which serve to prove that, as before noted, the author of Chronicles was not a mere supplementer. He had, indeed, a definite object. Supposing him to have written shortly after the return from captivity, we can easily see the necessity of a work which should fix the genealogies of the returned exiles, with special reference to the line from which Messiah was to spring, to facilitate the re-establishment of religious worship by detailing the pedigrees, the functions, and the order of the priests and Levites, and to describe the original apportionment of lands, that the respective families might be confirmed in their ancient inheritances. Accordingly, after the early genealogies in the first eight chapters, the writer seems to mark his age and design in ix. 1, &c. We may thus perceive why the kingdom of the ten tribes is hardly mentioned. Israel had been removed, and their country occupied by an envious and hostile population. We may see why the building of the temple, David's preparations, as well as Solomon's accomplishment of them, are detailed, and the various reformations of later godly kings specially chronicled: these accounts would serve to cheer those who were engaged in a similar work, and strengthen them to believe that their covenant God would enable them to re-construct their religious order, and repair their ruined civil polity, in spite of the vast difficulties against which they had to contend. The pedigrees were, no doubt, extracted from public registers; a confirmatory proof of which is that they are not all brought down to the same period. And, in regard to his facts, the author is careful to name his authorities. Thus, for the history of David (1), he specifies the books of Samuel the seer, of Nathan the prophet, and of Gad the seer (1 Chron. xxix. 29), probably the same with the Chronicles of king David mentioned in xxvii. 24; for the history of Solomon (2), the book of Nathan, the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, and the visions of Iddo the seer against Jeroboam (2 Chron. ix. 29). For the further history of Judah (3), a book of the kings of Judah is referred to (xvi. 11), cited elsewhere with small variations of title (xxv. 26, xxviii. 26, xxxii. 32, xxvii. 7, xxxv. 27, xxxvi. 8, xx. 34, xxxiii. 18, see the Hebrew). There are also (4), the story, midrash, of the book of kings (xxiv. 27), by some supposed identical with (3); (5), the book of Shemaiah the prophet and of Iddo the seer concerning genealogies (xii. 15); (6), the story, midrash, of the prophet Iddo (xiii. 22); (7), the book of Jehu, the son of Hanani (xx. 34); (8), the acts of Uzziah, written by Isaiah the prophet (xxvi. 22); (9), the vision of Isaiah the prophet (xxxii. 32); and (10), the sayings of the seers (xxxiii. 19). Of these, the book or words of Jehu and the vision of Isaiah are said to have been incorporated with the book of the kings of Judah and Israel. It is very likely that the rest were sections of some one large historical work.

The author of the Chronicles it is not very easy to ascertain. The Jews believe him to be Ezra; but the pedigree inserted in 1 Chron. iii. 17-24 would seem to reach beyond Ezra's time. Different explanations, however, are given of it; and some imagine that the passage is a later addition to the book. Some indications of the date are afforded by the diction; as where the reckoning is by darics (xxix. 7), in our translation 'drams.' We must place the composition, therefore, under the Persian dominion. It is not likely to have been later. There is a probability, it may be added, that the books of Chronicles and of Ezra were originally one work.

Besides the differences which have been noted between Chronicles and the books of Samuel and Kings, some critics believe that they have detected contradictions. It can only be replied generally here, that discrepancies in orthography, diction, and arrangement are of little weight; and that those of numbers and facts have for the most part been satisfactorily explained. It was customary to express numbers by letters of the alphabet: hence many of the mistakes of transcribers. And, if no perfect solution of every knot can now be given, the difficulty is perhaps owing rather to our want of information than to a real fault in the composition. Besides, it must never be forgotten that the points of exact agreement between independent scripture writers are almost innumerable—those of stubborn discrepancy very few.

The books of Chronicles have always had their place in the canonical writings, ranked among the khethubim or hagiographa, both as being later than the captivity, and as not exhibiting that detailed history and teaching of prophets which we find in Kings (comp. Zündel, Krit. Untersuch. über die Abfassungszeit des B. Daniel, pp. 220, 221). They are not expressly cited in the New Testament; but there are probably some indirect allusions to them: comp. 1 Chron. xxiii. 13 with Heb. v. 4; xxiv. 10 with Luke i. 5; 2 Chron. ix. 1 with Matt. xii. 42 and Luke xi. 31; xxiv. 20, 21 with Matt. xxiii. 35 and Luke xi. 51. The books of Chronicles comprise, I. Genealogical lists from Adam downwards, including an enumeration of those who returned from captivity (1 Chron. i.—ix. 34); II. The histories of Saul and David (ix. 35—xxix. 32); III. The history of the united kingdom under Solomon (1 Chron. xxix. 23-30; 2 Chron. i.—ix.); IV. The history of the kingdom of Judah till its termination by the Babylonian conquest (x.—xxxvi.).

CHRONOLOGY. The importance of chronology as an adjunct and interpreter of history is sufficiently acknowledged. Its business is to range events in their proper order; for without such arrangement their mutual relations cannot be understood, and the records of past times become but an indistinguishable mass. But early writers were little careful in noting the dates of the events they chronicled. The want of fixed eras from which to court, the habit of using round numbers, the inexactness in settling the length of years and months, the varying distribution of the parts of a day, the tendency of so many nations to exaggerate their own antiquity—these are but some of the causes which contribute to embarrass chronological investigation.

In the short space which can be allotted to the subject here it is obviously impossible to give even a complete outline of it. That space will perhaps be most satisfactorily occupied, if, after an explanation of the various divisions of time natural and artificial, of calendars and eras, an account is offered of some leading systems of biblical chronology, and the grounds on which their advocates have based them, with notice also of the checks which may be applied to them. The reader will at least gain clear ideas, and will in a degree be prepared for those further researches in which he must seek the aid of larger books.

Natural divisions of time are the day, the month, and the year. The day, or one revolution of the earth upon its axis, of course everywhere identical in its total length, had among different nations a different beginning. The Hebrews began it in the evening: the sunset was the close of one day: immediately afterwards the next began. The Romans commenced their day as we do ours, just after midnight.

The month was a revolution of the moon. But one such revolution did not contain exactly a certain number of days. The months, therefore, were counted in round numbers either thirty days, or, to bring them more precisely into agreement with the moon, alternately thirty and twenty-nine days.

The year was one revolution of the earth round the sun. This, however, comprehended more than twelve lunations. If the months were alternately twenty-nine and thirty days, the sum of twelve such months would be 354 days. But a year of 360 days seems to have been in use. In either case, if such years were allowed to run on, the month that at one time was mid-summer would in no very long period fall in mid-winter.

For convenience, artificial divisions of the day and night were made. These were hours and watches. Twelve hours were assigned to the day, from sun-rise to sunset: consequently, according to the length of this interval at different seasons, the length of the hours would be different. See DAY. At first among the Hebrews there were three watches: afterwards they counted four. See WATCH.

The week was another artificial division of time. The changes of the moon are hardly defined enough to account for it: we must look for some other reason. And this we find in the account of the creation. Six separate divisions of creative activity are noted, a seventh of repose. And the Creator established a law thereupon that six days should be employed by man in labour, with a seventh for rest, needed, as physiologists testify, for the due refreshment of the human frame, and most rightly demanded for the special worship of Him who formed the intelligent inhabitants of the world. The week, therefore, though not distinctly marked in nature, and so far artificial, was the appointment of God. Most nations—those even without the light of divine revelation—have had the division of the week. See SABBATH, WEEK.

It has been observed that the ends of the different revolutions of the moon and of the earth, diurnal and annual, do not tally, so that, without the application of some check, confusion in reckoning would soon ensue. To prevent this, calendars were devised. If the solar year was to be a standard, additional days must be thrown in; and this was most conveniently done by allowing the difference between a lunar and a solar year to increase till the intercalation of a month would pretty nearly rectify the calculation. The cycle of intercalation among the ancient Hebrews we do not know: the modern Jews count thirteen months in the year seven times in nineteen years. See MONTHS. As astronomical science became more exact, further modifications of the calendar were introduced. It is almost needless to say that according to our present practice one day is added every fourth year called leap-year, and one leap-year is omitted once in a century.

No standard era is adopted in our bible. Many of the sacred historians and prophets are particular in dating events; but these dates refer to late, and in different places different events. Thus we find occasionally the years reckoned from the departure of Israel from Egypt (Numb. i. 1, xxxiii. 38; Deut. i. 3; 1 Kings vi. 1); continually from the accession of kings (e.g. xv. 1, 9, 25, 33; 2 Kings xviii. 13). The prophet Ezekiel uses two eras: the first (Ezek. i. 1) is variously explained, from the time of Josiah's great reformation, from the prophet's birth, from what is called the era of Nabopolassar, &c. &c.; the second from Jehoiachin's captivity (i. 2, viii. 1, xx. 1). Sometimes it would seem that the Jews reckoned from the return from Babylon (Ezra iii. 8). But these dates were none of them employed as regular standards; as the era of the Olympiads, from 776 B.C. was by the Greeks, and that of the foundation of their city by the Romans, 753 B.C. And, besides, there is a peculiarity observable which might draw a hasty reader into mistakes. The years of kings, for example, were reckoned not from the actual time of their accession, but from the ordinary commencement of the year; so that one who ascended the throne in the 10th month would have commenced the second year of his reign within three months of his accession. The era called that of the Seleucidæ, 312 B.C., is adopted in the books of Maccabees (1 Macc. ii. 70): see also a notice of the date used in instruments and contracts (xiii. 42).

In the absence of a standing era, chronological tables are constructed for the sacred volume by calculating from the dates assigned of the births and deaths of the patriarchs compared with the age as stated of each when a son was born, in later days by putting together the incidental notices of periods of time, as the years during which Israel was enslaved or tranquillity lasted, the length of the administrations of judges and of the reigns of kings. Thus, following the Hebrew text of Gen. v. 3-32, vii. 6, the simplest arithmetical calculation will show that 1656 years elapsed between the creation and the deluge. This is the computation adopted by archbishop Ussher, and followed in the chronological notes of our ordinary English bibles. A similar process leads easily onwards to the death of Jacob. After the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan the calculations become more intricate. It is not clear whether the judges followed in consecutive order, or whether, as the authority of some seems to have been acknowledged only in certain districts, we ought not to place two or more as contemporaneous rulers. In the times of the monarchy dates were more precisely given; and after the division of the kingdoms the regal chronicle of one is a check on that of the other. Proceeding cautiously, therefore, along the stream of time, archbishop Ussher places the call of Abraham 1921 B.C.; the exodus of Israel from Egypt 1491 B.C.; the foundation of the temple 1012 B.C.; the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar 588 B.C.; and the birth of Christ 4 B.C., or 4,000 years after the creation.

But, when collateral testimonies have been considered, other chronologers have arrived at very different conclusions. Those just given are derived, as previously remarked, from the Hebrew text. Now the Pentateuch exists also in the ancient Hebrew, or (as they are commonly called) Samaritan characters: see SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH. There is also the Septuagint Greek version, of high value. And these two, the Samaritan Pentateuch and the Septuagint (without mutual accordance), vary widely from the Hebrew in the numbers they give. The Jewish historian Josephus also, differing from the Hebrew text, agrees nearly with the Septuagint. The subjoined table will exhibit these differences in a clear form:—

But the discrepancy is still greater when we descend to the period between the flood and the birth of Abraham. It will be sufficient to say that, while the Hebrew text allows but 292 years, the Samaritan extends the interval to 942; the Septuagint, reckoning an additional patriarch, Cainan, to 1072; and Josephus to 993 years. Admitting that the insertion of Cainan is an error, it must yet be conceded that the Hebrew computation does not allow space for the multiplication of men, and consolidation of the monarchies which we find in Abraham's days.

There are various checks which tend to give precision to chronological calculations. Incidental notices in scripture are very serviceable in correcting false conclusions which might be drawn from the very concise way in which the sacred writers speak. A single example shall be produced. According to Exod. xii. 40, 41, it would seem that the Israelites had dwelt in Egypt 430 years, reckoning from the time when Jacob went down thither. A difficulty indeed would be felt, because the mother of Moses is said to have been the daughter of Levi. But the matter is cleared up, when we find St. Paul reckoning 430 years between the Abrahamic covenant and the giving of the law (Gal. iii. 17). The covenant referred to is obviously that mentioned in Gen. xv. (see Browne's Ordo Sæculorum, part i. chap. vi. pp. 308, 309), a very little while posterior to Abraham's own sojourn in Egypt, from which, therefore, the Egyptian connection might fairly be said to begin. Hence we are led to the conclusion that the time from Jacob's descent to the exodus

It can hardly be conceived that the variations are mere mistakes. The Septuagint adds regularly 100 years to the age of each patriarch at the birth of his son, if the age in the Hebrew text be under 100, and as regularly subtracts 100 years from the remainder of the life. The Samaritan computation cannot be relied on, because it would make three of the earlier patriarchs die in the very year of the flood; and the total period from the creation to that time seems unreasonably short. The question, then, substantially lies between the Hebrew and the Septuagint computations—has the first abridged, or has the latter extended the true chronology? Great names may be found as supporters of each hypothesis.

was about 215 years. Profane history and still-existing monumental inscriptions will furnish similar illustrations. Thus Rehoboam was contemporary with Shishak (or Sheshonk) (1 Kings xiv. 25, 26), Hezekiah with Tirhakah (2 Kings xix. 9), Josiah with Pharaoh-necho (xxiii. 29). But inscriptions have been found recording the dates of the accessions of these monarchs, or of the expeditions which they made; and, without entering into particulars, it may be said that they corroborate the generally-received biblical chronology. For it is only in respect to the earlier ages of the world that much difference exists among chronologers. And this, be it ever remembered, arises not from the untrustworthiness of the bible record.

but because it is difficult to ascertain what is the true reading of that record.

Far different from the modest Hebrew statements are the claims which other nations have put forth to vast antiquity. In Egypt, in India, and elsewhere, monarchs have been said to reign thousands and tens of thousands of years ago. But such assumptions will not bear the test of careful examination; and all research has failed in discovering real history anterior to the events chronicled in the bible. That the Usserian calculations, indeed, are too contracted may well be believed; but no proof has yet been produced that it is necessary to fix the great recorded events known to have occurred earlier than the period the larger computation allows.

More cannot here be said: for particulars the student must consult other books. But it may be well to give a comparative view of the dates of a few leading events as fixed by some eminent chronologers. These shall be taken from Dr. Hales (New Analysis of Chronology), from Mr. Poole, who, in his article on chronology in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, has proceeded by careful comparison of the biblical with foreign data, and from Mr. Palmer's learned work, the Egyptian Chronicles. To these Ussher's dates shall be added.

CHRYSO'LITE (golden stone). One of the precious stones mentioned as a foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20). It was probably a species of topaz, being described as golden streaked with green and white. In Ezek. xxviii. 13, marg. 'chrysolite' is given for 'beryl' in the text: see BERYL.

CHRYSO'PRASUS (golden leek). An Indian gem, so called because it is said to resemble in colour the juice of the leek, interspersed with golden spots. It is a kind of beryl, translucent, and has been thought to have some medical virtue in diseases of the eyes. It is one of the foundations of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20): comp. Ezek. xxvii. 16, marg., xxviii. 13, marg., and see AGATE, EMERALD.

CHUB (Ezek. xxx. 5). This word must describe an African people, probably contiguous to Egypt. But it occurs nowhere else; and the meaning can only be conjectured. Some critics would alter the text one way into Nub, for Nubia, and some another, into Lub, for Libya; but these are only desperate and very improbable guesses.

CHUN (establishment, place?). A Syrian city (1 Chron. xviii. 8). In the parallel place (2 Sam. viii. 8) it is called Berthai; which the Peshito Syriac reads in both places, and which possibly the LXX. translators had in their copies.

CHURCH. This word occurs in our version only in the New Testament. The Greek term of which it is the translation implies generally 'an assembly,' civil or religious, and is, in some cases, properly so rendered (Acts xix. 32, 39, 41). In a religious sense, it signifies that body of persons whom God has gathered out to be his servants. It is thus applied to Israel, the Lord's peculiar people (vii. 38; Heb. ii. 12), where it corresponds to the 'congregation' so frequently mentioned in the Old Testament. And so the word has the general meaning of an assemblage or congregation of Christians in apostolic times (1 Cor. xi. 18). This meaning has, of course, many modifications. It is sometimes a body belonging to or meeting in one house (Rom. xvi. 5; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; Philem. 2); sometimes the Christians of a city, as Jerusalem, where were at one time many thousands that believed (Acts xv. 4, xviii. 22, xxi. 20), or Antioch (xiii. 1), or Thessalonica (2 Thess. i. 1), &c. Sometimes it is employed in a larger sense, with no local or territorial designation (Rom. xvi. 4, 16). And it frequently comprises that great body of redeemed, the holy catholic church, the universal company, united in one living Head, 'the fullness of him that filleth all in all' (Matt. xvi. 18; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Gal. i. 13; Eph. i. 22, 23, iii. 10, v. 25-30; Heb. xii. 23). The foundation, and the building, and the privileges, and the obligations, and the final glory of this church are often largely described. Very impressive, too, is the warning against those who have only in name belonged to it, but are found to have had no real part therein (Matt. vii. 22, 23; Acts viii. 13, 18-23; Rev. iii. 16). For the visible church embraces all who carry the outward signs of church-membership (comp. art. xix. of the English church); but not co-extensive with it is the invisible church—those who are really justified and sanctified, known to God alone, whose eye is most scrutinizing to detect the actual character and condition of all his creatures. In Matt. xviii. 17 the ruling authorities, whatever they might be, of the church seem to be meant. See, for much valuable information, Bp. Pearson, On the Creed, art. ix.

CHURN (Prov. xxx. 23). See BUTTER.
CHU'SHAN-RISHATHA'IM (most wicked Cushite, otherwise, lord of the land of the two rivers). A king of Mesopotamia, of whom nothing more is known than that he subjugated Israel shortly after the time of Joshua. His power was broken after eight years by Othniel, the son of Kenaz (Judges iii. 8-11).

CHU'SI (Judith vii. 18).

CHU'ZA (a seer?). The steward of Herod Antipas, whose wife, Joanna, was one of the women that ministered to Jesus (Luke viii. 3).

CILICIA. The most south-easterly province of Asia Minor, divided by mount Amanus from Syria, with which it is sometimes coupled (Acts xv. 23, 41; Gal. i. 21), on the west and north girdled by the chain of Taurus, through passes in which it communicates with Isauria, Pisidia, Pamphylia, and Cappadocia, and washed on the south by the Mediterranean. The eastern part was a plain district, well watered and fruitful: the west was rugged, but afforded pasture for the celebrated Cilician goats. The inhabitants are said to have sprung from the Syrians and Phœnicians. Cilicia, after belonging partially to the Syrian kingdom and to Armenia, became, in 63 B.C., when Pompey had subdued the noted pirates, a Roman province; and Cicero was once proconsul of it. The inhabitants of the mountains, however, long maintained their independence. Tarsus, the capital, was the birth-place of the apostle Paul. Cilicia is frequently mentioned in the New Testament (Acts vi. 9, xxi. 39, xxii. 3, xxiii. 34, xxvii. 5).

CL'MAH (a heap, cluster) (Job ix. 9, marg., xxxviii. 31, marg.). See PLEIADES.

CINNAMON. One of the ingredients of the holy anointing oil (Exod. xxx. 23-25). It is the rind of the Cinnamomum Zeylanicum, a tree found in Sumatra, China, and especially the south-west part of Ceylon. It was anciently imported into Judea by the Phœnicians and Arabians. The stem and boughs of the tree have a double rind: it is from the inner of the two, itself consisting of two closely-connected rinds, that the fine cinnamon is obtained: it is dried in the sun, and rolled into the cylinders in which we receive it. From the coarser pieces an oil of cinnamon is made, and a finer oil by boiling the ripe fruit. It is spoken of as a perfume for the bed (Prov. vii. 17), and as one of the trees of the garden to which the spouse in Sol. Song iv. 14 is compared.

CIN'NEROTH (lyre). A district (1 Kings xv. 20), taking its name from the town CHINNERETH, or the lake of CHINNERETH, which see.

CIRA'MA (1 Esdr. v. 20).

CIRCUMCISION. A sacramental rite, the symbol of the national covenant of Israel with God.

The first mention we have of circumcision in scripture is when the covenant was made with Abram, his name being changed to Abraham (Gen. xvii.). But it is a question whether the practice did not prevail among various nations at an earlier period. The Egyptians were circumcised, according to Herodotus (lib. ii. 36, 37, 104), and other writers; and the examination of existing mummies corroborates their testimony. It has been supposed, therefore, that it was first introduced among the Ethiopians and various South African nations, for physical reasons, and that from them it spread into other regions. This is a matter upon which en-quirers are not likely to agree. But it may be said, even if this theory were certainly proved, that it presents no kind of opposition to the scripture record. There are many instances (the symbol of the rainbow is one, Gen. ix. 12-17) in which God has taken up a well-known phenomenon, or an acknowledged custom, and has invested it with a new significance, to be the token of some blessing, or the seal of some promise, or the mode in which service might be paid him. And our Lord's words (John vii. 22) are simply intended to assert that Moses was not the originator of circumcision: there were fathers, not necessarily of Abraham's family, who before him practised it. Be this, however, as it may, it was to Abraham first that it was the seal of a covenant, and was made a religious rite; so that the sacred aspect of it was of the Abrahamic fathers. It was the assurance to Abraham that he should have a seed of Sarah, in whom there should rise the blessing of many nations. The penalty under which circumcision was enforced (Gen. xvii. 14) must not be taken as if this neglect were to be punished by man. The uncircumcised, indeed, could not share in the offices of religion; but the Lord would himself avenge the disregard of his command, since it concerned the individual only, and was not one of the public crimes amenable to public justice. And this is probably the explanation of a remarkable incident recorded of Moses' life (Exod. iv. 24). Even in his favoured servant God would mark his sense of the neglect of a divine command.

Abraham and the males born in his house and bought with his money were circumcised; and the rite was carefully practised in his family. Thus the history of Jacob shows both that the Hebrews were circumcised, and that the Hivites were not (Gen. xxxiv. 14-17). We may judge also, from the history of Moses just adverted to, that the Midianites did not practise circumcision; just as in later times we have abundant proof that it was not the custom of the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv. 6, xvii. 26, xviii. 25, 27, xxxi. 4). The Israelites were circumcised while resident in Egypt; and from the time of Moses this rite, solemnly enjoined in the law (Lev. xii. 3), acquired a higher significance, and became the special characteristic of the chosen and sealed nation; so that the Hebrew could use no stronger term to express his separation and aversion from a Gentile than to call him uncircumcised. Possibly this came to be used as a general term of reproach, irrespective of its literal meaning, merely signifying impurity. And this may be the reason why Egypt, a circumcised nation as we have seen, was ranked among the uncircumcised (Jer. ix. 25, 26). For critics have been puzzled to know why the prophet speaks as he does, and have supposed that circumcision had gradually gone out among the Egyptian people, or that the priests and those initiated in the mysteries alone practised it. The Israelites were not circumcised in the wilderness. Perhaps their nomad life, perpetually moving, may sufficiently account for this; though some have supposed them, as it were, in a state of rejection till the disobedient generation had died out. When the Jordan was crossed, the rite was universally performed (Josh. v. 2-9); and the ancient precept was 'rolled away' from Israel. Circumcision entitled a man to religious privileges: it was the standing symbol of the Lord's favour. But this was mainly as it pointed to and included the circumcision of the heart. The outward form was but a testimony against those who were internally unclean. And this the sacred writers from the time of Moses repeatedly inculcated (Lev. xxvi. 41; Deut. x. 16, xxx. 6; Jer. iv. 4, ix. 26; Ezek. xlv. 7; Rom. ii. 28, 29). They must, to be Jews indeed, have all that circumcision signified and sealed.

Our Lord, as a Jew, was circumcised, becoming 'obedient to the law for man' (Luke ii. 21). But the apostles refused to sanction the imposition of the rite upon the Gentiles, and strenuously opposed the doctrine that it was necessary to salvation (Acts xv. 1, 2, 5, 23-29; Gal. v. 1-6). Circumcision, indeed, in itself was indifferent: it might be used or not according to circumstances (Acts xvi. 1-3; Gal. ii. 3); but the dependence on it as a ground of righteousness before God overthrew the principle of the Christian faith.

Circumcision was performed the eighth day, when generally the name was given (Luke i. 59), even if it fell upon the sabbath (John vii. 22, 23); with sharp knives sometimes made of stone (Exod. iv. 25; Josh. v. 3), which were thought to prevent inflammation; and in adults it was very painful. It was possible by another operation to obliterate it; and to this St. Paul probably alludes in 1 Cor. vii. 18.

Circumcision is still practised by (besides the Jews) Mohammedan nations. According to Josephus, the Arabians circumcised at 13 years of age, that being the age of Ishmael when he was circumcised (Gen. xvii. 25; Antiq., lib. i. 12, § 2). It prevails also elsewhere. Thus the Abyssinian Christians perform the rite on both sexes; and the disuse of it as recommended by some missionaries is said to have produced physical inconveniences. See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 386-394; Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Beschnidung.'

The ceremonies at present used by the Jews in circumcision are thus described by Mr. Mills. After enumerating a few circumstances which may require it to be deferred beyond the eighth day he says, 'The first thing to be done is to choose sandakin, something similar to a godfather and godmother in the Christian world. The sandakin, however, undertake no future responsibilities towards the child—all their duties are over on the day of circumcision. They are generally husband and wife. . . . The parents must also give the child a name, that it might be mentioned at its circumcision. . . . Before the eighth day a mohel or circumciser must be engaged. If the father happen to be one, he is bound to circumcise his own child. On the Friday evening before the circumcision, it is announced in the synagogue that to A. son of B. a son is born; and after the service a few friends are entertained at the parents' house with fruit and wine, known by the name of zachar, i.e. male. When the time for performing the ceremony is arrived, all things are ready in the appointed place. This ought to be the synagogue; but, if the parents live at a distance from the synagogue to which they belong, or if the weather be inclement, they have it done at home. There must be present a minyán (congregation), among whom are the chazan (reader or minister), and secretary of the synagogue. The mohel also is ready, with his knife, lint, plaster, &c. These are given to a relative of the child to hold during the operation, by way of compliment, as it is deemed a meritorious thing to assist in the work. Two other persons hold each a glass of wine in readiness for the mohel. The child is brought to the door of the synagogue by the godmother, and there is received by the godfather. As he carries the child towards the congregation, they say, "Blessed is he that cometh." In the middle is a large chair with two seats, one for the godfather, the other to be left vacant; it is the seat of Elijah the prophet, who is called the "angel of the covenant," and who, it is believed, is present to witness the ceremony, although invisible. The godfather being seated, and the child placed on a cushion on his lap, the mohel lays hold of the foreskin, and secures it in a silver instrument, to keep it separate from the sinewy part of the member, and that it may not slip from him during the operation. All now being ready, the mohel pronounces the following blessing, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and commanded us circumcision," when he immediately cuts off the foreskin close to the instrument, and rends the remainder with his nails, until the glands are laid bare. Without this rending the ceremony would have no value. Then the father of the child says the following blessing, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and commanded us to enter into the covenant of our father Abraham." To this the congregation present answer, "As he hath entered into the covenant, so may he enter into the law, the canopy (used in marriage), and good deeds." He then, with the greatest despatch, takes the wounded part unto his mouth, sucks the blood repeatedly, rinsing his mouth each time with the wine in one of the aforesaid glasses, applies to it lint and plaster. When properly bound up with bandages, the godfather leaves the chair; and, holding the child in his arms, the mohel says as follows, "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, the Creator of the fruit of the vine. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, who hast sanctified his beloved (i.e. Abraham) from the womb, and ordained an ordinance for his kindred, and sealed his descendants with the mark of the holy covenant; therefore, for the merits of this, O living God, our rock and inheritance, command the deliverance of the beloved of our kindred from the pit, for the sake of the covenant which he hath put in our flesh. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the maker of the covenant. Our God, and the God of our fathers, preserve this child to his father and mother; and his name shall be called in Israel —, son of —. Let his father rejoice in those that go forth from his loins; and let his mother be glad in the fruit of her womb; as it is written, Thy father and thy mother shall rejoice, and they that begat thee shall be glad. And it is further said, And I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thy blood, and I said unto thee in thy blood, thou shalt live. And it is said, He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he hath commanded to a thousand generations; even the covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac; and he hath confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant. And it is said, And Abraham circumcised his son Isaac, being eight days old, as God commanded him. O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever. A. B., this little one, may he live to be great; and, as he hath entered into the covenant, so may he enter into the law, and the canopy, and good works." Whilst rehearsing this blessing, the mohel, at intervals, dips his little finger three several times in the second glass of wine, and afterwards puts it into the child's mouth, uttering certain words in allusion to the child's long life. The ceremony being carried on thus far, the father according to his circumstances makes an offering of money to the poor. The mohel, the sandak, and the friends of the parties, make similar offerings. Certain compliments are then made and fees paid. If a child dies before he is eight days old, the operation is performed with a piece of glass on the corpse without prayers or blessing. 'It is also generally believed that a mohel, who has circumcised as many children as the numerical value of the letters of his name amount to, is thereby entitled to a peculiar state of felicity in the world to come.' The British Jews, part i. chap. i. pp. 9-14.

CIS (Acts xiii. 21). The Greek form of KISH, which see.

CISAI (Rest of Esth. xi. 2).

CISTERN. There is frequent mention of these receptacles for water in scripture. They are to be distinguished from the living springs or fountains, and from the wells, which are supplied by water rising into them from the ground. Cisterns are rather for the collection of rain-water. And, as such reservoirs are needful in our own country, and are in common use among ourselves, much more, we may readily conceive, would the people be dependent on them in a hotter climate, and in a land where perennial streams are few, and where, for a considerable part of the year, little or no rain falls. These cisterns in the country are generally large pits, or subterranean vaults, with a small mouth or opening, which can be closed with flat stones, and then concealed by sand placed over the stones. Such cisterns are of in calculable value to the shepherd for the watering of his flocks, and a great refreshment to the thirsty traveller. And the disappointment of finding no water is in a warm climate of serious character (Isai. xli. 17). Many ancient cisterns still exist: on the road from Jericho to Beth-el, for example, 'broken cisterns' (Jer. ii. 13), holding no water, are found at regular intervals. In cities these reservoirs were, of course, very numerous. They were either hewn in the rock, or built up with walls; and the rain-water was conducted into them from the roofs. Those now in use are often furnished with a curb and wheel for a bucket, as in an ordinary well. Most houses in Jerusalem are provided with them; and there are said to be very large ones in the area of the temple. Deposits there were, of course, accumulating by neglect; so that, if allowed to get dry, a mass of mire remained at the bottom. And, when they were used, as was occasionally the case, as places of confinement, the prisoner was likely to sink into the mire (Gen. xxxvii. 22; Psal. xl. 2; Jer. xxxviii. 6). Hence the word signifying cistern seems sometimes used simply for a dungeon (Gen. xl. 15).

CITHERN (1 Macc. iv. 54). A musical stringed instrument, probably resembling the modern guitar, for which the word 'cithern' was formerly used. Opinions differ as to the shape of this instrument in ancient times.

CITIES. Cities are mentioned in the very infancy of the world. Before the flood, the building of a city is noted (Gen. iv. 17). And, of course, when the earth was being re-peopled, it was natural that men should live collected together, for mutual help and defence. Hence we read of cities in remote antiquity, some of which are yet existing, Nineveh, Babylon, Hebron, Damascus, &c. It may be that, when first named, it is rather as sites on which afterwards walls and habitations rose. But certainly in Abraham's days there were towns of some magnitude: Sodom, for example, is spoken of with a gate and streets (xix. 1, 2). In process of time cities multiplied, were enlarged, and strengthened. Thus the Israelites built treasure-cities in Egypt (Exod. i. 11): the spies described those of Canaan as 'walled and very great' (Numb. xiii. 23): Moses also speaks of them in similar terms (Deut. ix. 1), and uses even stronger language of the cities of Bashan (iii. 5), which remain to the present day sufficient witnesses that his narrative was truthful. There have always been pastoral and nomad tribes who have not constructed settled habitations. Such were the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv. 6-10); but these have often been compelled in troublous times to seek the protection of cities (11). And for this protection we find that there were FENCED CITIES, which see; strong-holds, probably, at first, about which habitations gradually clustered, which afterwards were surrounded with walls, and which had suburbs in addition (e.g. Josh. xxi. 2, 8), including spaces appropriated for pasturage. Cities were often, as it were, rural capitals, with unwalled villages depending upon them and looking to them for defence (Neh. xi. 25, 27, 30, 31). Hence a 'land of unwalled villages,' requiring no such defence, was a land of rest, the inhabitants dwelling in peace and security (Ezek. xxxviii. 11). Provincial cities appear to have had their own municipal government (1 Kings xxi. 8-14), administered by elders or magistrates: these, according to Josephus, (Antiq. lib. iv. 8, § 14), were seven, with two Levites to each as officers. Sometimes we read of the 'governor' of a city (1 Kings xxii. 26). Ezra, after the captivity, is said to have appointed local judges (Ezra vii. 25); while, later, there were provincial councils, with presidents, after the fashion of the sanhedrim in Jerusalem, and under its authority.

It was very common to assign special cities for particular purposes; thus there were Levitical cities, and cities of the priests: see LEVITES. Solomon had cities of store, chariot-cities, horse-cities (1 Kings ix. 19).

We have little means of computing the population of the ancient cities of Palestine. As to their general aspect, they probably resembled modern cities of the east, having narrow streets, and places of assemblage at the gates (Ruth iv. 1, 2; 1 Kings xxii. 10).

CITIES OF REFUGE. Among the various provisions of the Hebrew law, there was one for the protection of any who might kill his neighbour without malice aforethought. Six cities of those assigned to the priests and Levites were invested with the right of asylum. These six were three on each side of the Jordan; Hebron, a city of the priests, Shechem, and Kedesh in Galilee, Levitical cities on the west; Bezer, Ramoth-gilead, and Golan in Bashan, Levitical cities on the east of the river (Deut. iv. 41-43; Josh. xx. 7, 8, xxi. 13, 21, 27, 32, 36, 38).

About these cities were suburbs, a thousand cubits every way, the length of each side of the square thus formed being two thousand cubits, a result which has startled several critics who have forgotten to carry the common principles of arithmetic along with them in their researches, and have hence charged the scripture record with mistake (Numb. xxxv. 3-5). The regulations for those claiming the right of refuge will be found in Exod. xxi. 12-14; Numb. xxxv. 9-34; Deut. xix. 1-13. After examination made, if they were pronounced entitled to it, they had protection, but must live within the boundaries of the refuge-city, till the death of the high priest, when they might return in safety to their own homes. It is said that direction-posts were set up to guide the fugitive to the asylum; and various additions to the law were imagined or introduced by rabbinical writers.

It would seem that God's altar was held to give some privilege of asylum (1 Kings i. 50, ii. 28). The right of sanctuary was possessed by certain Greek and Roman cities, and it was afterwards claimed to a great extent for Christian churches.

CITTIMS (1 Macc. viii. 5). See CHITTIM.

CITIZENSHIP. The privilege of Roman citizenship is frequently referred to in the

New Testament. It was acquired by birth, or hereditary descent, by purchase (Acts xxii. 28), also by manumission, and military service. Some of the rights enjoyed were freedom from bonds and scourging (xvi. 37, 38, xxii. 25, 26, 29); also the power of appealing, or transferring a cause from a provincial magistrate to the emperor (xxv. 11, 12). St. Paul alludes to the privilege of citizenship in Phil. iii. 20: 'our country,' our home, where we have our rights as denizens of a noble city, 'is in heaven.'

CITRON. See APPLE-TREE.

CITY. See CITIES.

CLAP, CLAPPING THE HANDS (Psal. xlvii. 1, xcvi. 8; Isai. lv. 12). Antiquarian research illustrates this expression. The Egyptian tombs show that it was usual to beat the measure in singing, by clapping the hands (Osburn's Anc. Egypt, p. 238).

CLAU'DA. An island off the south-west coast of Crete, under the lee of which the vessel in St. Paul's voyage to Italy had to run (Acts xxvii. 16). It is now called Gozzo. See Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, pp. 92-107, 253.

CLAU'DIA. A Christian lady at Rome who joins in the salutations which St. Paul sends to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21). There is reason to believe that Claudia was a Briton, and that she became the wife of Pudens mentioned in the same place. See PUDENS.

CLAU'DIUS. Tiberius Claudius Nero Drusus Germanicus, the son of Nero Drusus, born at Lyons 9 or 10 B.C., became fourth Roman emperor on the assassination of Caius Caligula, and reigned 41-54 A.D. He was a weak and indolent man, and was poisoned by his fourth wife, Agrippina. Several famines occurred in the reign of Claudius: one of which extended to Palestine and Syria (Acts xi. 28-30). And there was an edict of his which, in consequence of a tumult, expelled the Jews from Rome (xviii. 2). It is not agreed when this edict was issued. It is variously assigned to years between 49 and 53 A.D. Winer says 50 or 51. See AQUILA.

CLAU'DIUS LYS'IAS. (Acts xxi. 31-40, xxii., xxiii.). See LYSIAS, CLAUDIUS.

CLAY. For the use of clay in brick-making, see BRICK. Clay is also employed for pottery: see POTTER. We find the word occasionally signifying ordinary mire (Psal. xl. 2), and a mixture of spittle with dust (John ix. 6, 11, 15). Clay, moreover, was used for sealing (Job xxxviii. 14). Thus pieces of fine clay have been discovered in the Assyrian excavations, bearing devices evidently made by seals. The method was to roll a cylindrical seal upon a tablet of clay, which was then baked, and the impression preserved. Wine jars have been found in Egypt sealed with clay; and it is still a not uncommon practice in the east to seal doors with clay. See SEAL, THICK CLAY.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. A distinction, most probably with reference to sacrifice, was made between clean and unclean animals before the flood (Gen. vii. 2, 8, viii. 20). Under the Mosaic law the distinction was extended to food. Thus in Lev. xi. and Deut. xiv. there are lists of animals, birds, and fishes, which might and might not be eaten. The regulations thus made were doubtless promotive of health. But, besides, they, as well as the purifications prescribed for uncleanness in men (Lev. xi.-xv.; Numb. xix.), had a symbolical meaning, which is illustrated in Heb. ix. 9-14.

CLEM'ENT. A Christian mentioned by St. Paul as his fellow-labourer (Phil. iv. 3). He is generally supposed to be the person celebrated as bishop of Rome, and for a letter, yet extant, written to the church at Corinth.

CLEOPAS (very renowned). A disciple named as one of those who went to Emmaus and were joined by Jesus on the evening of the resurrection (Luke xxiv. 13). It is questioned whether he was identical with the Clopas or Cleophas, husband of Mary the Virgin's sister (John xix. 25). More probably not; for Mary's sons are mentioned with their mother in a way which would lead naturally to the conclusion that their father was deceased. He never appears.

CLEOPATRA.—1. The wife of Ptolemy: probably Ptolemy VI. is meant (Rest of Esth. xi. 1).—2. The daughter of No. 1, first married to Alexander Balas, king of Syria (1 Macc. x. 57, 58), then taken from him and given to his rival, Demetrius Nicator (xi. 12). When Demetrius was a captive in Parthia, she married his brother Antiochus VII. Demetrius returned to Syria, and was murdered there; Cleopatra being supposed to have been privy thereto. She afterwards murdered her eldest son by Demetrius, Seleucus V., and was in turn poisoned herself by her second son, Antiochus VIII.

CLEOPHAS (John xix. 25). A person called also Clopas (marg.) most likely identical with ALPHEUS, which see.

CLERK, or TOWN CLERK (Acts xix. 35). A prudent officer at Ephesus is so called; who calmed the uproar of the people which Demetrius had excited. He was the keeper of the archives, and public reader of decrees in the assemblies. Some have supposed that he had a sacred function. But this was not necessarily the case.

CLOAK (Isai. lix. 17; Matt. v. 40; Luke vi. 29; 2 Tim. iv. 13). See DRESS.

CLO'PAS (John xix. 25, marg.). See CLEOPHAS, ALPHEUS.

CLOTHES, CLOTHING. See DRESS.

CLOUD. The ordinary Hebrew word for cloud signifies covering: clouds are the covering of the heavens. Hence, very oppositely, a numerous army is represented as a cloud (Ezek. xxx. 18, xxxviii. 9); also, the transient character of anything is illustrated by the 'morning cloud' (Hos. vi. 4), which soon dissolves. Further, as in a hot climate the dazzling rays of the sun are agreeably tempered and veiled by clouds, the Deity is symbolized as veiling in clouds his intense glory, which no man can look on (Exod. xvi. 10; Psal. xviii. 11, 12, and elsewhere). And thus the visible sign of the presence of Jehovah with Israel was a column of cloud, resting when they were to remain in their encampment, moving on when they were to march, a cloud by day, luminous by night (Exod. xiii. 21, 22; Numb. x. 11-13, 33-36). A like symbol of the divine presence was in the sanctuary: see SHECHINAH. There are other Hebrew words sometimes rendered 'clouds': one in Prov. xxv. 14, properly vapours, which rise from the earth; another in Isai. xix. 1, implying darkness. The term last referred to means also the dark thicket of a wood (Jer. iv. 29).

CNI'DUS. A peninsula in the Ægean sea jutting out between the islands Cos and Rhodes. It was a part of Caria, or more properly Doris, and had a town of the same name, where the worship of Venus prevailed. It was passed by St. Paul on his voyage to Italy (Acts xxvii. 7). Cnidus is mentioned in the Maccabean history (1 Macc. xv. 23).

COACHES (Isai. lxvi. 20, marg.). See LITTER.

COAL. It is very doubtful whether the mineral to which we ordinarily give this name is intended in any of the places in which the word 'coal' appears in our version. Fossil coal was used by some ancient nations; yet we cannot venture to decide that the Hebrews were acquainted with it. Fossil coal, indeed, exists in Syria. Indications of it have been found in the mountains of Lebanon; and a coal mine has been worked at Cornale, eight hours east from Beirut at a height of 2,500 feet above the level of the sea. The late Mohammed Ali employed an English engineer on this (Kitto, Phys. Geogr. of Holy Land, 1848, chap. ii. p. 95). But the fact by no means proves that the Israelites worked any coal mine there. Their fuel was charcoal, dung, &c.; so that the word generally rendered 'coal' most probably means charcoal, of which the roots of the broom-plant are considered by the Arabs to yield the best. Another Hebrew word sometimes signifies burning coal, sometimes fuel not kindled, e.g. Prov. xxvi. 21: 'as fuel to kindled coals.' Another word is used in 1 Kings ix. 6: it probably means the heated stones on which it was customary to bake bread (see Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. pp. 289, 290). The 'coals' of Sol. Song viii. 6, are, perhaps, flames: the same word occurs in Habak. iii. 5, where the meaning is uncertain. In Lam. iv. 8, the marginal rendering is to be preferred. Henderson translates (Jeremiah and Lam., p. 298) 'darker than the dawn.'

The word is sometimes employed figuratively; as (2 Sam. xiv. 7) for the last hope or remnant of a family, also for severe punishments (Psal. cxl. 10), for burning remorse, and shame (Prov. xxv. 22), for lightnings (Psal. xviii. 12, 13).

COAT. See DRESS.

COAT OF MAIL (1 Sam. xvii. 5, 38). See ARMS.

COCK. The ordinary domestic bird mentioned, with one exception, only in connection with St. Peter's denial of Christ (Matt. xxvi. 34, 74, 75; Mark xiii. 35, xiv. 30, 68, 72; Luke xxii. 34, 60, 61; John xiii. 38, xviii. 27). The cock crows with peculiar vivacity just about dawn; but the time generally understood by cock-crowing was three in the morning. The rabbins pretend that cocks were not allowed to be kept in Jerusalem, for the sanctity of the place; but there is no proof that this was really the case.

COCKATRICE (Isai. xl. 8, xiv. 29, lix. 5; Jer. viii. 17). See ADDER.

COCKLE (Job xxxi. 40). This, the original word of which signifies 'a noisome thing,' may possibly be the same with 'the tares' of our Lord's parable (Matt. xiii. 24-30). See TARES. But perhaps it is better to understand generally any noxious weed: see Duns' Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 368.

COELE-SYRIA (hollow Syria). This word does not occur in scripture: it is the name originally given by the Greeks to the valley or hollow between Lebanon and Anti-libanus, a region said to present a beautiful picture of fertility to him who looks down from a height into this long cavity—extending probably 100 miles—between the two mountain ranges. Coele-syria was afterwards understood to include a much wider district, comprising the tracts east of the Jordan down to the very shores of the Red sea, and the cities of Heliopolis, Abila of Lysanias, Damascus, Gadara, Pella, Philadelphia, &c., and even Scythopolis on the west of the Jordan. In the Apocrypha, it is frequently mentioned as Cele syria, apparently equivalent to Syria (e.g. 1 Esdr. ii. 17, 24, 27; 1 Macc. x. 69). See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Coeloesyrien.'

COFFER. A chest or box hanging from the side of a cart or wain (1 Sam. vi. 8, 11, 15).

COFFIN (Gen. l. 26; Luke vii. 14, marg.). See BURIAL.

CO'LA (Judith xv. 4).

COL-HO'ZEH (all-seeing). A man of Judah (Neh. iii. 15, xl. 5).

CO'LUI'S (1 Esdr. ix. 23). A form of Ke-laiah (Ezra x. 23).

COLLAR (Judges viii. 26). See EAR-RINGS. The orifice at the neck of a close-fitting garment is meant in Job xxx. 18: it is said to have had a strong binding round it. It was this orifice or 'collar,' that is intended also in Psal. cxxxiii. 2, where the ointment on Aaron's head is described as descending to his beard, and to the collar where his robe fitted round his neck, not to his skirts.

COLLEGE. The word so rendered in 2 Kings xxii. 14; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22 does not mean any scholastic establishment, but rather 'the other part,' probably the lower city on the hill Akra. The same term differently translated occurs in Neh. xi. 9; Zeph. i. 10.

COLONY. The city of Philippi is called a colony (Acts xvi. 12). It was so made by Augustus Cæsar. A Roman colony was, as it were, a portion of Rome transplanted to the place. The colonists were veteran soldiers and freedmen, who as Roman citizens were enrolled in one of the tribes and retained their privilege of voting at Rome. The Roman law was in force in the colony, which had its own senate and magistrates, being exempt from the authority of the governor of the province. These privileges were possessed only by the original colonists, and their descendants by Roman wives, or women of a country or town having Roman citizenship.

COLOS'SE, COLOS'SÆ, or COLAS'SÆ. This was formerly a large city of Phrygia, seated on the river Lycus, which sinks into a deep chasm, and discharges itself into the Mæander (Herod., lib. vii. 30; Xen., Anab., lib. i. 2, 6). It was in the immediate neighbourhood of Laodicea and Hierapolis (Col. ii. 1, iv. 13, 15, 16); and, though it continued to be a town of some importance, it was in the course of time overshadowed by the greater cities in its vicinity. Colossæ, with the places above mentioned, was destroyed by an earthquake in the ninth year of Nero; it must, however, have been almost immediately re-built. Its site was about three miles from the modern village of Chonas. The majority of commentators believe that St. Paul had not visited it when he wrote the epistle (ii. 1); but he expresses his hope (Philem. 22) of going thither after his release from Rome. Epaphras was probably the founder of the church at Colossæ (i. 7). Philemon, Onesimus, and Archippus are other persons named who (it is generally supposed) dwelt in the place. It is noticeable that angel-worship, referred to in ii. 18, is known to have prevailed in later times through the district.

COLOS'SIANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. There can be no reasonable doubt that this epistle is from the pen of St. Paul. It is cited by Justin Martyr and Theophilus of Antioch, and distinctly ascribed to the apostle by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen. The notion of a few modern critics that it contains phrases and ideas drawn from heretical philosophers of later times will not bear examination. It must also be conceded that it was written from Rome, most probably in the earlier and freer period of St. Paul's imprisonment, when he was allowed to dwell in his own hired house, and to preach the gospel without molestation (Acts xxviii. 30, 31; Col. iv. 3, 4). The date may, therefore, be fixed at about 61 or 62 A.D. It has, indeed, been thought by some that this epistle was written from Cæsarea, during the apostle's two years' confinement under Felix; but it does not appear, though the governor 'communed with him' (Acts xxiv. 26), that he had then any general liberty of preaching.

The believers at Colossæ were mainly Gentiles (i. 27, ii. 13); and the letter to them seems to have been occasioned by information which Epaphras and Onesimus had conveyed. St. Paul, therefore, while rejoicing in the proofs he had of the fruitfulness of the gospel among them (i. 6), felt it necessary to caution them against that spirit of erroneous philosophy, Judaistic and oriental, fostered by the superstitious tendencies of the Phrygian character, which was derogatory to the glory of Christ, and which tended to the fatal Gnosticism which afterwards so corrupted the faith.

After his usual introduction (i. 1, 2) the apostle expresses his joy for what he had heard of the Colossians (3-8), prays for their further improvement (9-11), and specially that they might be thankful to the Father for having translated them into the kingdom of his dear Son, whose dignity he emphatically describes (12-20) as the reconciler of all things. He then enlarges on their being partakers of the reconciliation, reminding them that they were once alienated, but now settled in a blessed hope through that mystery of the gospel of which he was a minister, and for which he suffered (21-29); it being his anxious desire that they might come to the full knowledge of Christ, not deceived by plausible sophistries (ii. 1-7). He warns them, therefore, against the vain philosophy which would separate from Christ, and would have them soar above creature-worship, and carnal observances, to those high principles which, if risen with Christ, they should remember ought to rule in them (8-iii. 4). He adds many special admonitions to a holy life, inculcating relative duties (5-iv. 6), and concludes with some private directions and greetings (7-18).

The striking similarity of the epistles to Ephesus and Colossæ should not be unnoticed. They were written about the same time, probably that to the Colossians first; and neighbouring cities were likely to need the same kind of address. The two should be read together, and carefully compared. Among the valuable commentaries on this epistle, may be mentioned those of Bp. Davenant, Expos. Ep. Pauli ad Coloss., and of Bp. Ellicott, Comm. on Ep. to Coloss. 1858.

COLOURS. A variety of colours, both natural and artificial, are mentioned in scripture. And it is obvious that these generally have a symbolical meaning, especially as sometimes they were prescribed by God himself, e.g. in the construction of the tabernacle and of the priestly garments, and also as they prominently occur in those parts of the divine book, e.g. the prophetic visions, where by natural qualities spiritual things are figured. Fully to investigate the whole subject of colours would require greater and more etymological disquisition than the present work can admit: it must suffice to point out here some general principles and illustrations.

The natural tints shall be noticed first: they may be enumerated as white, black, red, yellow, and green.

White. There are several words used to designate white, distinguishing no doubt different degrees, from a dead whitish hue to the glorious splendour of the sun-light. Thus we have the paleness of shame (Isai. xxix. 22), the hoariness of white hair (Gen. xlii. 38), the dull white of milk (xlix. 12) and of marble (Esth. i. 6), and the dazzling brightness with which our Lord's face and garments shone on the mount of transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 2). Whiteness is illustrated by various similitudes, as snow, and wool (2 Kings v. 27; Isai. i. 18). White symbolized purity: thus angels were clothed in white raiment (Acts i. 10), and glorified saints (Rev. iii. 4. vi. 11); it signified also conquest; hence the white horses on which conquerors were seated (vi. 2, xix. 11, 14: comp. Zech. vi. 3), and joy: thus festive garments were described as white (Eccles. ix. 8).

Black had, like white, various shades, and expresses the darkness of a sad countenance (Job xxx. 30; Jer. viii. 21), the colour of hair (Sol. Song v. 11), and a tawny complexion (i. 5). It also implies the hue produced by being scorched or burnt, as by fire or the sun's rays (Gen. xxx. 32, where our version has 'brown'; Joel ii. 6), and, further, denotes the darkness of water (Job vi. 16), mourning garments, black and squalid (Mal. iii. 14: comp. marg.), the gloom of a clouded sky (1 Kings xviii. 45), and also the night (Prov. vii. 9; Jer. iv. 28). Black symbolizes evil and distress (Zech. vi. 2; Rev. vi. 5, 12).

Red is illustrated by blood (2 Kings iii. 22), and describes the colour of a heifer (Numb. xix. 2), pottage of lentiles (Gen. xxv. 30), wine (Psal. lxxv. 8, where, however, it is possible that the fermentation rather than the colour may be intended; Prov. xxiii. 31), the complexion, or perhaps sometimes the hair (Gen. xxv. 25; 1 Sam. xvi. 12; xvii. 42, where in our version 'ruddy'). A fainter hue of red is occasionally introduced (Lev. xiii. 19, xiv. 37), 'reddish.' The 'speckled' or 'bay' horses of Zech. i. 8 were reddish or fox-coloured. Red was a symbol of bloodshed or destruction. Hence sins are called 'red' (Isai. i. 18); and the horse whose rider held the sword was 'red' (Rev. vi. 4); as also the symbolical dragon (xii. 3).

Yellow occurs only as descriptive of leprous hair (Lev. xiii. 30, 32, 36), which had probably a greenish cast, and of gold (Psal. lxxviii. 13).

Green, as a colour, is used almost exclusively of herbs or grass (e.g. Gen. i. 30). But very frequently it denotes (we employ the word in the same way) fresh, flourishing, moist, unripe (e.g. Lev. ii. 14; Judges xvi. 7, 8; Job xv. 32). Words, elsewhere rendered green, are sometimes in our translation 'pale' (Jer. xxx. 6; Rev. vi. 8); where the idea is that of the livid ghastly hue of death. The 'green' of Gen. xxx. 37; Esth. i. 6 is more properly white.

Notice may be here taken of that intermixture of some of the colours just spoken of which distinguishes certain animals. The 'speckled' and 'spotted' (Gen. xxx. 32) were those marked with white and black; the 'ringstraked' (35) those with white bands or stripes, white-footed: the 'gristed' (xxx. 10) had probably larger spots: when spoken of horses (Zech. vi. 3, 6), the meaning is 'pie-bald': the 'white asses' (Judges v. 10) were perhaps white and red, reddish, dappled.

The colours imparted by dyeing, or artificial process, may be enumerated as purple, blue or violet, scarlet or crimson, and vermilion. Four tints are said to have been regarded as sacred, because they were used for holy purposes. These were purple, blue, and scarlet, with white (Exod. xxv. 4); for the 'fine linen' must be understood, according to its texture, to have been white. These colours are said to have had a mystical application; Philo and Josephus asserting that they represented the sea, the air, fire, and the earth (Philo, De Mose, lib. iii. vol. ii., p. 148, edit. Mangey, 1742; Josephus, Antiq., lib. iii. cap. 7, § 7). It is more likely that they were chosen mainly for their cost and beauty.

The purple tint was obtained from a shellfish, the Murex trunculus, found in the Mediterranean sea. The colouring matter was extracted from a single vessel in the fish; each yielding but a very small quantity: it was therefore rare and of high value. Purple robes were worn by sovereigns and great men: they were a mark of pre-eminence and luxurious wealth (Judges viii. 26; Esth. viii. 15; Jer. x. 9; Dan. v. 7, marg.; Luke xvi. 19; Rev. xvii. 4). But it would seem that various hues were comprehended under the word. For we find it applied to hair (Sol. Song vii. 5); and the purple garment in which our Lord was clothed (John xix. 5) is elsewhere called scarlet (Matt. xxvii. 28). Probably this purple was lighter and more shining than the dark blue, to be next described. It might also have a reddish tinge.

Blue, occasionally translated 'violet' (Esth. i. 6, marg.), must have been a deep dark hue. The dye of this colour also was procured from a shell-fish, found on the Phœnician coast, the Helix ianthina. The loops of the curtains of the tabernacle were blue (Exod. xxvi. 4), as also were the laces of the high priest's breast-plate, and of his mitre, and the robe of the ephod (xxviii. 28, 31, 37). The riband and fringe on the borders of the Israelites' garments were blue (Numb. xv. 38). Moreover, cloths of blue were to be put upon the sacred utensils when the tabernacle was removed; scarlet and purple being in two cases also commanded (iv. 6-13). Blue robes were worn (as purple) by great men (Ezek. xxiii. 6); and Jeremiah describes the idols of Babylon arrayed in these two colours (Jer. x. 9).

Scarlet and crimson seem to be the same. The scarlet dye was procured from the female of an insect, Coccus ilicis, which is found on the boughs of a species of ilex, Ilex coccifera, and is common in several eastern countries, and resembles the cochineal, Coccus cacti. This hue is brilliant and glaring. We read of scarlet threads or lines (Gen. xxxviii. 28; Josh. ii. 18, 21). Scarlet (perhaps also cord) was used in conjunction with hyssop and cedar, in the ceremony of cleansing the recovered leper (Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 49, 51, 52), and at the burning of the red heifer (Numb. xix. 6). Scarlet robes were worn by the wealthy (2 Sam. i. 24; Prov. xxxi. 21; Jer. iv. 30; Lam. iv. 5; Rev. xvii. 4). Eastern warriors wore scarlet (Nah. ii. 3); as did Roman military officers. The lips are likened to a thread of scarlet (Sol. Song iv. 3); and sins are described as being like scarlet (Isai. i. 18).

The four tints that have been spoken of as sacred were used in combination in the curtains of the tabernacle, for the veils at the entrances (Exod. xxvi. 1, 31, 36, xxvii. 16), also for the high priest's robes, the ephod, girdle, and breast-plate (xxviii. 6, 8, 15): the pomegranates on the hem of the robe of the ephod were to have three colours, blue, purple, and scarlet (33); while the mitre was to be white (39).

Vermilion was a colour used in decorating the beams and panels of houses (Jer. xxii. 14). It was common among the Assyrians for drawing images on the walls of temples (Ezek. xxiii. 14), as testified by the late discoveries. Idols, according to an apocryphal writer, were painted with vermilion (Wisd. xiii. 14). This pigment was of ochre. See Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 342-346; Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Farben.'

COLT. This word is used in scripture for the young of camels (Gen. xxxii. 15) and asses (xlix. 11; Judges x. 4, xii. 14; Job xi. 12; Zech. ix. 9; Matt. xxi. 2, 5, 7; Mark xi. 2, 5, 7; Luke xix. 30, 33, 35; John xii. 15). See ASS, CAMEL.

COMFORTER. The term 'Comforter' in the New Testament generally designates the Holy Spirit (John xiv. 16, 26, xv. 26, xvi. 7). The same word differently rendered is sometimes applied to Christ, as in 1 John ii. 1, where it is translated 'Advocate.' See SPIRIT, HOLY.

COMMANDMENTS. See LAW.

COMMERCE. The interchange of commodities must necessarily have begun at a very early period of the world's history. Indeed, we can scarcely conceive of a state of society at all, without the demand and supply from man to man of what the one possessed and the other needed. We have incidental notices in scripture, which serve to show how soon commerce existed. Thus Abraham was rich in gold and silver as well as in cattle (Gen. xiii. 2); also he had slaves bought with his money (xvii. 12, 13, xxiv. 35), and articles of jewelry (xxiv. 23, 30, 53). And, when he purchased the cave and field of Machpelah for a burying-place, he paid for it in current money (weighed out) of the merchant (xxiii. 16). In Jacob's time we find that the Shechemites counted on the advantage they should get by an alliance with his family for trade (xxxiv. 21). A little later we read of a caravan of merchantmen passing near the pasture-ground of Dothan, conveying from Gilead the productions of Arabia, and the adjacent countries, into Egypt (xxxvii. 25, 28, 36). The famine, moreover, which Joseph had predicted—and no doubt other scarcities when they occurred—promoted a brisk corn-trade between Egypt and other nations (xii. 56, 57; comp. xlii. 3, xliii. 11, 12).

It is probable that some of the materials required for the construction of the tabernacle were obtained by barter or purchase. The laws of Moses, however, did not encourage commerce. Statutes were enacted for strict justice in regard to weights and measures (Lev. xix. 35, 36; Deut. xxv. 13-15); but the prohibition of usury or interest, and the command to let the poor and the stranger have freely the produce of the sabbatical year (Exod. xxii. 25, xxiii. 11, xxv. 6, 14, 35-37; Deut. xxiii. 19), must very much have checked trade, especially internal trade. Still usury from foreigners was not forbidden (xv. 3, xxiii. 20); and advantage was clearly anticipated from external commerce (xv. 6, xxviii. 12). When the Israelites occupied Canaan the productions of other countries were found there (Josh. vii. 21); but we perceive little or no indication of foreign trading till the establishment of the monarchy.

David acquired great facilities for traffic by subduing Edom, and becoming master of the two ports of Eloth and Ezion-geber, on the Red sea (2 Sam. viii. 14), and by the commercial relations he established with Hiram, king of Tyre (v. 11). Hitherto trade seems to have been mostly carried on by land, and merchandise was transported across the deserts by camels, a hardy race of animals, admirably adapted by nature for such a purpose. And, lest they should be attacked and plundered by robbers, the merchants associated themselves in companies (Isai. xxi. 13), yet common enough for the same reason in the east. Solomon used and improved the advantages which his father had obtained. He visited his sea-ports on the Red sea, and established a profitable trade, his ships making voyages of three years, in conjunction with his Tyrian ally, for gold and silver, precious stones, spices, sandal-wood, ivory, &c. (1 Kings ix. 26-28, x. 22; 2 Chron. viii. 17, 18, ix. 10). The building of the temple, too, and the other great works which this monarch carried on, gave animation to the commercial intercourse with Tyre, then, as long after, a mart of nations, whither commodities found their way from various quarters of the world, to be thence circulated through other countries (Ezek. xxvii.). Solomon, moreover, encouraged commerce by land. Horses, chariots, and linen yarn were imported into Palestine out of Egypt, at a fixed price; and these were not only for home consumption, but for the supply of neighbouring districts (1 Kings x. 28, 29). Private enterprise also flourished, for it would seem that some duty was collected on imports (15; 2 Chron. ix. 14); and it may be supposed that some of the cities which Solomon built or fortified were intended (Tadmor, i.e. Palmyra, for example, 1 Kings ix. 18) as commercial stations or depôts.

After the division of the kingdom, as Edom remained subject to the princes of the house of David, the Jews carried on the oriental trade from their ports of Eloth and Ezion-geber; and it was perhaps with a view of commercial advantage that the kings of Israel sought alliance with those of Judah (xxii. 48, 49; 2 Chron. xx. 35-37). When Edom revolted in the reign of Jehoram (xxi. 10), that trade was crippled, till Uzziah recovered Eloth (xxvi. 2). The place was, however, lost again under Ahaz, and the Jews were finally expelled (2 Kings vi. 6).

But we must not believe that they ceased to be a commercial people. Many notices are scattered through the scriptures which prove both that foreign commodities found their way in abundance into Palestine (Isai. ii. 6, 7); so that Jerusalem was regarded as a rival of Tyre (Ezek. xxvi. 2); and that the productions of the country were exported (Prov. xxxi. 24; Hos. xii. 2; Jonah i. 3, 5); and also that there was a brisk inland trade (Neh. xiii. 15, 16, 20). Wheat, honey, oil, and balm are particularly noticed as supplied by Judah and Israel to Tyre (Ezra iii. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 17). During the reigns of the Asmonean princes, Joppa, which was fortified by Simon Maccabeus (1 Macc. xiv. 34), and Cæsarea afterwards were busy seaports; and Tyre, as of old, was in New Testament times dependent on Judea for corn (Acts xii. 20).

The frequent journeys of the Hebrews on occasion of their festivals must have stimulated business, just as, in later times among the Mohammedans, pilgrimages to Mecca were taken (by allowance of the Koran, sur. ii. 195) advantage of for trade. The sacrifices, too, required victims. Hence we find buyers and sellers intruding even into the temple-courts with their supply of animals and birds for offerings (John ii. 13-16). It may be added that the Jews in their dispersion have been always, it is well known, a trading people.

Commerce was doubtless at first carried on by barter; but afterwards the precious metals weighed out (Zech. xi. 12) became a convenient medium. And the use of them, especially when stamped into pieces of specified value, must have stimulated trade. See MONEY. The first Jewish prince who exercised the privilege of coining was Simon Maccabeus, by grant of Antiochus Sidetes (1 Macc. xv. 6). See Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr. vol. i. cap. xv. pp. 158-166.

COMMON. That which was partaken of by all men alike. Hence the Jews, whose rites separated them from Gentile nations, came to make 'common' synonymous with 'unclean,' 'defiled' (Mark vii. 2, marg.; Acts x. 14).

COMMUNION. A fellowship or agreement in which two or more join in one thing. Communion with God is the privilege which he allows to his people (Gen. xviii. 17-33; Exod. xxxiii. 9-11; Numb. xii. 7, 8). It was promised by Christ to his followers (John xiv. 23), and was enjoyed by Jew and Gentile alike through the operation of the Holy Ghost (Eph. ii. 18; 1 John i. 3). And, as it is by the power of the Spirit that the actual union is formed betwixt the soul of man and God, it is called the 'communion' or 'fellowship of the Spirit' (2 Cor. xiii. 14; Phil. ii. 1). Believers in Christ are knit into fellowship with each other (Eph. iv. 1-6). Hence the special application of the word to the celebration of the Lord's supper, an act of fellowship with Christ, and among Christians one with another (1 Cor. x. 16, 17).

COMPANY. A company of travellers is now called a caravan. Merchants or pilgrims join together for the sake of safety and convenience. A caravan often consists of many hundred persons who have provided themselves with necessaries for the journey, and is under the direction of a leader, well acquainted with the route, and the proper stopping-places by fountains or wells. The great annual caravan to Mecca has both a commercial and a religious character. Allusions to such a mode of travelling are frequent in scripture (Gen. xxxii. 7, 8, xxxvii. 25; Job vi. 19; Isai. xxi. 13; Luke ii. 42-44).

CONANI'AH (whom Jehovah hath set). A chief among the Levites (2 Chron. xxxv. 9).

CONCISION. A contemptuous term (Phil. iii. 2) to signify mere outward circumcision of the flesh. See CIRCUMCISION.

CONCUBINE. A secondary wife. The practice of concubinage probably grew out of polygamy; when there was a plurality of wives some being placed in an inferior grade. Concubines are mentioned very early in scripture; as in the history of Abraham (Gen. xvi.), of Nahor (xxii. 24), of Jacob (xxx). Sometimes wives, as in the cases of Sarah, Rachel, and Leah, gave their servants to their husbands for concubines, in order to obtain children; and the children so born were then reckoned as belonging to the wife whose servant the mother was. No stain appears to have attached to such children. It is true that Jotham depreciates Abimelech as the son of his father's maid-servant (Judges ix. 18), but this does not seem on account of alleged illegitimacy; rather from the social inferiority of Abimelech's mother. Sometimes a concubine is called a wife. Keturah is said to have been Abraham's wife (Gen. xxv. 1); and yet (5, 6) all Abraham's sons save Isaac are called the sons of concubines. We must, then, conclude that the concubines had a recognized position, that no immorality was considered to attach to the connection, and that the children were legitimate, though more dependent, perhaps, upon the father's will for any share in his inheritance than the sons of the actual or higher wives. The taking of a concubine very much resembled what is called now morganatic marriage, most common in Germany, in which a wife supposed to be socially below her husband does not take his titles or convey them to her children. Concubines were often servants or captives (Exod. xxi. 7-11; Deut. xxi. 10-14); but this was not always the case. The Levite's concubine (Judges xix.) was neither; and it is observable that her father is called the Levite's father-in-law. Moreover, no mention is made of this man's having another wife. Possibly, therefore, the higher or lower degree of marriage might be contracted at pleasure. Marriage with a concubine does not seem to have been celebrated with the ceremonies which attended that of the higher wife. There was no nuptial feast or dowry; and probably divorce was more unrestrained. After the establishment of the Israelitish monarchy, the kings accumulated concubines; and the right over those of one monarch accrued to his successor; so that to seize on any of them was regarded as an overt act of rebellion (2 Sam. iii. 7, xii. 8; 1 Kings ii. 22, xi. 3).

CONDEMNATION. A pronouncing of sentence as a judge upon a malefactor (John viii. 10, 11). Hence the law is said to be a 'ministration of condemnation,' or 'of death' (2 Cor. iii. 7, 9), because it convicts and sentences those who have transgressed it. Under this condemnation men generally lie (Rom. v. 16, 18). Inheriting the nature, inclined to evil, of their first father, they have personally broken the divine law; 'for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God' (iii. 23). There is but one means of escaping this condemnation, with its fearful consequences; and this is announced in the gospel of Christ: 'He that believeth on him (the Son) is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already (that is, has incurred that guilt which, unrepented and unforgiven, will condemn him), because he hath not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God' (John iii. 18). In the succeeding verse, the word 'condemnation' includes the idea of aggravation.

CONDUIT. Conduits are repeatedly mentioned in connection with Jerusalem. Thus there was close by the city 'the conduit of the upper pool' (2 Kings xviii. 17; Isai. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2); the locality of which was 'the highway of the fuller's field,' near the road that led to the place where the fullers plied their trade. We are further told that Hezekiah 'made a pool and a conduit, and brought water into the city' (2 Kings xx. 20); this being probably the same work with his stopping 'the waters of the fountains which were without the city,' and stopping 'the upper water-course of Gihon,' bringing it 'straight down to the west side of the city of David' (2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 4, 30). There is a difference of opinion as to the position of Gihon; and consequently it is not agreed what exactly it was that Hezekiah did. According to Keil's view, who identifies the reservoir of the upper Gihon with the modern Birket es-Mamilla, and the lower pool with Birket es-Sultan, the conduit here spoken of is that which went from the one to the other, and the 'end,' where Isaiah was to meet Ahaz, was that of the conduit leading from the pool to the city. Hezekiah, therefore, 'stopped the upper mouth of the water of Gihon, and conducted it down from the west to the city, that is, he covered the conduit going from the upper Gihon to the lower pool, and so conducted the water which formerly ran on the west side without the city-walls down into the valley of Ben-Hinnom, through a canal with several subterranean chambers into the city, whereby, in case of a siege, the water would be withdrawn from the enemy and preserved for the inhabitants' (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. p. 86). Dr. Robinson believes the lately-discovered subterranean conduit within Jerusalem to be a branch of Hezekiah's water-course (Bib. Res., vol. i. p. 346, vol. iii. pp. 243, 244; comp. Porter's Handb. for Syria and Palest., pp. 137, 138). Mr. Williams takes a different view. He places the fuller's field and Gihon on the north of the city, and imagines that the water was brought south to the temple, and thence flowed to the pool of Siloam or lower pool (The Holy City, vol. ii. pp. 469-478, 2nd edit.).

It may be added, that there is a conduit or water-course still existing, though injured and only partially serviceable, to convey the water from Solomon's pools to Jerusalem. See POOL.

CONEY. An animal whose flesh was forbidden to the Hebrews (Lev. xi. 5; Deut. xiv. 7). It is elsewhere spoken of (Psal. civ. 18; Prov. xxx. 26). The Hyrax Syriacus is most probably intended, a small animal like a marmot, found in Palestine (though now very rarely), Lebanon, Arabia, and elsewhere. It is hardly larger than a rabbit, has a very short tail; its ears, feet, and snout resembling those of the hedgehog. It is gregarious, makes its bed in the clefts of rocks, but does not burrow. It is timid, and difficult to capture. The animal exactly answers the description given in the passages cited from the Psalms and the Proverbs; but it is not ruminant, according to the classification in the Mosaic law. Perhaps, however, this is no sufficient objection; for the action of the jaws resembles that of ruminating animals.

CONFESSION. A penitential acknowledgment of sin either to God, as Aaron was to confess over the scape-goat the iniquities of the children of Israel (Lev. xvi. 21), and as Ezra and Daniel confessed their sins and the sins of their people (Ezra ix. 5-15; Dan. ix. 3-19; comp. 1 John i. 9; or to those who have been wronged (James v. 16). There was a notable provision in the Mosaic law that, if an offender confessed his fault, the prescribed penalty or restitution was lessened (Lev. v. 5; Numb. v. 7; comp. Exod. xxii. 1, 4). Confession is used to signify the open profession a man makes of his faith (Luke xii. 8).

CONGREGATION. This word is applied to the collective Hebrew people, theocratically regarded; from which some bodily disabilities would exclude, and into which a stranger could be admitted only under certain limitations (Exod. xii. 19; Numb. xv. 15; Deut. xxiii. 1-8). If a foreigner were circumcised, and did so enter into the congregation, he was perhaps ranked with some tribe or family, and thus was made capable of all the privileges of a home-born Israelite. But it was quite possible for a sojourner to become subject to some provisions and duties of the law, without thereby acquiring a place in the congregation (Lev. xvi. 29; Numb. ix. 14).

The congregation was an organized body, arranged under chiefs. The divisions of tribes, families, and houses were carefully preserved; and the heads of these were invested with a certain authority, individually or collectively, sometimes acting as representatives of the whole (Exod. vi. 14, 25; Josh. xiv. 1, xxi. 1; 1 Chron. viii. 10, 13, 28). They were called elders, heads, princes, renowned men (Numb. xvi. 2); and of them there were seventy selected as a kind of council in the general government (xi. 16). Those thus appointed by Moses were specially and divinely qualified (25), and in this respect they stood pre-eminent; but it was probably intended that the institution of a council should be permanent. The place of meeting was at the door of the tabernacle. A general assembly was summoned by blowing the two silver trumpets, the elders by the sound of one of them (x. 3, 4, 7). These elders, as the representative body, were sometimes called the congregation: to them were entrusted judicial powers: they were the means of communicating with the general mass; and their decisions bound the nation (Exod. xii. 21, xvii. 5, xix. 7, 8; Lev. iv. 14, 15; Numb. xv. 33-36, xxxv. 12; Josh. ix. 15, 18). Occasionally, however, the whole of the people were summoned (Exod. xix. 17). After the occupation of Canaan, the congregation assembled from time to time, but most generally we may suppose by the representative elders (Judges xx. 1; 1 Sam. vii. 5, x. 17, xi. 14, 15; 2 Sam. v. 1; 1 Kings xii. 1, 20; 2 Kings xi. 19; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 29).

The fact that the masses were represented by their chiefs disposes of the objection sometimes made to the credibility of the narrative on account of the difficulty of collecting the whole population.

CON'AH (Jer. xxii. 24, 28, xxxvii. 1). A shortened form of JEHOIACHIN, which see.

CONONI'AH (whom Jehovah hath set). A chief among the Levites (2 Chron. xxxi. 12, 13).

CONSCIENCE. The judgment of the soul giving its approbation to actions it thinks good, and condemning that which it supposes evil (Rom. ii. 15). The conscience must be enlightened, else it may not give a true testimony; and its dictates must be obeyed, else it will become depraved and defiled (1 Cor. viii. 7; Tit. i. 15). The testimony of a good conscience, guided by the Holy Ghost, is that which a Christian should desire and cultivate (Acts xxiv. 16; Rom. ix. 1; 2 Cor. i. 12; 1 Tim. i. 5, 19; 1 Pet. iii. 21).

CONSECRATION. See PRIEST, SANCTIFICATION.

CONVERT, CONVERSION. The change in a man's heart and life, when by the effectual working of the Holy Ghost (from whom 'all holy desires proceed') he turns from sin and the power of Satan to the service of God. It was this that St. Peter urged upon the Jews (Acts iii. 19), a change from an outward profession to vital godliness: it was this the news of which by Paul and Barnabas caused such joy to the brethren (xv. 3), the turning of the Gentiles from their idols to the faith of Christ. The expression of our Lord to Peter, 'when thou art converted' (Luke xxii. 32), must mean recovery from his fearful fall: having had experience of Satan's power, he might well warn and strengthen others against yielding to it: comp. 1 Pet. v. 8, 9.

CONVOCAION (Exod. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 2; Numb. xxviii. 18, xxix. 1, and elsewhere). The word so rendered denotes meetings of a religious character, and generally has the adjunct 'holy.' The same word occurs in Isai. i. 13, and is translated in our version 'assemblies.'

COOKING. The culinary art among the Hebrews was probably simple, and similar to that among the Egyptians. Females, generally speaking, were the cooks; and those at the head of a household, or of high rank, did not disdain so to employ themselves (Gen. xviii. 6, xxvii. 14; 2 Sam. xiii. 7-9). Men, also, prepared food; and there were persons, especially in large establishments, whose business it was to cook (Gen. xviii. 7, 8, xxv. 29; 1 Sam. viii. 13, ix. 23, 24). A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 350, has drawn together several notices scattered through the bible, which illustrate Hebrew cookery. When animal food was eaten, he remarks, it was killed only just when wanted (Gen.

xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24), and the blood poured out: it was then flayed, and, if roasted, roasted whole over the fire, or baked in an oven. This was certainly the case with the paschal lamb (Exod. xii. 8, 9, 46); but we can scarcely infer that an animal was always roasted or baked whole. Boiling was, perhaps, more common; and the writer alluded to says that then the animal was cut up, and the shoulder given to the priest (Lev. vii. 32). But surely the priest's portion did not depend on the difference between roasting and boiling: there were specified parts of certain sacrifices that belonged of right to the priests; and ordinarily, it was prescribed, when animals were slain they were to be brought to the door of the tabernacle, that a peace-offering might be made; though there was special provision that the Israelites should not be bound to this when settled in Canaan, and far from the sanctuary (xvii. 1-7; Deut. xii. 5-7, 10-28). The mode of boiling may be gathered from Ezek. xxiv. 3-6, 10; Mic. iii. 3. When sufficiently cooked, the flesh and the broth were served separately (Judges vi. 19). Meat was sometimes highly seasoned (Gen. xxvii. 4, 7). Vegetables seem to have been made into pottage (xxv. 29; 2 Kings iv. 38); fish to have been broiled (Luke xxiv. 42). Various culinary utensils, as pots and pans, are mentioned in scripture.

COOP (Jer. v. 27, marg.), equivalent to CAGE, which see.

CO'S (Acts xxi. 1). See Cos.

COPPER. This word occurs in our version in Ezra viii. 27; where copper brightly polished, or possibly with a mixture of some more precious metal, is meant; there being an alloy much esteemed among the Persians, of gold and other metals. The same Hebrew word is elsewhere wrongly translated 'brass.' The use of copper was early known (Gen. iv. 22). It was found in Palestine (Deut. viii. 9); and instruments and utensils of all kinds were made of it, as many of the vessels for the tabernacle and the temple (Exod. xxvi. 11, 37; Lev. vi. 28; Numb. xvi. 39; 2 Chron. iv. 16). The mirrors of the women were of copper polished; and of these, voluntarily offered, the laver was formed (Exod. xxxviii. 8). So fetters were of copper (Judges xvi. 21); also armour, helmets, shields, spear-heads (1 Sam. xvii. 5, 6, 38; 2 Sam. xxi. 16). It would seem that some mode was known of tempering and hardening copper; or an alloy might have been used. In some cases no doubt bronze is intended. Hiram is described as very skilful in working this metal (1 Kings vii. 14). And, though, as already observed, it was found in Palestine, yet it was brought to Tyre from Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, probably the mountainous regions between the Black and Caspian seas (Ezek. xxvii. 13). The word is sometimes used for money (xvi. 36; where our version has 'filthiness'); also in the New Testament (Matt. x. 2). See BRASS.

COR (a round vessel) (1 Kings iv. 22, marg.; Ezra vii. 22, marg.; Ezek. xlv. 14). See MEASURES.

CORAL. This word occurs twice in scripture (Job xxviii. 18; Ezek. xxvii. 16): according to the Jewish rabbins it is red coral, anciently in high esteem, and still much valued when carved and cut. The mode in which this substance is built up from the bottom of the sea by innumerable living creatures, forming their houses, which are afterwards their tombs, is highly curious and interesting. So have grown myriads of islands in the Pacific. The Red sea abounds in coral; and thence probably it was carried to the markets of Tyre.

COR'BAN. An offering, bloody or unbloody, made to God, specially in fulfilment of a vow. In vows persons bound themselves positively to do something, or negatively to abstain from something (Lev. xxvii.; Numb. xxx.; Judges xi. 30, 31, xiii. 4, 5, 7). The rabbins overlaid the law herein with their traditions. They taught that, by declaring a thing 'corban,' a man might interdict himself from using it or giving it to another, and from receiving any thing from another. And the abuse was carried so far as to prohibit the doing of any act which was pronounced corban. So that, in the case our Lord censures (Matt. xv. 5, 6; Mark vii. 11-13), a son, reserving his goods to his own selfish use, might refuse help to his parents. It was 'corban' to render them any service. And so he pretended he was excused. The word occurs frequently in the Old Testament.

COR'BE (1 Esdr. v. 12). A perverted form of Zaccab (Ezra ii. 9).

CORD. Cords or ropes were of various materials. Strips of camel's hide are still used in the east, sometimes twisted into thongs. Strong ropes were probably made of these: the finer kinds of flax, or the fibre of the date-palm, supplied ordinary cords.

There are some passages of scripture in which cords or ropes are figuratively used, which require illustration. Thus Isaiah speaks of men drawing 'iniquity with cords of vanity, and sin as it were with a cart-ropes' (Isai. v. 18). Lowth's interpretation that the reference is to a rope-maker, who is continually adding to his materials and lengthening his cord, is forced. Henderson is probably right when he says, 'The meaning is that the persons described were not satisfied with ordinary modes of provoking the Deity, and the consequent ordinary approach of his vengeance, but, as it were, yoked themselves in the harness of iniquity, and, putting forth all their strength, drew down upon themselves with accelerated speed the load of punishment which their sins deserved' (Isaiah, p. 43). Cords were used for measuring: hence to 'cast a cord by lot' (Mic. ii. 5) is to allot an inheritance; and sometimes 'a line' signifies an inheritance (Psal. xvi. 6). Animals were led by cords and prisoners bound with them: therefore to 'loose the cord' is to cast off restraint (Job xxx. 11); while 'cords of love' (Hos. xi. 4) may refer to the soft bands or leading-strings, used for children.

CO'RE (Jude 11) The Greek form of Korah.

CORIANDER (Exod. xvi. 31; Numb. xi. 7). The manna was likened to coriander seed in both colour and form. This plant (Coriandrum sativum), is very widely diffused. It is umbelliferous, akin to parsley in family characteristics; with a round tall stalk, the flowers small and white. The leaves are much divided and smooth. The seeds are globular, of a grey colour, and from their aromatic nature are used for culinary purposes.

CORINTH. A celebrated city on the isthmus which unites Peloponnesus (the Morea), to the continent of Greece. A vast rock called the Acrocorinthus, rose abruptly to a height of 2000 feet above the level of the sea; to the north of which lay the city, mistress of two harbours, Cenchrea, about eight miles distant on the eastern or Saronic gulf (gulf of Egina), and Lechæum on the western or Corinthian gulf (gulf of Lepanto) only a mile and a half away. So advantageously situated, Corinth became wealthy and strong, and sent out numerous colonies to western lands, but was at length utterly destroyed by the Romans under Mummius, 146 B.C. In about a century Corinth was re-founded by Julius Cæsar, and was made the capital of the Roman province Achaia. Thus it was again a wealthy city, and its commerce flourished anew. The Isthmian games celebrated close by added to its prosperity; and as riches increased so did luxury and profligacy; the worship of Venus encouraging the most shameful licentiousness. The Christian church here was founded by St. Paul; and the Lord had 'much people' (Acts xviii. 10) in this city, the power of the gospel prevailing mightily against the corruptions of idolatry and lust. Corinth became the see of a bishop, which though the great city is now reduced to a mere village it still retains. There are still relics of ancient splendour; and in the Posidonium or sanctuary of Neptune some traces may be seen of the Isthmian games of which that was the scene. The small green pine-trees from which the chaplet of victory was taken are yet found growing in the neighbourhood. There are notices in the Acts of the Apostles of two visits paid by St. Paul to Corinth. The first extended to a year and six months (xviii. 1-18). Gallio, brother of the philosopher Seneca, was then proconsul of the province. St. Paul's second visit is briefly noticed, though it lasted three months (xx. 2, 3). Whether between these two the apostle made another is questioned: see below, p. 181.

CORINTHIANS, THE EPISTLES TO THE. The First Epistle.—That the first of these epistles was written by St. Paul was never doubted; the evidence of its genuineness and authenticity being abundant and distinct. It is cited by Clement of Rome, Polycarp, Irenæus, Cyprian, Athenagoras, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and other ancient writers. The place where it was written is clearly specified (1 Cor. xvi. 8). It was at Ephesus, at the end of the apostle's long sojourn in that city; and, as there is some reason to imagine (v. 6-8) that it was about the time of the paschal feast, we may date the composition in the spring of 57 or 58 A.D. The occasion of writing was two-fold. The Corinthians had applied to St. Paul for information, perhaps by Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (xvi. 17) on the subjects of marriage, of eating meats offered to idols, &c. (vii. viii. &c.); and, besides, he had learned by special information (from Chloë's family) (i. 11) that various abuses, dissensions, immoralities, &c. had been practised among them. Full of anxiety for those over whom his bowels yearned, the apostle applies himself immediately to repress the evils that had arisen, and to solve the questions submitted to him. Corinthian Christians were mainly Gentiles (xii. 2): still there were many Jews among them (Acts xviii. 4, 8); and Jewish jealousy of Paul, and Grecian profligacy and philosophic spirit, combined to endanger the purity of the faith and to debase the holiness of character which ought to have been maintained.

The plan and structure of this epistle is easily exhibited. After an introduction, and brief expression of thankfulness for the blessings they had received (i. 1-9) the apostle proceeds to rebuke the spirit of dissension which prevailed, vindicating his authority, and intimating his purpose of visiting them, strongly censuring the case of the incestuous person, whom he commanded to be put out of the church, and enforcing that purity which in such a city was especially likely to be corrupted (10-vi. 20). He next replies to the questions sent to him, placing before them his own moderation as an example to be followed, in subserviency to the great example of Christ (vii. 1-xi. 34); and then, after discussing the right use of spiritual gifts (xii., xiii., xiv.), he maintains in an admirable section the truth of Christ's resurrection, and illustrates the resurrection of the body, in which the final victory is gained by the believer over the last enemy (xv.), and concludes with directions for a contribution to be sent to Jerusalem, a notice of his own motions, and various greetings (xvi.).

It should be added that much difficulty has been felt in regard to v. 9, whether or no a prior epistle had been written. The best critics are now inclined to answer in the affirmative. It is not, however, to be supposed that anything has been lost from the canon. An earlier letter, even if written by inspiration and no longer extant, had accomplished its end. It was no more the divine purpose that everything written by Paul or Peter or others should be preserved for the church, than it was that every word uttered by a prophet should be chronicled for ever. What God's good providence designed for perpetual use we have.

The Second Epistle.—The authority of the second epistle to the Corinthians is equal to that of the first. It is cited by Irenæus, Athenagoras, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and others. Soon after the first epistle was despatched St. Paul left Ephesus (2 Cor. i. 8), and proceeded to Troas, where he expected to meet Titus with intelligence of the effect produced by the admonitions he had given. Disappointed there he went on into Macedonia, in some city of which he found Titus, and was cheered by the news he brought (ii. 12-14). Paul in consequence wrote this second letter to prepare the Corinthians for his approaching visit to them. It was probably composed, therefore, in the summer or autumn of the same year in which the first epistle had been written. The exact place of writing cannot be ascertained: we can only say it was in Macedonia (vii. 5, viii. 1, ix. 2).

Though the impression made by the first epistle was generally favourable, yet it had evidently stirred up the passions of those who were not friendly to St. Paul; and therefore in now writing, after his usual introduction (i. 1, 2), he justifies himself from the imputations made against him, touches on his integrity in the discharge of his ministry, and shows how he was influenced not by worldly interest, but by affection towards his converts (i. 3-vii. 16). He then speaks of the collection (viii., ix.), and afterwards defends his apostolic authority (x. 1-xiii. 10). Salutation and solemn benediction conclude (xiii. 11-14).

It is questioned (xiii. 1) whether the apostle had previously paid two visits to Corinth; the second recorded in the Acts (xx. 2, 3) being evidently after this second epistle was written. It seems most probable that a short visit was paid during the lengthened residence at Ephesus. St. Luke's omitting to record it is no proof that there was no such visit.

The two epistles to the Corinthians are full of interest. A singular variety of topics are treated: the changes are rapid, and the details minute. Irony, rebuke, consolation present themselves in turn; and in no other of his writings are the extraordinary powers of the apostle's mind more evidently displayed. Among the commentaries on these epistles may be named those of Billroth, Leipz. 1833; Olshausen, Königsb. 1840; Meyer, 1849, 1850.

CORMORANT. An unclean bird (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 17). The Hebrew name, which implies casting down, is no doubt given it from its habit of plunging or darting from a height upon the fish, its prey. The common cormorant, Phalacrocorax carbo, is most probably the bird intended. It is true that a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, append. A. p. xliv., declares that it is not found on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean; but Gosse (Imp. Bible Dict., vol. i. p. 361) and Duns (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 90) distinctly assert that it is abundant there. This bird measures about three feet in length, is black beneath and dark brown above, and has a white patch on each thigh. The bill is long, nearly straight, with a strongly-hooked tip of the upper mandible. The skin of the face and throat is yellow, bordered with white. The cormorant is voracious and an excellent diver. There is another word sometimes translated 'cormorant' (Isai. xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14), which is more properly (as in the margin) PELICAN, which see.

CORN. The Hebrew word commonly translated corn has a very comprehensive meaning, including more than we usually understand by our term: it is that which covers the ground, increase generally. And this was very applicable to Palestine, a most fertile country (Gen. xxvii. 28, 37; Psal. lxxv. 9-13), where the produce of what was sown was manifold; so that it was able to export cereals to neighbouring nations (1 Kings v. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17). The principal kinds of corn grown were wheat, barley, millet, and a grain with regard to which our translators seem in doubt; for they render the Hebrew word sometimes 'rye' (Exod. ix. 32; Isai. xxviii. 25), and sometimes 'fitches' (Ezek. iv. 9): it was probably spelt. A writer in the Imp. Bible Dict., vol. i. p. 361, is inclined to believe that maize or Indian corn was also grown in Palestine. For the operations of cultivating, sowing, reaping, threshing, winnowing, &c., see AGRICULTURE, and the articles under those words. The storing of corn is a matter of much anxiety in the east on account of the insecurity of property. Joseph would seem to have laid up the vast produce of Egypt in granaries (Gen. xli. 48); and Egyptian granaries were, as the paintings show, a series of vaulted chambers; but store-houses in Israel are spoken of 'in the fields,' as distinguished from those in the cities (1 Chron. xxvii. 25). And these doubtless were pits, probably like the ones now in use, lined with straw, to preserve the corn from damp (comp. Jer. xli. 8).

CORNELIUS. A centurion of 'the Italian band' at Cæsarea, a devout man, earnestly worshipping God according to the light he possessed. He was instructed by an angelic vision to send for the apostle Peter, who having been similarly directed obeyed the summons, and preached the gospel of Christ to Cornelius, and a company gathered in his house. While Peter was speaking, the Holy Ghost fell upon the assembly, with supernatural gifts. They were therefore as the first-fruits of the Gentile world baptized into the Christian church (Acts x.). Nothing more is known of Cornelius.

CORNER. It was one of the humane regulations of the Mosaic law that a man was not to reap the corners of his field. What grew therein was, with the gleanings, to be for the poor and the stranger (Lev. xix. 10, xxiii. 22). Their right is said to have been afterwards commuted for a sixtieth part of the whole produce. See AGRICULTURE, POOR.

The word corner is also used in reference to the hair or beard, which was not to be marred or rounded (xix. 27, xxi. 5). The Arabian tribes to the south-east of Palestine appear to have observed this custom, which became one of their characteristics (Jer. ix. 26, marg., xxv. 23, marg., xlix. 32, marg.: comp. Henderson's Jeremiah, pp. 65, 66, note). See BEARD, HAIR, MOURNING, PRIEST.

CORNER-STONE. A stone of special importance in binding together the two sides of a building. In the structures of Nineveh the corner is sometimes formed of a single angular stone. Figuratively the term was applied to the principal persons in a country; just as we say the 'pillars' of the state (Isai. xix. 13, marg.). And so we find Messiah pre-signified in passages which, though they might have an application, as many prophetic utterances have, to the circumstances of the time when they were delivered (as Psal. cxviii. on occasion of the laying the foundation of the new temple), yet certainly pointed forward to him on whom all believers should be built, Jews and Gentiles compacted into one holy temple to God's eternal glory (2; Isai. xxviii. 16; Matt. xxi. 42; Acts iv. 11; 1 Pet. ii. 6).

CORNET. A musical instrument. The word shophar, so rendered in 1 Chron. xv. 28; 2 Chron. xv. 14; Psal. cxviii. 6; Hos. v. 8, is generally elsewhere translated TRUMPET, which see. It appears to have been a long straight tube. The cornet, kévén (Dan. v. 5, 7, 10, 15), was most likely a curved horn. This word is also found as the translation of another Hebrew term, méná'an'ím (2 Sam. vi. 5). It probably meant a kind of rattle giving a tinkling sound when shaken; like the sistrum used in the worship of the Egyptian Isis; which was from 8 to 18 inches in length, of bronze or brass, with loose rings on transverse bars. Specimens of the sistrum are preserved in museums.

CORRUPTION, MOUNT OF (2 Kings xxiii. 13). See OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

COS or CO'OS. A small island in the Ægean sea off the coast of Caria, the birth-place of Hippocrates, with a chief town of the same name, in which was a famous temple of Æsculapius. The island was celebrated for its wines, beautiful stuffs, and ointments. St. Paul passed a night here on his voyage from Miletus to Judea (Acts xxi. 1). It is noted as the residence of Jews in Maccabean times (1 Macc. xv. 23): its modern name is Stanchio.

CO'SAM (a diviner). One in the list of Christ's ancestry (Luke iii. 28).

COTTON. A name, probably derived from the Arabic kutn, for a well-known substance, a filamentous matter, produced by the surface of the seeds of various species of gossypium, of the parenchymatous part of which it may be said to be a development; while linen is a form of woody matter. The cotton plant has been found wild in both the old and the new world. The situations in which it has been advantageously cultivated are included between Egypt and the Cape of Good Hope in the eastern, and between the southern shores of Chesapeake bay and the south of Brazil in the western hemisphere. Beyond the parallels limiting these regions it does not prosper. It requires a peculiar combination of heat, light, and moisture, appearing to prefer the vicinity of the sea in dry countries, and the interior districts in moister climates. Cotton was well-known and largely used in very ancient times, most probably in Egypt (though the cloths in which mummies there were swathed, often supposed to be cotton, are now known to be linen), and certainly in India. It is natural, therefore, to suppose that the Hebrews might have been acquainted with it. But the only distinct mention we have of it in scripture is in Esth. i. 6, where carpas, rendered in our version 'green,' is fine white cotton, cotton stuff. It was very likely at first considered as a variety of linen, and not till after the Persian dominion distinguished from it. Cotton is now grown to some extent in Syria and Palestine, and is in frequent use.

COUGH (Gen. xlvi. 4, and elsewhere). See BED.

COUNCIL. The great council of the Jews was the SANHEDRIM, which see. There were also inferior local councils, or courts (Matt. x. 17; Mark xiii. 9), two of which were at Jerusalem, one at each provincial town. The constitution of these is not clear. Their origin may be traced to Moses (Deut. xvi. 18); and Josephus declares that they consisted of seven judges, with two Levites as assessors (Antiq., lib. iv. 8, § 14). See CITIES. He himself appointed a court of seven judges for small offences (Bell. Jud., lib. ii. 20 § 5). The Talmudical writers, however, say that the number of judges varied, that it was 23, if the population exceeded 120; 3, if it fell below. Perhaps the 'judgment' (Matt. v. 21, 22) referred to these inferior councils. The 'council' (Acts xxv. 12) was composed of councillors appointed to assist and advise the Roman governors.

COURT. The original word, signifying enclosure, and generally translated 'court,' is used to designate the enclosure of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvii. 9); also, the various courts of the temple (1 Kings vi. 36, vii. 8; Psal. xcii. 13). It is likewise applied to the court of a private house (2 Sam. xvii. 18), of a palace (2 Kings xx. 4; Esth. i. 5), and of a prison (Neh. iii. 25; Jer. xxxii. 2). It further signifies the enclosure of a village, and repeatedly occurs (Hazer, or Hazor) in the names of places. Another word is used for court in 2 Chron. iv. 9, vi. 13, which in Ezek. xliii. 14, 17, 20, xlv. 19 is translated 'settle.' It probably means a kind of ledge round the altar, as it were enclosing it.

CO'UTHA (1 Esdr. v. 32).

COVENANT. An agreement entered into between two or more contracting parties to perform certain specified acts. The making of a covenant, in ancient times, was usually attended by solemn rites or symbols. Thus an oath was taken (Gen. xxi. 31, xxvi. 28, 31), and God invoked (xxx. 5; 1 Sam. xx. 16, 17). Gifts, too, were made (Gen. xxi. 27, 30), or some other witness or sign employed, as a heap of stones, or a pillar, to be a memorial of the conditions entered into (xxx. 45-49). Also, a feast was made (xxvi. 30, xxxi. 46); and sometimes animals were divided into two, and the contracting parties passed between the pieces (xv. 17; Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19). The Hebrew word for ratifying a covenant implies to cut, perhaps with a reference to this practice; and the term for covenant itself is by some scholars taken to signify eating together. To this day the mere eating with a man constitutes a certain title to his good offices among eastern tribes. It has been thought that 'a covenant of salt' (Numb. xviii. 19; 2 Chron. xiii. 5) had hence its significancy; since it is well known that to have tasted another's salt is a proverbial phrase for to be bound to him. But more probably 'a covenant of salt' means a permanent covenant, because of the preservative quality of salt. A covenant made as just described, with solemn ceremonies and an appeal to the Deity, was to be carefully observed: to break it was a heinous sin (Ezek. xvii. 18).

As the Deity has often illustrated his own dealings with men by their dealings with each other, so he has been pleased to use the idea of a covenant, which properly can be entered into between those only who are mutually bound, and to represent himself as standing in a covenant relation with his people. This is altogether of grace. For his creatures, sinful creatures pre-eminently, have no independent standing, and can have no claim upon him but what he gives them. And, if he binds himself, it is to gain no advantage: it is rather the exclusive bestowal of advantage and good on those whom he admits into his covenant. Thus God made a covenant with Noah, and appointed the rainbow as the sign of it (Gen. ix. 9-17); but it was properly but a merciful promise. Similarly there was a covenant with Abraham, of which circumcision was the seal (xvii.). It is true that certain provisions are made, according to which the men of the covenant must act if they would not forfeit its advantages: it is true, too, that God, taking on himself a name of earthly relationship, gives a pledge that he will fulfil the requirements of that relationship. Thus marriage is a covenant (Prov. ii. 17; Mal. ii. 14). And God condescends to say that he espouses his church unto himself (Isal. liv. 5; Jer. iii. 14; Eph. v. 23, 24), binding himself therein to grant his people all the loving protection, yea, far more than all, which a husband manifests to the wife of his bosom. It was as imposing conditions, those of the moral law (Exod. xxxiv. 27, 28; Lev. xxvi. 15; Deut. iv. 13), that God made his covenant with Israel at Sinai; hence the dispensation, and even the book of the law, was termed the covenant. And in reference to this it was that a better and yet more gracious covenant was promised, even that new covenant to be made by God with Christ, and through Christ with believers in him, that their sins should be forgiven and eternal life assured them (Jer. xxxi. 31-34; 2 Cor. iii. 6-17; Heb. viii. 6-13). Not, indeed, that the so-called 'new' Messianic covenant was an after-thought; it was God's gracious purpose from the beginning (Gen. iii. 15); and every provision and promise delivered from time to time to the fathers was the development of the original purpose, preparing the way for its full manifestation. The two are not really in opposition; but the law was a school-master to lead men to Christ (Gal. iii. 21-26).

In the New Testament, the word often rendered 'covenant' is also often translated 'testament.' And it is sometimes very difficult to decide which of the two senses is to be preferred. The most perplexing case is in Heb. ix. 15-17, where Scholefeld decides for covenant, translating 16, 17, 'For, where a covenant is, there must of necessity be brought in the death of the mediating sacrifice. For a covenant is valid over dead sacrifices; since it is never of any force while the mediating sacrifice continues alive' (Hints for an Improved Transl. of the New Test.).

COW (Lev. xxii. 28; Numb. xviii. 17; Job xxi. 10; Isai. vii. 21, xl. 7; Ezek. iv. 15; Amos iv. 3). See BULL.

COZ (thorn). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8).

COZ'BI (lying). The daughter of a chief of Midian, whom Phinehas slew (Numb. xxv. 15, 18).

CRACKNELS. A kind of cake, which probably crumbled easily (1 Kings xiv. 3). See BREAD.

CRANE (Isal. xxxviii. 14; Jer. viii. 7). The word rendered 'crane' in both these places properly signifies a swallow. And it is most probable that the 'swallow' in the same places is a crane. The common crane, Grus cinerea, is a well-known bird, migratory and gregarious. Cranes were formerly very numerous in England.

CRA'TES (2 Macc. iv. 29). A person said to be 'governor of the Cyprians.'

CRAW (Zeph. iii. 1, marg.). Our translators appear to have thought the word so rendered the substantive, which means the crop or craw of a bird. More probably it is an adjective signifying rebellious. See Henderson, Minor Prophets, p. 339, note.

CREATION. In the beginning of the Pentateuch, we find an account of the forming of the visible universe. It has been hotly contested whether this be indeed a trustworthy, or whether it be not a mistaken account. Some writers have chosen to say that geological discoveries entirely disprove the Mosaic cosmogony; while others vindicate the authority of the sacred historian, but differ widely in their modes of vindication. The brief space which can be allowed to the subject in the present work entirely precludes that minuteness of investigation for which a large book would hardly suffice. It must be enough to lay down here a general principle, and to offer some observations on it which may tend to guide the reader towards a sound conclusion.

It is hoped that, in other parts of this volume, abundant grounds have been shown for receiving the bible as the revelation of divine truth; so that its histories are entitled to belief, its doctrines are those which the Deity has propounded as necessary for the well-being of his creatures. If the bible is the word of God, nay, if, taking lower ground, and less defensible, the bible contains the word of God, it is inconceivable, it is repugnant to the very nature of the thing, that it should commence with a mere legend, the baseless speculation of some Hebrew dreamer. If its statements are not to be relied on in regard to a matter of such practical importance as the relation which man bears to his Creator, resulting from the mode in which he was formed, and the kind of dwelling in which he is placed, surely the sooner such a volume is discarded the better. It is to be concluded, therefore, as strongly as possible, that the early accounts of Genesis are not mere fanciful reveries, but do authoritatively convey definite truth.

There is, however, another record; and its facts are before our eyes. The investigations of science prove that a variety of changes have occurred in the earth's history; they exhibit to us plants and animals which existed long ago, of species altogether different from those existing now. The problem is, how to interpret the scripture record so as that it shall not contradict ascertained facts. Various modes have been attempted of solving this problem. It has been alleged that the early part of Genesis is of a poetical cast, embodying truth, but truth by means of allegorical description. It has been allowed, by others, that the narrative is one of simple facts; but among those who so maintain the plain truth of the record there is this difference, that, while some believe God's six days' work in creation to have been spread over six indefinitely-long periods, during which geological changes occurred, others hold that these days were natural days, and that the revolutions or changes occurred prior to their commencement. Other minor suppositions, too, there have been, as that the six days' work concerned only a single district of the earth's surface.

The principle which shall be laid down here is, as noted above, that the opening part of Genesis is a plain truthful narrative of facts; and for this some reasons shall be given: the question whether the 'days' were literal days or more extended periods, though an opinion shall be given on it, will be treated with much less confidence.

Archdeacon Pratt, in his very sensible work, Scripture and Science not at Variance, has shown that past history confirms the truth of scripture. Scientific discoveries, at first apparently at variance with scripture, have been found, on better examination, to contradict merely the false interpretations of scripture, and have done good service in leading to a more adequate appreciation of what the scripture really does say, illustrating thus, in a remarkable way, the harmony between scientific conclusion and the statements of the written word. This the archdeacon confirms by various examples. He further shows how later scripture writers, how our blessed Lord, continually cite or allude to the earlier chapters of Genesis, as containing a truthful narrative of facts. His words, in summing up his statement, are, 'Here are sixty-six passages of the New Testament, in which these eleven chapters of Genesis are either directly quoted or are made a ground of argument. Of these, five are by our Lord himself, two of them being direct quotations; thirty-eight by St. Paul, three being direct quotations; six by St. Peter; eight in St. John's writings; one by St. James; two by St. Jude; two by the assembled apostles; three, all of them direct quotations, by St. Luke; and one by St. Stephen' (p. 77, 3rd edit.). He proceeds, 'The inference I would draw from this circumstance is that our Lord and his apostles regarded these eleven chapters as historical documents worthy of credit, and that they made use of them to establish truths—a thing they never would have done had they not known them to be authoritative' (ibid.). It is not easy to evade this conclusion; a mythical or allegorical interpretation, therefore, of the scripture account of creation, is inadmissible. So Dr. McCaul argues with the greatest force, 'There are in this chapter (Gen. i.) none of the peculiarities of Hebrew poetry. The style is full of dignity, but it is that of prose narrative. There is no mention of prophetic vision, no prophetic formula employed. . . . The prophet or historian is kept entirely out of sight; and the narrative begins at once without any preface, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," and then goes to the account of paradise, the birth of Cain and Abel, &c., without any break or note of transition from vision to history. The book of Genesis is history. It is the historical introduction to the four following books of the Pentateuch, or, rather, to all following revelation; and the first chapter, as the inseparable beginning of the whole, must be historical also. When the Lord recapitulates its contents in the fourth commandment, and makes it the basis of the ordinance of the sabbath, he stamps it as real history. To suppose a moral, or even a ceremonial, command, based upon a poetic picture, or a vision, or an ideal narrative, would be absurd' (Aids to Faith, pp. 198, 199).

But, while it is maintained that the record of creation is a real historical narrative, it may be allowed to be a record of appearances; that is, that the events are optically described, such as they would appear to a spectator placed on the surface of the earth. See Prof. Challis's very sensible remarks in his Creation in Plan and Progress, pp. 5, &c. It is not indeed necessary to suppose, with Hugh Miller (Testimony of the Rocks, pp. 157, &c.), that the great drama of creation was unfolded to the eye of the inspired writer in a series of visions, thus picturing actually before him what no human witness was present to describe, and what his mind otherwise might not have been able to conceive. But, if the description had been philosophically exact, expressing causes rather than results, it would have been less intelligible to the mass of men, it would have departed from the habitual practice not only of the bible, but of persons in general, nay, of philosophers too, in their mode of recording their scientific observations. Because the narrative describes appearances, it does not the less describe facts. This question is well argued by Mr. Birks, who concludes that 'the objection to the optical construction of the sacred narrative, that it deprives it of all definite meaning, and gives it a non-natural sense, exactly reverses the real truth. The record of visible appearances is quite as definite in its own nature as a statement of physical causes, and is far easier to understand; and no simple reader, in the age when Moses wrote, could attach any other meaning to the words than that which is so rashly condemned' (The Bible and Modern Thought, 1862, pp. 317-322).

With these preliminary observations on the mode in which the narrative is framed, let us see what we are to understand by the words of the sacred writer. The statement, as we find it, is that the universe was framed by an act of creative energy, and that afterwards the earth was transformed, in six successive periods of time, by successive fiat's of the Creator, from a waste and desolate condition into a fit habitation, furnished with vegetable productions, and replete with animal life, for its favoured tenant man, created on the last of those days.

'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth' (Gen. i. 1). This is not a summary of the description which succeeds. It is the account of a distinct exertion of Almighty power. As some undefined point of his eternal duration, he made a beginning of the visible universe, by creating heaven and earth—not just the materials of which the marvellous frame was afterwards constructed, but 'the heaven and the earth,' the higher regions of which we know so little, and the lower world, substantially the same globe on which we live. And then, for aught that we can tell, long ages passed. Scientific research proves that various races of plants and animals have lived and passed away; and that great changes have from time to time taken place in the earth's surface. And in the course of them vast periods must have elapsed. It has been thought by many able men that these changes occurred, and these successive groups of life appeared in the six Mosaic 'days,' which they consequently have extended—seeing that the word 'day' is often used indefinitely in scripture—to comprise great portions of time. Hugh Miller was one who embraced this hypothesis, and he most ably defended it (ubi supr., pp. 115 &c.), believing that successive geological epochs corresponded remarkably with the successive days of Genesis.

Dissent from the opinions of men so well qualified to judge must be propounded with modesty. But later research seems to have thrown reasonable doubt on Miller's conclusion. He had imagined that no break was discoverable between the human or present period, and that immediately preceding it, called by geologists the tertiary, that is to say, that animals lived on in regular descent from the former into the latter era. But the species appear to be quite distinct; and some writers are now disposed to believe that the entire fauna and flora or animal and vegetable existence of the tertiary period were destroyed. If this be so, the various revolutions—and as many as twenty-nine are numbered—of which geology takes account occurred chronologically prior to the statement that 'the earth was without form and void' (Gen. i. 2). The last great catastrophe had swept off all animal and vegetable life. The remnants indeed of earlier creations lay entombed in its rocks; but the surface of the globe was a cleared platform for the last and greatest exhibition of creative power. We know not how long it lay thus waste, just as it was previously said we know not how long a time elapsed, embracing all the geological eras between the original creation of the heaven and the earth and the epoch when God in his wisdom began specially to fit this planet for the reception of the human race. Previous races had been gradually ascending in the scale of life, not by any natural development—the gaps, or breaks, or catastrophes of each successive period refute the notion—but by the various acts of power in which the Creator placed upon the earth creatures continually succeeded by those of higher type, culminating in that race whom he formed after his own image, breathing into their nostrils the breath of life.

Viewed in this way there is nothing in the scripture record contradicted by scientific discovery. And, when it is said in the account of the first-named 'day' that darkness was on the face of the deep, and that light broke forth at the almighty word, we need not imagine, the text does not require us to imagine, that the darkness overspread any other than our own planet, or that, previous to the command then given, light was unknown throughout the whole universe. It was from the earth that the gloom was cleared away; and for this we must allow the bright shining of the sun was not necessary; so that we may well conceive that the luminaries (light-bearers) which now cheer us did not become visible at the earth's surface till the fourth creative day.

It is impossible to describe here the successive processes, in which one step after another, most likely, as Dr. M'Caul argues, through lengthened periods, was taken, and how plants, fowl, beast of the field such as we have now, were created, similar to, but not exactly the same in species with those of former epochs. The reader must be referred for such details to other works. Some such works have been already mentioned: it may be added that much useful remark will be found in Duns' Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. i. pp. 1, &c.

It may, however, be distinctly repeated that we have proof—the rocks afford us proof—not to be gainsaid, of the interference of a divine hand. There are endings and there are beginnings manifested, the close of one epoch and the commencement of another, not an uninterrupted chain, but links broken off, and a fresh series apparent. Truly in all this we may say, the finger of God is here. This argument has been excellently wrought out by Dr. Chalmers in his 'Natural Theology,' book ii. chap. ii. (Select Works, vol. v. pp. 132-150).

Some have chosen to assert that the account of creation in Gen. ii. differs from that in Gen. i. Doubtless it differs, because it is in some respects more full; but it is not antagonistic. Without entering here upon the question whether or no these two chapters were derived from different original documents, it will be sufficient to say that the history proceeds upon the plan common to all histories. There is first a compendious account (i.) of creation generally. Then (ii.) the creation of man is more particularly detailed, in relation to both the sexes, in relation also to that particular part of the earth in which Adam was to live, with the condition on which he was placed there, and an illustration of that sovereignty which was confided to him over the lower animals. Historians, as above said, continually, after a general statement, return as it were to take up and detail some special circumstances, before implied but not expressed; and no one blames them, or imputes self-contradiction to them for this.

It is hoped that in what has been said some general grounds have been given for the candid reception of the scripture testimony respecting creation. Let the reader be reminded that if at any time fresh research should occasion fresh difficulties he must not at once conclude them unanswerable: he may well recollect that difficulties, at first sight formidable, have frequently been so thoroughly cleared up by more careful investigation, as really to confirm the record they originally seemed about to overthrow. And a word of caution may not be out of place. Christian writers should beware of dogmatizing on the mode of reconciling scripture with science. In our search after truth we may be sure that all that God has written, be it in the book of nature or in that of revelation, will ultimately be found to harmonize. But, inasmuch as scientific theory has often been proved presumptuous, one after another having gone down as knowledge increased, we must not venture to stake the credit of revelation upon any theory which later wisdom may prove insufficient.

CREDITOR. See LOAN.

CRES'CENS (growing). A Christian, of whom nothing more is certainly known, than that St. Paul speaks of his having gone into Galatia (2 Tim. iv. 10). There are various traditions of him.

CRETE. A large island in the Mediterranean, bold and mountainous, but with fruitful valleys, anciently celebrated for its hundred cities. It is about 140 miles in length, and of very variable breadth. Tacitus (Hist., lib. v. 2) represents the Jews as of Cretan origin: possibly he confounded them with the Philistines, or imagined that the Cherethites, repeatedly mentioned in scripture, were Cretan emigrants. Indeed, the Septuagint renders Cherethim, or Cherethites (Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5) Cretans. In later times, it would appear that many Jews had settled in Crete, so that we find notice of these as being in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 11). We have no knowledge of the preaching of the gospel in this island. We are informed only that St. Paul was off the coast on his voyage to Rome (xxvii. 7-14); and that he subsequently left Titus there (Tit. i. 5). See TITUS, THE EPISTLE TO. Crete was a Roman province, placed from 67 B.C. under a proconsul. The inhabitants had an evil name, as false and faithless (12). This island is now called Candia, and, by the Turks, Kivid.

CRETES, CRET' IANS. Inhabitants of Crete (Acts ii. 11; Tit. i. 12). The verse cited in the last-named passage is from Epimenides, a native of Phæstus in Crete, who was regarded as a prophet. He lived about 600 B.C.

CRIME. See LAW, PUNISHMENT.

CRIMSON (2 Chron. ii. 7, 14, iii. 14; Isai. i. 18; Jer. iv. 30). See COLOURS, SCARLET.

CRISPING-PINS (Isai. iii. 22). The original word thus translated here occurs again in 2 Kings v. 23, where it is rendered 'bags.' It is properly a pocket, reticule, or purse for holding money or other articles, conical in form, and often of satin or velvet, ornamented with gold (Henderson, Isaiah, p. 32).

CRIS'PUS. The ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, who, with his family, believed in Christ (Acts xviii. 8), and was baptized by the apostle Paul (1 Cor. i. 14).

CROCODILE. A formidable reptile, of which there are several species. The Crocodilus vulgaris is that which is found in Egypt. It is amphibious, and is now to be seen only in the upper Nile, though heretofore it frequented the lower parts of that river. The crocodile is too well known to require a description here. It is most likely the leviathan of Job xli.: see LEVIATHAN. Possibly also it is intended in Isai. xxvii. 1. When Ezekiel was commanded to prophesy against Egypt, he described Pharaoh as 'the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers' (Ezek. xxix. 3). The allusion must here also be to the crocodile; and it is fitly applied to indicate an Egyptian king.

CROSS. The frightful mode of punishment by the cross appears to have been practised from the earliest periods known to history. Crosses were made of two beams of wood, crossing each other either at right angles, or obliquely in the shape of the letter X; with various modifications of form. There was sometimes also a kind of bracket attached as a partial support to the sufferer. Crucifixion was inflicted among the ancient Persians, Assyrians, Egyptians, Carthaginians, Indians, Scythians, Greeks, and Macedonians (see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Kreuzigung,' where authorities are given). Among the Romans, it prevailed from very early times down to the reign of Constantine the Great, by whom it was abolished (Soz., Hist. Eccles., lib. i. cap. 8, p. 336, edit. Amst. 1700); and from the Romans it most probably passed to the Jews; though some have imagined that they could trace the punishment in such passages as Deut. xxi. 22, 23.

The mode of execution by the cross may be thus described. The criminal was first stripped and severely scourged, not with rods, but with whips, in which were often stuck nails or pieces of bone. He was then obliged to bear the cross, or some part of it, to the place where it was to be set up, generally without the city walls. Before him was frequently carried the placard, expressing his crime, in black letters on white gypsum, which was after wards fastened over his head. Arrived at the spot, his clothes, resumed after the scourging, were taken off: they were the perquisite of the executioners. Sometimes the sufferer was fastened to the cross as it lay on the ground: it was then lifted, with the body attached, and dropped into the hole, so prepared that the feet were not more than about half a yard from the earth. But sometimes the cross was first set up; and then the criminal was attached to it. Tying and nailing were both in use: the former mode, less painful at first, ensured a more frightful because a more lingering death. Our Lord was nailed; and a question has arisen whether one or two nails were driven through his feet: most probably there were two. One single trace of humanity was apparent in the fearful process. A medicated draught was offered to stupefy the senses: this Jesus refused (Mark xv. 23): he would keep his mind quite clear through the whole period of his blood-shedding. And then the sufferer was left, a watch being set, lest any friends should take him down; and days are said sometimes to have passed ere the agony was quenched by death. It was merciful to break the legs: death would come the sooner. The special tortures are thus described by a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 371: '1. The unnatural position and violent tension of the body, which cause a painful sensation from the least motion. 2. The nails, being driven through parts of the hands and feet which are full of nerves and tendons (and yet at a distance from the heart), create the most exquisite anguish. 3. The exposure of so many wounds and lacerations brings on inflammation, which tends to become gangrene; and every moment increases the poignancy of suffering. 4. In the distended parts of the body more blood flows through the arteries than can be carried back into the veins; hence too much blood finds its way from the aorta into the head and stomach; the blood-vessels of the head become pressed and swollen. The general obstruction of circulation which ensues causes an internal excitement, exertion, and anxiety, more intolerable than death itself. 5. The inexpressible misery of gradually increasing and lingering anguish. To all of which we may add, 6. Burning and raging thirst.'

The cross on which our Lord suffered, was, if we may credit a legend, made of the aspen; which is said hence to be continually trembling. More reasonably it may be believed to have been of oak, which was plentiful in Judea. According to some historians, this cross was discovered at Jerusalem by the empress Helena, 326 A.D. It had been, with the two on which the thieves were crucified, buried near the place. There was a difficulty, however, to know which was our Lord's; but that difficulty, says the story, was overcome by a trial which of the three possessed miraculous virtue. From that time the wood has been largely venerated; and so-called pieces of it are preserved in various parts of the world. It would be out of place here to discuss the truth of this narrative: it must be sufficient to say, that the crosses on which criminals had suffered were, by Jewish law, to be burned, and that Eusebius says nothing of any such discovery, though he minutely describes the building of the church of the holy sepulchre (De Vit. Const., lib. iii. capp. 25-40).

The cross of Christ was indeed honoured by his disciples; but it was not the material cross. It was Christ crucified whom the apostles preached; the divine Redeemer stooping so low as to endure this shocking death, in order to make a sufficient sacrifice, satisfaction, and oblation, for the sins of the world (1 Cor. i. 23, 24, ii. 2). Hence they gloried in the cross of Christ (Gal. vi. 14), and willingly, for love of him, took up the cross (a figurative expression) and followed him, suffering for his sake persecution even to the death (2 Tim. ii. 11, 12). The symbol of the cross may, indeed, be before our eyes, to remind us of our vocation, but only as a symbol. The virtue is not in the sign, but in that which it represents. See Hooker, Eccl. Pol., book v. 65. And some centuries elapsed before the symbol was turned into an image, the cross into the figure of Christ suspended on it.

It may be added that, though among other nations bodies were generally suffered to rot upon the cross, the rites of sepulture being denied, the Jews observed the precept of Deut. xxi. 23, and took down the corpse before sunset.

When the Roman empire became Christian, the cross, heretofore so shameful, was adopted as a symbol of honour: it glittered on the helmets of the soldiery, was engraved on their shields, and interwoven into their banners. For an account of this revolution of feeling, and of the famous Labarum, or imperial sacred banner, on which the cross was represented, see Gibbon's History, chap. xx. vol. iii. pp. 249-252, edit. 1838.

CROWN. The name now applied to the ornament worn by sovereign princes; but the words so translated in our version of the bible apply also to what we should distinguish as coronets, mitres, &c., garlands worn at feasts, at marriages, &c. The crown originated in the diadem or fillet used to confine the long hair. Jewelry was added: special colours were adopted: the fillet was made to encircle a cap; and thus by degrees a crown was developed. It is useless to enquire who first wore a royal crown. Various legendary accounts are given.

We have frequent notice of this ornament in scripture. Bonnets, or tiaras, were made for the Israelitish priests (Exod. xxviii. 40, xxxix. 28): that appropriated to the high priest was of peculiar richness, and had a golden engraved plate upon it called 'the holy crown' (xxviii. 4, 36-38, xxxix. 30, 31). Crowns were worn by the Hebrew princes: that of Saul is mentioned as upon his head in battle (2 Sam. i. 10). David took the crown of the king of Ammon, which, with its jewels, weighed, or was worth, a talent of gold (xlii. 30). A crown, too, we are told, was placed on the head of Joash (2 Kings xi. 12). As to the shape of crowns, it may be observed that those worn by the As syrian kings were a kind of high and peaked mitre. Of these, and of Egyptian crowns, we have various examples.

Assyrian and Egyptian Crowns.

1. Crown of Upper Egypt. 2. Crown of Lower Egypt. 3. Crown of Upper and Lower Egypt united. 4. Crown of a prince. 5. Crown of a queen or princess. 6. Crown from a Sassanian medal. 7. Crown from Nineveh marbles.

Modern Asiatic crowns are turbans adorned with jewels and aigrettes of precious stones.

Modern Asiatic Crowns.

1. Crown of Nadir Shah. 2. Crown of Feth Ali Shah. 3. Ottoman Crown.

'Many crowns' is an expression occurring in scripture (Rev. xix. 12); it being customary for those who claimed authority over more than one country to wear double or united crowns. We have a familiar illustration of this in the papal tiara, or triple crown; as circlets were from time to time added to it to mark the successive augmentations of power.

1, 2, 3. Olive, Oak, and Laurel Crowns. 4, 5, 6. Mural, Naval and Military Crowns. Those which follow are Fillets and Crowns from the coins chiefly of Judean or Syrian kings. 7. M. Vips. Agrippa. 8. Antigonus. 9. Antiochus IV. 10. Antiochus VI. 11. Herod the Great. 12. Antiochus VIII. 13, 14. Tigranes, king of Armenia. 15. Aretas, king of Arabia.

Crowns of laurel, &c., were given to victors in the ancient games: hence the Christian's final prize is represented as a crown, the symbol of successful contest, the appropriate ornament of the royal dignity conferred upon him (1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 5, iv. 8; Rev. i. 6, iii. 11). The term is also used figuratively elsewhere, as in Prov. xii. 4, xiv. 24, xvi. 31. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 368, observes that there were anciently coins called 'crowns' (1 Macc. x. 29, xiii. 39).

CROWN OF THORNS. Our Lord was crowned in mockery by the Roman soldiers (Matt. xxvii. 29; Mark xv. 17; John xix. 2). It is questioned whether this was merely mockery, or whether it was specially intended for additional torture. Such a crown, it is clear, must have been made of some plant that would readily twist into a wreath. The large-leaved acanthus would not: no more would the Spina Christi, as it is called, with strong sharp thorns. Hasselquist imagines the thorn in question the Arabian nabb, a very common plant, 'with many small and sharp spines; soft, round, and pliant branches; leaves much resembling ivy, of a very deep green, as if in disguised mockery of a victor's wreath.'

CRUCIFIXION, CRUCIFY. See CROSS, PUNISHMENTS.

CRUSE. The word appears as the translation of three Hebrew words: one of these occurs in 1 Sam. xxvi. 11, 12, 16; 1 Kings xvii. 12, 14, 16, xix. 6 to denote a vessel used for water or oil. Gesenius, from the derivation of this—that which is expanded—thinks it was made of iron plates; but possibly it was of earthenware, a globular vessel, with a neck, handle, and narrow spout, such as is not uncommon at the present day. Or it might be a skin-bottle. Again, we have a 'cruse of honey' (xiv. 3). The same word is also rendered 'bottle' (Jer. xix. 1, 10). This must have been of earthenware, and had its Hebrew name from the gurgling sound caused when any liquid was poured from it. The only other place in which our version has 'cruse' is 2 Kings ii. 20. The original word is translated 'dish' in xxi. 13, 'pans' in 2 Chron. xxxv. 13, and 'bosom' in Prov. xix. 24, xxvi. 15. It was probably a metal platter or dish.

CRYSTAL. This word occurs in our version of Job xxviii. 17. The original term signifies something of exceeding purity. Mr. Carey, for 'the gold and the crystal,' translates 'golden glass' (The Book of Job, p. 117), and in his notes and illustrations (pp. 327-467) shows that the Egyptians had the secret of introducing gold between two surfaces of glass, together with various colours. They could also enamel upon gold. It is very likely that a reference to some such work of art is intended. The word rendered 'crystal' in Ezek. i. 22 is elsewhere 'ice,' or 'frost.' It is probably called 'terrible,' because of the bright shining of such a substance in the rays of the sun, dazzling and blinding the eye that looks on it. We further find 'crystal,' the rock crystal, in Rev. iv. 6, xii. 1: also, the epithet crystal-clear is given to 'jasper' (xxi. 11). See JASPER.

CUBIT. See MEASURES.

CUCKOO (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15). One of the birds of which the flesh was unclean. The cuckoo is known in Palestine; but it is not probable that it is here meant. More likely some of the lesser kinds of sea-fowl. Kitto is inclined to believe that the tern, Sterna hirundo, or sea-swallow, is the bird forbidden. Gesenius suggests the sea-gull, or sea-mew. The Larus fuscus, lesser black-backed gull, and Larus argentatus, herring-gull, are common in Palestine. Duns imagines that the bird in question might be the flamingo, Phaenicopterus ruber, which frequents the shores of the Red and the Dead seas (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 89).

CUCUMBER. This, thought to be the Cucumis chate, was one of the productions of Egypt, which the Israelites regretted (Numb. xi. 5). The common cucumber, Cucumis sativus, is also plentiful in both Egypt and Palestine. 'A garden' or field 'of cucumbers' is mentioned in Isai. i. 8, and in the Apocrypha (Bar. vi. 70). The 'lodge' in such a garden is a frail erection, desolate indeed when the watcher has no further use for it and is gone.

CUMMIN. An umbelliferous annual plant, Cuminum sativum, cultivated for its aromatic seeds, which are used as a condiment. It was threshed with a rod (Isai. xxviii. 25, 27), a practice still continued in Malta. Our Lord alludes to the Pharisees paying tithes of it (Matt. xxiii. 23).

CUP. This is given as the translation of various Hebrew words, frequently otherwise rendered. Thus, Joseph's 'cup' (Gen. xlv. 2), probably of large dimensions, is the same with the 'pots' in Jer. xxxv. 5; while 'cups' there is the translation of another word. Cups were of various shapes and materials, earthenware and metal; and many have been found in Assyria and Egypt of elegant shape and beautifully ornamented. Some, too, have inscriptions of a superstitious character, such as charms against disease, &c. Possibly Joseph's cup might have some resemblance to these. The word 'cup' is often used metaphorically in scripture for the portion or destiny of any one (Psal. xi. 6); for judgments, or affliction (lxxv. 8; Jer. xxv. 15, and elsewhere). The 'cup of salvation' (Psal. cxvi. 13) alludes probably to the cup of ceremony at the passover, when the head of a family pronounced words of blessing over it: see PASSOVER; and comp. the 'cup of blessing' (1 Cor. x. 16). The 'cup of devils' symbolized idolatry and foul rites (21: comp. Rev. xvii. 4).

CUP-BEARER. An officer of high dignity at eastern courts. Such a one was the 'butler' of Pharaoh (Gen. xl. xli. 9). Cup-bearers are mentioned in the description of Solomon's court (1 Kings x. 5); and Rabshekeh, as his name indicates, was cup-bearer to the king of Assyria (2 Kings xviii. 17). Nehemiah held the same post under Artaxerxes (Neh. i. 11, ii. 1). And it was not only an honourable appointment, but must have been a source of great emolument, for Nehemiah was evidently a man of wealth (v. 14-19). Some curious particulars are given by Xenophon (Cyrop., lib. i. cap. 3) of the way in which a Median cup-bearer performed his office. The cup was washed in the king's presence, and when filled, after the officer had tasted a little of the wine, which he poured into his left hand, was presented on three fingers. So no modern eastern attendant ever grasps any vessel he offers to his master, but places it on his left hand, and steadies it with his right.

CURSE. An imprecation or solemn denunciation of evil or judgment (Judges v. 23). When the Israelites entered Canaan, solemn curses were to be pronounced against notorious offenders by certain of the tribes who were stationed upon mount Ebal; the Levites, who stood with the rest of the tribes upon Gerizim, uttering the awful words (Deut. xxvii.). This command was executed by Joshua (Josh. viii. 30-35). See ANATHEMA, EXCOMMUNICATION.

CURTAIN. A Hebrew word, denoting curtains, from a root signifying to shake, is used of the linen and goats' hair hangings which covered the sacred tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 1-13, xxxvi. 8-18). It is hence sometimes employed to designate the tabernacle itself (2 Sam. vii. 2; 1 Chron. xvii. 1). And we find it applied to a tent generally (Isai. liv. 2; Jer. iv. 20). Other Hebrew words are sometimes rendered 'curtain.' See HANGINGS.

CUSH (black ?).—1. An individual or tribe of the sons of Ham (Gen. x. 6, 7, 8; 1 Chron. 8, 9, 10).—2. A Benjamite in the time of Saul (Psal. vii., title).

CUSH (id.). The name of a region inhabited by tribes of the Hamite family so called. But there seems to have been an antediluvian Cush (Gen. ii. 13). If so, it was in Asia; and Cush the Hamite may have had his name from a settlement or allotment there. Leaving this as a matter upon which we can do little more than conjecture, it may be observed that the chief habitations of the Cushites were to the south of Egypt, in the extensive tracts called Ethiopia (Ezek. xxix. 10). They also appear to have spread in the Arabian peninsula, where were tribes descended from them (Gen. x. 7). The Cushites (the word being often rendered 'Ethiopian' in our version) were black in colour (Jer. xlii. 23), robust and large in stature (Isai. xlv. 14), and as it would seem wealthy (xliii. 3). They are mentioned with the Egyptians (Psal. lxxviii. 31; Ezek. xxx. 4, 5, 9; Nah. iii. 9) with the Libyans (2 Chron. xii. 3, xvi. 8); with Phut or Put (Jer. xlvi. 9; Ezek. xxxviii. 5), and as the extreme limit westward of the empire of Xerxes (Esth. i. 1, viii. 9). 'Cush' says Dr. Kalisch 'was strictly the southern zone: it comprised the known countries of the south, both in Africa and Arabia: in the former part it is bounded by Seba (Meroe), in the latter by Sheba (Sabæa), and, whenever the nations inhabiting these districts extended beyond the southern regions, either to settle in more eastern or in more northern parts, they were separated from the stem of Cush, and associated with different branches of Shem. . . . Only, if the ethnographical relation was quite undisputed, as for instance with Raamah, even a more eastern nation was acknowledged as descending from Cush. This part of our list admits then a historical fact of the highest importance, namely the early connection between the tribes of Arabia and those of Africa, a connection guaranteed, not only by the Arabic character of the Abyssinian language, but by the similarity of the names of towns on both sides the Arabic gulf' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 252, 253). Dr. Kalisch afterwards notices another important migration of Cush, that of Nimrod a Cushite chief (pp. 253, &c.). The Cushite woman whom Moses married would seem to have been Arabian (Numb. xii. 1).

CUSH'AN (id.). A name found only in

Hab. iii. 7. It has been supposed that of a man, identical with Chushan-rishathaim; but this is not probable. More likely it is identical with Cush, the territory, the Arabian Cush; the connection with Midian confirming this view. The prophet is describing the triumphant approach of Israel to Canaan, and the consequent fear of the neighbouring tribes.

CUSH'I (the Ethiopian). 1. A runner whom Joab dispatched to apprise David of the victory over Absalom's troops and of Absalom's death (2 Sam. xviii. 21, 22, 23, 31, 32). 2. An ancestor of the person sent to Baruch to desire him to bring and read Jeremiah's roll to the princes (Jer. xxxvi. 14). 3. The father of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

CUSE'ITE (Numb. xii. 1, marg.). See CUSH.

CUSTOM, RECEIPT OF (Matt. ix. 9; Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27). See PUBLICAN.

CUTH, CUTHAH (treasure-house ?) A region, whence colonists were brought by the king of Assyria into Samaria (2 Kings xvii. 24, 30). The number so transported must have been considerable; for the Samaritans were afterwards called Cuthim by the Talmudical writers. The locality is very uncertain. Josephus considers it a region of inner Persia (Antiq., lib. ix. 14, § 3, lib. x. 9, § 7). There was a warlike tribe called Cossæi occupying the mountain ranges between Media and Persia. Perhaps the Cuthæans may be identified with these. Kell, however, prefers the supposition, agreed in by some other writers, that they inhabited the Babylonian Irak, in the district of the Nahr Malcha (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 67, 68).

CUTTING OFF FROM THE PEOPLE (Exod. xxx. 33, and elsewhere). See EXCOMMUNICATION, PUNISHMENTS.

CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH. Heathen nations frequently cut and lacerated their flesh, both as mourning for the dead, a relic perhaps of the human sacrifices that used to be then offered (examples of which still continue among barbarous African nations), and also in order to propitiate their idol deities (1 Kings xviii. 28), a practice prevailing specially (though not exclusively) among Syrians (comp. Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. p. 280). Further, masters used to brand their slaves; and, though this might be a punishment for running away, yet indisputably it served to indicate ownership, and in this sense it is alluded to in various places of scripture (Gal. vi. 17; Rev. vii. 3, xiii. 16, xix. 20). Akin to this practice was the marking or tattooing voluntarily undergone as the sign of devotion to some idol god (Zech. xiii. 6). To preserve them from all such evil and contaminating customs, the strict prohibition was given to the Israelites not to make any cuttings in their flesh, nor to print any marks upon themselves (Lev. xix. 28, xxi. 5; Deut. xiv. 1; comp. also the warning in Jer. xvi. 6, 7). It seems, indeed, as if the forbidden rite was sometimes practised (xli. 5); but the persons referred to in this place were probably the more-than-half idolatrous Samaritans. Mention is also made of the custom in respect to the Philistines and Moabites (xlvi. 5, xlviii. 37).

CY'AMON (Judith vii. 3). A place near to the great plain of Esdraelon. Mr. Grove is inclined to identify it with Tell Kaimon, on the eastern slope of Carmel (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 375).

CYMBALS. Metallic musical instruments of percussion, traceable to remote ages, and still used with no great variation of form. They are in pairs, nearly flat, the central part concave, with a strap at the back for a handle. Sometimes, however, one cymbal is fixed, as to a large drum. They are repeatedly mentioned in scripture, being used on occasions of public rejoicing and for worship (2 Sam. vi. 5; 1 Chron. xiii. 8, xv. 16, 19, 28, xvi. 5; Neh. xii. 27). A distinction is made (Psal. cl. 5) of two kinds; the 'loud' and the 'high-sounding cymbals.' According to a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, the former consisted of four small metallic plates, two being held in each hand, like the modern castagnettes; the latter of two larger plates: comp. Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Becken.' The cymbal (the larger kind) is also mentioned in the New Testament (1 Cor. xiii. 1).

CYPRESS (Isai. xlv. 14). The tree here intended has been supposed to be the ilex, a species of oak. But it is more probably the evergreen cypress, Cupressus sempervirens. This is very common in the lower levels of Syria: the wood is fragrant, very hard, and not likely to rot. So that it was not unfrequently chosen for making images of gods.

CYP'RIANS (2 Macc. iv. 29). Inhabitants of CYPRUS. A large island in the Mediterranean, lying about sixty miles from the coasts of Syria and Asia Minor. Its greatest length, from the north-east extremity to the most western point, is 140 miles. Its breadth varies: where widest it is about 50 miles; but it narrows in one part to 5. The soil is naturally fertile. Cotton, wine, and various fruits are produced; but at present agriculture is in a backward state. Copper and other minerals are found in this island: the copper-mines, we are told by Josephus, were at one time farmed to Herod the Great (Antiq., lib. xvi. 4, § 5). After belonging to Egypt, Persia, and Greece, it became a Roman possession 58 B.C., and was at first united to Cilicia. When separated it was an imperial province, but was subsequently given up to the senate; so that, when St. Luke speaks of the 'deputy' (proconsul), he speaks most accurately; as existing coins and inscriptions testify. In the ninth century, it was subjected to the Saracens: in the crusades, our Richard I. conquered it, and gave it to Guy Lusignan, whose family retained it for nearly 300 years: it was then possessed by the Venetians, and afterwards by the Turks. Cyprus is very frequently mentioned in scripture. Perhaps it may be intended by Chittim in Ezek. xxvii. 6. Jews settled there at an early period; and in New Testament history we find Barnabas a native of Cyprus (Acts iv. 36), and then men of Cyprus and Cyrene preaching the gospel at Antioch (xi. 19, 20). The first missionary journey of Paul and Barnabas commenced with Cyprus (xiii. 1-13); and thither Barnabas went again with Mark (xv. 39). Other references to this island are found in xxi. 3, 16, xxvii. 4. Salamis and Paphos were celebrated cities of Cyprus.

CYRE'NE. A Libyan city, founded by a colony of Greeks from Thera, an island in the Aegean, about 632 B.C. It probably took its name from a fountain, Cyre, near. Cyrene stood on table-land, 1,800 feet above the level of the sea, in a beautiful and fertile region. It was the capital of a district called Cyrenaica; and, with its port, Apollonia, about ten miles off, and the cities Barca, Teuchira, and Hesperis (subsequently named Ptolemais Arsinoe, and Berenice), it formed the Cyrenaic Pentapolis. After the death of Alexander the Great, it was a dependency of Egypt. And then it began to be frequented by the Jews, to whom special privileges were granted. Cyrene was bequeathed to the Romans by Apion, son of Ptolemy Physcon, and was some years after 75 B.C. reduced to the form of a province. Then, 67 B.C., it was united into a single province with Crete. Simon, who was compelled to bear our Saviour's cross, was a Cyrenian (Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26); so were some of the first Christian teachers (Acts xi. 20, xiii. 1). Cyrenian Jews were numerous in Jerusalem; hence the designation of one of the synagogues there (ii. 10, vi. 9).

CYRENIUS. The name by which a Roman governor of Syria, Publius Sulpicius Quirinus, is known in scripture (Luke ii. 2). It has been objected against St. Luke's narrative, that, apart from his statement, there is no trustworthy record of any census having been ordered about the time of our Lord's birth, that Cyrenius or Quirinus was not governor of Syria till some years after that event, and that St. Luke himself notes a later time for the taxing (Acts v. 37). Various modes have been proposed of meeting the difficulty by different renderings of St. Luke's words. But unexpected light has been of late thrown upon the matter.

Mr. Browne (Ordo Saeculorum, pp. 40-49) showed from Tacitus that Quirinus was at an early period in the east in some office of authority, and also by inscriptions obtained from Sanclemente (De Era Vulgari), though these are, perhaps, not to be implicitly relied on, that Quirinus had superintended some prior enrolment, and that it was possible that he might have held the government of Syria twice. Zumpt (Comm. Epigraph. ad Antiq. Rom. pert., vol. ii. p. 98), having examined more particularly the passage of Tacitus which speaks of Quirinus obtaining triumphal honours for reducing the strong-holds of the Homonadenses in Cilicia, comes to the conclusion that Quirinus, as governor of Cilicia, was governor also of Syria at that time, Cilicia and Syria being then united. But the time when this occurred was not that ordinarily assigned to the governorship of Quirinus, some years after Christ's birth: it was earlier; and collateral testimonies add weight to the belief that the succession of Syrian governors stood thus:

C. Sentius Saturninus	from B.C. 9
P. Quinctilius Varus	" 6
P. Sulpicius Quirinus	" 4
M. Lollius	" 1
C. Marcus Censorinus	" A.D. 3
L. Volusius Saturninus	" 4
P. Sulpicius Quirinus, a second time	" 6

It is fair, however, to say, that the consideration of certain historical circumstances tends to throw some doubt on the conclusion just stated. Mr. Pratt has lately taken pains in examining these points, and has given his reasons in the Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan., 1864, pp. 475-482, for rejecting the theory that Quirinus was twice governor of Syria. Mr. Pratt, it must be said, is convinced that the true era of our Lord's birth was about October in 7 B.C.; and it is clear that, if this computation be accurate, the birth, and consequently the census, must have fallen under the administration of Sentius Saturninus. Nor did Quirinus immediately succeed; for Josephus declares that Varus was still governor after Herod's death, and as such was engaged in suppressing a dangerous outbreak of the Jews at Pentecost, while Archelaus was in Rome seeking confirmation from Augustus as his father's successor. Still further, Tertullian, in six different passages, alludes to the enrolment, and in one of these asserts that it was made under Sentius Saturninus (Adv. Marcion., lib. iv. 19). Mr. Pratt thinks, from the repeated and positive mention of the census rolls, that Tertullian had inspected them himself, so that his testimony is to be relied on. On the other hand, Justin Martyr, an earlier writer, resident at Rome, while Tertullian lived in Africa, three times attributes the enrolment to Quirinus, and states that Jesus was born under Quirinus (Apolog., i. 34, 46; Dialog. cum Tryphon., 78). Mr. Pratt believes that Justin was careless, that he went to the record office and asked for the rolls of the census under Quirinus, and that, when they were handed to him, he did not discover that he was looking at documents relating to an event that occurred several years after that which he wished to verify. The reader must lay all the circumstances together, and decide for himself to which of these two writers, Justin or Tertullian, most credit should be given. But then there remains the testimony of Josephus; and it must be acknowledged that it is puzzling. Still, if Josephus is to be trusted, we can hardly imagine that Jesus was born in the governorship of Saturninus. For he places the death of Herod not earlier than 4 B.C., in the thirty-seventh year after his appointment as king (Antiq., lib. xvii. 8, § 1), that appointment being 40 B.C. Varus became governor in 6 B.C.; and it is not probable that our Lord's birth was so long as two or three years before Herod's death.

Perfect certainty in this matter may not be at present attainable; but we must hope that future research may throw additional light upon it. So far, however, as the result can be now stated, there is, to say the least, high probability that Quirinus was governor of Syria about the supposed time of our Lord's birth; and that there was then an enrolment, whoever might be governor—so strong is the corroborative evidence—no candid person can doubt. St. Luke's words, as above noted, have been variously rendered by those who were ignorant of, and those who have disbelieved, the alleged early governorship of Quirinus. Mr. Pratt would understand them as affirming that the enrolment took place before Quirinus was governor of Syria. But, not to speak of the extreme harshness of the construction, if we are thus to render the sentence, it is almost inconceivable that St. Luke, ordinarily so plain in stating his notes of time, should not have obviated every misapprehension by simply saying that this enrolment was in the time of Saturninus, if that really were the fact.

A mere outline of the discussion is, of course, all that can be given here. The student who desires to know more will, doubtless, consult Mr. Pratt's interesting paper, to which reference has been made, and may also examine Dr. Lee's Inspiration of Script., 2nd edit., p. 401, note 1, and append. Q, pp. 575-581; and Dr. Fairbairn's Herm. Man., app., pp. 461-475; together with Bp. Ellicott's very sensible note in Hist. Lect., lect. ii. p. 58.

CY'RUS (the sun, splendour of the sun). The founder of the Persian empire. The accounts of historians vary as to his personal history. He is said to have been the son of Cambyses, a Persian of the royal Achæmenian race, by Mandane, daughter of Astyages the king of Media. His grandfather ordered him to be put to death, because in consequence of a dream he apprehended danger from him. But he was secretly preserved and brought up in obscurity under the name of Agradates. Discovered by the spirit he showed, he was placed at the head of the Persians. In a revolt which followed against the Median power, Cyrus defeated and took Astyages prisoner at the battle of Pasargadæ 559 B.C. He was now a powerful king: he conquered Lydia; he took Babylon 538 B.C.; and the provinces of the Assyrian empire fell under his sway. He still went on enlarging his dominions; but having attacked the Scythians he was killed in battle 529 B.C. Such in substance is the account given by Herodotus (lib. i. 107-130, 190, 191, 214): that of Xenophon (Cyrop.) differs in many important particulars.

The relation in which Cyrus stood to the Jews deserves special attention. It was foretold by the prophet Isaiah that he should deliver the Jews from their captivity by his conquest of Babylon, and that he should direct the re-building of Jerusalem with the temple. The prophet's words have an inexpressible grandeur in them, calling the future conqueror by name, and describing him as anointed by the Most High, of whom in his eastern home he had never heard (Isai. xlv. 34-xlv. ). We must recollect that the welfare of the church was involved, and that the deliverance from Babylon pre-signified a far greater deliverance and a much happier return. The prosperity with which God blessed his people after he had placed them again in their own land was very sweet to the rescued captives; and the restoration of their temple-worship was a precious boon. But their worship was often interrupted; and their quiet was often invaded. So that we are not to conceive that the magnificent promises of lasting glory had their entire fulfilment in the return from Babylon. The prophet's eye ranged from the comparatively-near to the more distant prospect, and beheld adumbrated under worldly privileges the spiritual triumphs of Messiah's reign. Then indeed should Jerusalem be a name of joy for ever: then indeed should the redeemed dwell in blissful habitations; and their rapturous song of praise should cease no more.

Viewed in this light the commission of Cyrus was of the greatest magnitude. And it was a fitting occasion for the prophetic spirit to reveal with unwonted clearness the circumstances relating to him. Certain critics have taken exception to this, because the Persian prince is announced by name. It could not, they say, have occurred so long before: they bring down this prophecy, therefore, to a much later time, to the very time of Cyrus himself. This attempted dismemberment of the book of Isaiah cannot be now examined (See ISAI'AH, BOOK OF): suffice it to say here that the appellation Cyrus was probably a title rather than a personal name; that the crisis demanded a peculiar manifestation of divine foreknowledge (Isai. xli. 21-29); and that there are other examples in scripture of individuals designated by name long before their birth (1 Kings xlii. 2).

Josephus, indeed, narrates a remarkable story. He says that the prophecies of Isaiah respecting Cyrus were shown to that king, and that, struck with the divine record, he was induced to issue his decree (Antiq., lib. xi. 1, §§ 1, 2). Be this as it may, most unquestionably the decree, preserved in Ezra i. 2-4, not merely refers to the later chapters of Isaiah, but, as Kleinert has proved (Ueber die Echtheit sämmtl. in dem Buche Jesaia enthalt. Weissagungen, pp. 134 &c.), actually incorporates many of the words of them.

The edict of Cyrus, most important in itself, was the source and authorization of other edicts of Persian kings in favour of the Jews (Ezra v. 17, vi. 1-12). It inaugurates, therefore a new era in Jewish history, an era which, according to Mr. Westcott (Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 380), was the 'beginning of Judaism,' when those great changes occurred 'by which the nation was transformed into a church.'

Cyrus was succeeded in his dominions by his son Cambyzes: a tomb said to be his is still shown at Pasargadae, the modern Murg-Aub.

D

DA'BAREH (sheep-walk?). A Levitical city (Josh. xxi. 28): it is identical with Dabereh.

DAB'BASHETH (hump of a camel). A border town of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 11).

DA'BERATH (the sheep-walk?). A city, called also Dabareh, on the border of Issachar and Zebulun, but belonging to the former (Josh. xix. 12; 1 Chron. vi. 72). It has been identified as Debârieh, a small modern village at the western foot of Tabor.

DA'BRIA (2 Esdr. xiv. 24).

DACO'BI (1 Esdr. v. 28). A corrupted form of Akkub (Ezra ii. 42).

DAD'DEUS (1 Esdr. viii. 46). Identical, it would seem, with Saddeus (45); probably corrupted forms of Iddo (Ezra viii. 17).

DA'GON (little, i. e. dear, or honoured, fish). The national deity of the Philistines, the god, as Atargatis or Derceto was the goddess. There was a temple of Dagon at Gaza (Judges xvi. 23), and one at Ashdod (1 Sam. v. 1-7), which last was destroyed by Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Macc. x. 83, 84); and we may conclude that occasionally the worship of the male and female deities was conjoined in the same sanctuary (1 Sam. xxxi. 10; 1 Chron. x. 10). There are places called Beth-dagon, where doubtless this idolatrous worship prevailed (Josh. xv. 41, xix. 27).

Dagon was represented with the face and hands of a human being, and with a fishy tail. A fish-god was worshipped by the Babylonians. It was said to have emerged from the Red sea, and to have taught men the use of letters, the arts, religion, and agriculture. Other similar beings, according to the story, from time to time have appeared: the name given to the last of them was Odarkon. Some have identified this with the Phœnician Dagon, but perhaps without sufficient reason. The fishy shape was the symbol of fruitfulness, and therefore likely to be adopted in various places, especially among maritime tribes. Some representations of a fish-god have been discovered among the Assyrian sculptures.

Assyrian Fish-God. Nineveh Marbles, Brit. Mu

DA'Y'SAN (1 Esdr. v. 31). Perhaps for Rezin (Ezra ii. 48).

DALAI'AH (whom Jehovah hath freed). A descendant of David (1 Chron. iii. 24).

DALMANU'THA. A place near the sea of Galilee, into the parts of which our Lord is said to have come (Mark viii. 10). But St. Matthew, recording the same journey, says (Matt. xv. 39) 'into the coasts of Magdala.' The two most therefore have been contiguous. Now Magdala was close upon the shore at the southern end of the plain of Gennesaret. A mile beyond this, at the mouth of a narrow glen running down from the west, are fields, and gardens, and copious springs, and ruins. The place is called 'Ain el-Bârideh. Here Mr. Porter supposes was Dalmanutha.

DALMA'TIA. A part of the Roman province of Illyricum, on the east coast of the Adriatic sea, to the south of Liburnia. Its chief towns were Salona, Epidaurus, and Lissus. St. Paul speaks of Titus going thither (2 Tim. iv. 10).

DAL'PHON (swift?). A son of Haman (Esth. ix. 7).

DAM'ARIS (probably delicate woman?). A female at Athens converted by the instrumentality of St. Paul (Acts xvii. 34).

DAM'ASCENES (2 Cor. xi. 32). Inhabitants of Damascus.

DAMAS'CUS (activity, alertness, perhaps in reference to traffic). A noted and most ancient city of Syria, seated in a fertile plain at the eastern base of the Anti-libanus. It is first mentioned in scripture in connection with Abraham's slaughter of the confederate eastern kings (Gen. xiv. 15). There is also a legendary story that the patriarch, on his way to Canaan, stayed some time at Damascus. This may well have been so, if Dr. Beke's belief that Haran was in the neighbourhood be well founded (see HARAN). Abraham held certainly some relation to the Syrian city; for the steward of his house was a Damascene (xv. 2).

We hear no more of it in scripture till the time of David, when the inhabitants of that territory of which Damascus was the capital ventured to assist their neighbours of Zobah against the Israelitish monarch, and were by him reduced to subjection (2 Sam. viii. 5, 6; 1 Chron. xviii. 5, 6). It is very possible that David might permit the native prince still to occupy the throne of Damascus as his vassal. His name, if we may credit Nicolaus Damascenus, an author cited by Josephus (Antiq., lib. vii. 5, § 2), was Hadad; and his posterity reigned for ten generations. We find, however, that in Solomon's reign, probably towards the end, a certain Rezon gathered partizans and possessed himself of Damascus (1 Kings xi. 23-25). He must have been either an usurper, or the same with Hezion of whom we afterwards read, whose son was Tabrimon, and grandson the Ben-hadad with whom Asa made a league, there having been a similar alliance between Tabrimon and Abijah (xv. 18, 19). This Ben-hadad overran the northern part of Israel, and secured a kind of authority, called that of making streets, in Samaria (20, xx. 34). His son, likewise named Ben-hadad (the second so designated in scripture), was the antagonist of Ahab and Jehoram (xx., xxii.; 2 Kings vi., vii.). In his reign Syria appears to have been pressed by the Assyrian power now beginning to turn westward. Hazael succeeded (viii. 15), and transmitted the crown to his son Ben-hadad (xiii. 3, 24). Afterwards, whether in Ben-hadad's reign is uncertain, Damascus was subjected by the Israelitish king Jeroboam II. (xiv. 28). We hear nothing more of the city or its king till the reign of Ahaz, when Rezin joined with the king of Israel against Judah; but, Ahaz having solicited the aid of Tiglath-pileser, the Assyrian came, slew Rezin, occupied Damascus (where Ahaz went to meet him), and carried off many of the people captive (xvi. 5-10). This catastrophe was predicted by Isaiah (Isai. xvii.) and by Amos (Amos i. 3-5). Further calamities were in store for Damascus, foretold by Jeremiah (Jer. xlix. 32-27), inflicted according to Josephus (Antiq., lib. x. 9, § 7), by an invasion of the Chaldeans five years after the destruction of Jerusalem; when Coele-syria was occupied and Ammon and Moab subdued. Damascus passed afterwards into the hands of the Persians, the Greeks, and the Romans. It was the scene of the conversion of St. Paul (Acts ix.); and certain localities connected with the apostle and the street called 'Straight' are still pointed out. But little credit can be given to these identifications. For the authority of Aretas at Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 32) see ARETAS. This city, advantageously situated, has always been a place of great traffic. Ezekiel mentions the commodities supplied by it to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 18); and it would seem that it was very early noted for textile fabrics; for the text (Amos iii. 12) might be better rendered, 'on the couch of damask' (damask taking its name from Damascus, from which it is said to have been originally brought). See, however, Ewald, Die Proph. des A. B., vol. i. p. 97; Henderson, Minor Proph., p. 144.

Damascus is still a great city under Turkish rule; reckoned to contain 140,000, of whom 12,000 are Christians, and 12,000 Jews. But it suffered great calamities in the late Druze disturbances. A fearful massacre of Christians was perpetrated there July 9, 1860. See Churchill, The Druzes and the Maronites, chap. vii. pp. 207-221. Travellers have vied with each other in describing the beauty of Damascus. 'From the edge of the mountain range' says Dr. Stanley, 'you look down on the plain. . . . It is here seen in its widest and fullest perfection, with the visible explanation of the whole secret of its great and enduring charm, that which it must have had when it was the solitary seat of civilization in Syria, and which it will have as long as the world lasts. The river (Barada), with its green banks, is seen at the bottom rushing through the cleft (see ABANA) : it bursts forth, and as if in a moment scatters over the plain, through a circle of 30 miles, the same verdure which had hitherto been confined to its single channel. . . . Far and wide in front extends the level plain, its horizon bare, its lines of surrounding hills bare, all bare far away on the road to Palmyra and Baghdad. In the midst of this plain lies at your feet the vast lake or island of deep verdure, walnuts and apricots waving above, corn and grass below ; and in the midst of this mass of foliage rises, striking out its wide arms of streets hither and thither, and its white minarets above the trees which embosom them, the city of Damascus. On the right towers the snowy height of Hermon, overlooking the whole scene. Close behind are the sterile lime-stone mountains ; so that you stand literally between the living and the dead' (Sinai and Palestine, p. 410).

DAM'MIM (1 Sam. xvii. 1, marg.). See EPHES-DAMMIM.

DAN (Judge). A son of Jacob by his concubine Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid (Gen. xxx. 6, xxxv. 25 ; Exod. i. 4 ; 1 Chron. ii. 2). Of Dan's personal history we know nothing, except that he had one son, Hushim or Shuham (Gen. xlvi. 23 ; Numb. xxvi. 42). He shared with his brethren the prophetic blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 16, 17), fulfilled, perhaps, in the administration of Samson, and in the craft and stratagem which his descendants used against their enemies. Other explanations, however, have been given. Those descendants multiplied largely ; for at the first census after quitting Egypt the tribe numbered 62,700 males above twenty years of age ; and, when numbered again on their coming to Jordan, they were 64,400 (Numb. i. 38, 39, xxvi. 42, 43). Moses ere his death, as Jacob, pronounced a prophetic blessing. 'Dan is a lion's whelp ; he shall leap from Bashan' was the utterance respecting this tribe (Deut. xxxiii. 22), fulfilled in the predatory expeditions, of which one at least is recorded in their subsequent history.

When the Israelites had subdued Canaan and were apportioning its territory among the tribes, to Dan was allotted a pleasant region, narrow in extent, but rich and fertile in its general character. It was to the west of Benjamin, reaching to the Mediterranean, bordered by Ephraim to the north, and by Judah to the south-east. But then there were other neighbours. For the Philistines were occupying much of that fruitful plain ; and Dan would need the wisdom as well as the venom of the serpent to resist their horsemen and their chariots (Josh. xix. 40-46). Some of the cities of Dan seem to have been taken from the territories of other tribes, from Judah or from Ephraim. They were not many in all, but seventeen or eighteen ; and four of them were assigned to the Levites (xxi. 23, 24). Several of these cities were retained by the Philistines. Hence the Danites found their territory too circumscribed. And so they sent out a small party to explore, who, wandering to the far north-east, fixed upon a spot where they thought they could surprise and overcome the careless inhabitants. A large detachment accordingly marched to Laish, seized it, and called it Dan after their ancestor. It was a well-planned but wild and lawless foray (xix. 47 ; Judges xviii.). Some of the tribe appear to have taken to the sea (v. 17), engaged in fishing probably or this coasting-trade ; and perhaps they cultivated the arts : two at least of the artists mentioned in the construction of the tabernacle and of the temple were connected with the tribe (Exod. xxxv. 34 ; 2 Chron. ii. 14). There is little more to be said. A prince of Dan is mentioned in 1 Chron. xxvii. 22 ; but the tribe is hardly again named. In Ezek. xviii. its lot is placed in the far north : in Rev. vii. it is omitted. Had it proved altogether faithless to its trust ? Legend adds that antichrist is to spring from Dan.

DAN (id.).—1. A place, originally Leshem or Laish, seized by a party of Danites and called Dan from the ancestor of their tribe. The original inhabitants are said to have lived 'after the manner of the Zidonians,' but far from them. Probably they were a colony of Zidon. The Danite free-booters brought hither the images they had stolen from Micah, and the Levite who was his priest ; and here for long this illicit worship continued (Josh. xix. 47 ; Judges xviii.). Subsequently Jeroboam set up one of his calves at Dan (1 Kings xii. 29, 30). This city being in the extreme north, as Beer-sheba was the extreme south, a proverbial expression came into common use to express the whole extent of Palestine : 'from Dan even to Beer-sheba' (Judges xx. 1, and elsewhere). Dan is twice mentioned in the Pentateuch (Gen. xiv. 14 ; Deut. xxxiv. 1). In the last-named place, probably Dan Laish is meant ; as the account of Moses' death must have been supplied by a later writer. As to the former it is not easy to decide. There might have been another Dan in Abraham's time ; but the matter is one of those on which we can only conjecture. Dan was near Paneas, on the road to Tyre, just by the mound now called Tell el-Kady, close by which rises the Leddan. But 'not one solitary habitation is there. The fountain still pours forth its river of delicious water ; but herds of black buffaloes wash and wallow in its crystal pools. You cannot even examine the site with satisfaction, so dense is the jungle of briars, thorns, and thistles which have overspread it' (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 216).—2. (Ezek. xxvii. 19). See VEDAN.

DAN-JA'AN (perhaps woodland Dan). A place to which Joab, and his officers, extended their circuit in taking the census of Israel (2 Sam. xxiv. 6). It is most generally believed identical with Dan, formerly Laish.

Some, however, are disposed, from its being named along with Gilead, to believe it in or near to that district; and others would place it elsewhere. But these are mere conjectures.

DANCE, DANCING. The inhabitants of warm climates are more accustomed to express their feelings by bodily gestures than the more staid natives of the north. Just as impassioned language became poetry, and song broke forth from the lips, so the limbs partook of the excitement (Psal. xxxv. 10), and joy was exhibited in dancing.

We read of dances among the Hebrews at solemn religious festivals. Thus David danced before the Lord at the bringing up of the ark into Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 14). His wife Michal reproached him for his conduct; but her objection did not apply so much to the act of dancing as to the exposure of his person in the light dress he necessarily wore (16, 20-22). It might be that Michal's reproaches had some effect; for in all the ordinances which David made for praise, dividing the Levites into choirs, and in subsequent festal rejoicings, we find no mention of the dance through the whole period of scripture history. In later times, indeed, the Mishna speaks of a torch-dance on the first day of the feast of tabernacles, when Jerusalem was illuminated. Besides dances performed by men, there were dances of Hebrew women. We have an example of this after the passage of the Red sea. There was a responsive song of triumph: the men, however, are not said to have danced, but the women did (Exod. xv.). Similar were the dances that celebrated David's victory over Goliath (1 Sam. xviii. 6; see also Psal. lxxviii. 25); the 'timbrels' being musical instruments invariably accompanied with dancing. We do not find that the sexes were mixed in social dances. Thus it is evident that the daughters of Shiloh were not accompanied by even their male relatives (Judges xxi. 21). Theirs would seem to have been a religious festival. Of course, there were also dances of mere pleasure and revelry (1 Sam. xxx. 16; Job xxi. 11; Jer. xxxi. 4, 13; Luke xv. 25). Of the modes or figures of the Hebrew dance we know little; whether it was in a ring, or whether the performers were arranged in more than one row. In the east at present a female leads the dance; and others follow, imitating exactly her movements. Possibly double rows, something similar to the country-dance, may be alluded to in Sol. Song vi. 13; where Ginsberg translates 'Like a dance to double choirs' (Song of Songs, pp. 176, 177). The daughter of Herodias danced alone (Matt. xiv. 6). See Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., vol. i. cap. 28, pp. 296-302. It may be observed that a Hebrew word, mahhol, rendered 'dance' in our version (Psal. cl. 4, and elsewhere), is supposed by some to mean a musical instrument.

DAN'IEL (judge of God).—1. One of the sons of David, born in Hebron, of Abigail, the Carmelitess (1 Chron. iii. 1). He is elsewhere called Chilleab (2 Sam. iii. 3).—2. A priest of the family of Ithamar, who returned from captivity with Ezra (Ezra viii. 2). Possibly he, or his representative, was the person who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 6).

3. One of the greater prophets. He was of royal, or at least noble, race, and was one of the young captives carried to Babylon after the attack on Jerusalem made in the third year of Jehoiakim (Dan. i. 1, 2). It has, however, been objected that no assault or capture of Jerusalem could have taken place so early in Jehoiakim's reign. But this objection will be considered in the succeeding article, and in that on JEHOIAKIM, which see.

Daniel, and some of his companions, were selected for training in the learning and tongue of the Chaldeans. They were favoured by the prince of the eunuchs, and permitted to decline the 'king's meat' and wine, from which they would have contracted ceremonial defilement; and, though they lived on plain and scanty fare, by God's providence their health was preserved. New names were given them, that of Daniel being Belteshazzar; and, after a three years' course of instruction, they stood before the king, and were found to have more wisdom than the Chaldean magicians and astrologers (3-20). Shortly after this, Daniel's knowledge was tried. Nebuchadnezzar, in the second year of his sole reign, dreamed a remarkable dream, which, on awaking, he had forgotten. He was about to put all the wise men to death because they could not tell him his dream and the interpretation. But the secret was supernaturally revealed to Daniel, who explained the vision to the king, and was, in consequence, advanced to be 'ruler over the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon' (ii.). Whether he retained his official rank through the whole of Nebuchadnezzar's reign we do not know; nor are we informed how he escaped when the king set up his golden image for worship; we may only be sure that it was by no unworthy compliance. He might have been absent in some other province; or perhaps, as Prideaux supposes, 'his enemies thought it fittest not to begin with him, because of the great authority he had with the king, but rather to fall first on his three friends, and thereby pave the way for their more successful reaching of him after it' (Connect., vol. i. p. 74, edit. 1858). Zündel, considering the required homage to the golden statue to have had more a political than a religious object, believes that neither Daniel, who was placed over the wise men, nor the wise men themselves, would be called on to make the prostration, since their office was not political (Krit. Untersuch. über die Abfass. des B. Daniel, p. 13). We read of Daniel's interpreting another dream of Nebuchadnezzar in the later part of that monarch's reign (Dan. iv.). He was then addressed as 'master of the magicians;' but, from the way in which he is spoken of as coming in last, it is not improbable that he was not residing in Babylon, and was sent for thither; or else that, though called 'master,' he stood apart from, and in a higher grade than, the caste of ordinary wise men (8). In the time of Belshazzar he was evidently neglected (v. 11, 12), but appears to have held some post at Susa (viii. 1, 27). In that reign he had two of his remarkable visions (vii., viii.); and he interpreted the handwriting on the wall (v.). By Darius he was made first president of the kingdom; and then occurred the plot for casting him to the lions. His integrity, fearlessness, and faith, were most remarkably illustrated at this crisis (vi.). In the first year of Darius he had another vision (ix.); and the last recorded was in the third of Cyrus, Daniel being at that time on the banks of the Hiddekel, i. e. the Tigris (x. 1-4). Of his death we have no certain account; but he is said to have died at Susa; and what is called his tomb is still shown there. His life must have been long, probably not less than 85 years. Daniel is mentioned by Ezekiel, specially for his wisdom (Ezek. xiv. 14, 20, xxviii. 3); and this is not wonderful, seeing that he was so greatly distinguished at court, and held at the time the appointment of chief of the wise men.

DANIEL, THE BOOK OF. The book bearing the name of Daniel is in our bibles placed immediately after that of Ezekiel, as the fourth of the so-called greater prophets. In the Hebrew canon it is ranked in the third division called Khethubim, or, according to the Greek name, hagiographa.

This book is composed partly in Hebrew; part, viz., ii. 4-7, 12, in Chaldee. A portion of it is occupied with a narrative of events; and the rest is a series of prophetic visions. In the history Daniel is spoken of in the third person; while the visions profess to be recorded by himself. There is no reason, however, to question the unity of the book. 'You may divide it,' says Zündel: 'you cannot possibly pull it to pieces. Separate it according to the languages. This you cannot do; for there is a clear reference in the Chaldee pieces, ii. 49, iii. 12, 16, 23, 30, to the Hebrew, i., and also a substantial connection between the Hebrew, viii.-xii., and the Chaldee, vii.; a similar notation of time being found in vii. 1 and viii. 1. Divide it according to the contents, the narrative and the visions, i.-vi., and vii.-xii. You are met by an equal difficulty. For i. is clearly by its contents an introduction to the historical ii.-vi., and by the language and style connected with the visions vii.-xii., linking through the Hebrew the former with the latter division, just as vii. links the first and the last through the Chaldee' (Krit. Unters. über die Abfass. Daniel, pp. 40, 41). Other references from one part of the book to another might be pointed out: see De Wette, Einleit. in A. T., § 256, p. 350; Keil, Einleit., § 134, p. 443; Horne, Introduct., vol. ii. p. 842, edit. Ayre. But it is needless to discuss this point further: critics are generally agreed that the whole book proceeds from the same hand.

Received into the Jewish canon, this book has been generally attributed to the prophet Daniel. This belief, however, questioned by certain ancient opponents of Christianity, has of late years been keenly disputed; and many able writers are now of opinion that the date of its composition must be brought down to the Maccabean times, and consequently that much of it is unhistorical. They do not impute to the writer any improper motive or intent to deceive: they suppose him a patriotic Jew, who was anxious to inspire his countrymen under the persecution of Antiochus, and who selected the names of his principal figures from the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah (e.g. Ezra viii. 2, x. 28; Neh. viii. 4, x. 2, 6, 23), guided perhaps by some traditionary stories of Daniel as a celebrated Hebrew exile. Whatever may be thought of the theory generally, that this book is of a late date, such fanciful confirmations must be allowed to be worthless. Neither can the opinion that the author was a pious patriotic Jew be easily approved. For he distinctly assumes the name of Daniel: he relates with all gravity circumstances that are said to have happened to Daniel: he professes as Daniel to have received divine communications, which he delivers as solemn prophecy. In regard to some books it matters little who penned them: their authority and credit will not be interfered with. And others bear merely a name in the title without further allusion to it. But here Daniel's history is found in every paragraph: Daniel personally presents himself everywhere: Daniel speaks continually as from the mouth of Jehovah: you cannot take away Daniel's authorship without most seriously impeaching the real writer's honesty, and reverence, and truthful purpose. He trifles with the living God. He speaks in the Lord's name; and yet the Lord did not send him: he utters oracles which are based upon a lie. This assertion is made deliberately and after careful consideration of the whole bearings of the case. And the conclusion is that, if the book can be proved to be the composition of some one much later in date than Daniel, it ought to be rejected as utterly unworthy of a place in the sacred canon.

It is necessary to examine the reasons that are urged against this book's being really the production of the prophet Daniel. In the brief space which can be given here to the investigation, only a few of the principal arguments can be adverted to; and the objections of less weight may well be passed over. Thus it is useless to dwell on the assertion that Greek names are given to some of the musical instruments enumerated in iii. 5, 7, 10, 15. If it were so, what then? It is admitted that Greek influence spread far in Asia at a very early date, that Sennacherib encountered a Greek army in Cilicia, and that Esar-haddon had Greeks in his service, from whom doubtless Greek words passed into eastern speech. And, besides, some Greek names of musical instruments were really words of Persian origin Grecized (see Zündel ubi supr., pp. 5, 6). Few would be inclined now to lay stress on such a reason for the late composition of the book. Neither need much attention be paid to the alleged improbabilities of the narrative. It is said that no king would have required his wise men to tell him the dream he had forgotten, as well as the interpretation of it (Dan. ii. 1-9). On the contrary, it was the most sensible thing Nebuchadnezzar could do. If the magicians had really supernatural knowledge, they could describe to the king his dream as well as interpret it. So the event proved, distinguishing between the false and the true; for the heathen astrologers who could not tell the dream had no power to unroll its prophetic signification; while Daniel, who could by divine revelation expound, by divine revelation told also what the dream had been. It was an admirable test which was thus applied.

Cases, however, are alleged of actual mistake or misrepresentation. Such is the statement that Daniel was carried captive to Babylon in the third year of Jehoiakim i. 1-6). Nebuchadnezzar, it is said, was not then king; for his reign commenced in Jehoiakim's fourth year (Jer. xxv. 1); and, besides, it is argued, from the terms of Jeremiah's prophecy (8-11), that the Babylonian invasion was then future. But the fact is that, the different places being compared, there is, instead of mistake or contradiction, a marvellous harmony. For Nebuchadnezzar's march on Jerusalem in Jehoiakim's third year (perhaps the earlier part of it) was before the victory of Carchemish (xlv. 2), while Nebuchadnezzar's father was still upon the throne. What wonder that the Jews, finding that he wielded all the power of Babylon, called him by the title which not long afterwards was exclusively his own? And the taking of Jerusalem at that time was not that utter destruction which Jeremiah predicted in the words above referred to, and which did not come upon the city till many years later. Jehoiakim submitted, and was continued on his throne as a Babylonish vassal; and for three years he was faithful to his liege-lord (2 Kings xxiv. 1; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7). Now observe that at the end of Jehoiakim's fifth year a fast was proclaimed in Jerusalem (Jer. xxxvi. 9), when Jeremiah's prophecies of the destruction of the Judean kingdom by the Chaldeans were publicly read (10). Who can doubt that this fast was held in preparation for the revolt from Nebuchadnezzar? and thus Jehoiakim's rage and destruction of the roll may be readily accounted for (22-26). Jeremiah's testimony just contradicted the king's determination. Mark, further, that Daniel and his three companions were to be three years in training (Dan. i. 5). But in Nebuchadnezzar's second year Daniel stood before the great monarch (ii. 1, 25). Exact is the correspondence, if the captivity be as early as Jehoiakim's third year: the three years of previous study had just ended. Again, objectors have been bold to declare that there never was such a king as Belshazzar: he is mentioned nowhere else. On this nothing need be said here: the matter has already been discussed: see BELSHAZZAR. Moreover, Darius the Mede, the son of Ahasuerus is a great stumbling-block to modern critics: see DARIUS, 3. But we may well say with Zündel, suppose this book of Daniel a late apocryphal unhistoric production, and see the wonderful good-luck of the writer. He puts down at hazard a date of Daniel's deportation, and a year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (i. 1, ii. 1); and lo! patient investigation shows that his dates tally, and are in remarkable correspondence with other parts of scripture. He invents a king, Belshazzar, whom no one ever heard of; and, surprising to relate, modern discovery dis-inters a real Belshazzar. His good fortune still does not forsake him. He introduces a Median Darius, whom Herodotus never names; and yet there can be no doubt that he has spoken of a veritable personage. Who will be credulous enough to imagine that all this has happened by chance (tibi suppr., p. 38)?

The great objections, however, to the authority of this book are the supernatural character of its narratives, and the minuteness of its predictions, down to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. With regard to the first objection all that shall be said at present is that the wonders related are an essential part of the book. They cannot be supposed to be interpolations. If they are rejected, you must reject the whole.

As to the minute prophetic detail down to Antiochus, and the consequent presumption that the book was composed in his times, let us see how such a supposition will agree with facts. If we imagine some pious Jew patriotically disposed, his object must have been to rouse and encourage that resistance to arbitrary profane power which, under the leadership of the Maccabean family, actually resulted in establishing the independence of the Jews. But certainly neither the histories nor the visions of this book are calculated to call out such a spirit: they suggest patient submission rather than bold opposition: written in the time of the Maccabees they would have tended to paralyze rather than to strengthen those valiant captains' hands. And, then, what could have been meant by the predicted resurrection of xii. 1-4? Who would have made it just follow the downfall of Epiphanes? Zündel places in parallel columns the historical facts of the book and the occurrences and position of the Jews in Maccabean times (pp. 67-73). A glance at his tables is sufficient to show the utter dissimilitude. One cannot conceive a man taking up old legends of quite a different cast, and trying to illustrate what was happening around him by comparisons which fall at every point.

The visions are equally inapposite. Besides, they reach far down below the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This is a point of great importance. For, if it can be proved, it at once puts an end to the notion that the writer was some Maccabean uninspired patriot. Now it will hardly be denied that the visions of ii. and vii. are parallel, and also that we have in viii. a special illustration of parts of the preceding visions. Let us place these over-against each other.

The golden head.
The silver breast.
The brass body and thighs.
The iron and clay legs and feet.

chap. vii.
The winged lion.
The bear.
The four-winged leopard.
The ten-horned beast.

chap. viii
The two-horned ram.
The he-goat.

The golden head is declared to be the Assyrio-Chaldaic kingdom (ii. 37, 38). The two-horned ram is the Medo-Persian dominion; and the he-goat the Grecian (vii. 20, 21). What, then, can be intended by the ten-horned beast, and by the iron and clay legs and feet of the great image (ii., vii.)? The natural answer would be that it was that world-wide empire which rose upon the ruins of preceding sovereignties, which held for long in its iron grasp all known civilized lands, but which ultimately, showing signs of weakness and decay, was divided into many (generally reckoned ten) inferior kingdoms, while under its rule God set up another kingdom of diverse character, which grew little aided by human hands, which has spread itself mightily, which will embrace within its ample sway all nations, and shall never be destroyed. Of course, if this interpretation stands, the patriotic Jew of the time of Antiochus, wishing merely to rouse his nation against the tyrant, vanishes; and it must be acknowledged that the inspiration of God is here. Accordingly, critics explain the ten-horned beast and the iron and clay legs and feet of the Grecian kingdom, identifying these with the he-goat of viii., and so dividing the Medo-Persian sovereignty that the silver breast and the bear are made to symbolize the Medes, the brass body and thighs, and the four-winged leopard, the Persians. The following scheme will represent this interpretation.

The golden head.
The silver breast.
The brass body and thighs.
The iron and clay legs and feet.

chap. vii.
The winged lion.
The bear.
The four-winged leopard.
The ten-horned beast.

chap. viii.
One horn } of the ram. Babylon.
The other horn } Media.
The four-horned he-goat. Persia.
Greece.

But surely the parts of this scheme do not fit in well together. The bear with unequal sides corresponds better to the unequally-horned ram than with a single horn of it; and the four-winged leopard which had suited exactly with the four-horned he-goat is strangely identified with the second horn of the ram; while, again, propriety is violated in setting the ten-horned beast over-against the four-horned he-goat. Great allowance certainly would have to be made for the patriotic Jew, if such were the writer of the book, for his ill-management of his symbols. Besides, it was doubtless the Messiah's kingdom, the Christian dispensation, that was ultimately to have sway; and this unquestionably does not date from the time of Grecian rule. It is objected, indeed, that to regard the fourth empire under which it rose as the Roman, would contradict ii. 44, 45; these verses being taken to assert that the fourth empire was subverted at the commencement of the Messianic kingdom. But this is an untenable gloss, to be maintained only on the supposition that Messiah's dominion was of a worldly nature.

It may be properly asked, When, at what exact juncture, did the supposed Jewish patriot compose the book? Was it before or after the death of Antiochus? If before, then he actually uttered prophecy; for in vii. 25 we have the prediction that the persecution should continue 3½ times; if after, the announcement of the resurrection (xii. 2) becomes absolutely monstrous. And then, instead of cheerful consolation, which it is assumed the book was to inspire, Daniel is represented after repeated visions as disappointed and mournful (x. 2, 3). What intelligible explanation can be given of this? Believing that the book was written by the Daniel of the captivity, the matter is plain enough. In the third year of Cyrus little fruit had been gained of the liberation, and of the decree of his first year. Expectations had not been realized. Opposition had shown itself and had prevailed. Jerusalem was still desolate; the temple had not been reared. No wonder that the prophet mourned. And then it is that the far future is laid open to him, the one and twenty days' resistance of the prince of Persia, the rapid sketch of Persian history, the power of Alexander, the fortunes of the Syrian and Egyptian kings, who had shares of his dominions, all is intelligible on the supposition that God is unfolding to a true prophet the things that should come to pass, and letting him see that, though disappointments might occur, an over-ruling hand was at work, and all things tending, through worldly change and succession of kings, to that great consummation, the establishment of an endless dominion of peace and glory. On any other view we have an inexplicable riddle. Ascribing the composition to Maccabean times, it is hard indeed, as above noted, to see how the writer could imagine that such narratives and such visions would rouse his countrymen to valiant resistance against their persecutors; and it is still harder to believe that the readers would have detected any incentives in the book sufficient to inspire them with hopeful expectations from such a contest. Minute investigation into the internal character of the composition, the farther it is carried, shows the more clearly that the presumption of a late origin does not fit the circumstances of the case, does not supply the key to unlock the mysterious casket.

Let us proceed to another part of the enquiry, and see if any positive reasons for settling the date can be produced.

Weighty proof of the early existence of the book of Daniel is to be gathered from the circumstances of the Septuagint translation. It is acknowledged that the various parts of scripture were rendered into Greek at different dates; the version of the Pentateuch being the earliest. Let us see whether we can approximate to that of Daniel. Now there is no doubt that this must have been in existence when the first book of Maccabees was composed. For the expression of 1 Macc. i. 54 is evidently from the Septuagint Dan. ix. 27. And the first of the Maccabees may be fairly dated about 100 B.C. Again, we gather from the second prologue to the book of Ecclesiasticus, that the whole of the Old Testament was at that time in Greek; the writer speaking of 'the law, the prophets, and the rest of the books.' This prologue was composed about 130 B.C. Hävernick and Zündel still further argue that, as the Septuagint text substitutes 'Romans' for 'Chittim,' in xl. 30, the translator must have been contemporary with Antiochus Epiphanes, who was peremptorily forbidden by the Roman envoy to prosecute his hostile designs against Egypt (Hävernick, Einleit., § 272, vol. ii. 2, p. 458; Zündel, ubi supr., p. 175). If this be admitted, or even if the later date, 130 B.C., only be taken, then, since it is allowed by critics generally that the original composition must have preceded the translation 50 or 60 years, the notion that the book was first written in Antiochus's time is distinctly disproved.

That there would be a considerable interval of time between the original and the translation is evident from the fact that the Septuagint text abounds in faults, mistakes, variations of every possible kind. These would not have been made, had the version come close upon the original composing of the book. So faulty is this translation, that it was for a long time laid aside, and that of Theodotion substituted in Greek bibles; and it was not till modern times that the Septuagint Daniel was discovered and published, viz., in 1772 A.D. Zündel has with singular acuteness examined and compared the Septuagint, the version of Theodotion, and the original, arranging several paragraphs in a tabular form, and from his investigations, for which the reader must be referred to his book, pp. 176-182, he comes to the conclusion that the Septuagint translator must have had a prior version before him when he did his work. If this be so—and the arguments used are very forcible—the first composition of the book is thrown yet farther back; and what then becomes of the notion of the patriotic Jew writing it in the time of Epiphanes?

There are some other particulars which must not be passed over. It can hardly be doubted—De Wette, indeed, acknowledges it (Einleit. in A. T., § 323)—that the author of the apocryphal book of Baruch was acquainted with Daniel: comp. Bar. i. 11 with Dan. v. 11; Bar. i. 15-17 with Dan. ix. 7-10; Bar. ii. 7 with Dan. ix. 13; Bar. ii. 10, 11 with Dan. ix. 5, 15; Bar. ii. 15 with Dan. ix. 19; Bar. ii. 19 with Dan. ix. 18. The question is, when was Baruch composed? In a former article (see BARUCH, BOOK OF), it was said that the earlier chapters of that apocryphal work were probably written in Hebrew towards the end of the Persian rule, and that these were translated, and the whole made complete as we have it about 160 B.C. If this be so, Daniel must have been written before the time of Antiochus. And so Zündel, who believes that the whole of Baruch was composed in Hebrew, and that it must have existed in the fourth century B.C., concludes that we have here a weighty proof that Daniel was in existence and circulation at least as early as that fourth century (pp. 188-193).

Take, again, the apocryphal additions to Daniel. We cannot, indeed, with certainty fix upon the dates of these pieces; but they were composed by different authors, possibly in different languages. Zündel would ascribe them to different localities. He imagines the story of Bel and the Dragon to be of Babylonian origin, the account of Habbacuc appended to it Palestinian, while Susanna is clearly Syrian. Time was required to get them together, more to attach them to the canonical book; and, as spurious additions are not made to works just upon their appearance, we may reasonably infer a considerable interval between the canonical Daniel and these excrescences. But, if Daniel was not written till the time of Antiochus, 163 B.C., how could such additions have established themselves in the Greek bibles, in the Septuagint version, by 130 B.C. (ibid. pp. 182-187)?

It is impossible to dwell here on all the various points which might be argued: the reader will find much more in Zündel's work, which has been so frequently referred to. But a word must be said upon the question, How did the book of Daniel get into the Jewish canon, if it is to be dated in the Maccabean times?

Of course, as much as possible is made of the fact that Daniel appears in that division of the sacred volume called khethubin or hagiographa, the latest portion, we are told, of the canon; just as, if after the gathering of the law, and of the prophets, seeing that there were at a posterior time several other books, floating as it were unconnectedly about, they were at length collected into a late supplement or appendix. But such a notion has no sufficient foundation. In fact, the reasoning we find is in a circle: the collecting of the hagiographa was late, because Daniel is there; and Daniel is late, because it is placed in the hagiographa! The books of the law naturally formed a single class. Those called in the Hebrew nomenclature 'the prophets' had a mutual interdependence. True, some are historical, and some are prophetic; but there was a bond of connection. There was prophetic teaching, if not by words, yet by actions. The hagiographa had a different character; and it was at least as much in reference to their contents, as to any consideration of date, that these books were arranged. For the Davidical psalms are there, not left for a long time out of the canon, but regarded from the first as a part of the sacred word, and placed as a nucleus round which other writings deemed fitting to be associated therewith might gather. This part of the subject is argued at length by Zündel (pp. 214-226), who, reaching by independent investigation the conclusion that the canon was closed about the end of the fourth century before Christ (pp. 226-239), finds in this a strong proof of the antiquity of Daniel. In any case, it would be hard indeed to explain how a production of the date of Antiochus Epiphanes could get into the sacred canon.

But we may look a little more particularly at the cause why the book of Daniel occupies the place in which we find it. Good reasons for the arrangement there certainly are, though they might not perhaps even appear so forcible in later times; and hence a collateral proof is furnished of the early settling of the canon. Thus, there is a vast difference between the contents of Daniel and those of other prophetic books. There are no fervid addresses in it to the Jewish people, as in the others: how then could it be classed with them? There is not the theocratic tone; nor even is the Jewish nation touched save as having a place in the world-system, to which, and not to the destiny of his own people, the prophet's eye was mainly directed. How well, then, was the wisdom of the sages who gathered the sacred books guided to place this in that division, the contents of which were rather for private edification than (except at certain festivals, the five megilloth) to be read in public assemblies. 'The distribution of the sacred books was (as Zündel well says) according to their public use. The law was the basis handed down from the fathers of all public teaching. The prophets, in the constant public use of them, discharged towards the people the peculiar office which belonged to such divine messengers. The hagiographa or khethubim were for the private use of pious Israelites. And, besides these, there were apocryphal writings, set aside and withdrawn from authoritative use altogether' (see p. 224). A similar distribution is made in the New Testament; and no man carps at it: why is not the Revelation discredited because it stands last?

Such are but a few of the reasons which can be produced for disbelieving that the book of Daniel is a late production of the Maccabean age. And, it may be added, if it is not of the Maccabean age, it is what it professes to be, of the exile and time immediately succeeding. For there is no pretence for placing it in the interval; and no one has ascribed it to that interval. Well and deeply, in regard to this part of the subject, should the words of Dr. Mill be pondered. The objection, he observes, is an old one, as old as the time of Porphyry, who concluded, from the particularity of detail, that the prophecy was merely history, written after the events. 'To those who conclude that Gen. xlix. must have been written after the establishment of David's dynasty, and all of Isaiah, from the fortieth chapter to the end, after the restoration of the Jews from Babylon—simply because the royalty of Judah is mentioned in the one, and the edict of Cyrus in the other—this argument must needs be irresistible. Unfortunately, however, it assumes as granted the whole matter on which such critics are opposed to ourselves, viz., that no higher intellect than that of man has been concerned in what those writers of Israel propounded to the world. And it is quite sufficient to reply that, in all to which the art of criticism properly relates, the criteria of human authorship and transmission of meaning which are common to these writings with all others, there is nothing to justify their allegation, but everything against it' (Observ. on Appl. of Pantheist. Princ., part ii. chap. i. sect. iv. pp. 133, 134).

It was observed above, that the supernatural character of the narrative portion of Daniel was used also as a main argument against its authority. To those enlightened men who have discovered the impossibility of a miracle, the alleged occurrence of one is a fatal objection to a book. On this question nothing need be said here: see MIRACLE. But, as a sufficient reason for vindicating the ways of God, the observation of Zündel is very weighty, that, where the welfare of God's Israel is brought face to face with the world's power, there the wonder-working hand of the Lord is stretched forth. We may see it in the contest with Pharaoh, we may see it when the holy ark was placed in an idol's temple by the Philistines: it was reasonable to expect it in the crisis at Babylon (ubi supr., pp. 51, 52).

Little can here be said of the notice we find of Daniel by the prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. xiv. 14, 20). He is coupled with two eminent patriarchs, Noah and Job. Now, if Daniel had been endowed with eminent wisdom, if he had been able to interpret the dream of the Babylonian king, if he was consequently raised to high place in the empire, we cannot wonder that one so distinguished, a faithful minister in a heathen court, should be ranked among the Lord's most favoured servants. If, on the other hand, the history we have be false, if no such prophet had attracted Nebuchadnezzar's favour, or received such marvellous communications of the divine Spirit, if Daniel were but a mythic personage, how is the mention of the name by Ezekiel to be explained?

There is a yet more august reference to him. Events in God's providence repeat themselves; and those which fulfil a divine prediction are in turn pre-significative of a yet more complete accomplishment. Now the pollution of the sanctuary by Antiochus had been predicted (Dan. xi. 31). But the prophecy was not exhausted by the Syrian king's profanation. There would be a more fearful desecration in a far more calamitous time. And of this our Lord speaks. He tells his disciples it would come, and warns them of it as the signal of their flight from the doomed city. And he expressly ascribes the prediction to Daniel (Matt. xxiv. 15). Now observe. He does not speak here as he does of Moses, just quoting a book which bore Moses' name. He does not speak as he does of Jonah, referring to a circumstance which, if it were but legendary, might yet be used for illustration. Here Christ cites a prophecy yet to be accomplished, attributes it to a certain individual, and declares its approaching accomplishment—and that in the same breath in which he denounces and cautions the apostles against false prophets, pretenders to divine gifts (11, 24). Will any man dare to say that the prophecy he so refers to was merely the word of an impostor, of a man who had concocted a legendary book, and whose pretended prediction was but the clothing of past events in the phraseology of the future? To all reasonable arguments let due weight be given: all reverent treatment of a mysterious matter may have its honour; but the criticism which attributes such ignorance, such perversion of fact, to the Only-begotten is too daring: let no man who venerates the Saviour give it the least countenance.

It has been repeatedly said that brevity is necessary in the present notice. The futility, therefore, of the objections taken from the presumed use of Greek names (slightly touched above), and from the style and phraseology of the book cannot be here dwelt on: the reader may be referred on such points to the satisfactory disquisitions of Hengstenberg.

Neither can the positive evidence of Dan. ix. be exhibited. It can only be said that, if, as many of the best expositors seem to have proved, the prediction of the 70 weeks reaches to the very times of Messiah (see MESSIAH), that is sufficient proof of the authority of this book. Yet it must in all fairness be said, that critics of name, who admit the genuineness of Daniel, do otherwise interpret this prophecy. Nor can the fact be more than hinted, that the book of Revelation—to say nothing of some other prophetic parts of the apostolic writings—is grounded upon Daniel. Could an inspired book take its colour from a clumsy forgery?

Shortly as the question has been here treated, enough, it is hoped, has been urged to vindicate the authority of this book. Let no reader suffer himself to be influenced by that weakest of all arguments, that all the most enlightened critics now give up the genuineness of Daniel. Were this indeed the case—and it is not so—it should not weigh with the honest enquirer after truth (John vii. 48).

The book, as already intimated, is divided into two parts:—1. The historical portion, including the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream, i. vi.—2. The prophetic part, vii.—xii.

Several works have been referred to as useful for the elucidation of this book. It would be easy to draw out a long list of critics and commentators upon it. It must suffice to mention that work of Zündel so often cited; Hengstenberg's Die Authentie d. Dan., 1831; Hävernick's Comm. über d. B. Dan., 1832; Auberlen's Der Proph. Dan. und d. Offenb. Joh. 2nd edit. 1857, with, of English books, Birks' Four Prophetic Empires, 1844, and Two Later Visions of Daniel, 1846. The commentary of Barnes is plain and worth consulting. More learned works are purposely here omitted.

DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS

TO. These are the Song of the three Children, the story of Susanna, and that of Bel and the Dragon, pieces which are found in the ancient Greek translations of Daniel, the first introduced between vv. 23, 24 of chap. iii.; the others, one at the beginning of the book and one at the end, in some editions, while other editions place them at the end as chaps. xiii., xiv. Jerome separated them and expressly noted that he had not found them in the original Hebrew, but had translated them from the Greek version of Theodotion. They appear, however, in the Vulgate without this cautionary notice, and have been received as canonical by the council of Trent. They were not so received by the Jews, nor by the Christian fathers who adhere to the Hebrew canon. And, though occasional references to them are found in early writers, they are generally (the last two) treated as fables; and it may be added, as an additional proof of the small veneration paid them, that they appear to have been amplified after their first composition. Of their origin nothing can be said with certainty. The Song of the three Children, consisting of a prayer and a canticle of praise, is believed by De Wette (Einteil., § 258) to have been written in Chaldee. But the reasons he adduces establish hardly more than a faint presumption. He thinks also, by a comparison of vv. 15, 31, 32, 62, 63, that the whole did not proceed from a single hand. The stories of Susanna and of Bel and the Dragon were indisputably written in Greek. There is a play on words in the first of them, which holds only in that language. But the legend of Habbauc appended to the last (33-42) was perhaps originally Hebrew. Possibly there may have been some such person as Susanna; but this can be merely conjectured. The other piece is clearly fictitious. It describes a kind of idolatrous worship which did not exist in Babylon.

DANITES. The descendants of Dan (Judges xiii. 2, xviii. 1, 11; 1 Chron. xii. 35).

DANNAH (low land?). A city among the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 49).

DAPHNE. A grove and sanctuary of Apollo, with the right of asylum, near to Antioch. It was in a situation of great natural beauty, and was founded by Seleucus Nicator (2 Macc. iv. 33).

DA'RA (1 Chron. ii. 6), probably contracted or corrupted from DAR'DA (pearl of wisdom). One of the persons whom Solomon is said to have surpassed in wisdom (1 Kings iv. 31). It is impossible to say when Darda lived; for, even if we suppose him to be identical with Dara, called the son of Zerah, the word 'son' is often used in so extended a sense, that we can by no means fix him to the generation immediately after Zerah.

DARIC. This word does not appear in our translation; but it is the proper name of a piece of money rendered 'dram' (1 Chron. xxix. 7; Ezra ii. 69, viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70, 71, 72). The daric was a Persian gold coin, common among the Jews while under Persian rule. It usually bore the image of an archer with a tiara, and on the reverse an irregular square. The weight was about 128 grains troy. Specimens exist in collections, but probably none earlier than the reign of Xerxes. The name daric is supposed to be taken from Darius; but there are other derivations proposed of the Hebrew word for this coin. Some Persian silver pieces are said also to have been called darics. See MONEY.

Silver Daric.

Gold Daric.

DARI'US (coercer, conservator?).—1. The son of Hystaspes, a king of Persia, who obtained the crown after that the false Smerdis, who succeeded Cambyses, had been put to death. His reign was long, 521-486 B.C., and was for the most part occupied with internal troubles and foreign wars. It was against the forces of Darius that the Greeks gained the battle of Marathon, 490 B.C. The policy of this monarch was favourable to the Jews. He confirmed the edict of Cyrus, and permitted the re-building of the temple at Jerusalem. The works which had been stopped under Cambyses and the false Smerdis were accordingly resumed in the second year of Darius, and the house of God was completed and dedicated in his sixth year (Ezra iv. 5, 24, v. vi.; Hagg. i. 1, 15, ii. 10; Zech. i. 1, 7, vii. 1).—2. A Persian king (Neh. xii. 22), who is generally identified with Darius II. Nothus, son of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and reigned 423-404 B.C. Some difficulty, however, has been felt, because in the same passage the line of the high priests is carried down to Jaddua, who was contemporary with Alexander the Great: the Darius in question might therefore be Codomannus the last king of Persia, 335-330 B.C. But this would bring down the date of the book of Nehemiah to a late point; and Keil argues very strongly against such a supposition, Einleit., § 152, pp. 526, 527.—3. A sovereign called 'the Median,' the son of Ahasuerus of the seed of the Medes, who took the kingdom after the death of Belshazzar (Dan. v. 31, vi., ix. 1, xi. 1). Various conjectures have been hazarded in regard to this prince. Perhaps, however, we may conclude that he was either the Astyages of profane history, grandfather to Cyrus, or Cyaxares, Cyrus's uncle. The last supposition is the most reasonable; and it agrees with the account of Josephus, who identifies this Darius with Cyaxares II., the son of Astyages, and says that he was known among the Greeks by another name (Antiq., lib. x. 11, § 4). It is true that Herodotus represents Astyages as dying without male issue, and that Xenophon alone mentions Cyaxares. Zündel, however, believing Darius to be Cyaxares II., imagines him the brother and not the son of Astyages; both these princes being sons of Cyaxares I. (Krit. Untersuch. über die Abfass. des B. Danie., pp. 34-38).

DARI'US (1 Macc. xii. 7). This would seem to be put for Areus: comp. 20.

DARKNESS. Twice in scripture history darkness is said to have occurred of an extraordinary and (it must be admitted) a supernatural character. A plague of darkness was inflicted upon the Egyptians, the more remarkable because Israel in Goshen had light in their dwellings. In this darkness the atmosphere was thickened so that it might, as it were, be felt: so intense was it, that no person could move; artificial means of light, it would seem, being useless: it lasted, too, three days (Exod. x. 21-23; Psal. cv. 28). Some, pressing, perhaps too literally, the Psalmist's expression (lxxviii. 49), have imagined that lurid spectres glided through the gloom. No doubt this, like the other plagues, stood in connection with the natural phenomena of Egypt; still no sufficient reason can be assigned for it from merely physical causes. There is said to be a peculiar wind in Egypt, and, while it blows, the sun is obscured, the atmosphere filled with dust, and intense darkness sometimes produced. But, in the case before us, there were circumstances, the sudden occurrence, the prolonged duration, the limited area, which cannot be explained, save on the assumption that, while natural causes are often made to carry out the divine will, there was a greater cause in operation, that in short (as the magicians had been previously compelled to acknowledge) the finger of God was there. There was also a strange darkness while our Lord was on the cross (Matt. xxvii. 45; Mark xv. 33; Luke xxiii. 44, 45). Opinions differ on the point, whether this was confined to Judea, or had a wider influence. But it is of comparatively little moment. Some are inclined to attribute this darkness to an eclipse of the sun. And it is said there was an eclipse at noon, in or near the year of the crucifixion, attended by an earthquake in Bithynia, which Phlegon of Tralles mentions. To be sure the passover was to be held just after the full moon; but it has been argued that the Jewish calendar had got into confusion, so that the statutable times of their feasts were not observed. It is not, however, easy to believe that there would be a great departure from the regular times of festivals made dependent upon the phases of the moon which every one could observe. And various scholars have satisfied themselves that Phlegon's eclipse could not occur in any year. Likely to be that of the crucifixion. Besides, the duration of three hours, assigned by the evangelists, far passes the limit of an eclipse. Here, therefore, again we must acknowledge that a supernatural fact is recorded.

Darkness is often figuratively used in scripture for privacy or concealment: as when God is said to dwell in thick darkness (Exod. xx. 21; 1 Kings viii. 12), because mortal eye cannot penetrate to him; for misery (Isai. v. 30, lix. 9, 10); for ignorance or sin (Rom. xiii. 12; Eph. v. 11); for final punishment (Matt. viii. 12).

DAR'KON (scatterer). A person whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58).

DAR'MESEK (1 Chron. xviii. 5; 2 Chron. xvi. 2, xxiv. 23, xxviii. 5, 23, marg. in all the places). See DAMASCUS.

DATE. The fruit of the palm (2 Chron. xxxi. 5, marg.). See PALM.

DATHAN (belonging to a fountain). A chief of Reuben, who joined in Korah's treason (Numb. xvi., xxvi. 9; Deut. xi. 6; Psal. cvi. 17).

DATH'EMA (1 Macc. v. 9).

DAUGHTER. The word is used, in a similar way with 'son,' in a much wider sense than the literal acception would allow; as for grand-daughter or more remote descendant (Gen. xxiv. 48; Luke i. 5), for any dependent relationship, e.g. the daughters of a tree, that is, the branches (Gen. xlix. 22, marg.), the daughter of a strange god, that is, an idolatrous woman (Mal. ii. 11). It is also used of cities by personification (Isai. x. 32, xxxvii. 22, and elsewhere), and especially of villages or small places dependent upon the chief town of a district (Numb. xxi. 25, marg.; 1 Chron. vii. 28, marg.; Ezek. xvi. 46, 48, and elsewhere). Hence it easily comes to signify the women of any particular family, or city, or race (e.g. Gen. vi. 2; Judges xl. 40, xxi. 21), and is sometimes put for women in general (Prov. xxxi. 29; Isai. xxxii. 9).

DA'VID (beloved). The distinguished king of Israel. He was the eighth youngest son of Jesse, the Beth-lehemite, of the tribe of Judah. Six of his brothers are named in scripture (1 Chron. ii. 13-15): of the other, we know only the fact of his existence (1 Sam. xvii. 12); and it is needless to mention the conjectures which have been formed of him. David had also two sisters (1 Chron. ii. 16, 17). His mother's name is not recorded, unless, as some have believed, she was the Nahash of 2 Sam. xvii. 25. See NAHASH.

The first notice that we have of David is when the Lord, provoked by the ungodly conduct of Saul, had determined to choose out another king who would more faithfully rule his people. Accordingly, Samuel was directed to proceed to Beth-lehem: there among the sons of Jesse he should find the future sovereign. The prophet obeyed with some reluctance; and, when he saw Eliab, Jesse's eldest-born, struck with his bold bearing and goodly stature, he conceived that this was to be the Lord's anointed. Nay, God seeth not as man seeth; and the rest of the family must pass before him. None of those present was selected; and it was not till the youngest, the lad that tended the sheep, was sent for, that the divine intimation was given: 'Arise, anoint him; for this is he.' David's personal appearance is minutely described. He was a bright and beautiful boy, of a fair complexion, with reddish or auburn hair, and sparkling eyes (1 Sam. xvi. 12, xvii. 42). Some have supposed him short of stature: possibly he was not tall; but had he been at all dwarfish he could hardly have possessed the strength which he manifestly had. For to be a shepherd was no peaceful charge. Marauders might have to be resisted; or, at least, wild beasts were prowling round; and two of these one night this shepherd lad had conquered and slain. Samuel anointed him 'in the midst of his brethren' (xvi. 13); and the Spirit of God was from that day specially upon him; though whether he and his family fully understood the whole signification of the prophet's deed may be doubted. David returned to the care of his flocks. Such education as the times afforded he had doubtless had; and God's word was his study. He had poetic genius, too; and music was his delight. We may imagine him—as he traversed the neighbourhood of Beth-lehem, and looked upon the rich pastures dotted with flocks and herds, or when he watched his sheep by night, and beheld the starry host—arranging the thoughts which gushed up in his mind in such strains as Psalms viii., xix., xxiii.; while, more free from care than when afterwards he wore a crown, he sang to his harp the praises of Jehovah.

The name of the gallant youth was ere long known beyond his immediate circle. And, when the sovereign, afflicted now with that black spirit of melancholy which his sins had justly brought upon him, might, it was thought, be soothed by a minstrel's music, some one of his body-guard mentioned Jesse's son, famed for his musical skill, and, as his prowess in defending his flock recurred to memory, a mighty valiant man; sure that such an eulogium would be most likely to recommend him to the warlike monarch. Accordingly, David took his harp to the palace; and his music calmed Saul's distemper; and Saul was gratified and became attached to his skillful attendant. He was not indeed altogether removed from home. He went backwards and forwards, as the king's dark hour was upon him, and his services were needed. In 1 Sam. xvi. 21 it is said that Saul made David his armour-bearer. And this has puzzled commentators exceedingly. For it then would have been strange if neither Saul nor any one about his person had recognized David when he came, as we find in the next chapter, to accept Goliath's challenge. And so all sorts of devices have been contrived to get the history into chronological order; some imagining that the fight with the Philistine was before David's being attached to Saul as the minstrel. The same difficulty would be found with any history whatever. You cannot, if you want to keep it intelligible, detail all the facts exactly as they occurred. You must sometimes sum up, and relate the steps thereto afterwards. So it is here. The sacred historian tells of the impression David made on Saul, and says that he advanced him. And then he returns to describe how it was not merely a minstrel's reward that was bestowed, on his becoming armour-bearer, but how he earned it on the field of battle, the forgotten minstrel proving himself unexpectedly able to take rank with the mighty warriors of the kingdom. The Philistines had gathered their hosts; and Goliath came forth to defy the armies of Israel. Obligated to head his forces in the field, Saul had lost his moodiness. It is then that David, sent by his father to see his three brothers who were with the army, hears of Goliath's challenge, and with characteristic spirit expresses his wonder that no Israelite, valiant for his God, would meet the heathen giant. His words are bold and burning; and they are carried through the camp, till some one reports them to Saul. The king sends for him, but fails to recognize him. It is no wonder: he had scarcely seen him, save when the evil spirit was on him; and months, perhaps, had passed since David's harp was touched before him. David offers to engage Goliath; but Saul doubts whether the young man was equal to such a perilous encounter; and David of course makes no allusion to his having previously stood before the king. Had it come out then that he was but the minstrel, the discovery would have been enough to prevent his being allowed the combat: he tells, therefore, how he killed the lion and the bear; and his evident enthusiasm wrings a consent from Saul that he shall go to battle. Saul accordingly arms him—not with his own personal armour, as some have not very wisely supposed: the stalwart king would have known better than to encumber the stripling with his own coat of mail—but with weapons—plenty were no doubt in the royal tent—more suited to his size. With these, however, unaccustomed as he was to such harness (an additional proof that he had never yet been Saul's armour-bearer), David refuses to go. He will rather take his shepherd's sling, and choose him out pebbles from the brook. As he passes forth to the battle, some reminiscence seems to strike the king; and he appeals to Abner: 'Whose son is this youth?' Abner, captain of the host, usually at the head of troops, had never troubled himself about the royal minstrel, perhaps he had never seen him, or, if he had, he was not the man to help him forward now. Abner was selfish, and foresaw, if David succeeded, a rival to himself, and therefore he indifferently said that he knew not who he was. David was successful: the huge Philistine fell; and the Israelitish troops pealed out their shouts of victory. Then Abner was willing to appear as a patron, and took the conqueror to Saul. And, in answer to the king's query, David replies, 'I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Beth-lehemite (xvii. 58), adopting the style by which he was first named to the king (xvi. 18). He is now fully recognized, found both a skilful musician and a valiant soldier, and attains the position mentioned before (xvi. 21). Saul loves him, and makes him his armour-bearer, and sends a second message to Jesse (22), which, if not explained in this way, would seem unnecessary (see 19). David is now established in the king's favour: he is specially beloved by Jonathan: he is set over the men of war (xviii. 5), perhaps made captain of the body-guard, and employed in various services the rest of the campaign; by which his popularity was increased. But the king's mind began ere long to change. The rejoicings at the re-establishment of peace provoked his jealousy. For the chief praise in the songs of the women was given to David (6-9). And speedily the evil spirit resumed his sway. David did not then refuse to take up again his harp; though once or twice the maddened king strove to kill him with his javelin, and, because he could no longer bear his constant presence, removed him from the body-guard to a separate command (13).

The course of David's life, and the steps of the estrangement which led to his becoming an outlaw, must be more briefly told. After he had married Saul's younger daughter Michal, instead of the elder Merab, who had been promised him, Saul, further enraged by David's increasing credit with the nation, and understanding, it is likely, by this time, that the young Beth-lehemite was the chosen of the Lord to whom the kingdom was to be transferred, sent to arrest him in his house. By Michal's stratagem he escaped, and fled to Samuel at Naloth in Ramah. Hither, however, he was followed (xix.), and again he fled; his stay with Samuel, whom he had perhaps not seen since the anointing, being in all probability not longer than a day or two. Convinced by an interview with Jonathan that Saul's enmity was no mere transient passion (xx.), David went to Nob, where his duplicity cost the high priest his life, and thence to Achish, king of Gath, where, to escape the jealousy of the Philistines, he simulated madness (xxi.). Returning into Judah, he gathered a band of men, and maintained himself sometimes in the wilderness, sometimes hiding in caves, sometimes occupying a town, as Keilah. His father and mother he had placed with the king of Moab (xxii. 3); and he had now the presence of the prophet Gad (5). At Keilah, too, Abiathar, become high priest on his father's murder, joined him (20, xxiii. 4), and various warriors: eleven Gadite chiefs are particularly specified, and some of Judah and Benjamin (1 Chron. xii. 8-18). To this period belong the circumstances narrated in the concluding chapters of the first book of Samuel—the adventure with Nabal, and David's marriage with Abigail; his twice sparing Saul's life; perhaps the battle for the water of the well of Bethlehem (1 Chron. xi. 15-19); and, in fine, the residence with Achish, who gave him Ziklag. David's conduct at this time cannot be justified. He laid waste the country of Philistine allies, and pretended that he had destroyed only the tribes dependent upon Judah; and he joined Achish's army when marching to the battle of Gilboa. Here he was reinforced by some Manassites xii. 19, 20, but was dismissed from the expedition through the renewed jealousy of the Philistine lords. He returned, therefore, to Ziklag, to find it plundered and burnt. However, he recovered what was lost, and obtained greater spoil, which he politely sent to his friends in Judah, and, on the news of Saul's defeat and death just after, he repaired, by God's direction, to Hebron, and was anointed king (2 Sam. ii. 2).

We are now to view David in another capacity, as a monarch. He reigned as yet over only a part of the nation; for Abner established Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, on the west of the Jordan, and over Israel generally. But gradually the tribes were flocking to David (1 Chron. xiii. 23-40); and Saul's house was weakening as he was strengthened; till at length Abner himself came with a proposal to transfer to him the whole kingdom (2 Sam. iii.). But Abner was murdered by Joab, David's nephew and commander-in-chief, a man too powerful to be punished; and shortly after Ish-bosheth was assassinated by two of his officers; and then the nation was re-united; and David reigned over the kingdom of Israel; seven years and six months having elapsed since his assumption of the crown of Judah (iv., v.). He was now 'one of the great men of the earth' (vii. 9). He consolidated his power at home, took Jerusalem and made it his capital, removing thither the ark of God (vi.), organized his army (1 Chron. xi.), and regulated the services of the sanctuary (xv., xvi.), enlarged his harem (2 Sam. iii. 2-5, v. 13-16), opened a commercial intercourse with the king of Tyre (v. 11), and also extended his power abroad, subduing the Philistines, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites. His dominion, therefore, was no petty chieftainship: it was an empire, extending far as the large promise made originally to Abraham, and repeated again and again to the chosen people (Gen. xv. 18-21; Exod. xxiii. 31; Deut. xi. 24).

But, just at that time when David's power was established, the cloud was rising which overshadowed more or less the rest of his career. He had lingered at Jerusalem, while Joab was besieging Rabbah of the children of Ammon. And then occurred those shameful deeds, the adultery with Bath-sheba, and the murder of Uriah, which at first, it seems, did not touch his conscience, but which, when charged home upon him by the prophet Nathan, humbled the guilty monarch in the dust (2 Sam. xi., xii.). He repented deeply; and he obtained pardon by God's mercy. But he was not again the David of former days. The sword was never to depart from his house (xii. 10). And it never did. Heretofore, with the Lord's blessing upon him, he had run a course of almost-uninterrupted prosperity: henceforth one frightful event after another showed him, and left it to the world as a lesson, that it is an evil and a bitter thing to depart from God. There was the defilement of Tamar, and the murder of his first-born Amnon (xiii.); and then Absalom's unnatural rebellion and death (xv.—xviii.); and Sheba's insurrection (xx.); and the plague for the numbering of the people (xxiv.); and Agonijah's seizure of the government, when the most long-tried counsellors of David deserted him, a movement that could be crushed only by the aged monarch's devolving his crown upon Solomon (1 Kings i.); with various other griefs. Yet, perhaps, in the humiliations of his later years, the king gathered more instruction, and found more true peace, than in the proud days of victory, when courtiers flattered him, and suppliants crowded his presence-chamber, and subject nations crouched before him. He learned more of the evil of his heart, and found it good to be afflicted. And he died in hope. He had the promise of an assured throne to his descendants: he transmitted a magnificent heritage to Solomon, to whom he left the carrying out of that purpose he had long before conceived (2 Sam. vii.; 1 Chron. xxviii., xxix.), of erecting a habitation for the mighty God of Jacob. And no doubt his prophetic eye rested in the far distance on one of his line, who should be great, the Son of the Highest, to whom the Lord God would give David's throne, and of whose kingdom there should be no end. Of him in many respects David was a type. And many of the predictive utterances, setting out from David, have their full meaning in David's glorious Son (Jer. xxx. 9; Hos. iii. 5).

David's character is clearly shown in the events of his life—a shepherd, a soldier, a statesman, a poet, a prophet, a king, tender, generous, sometimes fierce, easily moved to passion, and easily appeased, a faithful friend, an indulgent father—there is scarce a personage of scripture history on whom our thoughts and love centre so much as on David, whose strains of inspired song intertwine with all the devotional and joyful feelings of God's people in every age. The psalms are a rich heritage to the church. Very many were from David's pen. And, though we cannot with precision point out all he wrote, or describe the times and circumstances under which those were penned that we know did come from him, yet we delight to couple particular compositions with various crises of David's life—as Psal. xlii. with his flight across the Jordan in Absalom's rebellion; Psal. xxiv. with the bringing up of the ark to Jerusalem; Psal. xviii. with David's deliverance from his enemies, &c., and to see his emotions of praise, and hope, and repentance, and gratitude, and faith, at the wonderful dealings of God with him.

Of the children of David many are mentioned in scripture; and there were probably more: twenty-one sons are eunmerated and one daughter (2 Sam. iii. 2-5, v. 13-16, xii. 15, 24; 1 Chron. iii. 1-9, xiv. 3-7; 2 Chron. xi. 18).

David left the impress of his reign upon the nation, both politically and religiously. It is true that in the days of his grandson that schism occurred which rent from his house a large portion of their inheritance. Nevertheless, his seed continued to possess Judah; and David's regulations (1 Chron. xxiii.—xxv.), however they might be disregarded by ungodly princes, were always referred to as a standard in times of reformation (2 Chron. xxix. 25-27, 30, xxxv. 4). Never was a promise more thoroughly fulfilled than that to David (Psal. lxxxix. 35); and the most blessed heritage which can even now be desired is 'the sure mercies of David' (Isal. lv. 3; Acts xiii. 34).

DAY. The natural day from sunrise to sunset is continually varying. It has therefore been found convenient to take one revolution of the earth, a day and night, as the standard of time. Different nations have begun their day at different points. We, like the ancient Romans, begin it at midnight; the Hebrews, probably from the narrative of creation (Gen. i. 5; see Dan. viii. 14, marg.), began theirs at sunset (Lev. xxiii. 32). Their divisions of the day appear to have been in early times very inartificial. Thus we read of a distribution into three parts, evening, morning, and noon (Psal. lv. 17). Other more minute divisions are also spoken of, such as dawn, sunrise, heat of the day, noon, cool of the day, evening; but these were rather occasional notings of time, than recognized parts of the ordinary day. At length, however, hours were introduced. The first mention of an hour is by the prophet Daniel (Dan. iii. 6, 15, iv. 19, v. 5): probably, then, the reckoning of the twelve hours of the day was borrowed from the Chaldeans. In New Testament times it was a well-understood distribution of time (John xi. 9). These twelve hours, extending from sunrise to sunset, were of course of variable length. The variation is not, however, so much as it would be in our latitude; and, the sixth hour being noon, the third may be roughly said to be our 9 in the morning, the ninth 3 in the afternoon. The nights were divided into watches, at first three, afterwards four.

The word 'day' is used in various senses, sometimes for a festival or birth-day (Job iii. 1), sometimes for the great day of God's judgment (Acts xvii. 31; 2 Tim. i. 18). The meaning is sometimes indefinite, as it is with us (Gen. ii. 4); and according to some the 'days' of creation (i. 5, 8, 13, 19, 23, 31) indicate not natural days, but long periods of time. Day is also used symbolically (Numb. xiv. 34); and sharp contests there are among interpreters of prophecy whether the days of Dan. xii. 11, 12; Rev. xi. 3, 9 do not mean years. For the arguments used their works must be consulted. See EVENING, WATCH.

DAYSMAN. An umpire or arbitrator

(Job ix. 33). The word occurs in this sense in old English writers, e. g. Spenser's Faerie Queene, book ii. canto viii. 28.

DEACON. The designation of an office-bearer in the Christian church. It has generally been connected with the appointment of the seven who were to relieve the apostles in the 'daily ministration,' the distribution of the public money, or the apportionment of the public meals (Acts vi. 1-6). The special name of deacon is not, however, given to these seven; and it may be questioned whether this appointment was not rather to meet a particular case; the order called deacons being subsequently established, and founded upon or in imitation of the temporary office committed to the seven (See Alford, The Greek Test., note on Acts vi. 5). It has indeed been imagined that there was already a class called 'the young men,' as contradistinguished from 'the elders,' and that this body of young men was the prototype of the diaconate. Such 'young men' are certainly mentioned (Acts v. 6, 10); but the fact that different Greek words are used in the two verses just referred to seems fatal to the supposition. Surely one definite name, had such a class or order been constituted, would have been applied to them.

The Greek word for deacon often occurs in a general sense to indicate any person ministering in God's service. Thus it designates our Lord himself (Rom. xv. 8); and St. Paul describes by it his own position (2 Cor. vi. 4; Eph. iii. 7; Col. i. 23); in all which places it is translated 'minister.' But after a while it began to be used of a particular order in the church (Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 8-10, 12, 13). In the last-named place the qualifications of deacons are described; from which in some measure their duties may be deduced. They were to hold a certain authority, and to show themselves patterns to believers. They were to be pure in faith; but it is not required, as it is of the bishop or overseer, that they should be 'apt to teach.' The inference undoubtedly is that, even if there were exceptions, teaching was not an ordinary part of the deacon's employment. Still, from the example of at least some of the seven, it must be admitted that there was no essential reason why teaching might not be conjoined with the more secular 'daily ministration.' And, though St. Paul does not affirm that it was, his words constitute no proof that it was not. It has been questioned whether the diaconate was originally a step to a higher ecclesiastical office; and different interpretations have been given of 1 Tim. iii. 13. These interpretations may be seen in Dr. Alford's note upon the passage; and, though critics of name advocate other views, it must be confessed that more properly the honour spoken of should be interpreted as that attained in the diaconship, and not in promotion to another office. Generally speaking, too, permanence in the diaconate seems to have been the rule in primitive times.

It is obvious that, as the church was more thoroughly organized, the duties of deacons would be more precisely marked out.

The services are noted below which, according to Bingham, devolved upon them. And that their ministrations very early were ecclesiastical as well as secular we have sufficient authority. Thus they are said to be 'ministers of the mysteries of Jesus Christ,' 'not merely of meats and drinks, but of the church of God' (Ignatius, Epist. ad Trall. 2). After insisting that deacons were always reckoned one of the three sacred orders, Bingham shows that they were:—1. To take care of the utensils of the altar.—2. To receive the oblations of the people, and present them to the priest, reciting the names of those that offered.—3. To read the gospel in some churches.—4. To minister the consecrated elements in the eucharist, though they were not allowed to consecrate.—5. Occasionally to baptize.—6. To bid prayer in the congregation.—7. To preach by the bishop's authority.—8. To reconcile penitents in extreme cases, and sometimes to suspend the inferior clergy.—9. To attend upon their bishops, and sometimes to represent them in general councils.—10. To rebuke and correct those who behaved irregularly in the church.—11. Anciently, to perform the offices of all the inferior orders of the church.—12. To be the bishop's sub-almoners.—13. To inform the bishop of the misdemeanours of the people: hence they were called the bishop's eyes, his mouth, angels, prophets, &c., &c. (Orig. Eccles., book ii. chap. 20). As the duties to be performed were so multifarious, it was customary to have many deacons in a single church. Some churches, however, in imitation of the apostolic appointment of the seven, were careful to limit the number of their deacons to seven. Thus, in the middle of the third century, while there were forty-six presbyters in the church of Rome, there were but seven deacons (Euseb., Hist. Eccles., lib. vi. cap. 43). There was also an archdeacon in early times; though the first establishment of the office is in dispute. He was of the same order with the deacons, was selected from them, and had special authority over them and the other inferior clergy (Bingham, ubi supr., chap. 22).

DEACONESS. Mention is made (Rom. xvi. 1) of a 'servant' (deaconess) of the church of Cenchrea; and notices are scattered through several of St. Paul's epistles of women who were engaged in Christian ministrations (3, 12; Phil. iv. 2, 3; 1 Tim. iii. 11, v. 9, 10; Tit. ii. 3, 4). It is very likely that no distinct order of women bound by certain rules was at this time established. But surely we may see here the beginnings of such a class. And it is certain that, a few years later, deaconesses were a recognized body. Pliny, in his famous letter to Trajan (lib. x. ep. 97), speaks of two whom he put to the torture, in order to extract information from them respecting the Christians; and ecclesiastical writers from a very early date frequently refer to them. A full account of deaconesses is given by Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book ii. chap. 22.

DEAD SEA. See SEA.

DEAF. There was a merciful prohibition in the Mosaic law against cursing the deaf (Lev. xix. 14). Our Lord's power was manifest in restoring hearing to the deaf (Matt. xi. 5; Mark vii. 37); and this he appealed to as one proof of his Messiahship.

DEARTH. See FAMINE.

DEATH. By death, in the ordinary use of the term, is understood the separation of the soul and the body. Death was threatened to man as the penalty of disobedience to God's command (Gen. ii. 17). And, accordingly, when Adam sinned, the sentence of death was passed upon him (Rom. v. 12, vi. 23). It will be observed that such declarations of scripture apply simply to man, and must not be taken to deny that there might have been inferior animals before the fall subject to death.

There are various modes of expression used relating to death, such as returning to the dust (Gen. ii. 7, iii. 19; Eccles. xii. 7; comp. Psal. xxii. 15); this implies the dissolution of the bodily frame; the being deprived of the spirit or breath of life (Civ. 29); and the removing or taking down of a tabernacle in which the person, the soul, was dwelling (Isai. xxxviii. 12; 2 Cor. v. 1; 2 Pet. i. 13, 14). Akin to this idea is the being 'unclothed,' as if the body were the garment of the soul (2 Cor. v. 4). Death is also represented as a departure (Job x. 21; Matt. xxvi. 24; Phil. i. 23), and a sleep (Jer. li. 39; Dan. xii. 2; John xi. 11, 13; Acts vii. 60). But the word is not confined in scripture to the separation of soul and body; nor indeed was that the only penalty threatened against and inflicted for sin: there is spiritual death, when the body yet living, the soul is dead, insensible to the voice of divine love, destitute of the power of divine grace. Hence the ungodly are said to be 'dead in trespasses and sins,' (Eph. ii. 1, 5; 1 Tim. v. 6).

The term is also employed to denote the mortification of sinful affections and lusts in the believer: he is to die to sin (Col. iii. 3, 5). And then there is that second or eternal death, the sad destruction of the entire man, cut off for ever from God's life-giving presence. 'The lake of fire' is described to be 'the second death' (Rev. xx. 14). Thus it may not improperly be said that there are four kinds of death—death natural, and death spiritual, death temporal, and death eternal.

DE'BIR (inner sanctuary). The king of Eglon, one of the five who combined against Israel after the Gibeonites had obtained terms of peace (Josh. x. 3).

DE'BIR (id.).—1. A town formerly called Kirjath-sepher (Josh. xv. 15; Judges i. 11), and Kirjath-sannah (Josh. xv. 49). It was taken by Joshua (x. 38, 39, xii. 13); and the subsequent account of its capture (xv. 15-17; Judges i. 11-13) either is the detail of what was briefly recorded before—it being in all histories common to ascribe to the general-in-chief the exploits performed by commanders under him—or there was a second capture—it being very probable that, as is the case in every war, the Canaanites recovered towns which they had lost; so that they were again and again attacked. Debir was one of the places which the Anakim held (Josh. xi. 21); and these powerful people certainly would give up no post without continual struggle Debir stood in the hill-country and was assigned to Judah (xv. 49), but was afterwards allotted to the priests (xxi. 15; 1 Chron. vi. 58). It was probably to the south-west of Hebron; but the site has not yet been fully identified.—2. A frontier place of Gad (Josh. xiii. 26) to the east of the Jordan. It was not far from Mahanaim, and possibly might be the same with Lo-debar (2 Sam. xvii. 27).—3. A place on the north boundary of Judah, near the valley of Achor (Josh. xv. 7): its exact position has not been ascertained.

DEB'ORA (Tob. i. 8.) A person said to be Tobit's grandmother.

DEB'ORAH (bee).—1. The nurse of Rebekah, whom she accompanied into Canaan (Gen. xxiv. 59). She appears afterwards to have been with Jacob's family, by whom on her death she was buried at Beth-el under an oak, called the 'oak of weeping,' (xxv. 9). Rebekah was doubtless dead when Jacob returned from Padan-aram, as we then hear nothing of her (comp. 27); and it is natural to suppose, Rebekah being dead, that the nurse would join Jacob's household. The Jews, indeed, have a tradition that it was at this spot, Beth-el, that Jacob learned the news of his mother's death; so that the name given to the oak referred to her as well as to Deborah. 2. A prophetess, the wife of Lapidoth, who judged Israel. She dwelt under, i. e. had a tent pitched beneath, a noted tree; a palm-tree it is called, and may have been at Baal-tamar (Judges xx. 33), or, it has been suggested, it might be the identical tree under which the first Deborah was buried, which certainly could not be far distant from the place indicated. Deborah incited Barak to deliver his people from the oppression of Jabin, at his desire accompanied him, though with a rebuke, and after the victory uttered a triumphal song of praise (iv. v.). See BARAK.

DEBT, DEBTOR. See LOAN, PLEDGE.

DECAP'OLIS. A region so called from its embracing ten cities in the north-eastern part of Palestine, near the lake of Genesareth. These cities, without any special connection, seem to have been endowed with certain privileges by the Romans, under whose immediate authority they were; their population being for the most part heathen. Geographers differ as to the names of the cities. Possibly the same privileges were extended to others besides the original ten. The following is Pliny's list: Damascus, Philadelphia, Raphana, Scythopolis, Gadara, Hippos, Dion, Pella, Gerasa, and Canatha; all of these, except Scythopolis, being east of the Jordan. But the district of Decapolis must have comprised a tract of country on both sides the river (Matt. iv. 25; Mark v. 20, vii. 31).

DECISION, VALLEY OF (Joel iii. 14). The place where the great crisis should occur when God's judgments would be inflicted on the assembled enemies of his people; no doubt identical with the valley of Jehoshaphat previously mentioned (2, 12).

DE'DAN (low ground?). 1. The name of a person or tribe, descendants of Ham (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9).—2. A son of Jokshan, Abraham's son by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 3, 1 Chron. i. 32).

It has often been supposed that from these two sources two different tribes descended; but it is more reasonable to believe that they were but a single people, and that the posterity of the Abrahamic intermarried with that of the Hamitic Dedan. The remarks of Dr. Kalisch on this matter are valuable. 'Dedan,' he says, 'is sufficiently defined by the biblical allusions, both with regard to its geographical situation and its social condition. It was a commercial nation of Arabia, which traversed the deserts with their goods (Isai. xxii. 13): their exports consisted especially of ivory and ebony, which they carried to the markets of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 15); and their trade resembled in extensiveness and importance that of Sabæa and Tartessus (xxviii. 13). They are sometimes described as the immediate neighbours of the Idumeans (Jer. xlix. 8), whose territory is stated to have extended between Theman and Dedan (Ezek. xxv. 13); but in other passages they are called the inhabitants of an island (Jer. xxv. 23), and are therefore coupled with Tartessus and Greece, and other islands [i. e. maritime countries] (Ezek. xxvii. 12-15, 20). It is, therefore, evident that the tribes of Dedan settled in two different regions; partly on the north-western coast of the Arabian gulf, and partly nearer the mother land, Raamah, perhaps on the island Daden in the Persian gulf, from whence they took part in the trade from India and central Asia. The intercourse between both colonies was entertained by their lively commerce, and perhaps by various intermediate stations along the northern part of the Arabian peninsula; they might, therefore, have been regarded as one country, but it is not impossible that the inhabitants of that island were later either subdued by, or, at least, greatly intermixed with, emigrants from other tribes; and hence it may be explained that Dedan is reckoned with the Cushites; whilst it is in another passage (Gen. xxv. 3), ranged among the Shemites' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 252).

DEDA'NIM. The inhabitants of Dedan (Isai. xxi. 13).

DEDICATION, FEAST OF THE. The temple of Solomon was solemnly hallowed, by the placing there of the ark, and dedicated at the feast of tabernacles (1 Kings viii. 2; 2 Chron. v. 3). The second temple was finished on the third of the month Adar, and probably was dedicated immediately; though the festival rejoicings seem to have lasted over the feast of the passover, which was held a little more than a month later (Ezra vi. 15-22). These rejoicings were celebrated but once. But there was a third dedication, which commenced on the twenty-fifth of the month Casleu or Cisleu, and extended over eight days, at the purifying of the temple from the polluting desecration of Antiochus Epiphanes. This feast was to be kept continually from year to year (1 Macc. iv. 52-59); and we find it mentioned in scripture (John x. 22). It was celebrated in a way similar to that in which the feast of tabernacles was kept, with branch-bearing and psalm-singing (2 Macc. x. 1-8). The great Hallel (Psal. cxlil.-cxviii.) was sung every day in the temple; and in later times there were illuminations. Josephus calls it 'light,' from the joy felt at the unexpected deliverance (Antiq., lib. xii. 7, § 7). Hence the solemnity was sometimes termed the Feast of Lamps or Lights. See LAMPS. DEER. See FALLOW-DEER.

DEGREES, SONGS OF. Fifteen psalms, cxx-cxxxiv., are so entitled. A variety of reasons have been supposed for this. The Jews believe that they were sung by the Levites on the fifteen steps which separated the men's court from the women's in the temple. Gesenius suggested that there was a kind of progression in the thought and phraseology; the last member of a verse or part of it being taken up, repeated, and amplified in the next verse, thus:

'I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills,
From whence cometh my help.
My help cometh from the Lord,
Which made heaven and earth.'

(Psal. cxxi. 1, 2).

But this structure cannot be detected in all of them. Hengstenberg and others believe that they were 'pilgrim-songs,' chanted by those who went up to Jerusalem at the solemn feasts. There is an ingenious disquisition on these psalms in the Journ. of Sac. Lit., Oct. 1854, pp. 39-53. The writer supposes that they are systematically arranged, being grouped round Psal. cxxvii., composed by Solomon, which furnishes a key-note with which the rest are in unison. They have their echo in the book of Nehemiah. So that, if we examine, we shall find a striking coincidence of thought, in many cases a verbal resemblance, to what we read in Nehemiah of that pious ruler's labour in re-building the walls of Jerusalem. Taking Psal. cxx. for an example; v. 1 is illustrated by Neh. ii. 17, also i. 3-11, ix. 37. In vv. 2, 3, the lying lips, &c. accurately describe Sanballat and other foes (Neh. ii. 19, vi. 2, 6, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13). In v. 7 the psalmist was for peace; Nehemiah's enemies were always picking quarrels (Neh. ii. 19, iv. 7, 8, vi. 12). The writer, further, connects these psalms with the steps which, from the natural position of Jerusalem and the temple, he supposes must have been frequent there. Pious Jews would often be likely to repeat Psal. cxxvii. as they paced the numerous stairs belonging to the temple. And it must be observed that Psal. cxxi. is extremely apposite to this idea. Thus, connecting Nehemiah with these psalms, the two-fold object of the collection is brought out—(1), 'a historical memorial of an important part of the national history of the Jews; and (2), the position which the songs occupied in the temple service rendered them instrumental in keeping up a perpetual thanksgiving to God for his goodness in regard to that national era.'

DEHA'VITES (villagers). A tribe from whom the king of Assyria had sent colonists into Samaria (Ezra iv. 9). They are probably the Dai mentioned by Herodotus (lib. i. 125), a Persian sept, near the Caspian, found also diffusing themselves in other regions.

DE'KAR (a thrusting through, a lancer). A person whose son (Ben-dekar) was one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 9).

DELAI'AH (whom Jehovah hath freed).—1. The head of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 18).—2. One whose descendants, of uncertain pedigree, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 60; Neh. vii. 62).—3. The father of a person who tried to intimidate Nehemiah (vi. 10).—4. One of the princes in the time of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxvi. 12, 25).

DELI'LAH (delicate, pining with desire). A woman, most probably a Philistine, living in the valley of Sorek, who, bribed by the Philistine lords, succeeded in enticing Samson to disclose the secret of his strength (Judges xvi. 4-20).

DELUGE. See FLOOD.

DE'LUS (1 Macc. xv. 23). A small island among those called Cyclades in the Ægean sea (Archipelago). It was peculiarly sacred to the classical god Apollo, who, with his sister Diana, was said to have been born there.

DE'MAS (probably contracted from Demetrius). A companion of St. Paul during his first imprisonment at Rome (Col. iv. 14; Philem. 24). The mournful note is subsequently made that he had forsaken the apostle, 'having loved this present world' (2 Tim. iv. 10). Whether this meant actual apostasy we know not.

DEMETRIUS (belonging to Ceres).—1. A maker of silver shrines (models of the great temple) of Diana at Ephesus (Acts xix. 24).—2. A Christian mentioned with commendation by St. John (3 John 12).

DEMETRIUS.—1. Demetrius I., surnamed Soter, 'the saviour,' king of Syria, was the son of Seleucus IV., called Philopator. At the time of his father's death, 175 B.C., he was a hostage at Rome. He found means, however, to quit Italy, and, landing at Tripolis in Phœnicia, 161 B.C., he obtained possession of the Syrian crown; Antiochus V. being put to death, and Demetrius's title being acknowledged by the Romans (1 Macc. vii. 1-4; 2 Macc. xiv. 1, 2). Incited by the Grecizing party, he sent four expeditions against the Jews (1 Macc. vii., ix.), but received a peremptory order from the Romans to molest them no more (viii. 31, 32). When Alexander Balas appeared as an aspirant for the crown of Syria, Demetrius endeavoured vainly to secure the help of Jonathan, brother of Judas Maccabeus. A decisive battle was fought between the rivals, in which Demetrius was slain, 151 B.C. (x. 1-50).—2. Demetrius II., called Nicator, 'the victorious,' was the son of No. 1. He made a descent on Syria, 147 B.C., in order to recover his father's dominions (67-69). He ultimately succeeded (xi. 19), and, though Jonathan had opposed him, he confirmed him in the high priesthood, and ratified the privileges of the Jews (20-37). By Jonathan's help he suppressed an insurrection (38-52). After a struggle with Tryphon, in which the Jews took part (53-74, xii. 24-53), and at length obtained from Demetrius immunity from tribute (xiii. 34-42), Demetrius invaded Media, and was taken prisoner by Arsaces, king of Persia (xiv. 1-3). He was liberated by Phraates, successor of Arsaces, in order to oppose Antiochus Sidetes, and recovered his kingdom. But not long after he was defeated by a pretender to the crown, Zablnas, and put to death. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Demetrius.'

DEMON, DEMONIAIC. The appellation 'demon' was given by classical writers to beings superior to man, including even the highest deities they worshipped. More exactly, or in later speech, the demons were regarded as intermediate between gods and men, those through whom the gods communicated with the human race, either the spirits of the dead or a distinct order of creatures. And, as thus placed in a certain relation to men, they were supposed to exercise a kind of tutelary care over individuals. The full idea of a naturally-evil and malignant character in these beings does not seem developed in classical writers. But, when we consider the debased notions (at least popularly) entertained by the heathen of the gods they worshipped, how they attributed to them human passions and sensual desires, the step was easy enough, especially if quickened by eastern influence, to the belief that there were evil demons, bent on moral and physical mischief, whose enmity must be counteracted or be bought off by those who would escape the effects of it. And, though there might be a lingering idea in the Jewish mind that there were good demons as well as bad, yet, generally speaking, such spirits were regarded by those who had the knowledge of the true God as foul and wicked.

The scriptures of the New Testament certainly corroborate this view. The demons are there invariably regarded as evil. For the clear explication of this, it must be observed that the original word which we translate 'devil' is used, when applied to an evil spirit, only in the singular number, as if designating one particular being; and that, when persons are said to be possessed by a 'devil,' or when 'devils' in the plural number are spoken of, the original word is that which might with more precision be rendered 'demon.' Now these are called 'unclean spirits' (Matt. x. 1), 'evil spirits' (Acts xix. 12, 13, 15, 16): fellowship with them is placed in direct opposition to fellowship with Christ (1 Cor. x. 20, 21); and they are said to tremble at that truth of God which they cannot but acknowledge (James ii. 19). They are, further, represented as subordinate to some chief, which chief is Beelzebub, or Satan, 'the devil' emphatically (Matt. xii. 24-28; Mark iii. 22-26; Luke xi. 14-20). So far then as the plain evidence of the scripture goes, we have a number of agents working with or under Satan for evil, probably 'the angels' of the devil (Matt. xxv. 41), exercising some great power, and actually taking the place in gentile worship that rightfully belonged to God (Lev. xvii. 7; 1 Cor. x. 20; Rev. ix. 20). The honour paid to mere idols, which in themselves were nothing, was really, it would seem, through the idols directed to, and appropriated by, these demons. And who shall say that it was not a reasonable and a just thing, when men, contrary to what even nature and the visible creation might have taught them, 'changed the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things,' for God in retribution to give them up to evil powers, who might work their will in them (Rom. i. 18-25)? Questionless, there are awful indications scattered through scripture of the power of the wicked one over those who have thrown off their allegiance to God (2 Cor. iv. 3, 4; Eph. ii. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 26).

Some of the most noteworthy cases of power exercised by demons over men are found in the accounts of such as are said to be 'possessed with devils.' It is true that many expositors have thought fit to depart from the literal explication of the sacred narrative: they have presumed that its meaning was but symbolical, or that our Lord accommodated himself to the notions of the Jews of his time, treating what was mere insanity as if it were a residence of a demon in the sufferer's person. But, if the gospel be really a record of facts, if the history of Christ be the relation by eyewitnesses of what was obvious to their senses, the expressions used cannot be symbolical. Symbolical expressions occur in poetry or highly-wrought narrative: they are utterly out of place in a sober record of events. Nor would our Lord have acted as he did, if possession had been merely a Jewish notion. It is just conceivable that he might have forborne to rectify an error: it is inconceivable that he would himself have plunged into it. Dr. Trench makes a very just distinction. We may speak, he says, 'of certain forms of madness as lunacy, not thereby implying that we believe the moon to have or to have had any influence upon them; . . . but, if we began to describe the cure of such as the moon's ceasing to afflict them, or if a physician were solemnly to address the moon, bidding it abstain from injuring his patients, there would be here a passing over to quite a different region . . . there would be that gulf between our thoughts and words in which the essence of a lie consists' (On Miracles, p. 153). The cases of our Lord's speaking to the wind (Matt. viii. 26) and to the fever (Luke iv. 39) are not parallel. He did not converse with the one or the other, as he is said to have done with the demons.

There is a clear distinction made between the diseased and the possessed (Matt. x. 8). The demons speak, though through the sufferer's bodily organs, yet as apart from them, and with a higher knowledge than they or any one else had at the time attained (viii. 29; Mark i. 24, v. 7; Luke iv. 41; Acts xix. 15); and they evince a strange mysterious terror of Christ's power over them and his authority to judge and punish them. We cannot help seeing what Dr. Alford calls 'a double will and double consciousness' in the possessed, 'sometimes the cruel spirit thinking and speaking in him, sometimes his poor crushed self crying out to the Saviour of men for mercy' (The Greek Test., note on Matt. viii. 32 : comp. an admirable note of Bp. Ellicott, Hist. Lect. on Life of Christ, p. 163, 2d edit.). Then there was sometimes a singular power of divination exercised by the spirit, shedding a light upon the heathen oracles, which were not, it may be, all imposture (Acts xvi. 16-18). Moreover, what are we to say to the departure of the demons from the men (one perhaps more fierce than the other, and therefore especially noticed), and their entrance into the herd of swine (Matt. viii. 28-34; Mark v. 1-20; Luke viii. 26-39)? It is quite beside the mark to explain it as if it were merely a transference of a disease. Diseases do not ask to be moved from one subject to another. So that the infliction of the leprosy of Naaman on Gehazi (2 Kings v. 27) is not at all a parallel case. And the 'fixed idea' in the lunatic's mind, by which some would interpret the answer 'My name is Legion; for we are many,' as if it were only one of the wild notions which madmen ordinarily entertain, is futile as regards the swine. We are not called on to explain why the demons wished to enter the swine: we have here only to look at the fact. And certainly the statement of the sacred writers, for which we must suppose, if words have any meaning, they pledge their credit, is that some independent power which was in the man passed thence into the swine, some being or beings first inhabited the one and then inhabited the other. It has been questioned why our Lord, whose miracles were those of mercy, permitted this act of judgment. May not a sufficient answer be found in this? He permitted it in order to give demonstrative proof of the separate existence and power of the demons; a proof which no fair reasoning can evade or overthrow.

It is not without ground, then, that Dr. Alford, in the place before referred to, declares that 'the gospel narratives are distinctly pledged to the historic truth of these occurrences (demoniacal possessions). Either they are true; or the Gospels are false. For they do not stand in the same, or been no other evidence than the fact related of Jewish practices in Acts xix. 13-17, it would have been hard to explain it by the notion of a mere disease.

But, after all, might there not have been then, may there not now be, instances even in the more ordinary diseases of the action of some evil external power? Such agency is certainly hinted at in scripture. The 'sore boils' of Job were produced by Satan (Job ii. 7). The infirmity of the woman whom Jesus healed is ascribed to Satan (Luke xiii. 11, 16). Those generally who recovered health are said to have been 'oppressed of the devil' (Acts x. 38). Assertions of this kind illustrate the power with which through sin 'the god of this world' reigns. It may be that that power was more evidently exerted in our Lord's time than before or since; that it was its most rampant dominion that he attacked and mastered, to give the fullest proof to the world of his almighty lordship. We dare not, indeed, say that persons are possessed with demons now, as many then were. But it is not too much to suppose that, when a man yields to the evil influence, when he chooses to become the slave of lust, when he has revelled in sin, and had his pleasure in the gratification of filthy desires, the power which works in him waxes stronger and stronger, till it seems as if some fell master were actually ruling him, against whom the victim tries to make head too late, his resolutions broken, his struggles ineffective, the chain drawn tighter, the imperious will more tyrannizing over both soul and body, to be subdued only by that voice of resistless power which bade the evil demons of old relax their grasp, and they were compelled to obey.

The subject is full of interest: it cannot be pursued further here; but it speaks trumpet-tongued to us all, to resist at once, at the first onset, not to give any 'place to the devil' (Eph. iv. 27; James ii. 7; 1 Pet. v. 8).

DEMOPHON (2 Macc. xii. 2).

DENARIUS, or Roman penny (Matt. xviii. 28, and elsewhere). See MONEY.

a similar position, with the discrepancies in details, so frequent between the evangelists; but they form part of that general groundwork in which all agree.' And, if may be added, the opinion of the Jews, accompanied as it very likely was by superstitious notions and observances, instead of weakening, rather confirms the case as gathered from our Lord's miracles. Even had there

DEPOSIT. The Mosaic law provided for the safe custody and due restoration of goods and property which a man had undertaken to keep for another. If goods, 'money or stuff,' so deposited were stolen, and the thief found, he was to pay double: if the thief was not found, then the person in whose custody the goods had been was to appear before the judges, that it might be known whether or no he was the guilty party, and he was put upon his oath. With regard to beasts, if they died, or were hurt, or driven secretly off, the person entrusted with them also was to swear that he had not dishonestly made away with them. But, if they were stolen, he was obliged to make the loss good; if, however, an animal was torn by a wild beast, he must bring the remains in proof, and then he was quit (Exod. xxii. 7-13). Of course, if perjury was committed, there was punishment, the principal and a fifth added thereto was to be restored, and the sacrifice of a ram for a trespass-offering was required (Lev. vi. 1-7). At a later period an acknowledgment of a deposit seems to have been given (Tob. v. 3).

DEPUTY (Acts xiii. 7, 8, 12, xix. 38). The term by which our translators render a Greek word equivalent to the Latin proconsul, the governor of a senatorial province.

DER'BE (perhaps juniper-tree). A small town in Lycaonia, probably near the pass called the Cilician gates. According to Winer it was to the south of Iconium and south-east of Lystra (Bibl. RWE. art. 'Derbe'); but this is doubtful. The site of this town has been variously placed. Perhaps it was at Divlé, near the base of Taurus. St. Paul visited Derbe repeatedly (Acts xiv. 6, 20, xvi. 1), and most likely also on his third journey (xviii. 23, xix. 1); and one of his companions when proceeding to Jerusalem was Gaius of Derbe. He was not persecuted in this place; and therefore it is not mentioned in 2 Tim. iii. 11—a minute coincidence confirming the credibility of the sacred narrative.

DESERT. There are several Hebrew words thus rendered in our version. One of these is midbar, signifying pasture-land, open field, in contradistinction to that which was tilled. It is derived from a verb implying to lead or drive, i.e. flocks and herds to pasture. Midbar with the article designates the great Arabian desert towards and around Sinal (Exod. iii. 1, v. 3, xix. 2, xxiii. 31; Numb. xxxiii. 8, 9, 16, and elsewhere). It is more frequently translated 'wilderness.' This word is also used for the open field or pasture round many towns and villages, somewhat like our commons, and often named after the place to which it was contiguous (1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15, 25), land in the spring covered with verdure, and even after the heats of summer, though dry and burnt up, yet not without food for the cattle scattered over the surface. There is good reason for believing that the Arabian desert was anciently far less sterile than it is at present. We may see hence the futility of the objection made to the statement that the Israelites had flocks and herds with them in their wanderings. Much of the country they traversed, wild and rugged as it often was, furnished sufficient pasturage, and enclosed many verdant glens well supplied with wells of water. Another Hebrew word, 'arabah, signifies an arid tract of country (Isai. xxxv. 1, and elsewhere): it is also translated 'wilderness' (Job xxiv. 5; Isai. xxxiii. 9, and elsewhere). When the article is prefixed, that great sunken region extending from the lake of Gennesaret towards the gulf of Akabah, through part of which the Jordan flows, is invariably meant. This is rendered 'the desert' in Ezek. xlvii. 8, but generally 'the plain.' South of the Dead sea it was indeed a dry and fearful desert; see ARABAH. Hhorbah implies wasteness, or desolation: it sometimes occurs in the plural number, and is translated in our version 'desert' or 'deserts' (Psal. cii. 6; Isai. xlvi. 21; Ezek. xiii. 4). There is yet another word, yeshimon, signifying a desert-region (Isai. xliii. 19). With the article it appears to designate the high waste land to the east of the Dead sea (Numb. xxiii. 28). See JESHIMON.

DES'SAU (2 Macc. xiv. 16).

DEU'EL (invocation of God). The father of the prince of Gad in the wilderness (Numb. i. 14, vii. 42, x. 20). But (ii. 14) he is also called Reuel.

DEUTERON'OMY. The fifth book of Moses is known among the Jews (who divide it into eleven perashioth) by several names. Thus the two words with which it begins, and the second word, signifying respectively: 'These are the words,' and 'The words,' are common appellations: it is also called 'The repetition of the law,' and 'The book of reproofs.' Our name, Deuteronomy, is derived from the Greek title, signifying 'the second law.'

Its obvious purpose is to repeat to Israel the principal laws which had been given them in the wilderness, explaining, enforcing, adding to the sanctions with which those sacred ordinances bound them, gathering up some notices of what had befallen them on their way, and unfolding so far their future destiny as that they might see that obedience to the covenant would ensure their prosperity, while idolatry and rebellion against God's laws would provoke him to scatter them through the world and make them a mocking and a by-word to the nations. The fulfilment of this threatening is before our eyes. We cannot walk the streets of our cities without beholding it. And, as it is on all hands conceded that this book was written before the dispersion began, we have in the very fact of the history of the branded sons of Jacob a proof not to be evaded that he who wrote it was gifted with supernatural prescience, that he 'spake' as he was 'moved by the Holy Ghost.'

It was very fitting that such an address should be at the time delivered to the Israelites. Their weary wanderings were now ended. Their multitudinous hosts lay camped in the plains of Moab, close upon that promised heritage, a fair land, fertile and most desirable, which they were only waiting for the signal to occupy. And in strains touching and tender, delivering the last admonitions of a father, does their veteran leader charge them. For himself his life-long hope was not to be realized. O if he might but set foot upon the soil of Canaan! But he had sinned; and therefore, though his eyes, undimmed by the mists of a hundred and twenty years, might feast upon the lovely prospect, his feet should never tread the other bank of Jordan. His life, waning fast, was the last single thread which bound his nation in their pilgrimage. When he was dead, and buried where no man knew, then once more should the cry 'Go forward!' that had stirred them to adventure the passage of the Red sea (Exod. xiv. 15) summon them to cross the full river which swelled before them, and the swarming tribes should press on to occupy the great and goodly cities which they did not build, and enjoy the vineyards which they had not planted (Deut. vi. 10, 11). An address delivered by such a man in such a crisis would not, we may be sure, be in that plain style of narrative which he might use at other times. And hence the hortatory tone, the fulness of expression of the book of Deuteronomy, are the surest warrants that it is what it professes to be. 'I must regard this book,' says Professor Moses Stuart, 'as being so deeply fraught with holy and patriotic feeling, as to convince any unprejudiced reader who is competent to judge of its style, that it cannot, with any tolerable degree of probability, be attributed to any pretender to legislation, or to any mere initiator of the great legislator. Such a glow as runs through all this book it is in vain to seek for in any artificial or supposititious composition' (see Crit. Hist. and Def. of the O. T. Canon, edit. Davidson, sect. iii. pp. 49, 50).

And yet certain critics are disposed to deny the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy. Some ascribe it to the person who they say supplemented the other books of the Pentateuch; and some are of opinion that the writer was a third individual, who, having lighted upon the works of two predecessors—the Elohist and the Jehovist they are called—constructed from them the preceding four books, and added Deuteronomy from his own pen. Some, from a fancied resemblance in diction, attribute the work to Jeremiah; while Ewald has recourse to the very reasonable notion that it was written by a Jew who lived in Egypt in the latter part of Manasseh's reign. Speculations of this kind placed together are mutually destructive; and little respect can be felt for criticism thus uncertain. Ewald, in particular, can hardly have expected credit for his theory, so utterly repugnant to the principles of common sense. For the Egyptian Jew of his dream he supposes to be a pious man, gifted with prophetic power, who adopts the Mosaic mode of expression to make his countrymen believe that their ancient legislator was addressing them. And he succeeds, according to this notion, so well that they never detect his well-intended fraud, they incorporate his composition with the rest of the Pentateuch (the five-fold division of which was not made, in all probability, till the time of the Septuagint translators), they reverence it as scripture, and as scripture our Lord himself cites it. Surely the wildest credulity must be startled at a theory like this.

tions) a complete whole. It is consistent throughout. But then it is said that, both in regard to its legislation and its historical statements, there are differences from the preceding books, additions and indeed contradictions, sufficient to show that they could not all have proceeded from one pen; and, moreover, that there are unequivocal indications of a later date. Among the historical additions may be mentioned the prohibition against attacking Edom, Moab, and Ammon (Deut. ii. 4-6, 9, 19), and the greater circumstantiality in relating the aggression of the Amalekites (xxv. 17-19 compared with Exod. xvii. 8). In the legislation, we are to observe that the command to kill an animal at the door of the tabernacle (Lev. xvii. 3-5) is modified and relaxed (Deut. xii. 15, 20, 21), and that there are special directions introduced as to the appointment of a king (xvii. 14-20). But surely such additions as these do not even tend to prove diversity of authorship: no writer would bind himself to say in a second work neither more nor less than he had said in a first. Rather some of the additions are strong evidence that Deuteronomy was delivered at the time and under the circumstances professed. The command to kill at the door of the tabernacle was appropriate so long as the tabernacle was in the centre of the camp, each man's tent close by: it would have been inappropriate, almost tantamount to a prohibition against killing animals at all, when the tabernacle was settled in a city, and the tribes were dispersed through the extent of Palestine. Doubtless God, in his wisdom and his goodness, will enact his laws so as to fit the varying circumstances of his people. And it was very meet that the repetition of law, delivered as Deuteronomy was on the eve of the occupation of Canaan, should look forward to Israel's position there, and not backward to their habits in the wilderness they were leaving. God does not deal with men as if they were mere machines. He would have them use their faculties, and find out their wants, and then apply to him on his mercy-seat. Thus their filial dependence on him is best secured. We have a remarkable illustration of this in the progressive legislation in regard to the daughters of Zelophehad (Numb. xxviii. 1-11, xxxvi. 1-12).

But we must see if the so-called discrepancies can disprove the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy. Only one or two of these can be here noticed. Thus it is said that Deut. ii. 24 contradicts Numb. xxi. 21, 22; for that in the last-named place the Israelites sent Sihon a peaceful embassy, while in the other God encouraged them to attack him. But the fact is that Sihon had a warning, as Pharaoh had. He might have escaped attack. Invasion did not come till the embassy had been sent and the terms had been rejected (Deut. ii. 26-30). God, however, foresaw that they would be rejected, and that Sihon would be justly destroyed. It is also said that Deut. x. 6, 7, contradicts Numb. xx. 22-27, xxxiii. 30-38. A very feasible explanation has been given of the apparent contradiction; but for this the reader must be referred to another article: see WANDERING. Once more it is alleged that, whereas generally in the preceding books the mountain where the law was given is called Sinai, in Deuteronomy, with one exception (xxxiii. 2), the name Horeb is used. But it would seem a sufficient reply that Sinai is the particular mountain, Horeb the range: it was natural, at an earlier period, when in the neighbourhood, to specify the single summit, but, when the region had long been quitted, it was equally natural to apply the general name. As to traces of a post-Mosaic date, it is argued that the regulations already referred to concerning the kingdom show that the government of Israel had already become monarchical; but this argument can hardly weigh with those who are not inclined to deny the presence of God, and to refuse him the right of providing for the future guidance of his people.

Little more can be said in this place. Be it only added, as a brief summary of the evidence for the Mosaic authorship, that direct quotations (1 Kings viii. 29; 2 Kings xiv. 6; Jer. xxxiv. 14) would show that 400 years and onwards after Moses this book was in existence and was recognized as law; that there are verbal allusions in various early books of scripture, and traces in history which serve to connect Deuteronomy with the times in which it professes to be written. De Wette can evade the conclusion only by saying that the final editors of Judges and Samuel were acquainted with the Pentateuch, and caught the spirit of the book of Deuteronomy (Einleitung, § 162 b. p. 201). Further, the diction of this book is archaic like the rest of the Pentateuch, so much that one critic is driven to the pitiful resource of guessing that the writer had very likely a fancy for imitating the phraseology of old books. Then we have the evident high antiquity of chap. xxxiii., the silence as to post-Mosaic events, peculiar geographical notices, a relation pre-supposed of Moab, Ammon, and Edom to Israel, varying from that which subsisted later, a familiar acquaintance with Egypt, a certain indefiniteness in the predictions, laws appearing which related to the conquest of Canaan, the sanction, moreover, which our Lord gave to Deuteronomy, together with the glaring difficulties to which a contrary hypothesis is exposed, seeing that it can be successfully maintained only on the supposition that the book is an elaborate forgery (see Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1858, pp. 313-325). He that comes in a reverent spirit to the bible cannot easily doubt that Deuteronomy is what it professes to be.

The contents may be arranged under the following heads:—I. A repetition of the history related in the preceding books (i.-iv.), concluding with an introduction to the following discourse. II. A repetition of the moral (v.-xi.), ceremonial (xii.-xvi.), and judicial law (xvii.-xxvi.). III. The confirmation of the law, with prophetic promises to the obedient and curses against the disobedient, and sundry admonitions (xxvii.-xxx.). IV. The personal history of Moses to his death; the account of which is of course supplied by some other hand (xxxi.-xxxiv.). There is a remarkable Messianic prophecy in Deuteronomy (xviii. 15, 18, 19), expressly applied to Christ in the New Testament (Acts iii. 22, 23, vii. 37).

Expositions of this book are, for the most part, found in commentaries on the whole bible, or at least upon the Pentateuch. There are, however, some exceptions, as Calvin's Sermons upon Deut., translated by A. Golding, London, 1583; Schultz's Das Deut. erklärt, Berlin, 1859.

DEVIL. The appellation generally given to a mighty spirit of evil, in rebellion against God, and antagonistic to man. 'Devil' is derived from, and is the rendering of, a Greek word, diabolos, implying one who sets at variance, a slanderer, an accuser. This word (when designating men) is occasionally used in the plural number (1 Tim. iii. 11; 2 Tim. iii. 3; Tit. ii. 3); where persons are described as slanderers. It is applied to Judas (John vi. 70): elsewhere it has the article (Acts xiii. 10 excepted), and must, therefore, designate some one special being, to whom also other appellations are given in various parts of scripture. Such are 'Satan' (adversary), the 'wicked' or 'evil one' (Matt. xiii. 38, 39; 1 John ii. 13), 'the prince of this world' (John xii. 31, xiv. 30), 'the god of this world' (2 Cor. iv. 4), 'the prince of the power of the air' (Eph. ii. 2), 'the old serpent' (Rev. xx. 2), &c. &c.

There can be no doubt of the personality of such a being. He is described as exercising power, as influenced by motives, as performing actions, as receiving judgment, as suffering punishment (Gen. iii.; Matt. iv. 1-11; Luke xxii. 31; John xvi. 11; 1 Pet. v. 8; Rev. xx. 10): it is impossible, therefore, with any fairness, to interpret language so used of an abstract principle personified.

This is yet further proved by the glimpses afforded us of the history of this evil one. His origin, indeed, is not explained; nor are the steps detailed by which he came to his present state. He is introduced abruptly, is spoken of at first as a tempter and an enemy (Gen. iii. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 3). But it is not to be supposed that he was uncreated; for that would be to set up two co-ordinate opposing powers, an error and a heresy, which, though revived from time to time, has been long ago sufficiently confuted. Nor must it be imagined that Satan was evil as he proceeded from his Creator's hand. For, though certainly the devil is said to have been 'a murderer,' and to have 'sinned' 'from the beginning' (John viii. 44; 1 John iii. 8), yet in one of these places a departure from former truth seems implied; and we may perhaps (though opinions vary on the point) connect this with the mention elsewhere of 'angels that sinned,' and that 'kept not their first estate' (2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6). Just as when man had been created holy he transgressed, so we may conclude that there were other beings—the time and the locality we know not—who forfeited their prerogative, who broke the tie of love betwixt themselves and their Creator, and for whom a just punishment is prepared (Matt. xxv. 41). Among these one stands forth pre-eminent. He is their head and king. To him the special name of 'the devil' is given; while the rest are called 'demons.' It may be that he was the great mover in the rebellion, prompted, it is possible, by pride (1 Tim. iii. 5), who induced others to range themselves on his side: it may be that he was far higher originally than they, and has preserved his fatal pre-eminence in ruin. We must, however, be careful not to let speculation carry us too far. The scriptures do not minister to curiosity: all their revelations are intended for practical guidance.

And this is a practical matter. We are warned that we have a foe, powerful, malignant, and unwearied. Why he and his company have been permitted to exercise their injurious propensities upon our race, instead of being at once confined in their destined prison, we cannot tell: but the fact is patent. The devil gained a victory when he lured our first parents into disbelief and disobedience: he is striving to gain fresh victories over us. And he will succeed, unless we take the right mode of repelling him. He has various kinds of temptations; for David (1 Chron. xxi. 1), for Job (Job i. 10, 11, ii. 4, 5), for Judas (Luke xxii. 3-6), for Ananias (Acts v. 3), according to the various dispositions and circumstances of the men. And when he prevails he is ready to spread their fault before the divine Judge, and to call for punishment on the sin to which he has incited (Rev. xii. 10). Men can overcome him only 'by the blood of the Lamb' (11). It is well to know that we are engaged in a struggle, the issue of which will be life or death. It is not merely with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers of higher force. We must 'put on the whole armour of God,' 'the breast-plate of righteousness,' 'the shield of faith,' 'the sword of the Spirit': with these weapons we may stand (Eph. vi. 12-18).

The serpent, it was predicted, should bruise the heel of the woman's seed; but that seed should bruise the serpent's head (Gen. iii. 15). Essentially and most entirely fulfilled by the divine Saviour, who came for the express purpose 'that, through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil' (Heb. ii. 14), it is yet again fulfilled in Christ's faithful soldiers and servants. They take part, by virtue of union with him, in their Master's victory, in their Master's glory (Rev. iii. 21). Let them be careful to keep up their persevering resistance. They shall have in due season their triumph: 'The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly' (Rom. xvi. 20).

DEW. The dew is very copious in Palestine, so as in some degree to supply the want of rain in summer. Travellers describe it as sometimes rolling off their tents like rain (Sol. Song v. 2; Dan. iv. 23, 25), illustrating the history of Gideon's fleece (Judges vi. 36-40: comp. Psal. cx. 3). Hence we find the promise of it as an indication of fertility (Gen. xxvii. 28; Dent. xxxiii. 13), and the withholding of it as the curse of sterility (2 Sam. i. 21; Hagg. i. 10). Sometimes, perhaps, it means light rain. The dew often occurs in a figurative sense: speech distils like it (Dent. xxxii. 2): the goodness of Ephraim and Judah exhales as quickly as it does (Hos. vi. 4): the wicked pass away like it (xiii. 3): the Lord is welcome to his people as dew to the thirsty soil (xiv. 5).

DIADEM (Job xxix. 14; Isai. xxviii. 5, lxii. 3; Ezek. xxi. 26). See CROWN.

DIAL. It was on the 'dial of Ahaz' that the miraculous sign given to Hezekiah for his recovery from sickness showed itself (2 Kings xx. 8-11; Isai. xxxviii. 7, 8). With regard to the wonder itself we need not too curiously enquire. He, who formed the universe, and gave the worlds their motions, could, as easily as he created, with a word suspend the operations of the vast machine. And they, who allege that all would have been thrown into disorder if one particular part had been touched, must imagine the Almighty like an unskilful workman, who thinks of stopping only certain wheels in an engine, and forgets that the rest would dash themselves to pieces. Hard and easy are words unknown to the Deity; and what he willed he accomplished. Still it might be that the effect was produced by a supernatural refraction of the light. Only we must acknowledge that the sign was miraculous; else, if it could have been effected by human skill, it would have been no sufficient proof to Hezekiah.

It is uncertain what the 'dial' of Ahaz was. The word so translated is elsewhere rendered 'degrees,' 'steps' (e.g. Exod. xx. 26). Some have imagined it a hemispherical cavity in a horizontal square stone, provided with a gnomon or index in the middle, the shadow of which fell on different lines cut in the hollow surface: some think that it was a vertical index surrounded by twelve concentric circles; while some, with perhaps greater probability, believe it an obelisk-like pillar, set up in an open elevated place, with encircling steps, on which the shadow fell (Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 115, 116). Ahaz appears to have had a taste for curious things (2 Kings xvi. 10), and might have borrowed this dial from some foreign pattern. It is not clear whether the phenomenon was observed out of Palestine. The enquiry from Babylon in regard to it would seem to imply that it was heard of, but not witnessed there (2 Chron. xxxii. 31).

DIAMOND. One of the gems in the high priest's breast-plate is so called in our version (Exod. xxviii. 18, xxxix. 11). The same word also occurs in reference to the king of Tyre (Ezek. xxviii. 13). It is doubtless some hard stone; for the original Hebrew term implies striking. But it is questionable whether, in the early ages of the world, the art of cutting and engraving the diamond was understood. It is, therefore, more generally supposed that an onyx is here meant. A different word is translated 'diamond' in Jer. xvii. 1: it is elsewhere rendered ADAMANT which see. The diamond is well known as the hardest, most beautiful, and most precious of gems. It is pure carbon, and may be called charcoal crystallized. Exposed to heat it loses its crystalline texture.

DIA'NA. The Roman name of the goddess called Artemis by the Greeks. This deity distinguished by the title 'Great' was specially honoured at Ephesus (Acts xix. 23-41), where a magnificent temple was dedicated to her. It had a large revenue, and was accounted the public treasury: it had the privileges of an asylum; and no weapons were to be carried into its precincts. The Ephesian Diana, however, differed much in the attributes ascribed to her, and the character of the worship paid her, from the Grecian goddess. She was more the Syrian Astarte; and, being represented with numerous breasts, she must be considered as symbolizing the generative and sustaining powers of nature. The earliest image, said to have fallen from heaven, was very rude, a head on which was a mural crown, and an almost-shapeless trunk, each hand holding a bar or staff. Later images were more developed with many breasts, bands, and symbolical figures round the body. The servants of this goddess were women, melissæ, and eunuchs, megabyzi. No bloody sacrifices were offered in her temple.

DIBLA'IM (double cake). A person (male or female?) whose daughter Hosea the prophet took to wife (Hos. i. 3).

DIB'LATH (possibly a corruption for Riblah). This name occurs only in one place (Ezek. vi. 14), and is obviously at the extremity, most likely the northern extremity, of the land.

DIBLATHA'IM (twin-cakes). See ALMON-DIBLATHAIM and BETH-DIBLATHAIM.

DIB'ON (a pining, wasting).—1. A town on the east of the Jordan, assigned to the tribe of Gad, who are said to have built or fortified it (Numb. xxi. 30, xxxiii. 3, 34). But afterwards it belonged to Reuben (Josh. xiii. 9, 17), and in the decay of the Israelitish power was occupied by Moab (Isai. xv. 2; Jer. xlviii. 18, 22). Some ruins on the Roman road, three miles north of the Arnon, still bear the name of Dhibân.—2. A town inhabited after the captivity by the men of Judah (Neh. xi. 25); it is, perhaps, identical with Dimonah.

DIB'ON-GAD (wasting of Gad). A station of the Israelites, probably identical with Dibon, 1 (Numb. xxxiii. 45, 46).

DIB'RI (eloquent). A Danite, whose daughter Shelomith was married to an Egyptian. Their son was stoned for blasphemy (Lev. xxiv. 11).

DID'YMUS (twin). The surname of the apostle Thomas (John xi. 16, xx. 24, xxi. 2). See THOMAS.

DIK'LAH (a palm-tree). A son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chron. i. 21). His descendants are said to be the Minæi, a people described as inhabiting a country abounding in palms. But then their location is not easily to be ascertained. Among many discrepant views, they may, perhaps, be most probably believed to have occupied a part of the Yemen; and some traces of the name Minæi are stated to exist there.

DIL'EAN (gourd-field). A city of Judah (Josh. xv. 38).

DILL (Matt. xxiii. 23, marg.). See ANISE.

DIM'NAH (dung-hill). A city of Zebulun, assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 35). It is not enumerated elsewhere with the cities of Zebulun; and in 1 Chron. vi. 77 Rimmon is substituted for it. Perhaps Dimnah is a copyist's error.

DI'MON (stillness, or perhaps for Dibon). The waters of Dimon appear to have been streams to the eastward of the Dead sea, in the territory of Moab (Isai. xv. 9).

DIMO'NAH (id.). A city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 22); probably the same as Dibon, 2; on the site of the ruins of ed-Deib.

DI'NAH (judged, acquitted, or avenged). The daughter of Jacob and Leah (Gen. xxx. 21). The history of her visiting the daughters of the heathen inhabitants of the land, of her defilement by Shechem, and of the treacherous and bloody revenge taken by her brothers Simeon and Levi, are recorded in xxxiv. Nothing more is certainly known of her: she probably accompanied her family into Egypt (xvii. 15).

DI'NAITES. An Assyrian people, from whom colonists were placed in the cities of Samaria (Ezra iv. 9).

DINHA'BAH (perhaps lord or place of plundering, i. e. robbers' den). The city of Bela, a king who reigned in Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 32; 1 Chron. i. 43).

DINNER. See MEALS.

DIONYSIA. The name of a feast of Dionysus or Bacchus, celebrated with wild and licentious enthusiasm. So great were the excesses committed that the Romans had forbidden the celebration of this feast in Italy. And yet it was forced upon the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. vi. 7). See BACCHUS.

DIONYSIUS (belonging to Dionysus, or Bacchus). An eminent Athenian, converted by means of St. Paul's preaching (Acts xvii. 34). Tradition reports him to have been bishop of Athens, and to have suffered martyrdom there. The writings which bear his name are spurious.

DIOSCORINTHIUS (2 Macc. xi. 21). See MONTH.

DIOTREPES (Jove-nourished). A professed Christian, who resisted the authority of St. John (3 John 9). His place of residence can only be conjectured.

DIPHATH (1 Chron. i. 6, marg.). See RIPHATH.

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS. One of the supernatural gifts of the Holy Ghost, by which some believers were enabled to distinguish the operation of God's Spirit from that which was evil or merely human (1 Cor. xii. 10; 1 John iv. 1).

DISCIPLE. This word is often used in the New Testament to designate the followers of Christ (Matt. x. 42; Acts ix. 26, and elsewhere). See EDUCATION, SCHOOL.

DISCUS (2 Macc. iv. 14). A circular plate of metal or stone, the throwing of which was one of the exercises in the ancient games. See GAMES.

Discobolus: figure of an athlete who threw the discus. Brit. Mus.

DISEASES. See MEDICINE, PHYSICIAN.

DISH. The words sometimes so rendered in our version are also translated 'basin,' 'bowl,' &c. In Exod. xxv. 29, xxxvii. 16; Numb. iv. 7 a deep dish or bowl is meant. The 'dish' of Judges v. 25, translated 'bowl,' in vi. 38, is a shallow basin. The word used in 2 Kings xxi. 13 signifies a platter into which anything is poured. The dipping in the dish (Matt. xxvi. 23; Mark xiv. 20) is still customary in some eastern countries. Each person dips a piece of bread in the dish, and carries it to his mouth with some portion of the contents. The phrase as applied to Judas, of dipping his hand in the same dish with our Lord, was used to indicate familiar association.

DISHAN (antelope). A son of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 28, 30; 1 Chron. i. 38, 42).

DISHON (id.).—1. Another son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 26, 30; 1 Chron. i. 38).—

2. A son of Anah, and grandson of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 25; 1 Chron. i. 41).

DISHON (Deut. xiv. 5, marg.). See PYGARG.

DISPENSATION. This word, occurring in 1 Cor. ix. 17; Eph. i. 10, iii. 2; Col. i. 25, properly means stewardship or administration. It has come, however, in the ordinary use of it, to imply a system of religious doctrines and rites. Thus, we speak of the Jewish dispensation and the Christian dispensation.

DISPERSION, JEWS OF THE. The 'dispersed,' or the 'dispersion,' was the appellation given to those who continued in other countries after the return from Babylon. Babylon thus became a centre from which offshoots spread; and colonies of Jews established themselves in Persia, Media, and other neighbouring countries. The result of Greek conquest was to draw off Jewish settlers to the west. Hence they were found in the cities of Asia Minor, enjoying privileges from the Syrian kings. Settlements were also formed in Egypt, extending themselves along the northern coasts, and possibly also into the interior. And, after the capture of Jerusalem by Pompey, Jews were introduced at Rome. The dispersed, however, all looked to Jerusalem as the metropolis of their faith: they paid the legal half-shekel towards its services: they had with them everywhere their sacred books, which thus became known to the Gentiles (Acts xv. 21); while a wholesome influence was perceptible on themselves: 'The difficulties,' says Mr. Westcott, 'which set aside the literal observance of the Mosaic ritual, led to a wider view of the scope of the law, and a stronger sense of its spiritual significance. Outwardly and inwardly, by its effects both on the Gentiles and on the people of Israel, the dispersion appears to have been the clearest providential preparation for the spread of Christianity' (Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 441; see also Introd. to the Gospels, chap. 1). The 'dispersion' included the twelve tribes (John vii. 35; Acts xxvi. 7; James i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 1).

DIVINATION. The human mind has always evinced a great inclination to read the future. Accordingly, various modes have been resorted to in different nations of gratifying this propensity, sometimes with a view of directing the actions so as to ensure prosperity, and sometimes even with a hope, by magical arts, of influencing superior powers into conformity with the wishes.

Divination was practised among the Greeks. The appearance of the sky and of the heavenly signs, the flight and song of birds, the phenomena presented by the entrails of victims, &c., were supposed to prognosticate events; and, according to these prognostications, public as well as private actions were regulated. See ORACLE. The Romans were equally zealous in divining. Much of it among them was probably of Etruscan origin; and it prevailed in Rome to such a degree, that there was scarcely a natural event or ordinary occurrence which did not, in their view, bear upon the future. The most important proceedings of state were sometimes nullified if the auspices were pronounced unpropitious. And, besides the observation of lightning and heavenly signs, of the flight of birds, of the appetite of sacred fowl, of the appearance of the entrails of sacrifices, &c., they had the Sybilline books to consult, in which they believed the decrees of fate to be inscribed. Thoughtful men must have been aware of the absurdity of such a system. For not unfrequently different modes of divination would yield exactly-opposite results. And we have evidence in classical authors of the acknowledgment of imposture. Yet they held that such practices had upon the public mind was very strong. We need the less wonder at it when we notice the eagerness with which, even now, persons will resort to a specious fortune-teller. See Dollinger, The Gentile and the Jew, Engl. transl., book iv. 1, vol. i. pp. 206-209; book vii. 2, § 5, vol. ii. 98-108.

There is frequent mention of diviners in scripture; and the Hebrews are repeatedly warned against the pretensions of those who affected to foretell events.

Divination first appears in connection with Egypt. The soothsayers or diviners were here a recognized body of men, a class of the priesthood it would seem. They are designated by different names, both in the original and in our version, perhaps as indicating separate departments or modes of acting. These names shall be briefly noticed, with some explanation of their special meaning. The word rendered 'wise men' (Gen. xli. 8; Exod. vii. 11) has probably a general purport, designating those skilled in occult science. It is the name frequently applied to the sages of Babylon (Dan. ii. 24, iv. 6, v. 15). The word rendered 'magicians,' khartumtm (Gen. xli. 8; Exod. vii. 11, 22, viii. 7, 18, 19, ix. 11) may signify those acquainted with the sacred writing or hieroglyphics in which secret things were recorded (see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 644-647). The same name is given to the Chaldeans (Dan. i. 20, ii. 2). The 'sorcerers' (Exod. vii. 11; Dan. ii. 2; Mal. iii. 5), mekhashshshephtm, were those who muttered and used incantations. The word occurs in Exod. xxii. 18 (fem.); Deut. xviii. 10, where our version has 'a witch;' in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6, 'used witchcraft.' The divination said to be exercised by Joseph is not easily explained. 'The ancient Egyptians, and still more the Persians, practised a mode of divination from goblets. Small pieces of gold or silver, together with precious stones, marked with strange figures and signs, were thrown into the vessel; after which certain incantations were pronounced, and the evil demon was invoked: the latter was then supposed to give the answer, either by intelligible words, or by pointing to some of the characters on the precious stones, or in some other more mysterious manner. Sometimes the goblet was filled with pure water, upon which the sun was allowed to play; and the figures which were thus formed, or which a lively imagination fancied it saw, were interpreted as the desired omen—a method of taking auguries still employed in Egypt and Nubia. The goblets were usually of a spherical form, . . . and from this reason, as well as because they were believed to teach man all natural and many supernatural things, they were called "celestial globes" (Kalisch, ubi supr., p. 673). It may be that Joseph, intending to prove his brethren, in order the more surely to preserve his incognito, professed to adopt an Egyptian custom. It can hardly be imagined that he, to whom God had given supernatural discernment, should have really used heathen and false incantations. The word rendered 'divine' (Gen. xli. 5, 15) implying originally to hiss like a serpent, may mean to murmur incantations, or to use ophiomancy, that is, divination by means of a serpent. This same word occurs elsewhere (Lev. xix. 26; 2 Kings xvii. 17, xxi. 6, 'used enchantments'), as also a nearly-similar word (Psal. lviii. 7, 'charmers'). And it sometimes bears a very general sense, to augur, to have a presage, to conclude by experience, as in Gen. xxx. 27.

There was another kind of diviners frequently mentioned in scripture, me'onentm, generally rendered 'observers of times' (Lev. xix. 26; Deut. xviii. 10, 14; 2 Kings xxi. 6; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6). This is also translated 'soothsayers' (Isai. ii. 6; Mic. v. 12): also a form of the word is 'sorceress' (Isai. lvii. 3) and 'enchanters' (Jer. xxvii. 9). The original meaning of the term is to cover; hence to use covert arts. Some would consider this mode of divination as the observing of the clouds or meteoric appearances, the noting of dreams, or fascination with the eye. Gesenius believes it to imply a kind of divining connected with idolatry.

Another word, yidd'ontm, signifies knowing; hence a wizard (Lev. xix. 31, xx. 6, 27; Deut. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 9; Isai. xix. 3): it is often joined with the having or resorting to what is called a familiar spirit.

The word expressive of a familiar spirit, ob, designates a bottle (Job xxxii. 19); and the spirit was supposed to be in the body of the diviner as if in a bottle; hence the application of the term (Lev. xix. 31, xx. 6, 27). It was by this means that Saul sought an answer when the Lord refused to hear him (1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 8, 9). This kind of divining was probably the same as consulting the dead (Deut. xviii. 11, where in our version 'necromancer'). The spirits were supposed to be those of dead persons. And the answers given, in which it was imagined that these spirits spoke, were probably by a kind of ventriloquism; and thus the Septuagint translators have rendered the original word. The voice is sometimes described as 'out of the ground' (Isai. xxix. 4). There is another word, ittm, occurring in xix. 3, rendered 'charmers' by our translators, which appears to have the same meaning. According to its derivation, it would designate those necro-mancers who emitted the supposed murmur of a spirit. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Todtenbeschwörer.' Analogous to the 'familiar spirit' was that 'spirit of divination' or 'Python,' which possessed the damsel at Philippi (Acts xvi. 16). This appears, however, to have been a case of actual possession by a demon.

'Dreamers of dreams' are denounced (Deut. xiii. 1-5); it being of course understood that these dreamers were but pretenders, and that their purpose was to draw away the people into idolatry or other evil (Jer. xxiii. 32).

'One that useth divination' is mentioned in Deut. xviii. 10. Kosem, the original word, implies dividing out, perhaps by lot; and hence a diviner, used always with a bad meaning, as in reference to Balaam (Josh. xiii. 22, where our version has 'soothsayer') and to the Philistines (1 Sam. vi. 2). We find it in a general sense (Ezek. xxi. 21), as including three different modes of divining, which are just after specified; by arrows, on which, perhaps, were inscribed the names of different cities, that to be attacked which was drawn; by consulting teraphim; and by inspecting the entrails of victims: see Henderson, Ezekiel, p. 104.

The 'charmer' (Deut. xviii. 11) was some person who could bind (for this is what the original word implies) with spells. It is used of one who charmed serpents (Psal. lviii. 5). There is another term, gazerin, rendered 'soothsayers' (Dan. ii. 27, iv. 7, v. 7, 11). It signifies deciders, probably those who cast nativities, and by various modes of computing foretold the fortunes of men. The word ashshaphim (Dan. i. 20, ii. 2) is rendered in our version 'astrologers.' The primary idea being that of covering, it must signify those who used occult arts. A kindred word occurs in 27, iv. 7, v. 7, 11, 15. The divining-rod is mentioned in Hos. iv. 12. To the consultation of oracles there is no distinct allusion.

In such modes as those which have been now enumerated curiosity respecting the future endeavoured to satisfy itself. And idolators and impostors were ready to gratify such desire. But they were all distinctly forbidden by the sacred law (Deut. xviii. 9-14). God had provided modes by which his people, in all necessary cases, might know his will for direction, 'by dreams, by Urim, by prophets' (1 Sam. xxviii. 6). These were not to be resorted to without sufficient reason. But, as he was in a special sense the king of the chosen people, it was natural that extraordinary means should be at hand of learning his will; and to him alone, and not to vain idols, or to arts invented by men, were his people to apply.

It is a question how far divination was an imposition. That much imposture was mixed with it no one will deny. But it may not unreasonably be believed that some dark superior influence was at work. We may not attempt to define it. But if, as we know, the prince of the power of the air had sway over the children of disobedience (Eph. ii. 2), and evidenced his dominion in many remarkable cases (see DEMONIAC), it may be that sometimes the soothsayers, the magicians, the sorcerers, were helped in their evil courses by him whose slaves they were. Be this, however, as it may, whether the whole were imposture, or whether there was some reality in it, the law of God was holy, just, and good, which condemned and punished it.

DIVORCE. Marriage, on its original institution, was regarded as indissoluble (Gen. ii. 24). In the course of time divorce (like polygamy) became customary, arising, no doubt, from the assumed inferiority of the female to the male sex, so that a man regarded a woman as property to be disposed of at pleasure. This licence was not prohibited by the Mosaic law. For men must be dealt with according to what they are, in order to raise them to what they ought to be; so even now God appears to wink at many disorders. It is the wisdom of his providential government, because we are in a state of probation, and because a day of righteous retribution is coming upon the world. Thus our Lord intimates that, had the Israelites been in a higher moral state, the law would have been in some respects different (Matt. xix. 8). There were, however, checks to the facility of divorce. Certain cases are mentioned in which it was forbidden (Deut. xxii. 19, 29); and generally there was to be a legal document (xxiv. 1). It has been imagined that, the majority of the people being unable to write, the effect of this regulation would be to refer divorce practically to the Levites, the educated class of the nation. Much stress cannot be laid on this; but the mere fact of a bill or document being required would give time for deliberation; and possibly it might have been necessary to state therein the reason alleged for the act. Very light reasons, indeed, according to the rabbins, were sufficient; and the schools of Shammai and of Hillel were, in the time of our Saviour, at issue upon what was sufficient, the latter allowing divorce for the merest caprice. A divorced woman might marry with another man, but might not return to her first husband (2-4; Jer. iii. 1). The power of divorcement seems to have rested only with the husband; and Salome is noted as the first example of such a step by a wife (Joseph., Antiq., lib. xv. 7, § 10). There is no instance of divorce distinctly recorded in the Old Testament; but it was evidently common in the later periods of Hebrew history (Mal. ii. 15, 16). Occasion was furnished to our Lord, by the attempt made to embroil him with one of the rival schools of teachers above referred to, for repeating his distinct authoritative law respecting divorce (Matt. v. 32, xix. 9; Mark x. 11; Luke xvi. 18). Adultery alone is a sufficient justification of it. Whether the divorced parties are at liberty to contract (either or both) a fresh marriage is a vexed question, which need not be here discussed. But it may be added that St. Paul's direction (1 Cor. vii. 15) seems to apply to a community not thoroughly Christian, and where heathens and Christians were in the bond of wedlock; comp. Ezra x. 18, 19. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art.

'Ehescheidung'; Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 62, vol. ii. pp. 199-201.

DI'ZAHAB (of gold, or possessor of gold, i.e. a spot rich in gold). A place in the Arabian desert (Deut. i. 1). It has been identified with Dahab, a cape on the western shore of the gulf of Akabah.

DOCTOR (Luke ii. 46, v. 17; Acts v. 34). See LAWYER, TEACHER.

DO'CUS (1 Macc. xvi. 15). A fort near Jericho, where Simon Maccabeus and two of his sons were murdered.

DO'DAI (loving). One of David's captains (1 Chron. xxvii. 4). He is probably the same with Dodo, 1; and some have imagined that the words 'Eleazar the son of' have been omitted by an error of transcription.

DODA'NIM (leaders?). A name among the sons of Javan (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chron. i. 7). But in the margin and in some copies in the text we have Rodanim: this, however, is, most probably, an erroneous reading. Various opinions have been held as to the tribes which may be supposed to have hence deduced their origin. Some are in favour of the Dardani or Trojans, others of the Daunians in Italy. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Dodanim'; Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 245.

DODA'VAH (love of Jehovah). A man of Mareshah, whose son Eliezer rebuked Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 37).

DO'DO (amatory).—1. The father of one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 9; 1 Chron. xi. 12), probably the same with Dodai.—2. A Beth-lehemite, whose son was one of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 24; 1 Chron. xi. 26).

DO'EG (fearful). An Edomite, the chief of Saul's herdmen, 'detained before the Lord,' probably by a vow, or because it was the sabbath, when David fled to Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 7). Doeg afterwards falsely accused Ahimelech, the high priest, to Saul; and, when none of the king's guard would execute the ferocious sentence to slay the priests of the Lord, he fell upon them and killed eighty persons, sacking also their city (xxii. 9-19; Psal. lii., title).

DOG. This well-known animal is frequently mentioned in the bible. But, though it was employed to watch the flocks (Job xxx. 1), and to guard the house (Isai. lvi. 10), it was by no means regarded as we regard it, the companion and friend of man. Many of the various species of the dog were known to the Egyptians, and doubtless also to the Israelites. Some probably had never been domesticated and there were multitudes, half-wild, prowling about the fields and the towns, devouring offal and dead bodies, and disturbing the night with their howlings. This is the case at present in the east; troops of dogs abounding, recognized in a degree by food and water being occasionally given them, and, according to the instinct of their nature, guarding the places where they congregate, but deemed impure and unclean, just as among the ancient Hebrews. Hence we can understand the comparison of savage and cruel men to dogs (Psal. xxii. 16; Phil. iii. 2), and the contempt and dislike attached to the name of a dog (1 Sam. xxiv. 14; 2 Sam. iii. 8, ix. 8; Rev. xxii. 15). To the present day the word is applied by Jews to Gentiles, and by Mohammedans to Christians, as a term of reproach.

DOMINIONS (Col. i. 16). See ANGEL.

DOOR. This word is often used figuratively; an open door implying free access. Thus Christ calls himself 'the door' (John x. 7, 9; comp. 1 Cor. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. ii. 12; Col. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 8). See GATE, HOUSE.

DOPH'KAH (knocking). One of the stations in the march of the Israelites (Numb. xxxiii. 12, 13). Porter suggests that it might be at the junction of the Mukatteb road with Wady Feirân (Handb. for Syria, p. 22).

DOR (a dwelling). An ancient Canaanitish city (Josh. xi. 2, xii. 23). It was locally in the territory of Issachar or Asher, but was assigned to Manasseh (xvii. 11; comp. 1 Chron. vii. 29). The original inhabitants were not at once expelled (Judges i. 27); but we afterwards find the whole region one of the commissariat departments of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 11). It was of some consequence in the Maccabean times, being called Dora, and also under the Romans. It stood between Cæsarea and Ptolemais, and is now Tantûra, 'a sad and sickly hamlet of wretched huts, on a naked sea-beach, with a marshy flat between it and the base of the eastern hills' (Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 500).

DO'RA (1 Macc. xv. 11, 13, 25). See DOR.

DOR'CAS (gazelle, doe). (Acts ix. 36, 39) See TABITHA.

DORYMENES (1 Macc. iii. 38; 2 Macc. iv. 45).

DOSITH'EUS.—1 (Rest of Esth. xi. 1).—2 (2 Macc. xii. 19, 24). One of the officers of Judas Maccabeus.—3 (35).

DOTHA'IM (Judith iv. 6, vii. 3, 18, viii. 3) Identical with Dothan.

DO'THAN (two cisterns or wells). A place where Joseph found his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 17), afterwards mentioned as the residence of Elisha (2 Kings vi. 13). It was at the southern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, about twelve miles north of Samaria. Its site is now called Tell Dothaim or Dothan, near the great road for the caravans from Gilead to Egypt: comp. Gen. xxxvii. 25, 28.

DOVE. The natural family of birds called Columbidæ comprise pigeons, doves, and turtles. The Hebrew word yonah includes the various varieties of doves and pigeons found in Palestine, excepting turtle-doves, called tôr. We find the dove first noticed when Noah sent one from the ark (Gen. viii. 6-12); and there are very many allusions to this bird, for its beauty of plumage (Psal. lxxviii. 13), its simplicity (Hos. vii. 11), its harmlessness (Matt. x. 16), &c.; so that it even symbolizes the Holy Spirit, the meekness, purity, and splendour of righteousness (Matt. iii. 16). Doves are frequently domesticated in the east. Morier (Second Journey to Persia, p. 140) speaks of the pigeon-houses as 'large round towers, rather broader at the bottom than the top, crowned by conical spiracles through which the pigeons descend. Their interior resembles a honey-comb, pierced with a thousand holes, each of which forms a snug retreat for a nest. The extraordinary flights of pigeons which I have seen upon one of these buildings afford perhaps a good illustration for the passage in Isai. lx. 8.' The species most common in Syria are the stock-dove, the ring-dove, and the common pigeon in several varieties. The turtle-doves, Columba turtur, are invariably smaller than pigeons properly so called: they have generally a patch of coloured feathers on the neck, or a kind of black collar. Pigeons and turtle-doves might, alone of birds, be offered in sacrifice; full-grown turtle-doves in pairs, but only the young of pigeons (Lev. i. 14, v. 7, 11). They were the offering of the poorer classes; hence made by the Virgin (Luke ii. 24). And on this account it was that those who sold doves established themselves in the precincts of the temple (Matt. xxi. 12). It is said that the Assyrians and Babylonians bore a dove on their standards, in memorial of Semiramis, nourished by doves, when exposed after her birth (Diod. Sic., Hist., lib. ii. cap. 4). There may be an allusion to this in Jer. xxv. 38, the last clause being better translated 'the fierceness of the dove' i.e. the Assyrians.

DOVE'S DUNG. In the siege of Samaria, by Ben-hadad, a fourth part of a cab of dove's dung was sold for five shekels (2 Kings vi. 25). Bochart supposes chick-peas here meant; but Keil, without deciding the question, produces testimony that excrement has been used for food in famine, and that the literal meaning is not impossible (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. p. 397). Dr. Thomson considers dove's dung a coarse kind of bean (The Land and the Book, p. 470).

DRACH'MA (Luke xv. 8, 9, marg.). See MONEY.

DRAGON. There are two Hebrew words nearly alike which are rendered 'dragon' in our version; but they must be carefully distinguished. One, tannim, is a plural form: the animals intended dwell in deserts (Isai. xlii. 22, xxxiv. 13, xxxv. 7, xliii. 20); hence 'the place of dragons' means the desert in Psal. xlv. 20. They are described as sucking their young (Lam. iv. 3; where our version has 'sea-monsters' or 'sea-calves'); and as uttering a wailing cry (Job xxx. 28, 29; Mic. i. 8). Wild asses, too, are compared to them (Jer. xiv. 6). Now it is manifest that serpents cannot be intended: it has therefore been with reason supposed that jackals, noted for their wailing cry, and their frequenting desert places, are the tannim of scripture; or, at least, some animals akin to jackals. The other word is tannin: this seems to describe some monstrous creature whether of the land or the sea. Thus it is used for marine animals (Psal. cxlviii. 7, also in Gen. i. 21; Job vii. 12, where it is rendered 'whales'), and is sometimes coupled with Leviathan (Psal. lxxiv. 13, 14; Isai. xxvii. 1). It must mean land serpents in Deut. xxxii. 33; Psal. xci. 13; Jer. li. 34; and it is rendered 'serpent' in Exod. vii. 9, 10, 12. Not unfrequently it signifies the crocodile, as the emblem of the king of Egypt (Isai. li. 9; Ezek. xxix. 3; xxxii. 2). In the New Testament the word is symbolically used for Satan, 'that old serpent which is the devil,' or for some antichristian power stirred up by him against the church (Rev. xii. 3-17, xiii. 2, 4, 11, xvi. 13, xx. 2).

DRAGON-WELL. This seems to have been over-against the valley-gate (Neh. ii. 13). Robinson believes it identical with the pool or fountain of Gibon (Bibl. Res., vol. i. pp. 320, 347, 2nd edit.).

DRAM (1 Chron. xxix. 7; Ezra ii. 69, viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70-72). See DARIC, MONEY, WEIGHTS.

DRAWING WATER (1 Sam. vii. 6). The ceremony here mentioned was not prescribed by the law. Various opinions have been offered upon it. Doubtless it had a symbolical meaning. Some, as Kitto, are inclined to believe it emblematic of the abundance of tears the occasion required (Pict. Bible, note on 1 Sam. vii. 6). See WATER, WELL.

DREAM. The phenomena of dreams have given rise to innumerable speculations. It must suffice to say here, generally, that the perceptive and sensational powers retain very often their activity during sleep, while those of reflection and judgment are lost. Hence the disjointed character of dreams. Vivid impressions are made: the fancy revels as it were in a marvellous confusion of time, place, and circumstance, the strangeness of which the reason does not rectify or even perceive. Thus no surprise is felt at a conversation in a dream with one whom we know at the time to be dead. The play of the imagination is sometimes quite independent of the bodily organs of sense, and sometimes connected with them. Thus the sleeper's ear is not insensible to a loud noise, which, failing to awake him, raises in his mind the notion of a tumult or perhaps a battle, of which he says afterwards that he has dreamed. An apparently-long dream may occupy really but a very few moments. Indeed some have maintained, though perhaps not on sufficient grounds, that all dreaming is at the crisis, a second or two, when the faculties are just succumbing to the influence of slumber, or being aroused from it.

One mode of divine communication to the mind of man has been by dreams (Numb. xii. 6). While bodily organs were asleep and yet the perception active, God has sometimes spoken, occasionally in the way of direct message, occasionally by symbolic representation, for which afterwards an interpreter was needed. The prophetic dream must be distinguished from the prophetic vision. The latter might be in the night (Acts xviii. 3, xxiii. 11, xxvii. 23); but the senses were not wrapped up in sleep. It was by means of dreams that God communicated with those who were not of his covenant people (Gen. xx. 3-7, xxxi. 24, xl. 5, xli. 1-8; Judges vii. 13; Dan. ii. 1, iv. 5, 10-18; Matt. ii. 12, xxvii. 19). Often, indeed, it was by a dream that God spoke to his most favoured servants (Gen. xv. 12-16, xxxvii. 5-10; Matt. i. 20, 21); but a writer

In Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible suggests that dreams, as means of revelation, 'are almost always referred to the periods of their earliest and most imperfect knowledge of him,' indicating that such a kind of revelation might be expected to pass away in the fulness of time. He notices Daniel (Dan. ii. 19, vii. 1) as the only exception, and tries to account for it on the principle that it was to put to shame the falsehood of the Chaldean belief in prophetic dreams, and in the power of interpretation, and yet to bring out the truth latent therein. There may be some ground for what this writer says: still there are more exceptions than he notices. God communicated by a dream with Solomon, not only while he was young (1 Kings iii. 5-15), but also in his mature life (ix. 2-9). We can only say that the Lord acts herein according to his good pleasure. The false dreaming of a dreamer of dreams, it may be added, was censured and to be punished (Deut. xiii. 15).

DREDGE (Job xxiv. 6, marg.). In the text of this passage our version has 'corn.' Gesenius interprets 'mixed provender'; but Carey is inclined to accept a conjectural emendation, not altogether without authority, and translates: 'in fields not their own do they reap' (Job, pp. 109, 304).

DREGS (Psal. lxxv. 8; Isai. li. 17, 22). See WINE.

DRESS. In order to give anything like a satisfactory account of the dress of the Israelites, it will be well to note first of all the materials of which their clothes were made, and afterwards to explain the different names by which we find garments designated in scripture, comparing them as far as possible with the articles of dress now in use in Palestine and the neighbouring countries.

The first attempt at clothing, made by Adam and Eve at the fall, was by adapting fig-leaves (Gen. iii. 7). Shortly after they had 'coats of skins' (21). The hides of animals, with or without the fur or wool, have in all ages furnished a material for dress. In their rougher form they suited the rude inhabitants of uncivilized and cold regions; and, more carefully prepared, they supplied the requirements of luxury. Some of the ancient sculptures represent persons clothed in sheepskin coats; and, though such material was less suitable for the climate of Canaan, and was probably little used among the Hebrews, yet it is possible that Elijah's mantle may have been a hairy skin (1 Kings xix. 13, 19; 2 Kings i. 8, ii. 8, 13, 14; comp. Zech. xiii. 4): at all events such garments were used by those who fled from persecution (Heb. xi. 37). The sackcloth, too, of which we so frequently read, was made of hair (Rev. vi. 12); and John the Baptist's garment was of camel's hair (Matt. iii. 4). Of the common use of skins and fur among ourselves nothing need be said here. Other materials of dress were wool and linen (Lev. xiii. 47-49). Of linen the very finest kinds were in early use; as the existing linen integuments of Egyptian mummies show. Different words are used in the original for linen, distinguishing perhaps the raw material from the manufactured fabric, or denoting various degrees of fineness or quality: see LINEN. Linen and wool might be ordinarily used at pleasure separately; but it was a command of the Mosaic law, intended probably to carry out the idea, so frequently enforced, of simplicity and purity, that a garment 'of woollen and linen together' must not be worn (xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11). Cotton, moreover, was, we may suppose, more or less used: see COTTON. It is a common material of dress in the east now. Silk was not known till later times (Rev. xviii. 12): see SILK. As the articles of Hebrew clothing were for the most part loose and simple, their garments could have required little of what we call 'making.' This, so far as it was necessary, was perhaps generally done in a household. Thus the excellent housewife is described both as spinning and also as making clothing (Prov. xxxi. 19, 22, 24); and the charitable Tabitha is mentioned as making 'coats and garments' for the needy (Acts ix. 39).

There are several original words used in scripture for particular garments. It is unfortunate that our translators have frequently rendered them by inapplicable English terms, and that they have not preserved uniformity in their renderings, giving in different places the most different English words for a single one in Hebrew.

The khêthôneth, or khuttôneth, corresponding to the Greek chiton, was a loose inner garment or tunic, like the shirt with us. Originally, perhaps it was short and without sleeves; but afterwards it had sleeves and was larger. It was made of wool, cotton, or linen, of finer or coarser quality, according to the means of the wearer. Frequently this garment was worn alone, being confined by a girdle; and a person so dressed probably resembled the man here figured.

But any one wearing only the khêthôneth was commonly called naked in scripture. So Saul is said to have been naked, when he had stripped off his upper clothes (1 Sam. xix. 24); Isaiah, when he had laid aside his outer garment of sackcloth (Isai. xx. 2, 3); Peter, when he was without his

'fisher's coat' (John xxi. 7). And so the term 'naked' elsewhere describes a man who had but one garment, that is, a poor man (Job xxii. 6; Isai. lviii. 7).

The mē'il, generally of one piece (Josephus, Antiq., lib. iii. 7, § 4), was an upper tunic, larger than the khēthōmeth and worn over it. From this fact such passages as Matt. x. 10; Luke iii. 11, are illustrated: the 'two coats' were the upper and under tunics; and our Lord's injunction to his disciples, when he sent them forth, had peculiar force, since, as we gather from Josephus, travellers ordinarily used the two (Antiq., lib. xvii. 5, § 7). The word mē'il occurs very frequently, and is rendered in almost every conceivable mode by our translators, 'coat,' 'mantle,' 'robe' (e. g. Exod. xxxix. 22; 1 Sam. ii. 19, xv. 27, xviii. 4, xxiv. 4, 11, xxviii. 14; 1 Chron. xv. 27, Job i. 20, ii. 12). Perhaps the word may express generally any upper garment.

There was another loose under garment worn next the body, called sadin. It was probably always of linen. It is rendered by our translators 'sheet' or 'shirt' (Judges xiv. 12, 13), and might be the 'linen cloth,' sindēn, cast about the young man's naked body (Mark xiv. 51).

Then there was an outer large woollen garment, quadrangular, and, we may fancy, resembling a Scotch plaid. Several names were given to this, as begeg, khēsāth, lēvāsh, simlah, and others, perhaps expressing some differences of size and quality. Corresponding Greek terms were himation and stolē. Some of these words frequently imply clothes in general; and the begeg, lēvāsh and stolē appear to indicate the handsomer or state robes, or royal dress. Thus begeg occurs in Gen. xxvii. 15; 1 Kings xxii. 10, 30; lēvāsh in Esth. vi. 11, viii. 15; and stolē in Mark xii. 38, xvi. 5; Rev. vi. 11, vii. 9, 13. One or other of such words is occasionally used for a military cloak (2 Sam. xx. 8; Isai. ix. 5), priests' vestments (2 Kings x. 22), &c. This outer garment was sometimes wrapped round the body, or brought over the shoulder, with the ends hanging down, or passed over the head. It was this that in the corners or ends was to have 'a fringe,' and be bound with 'a ribband of blue' (Numb. xv. 38; Deut. xxii. 12). It was fastened round the waist by a girdle (2 Sam. xx. 8); and one or more of the folds of it were used for pockets, purses, or convenient receptacles for anything (2 Kings iv. 39; Prov. xvii. 23). The addereth was the 'mantle' worn by Elijah (1 Kings xix. 13, 19; 2 Kings ii. 8, 13, 14). It was probably a loose wide outer wrapper. The same word designates the king of Nineveh's robe (Jonah iii. 6). Several other names appear in the Talmud as given to garments afterwards in use.

We have scarcely any examples preserved of Israelitish garments, and those only on monuments where captives are thought to be Jews. But various illustrations can be given from Egypt and Assyria; and modern oriental dress may be taken to bear a great resemblance to that of the ancient Israelites. Over the inner garment or shirt is worn a kaftan or long gown of striped silk or cotton, with long sleeves. This is confined by the girdle, a coloured shawl, or piece of figured white muslin. Over the kaftan is the gibbeh, a coat of woollen cloth garment. Instead of this the bournos is sometimes worn, much resembling the abba, except that it has a hood. Another outer garment is the hyke, a woollen blanket, white or brown; or in summer a cotton sheet, blue or white, or both together. It is worn by putting one corner over the left shoulder in front: the rest of it goes round the body behind, is drawn under the right arm, and brought round so as to go again over the left shoulder, thus leaving the right arm disengaged. The figure no. 1 shows an Egyptian with the gibbeh over the kaftan, those nos. 2 and 3 an Egyptian and a Bedouin with the abba.

We now come to the dress of women. The khéthôneth or inner tunic was worn also by females. This is the word used for the garment of the princess Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 18), having probably very long sleeves. But it may be observed that the robes with which such ladies were clothed are in the same place called mê'il. There were several outer garments which seem to have been peculiar to females. Some of these were that called mitpakhath, rendered 'veil' (Ruth iii. 15) and 'wimple' (Isai. iii. 22): perhaps it was a kind of shawl; another, ma'atpaph, 'mantle' (ibid.); a third, izatph, the 'veil' which Rebekah put on (Gen. xxiv. 65) and in which Tamar, Judah's daughter-in-law, enveloped herself, concealing her face therewith (xxxviii. 14, 19): it has been supposed some gay or showy article of dress; another, radid, 'veil' (Sol. Song v. 7; Isai. iii. 23), probably resembling the izatph, a garment worn out of doors, a long fine veil, Dr. Saalschütz supposes, fastened to the back of the head, falling down over the shoulders and drawn at pleasure round the whole person (Arch. der Hebr., cap. iii. vol. 1. pp. 28, 29). The dresses of females were long and fringed or bordered, covering the feet; as it was considered a peculiar disgrace for the leg to be left bare (Isai. xlvi. 2).

The most noticeable description of female dress and ornaments is to be found in Isai. iii. 18-24. Explanations have been attempted of the different articles named, which will for the most part be found under their respective headings. But it may be well to enumerate them in order here, giving, as far as can be ascertained, the best meanings of each. They are as follows: 'tinkling ornaments about the feet,' anklets; 'cauls,' perhaps braids of hair enfolded in silken threads, to which pendants were attached, giving the whole the appearance of checker-work (see HEAD-DRESS); 'round tires like the moon,' ornaments of a crescent or moon-like shape, hung on the neck-chain; 'chains,' perhaps ear-drops; 'bracelets'; 'mufflers,' small thin veils; 'bonnets,' turbans, the conical part; 'ornaments of the legs,' step-chains; 'head-bands,' fillets for the hair, or possibly girdles; 'tablets,' smelling-bottles; 'ear-rings,' amulets worn in the ears; 'rings,' finger-rings; 'nose-jewels'; 'changeable suits of apparel,' robes for special occasions, changed or laid aside till so wanted again; 'mantles'; 'wimples,' shawls; 'crisping-pins,' reticules; 'glasses,' mirrors; 'fine linen,' linen shifts; 'hoods,' the folds of the turban: Henderson suggests ribands; 'veils'; 'girdles'; 'stomacher,' wide mantle or holiday-dress.

dressess in various parts of scripture. Thus the 'garment' (Esth. viii. 15), was the long flowing robe of an eastern monarch; and, in the account of the three confessors at Babylon (Dan. iii. 21), the 'coats' were drawers, now common in the east, the Ancient Persian Dress. Persepolis.

It is likely that there is no great difference between the ancient and modern female oriental dress, save that the Israelitish women, enjoying far more freedom than those in the east at present, did not use the hideous veil, which now is thought necessary to conceal the features from the gaze of men. The figures of the illustration above represent a modern Egyptian lady in private, and in her walking dress. Among the Syrian peasantry the women usually wear drawers, and a long loose gown of coarse blue linen, with an ornamental border of some other colour about the neck. On the head is a kind of turban, attached to which is a veil behind covering the neck, back, and bosom.

There are some references to foreign

'hosen' the inner tunic, the 'hats' the upper tunic, corresponding to the mē'il; the 'garments' the outer cloak or begeg (see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 457). Of Greek or Roman dress there is little mention. The 'robe' (Matt. xxvii. 28) was probably the military Roman cloak; that which St. Paul sent for (2 Tim. iv. 13), a thick travelling cloak; though some suppose it rather a cloak bag for books or other articles; and there are other conjectures.

The general colour of Hebrew garments would seem to have been white; several of the terms used for the materials implying whiteness. White was the symbol of joy (Eccles. ix. 8), also of purity (Rev. iii. 4, 5, iv. 4, vii. 9, 13, xix. 14). Hence, as stains would be easily perceptible, the necessity for the fuller (Mark ix. 3). Sometimes, however, scarlet and purple robes were worn (2 Sam. i. 24; Prov. xxxi. 22; Luke xvi. 19). Dresses of the richer hues were preferred more by the neighbouring nations than by the Hebrews; at least we find more frequent reference to them among the Midianites, the Persians, the Assyrians, the Phœnicians (Judges viii. 26; Esth. viii. 15; Ezek. xxiii. 6, 12, 15). It is a question whether variegated robes were in early use among the Israelites. The many-coloured garments occasionally spoken of (Gen. xxxvii. 3, 23; 2 Sam. xiii. 18), have been thought to be rather such as had long sleeves, and reached to the ankles. Perhaps variegated robes were those censured as being imported from abroad, the dress of foreign nations (Zeph. i. 8). Yet garments were frequently ornamented. Thus we find that some of those for the high priest were to be embroidered: see EMBROIDERY. Both coloured threads and gold threads seem to have been introduced into the fabric (Exod. xxviii. 6, 8, 15, xxxv. 25); also there were figures, as of the cherubim in the tabernacle curtains (xxvi. 1, 31). Such a figured garment, perhaps, was that which Achan appropriated (Josh. vii. 21: comp. Judges v. 30). We also read of gold brocade (Psal. xlv. 9, 13).

Great store of garments constituted a considerable part of a man's wealth; hence 'to have clothing' (Isai. iii. 6, 7) was expressive of being rich. Changes of raiment were not only required for personal luxury, but were necessary, according to oriental customs, as presents to friends, or those who were to be honoured (Gen. xlv. 22; 2 Kings v. 5, 22, 23): sometimes also at feasts the guests were provided with attire. Hence the fault of the man in our Lord's parable, who must have refused the offered wedding-garment (Matt. xxii. 11, 12). To bestow the best robe was a peculiar mark of affection (Luke xv. 22); and it was a great honour when a superior, as Jonathan who was a prince, stripped off his own garment and gave it to another. (1 Sam. xviii. 4). Kings had a very large quantity of vestments, and a special officer appointed to take charge of them (2 Kings x. 22); but private persons also were in the habit of accumulating dresses (Job xxvii. 16; Matt. vi. 19; James v. 2): for which, and for extravagance in dress, frequent reproofs were given by the prophets and apostles (e.g. Jer. iv. 30; 1 Tim. ii. 9; 1 Pet. iii. 3).

The garments of the Hebrews being loose and ample could be easily taken off, and used off-band for various purposes, as to receive or carry articles (Judges viii. 25; Ruth iii. 15), to serve for a saddle (Matt. xxi. 7), &c. An outer garment served also for bed-clothes; whence it was forbidden to retain it as a pledge after sun-set (Exod. xxii. 26, 27; Deut. xxiv. 12, 13; Ruth iii. 9).

Various symbolical actions were performed with the garments. Rendering them implied 'grief' (Gen. xxxvii. 29, 34; 2 Sam. i. 2; Job i. 20), fear (1 Kings xxi. 27; 2 Kings xxii. 11, 19), indignation (v. 7, xi. 14; Matt. xxvi. 65), or despair (Judges xi. 35; Esth. iv. 1). It was generally the outer garment that was rent, but sometimes the inner, and occasionally both. Sometimes also the rending of a garment was the figurative sign of a prophecy to be accomplished (1 Kings xi. 29-32). 'Shaking the garments, or shaking the dust off them, was a sign of renunciation (Acts xviii. 6); spreading them before a person, of loyalty and joyous reception (2 Kings ix. 13; Matt. xxi. 8); wrapping them round the head, of awe (1 Kings xix. 13), or of grief (2 Sam. xv. 30, xix. 4; Esth. vi. 12; Jer. xiv. 3, 4); casting them off, of excitement (Acts xxii. 23); laying hold of them, of supplication (1 Sam. xv. 27; Isai. iii. 6, iv. 1; Zech. viii. 23)' (Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 457, 458). It was necessary to gird up the flowing dress of the Israelites on occasion of any particular exertion; or to throw off the outer robe (1 Kings xviii. 46; 2 Kings iv. 29; Mark x. 50; John xiii. 4); hence the metaphorical expression of girding up the loins of the mind (Luke xii. 35; 1 Pet. i. 13). To cut the garments of any one short was a great insult (2 Sam. x. 4); as also to raise the skirts of a woman's clothing (Jer. xiii. 22, 26; Nah. iii. 5). See GIRDLE, HEAD-DRESS, SANDAL, SHOE.

DROMEDARY (1 Kings iv. 28; Esth. viii. 10; Isai. lx. 6; Jer. ii. 23). See CAMEL. But sometimes horses or mules may be meant.

DROPSY. This disease is mentioned but once (Luke xiv. 2). Our Lord healed a man afflicted with it on the sabbath-day; by an apt example showing the lawyers and Pharisees who watched him, that it was lawful to do good on the sabbath.

DROUGHT. The summer in Palestine is dry, little rain falling. Hence 'the drought of summer' (Psal. xxxii. 4). Long-continued dry weather parched up the country, and was a heavy judgment on the inhabitants (1 Kings xvii.; Isai. v. 6; Amos iv. 7; Hag. i. 11). See SEASONS.

DROWNING. See PUNISHMENT.

DRUNKENNESS. The first recorded instance of drunkenness is that of Noah (Gen. ix. 20, 21). This vice is strongly condemned in scripture (Prov. xxiii. 29-35; Rom. xiii. 13; Eph. v. 18, and frequently elsewhere). The word is used figuratively of persons oppressed with sorrow, animated with rage, and the like (e.g. Isai. xxix. 9, li. 21, lxiii. 6; Rev. xvii. 6); just as we use the word intoxicated—intoxicated with success.

DRUSIL/LA. The younger daughter of Herod Agrippa I., and sister of Agrippa II. She was first betrothed to Antiochus Epiphanes, prince of Commagene; but, as he refused to become a Jew, she was married to Azizus, prince of Emesa. Soon after, Felix, the Roman procurator, persuaded her, by means of the Cyprian sorcerer Simon, to leave her husband and marry him (Acts xxiv. 24). She bore him a son, Agrippa, who perished in the eruption of Vesuvius in the reign of Titus.

DUKE. The chiefs of Edom and the Horites are called 'dukes' (Gen. xxxvi. 15-43; 1 Chron. i. 51-54; comp. Exod. xv. 15; Josh. xiii. 21). Chiefs or princes would have been a preferable word.

DULCIMER. A musical instrument (Dan. iii. 5, 10, 15). The modern dulcimer is a box, triangular in shape, and containing a large number of strings varying in length, which are played on by small hammers. But this is not the instrument intended. The Chaldee word is sumphonia, which has been thought to be adopted from the Greek. The supposition, however, is by no means certain. Simphon (Buxtorf., Talm. Lez., p. 1504) is an air-pipe; so that very probably the instrument was a double pipe with a sack, resembling the bag-pipe. And this is confirmed by the fact that a similar instrument is still in use, called in Italy sampogna, and in Asia Minor sambonya.

DU'MAH (silence). One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chron. i. 30).

DU'MAH (id.). 1. A city in the mountainous district of Judah (Josh. xv. 52). It was probably a few miles south-west of Hebron; where there are some ruins still bearing the name.—2. A place in Arabia (Isai. xxi. 11), so called, it is likely, from the son of Ishmael.

whose descendants inhabited that locality. There is a town bearing the name of Doomat-el-Jendel, Dumah of the stones, which may be upon the site of the ancient city.

DUMB. Those speechless through natural infirmity or other cause (Psal. xxxix. 9; Ezek. iii. 26). Our Lord repeatedly cured the dumb, to the astonishment of the people who heard them proclaim the praises of God (Isai. xxxv. 6; Matt. ix. 32, 33; Mark vii. 32-37).

DUNG. There are two uses of dung referred to in scripture; for manure, and for fuel. Thus (Luke xiii. 8) holes were to be dug about the tree, and the manure put in, a mode still not unfrequently practised. In Ezek. iv. 12, 15 the use of dung as fuel is referred to. In Egypt it is mixed with straw, and formed into flat cakes, which are dried in the sun for this purpose. The dung of sacrifices was to be burnt outside the camp (Exod. xxix. 14); hence the threat (Mal. ii. 3) implies the most ignominious treatment. To sit on a dunghill marks misery the most extreme (1 Sam. ii. 8; Lam. iv. 5); and the making of a man's house a dung-heap (Ezra vi. 11; Dan. ii. 5) was to condemn him to the worst disgrace. The word as used by St. Paul (Phil. iii. 8) means any kind of refuse.

DUNG-GATE. One of the gates of Jerusalem (Neh. ii. 13, iii. 14), variously placed by different writers in the south-east or south-west wall of the city.

DUNGEON. See PRISON.

DUR'A (circle). The place where Nebuchadnezzar set up his golden image (Dan. iii. 1). Dr. Layard identifies it with Dur, below Tekrit, on the east bank of the Tigris; but Oppert would place it, with more probability, to the south-east of Babylon, near a mound called Dûair, where he found the pedestal of a colossal statue.

DUST. To lick the dust (Psal. lxxii. 9) signifies abject submission. To shake the dust from the feet (Matt. x. 14; Luke x. 11) implies the renouncing of all contact. The Pharisees entering Judea from a Gentile country were accustomed to shake the dust from their feet, as a renunciation of Gentile communion. But there was a further meaning. As Paul's shaking his garment (Acts xviii. 6), so shaking off the dust was a declaration of being free from the blood of those who rejected the gospel-message. The casting of dust on or against a person was a form of bitter execration (2 Sam. xvi. 13; Acts xxii. 23). See ASHES, MOURNING.

DYEING. The art of staining textile and other fabrics with permanent colours. It was known and practised to a considerable extent, and with much skill, by the ancient Egyptians, Phœnicians, Greeks, and Romans. In scripture we read of a scarlet thread as early as the birth of Zarah (Gen. xxxviii. 28, 30); and in the construction of the tabernacle we find artificial colouring (Exod. xxvi. 1, 14). There is no precise mention of dyers in the Old Testament; but the Israelites must have been acquainted with the art, and they have been supposed indebted to two of the neighbouring nations, to the Phœnicians for the dyes, and to the Egyptians for the mode of applying them. So far as we can judge from the account of the making of the tabernacle, the raw material was coloured and afterwards manufactured (xxxv. 25). And this was usual in Egypt. There is sufficient proof of the perfection to which the Egyptian artists attained. They employed various vegetable and mineral substances. They were acquainted with mordants, which serve, as a bond of union between the dye and the substance to be dyed, to fix the colour; fully knowing the difference between substantive colours, those which are at once permanent, and adjective, those which are fugitive without some auxiliary process. The processes of dyeing are represented in very minute detail on the Egyptian monuments; and specimens of their colouring, yet bright and fresh, though of a very early age, still exist, proving their familiarity with the necessary chemical knowledge. See Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, vol. iii. chap. ix. pp. 131-133, edit. 1847. An interesting notice connected with this subject occurs in the New Testament (Acts xvi. 14). Lydia was a seller of purple, either of the highly-valued dye procured from a shell-fish, Murex trunculus, or, more probably, of cloth coloured with it. The Lydian women were famous for cultivating this art; and inscriptions have been found at Thyatira relating to the guild of the dyers of that city.

E

EAGLE. An unclean bird of the family Falconidae, of the order Raptores, forbidden to the Hebrews for food (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12). A distinct species must have been meant in these passages; possibly the Aquila chrysaetos, or golden eagle, which is widely spread over Europe, Asia, North Africa, and North America, and was formerly common in these islands, but is now found only in the mountainous parts of Scotland and Ireland; or the Aquila heliaca or imperial eagle, very abundant in Syria, distinguished by a spot of white feathers on each shoulder.

But the Hebrew word neshet, 'eagle' in our translation, is a generic term, including the species just mentioned with probably some others, and also vultures, the cognate Arabic term nasr commonly meaning vulture. Thus the Vultur fulvus, which is bald on the head and neck, is very likely the bird meant in Mic. i. 16. It is true that eagles become more or less bald in the moulting season; but a reference to them would not so well express the meaning of the prophet, or illustrate the custom of shaving the head as a sign of mourning or calamity. Eagles are distinguished for their size—the larger kinds measuring three and a-half feet from the head to the tip of the tail, and expanding their wings seven or eight feet—their courage, and powers of flight and of vision. They choose their abode where there are woody mountains and lofty cliffs; a pair usually occupying a single district. They are voracious, and prey on antelopes, hares, lambs, &c. Allusion is made in scripture to their swiftness (Deut. xxviii. 49; 2 Sam. i. 23), their care of their young (Deut. xxxii. 11, 12), their moulting (Psal. ciii. 5), their spreading their wings when they have seized their prey to bear it aloft (Jer. xviii. 40), their placing their nests on high (xlix. 16), &c. The eagle was an Assyrian symbol (Hab. i. 8), as the Assyrian sculptures would seem to show: it was adopted also by the Persians (comp. Isai. xlvi. 11), and by the Romans; hence the significance of our Lord's expression (Matt. xxiv. 28; Luke xvii. 37), though here, doubtless, vultures were included. See VULTURE.

E'ANES (1 Esdr. ix. 21).

EAR, BORING THE. If a servant did not choose to avail himself of his right of freedom after seven years, he was to be brought before the judges, and have his ear bored through with an awl (Exod. xxi. 2-6; Deut. xv. 12-17). See SERVANTS.

EAR, EARED, EARING. These words occur in five places in the authorized version (Gen. xlv. 6; Exod. xxxiv. 21; Deut. xxi. 4; 1 Sam. viii. 12; Isai. xxx. 24). Ear is an old English term for plough; and the original is frequently so translated, e.g. Deut. xxii. 10. We preserve one of the derivatives in arable, anciently earable, Lat. arato, to plough. A trace of it also may perhaps be found in some other existing words.

EARNEST. Something given as a pledge for the performance of a specified bargain (Gen. xxxviii. 17). It must be observed that the earnest, properly speaking, is a part of the whole to be granted; what remains, therefore, and is expected, is similar in kind to that already received. Thus, the earnest of the Spirit (the Spirit itself being the earnest) is that measure of grace vouchsafed here which shall be augmented and ripened into the fulness of grace hereafter (2 Cor. i. 22, v. 5; Eph. i. 13, 14).

EAR-RING. Ear-rings were usually worn by the Hebrew women, and by the children of both sexes (Exod. xxxii. 2); whether by the men is questioned. Asiatic males certainly have, in both ancient and modern times, very commonly worn ear-rings; and the presumption is that the male Hebrews would observe the same custom. The original word generally translated 'ear-ring' is ambiguous, and may signify an ornament for the ear or for the nose. In Gen. xxxv. 4; Exod. xxxii. 2 it is so qualified as to mean clearly an ear-ring. In Gen. xxiv. 47; Prov. xi. 22; Isai. iii. 21; Ezek. xvi. 12 it is as clearly a nose-jewel; while in Judges viii. 24, 25; Job xlii. 11; Prov. xxv. 12; Hos. ii. 13 it is uncertain. Ear-rings were probably round; so another word, used in Numb. xxxi. 50; Ezek. xvi. 12, implies. Being of gold, and of a considerable size, they were valuable. And then they had often jewels or drops attached to them, as in Judges viii. 26, translated 'collars,' Isai. iii. 19, translated 'chains.' Sometimes they were regarded as amulets, serving a superstitious purpose; hence they were given up by Jacob's household (Gen. xxxv. 4). In Isai. iii. 20, the 'ear-rings' are properly amulets, and should be so translated. Probably the so-called 'ear-rings' of Job xlii. 11, were simply rings. Ring money was in use among the Egyptians.

EARTH. This word occurs in scripture in more than one sense. Sometimes it means ground, soil, or the matter of the earth, in Hebrew ādāmah (2 Kings 7. 17). Another word, eret, considered to imply low, is used for the world as distinguished from the heavens (Gen. i. 1), the dry land as opposed to the sea (10, 28), a country (xxi. 32, where our version has rightly 'land'), a field (xxiii. 15, where also 'land'). It occurs also in the phrase 'bowing to the earth' or 'the ground' (xxxiii. 3, xxxvii. 10, xlii. 6), and for the earthy particles or scoriae of metals (Psal. xii. 6), 'silver purified in a workshop as to the earth,' i. e. from its dross, as Gesenius renders. By a common figure of speech, 'the earth' is put for the inhabitants in Gen. xi. 1. In the New Testament especially, our translators have frequently retained the word 'earth' where Palestine is meant, and where 'land' would have been a preferable rendering (e. g. Matt. xxiii. 35; James v. 17).

For some notice of the work of creation, in which this planet was formed and prepared by the fingers of God for the habitation of man, and as the scene of his righteous dispensation of government, see CREATION.

The knowledge of the extent and distribution of the earth's surface can hardly have been much greater among the Hebrews than among other neighbouring contemporary peoples. They appear somewhat rudely to have reckoned four quarters; and, as a person was supposed to look to the east, the south was at his right hand, the north at his left, and the west behind him. These terms were used without much exact-ness: the Israelites, however, were not quite so ignorant as some learned men imagine, who accuse them of placing Assyria and Babylonia in the north (Jer. iii. 18, vi. 22); the fact being that Assyrian and Babylonian invasions came necessarily by way of the north into Judea. And, besides, they had in their sacred books that remarkable genealogy of nations (Gen. x.) which will always supply the most valuable materials for ethnographical research. Indications, too, there are, in various passages, of a secret wisdom, expressing itself in language, possibly not altogether comprehended by those who employed it, which foreshadowed future discovery; of which we have a notable instance in Job xxvi. 7. Generally speaking, we may suppose the geographical knowledge of the Israelites, acquired from the Egyptians, to have comprised some considerable part of Africa, along the northern coast of the Mediterranean and that of the Red sea, of Western Asia the Babylonian and Assyrian empires, while their intercourse and alliance with the Tyrians would make them acquainted with some parts of Europe and the more eastern regions of Asia, as far at least as India, or by possibility even China. And in later times, when the tribes were dispersed, and yet many of those who settled in distant countries were in the habit of resorting to Jerusalem at certain feasts, intelligent communication would be kept up between widely-separated points, and great facilities would be furnished for making the gospel known throughout the world.

The genealogy of nations (Gen. x.) has been referred to, and its value noticed, as showing how the earth was replenished with inhabitants after the deluge. It may be well to exhibit this to the eye of the reader. The following table is therefore given from Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 231-233, with a few variations. But it is necessary to premise that the names generally (many of them being in the plural form) are those of tribes, not of individuals, and that, whereas the same name appears sometimes in different positions, it must be understood that tribes of different stocks came to inhabit the same locality; in such cases, the country, rather than the inhabitants, would seem to be meant. And, further, from the migrations of various peoples, a single name may perhaps at different periods of time have passed from one place to another.

I. JAPHETH, representing the nations of the north and west:—

1. Gomer, the Chomari, Bactrians; more probably the Cimmerians.

1. Ashkenaz, Rhagæ in Great Media.

2. Riphath, Ripean mountain tribes.

3. Togarmah, inhabitants of the Tauric peninsula, or Crimea: some would have it Armenia.

ii. Magog, the Scythians.

iii. Madai, the Medes.

iv. Javan, the Ionians in Greece & maritime countries.

1. Elishah, Hellas, the Æolians.

2. Tarshish, Tartessus in Spain?

3. Kittim, Cyprus, in which was a town Citium.
4. Dodanim, the Dauntians in Italy; or the Dardani?
- v. Tubal, the Tibareni } in Northern
vi. Meslech, the Moschi } Armenia.
- vii. Tiras, inhabitants of the Taurus.
- II. HAM, including the nations of the south:—
- i. Cush, tribes of Southern Africa and Arabia.
1. Seba, Meroe in Ethiopia.
  2. Havilah, tribes near the Arabian Gulf.
  3. Sabtah, the Astabori, by the river Astaboras, or Tacazze.
  4. Raamah, Rhagma in Arabia.
    - a. Sheba, Saba in Yemen.
    - b. Dedan, tribes on the north-western coast of the Arabian Gulf, and also near the Persian Gulf, in which is the island Daden.
  5. Sabtecha, in Ethiopia, perhaps Nigritia.
  6. Babel, Babylon.
  7. Erech, Orchoe, the modern Wurka.
  8. Accad, Tell Nimroud, or Akkerkuf; but see ACCAD.
  9. Calneh, probably Niffer.
  10. Nineveh, Nineveh, on the Tigris.
  11. Rehoboth-Ir, perhaps on the eastern bank of the Euphrates, where some ruins still bear the name of Rahabeh.
  12. Calah, Kalah Sherghat.
  13. Resen, Nimroud, or, according to Rawlinson, Selamiyeh.
- ii. Mizraim, Egypt, Upper and Lower.
1. Ludim, Letus, or Letopolis, in Lower Egypt, or Mauritania?
  2. Ananim, perhaps Cynopolis, the town of Anubis in Middle Egypt? the Delta?
  3. Lehabim, the Libyans.
  4. Naphtuhim, Napata, in the north of the province of Meroe.
  5. Pathrusim, the people of Upper Egypt, or the Thebaid.
  6. Casluhim, Chemnis or Panopolis, the chief town of a district of the Thebaid.
    - a. Philistim, the Philistines.
  7. Caphtorim, Coptos, in the Upper Thebaid.
- iii. Phut, Phaïat, or Lybia, adjoining Egypt, or else Buto in the Delta.
- iv. Canaan, Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine.
1. Sidon, Sidon, in Phœnicia.
  2. Heth, the Hittites, near Hebron, Beth-el, &c.
  3. The Jebusite, a tribe in and around Jerusalem.
  4. The Amorite, on both sides of the Jordan.
  5. The Girsagite, in the centre of Palestine.
  6. The Hivite, in Shechem, and Gibeon, and near Hermon.
  7. The Arkite, Arca in Phœnicia, at the north-west foot of the Lebanon.
  8. The Sinite, Sinnas, near Arca.
  9. The Arvadite, the island Aradus,
- off the northern coast of Phœnicia.
10. The Zemarite, Simyra, on the Eleutherus.
  11. The Hamathite, Hamath, Epiphania on the Orontes.
- III. SHEM, representing the central parts of the ancient world:—
- i. Elam, Elymats, in Persia.
  - ii. Asshur, Assyria.
  - iii. Arphaxad, Arrapachitis, in North Assyria.
    - (1). Salah, his descendants spread on the eastern bank of the Tigris.
    - (2). Eber, and the sons of Eber, on the west of the Tigris and Euphrates.
      - a. Peleg, in various parts of Arabia Deserta?
      - b. Joktan, the reputed ancestor of the Arabian tribes: there is a town called Kahtan to the north of Nedsheran.
        1. Almodad, in Arabia Deserta.
        2. Sheleph, the Salapeni, in Yemen.
        3. Hazarmaveth, Hadramaut, in the south of Arabia.
        4. Jerah, the coast and mountain of the Moon, near Hadramaut.
        5. Hadoram, the Adramitæ, on the southern coast, adjoining Hadramaut.
        6. Uzal, Sanaa, the capital of Yemen.
        7. Diklah, the Minæi, near Mecca?
        8. Obal, the Avalites, near Babel-Mandeb?
        9. Abimael, the Mali in Arabia?
        10. Sheba, the Sabeans, in the eastern parts of Arabia.
        11. Ophir, on the southern or south-eastern coast of Arabia?
        12. Havilah, tribes near the Persian Gulf.
        13. Jobab, in Arabia Deserta.
- iv. Lud, the Lydians, originally living in the highlands of Armenia.
- v. Aram, Aramæa, including northern Mesopotamia, Syria, and districts of Arabia.
1. Uz, Ausitis, in the northern parts of Arabia Deserta.
  2. Hul, Golan, to the east of the Jordan, or possibly a district near lake Haleh.
  3. Gether, Geshur, on the Orontes?
  4. Mash, the tribes of Mount Masius, who emigrated to Asia Minor, the Mysians.

From these tribes, migrating and extending themselves in the course of ages, have the nations of the earth sprung.

EARTHQUAKE. Palestine has, in both ancient and modern times, been subjected to earthquakes; so that, as we might naturally expect, there are many allusions in scripture to these convulsions; particularly as they often occurred with some special interference of divine power, or accompanying some great work in which the finger of God was to be peculiarly manifest

Whether earthquakes, properly so called, were felt at the time of the destruction of Sodom (Gen. xix. 24-29), and at the descent of God on Sinai (Exod. xix. 16-19), is not perfectly clear: the probability is, especially in the former case, that they were. Then we have that which destroyed the men who joined in the rebellion of Korah (Num. xvi. 28-34), that which occurred when Jonathan stormed the garrison of the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv. 15), that when Elijah stood before the Lord in Horeb (1 Kings xix. 11, 12), that in the reign of Uzziah (Amos i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5), those at our Lord's crucifixion and resurrection (Matt. xxvii. 51-54, xxviii. 2). The dreadful phenomena which accompany earthquakes furnish the sacred writers with various illustrations, often when describing God's wonderful dealings, but also as shadowing forth political convulsions (Judges v. 4; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Psal. xviii. 7, xvi. 2; Isai. v. 25, xxiv. 20; Joel iii. 16; Habak. iii. 6, 10; Rev. vi. 12, xi. 13).

A terrible earthquake occurred in Syria Jan. 1, 1837. See, for a graphic description of it and its calamitous results, Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 276-280.

EAST. There are two Hebrew words used to express 'east,' sometimes placed together (as Exod. xxvii. 13). The more indefinite implies rising, i.e. of the sun, and seems sometimes to be almost synonymous with distant (Isai. xlvi. 11). The other term simply means in front. The Hebrews were considered, when describing the points of the compass, to be looking eastward. To say, therefore, that any place or object was before them was equivalent to saying that it was to the east (1 Kings xi. 7, compared with Zech. xiv. 4). 'The east' sometimes designates particular countries, as Mesopotamia, Chaldea, Arabia, lying eastward from Judea (Judges vi. 33, vii. 12); and with the article it is definitely the southern region of Arabia (Gen. x. 30). So in the New Testament, when the article is used, some definite locality is meant (Matt. ii. 2). See article in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible.

EASTER (probably from the Saxon oster, to rise). This word occurs in Acts xii. 4. In earlier English versions it was repeatedly used for the Greek original term that signified passover. At the last revision this was left the only place in which 'Easter' was retained.

EAST SEA (Numb. xxxiv. 3; Ezek. xlvi. 18; Joel ii. 20; Zech. xiv. 3, marg.). The Dead sea is to be understood. See SEA.

EAST WIND. See WIND.

EAT, EATING. See MEALS.

E'BAL (stone, stony).—1. A descendant of Seir, the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23).—2. One of the posterity of Eber (1 Chron. i. 22). In Gen. x. 28 he is called Obal.

E'BAL (id.). A mountain in Palestine on which the Israelites were to build an altar, and write thereon the words of the law. Half the tribes were to stand here and denounce the curses upon transgressors, while over-against them the other six were to stand on mount Gerizim and to bless the people (Deut. xi. 29, 30, xxvii.). This was accordingly done, as we read, by Joshua (Josh. viii. 30-35). Ebal and Gerizim are the two mountains bounding—Ebal on the north, Gerizim on the south—a beautiful valley, in which lies Shechem, the modern Nablous. It has, however, been objected that the words of Moses (Deut. xi. 30) describe the mountains as over-against Gilgal, and also that those at Shechem are too far apart for the voice to be sufficiently heard from one to the other. These objections are futile. The Canaanites are described as dwelling, and not the mountains situated, over-against Gilgal. They dwelt at Shechem too (Gen. xii. 6); but Israel first met them as soon as they had crossed the Jordan. Besides, our translation does not give the full force of the original. 'They lie beyond (or behind) the way toward the sunset' is De Wette's version, clearly pointing to the centre of the land. And that the voice is audible from one of the Shechem mountains to the other has been proved again and again by actual experiment; the valley at the eastern end being not more than 60 rods wide. Ebal is the higher summit, about 2,700 feet above the level of the sea, Gerizim 2,600; and, as Nablous is 1,672 feet above that level, Gerizim rises 928, Ebal 1,028, above the town. Some have said that Ebal is the more barren; but there seems really little difference between the two. There are remains of old buildings on Ebal; but they have not been fully examined. In regard to the law to be written on the stones there, it has been questioned whether it was the whole law: it was more probably the blessings and cursings before prescribed. It has also been questioned whether the words were cut into the stones: they were more likely written on the plaster with which the stones were coated. Dr. Thomson says that he has seen such writing on or in cement more than 2,000 years old, still perfectly distinct (The Land and the Book, pp. 470-472). See GERIZIM.

E'BED (slave, servant).—1. The father of Gaal, who assisted the Shechemites against Abimelech (Judges ix. 26, 28, 30, 31, 35).—2. One of the descendants of Adin, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra vii. 6).

E'BED-ME'LECH (slave of the king). An Ethiopian eunuch at the court of Zedekiah, king of Judah. By his intervention Jeremiah was delivered from the dungeon-pit. For this he was assured that his life should be spared at the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxviii. 7-13, xxxix. 15-18).

E'BEH (Job ix. 26, marg.). In the text we have 'swift ships'; 'ships of desire' being also suggested. Gesenius inclines to 'skiffs of reed,' i.e. the light boats made of the papyrus of the Nile. See Carey, The Book of Job, pp. 220, 442.

E'BEN-E'ZER (stone of help). A memorial stone set up by Samuel after a victory over the Philistines, in acknowledgment of the Lord's help in the success (1 Sam. iv. 1, v. 1, vii. 12). It is not strange that we find the name in the first two places applied to the spot before the event which gave name to it occurred. The books of Samuel were not composed contemporaneously with the circumstances they record. And a writer, living shortly after, would naturally describe the place by the name which had become so note-worthy.

E'BER (the region beyond? a passer over?)

1. The son of Salah, and great-grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 21, 24, 25, xi. 14, 17; Numb. xxiv. 24; 1 Chron. i. 18, 19, 25). He is called Heber in Luke iii. 35. From him is most probably derived the designation HEBREW, which see.—2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 12). 3. A priest in the time of Joiada (Neh. xii. 20).

There are two other names which ought to be rendered Eber, but which are given Heber (1 Chron. v. 13, viii. 22); our version not being careful to distinguish names quite different in the original. See HEBER.

EBI'ASAPH (father of gathering). A Levite (1 Chron. vi. 23, 37, ix. 19, xxvi. 1, marg.). See ABIASAPH, ASAPH.

EBONY. A dark, hard, stone-like (this idea the original word conveys) wood, Diospyros ebenum, mentioned as brought with ivory by the men of Dedan to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 15). The best quality comes from southern India and Ceylon. It is the centre of the tree which furnishes the very black wood which is so much prized in ornamental carvings and inlayings, and takes so fine a polish. Such central logs may be obtained from trees in Ceylon, two feet in diameter and from ten to fifteen in length. There are other inferior species of the genus Diospyros; and probably some so-called ebony is procured from trees of a different genus.

EBRO'NAH (passage, sc. of the sea). One of the stations of the Israelites, nearly at the head of the Elanitic gulf (Numb. xxxiii. 34, 35)—en-Nukb? Possibly there may have been a ford there.

ECA'NUS (2 Esdr. xiv. 24).

ECBAT'ANA, or ECBAT'ANE. A Median city, mentioned only once in scripture (Ezra vi. 2, marg., Achmetha being given in the text); and even there it has been doubted whether the word does not rather mean in a coffer, treasury, or record-chest.

There were two cities which bore the name of Ecbatana. These are sometimes confounded; and, indeed, as they were no very great distance apart, it is by no means easy to decide which of them an author refers to. One was the capital of Northern Media, or Media Atropatene; and it has been identified by Sir H. Rawlinson with the ruins of Takht-i-Suleiman. According to Herodotus (lib. i. capp. 98, 99, 153) this city was built by Deioeces, and surrounded by seven circles of walls, each inner circle respectively over-topping the one next to it externally, and differently coloured. Sir H. Rawlinson believes this to be a true description, and thinks that the purpose was to place the city under the protection of the seven planets; their symbolical colours being used perhaps in the order black, white, orange, blue, scarlet, silver, gold. This Ecbatana it probably was, being said to be the capital of Cyrus, where the roll spoken of by Ezra was found. And it is mentioned in some of the apocryphal books (Tob. iii. 7; Judith i. 1-4). It continued an important place down to the Mogul conquests in the 13th century after Christ, and sunk ultimately, two or three centuries later, into complete ruin. The present remains are upon and around a conical hill about 150 feet above the contiguous plain. One wall, just at the brow of this hill, may be readily traced, enclosing an oval space of 800 yards by 400. There are no vestiges of other encircling walls; but they might very well have been ranged on the slope of the hill on all sides but the eastern, which abuts upon a hilly tract of ground, and is but little elevated above the adjacent country: see account in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 472. The other Ecbatana (2 Macc. ix. 3) was the metropolis of Media Magna, on the northern side of the mountain Orontes, now Elwend. It was the summer residence of the Persian kings from Darius Hystaspis, and later of the Parthian monarchs. It is still an important city, containing from 20,000 to 30,000 inhabitants, called Hamadan. The Jews point out the tombs of Esther and Mordecai in the neighbourhood.

ECCLESIAS'TES. The name of this book, Ecclesiastes, is derived from the Septuagint version; it being a Greek word signifying a preacher, one who addresses a public assembly. The Hebrew title Kohleth conveys nearly the same idea, intended to intimate preaching wisdom.

The book has generally been ascribed to Solomon as the author; and it is only of late years that any serious doubts have been entertained upon the question. Some of the Jewish rabbis, it is true, advanced different opinions; and Grotius in more modern times denied the Solomonic authorship. The general belief, however, was little disturbed by these exceptions. It is allowed on all hands that the writer represents himself as Solomon. He does not, indeed, take the very name of the wise king; but, when he says 'I, the preacher, was king over Israel in Jerusalem' (i. 12), he sufficiently indicates whom he means, there being after Solomon no king who reigned over Israel in Jerusalem. The question, therefore, is whether Solomon literally was the writer, or whether his name is assumed as personifying that high intellectual faculty which specially distinguished the gifted son of David. There are many examples in literature of some eminent man being chosen, into whose mouth sentiments agreeing with his known character are placed. The Cato Major of Cicero is an instance; and the parables of scripture are of a similar cast. Why then, it is asked, why should not an inspired writer, commissioned to teach moral truth, have allowed himself the same licence, in order to give a form and clothing to the instructions he had to convey? Different answers will undoubtedly be given to such a question. Modern critics are not content with rejecting the Solomonic authorship: they would carry down the date of Ecclesiastes to a very low period indeed, after the captivity, to the Persian, nay, to the Macedonian, rule. Many of the arguments they urge are of little weight. Thus Bleek, enumerating the reasons on which he forms his opinion, says that the reference to many books (xii. 12) is a proof of the lateness of the composition (Einleitung in das A. T., pp. 642, 643). And yet early Israelitish history shows that books were not few; witness the annalists of the various reigns, from Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, downwards (1 Chron. xxix. 29); witness more especially the wise king himself, who was a voluminous writer (1 Kings iv. 32, 33); in whose mouth, therefore, the observation in question would be specially appropriate. Bleek argues, further, that passages like iv. 13-16, v. 8, viii. 1, &c., x. 4, 16, &c., 20, describe a time when the people were oppressed, when they paid a reluctant obedience to kings not of their own hereditary stock, but of a foreign rule. One is tempted to ask, Well, and what then? Granted that it was so, what does the fact prove against the Solomonic authorship? Can any man of the most ordinary habits of reflection imagine that Solomon had no eyes but for what happened in Palestine? Was he quite ignorant of revolutions occurring elsewhere in his days? And why should he not refer to these? The fact is that we know there was much oppression, even by Solomon himself (1 Kings xii. 4); of which he might become in his later days painfully conscious; that there were troubles stirred up against him (xi. 23-40); and that there was a change of dynasty in Egypt during his reign, which from his Egyptian alliance must have forced itself particularly upon Solomon's notice, the sovereign whose daughter he married being believed to be of the 21st dynasty, under which the country seems to have fallen into anarchy, while Shishak (Sheshonk) was of the 22nd.

These facts will sufficiently account for the expressions in Ecclesiastes, without any necessity for travelling down to Persian or Macedonian misrule. Passing from arguments like those just noticed, we may look at some which it is fair to say are of greater weight. Thus the preacher says (i. 16, ii. 9) that he attained to greater wisdom and more magnificence than all that were in Jerusalem before him. Now Jerusalem had become an Israelitish town not very long before Solomon's time; and David was the only king there that preceded him. To say the least, the assertion in Solomon's mouth is somewhat perplexing. Then the diction of the book is taken to prove its late composition. It must be acknowledged that in this respect Ecclesiastes differs from Proverbs. And, as both books are didactic, the language, if from the same pen, might be expected to be similar. Critics have collected examples of late Aramaisms, philosophical expressions, abstract forms, &c., which they think conclusive against the Solomonic authorship. But it is fair to put against them the judgment of Professor Preston, whose Hebrew learning well qualifies him to speak: 'The Chaldee, Arabic, and Hebrew, having all emanated from the same source, it is manifestly impossible to pronounce with certainty on a word occurring in so confessedly an ancient book as Ecclesiastes, that it belongs to either of the two former, and not to the latter; because, the further we trace these dialects back, the greater will be their similarity; and even supposing some of the words . . . to be foreign and Aramaic . . . Solomon may easily have acquired them through his constant intercourse with the neighbouring nations, or from his foreign wives, especially as this book was written late in life' (The Hebrew Text and a Latin Version of the Book of Solomon called Ecclesiastes, pp. 7, 8). It must be added that there are peculiar phrases and expressions occurring in Ecclesiastes which are also found in Proverbs: by some this fact will be taken to prove an identity of authorship; while others will see only a careful study by the writer of Ecclesiastes of Solomon's acknowledged works. Decision in this matter is not easy: if the evidence be thought convincing against the Solomonic authorship, it must be held equally conclusive against an earlier date than the exile; but by no means can this book be placed later than the time of Nehemiah or Malachi.

The scope of Ecclesiastes is indicated in i. 2, and xii. 13. It is an enquiry into the chief good of man, and is distributed by Keil into four discourses (Einleitung, § 131). The first (i., ii.), exhibits (1) the vanity of theoretical wisdom directed to the knowledge of things, and (2) the nothingness of practical wisdom which aims at enjoying life; the result being that man with all his striving can attain no lasting good. The second (iii.-v.), following the idea thrown out in ii. 21, 26, begins with a description (iii. 1-8) of man's entire dependence on a higher unchangeable providence, and, in reply to the question of the chief good, shows that there can be no higher (iii. 9-22) than self-enjoyment and benevolence; which however (iv.) it is not easy to attain; still one must, in the fear of God and a conscientious fulfilment of duty, seek trustingly and contentedly to use earthly goods. In the third discourse (vi. 1-viii. 15), is shown the vanity of grasping riches (vi.); practical wisdom is then described (vii. 1-22), and the mode of attaining it indicated, spite of the incongruities of earthly life (vii. 23-viii. 15). The last (viii. 16-xii. 7), further discusses these incongruities, lays down rules for the conduct of a happy life, which may please God, and brings us to the conclusion of the whole (xii. 8-14), that a future judgment will clear up all present uncertainties. This is the great object the author intends to develop: he argues at first on lower principles, to show their imperfection, not prematurely expressing the whole truth (comp. iii. 21), but reserving that till he has raised by degrees the view to that high tribunal where every wrong will be redressed. The style of this book is loose and unconnected, with little poetical character. It was one of the megilloth read, we are told, by the Jews at the feast of tabernacles. Professor Preston's Text, &c., of Ecclesiastes has been already referred to: some devotional commentaries as those by Buchanan, Eccles. its Meaning and its Lessons, and by Bridges, Expos. of the Book of Eccles., may also be usefully consulted.

of Jesus the son of Sirach,' which has often been regarded and cited as a genuine work of Solomon. Solomon's, however, it cannot be; for the division of the kingdom after his death, and the sins of Israel deservedly punished by the captivity, are recorded in xlvii. 13-25 (comp. xlviii. 1.); nor was it ever admitted into the Jewish canon.

The notices in the book itself and in the prologues show that it was the work of one Jesus, a Palestinian Jew, who was thoroughly conversant with the Old Testament, and had collected many wise maxims, some perhaps ascribed to Solomon, all which he blended with observations of his own, in order to produce an ethical treatise which might be useful to his countrymen. This work was not finished when he died and left it to his son, from whom it passed to his son, another Jesus. This last reduced it to order, translated, and published it.

There seems nothing to throw serious doubt upon this statement; and then the question is to ascertain the date of the composition. Now, there are two indications of this; but each involves a difficulty. For the grandson says he came into Egypt in the reign of Euergetes; but there were two of the Ptolemies who bore that title. And (l. 1) Simon the high priest, son of Onias, is commended; but there were two high priests named Simon, and the father of each was Onias. The first of these Simons (about 310-290 B.C.) was the more distinguished man, and bore the appellation of the Just. It is the most reasonable supposition that he is the person commended; and then, as it would seem that Jesus the grandson visited Egypt in the thirty-eighth year of the reigning king, and this can apply only to Ptolemy Physcon, the second Euergetes, who, including his usurpation, reigned 169-117 B.C., we may suppose that the translation was made about 130, B.C. and the original compilation perhaps 180. B.C. This conclusion will still be most probable, if we believe that the 38th year spoken of was that of the writer's age, not of a king's reign. The Talmud mentions a Ben Sira, the author of a moral book which it classes under one division of sacred writings. Some of the sentiments there quoted from Ben Sira resemble passages in Ecclesiasticus; but, though by this name doubtless Sirach is meant, no satisfactory conclusion can hence be reached. The alphabetical collections of proverbs still extant ascribed to Ben Sira are probably later compilations; and perhaps we may most reasonably suppose that the reputation of the son of Sirach caused various maxims of wisdom resembling his genuine production to be attributed to him. The original language of Ecclesiasticus was either Hebrew, or the Syro-Chaldaic vernacular of Palestine. Certain mistakes in the Greek text sufficiently prove this. This original, possibly seen by Jerome, has disappeared; but three ancient versions (besides the Greek) have been printed, in Syriac, Arabic, and Latin; and there appears to be another Syriac translation, yet only in manuscript, at Milan. The Greek text is not in a very satisfactory state: the readings and arrangement differ in various MSS. and editions.

Ecclesiasticus is a book of very considerable value, frequently cited in the church by honourable names, and, though not a part of canonical scripture, yet occasionally read in the service of the English church. There is a general resemblance in it to the book of Proverbs; from which, as well as other sources, the compiler borrowed. But topics are sometimes discussed more connectedly and at greater length than by Solomon. There is little definite order, however, in the work; nor would it be easy to arrange its contents. The best division is that which distinguishes three parts: I. A commendation of wisdom, with precepts of general application for the regulation of life (l. xliii.); II. An encomium on the patriarchs, prophets, and other Hebrew worthies (xliv. 1.); III. A prayer and exhortation to the pursuit of wisdom (l.) The style is poetical; and there is much acuteness of thought and beauty of expression in this work. Reference to it has been supposed in the New Testament (e.g. James i. 19 to v. 10, 11; Luke xii. 19 to xl. 18, 19); but such reference is more than doubtful. The fathers, from the end of the second century, repeatedly cite it.

ECLIPSE. An eclipse of the sun is occasioned by the interposition of the moon between the sun and the earth: it occurs therefore at new moon. So that the darkness at our Lord's crucifixion, the passover being just after full moon, was not occasioned by an eclipse of the sun. An eclipse of the moon is when the earth is interposed between the sun and moon, and the latter, being then of course at the full, passes through the earth's shadow. The sun when totally eclipsed appears black: the moon in total eclipse does not disappear, but assumes a reddish colour; hence the propriety of the scripture language: 'The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood' (Joel ii. 31; Acts ii. 20; Rev. vi. 12), to signify civil and ecclesiastical changes. Eclipses are not distinctly mentioned in the bible; but allusions are not unfrequently made to them by the prophets. And it has been calculated that eclipses actually occurred about the times when such allusions were made. Thus, Archbishop Ussher, Annals, 3213 A.M., notes three great eclipses of the sun: June 24, 791 B.C. at pentecost; Nov. 8, 771 B.C. at the feast of tabernacles; May 5, 770 B.C. at the feast of unleavened bread, and connects Amos viii. 8, 9, 10 therewith, Amos prophesying about that time. Hitzig speaks of a total eclipse visible at Jerusalem shortly after noon in the days of the same prophet, Feb. 9, 784 B.C. There was also an eclipse June 5, 716 B.C. in the time of Isaiah and Micah (see Isai. xlii. 10; Mic. iii. 6); and one Sept. 30, 610 B.C. (see Jer. xv. 9; Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8).

ED (witness). This word is introduced into the authorized version as the name of the altar erected by the trans-Jordanic tribes: it appears in some MSS., but is not in the received Hebrew text (Josh. xxii. 34); the exact translation of which is

'And they named the altar, because it is a witness between us that Jehovah is the God' (comp. xxiv. 27).

EDAR (flock). The tower of Edar was a place where Jacob encamped after leaving Beth-lehem (Gen. xxxv. 21). It is said by Jerome to have been about a mile from that town. In Mic. iv. 8, marg., a tower of Edar is also mentioned; but that, being in apposition with 'the strong-hold of the daughter of Zion,' must have been close upon Jerusalem.

EDD'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 26). A corrupted form of Jeziah (Ezra x. 25).

E'DEN (pleasantness). A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 12, xxxi. 15).

E'DEN (id.).—1. The region in which the garden of paradise was planted (Gen. ii. 8).

Few questions have more perplexed critics and commentators than the determination of the site of Eden; so that almost every quarter of the world known or unknown has had its advocates, anxious to prove it the happy land. It would be neither instructive nor interesting to enumerate the various conjectures which have been hazarded; and indeed such an enumeration, to be complete, would require a very considerable space. The curious reader may find enough to satisfy him in the 'tabular view' of 'principal opinions' furnished by Dr. Kalisch (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 100-102). When learned men have so widely differed it becomes an individual to express himself with diffidence. No dogmatic opinion therefore will be here propounded; and only some general considerations urged which may probably tend to a definite notion not inconsistent with the truth of the scripture record.

The sacred penman is giving a literal account. Had he been writing allegorically, he would hardly, in so compendious a statement, have descended to such particular details, mentioning not only certain rivers, but the countries through which they flowed, and the very productions of the lands they watered. Neither would he have introduced among imaginary streams one so well known, and conveying so thoroughly the notion of fact, as the Euphrates. The theory, moreover, is unsatisfactory, which supposes Eden to have had its great features altered by the deluge so as to be now unrecognizable. The historian speaks in the present tense. He does not describe a region lying perhaps when he wrote at the bottom of the ocean, but one which men might, by the marks he gave them, then identify.

Let us see, then, what the narrative may fairly be taken to mean. Doubtless a popular notion is that there was a single stream which watered the garden of paradise, and that, being divided perhaps just after it left it, it formed four great rivers, the names and descriptions of which are thereupon precisely given. And then, as it is supposed that four rivers may be found—possibly the Phasis, the Araxes, the Tigris, and the Euphrates—rising no great distance from each other, it is concluded either that there is a communication between them, or that originally they flowed from a common source, though now, by some change in the earth's surface, they have their independent streams. It is easy then to imagine some place on the watershed near the heads of these rivers as the spot where paradise was. But this notion will hardly satisfy the conditions of the case. Great rivers may divide near their mouths; but we do not usually find, perhaps not a single example precisely in point can be produced of one fountain breaking out into several great streams, which flow so far as to be justly said to 'compass' extended territories. Besides, the four 'heads,' into which it is stated the 'river' first spoken of 'was parted,' are afterwards denominated rivers themselves, as if each were independent (Gen. ii. 10-14). There would seem, therefore, no impropriety in assuming with some eminent critics that the word translated 'river' (10), is used collectively, implying that, not one alone, but various streams rising in Eden contributed, all or some of them, to water paradise, and that of these streams, divided off not by physical separation, but rather by geographical apportionment, four capital ones are specified, all of which, though travelling far, and watering great countries, were really rivers of Eden. For it is nowhere asserted, or even hinted, that Eden was a small district. Rather we may believe it some vast region, of which the garden, carefully said to be in the eastern part of it, was a very inconsiderable portion. If this be allowed, much of the difficulty disappears. It is substantially the view of Bush, argued with much good sense (Notes on Genesis, pp. 44-47). 'The historian's meaning is simply,' he says, 'that from the beginning four considerable rivers . . . flowed over or along the pleasant land of Eden, by means of which, or some of their branches, the enclosure of the garden was watered and fertilized . . . that afterwards . . . geographical distinctions arose, the extensive tract was divided into minor portions, and the rivers were "parted," that is, assigned in geographical reckoning to particular districts or territories embraced in the larger original whole. These . . . were afterwards known by the names which he proceeds to specify, and by the designation of which he would help the reader to understand the true topography of the primitive Eden. As to a physical partition or division of a single river into different channels or courses, it is by no means necessarily implied in the import of the original word. It is the proper term for expressing that kind of conventional allotment which we understand by it.'

In endeavouring to identify the four rivers, the great difficulty is in respect to Pison, and Gihon. The former is said to compass the land of Havilah. Where, then, was Havilah, the land of gold so good, of bdellium and the onyx-stone? It would seem that there was a region thus named inhabited by descendants of both Ham and Shem (Gen. x. 7, 29); and in one of these passages Havilah is in juxta-position with Ophir. The region, therefore, must have been far to the east, lying perhaps upon the Persian gulf, and extending, it may be, to India. If so, there could be nothing unreasonable in imagining that the great river Indus is intended. The Gihon compasses the land of Ethiopia or Cush; by the term Cush the districts on both sides the Arabian gulf or Red sea being understood. It has therefore been supposed that the Gihon is the Nile. And, as this supposition is adopted by Bush, he conceives, since Hiddekel is confessedly the Tigris, and Euphrates sufficiently known, that Eden must have comprehended 'the fairest portion of Asia, besides a part of Africa . . . Cabul, Persia, Armenia, Kurdistan, Syria, Arabia, Abyssinia, and Egypt.'

From this conclusion of course many will dissent. And, indeed, it seems little likely that the Nile should this once be designated by the name of Gihon, a name not again recurring, though repeatedly again in the Pentateuch the Nile is mentioned or referred to. Besides, the extent ascribed to Eden seems too vast, comprehending well-nigh all the countries that could be said to be known at the time when the Pentateuch was written. And many will be disposed to object to the interpretation given of the parting of the 'river' first mentioned into the 'four heads.' In truth, as above admitted, no certainty can at present be arrived at; and the identification of Eden will probably continue one of those interesting problems to which ingenious men will apply themselves without producing conviction in any minds but their own.

Still, as before said, there are some conclusions which we may reach. That the Tigris and the Euphrates flowed through Eden cannot be doubted. We must look for it, therefore, in contiguity to those streams. And that it was far larger than the happy garden it is reasonable to believe. For Adam and Eve, when expelled from the garden, were not ejected from Eden. We may fairly gather that Cain was the first of the sons of men who left Eden; and he went farther east (iv. 16). But the great extension of Eden from the spot he quitted must have been westward; as it was in the east of Eden that the garden was planted. Large limits seem therefore required. And perhaps the research of future explorers may, within those limits, discover rivers, in some part of their course at least, answering better the descriptions of Pison and Gihon than any at present fixed on. Around Mesopotamia and Babylonia the circle must be drawn. But the attempt to identify any one particular spot with the garden of paradise seems absolutely hopeless. The two must not be, as they so frequently are, confounded. Eden may be known; while the garden is for ever hidden. See PARADISE.

2. A region, the children or inhabitants of which had been subdued by the Assyrians (2 Kings xix. 12; Isai. xxxvii. 12). It is also mentioned as having had commercial intercourse with Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 23). There are various conjectures as to this locality. Some would identify it with M'adon in the modern province of Diarbekr; others suppose it Aden (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Eden, 3'). But, as we find it connected with Gozan and Haran, we may fairly believe that it was somewhere in the north-western part of Mesopotamia. See TELASSAR.

3. A place near Damascus, perhaps a country residence of the king (Amos i. 5). See BETH-EDEN. Dr. Robinson imagines that the ruined village Jasieh el-Kadimeh, on the eastern slope of Anti-libanus, north of Damascus, may mark its site (Bibl. Res. in Pal., vol. iii., app. p. 171).

E'DER (stock). A Levite descended from Merari (1 Chron. xxiii. 23, xxiv. 30).

E'DER (id.). A city in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 21). Wilton is inclined to identify it with Arad, supposing that there has been a transposition of the letters (The Negeb, pp. 73, 74).

E'DES (1 Esdr. ix. 35). A corrupted form of Jadan (Ezra x. 43).

ED'NA (Tob. vii. 2, 8, 14, 16, viii. 12, x. 12, xi. 1). The wife of Raguel.

E'DOM (red). This name appears to have been adopted from the sale by Esau of his birth-right to Jacob for a mess of pottage. It was the red pottage, made of lentiles, which Esau in his hungry haste desired; and such a sacrifice for such a paltry benefit might well infuse a name upon him (Gen. xxv. 29-34). The appellation was the more appropriate because of the hairy redness of Esau at his birth (25). But it does not seem to have been used as a personal name: it was rather that of his descendants, and of the country in which they settled. Esau had married three wives, and had by them five sons born in the land of Canaan (xxxvi. 4, 5). He had become aware that Canaan was to be the possession of the posterity of his brother Jacob, who, as now having the birth-right, would have the largest share of his father Isaac's wealth. Esau accordingly removed to mount Seir (6-8). We may suppose this removal to have taken place before Jacob's flight into Mesopotamia. It is not so likely that Esau would have migrated during his brother's absence; and that he was occupying Seir before Jacob's return is distinctly asserted (xxxii. 3, xxxiv. 14-16). The reasonable conclusion is that, in the years succeeding Esau's marriages, before Jacob's offence of fraudulently obtaining the blessing had been committed, and the two were friends, he had willingly retired (See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 595, 596).

The country where Esau settled was mount Seir, a rugged tract, east of the great valley of the Arabah; see SEIR. It was previously inhabited by the Horites (Gen. xiv. 6, xxxvi. 20). But when the Edomites multiplied they extirpated the Horites and appropriated their country (Deut. ii. 4, 8, 12). Wilton, however, distinguishes between Seir and mount Seir, and believes that the Seir in which Esau dwelt at Jacob's return was the country afterwards occupied by the Amalekites, still in its eastern part called es-Serr (The Negeb, p. 73, note 1).

And the Edomites soon did multiply. The five sons expanded into thirteen families (Gen. xxxvi. 9-14). And then these families became clans, one (that of Korah) being reckoned twice over, or in two divisions, because, though Korah was the son of one of Esau's wives, some of his descendants probably intermarried with the descendants of another (15-19). There was yet another step. Kings reigned in Edom long before the promise was fulfilled to Jacob that kings should come out of his loins (xxxv. 11). Eight Edomitish monarchs are enumerated (xxxvi. 31-39), besides the dukedoms or powerful tribes (40-43), from which, as Kalisch imagines, the kings might be elected. It is clear that Edom had grown into a populous and warlike state.

The Israelites were forbidden to appropriate any of the Edomitish territory (Deut. ii. 5). Consequently they asked permission to pass through it, promising to do no injury. This, however, the king refused (Numb. xx. 14-21); so that, instead of crossing immediately through Edom, Israel had to go round along its frontier (xxi. 4; Judges xi. 18). No friendly intercourse, therefore, was to be expected between the nations. Still we have not any account of actual hostilities till the time of Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 47). David subdued Edom; but so determined was the resistance that Joab had to keep military possession of the country for many months, destroying all the males bearing, or able to bear, arms (see Kell, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. 1, p. 195); and strong garrisons were placed among the conquered people to secure their obedience (2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 Kings xi. 15, 16; 1 Chron. xviii. 19, 20; Psal. lx. 8, 9). Thus was the prediction fulfilled that 'the elder' should 'serve the younger' (Gen. xxv. 23). By this conquest David obtained possession of Elath and Ezion-geber, opening a way for the commerce by the Red sea, which Solomon afterwards so remarkably extended (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. viii. 17). The kings of Judah, after the disruption of the monarchy, held Edom a long time, governing it by a vassal prince (1 Kings xxii. 47; 2 Kings iii. 9). In the reign of Joash, however, the Edomites revolted, and, after a desperate struggle, established their independence (viii. 20-22; 2 Chron. xxi. 8-10); accomplishing another divine prediction (Gen. xxvii. 40). Amaziah invaded Edom and took Sela (2 Kings xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12); and Uzziah recovered Elath (2 Kings xiv. 22; 2 Chron. xxvi. 2); but this place was no long time after occupied by the Syrians, or possibly by the Edomites (2 Kings xvi. 6); and the Edomites were strong enough to invade Judah in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 17). We then hear little of Edom till the time of the Babylonian conquests, when this country, too, it was foretold, should fall under the great king (Jer. xxvii. 3, xlix. 7-22; Ezek. xxxv. 2-15; Amos i. 11, 12). And it is marked as a great aggravation of Edom's guilt and punishment, that they rejoiced at and helped forward the calamity of Judah (Obad.). The enmity of the two nations survived the captivity. The Edomites had occupied the southern part of Palestine, including Hebron; but they were defeated by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mace. v. 3, 65), and ultimately subjected by John Hyrcanus, who compelled the people to conform to the Mosaic law (Joseph, Antiq., lib. xii. 8, § 6, xiii. 9, § 1). They were afterwards governed by Jewish prefects; one of whom, an Idumean by birth, Antipater, obtained the authority over Judea (47 B.C.); and his son was Herod the Great (See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Edom, Edomiter').

The country of Edom lay (as already observed), to the east of the Arabah. It consists of limestone hills, with red and variegated sandstone cliffs and ridges, marked by that peculiar ruddy tinge of colour so consonant with the name of Edom. In the recesses of these hills are deep and fertile glens (Gen. xxvii. 39), presenting a remarkable contrast to the bare and parched plains east and west (see Porter in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 488). This was Edom Proper, about 100 miles long by 20 broad, divided from Moab by the brook Zered (Deut. ii. 13, 14, 18); but the region south of Palestine, formerly the country of the Amalekites (now the desert of et-Tih), was afterwards occupied by Edom. And, while Edom Proper became the seat of the Nabatheans, and was called Arabia, the western portion, under the Greek name Idumea, comprehended the country between the Arabah and the Mediterranean, south of Palestine, and even including portions of the last-named country. The ancient capital of Edom was Bozrah, afterwards Sela, or Petra, which subsequently was the city of the Nabatheans, to whom the extraordinary remains now existing belong. These were first explored in modern times by Burckhardt, 1812 A.D. See SELA. The traffic and caravan-trade through this country was large.

EDOMITES (Gen. xxxvi. 9, 43; 1 Kings xi. 14; 2 Kings viii. 21; 1 Chron. xviii. 12, 13; 2 Chron. xxi. 8, 9, 10, xxv. 19). See EDOM.

ED'REI (strong)—1. One of the chief cities in Bashan, the residence of Og, at or near which occurred the decisive battle in which Og was destroyed. Edrei, with the surrounding territory, was allotted to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Numb. xxi. 33; Deut. i. 4, iii. 10; Josh. xii. 4, xiii. 31). It has been supposed to be on the site of the modern Der'a; but Mr. Porter more satisfactorily identifies it with Edra, on a rocky promontory at the south-west corner of the Lejah (Trachonitis). There are extensive ruins here: the present inhabitants, about 50 families, occupy some of the massive old houses. It was an episcopal see in early Christian times.—2. A town in Naphtali, near to Kedesh (Josh. xix. 17). Mr. Porter would identify it with some ruins on a rocky hill two miles south of Kedesh.

EDUCATION. We have little definite information in scripture as to the formal modes of educating children; but we must conclude, from the attainments which we find incidentally noticed of various individuals, that there had been preparatory training. Thus the inscribing of the precepts of the law upon the posts of the houses and on the gates (Deut. vi. 9, xi. 20) pre-supposes a general competent knowledge of reading and writing. There were persons acquainted with the mensuration of land (Josh. xviii. 8, 9), and scribes or penmen are noted as belonging to the tribe of Zebulun (Judges v. 14). Solomon was not only a didactic author and a poet, but had large acquaintance with natural history and physics (1 Kings iv. 32, 33). The state officers of Hezekiah were skilled in a foreign language (2 Kings xviii. 26). If some of these were rare attainments, the facts nevertheless show that there must have been some system of education. The Mosaic law especially charged parents with the instruction of their children. Boys are said to have remained till their fifth year in the women's apartments; afterwards they came under the father's care; and injunctions were given that they should be instructed in the law of the Lord (Deut. iv. 9, vi. 6, 7, xi. 19). Of such instruction by parents we may be said to have specimens in Prov. i-vii., xxxi. 1-9. The ritual observances, too, were to awaken the curiosity of young people, and were to be carefully explained (Exod. xii. 26, 27; Josh. iv. 6, 7; Psal. lxxviii. 5, 6). And, though all this had particular reference to moral and religious training, yet it is manifest that the lessons so given must have embraced at least the rudiments of general knowledge: they must have included, besides reading and writing, the facts of the national history, and the relation of Israel to other peoples. It may perhaps be gathered from the account of Samuel that children were sometimes entrusted to a priest for training (1 Sam. i. 24, 25), or that there was a kind of seminary attached to the tabernacle. Afterwards there were the schools of the prophets, in which regular instruction was imparted (see PROPHETS), and which had very likely a more extended character than only the receiving of those who were expected to exercise the prophetic office. Something similar to these might have been the institutions for training in sacred song (1 Chron. xv. 22, xxv. 7, 8). In later times regular schools were established; and we are told that the rabbis sat on raised seats, and the scholars on benches below, or on the ground (comp. Luke ii. 46). The regulations of scholastic discipline after the destruction of Jerusalem are laid down in the Talmud. Females were trained in 'needle-work,' and in the duties of managing a household (Prov. xxxi. 10-31). It may be added that every one was expected to teach his son a trade, for honest subsistence. Thus, though St. Paul was an accomplished scholar, he had learned also a manual art (Acts xviii. 3, xxii. 3).

EGG. A few notices of eggs occur in scripture. Thus there is a prohibition against taking the dam when sitting on eggs or young ones in a bird's nest (Deut. xxii. 6). Again, an egg is contrasted with a scorpion (Luke xi. 12); and some have fancied an allusion to a species of scorpion about the size of an egg. But Dr. Thomson says, 'There is no imaginable likeness between an egg and the ordinary black scorpion of this country, neither in colour nor size, nor, when the tail is extended, in shape. But old writers speak of a white scorpion; and such a one, with the tail folded up as in specimens of fossil trilobites, would not look unlike a small egg' (The Land and the Book, p. 246).

EG'LAH (a heifer). One of David's wives, so specially called, who bore him his sixth son, Ithream, in Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chron. iii. 3). The Jews had an improbable tradition that Eglah was Michal.

EGLA'IM (two pools). A place in Moab, probably in a remote district (Isai. xv. 8). It has been thought—but it is only conjecture—to be identical with En-eglain.

EG'LOM (pertaining to a calf). A king of Moab, who gathered the Ammonites and Amalekites, and, crossing the Jordan, made the children of Israel tributary for eight-year years. He is said to have 'possessed the city of palm-trees,' if not upon, yet near to, the site of the ancient destroyed city of Jericho. Here Ehud brought him a present, and, after quitting him, returned and slew him. Ehud escaped, summoned the people of Israel, and attacked the Moabites, confounded no doubt at the loss of their king. The fords of the Jordan were seized; and 10,000 men of Moab, attempting to pass to their own country, were killed there. After this exploit the land had rest eighty years (Judges iii. 12-30). The account given by Josephus differs in several particulars from that of the sacred writer. See EHUD.

EG'LOM (id.). A city of the Amorites, no great distance from Lachish, taken and destroyed by Joshua (Josh. x. 3-5, 34, 35, xii. 12). It was afterwards allotted to Judah (xv. 39). It appears to have stood in the low country, on the southern part of the great plain. It is identified with the modern 'Ajlan, little more than a mound covered with debris and pottery, ten miles north-east from Gaza.

EGYPT. This celebrated country usually bears the name of Mizraim in the Hebrew scriptures. Mizraim is a dual form, and therefore aptly designates a land comprising two great districts, Upper and Lower Egypt, the Delta, and the higher valley of the Nile. According to Gesenius, the meaning of Mizraim is borders or limits; but it is questionable whether this is here the true signification. The modern Arabic name for the country is Misr; and this is said to imply red or brown mud. The name in hieroglyphics is Kem, similar to the Coptic appellations now used by the natives, chams, chemi, keme, 'black'; and a cognate Arabic word means black mud. It cannot fail to strike the reader that Egypt is also called 'the land of Ham' (Psal. lxxviii. 51, cv. 23, 27); Ham signifying warm, perhaps also browned. We may with much probability conclude that the names given to this country imply dark, sufficiently appropriate to its black alluvial soil, striking enough after the crops have been gathered in, before the Nile has again covered the surface with its fertilizing flood.

Egypt extends from the Mediterranean to the cataracts of Assouan, 'from Migdol to Syene' (Ezek. xxix. 10, xxx. 6, marg.), and on the east and west it is bounded by the Arabian and Libyan deserts. Upper Egypt, however, seems really to have comprised nothing more than the narrow winding valley of the Nile, limited on each side by limestone and sandstone hills, which near the river are of no great height, but which, in the eastern desert, are much more lofty; some peaks, as the Jebel-Gharib, rising to 6000 feet. But Lower Egypt is for the most part a vast fertile plain. The Nile divides into several streams, forming a great triangle, of which the limits were the ancient Canopic and Pelusiac branches. The others were the Bolbitine, originally a canal, still open at Rosetta; the Sebenitic, lost in the lake Bourlos; the Phatnitic or Bucolic, open at Damietta, being the eastern extremity of the modern Delta; the Mendesian; and the Tanitic or Saitic. The last two, with the Pelusiac, are absorbed by an extensive lagoon. In early times cultivation reached farther eastward: thus there was a fruitful valley along the canal of the Red sea. This, the Wady et-Tumeylat, is now a sandy wilderness. In the Libyan desert are some verdant oases; but several of these are properly beyond the limits of Egypt. That now called the Faioum was the ancient Arsinoite nome, the whole country being divided into a number of districts, or, as they are called from a Greek word, nomes. They are said to have been at first 36: they were afterwards increased. The superficial extent of Egypt has been variously estimated. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 495, fixes the area 'which the Nile either does or can water and fertilize,' at '9,582 square geographical miles.' But in the National Cyclopædia we are told that 'the whole of the cultivable land of Egypt, in the valley of the Nile and the Delta, is reckoned at 17,000 square miles.'

The climate of Egypt is considered salubrious during a large part of the year, especially that of the upper province, though the heat there is greater. The khamzin, a hot wind which blows from the south in April and May, is oppressive and unwholesome. In summer there are northerly breezes. But the dryness of the atmosphere causes a vast quantity of dust, peculiarly annoying and injurious to the sight. Ophthalmia, therefore, is common; and cutaneous disorders prevail. Pestilence has frequently ravaged Egypt; and in modern times it has been afflicted with that appropriately designated the plague.

The Nile is the great fertilizer of Egypt; and were it not for the periodical inundations of the river, as scarcely any rain ever falls, the country would speedily become an arid waste. The rising of the Nile is therefore earnestly looked for, and diligently watched; for, if it does not come up to a certain standard, disastrous results may be apprehended. The flood begins in June, about the summer solstice, and increases to September. All the lowlands are then overflowed; and the Delta presents the appearance of a great lake or marsh, interspersed with innumerable islands; the towns, villages, and groves being just above the water. The welcome stream is carried everywhere by canals; and then, after the inundation has continued stationary for a few days, it gradually passes away; and the fields are left, generally by the end of November, covered with its deposit, a rich brown slime, ready for the labours of the husbandman. The seed is then sown; and in three or four months' time the harvest begins. The cultivation of such a country is of course peculiar. Artificial irrigation is necessary; and the more if the rise of the Nile has been below its proper average, and during the periods between the inundations. A kind of machine is now in use called shaduf; it consists of an upright beam or beams, to which is attached a pole, with a bucket suspended from one end, and a weight from the other. By this means the raising of the bucket when filled with water is made easy to the labourer. Some artificial system of conveying water, possibly by canals, is alluded to by Moses, 'the land of Egypt . . . where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs' (Deut. xi. 10). The produce of the land was various, and—though severe famines have not unfrequently occurred—in general abundant. Egypt was a great corn-producing country, and was considered one of the granaries of Rome. Some of its productions are alluded to in the murmurings of the Israelites in the wilderness, 'the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic' (Numb. xi. 5). And it is said now to yield wheat, barley, beans, peas, lentiles, vetches, lupines, clover, flax, cole-seed, lettuce, hemp, cummin, coriander, poppy, tobacco, water-melons, and cucumbers; while of the summer-plants, for which the artificial watering above spoken of is needed, doorah, Indian corn, onions, millet, hennah, sugar-cane, cotton, coffee, indigo, and madder may be mentioned. Rice also is cultivated; and there are various fruits, such as dates, olives, grapes, figs, sycamore figs, mulberries, pomegranates, and bananas. Fish abounded in the Nile and the lakes in the northern parts of the country, and they are still a common article of food. By these lakes and along the river the papyrus or byblos, of the stalks of which boats were made, while its leaves produced paper, formerly grew. It is now scarcely known; and the reeds have well-nigh perished (Isai. xix. 6, 7).

Egypt was a pastoral country, perhaps more so than at present: we read in scripture of horses, asses, camels, oxen, and sheep (Gen. xii. 16, xli. 2, 3; Exod. ix. 3). Horses, in Solomon's time, were exported from Egypt into Palestine and Syria (1 Kings x. 28, 29). The breed must therefore have been in request. Asses are still numerous and excellent: dogs, as usually in Mohammedan lands, are accounted unclean, but are sometimes kept for watching houses: very few swine are in the country. Camels, singularly enough, are not mentioned in ancient inscriptions, or depicted on the ancient monuments, though there can be no doubt that they were known in Egypt in very early times. In the bordering deserts there are various kinds of wild animals. Some of those formerly not uncommon are now found no more. Thus, the hippopotamus was anciently an inhabitant of the lower Nile: now it is not seen lower down than in Nubia. Similarly with respect to reptiles. The crocodile, once so common as to be the symbol of the Pharaoh (Ezek. xxix. 3, 4), is now rare in the lower reaches of the Nile, though frequently met with higher up the stream. Frogs are abundant, and annoying by their incessant croaking in the autumn: snakes and scorpions, too, are plentiful, the more venomous kinds in the desert. Fleas and lice are noted by all travelers as a perfect plague; and locusts appear from time to time: bats cluster in the ancient tombs and temples; and there are various kinds of birds, none, however, remarkable for beauty of plumage: kites and vultures are perhaps as common as any. Divers and waders frequent the islands and sand-banks; but the once-sacred ibis has disappeared.

Egypt was peopled by the descendants of Ham (Gen. x. 6, 13, 14). 'A consideration, says Kalisch, 'of the physiognomy and bodily structure of the Egyptians, proves that they are . . . derived from the Hamites . . . It is not necessary to consider all Egyptians as negroes, black in complexion, and curly-haired: this is contradicted by their mummies and their portraits: the former exhibit mostly the osteology, the latter the physiognomy, of an Asiatic or Arabic race: they show the skull and the facial outline of the Caucasians: they are, indeed, darker in complexion—brown with a tinge of red, and great varieties in the shades: they have often a fuller lip, and a more elongated almond-shaped eye, half-shut and languishing, and turned up at the outer angles, sedate and placid countenances, round and soft features, and large mouths . . . Blumenbach . . . describes the general or national type as possessing a peculiarly-turgid habit, flabby cheeks, a short chin, large prominent eyes, and a plump form of body. The present Copts exhibit further a certain approximation to the negro' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 263). 'The Egyptian ladies,' the same writer observes, 'were not remarkable either for grace or beauty: they are pictured by ancient writers with no flattering colours; nor do the monuments permit any romantic illusion on this point: if rotundity and corpulency, thick and up-turned lips, contracted brows, long oval eyes, and well-developed and prominent ears, are attractions, the Egyptian ladies belong to the fairest of their sex' (p. 632).

With regard to the institutions and habits of the Egyptians, their public and their private life may be briefly touched on.

The government was monarchical; but it was not an absolute despotism. The sovereign had great power; which he sometimes delegated to his minister (Gen. xli. 40): he took the advice of his councillors (37, 38): he degraded and put to death high officers of his court, but not, it seems, without examination (xl. 1-3, 20-22): he did not venture to interfere with the franchises of the priestly caste, even when the rest of the people were brought into a feudal subjection (xlvi. 20-26)—these facts show that the monarch's authority, at least at one period, was under certain limitations. The laws of the country, there is reason to believe, were equitable and well-enforced. In the monuments persons are represented as unarmed: it has been inferred, with much probability, that there was security for life and property. The Egyptians must have been a warlike nation: we hear of conquests effected by their arms; and, till the predominance of the great eastern monarchies, Egyptian influence would seem to have extended over neighbouring countries. The most powerful arm of their military force was probably their war-chariots: thus we find it specially noted that a vast chariot-force pursued the departing Israelites (Exod. xiv. 6, 7, 23, 25): so, in later times, the Egyptian chariots are specially mentioned (2 Chron. xii. 3, xiv. 9); and it may well be thought that the 'horsemen' were those who fought in the chariots.

The religion of Egypt was an organized system. There was, as has been said, a priestly caste; and these formed the highest aristocracy: they were great landed proprietors; they controlled the sovereign; and the statues of the chief priests, like those of the Pharaohs, were set up in the temples. The high priest had vast power; his office being hereditary. Of their gods there were three orders. The first comprised eight great deities:—1. Amun, king of gods; 2. Maut, the mother of all, or maternal principle; 3. Noum, variously called Nou, Noub, Nef, and Knef, the ram-headed deity; 4. Sâte, his consort; 5. Pthah, creative power; 6. Neith, corresponding to the classical Minerva; 7. Khem, the generative principle and universal nature; 8. Pasht, corresponding to Diana. Then followed the second order of twelve gods:—1. Re, Ra, or Phrah, the sun; 2. Seb (Saturn); 3. Netpe (Rhea); 4. Khons; 5. Anouké (Vesta); 6. Atmou, Atmoo, Atum, or Atm, darkness; 7. Moui; 8. Tafne; 9. Thoth, intellect (Mercury); 10. Savak, the crocodile-headed god; 11. Seneb, Soyen, or Elleithya; 12. Mandoo, Mandou, or Munt (Mars). The third order were the children of Seb and Netpe; they were, 1. Osiris; 2. Aroeris, the elder Horus; 3. Seth or Typhon, the dark destroying principle; 4. Isis; 5. Nephtys. There were many other deities, of which the most noted was Thmei, Mei, or Ma, truth and justice (Rawlinson's Herod., Append. book ii. chap. iii. vol. ii. pp. 288-300). But there is some uncertainty as to the arrangement of these gods. Döllinger places Ra at the head of all (The Gentile and the Jew, book vi. 5, vol. i. pp. 436-488). Different deities were specially honoured in different cities; and there were triads, generally a god with his wife and their child, who had peculiar respect paid them in certain places.

Indeed the gods of the first and second orders were but partially venerated. Herodotus (lib. ii. 42) tells us that they were not everywhere worshipped alike. It was the third order, Osiris and others connected with him, that were nationally recognized. And there is a legendary story, not only current among the Egyptians, but adopted and embellished by classical writers. The five children of Netpe were born on five successive days, the intercalary days to be added to the year of 360. Osiris became the husband of Isis; and the younger Horus was their son. Typhon was the husband of Nephtys, and had by her Anubis. Osiris was king of Egypt. He promoted civilization among his people, and taught them agriculture. Then he travelled, leaving Isis regent. He traversed Ethiopia, where he gathered a band of satyrs, Arabia, and Europe, everywhere in-culcating the worship of the (inferior) gods and the knowledge of a Supreme Being. While he was absent, Typhon raised a rebellion, murdered Osiris on his return, and scattered the pieces of his mangled body. Isis was at Coptos when she received the intelligence. She cut off her hair and put on mourning. Then raising an army she defeated the rebels, recovered the remains of Osiris, which she enclosed in images, and distributed to the various temples. 'Being the author of agriculture, the ox was selected as his sacred animal: Isis being added to the deities at her death, the cow became her appropriate emblem. Anubis, who assisted in the search for Osiris, was made an attendant genius, and is represented with the head of a jackal, which the Greeks mistook for a dog. Typhon was condemned to perpetual abomination, as the spirit of evil, in the shapes of an ass and a hippopotamus. Horus, the son of Osiris and Isis, succeeded to the throne, being the last god that reigned in Egypt. He also, according to some accounts, was prematurely cut to pieces. Here was a myth, affording abundant scope for the piety, the patriotism, and the personal sympathies of the people. . . . It described the deeds and sufferings of a primitive monarch. . . . the boast of the nation, and a martyr in its cause. The popular ballads identified him with Menes, the founder of the first monarchy, who was torn in pieces by a hippopotamus: they joined with affectionate solicitude in the sorrowful quest of the widowed queen, and were never wearied of the annual rejoicing to commemorate the day when Osiris was found. Conceptions of this kind, mingling with the elder mythologies, naturally overpowered their weak and passionless abstractions. With the exceptions of Amun and Kneph, the gods of the first and second orders seem all to have passed into the Osirian group, and been supplanted by it. Osiris is figured as Pthah, and as Khem; Isis as Neith. . . . They were called the great god and goddess of Egypt: their son Horus assumed the hawk's head of Ra, the sun. . . . In effect, while the older forms were honoured with an occasional rite, Isis and Osiris were emphatically—to foreigners almost exclusively—the objects of Egyptian worship. Their rites exercised a powerful influence, not only over the native mind, but on the robust intellects of Greece and Rome. The mysteries of Isis became a tale of wonder throughout the civilized world. They gained admittance, in spite of repeated prohibitions, into imperial Rome: the legions carried her shrine to distant Britain, and planted it outside their encampments in every quarter of the empire. A temple to Serapis, the later form of Osiris, stood near the ancient Eboracum, on a site now covered by the York railway-station' (Trevor's Ancient Egypt, 1863, pp. 150-152). Besides the deities hitherto mentioned, the Egyptians worshipped animals, and even inanimate things, believing that the gods dwelt in them (comp. Exod. viii. 26). For, according to their pantheistic philosophy, they conceived not of God as a person, but as ar-essence, diffused throughout nature, and manifested in infinite variety of form. Animate and inanimate things were parts of one nature, of which the entirety was believed to be God. So that any one might be a manifestation of the divine presence.

The Egyptians are said to have believed the immortality of the soul, and future rewards and punishments. But it was not the scripture truth that they held. They imagined that there was a transmigration of the soul, which, when it parted from the human body, passed in a kind of circuit through inferior animals and birds, till eventually it resumed the form of man. The judgment of the dead is delineated in papyri enclosed with mummies. The spirit stands before Osiris, and professes innocence of various crimes. Then before forty-two avenging judges it utters again protestations of innocence; and afterwards the heart is weighed. There are representations of blessedness, in which worldly occupations are still pursued, and of torments to which the wicked are subjected. It may be added that the rite of circumcision was anciently practised in this country.

In their private life the position of the women was remarkable. There was free intercourse between the sexes; men and women being entertained in the same apartment, seated in mixed groups. They were a pleasure-loving convivial people. The monuments show them amusing themselves with music and dancing, regaled with wine and other refreshments, and presented with garlands and perfumes. The women were immoral: concubinage was allowed; the concubines ranking as inferior wives. They had various games; and the higher orders were pleased to superintend their fields and gardens, and diverted themselves with hunting and fishing. The classes were distinct, though there was no regular system of castes: the lowest were put to tend cattle. They were acquainted with letters; and no nation was ever so fond of writing down everythings as they were. But nothing was of more importance than their funeral rites. See EMBALMING. They had made great progress in the arts: their architecture, sculpture, and paintings, speak for them to the present day. Of course they had boats for the navigation of the Nile. They excelled in manufactures, in weaving, pottery, &c. They cultivated more recondite sciences; as the mention of their magicians shows (Gen. xli. 8; Exod. vii. 11, 22). All these particulars, which here can be touched only in the briefest manner, are illustrated in detail in Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians; to which the reader must be referred for full information. So many ancient monuments exist in Egypt in which the habits of the people are depicted, and so much has been learned from the inscriptions which have been deciphered, that, though in regard to their history we yet want more certain knowledge, the daily life of this remarkable people is brought out to us with vivid distinctness. Some illustrations are given to show the domestic manners, in the preparations for the table, and the amusements of the people. We see thus what the country was in which the Israelites had to serve a hard apprenticeship; how they were brought in contact with and must have learned many arts there; and what was the Egyptian idolatry, with which they were tainted, and were subsequently prone to fall into. We cannot, however, doubt that the sojourn of Israel in Egypt was ordained for good, and that God employed this sharp discipline for his church's welfare. The Judge of all the earth, in this, as in everything else, did right.

The language of ancient Egypt is preserved in the monumental inscriptions, which are found in the hieroglyphic and in the demotic or enchorial, i.e. the popular mode, of writing. It was for a long time thought impossible to decipher these; but the first step was taken by means of the famous Rosetta stone, now in the British Museum, on which were three copies of, as it was presumed, the same inscription. One of these was in Greek. A key was therefore obtained to the others; and scholars have since done much to unravel the ancient records. The present Coptic, of which there are various dialects, as the Memphitic, the Thebaic, and the Bashmuric, bears, it is thought, a near relation to the old language.

In Egyptian history much uncertainty still remains; nor can we feel ourselves on perfectly-sure ground till we come down to the Shishak who plundered Jerusalem in the reign of Rehoboam. An extravagant antiquity has by some been claimed for the monarchy; and dynasties, first of gods and then of men, have been said to reign in long succession through thousands of years. Thus, adding together the rule of the gods, demi-gods, and manes, i.e. ghosts, to the thirty dynasties of men which have been enumerated, the sum is 36,360, or 36,525 years. It must be enough to say here that several of these human dynasties (of course we need take no notice of the fabulous reigns of gods) were contemporaneous; different sovereigns swaying at the same time the sceptre over different regions or provinces. And then by degrees, by conquest or by inheritance, a preponderance was obtained by the Theban monarchs, who consolidated their power, and reigned over the whole of Egypt. This Theban supremacy seems to have been overthrown, or at all events Lower Egypt was wrested from its

the Hyksos or shepherd-kings. They are said to have been at length expelled, and kings of native Egyptian race to have reigned again. Some would place these shepherd-kings before the descent of the Israelitish family into Egypt, and account for the facility with which Joseph, a Hebrew, was made viceroy, and the welcome with which Jacob and his sons were received, by the supposition that a foreign shepherd-king would be glad to strengthen himself against a people who did not willingly submit to his sway. The king therefore, who afterwards arose who knew not Joseph (Exod. i. 8), is thought to be the head, Amosis, of the 18th dynasty (Theban) of natives. There are others who imagine that Goshen was ready for the occupation princes by some foreign intrusion. But again it would appear pre-eminent, till ultimately the Delta became the seat of sovereignty, and Thebes was neglected, or conquered and destroyed. It is clear from scripture that a monarchy was existing in Egypt at a very early period; for we find a Pharaoh when Abraham went down to sojourn there, in consequence of a grievous famine that afflicted Canaan (Gen. xii. 10-20). The earliest sovereign is generally called Menes; but the date of his reign is disputed. Some chronologers, for instance, have placed it 2717 years, and some 2224, before the Christian era.

There are other disputed questions which have exercised the ingenuity of scholars. It is recorded that an intrusive foreign dynasty reigned for a considerable space of time in Egypt. These are called of the Israelites, in consequence of the just-previous expulsion of the shepherds who had settled in it. And some scholars, feeling that, if Egyptian annals mentioned at all the sojourning of Israel, which terminated so disastrously for the kingdom, they would record it in a most distorted shape, have believed that the whole story of the shepherd-kings is but a narrative strangely disfigured, cloaked, and embellished, of the residence in Egypt, and departure thence, of the Israelites themselves: see Browne's Ordo Sæcl., append. iii. sect. ii. pp. 577-585.

Much difference of opinion, too, exists as to which king, according to Egyptian annals, must be supposed the Pharaoh of the Exodus. This cannot be discussed here; but, for some brief notice of the different kings of Egypt mentioned in scripture, see PHARAOH. And, it may be added, with all the uncertainty which yet rests in Egyptian annals, we cannot help seeing much to corroborate the scripture history.

Egypt was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, and the sovereign was made we may suppose a vassal of Babylon. It afterwards fell under Persian rule; whence, after various rebellions, it passed to Alexander the Great, and a line of Ptolemies, descended from one of his generals, were sovereigns of Egypt till it ultimately became a province of the Roman empire. Of the settlement of many Jews in Egypt, of the erection of a temple at Leontopolis, of the translation in Egypt of the Hebrew scriptures into Greek, notice is elsewhere taken. See IR-HA-HERES, VER-SIONS, pp. 903, 904.

Besides Mr. Browne's valuable disquisition describe with terrible particularity, not only the judgments which would be inflicted in their days, but how Egypt should be a base kingdom, and there 'be no more a prince of the land of Egypt' (Jer. xli. ; Ezek. xxx.). How accurately these threatenings have been accomplished let history declare: see Bp. Newton On the Prophecies, diss. xii.

Egypt is now a fief, under hereditary rulers, viceroys, of the Turkish empire. The houses of the wealthier classes in the chief towns are roomy, and substantially built; but the dwellings of the lower orders are many of them but hovels, built of unbaked bricks cemented with mud. The villages stand upon eminences of rubbish, the materials of older buildings, and are thus already referred to, pp. 571-633, Mr. Palmer's Egyptian Chronicles may be mentioned; he has constructed an elaborate Harmony of Sacred and Egyptian Chronology, vol. ii. pp. 896-906, which well deserves examination. Also, in Trevor's Ancient Egypt is a good popular compendium of Egyptian history.

The prophecies relating to Egypt, and their fulfilment, demand the most attentive consideration. They were uttered when the Pharaohs were at their height of power. Then did Joel commence the mournful strain: 'Egypt shall be a desolation' (Joel iii. 19). And Isaiah took it up: 'The Egyptians will I give over into the hand of a cruel lord' (Isai. xix. 4). And Jeremiah and Ezekiel, when the catastrophe was nearer, just above the reach of the inundations. The whole land is crowded with relics of antiquity. The pyramids, the temples, the tombs, speak of a grandeur that has passed away, and will always attract the curiosity and admiration of the world. The habits of the modern inhabitants illustrate in many respects the narratives of scripture. Many Israelitish customs there alluded to have their counterpart in modern Egypt. For full descriptions the reader must be referred to Lane's Account of Manners and Customs of Modern Egyptians.

EGYPT, RIVER OF. By this expression the Nile must sometimes be understood, as in Gen. xv. 18, the eastern branch of the Nile; the Hebrew term being nahar. But in Numb. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4, 47; 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xxiv. 7; Isai. xxvii. 12, the brook or torrent of Egypt, nahhal in Hebrew, by the town Rhinokoloura, the modern Wady el-Arish, is meant. In Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 21, it is termed simply 'the river.'

EGYPTIAN. A native of Egypt (Gen. xvi. 1, and frequently elsewhere).

The person, so called in Acts xi. 38, was no doubt the pretended prophet who posted himself on mount Olivet, and declared that the walls of Jerusalem would fall down at his word. Felix, however, set upon him, and defeated his followers, while he fled and disappeared (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xx. 7, § 6; Bell. Jud., lib. ii. 13, § 5; comp. Dr. Alford's note on this place).

E'HI (my brother). A son of Benjamin (Gen. xlv. 21). He was known also by other names, Ahiram (Numb. xxvi. 38), Aher (1 Chron. vii. 12), Aharah (viii. 1).

E'HU (union).—1. A judge or deliverer of Israel (Judges iii. 11-30). He was the son or descendant of Gera, a Benjamite (Gen. xli. 21; 1 Chron. viii. 3, 5). Ehud is said to have been 'left-handed'; and it is questioned whether the meaning of the original word is that his right hand was disabled, or whether he could use both with equal facility. But it seems clear that we should adopt the last opinion. For the word is used only once again (Judges xx. 16); where 700 'left-handed' are described as chosen men; which would hardly have been said of persons labouring under a physical defect. Further, as all these, Ehud included, were Benjamites, it is not unlikely that in that tribe there was some special training for the use of both hands. For (1 Chron. xii. 2) a body of Benjamites joined David, of whom it is expressly said that they 'could use both the right hand and the left.' Ehud assassinated Eglon king of Moab, who had oppressed Israel for eighteen years, and gained a great victory over the Moabites.—2. A great-grandson of Benjamin: he is said to be the son of Bilhan (1 Chron. vii. 10, viii. 6).

E'KER (a rooting up, a plant rooted up and transplanted). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 27).

EK'REBEL (Judith vii. 18).

EK'RON (eradication, emigration). One of the five principal cities of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3). It was assigned first to the tribe of Judah (xv. 11, 45, 46; Judges i. 18), afterwards to that of Dan (Josh. xix. 43). But, though once taken by Judah, it continued generally in the hands of the Philistines (1 Sam. v. 10, vi. 17). It was from Ekron that the ark of God was sent back to Israel. We afterwards hear of a shrine of Baal-zebub at this city (2 Kings i. 2, 3, 6, 16); and it is occasionally mentioned by the prophets (Jer. xxv. 20; Amos i. 8; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5, 7). It was situated in the plain country; just on the north-west border of Judah. It was given by Alexander Balas to Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Macc. x. 89), being then called Accaron, and is now the village 'Akr, with pretty gardens, and still, according to Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 535), abounding in flies.

EK'RONITES. The inhabitants of Ekron (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. v. 10).

E'LA (1 Esdr. ix. 27). A form of Elam (Ezra x. 27).

EL'ADAH (whom God puts on, i. e. fills with himself). A descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 20).

E'LAH (terebinth).—1. One of the dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 41; 1 Chron. i. 52).—2. The father of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 18).—3. The son and successor of Baasha, king of Israel. He reigned two years (930-928 B.C.), and was killed by one of his officers, Zimri, while drinking at the house of his steward Arza, at Tirzah (xvi. 6-14).—4. The father of Hoshea, last king of Israel (2 Kings xv. 30, xvii. 1, xviii. 1, 9).—5. A son of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. iv. 15).—6. A Benjamite chief (ix. 8).

E'LAH (id.). The valley in which David fought with Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19, xxi. 9). This valley has been identified with the Wady es-Sumt, or 'acacia valley.' It is close by Suweikeh, the ancient Shochob, which stands upon its southern slope, and is about fourteen miles south-west of Jerusalem, on the road to Gaza, and about twelve from Beth-lehem. At the junction of the Wady es-Sumt with two other wadies there is an open space, about a mile wide, with a torrent bed in the centre, strewn with round pebbles, and fringed with acacia bushes. Terebinths, from which the ancient name, are still abundant in the neighbourhood.

E'LAM (age, eternity?).—1. The son of Shem (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chron. i. 17).—2. A Benjamite chief (viii. 24).—3. A Levite porter (xxvi. 3).—4. One whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 7; Neh. vii. 12).—5. One called for distinction 'the other Elam,' whose sons also so returned (Ezra ii. 31; Neh. vii. 34). Descendants of one of these accompanied Ezra (Ezra viii. 7); and some of them had married foreign wives (x. 26). The name of their representative appears in the list of those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 14).—6. One of the priests who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (xii. 42).

E'LAM (id.). A region of Asia peopled by the descendants of the son of Shem (Gen. x. 22). These were, according to Professor Rawlinson (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. 'Elam,') conquered in very ancient times by a Hamite or Cushite race from Babylon, who became the dominant people in Elam, and were called by the Greeks Cissians. It is difficult to define exactly the boundaries of this country, which probably was of greater or less extent at different times; but it may generally be said that it lay to the south of Assyria, and east of Persia proper, reaching down to and along the Persian gulf. Elam appears as an independent power, its sovereign holding supremacy over Shinar, or Babylonia, in the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 1-11), and extending his conquests far westward. This independence was in great measure maintained during the Assyrian and Babylonian dominion; but Elamite troops marched under the banner of Sennacherib (Isai. xxii. 6); and ultimately Elam was a province of Babylon (Dan. viii. 1, 2), in fulfilment, Rawlinson supposes, of the prophetic denunciations (Jer. xlix. 34-38; Ezek. xxxii. 24, 25). Elam is spoken of as supplying part of the invading army which captured Babylon (Isai. xxi. 2), and was of course a constituent part of the Persian empire; its chief city, Shushan, or Susa (whence the name Susiana), becoming the Persian metropolis. The inhabitants, as proved by some of the passages already referred to, were brave and skilled in archery. See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 277. Captive Israelites were located in Elam, whence their return is predicted (Isai. xi. 11): Elamites, too, were placed in the cities of Samaria (Ezra iv. 9); and Jews were still resident there in the apostolic age (Acts ii. 9).

E'LAMITES. The natives or inhabitants of Elam (Ezra iv. 9; Acts ii. 9).

E'LSAH (whom God made).—1. The son of Shaphan (Jer. xxix. 3).—2. One of the priests who had married a strange wife (Ezra x. 22).

E'LATH, E'LOTH (trees, terebinths, a grove, perhaps palm-grove). A town of Idumea, at the extremity of the eastern gulf of the Red sea. It is first mentioned in the account of the journeyings of Israel in the wilderness (Deut. ii. 8). When David conquered Edom (2 Sam. viii. 14), Elath came into his possession, and it is named in connection with Solomon's navy at the neighbouring port of Ezion-geber (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. viii. 17). It was lost when Edom revolted, was recovered by Uzziah (2 Kings xiv. 22), and was finally wrested from Judah by Rezin, king of Syria, who expelled all the Jewish inhabitants (xvi. 6). By the Greeks and Romans it was called Elana, or Elana, and hence gave name to the eastern gulf of the Red sea called the Elanitic gulf, at present the gulf of Akabah. Elath is said now to be an insignificant place termed Eylet.

EL-BETH'EL (God of Beth-el, or of God's house). The name said to be given by Jacob to the place where God appeared to him when he fled from Esau (Gen. xxxv. 7). Some versions omit the prefixed El, God. But it was probably the altar which Jacob so named: comp. xxxiii. 20. See BETH-EL.

EL'CIA (Judith viii. 1). One of Judith's ancestors.

EL'DAAH (whom God called). A son of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chron. i. 33).

EL'DAD (whom God loves, identical with Theophilus). One of the seventy to whom the prophetic spirit of Moses was communicated. He with Medad did not go with the rest to the tabernacle, but prophesied in the camp. Joshua therefore begged Moses to forbid them (Numb. xi. 24-29).

ELDER. The word signifying more advanced in age came to imply a person vested with authority, because naturally older persons, for their wisdom and experience, would be selected for offices of trust and government. So we find the 'eldest servant' of Abraham's house 'ruling over all that he had' (Gen. xxiv. 2): we have also mention of 'the elders of Joseph's house,' and the 'elders of the land of Egypt' (i. 7), obviously indicating the chiefs of Joseph's establishment, and high Egyptian officers.

There must have been some recognized body under this title at an early period of the Hebrew history. For Moses was desired to convey the divine message to 'the elders of Israel' (Exod. iii. 16); and they were both to accompany him when he demanded freedom from Pharaoh, and also to be the means of communication between Moses and the mass of the people (18, iv. 29, xii. 21). We are not distinctly told who these elders were, probably the leading persons in each tribe. We find them after the departure from Egypt (xvii. 6, xix. 7); and from these seventy were selected for special worship with Moses, Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu (xxiv. 1, 2, 9-11). Moses had, at the suggestion of Jethro, appointed officers to administer justice (xviii. 26), but he seems to have required, further, a body of (if they may be so called) political advisers. Accordingly seventy out of the general class of elders were chosen, approved men; and on these the divine Spirit was especially poured (Numb. xi. 10-30). Possibly it was from this example that the sanhedrim was afterwards constituted.

There were 'elders' of neighbouring nations, synonymous with 'princes,' as of Moab and Midian (xxii. 7, 13), and of the Hivites (Josh. ix. 11). And we find the institution remaining in Israel through the whole history, under every change of government, and a certain authority exercised by them to which the people submitted. Sometimes they are mentioned as local magistrates, presiding over separate tribes or districts, and sometimes as the superior class, it is likely, acting generally for the nation (Deut. xix. 12, xxi. 2, 3, 6, xxxi. 28; Josh. ix. 15, 18-21, xxiv. 1; Judges ii. 7, viii. 14, xi. 5; 1 Sam. iv. 3, viii. 4, xvi. 4, xxx. 26; 2 Sam. xvii. 4, xix. 11; 1 Kings xii. 6, xx. 8, xxi. 11; 2 Kings x. 1, 5; 1 Chron. xxi. 16; Ezra v. 5, vi. 7, 14, x. 8, 14; Jer. xxix. 1; Ezek. viii. 1, 12). Those who locally administered justice are said to have been termed 'elders of the gate' (Prov. xxxi. 23; Lam. v. 14); because that was the place where a court was often held (Ruth iv. 2, 4, 9, 11). Elders are mentioned in Maccabean times, apparently distinct from the sanhedrim (1 Macc. vii. 33, xii. 6); and we find them in the New Testament history associated with the chief priests and scribes, but yet not to be confounded with them (Matt. xvi. 21, xxi. 23, xxvi. 59, xxvii. 41). And an analogous class yet subsists among Arab tribes, viz. their sheikhs, a word implying 'old men.'

We naturally see officers of the Christian church designated by the same title (Acts xiv. 23, xx. 17); and regulations are given in regard to them (1 Tim. v. 1, 17, 19). Hence our term presbyter, derived from the Greek word for elder, presbuteros. For a notice of their office and position in the church, consult Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book ii. chap. 19. See BISHOP.

EL'LEAD (whom God praises). A descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 21).

ELEA'LEH (whither God ascends). One of the cities assigned to the tribe of Reuben, which they built or fortified (Numb. xxxii. 3, 37). In later times it was occupied by Moab (Isai. xv. 4, xvi. 9; Jer. xlviii. 34). The ruins of it, now called el-A'al, stand on an eminence within two miles of Heshbon.

ELE'ASA (1 Macc. ix. 5). A place where Judas Maccabeus encamped shortly before his defeat and death. Its position is uncertain.

ELEA'SAH (whom God made).—1. One of Judah's descendants (1 Chron. ii. 39, 40).—2. A man of Saul's posterity (viii. 37, ix. 43). This name is identical with Elasa.

ELEA'ZAR (whom God helps).—1. The third son of Aaron (Exod. vi. 23-25, xxviii. 1). After the death of his brothers Nadab and Abihu, he was placed at the head of the Levites (Numb. iii. 32), and subsequently succeeded his father as high priest (xx. 28). He was then united with Moses in the divine communications (xxvi. 1), and with Joshua, who was solemnly inaugurated before him (xxvii. 18-23). Eleazar entered Canaan, and, in conjunction with Joshua, divided it among the tribes (Josh. xiv. 1, xvii. 4, xxi. 1). His death is mentioned (xxiv. 33), but not the time of it: perhaps it was near that of Joshua. He was succeeded as high priest by his son Phinehas.—2. The son of Abinadab of Kirjath-jearim, 'sanctified' or appointed to take charge of the ark after its restoration by the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 1).—3. A son of Dodo, and one of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 9; 1 Chron. xi. 12).—4. A Levite of the family of Merari, who had no sons, only daughters (xxiii. 21, 22, xxiv. 28).—5. A Levite who helped to weigh the vessels that Ezra brought to Jerusalem (Ezra vii. 33).—6. One who had married a foreign wife (x. 25).—7. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 42).—8. A person named among our Lord's ancestry (Matt. i. 15).

ELEA'ZAR.—1. One of the Maccabean family, son of Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 5, vi. 43-46). He is called in one place Avaran, in another Savaran.—2. The father of one of the envoys whom Judas Maccabeus sent to Rome (viii. 17).—3. An aged scribe martyred in the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. vi. 18-31).

ELEA'ZURUS (1 Esdr. ix. 24). A corrupted form of Eliashib (Ezra x. 24).

ELECTION. A choice. It is not intended to discuss here that theological doctrine on which so much difference of opinion has existed, but simply to note, in a few instances, the fact that God, as the great Ruler of the world, has thought proper to choose certain of his creatures for defined purposes and ends. Thus he selected Abraham to be the progenitor of a nation among whom he would especially make himself known. He selected Saul (1 Sam. ix. 17, x. 1), and afterwards David (xvi. 1-12), for the sovereignty of Israel. Israel was God's chosen seed, entrusted, because of his choice, with special privileges, which for their sins they forfeited; the Gentiles being chosen in their stead (Rom. x. 11, xi. 11-25). Hence God's people, whether Jews or Gentiles, are called 'a chosen generation,' 'a peculiar people' (1 Pet. ii. 9, v. 13). And so individual believers are said to be 'chosen in Christ' (Eph. i. 4), 'elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ' (1 Pet. i. 2: comp. Rom. viii. 28-39). So also the holy angels are called 'elect' (1 Tim. v. 21), indicating that the blessedness of those happy spirits they owe entirely to God's favour. We fallen men are specially to remember this: it is of divine grace we have any good gift, and by divine strength alone we can do any good thing (John xv. 5; James i. 17).

The privileges and prerogatives we have attained whether the 2nd epistle of St. John was addressed to a church, or to an individual: it is more probable to an individual (comp. 5, 13); and then there is the further question whether either of the original words is a proper name. Dr. Alford is of opinion that Kyria, translated 'lady,' is a name; so that the translation should be, 'to the elect Kyria' (The Greek Test., Proleg. on 2 and 3 John, sect. ii.).

ELECT LADY (2 John 1). It has been doubted whether the 2nd epistle of St. John was addressed to a church, or to an individual: it is more probable to an individual (comp. 5, 13); and then there is the further question whether either of the original words is a proper name. Dr. Alford is of opinion that Kyria, translated 'lady,' is a name; so that the translation should be, 'to the elect Kyria' (The Greek Test., Proleg. on 2 and 3 John, sect. ii.).

EL-ELO'HE-IS'RAEL (God, God of Israel). The name which Jacob gave to the altar he built near Shechem on the ground where he pitched his tent, and which he afterwards bought (Gen. xxxiii. 18-20).

ELEMENTS. The original principles of things; sometimes used literally (2 Pet. iii. 12); sometimes figuratively (Gal. iv. 3, 9, Col. ii. 20) for rudimentary lessons, i. e. the ritualistic observances of Judaism, and perhaps of heathenism; also in Heb. v. 12 for the early teachings of the gospel.

E'LEPH (the ox). One of the cities allotted to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28).

ELEPHANT. For 'ivory' in the text of 1 Kings x. 22, 2 Chron. ix. 21, the margin has 'elephants' teeth.' Also for 'behemoth,' (Job xl. 15) in the text, the marginal note expounds 'the elephant, as some think.' In the Maccabean wars elephants were employed (1 Macc. vi. 30, and elsewhere). See BEHEMOTH, IVORY.

ELEUTHERO'POLIS (free-town). A city of Palestine, but not so called in scripture. Shortly after the Christian era it was known as a place of importance, the see of a bishop, and the capital of a province. But it was destroyed after the Saracenic conquest. It lay on the border of the Philistine plain, about twenty-five miles from Jerusalem. An ancient name is said to be Betogabra; and at present as Bett Jibrin it is a village of fifty or sixty houses. There are very extensive ruins, and many singular caves in the vicinity. See GATH.

ELEUTHERUS (1 Macc. xi. 7, xii. 30). A river of Syria, most probably the modern Nahr el-Kebir.

ELHA'NAN (whom God bestowed).—1. A warrior who, in David's time, slew a gigantic Philistine. The two notices of him do not agree (2 Sam. xxi. 19, and 1 Chron. xx. 5). In one it is said that Elhanan was the son of Jaare-oregim, and that he slew Goliath (the words 'the brother of' in our version being adopted from the second account). In the other place Elhanan is called the son of Jair; and the person he slew is described as Lahmi, the brother of Goliath. It is likely that the text in Chronicles is accurate; else the account of David's own victory over Goliath would be contradicted. Besides, a part at least of the difference in Samuel may be accounted for. The word oregim in the original occurs twice: at the end of the verse it is rightly translated 'weavers.' Perhaps the eye of the copyist rested on this, and by mistake he wrote the word twice. See JAARE-OREGIM.—2. The son of Dodo, also one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 24; 1 Chron. xi. 26).

ELI (summit, the highest, according to some, adopted of the Lord). A noted high priest and judge of Israel. He was of the family of Ithamar, Aaron's youngest son; for his descendant Ahimelech or Abiathar (1 Sam. xiv. 3, xxii. 20; 2 Sam. viii. 17) is expressly said to be of that house (1 Chron. xxiv. 3). We do not know how or when the high priesthood passed from Eleazar's family to that of Ithamar; but it was declared, on account of Eli's sin in not restraining his ungodly sons, that the dignity should revert to the elder branch. With the exception of this great fault, of which he was repeatedly warned, Eli appears to have been a holy man. To him was committed the charge of Samuel the prophet when a child. And his anxiety for the ark of God, carried with the Israelitish army to battle, is graphically depicted in the sacred history. He sat watching for news in the open road; and, when he heard the disastrous intelligence, the death of his two sons, and, worst of all, the capture of the ark by the Philistines, he who could have borne the desolation of his own house sank down in grief, and his neck brake, and he died. He was ninety-eight years old, and had judged Israel forty years; some of these years probably including the time of Samson (1 Sam. i. iv.). Part of the fulfilment of the threatening against Eli's house is noted in 1 Kings ii. 27.

ELI, E'LI, LA'MA SABACH THANI (My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?) The Syro-Chaldaic words which our Lord uttered during his deep agony on the cross (Matt. xxvii. 46). They are given, with slight variation, preserving more of an Aramaic cast, in Mark xv. 34. They were cited from Psal. xxii. 1.

ELI'AB (to whom God is father).—1. The prince of Zebulun in the wilderness (Numb. i. 9, ii. 7, vii. 24, 29, x. 16).—2. A Reubenite, father of Dathan and Abiram (xvi. 1, 12, xxvi. 8, 9; Deut. xi. 6).—3. The eldest brother of David (1 Sam. xvi. 6, xvii. 13, 28; 1 Chron. ii. 13; 2 Chron. xi. 18). No doubt he is the same with Elihu (1 Chron. xxvii. 18).—4. A Levite, ancestor of Samuel the prophet (vi. 27). He is called also Elihu (1 Sam. i. 1) and Eliel (1 Chron. vi. 34).—5. A Gadite warrior, who joined David when in hold (xii. 9).—6. A Levite porter, who was a musician on the psaltery (xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5)

ELI'AB (Judith viii. 1). One of Judith's ancestors.

ELI'ADA (whom God knows).—1. One of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii. 8). But in 1 Chron. xiv. 7 he is called Beelada.—2. A Benjamite, one of Jehoshaphat's captains (2 Chron. xvii. 17).

ELI'ADAH (id.). The father of Rezon, a marauding chief who established himself at Damascus, and became king there (1 Kings xi. 23-25). His name is the same with the preceding.

ELI'ADAS (1 Esdr. ix. 28). Elioenai (Ezra x. 27).

ELI'ADUN (1 Esdr. v. 58).

ELI'AH (my God is Jehovah).—1. A chief among the Benjamites (1 Chron. viii. 27).—2. A person who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 26).

ELI'AHBA (whom God hides). One of David's chief warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 32; 1 Chron. xi. 33).

ELI'AKIM (whom God establishes).—1. A distinguished officer in the court of Hezekiah. It was declared of him that he should be advanced to a place of the highest dignity and trust on the degradation of Shebna (2 Kings xviii. 18, 26, 37, xix. 2; Isai. xxii. 20-25, xxxvi. 3, 11, 22, xxxvii. 2). Of the personal history of Eliakim we know too little to say for what services he attained his exalted position; but, as the language used in regard to him corresponds with that applied to Christ (comp. Isai. xxii. 22 with ix. 6; Rev. iii. 7), we may not improbably suppose Eliakim in some sense a typical character. It has been imagined that he was high priest; but there is no kind of proof that this was the case.—2. The original name of that son of Josiah who afterwards was king of Judah under the name of Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiii. 34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4). See JEHOIAKIM.—3. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 41).—4, 5. Two persons in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. i. 13; Luke iii. 30).

ELI'ALI (1 Esdr. ix. 34).

ELI'AM (God's people).—1. The father of Bath-sheba (2 Sam. xi. 3). He is also called Ammiel (1 Chron. iii. 5); the signification of the two names being the same.—2. One of David's warriors, son of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). These two are usually supposed to be the same person. See AHITHOPHEL.

ELIA'ONIAS (1 Esdr. viii. 31). Elihoenai (Ezra viii. 4).

ELI'AS (Matt. xi. 14, xvi. 14, xvii. 3, 4, 10, 11, 12, xxvii. 47, 49; Mark vi. 15, viii. 28, ix. 4, 5, 11, 12, 13, xv. 33, 36; Luke i. 17, iv. 25, 26, ix. 8, 19, 30, 33, 54; John i. 21, 25; Rom. xi. 2; James v. 17). The Greek form of ELIJAH, which see.

ELI'ASAPH (whom God added).—1. The chief of Gad at the census in the wilderness (Numb. i. 14, ii. 14, vii. 42, 47, x. 20).—2. A Levite (iii. 24).

ELI'ASHIB (whom God restores).—1. A descendant of David (1 Chron. iii. 24).—2. The head of one of the courses of the priests (xxiv. 12).—3. The high priest, in the time of Nehemiah (Ezra x. 6; Neh. iii. 1, 20, 21, xii. 10, 22, 23, xiii. 4, 7, 28)—4. A Levite singer who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 24).—5, 6. Two other persons who had also married foreign wives (27, 36).

ELIASIS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Apparently a corrupt form of Jaasau (Ezra x. 37).

ELI'ATHAH (to whom God comes). A Levite of the sons of Heman, appointed head of a division for the musical service of the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 27).

ELI'DAD (whom God loves). A Benjamite commissioner to superintend the allotment of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 21).

ELI'EL (to whom God is strength).—1. A chieftain of Manasseh east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).—2. A Levite, ancestor of Samuel (vi. 34). See ELIAB, 4; ELIHU, 1.—3, 4. Two Benjamite chiefs (viii. 20, 22).—5, 6. Two of David's warriors (xi. 46, 47).—7. A Gadite captain who joined David in the hold (xii. 11); he is probably identical with No. 5 or 6.—8. A Kohathite Levite in David's time (xv. 9, 11).—9. One of the overseers of the offerings in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

ELI'ENAI (toward Jehovah are my eyes). A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. viii. 20).

ELIE'ZER (God his help).—1. A Damascene chief servant of Abraham's household (Gen. xv. 2, 3). There are two difficulties connected with this passage. If Eliezer were of Damascus, how, it is asked, could he have been born in Abraham's house? But the original of 'born in my house' is 'a son of my house,' i. e. one of my household. Or, as Kalisch observes, 'Damascus Eliezer' was not necessarily a native of Damascus; it might very well imply that that was the place from which his family descended (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., pp. 363-365). If, however, we might adopt the theory that Haran, the city where Abraham dwelt with his father Terah, was near Damascus, in the district belonging to it (see HARAN), Eliezer might well be a native Damascene, and yet born in Abraham's house. Further, the expression 'steward of my house' is pointless; it is better, therefore, to render 'the proprietor of my house,' as Gesenius, Kalisch, and others. The meaning is that Eliezer would be, not was then, the owner, as Abraham anticipated, of his possessions. The servant's name who headed the embassy to Padan-aram (Gen. xxiv.) is not given, but it was very probably the same Eliezer.—2. One of the sons of Moses (Exod. xviii. 4; 1 Chron. xxiii. 15, 17, xxvi. 25).—3. A Benjamite chief (vii. 8).—4. A priest who blew the trumpet before the ark when brought from the house of Obed-edom (xv. 24).—5. A ruler of the Reubenites in David's time (xxvii. 16).—6. A prophet, son of Dodaiah of Mareshah, who rebuked Jehoshaphat for going with Ahaziah, and predicted the destruction of his fleet (2 Chron. xx. 35-37).—7. A chief man sent with others by Ezra to prevail on some of the Levites to join his caravan (Ezra viii. 16).—8, 9, 10. Three persons (the first two a priest and a Levite) who had married foreign wives (x. 18, 23, 31).—11. An individual in the ancestry of our Lord (Luke iii. 29).

ELIHO'ENAI (toward Jehovah are my eyes). One who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 4).

ELI'HU (whose God is he, i. e. Jehovah).—1. An ancestor of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. i. 1), called also Eliab (1 Chron. vi. 27) and Eliel (34).—2. A chief of Manasseh, who joined David as he went from the Philistine army to Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 20).—3. One of the Levite porters of the house of Obed-edom (xxvi. 7).—4. The eldest brother of David (xxvii. 19), elsewhere called Eliab (1 Sam. xvi. 6, xvii. 13, 28; 1 Chron. ii. 13).—5. The son of Barachel the Buzite, one of the interlocutors in the book of Job (Job xxxii. 2, 4, 5, 6, xxxiv. 1, xxxv. 1, xxxvi. 1). See BUZ, JOB.

ELI'JAH (my God is Jehovah).—1. That most renowned prophet of Israel who, with no introduction as to his birth or parentage, or even account of the divine commission given to him, bursts forth in sacred story as the stern denouncer of judgment on apostate Israel, and who, after his marvellous course of miracle and bold vindication of God's authority, is translated without tasting death.

The history of Elijah and Elisha has been a great stumbling-block to those critics who are inclined to see in any detail of supernatural occurrence a mythical element, and who therefore, unscrupulously squaring the record of what God did by what in their mortal judgment He ought to have done, coolly pronounce books of scripture 'unhistoric.' But the truth of such books is not to be so easily set aside. Their credit does not rest only on the evidence, strong as it is, which may be gathered from their own contents. It is corroborated by other proofs: it is bound up with the authority of the New Testament. Repeatedly are the deeds of Elijah spoken of by our Lord and his apostles; and we may fairly say that, if the first founders of Christianity were so weak as to mistake legendary tales for truth, we could place little dependence upon such men's doctrinal teaching. But, if ever there was a time when Jehovah might be expected to interpose by his wonderful arm of power, it was when the ten tribes had rent themselves from the holy service of the temple, had not only set up the calves of Dan and Beth-el, but were attempting solemnly to establish the religion of Baal, and constitute it that of the state. Warning had been given by a prophet to Jeroboam, and had been disregarded. Unless the national covenant was to be broken up at once, and no further period of probation allowed, stronger means must be used to oppose the overwhelming flood of evil, at least to keep up in Israel a remnant who would not bow the knee to idol-gods. Very well then has Hävernick observed, 'Where the temple was wanting, and image-worship took its place, and the priesthood constituted an unlawful caste, the spreading evil could be remedied only in an extraordinary way. In opposition to the illegality represented by the kingly and the priestly offices appeared the prophetic element as the representative of the law, and, therefore, as a properly-organized fixed whole in a proper embodiment of considerable extent in its permanent membership. As the only authorized representative and continuation of the law, therefore, this prophetic order was armed with the power and majesty of the law manifesting itself in miracles: as the spirit so the wonder-working might of Moses devolved upon Elijah and others' (Einleitung, § 170, vol. ii. 1. pp. 166, 167).

Elijah is first mentioned as 'the Tishbite, of the inhabitants of Gilead' (1 Kings xvii. 1). This term, 'the Tishbite,' is taken to indicate the name of his birth-place. But no place so named can be satisfactorily identified. Keil considers the prophet a foreigner (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. pp. 266, 267). And, certainly, in the expression 'inhabitants of Gilead,' the Hebrew word would seem to denote 'sojourners,' i.e. strangers. Further, the original of 'the Tishbite' may be from the same root, and may by possibility signify 'the sojourner,' as marking specially that this great man was an alien. But on this point no certain conclusion can be arrived at.

The incidents of Elijah's career must be briefly, and can be but briefly, sketched. He is introduced proclaiming that there should be neither 'dew nor rain these years,' the time being left indefinite, 'but according to his word.' By his mouth the judgment was announced, and from his mouth alone should the remission come; thus effectually cutting off all hope of relief from false prophets. But he was himself to be cared for. By the brook Cherith he might make his abode (see CHERITH); and there sufficient food should be brought him. 'And the ravens brought him bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening.' Other translations of this sentence have been proposed; and Dr. Kitto, in his Daily Bible Illustrations, forty-fifth week, seventh day, inclines to the belief that it was by human hands, from Arabs probably, that Elijah received his food. Without deciding this question (though there are strong reasons for holding to the ordinary interpretation), it is sufficient to say with Keil (ubi supr., p. 270), 'Whosoever acknowledges the living God will confide in his omnipotence, that he can cause his servants to be nourished even by ravens, although, according to the fine remark of Winer, they are otherwise the most voracious of birds.' When the brook Cherith dried up, Elijah was commanded to repair to Zarephath, where, in a widow's house occurred the wonder—which has ever since brought rich comfort to many a humble servant of God—of the barrel of meal never wasting, the cruse of oil not failing. Here, too, was wrought the miracle of the raising of the widow's son to life (1 Kings xvii.). Strong was the woman's faith; but stronger still that of the prophet.

And his faith was to be yet more hardily proved. For he was now to present himself before the ungodly king, who, prompted by his wife Jezebel, had long sought Elijah to destroy him, as the author of the country's calamity. He showed himself, therefore, to the astonishment of good Obadiah, and, strong in superior power, summoned Ahab to his presence, and, while the weak king quailed at his words, commanded that the prophets of idolatry should be collected, and the grand contest between their divinities and the Lord Jehovah be decided in the sight of the gathered people of Israel. Never was there a more magnificent scene, never a more triumphant result. Even the wavering Israelites were convinced by the decision, and uttered the shout that echoed far along the slopes of Carmel, 'The Lord, he is the God, The Lord, he is the God.' Ahab's authority seemed for the time set aside; and Elijah directed the execution, according to the law, of the idolatrous prophets; and no man dared to interfere. Then rose the little cloud; and then came the mighty rain; but ere it descended Ahab hurried in his chariot to Jezreel sixteen miles away; and Elijah girded up his loins like one of the practised runners, and ran before the king to the gate of the royal city (xviii.: comp. Luke iv. 25; James v. 17, 18). See CARMEL, 1.

Ahab had been cowed; but Jezebel was determined to avenge the false prophets. She swore by her gods that she would slay Elijah as he had slain them. The only wonder is that, instead of acting at once, and seizing him on the instant, she sent a messenger to tell him what she would do on the morrow. Perhaps, furious as she was, she had her fears, and thought it better to frighten him into exile. If so, her plan succeeded, for a time at least. Elijah, just before so bold, is now a fugitive. Perhaps he expected that Israel would rise in national reformation, and disappointed in this he lost heart, and fled across the territory of Judah, at the last town of which he left his attendant, and wandered on himself, weary of life, into the wilderness. Here he was to witness wonderful things. Supernaturally sustained, he travelled forty days and forty nights to Horeb, the mount of God. And there the storm, and the earthquake, and the fire appalled him; and afterwards the Lord's voice was heard: not loud was it, but clear and distinct; and its tones thrilled through the prophet's heart, 'What doest thou here, Elijah?' here, far away from the land of Israel, where his energies ought to have been exerted. He pleaded that he stood alone: all was lost, no great deliverance wrought, no token of amendment visible, his life pursued by the vengeful queen. But he was told that some faithful were yet left; there was work for him to do; and fresh commissions were given him, indicating the vengeance in store for the wicked house of Ahab, with the calamities that should fall upon apostate Israel; but yet that the Lord would not want a man to testify to his name and uphold his cause (xix.: comp. Rom. xl. 2-5).

Ahab might well believe that he was freed from his awful monitor for ever. Some time seems to have elapsed; and the king had wars and received rebukes, but not from Elijah. He was free, then, to indulge himself. He coveted Naboth's vineyard, and, by Jezebel's unscrupulous tyranny, he got it. So he went down to take possession, exulting, doubtless, like a humoured child. He steps upon the land he had acquired, but lo! there stands a figure there, he could not mistake it, the prophetic dress, the stern bearing, the fixed eye. And in agony the wretched king exclaims, 'Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?' Terrible was the response, 'I have found thee;' and so impressive the sentence pronounced that even Ahab's careless hardened heart was moved to something like repentance; so that the Lord, ever ready to show himself touched with compassion, announced a respite: the full vengeance should be executed not till Ahab's son's days (xxi. 15-29). Happy had it been for Ahab if this mercy had affected him as it ought, and if, like Manasseh in later days, he had turned to the Lord with all his heart and soul.

The subsequent appearances of Elijah were fitful, as his first had been abrupt. It may be that he busied himself in the establishment and training of the prophets' schools. At all events intervals elapse; and other prophets there are to admonish or rebuke. At last Ahab falls, and is succeeded by Ahaziah. And Ahaziah, wicked as his father, was laid upon a sick-bed, disabled by an accident. With bold superstition he sends off to the god of Ekron to know whether he shall recover. But the messengers meet and are turned back by one who bids them tell their master that he should die. The king, conscience-smitten, enquires who this might be, and is no sooner told of his hairy garment and leathern girdle, than he exclaims, 'It is Elijah the Tishbite,' and, with desperate purpose, sends company after company to seize him. The first two bands are destroyed by fire from heaven; but with the last, whose captain had approached and spoken in more reverent manner, Elijah goes to the king, and in person announces to him his doom. And so Ahaziah died (2 Kings i.). The judgments, it must be understood, that befel the troops despatched to apprehend Elijah were not the personal resentment of the prophet, but the vindication of the Lord's honour against an ungodly people, who in molesting him dishonoured the great God (Exod. xvi. 8; 1 Sam. viii. 7; Luke x. 16). For the misapprehension of the apostles grounded on this fact, and our Lord's rebuke to them, see ix. 53-56.

There is one more scene in the eventful drama. The time was come when Elijah's ministry on earth should end. And, as he passed from place to place accompanied by Elisha, the prophets in the schools he visited seemed to have had some intimation of what was to happen. At length, having crossed the Jordan by miraculous power, he asked his successor what he should do for him. 'Let a double portion of thy spirit be upon me,' was the reply, claiming the heirship of his gifts and authority; for the first-born had by right a double portion of the father's goods. If he saw his master when he was taken away, that is, continued his attendance to the last, it should be granted. And, while they were talking, there appeared a chariot of fire and horses of fire, parting the two, and Elijah was carried by a whirlwind into heaven. The cry which Elisha uttered, 'My father, my father, the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof,' and the rending of his clothes, evinced the sense he had of the loss. But he gathered up the prophetic mantle which fell from Elijah as he rose, the symbol of his own succession, and felt that his petition was granted. For far longer time did he exercise the sacred office; and his influence, taking up the work at the point to which Elijah had carried it, became more extensive, and was exercised, for the most part, more in deeds of mercy than in those of judgment (2 Kings ii. 1-14).

Of course there are men who attempt to explain away the miracle of Elijah's translation. But God 'giveth no account of his matters.' He had high reasons for exempting the great prophet from the death which, generally speaking, passes upon all men. And the remarks of Keil are well worth consideration (ubi supr., p. 349). 'Moses, the lawgiver, goes in the way of the law, which works death as the wages of sin (Rom. vi. 23, vii. 13), from the earthly life. Elijah, the prophet, who is ordained for correction to future times, to pacify the wrath before the judgment, to turn the heart of the father to the son, and to restore the tribes of Israel, is taken from this world as the forerunner of Christ (Mal. iv. 5, 6; Matt. xi. 10, 14) without tasting death, predicting the ascension of the Lord, who, by his resurrection from the dead, taking the sting from death and the victory from hell (1 Cor. xv. 55), as the abolisher of the curse of sin and conqueror of death and the grave, ascends into heaven to the right hand of the Father on high.'

There is a remarkable statement (2 Chron. xxi. 12-15) that a writing came from Elijah to Jehoram of Judah, threatening judgment for this king's evil deeds. It is generally supposed that this must have been after Elijah's translation. If so, we may well conceive that by the spirit of prophecy it was prepared before Elijah was taken up. Some have imagined, however, that the translation was not till after Jehoram began to reign, and that the events of 2 Kings iii. occurred in Elijah's life on earth. It may be so: the matter is not easy to decide. Yet it is obviously a mistake to imagine (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 530) that the theory of Jehoram's sharing his father's throne will solve the difficulty. It was not till after Jehoshaphat's death that Jehoram slew his brethren (2 Chron. xxi. 4). But these murders are alluded to in Elijah's 'writing.'

The character of Elijah made a deep impression upon the Jews. He was expected to return to earth as the forerunner of Messiah; an expectation encouraged by the remarkable prophecy (Mal. iv. 5, 6) already referred to. The prophecy was indeed fulfilled, but not in the way they imagined. John Baptist, though not personally Elijah (John i. 21), was to go before the Messiah in the spirit and power of the ancient prophet (Luke i. 17); and thus our Lord himself explained the matter to his disciples (Matt. xvii. 10-13). There was, it is true, a personal appearance of Elijah with Moses, when the two in glory stood beside the transfigured

Saviour on the holy mount, and talked with him of his coming death—a proof how both the law and the prophets pointed to a Redeemer suffering ere he was triumphant (1-8; Mark ix. 2-8; Luke ix. 28-36).

There are those who believe that the prediction of Elijah's coming has not yet had its full accomplishment; and they expect, before the second appearing of the Lord, that the old stern prophet of Gilead, who never died, will tread the earth again. Such a question, however, cannot be discussed here. For some interesting views of Elijah's character and history see Kitto's Daily Bible Illustrations, weeks forty-five to forty-seven.

2. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 21).

ELIJAHU (id.) (1 Kings xvii. 1, marg.). A form of the name Elijah.

ELI'KA (pelican of God? God of the congregation?). One of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 25).

E'LIM (trees, perhaps palm-trees). The second station of the Israelites after they had passed the Red sea. They found here twelve wells or springs of water and three-score and ten palm-trees (Exod. xv. 27, xvi. 1; Numb. xxxiii. 10). There are several valleys which descend from the mountain range et-Tih towards the sea; and one of these must be Elim, probably Wady Ghurundel, or else Wady Useit. Both are said to be fringed with trees and shrubs, among which are wild palms. See Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, pp. 37, 68, 4th edit.

ELIM'ELECH (God his king). A man of Beth-lehem, who, in the days of the judges, went in a time of famine to sojourn in Moab with his wife Naomi and his sons Mahlon and Chilion. He died there, and his sons also, leaving no posterity. Naomi afterwards returned into Palestine with one of her daughters-in-law, Ruth (Ruth i. 2, 3, ii. 1, 3, iv. 3, 9).

ELIO'ENAI (toward Jehovah are my eyes).

—1. One of David's descendants (1 Chron. iii. 23, 24).—2. A chieftain of Simeon (iv. 36).

—3. A Benjamite head of a house (vii. 8).—

4. A Levite of the family of Korah, one of the porters (xxvi. 3).—5. A priest who had married a strange wife (Ezra x. 22); perhaps he is the person who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 41).—6. Another person who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 27).

ELIO'NAS.—1. (1 Esdr. ix. 22). Elloenai (Ezra x. 22).—2. (1 Esdr. ix. 32). Perhaps corrupted from Eliezer (Ezra x. 31).

ELIPH'AL (whom God judges). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 35). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 34 he is called Eliphelet.

ELIPH'ALAT (1 Esdr. ix. 33). Eliphelet (Ezra x. 33).

ELIPH'ALET (God his deliverance). One of the sons of David born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. xiv. 7). In iii. 8 it is Eliphelet.

ELIPH'ALET (1 Esdr. viii. 39). Eliphelet (Ezra viii. 13).

ELIPH'HAZ (God his strength).—1. A son of Esau: he was the father of Teman (Gen. xxvi. 4, 10, 11, 12, 15, 16; 1 Chron. i. 35, 36).

—2. One of the three friends of Job: he is called 'the Temanite:' he was therefore, perhaps, a descendant of No. 1 (Job ii. 11, iv. 1, xv. 1, xxii. 1, xlii. 7, 9). See JOB, THE BOOK OF.

ELIPH'ELEH (whom God makes distinguished). A Levite, called a 'porter, but appointed by David to play on the harp (1 Chron. xv. 18, 21).

ELIPH'ELET (God his deliverance).—1. One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 34), called Eliphai in 1 Chron. xi. 35.—2. A son of David, born in Jerusalem (iii. 6). In 2 Sam. v. 15 he is omitted, and in 1 Chron. xiv. 5 called Elpalet.—3. Another son of David (iii. 8). He is called Eliphalet in 2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. xiv. 7.—4. A descendant of Saul (viii. 39).—5. One who returned to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra viii. 13).—6. A man who had married a foreign wife (x. 33).

ELIS'ABETH (God her oath, q. d. worshipper of God). The wife of Zacharias, and mother of John the Baptist. She was of a priestly family, and also the cousin of the Virgin Mary. She is described as being, with her husband, a person of piety, 'walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless' (Luke i. 5-66).

ELISE'US (Luke iv. 27). The Greek form of Elisha. The name appears in this form in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. xlviii. 12).

ELI'SHA (God his salvation). One of the most distinguished prophets of Israel, the minister and successor of Elijah. The acts of his earlier ministry are related at considerable length. Some have thought fit to call his history fragmentary, and have even accused the sacred writer of possessing but an inadequate conception of the great prophet's function. But such critics only betray their own inadequate conception of the character of the sacred word. The histories of all the persons—not excepting our Lord himself—mentioned in scripture are in a certain sense fragmentary; but just those traits of them are preserved, and those circumstances of their lives narrated, which most fully bring out that kind of instruction which the wisdom of God intended that the church should treasure for warning, for encouragement, as examples of faith and patience. It is so with the accounts of Elisha. His predecessor Elijah had been very jealous for the Lord of Hosts. He had predicted judgments and had executed judgments. He had always had to be in stern opposition to ungodly kings, never sought for, shrunk from, feared, and hated. It was an important work that the awful Tishbite performed. And he made a deep impression. But this impression was to be rendered yet deeper and wider and more effectual by one who, though he would vindicate the respect due to his office, was by his multiplied miracles of mercy to gain an influence over even irreligious princes, to be the bulwark of the land against foreign foes, to be a witness for God, known among the neighbouring nations, letting them learn that the only true Deity was Jehovah, God of Israel, to foster the prophetic schools and thus to preserve a nucleus of piety, blessing and blessed in the nation, where, doubtless, many more than the 7000 of Elijah's time there were, who had never bowed the knee at any idol-shrine. From the glimpses we have of Elisha's work, of the willing offerings that the people made (2 Kings iv. 42), of the expanding societies where God was worshipped and honoured (vi. 1), we may have some notion of the largeness of effect produced by this prophet's ministry. See Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. pp. 364-370.

He is first mentioned as the son of Shaphat, the agriculturist of Abel-meholah in the valley of the Jordan. While occupied in guiding the plough he received the call of Elijah, and appears ever after to have attended on him (1 Kings xix. 16, 19-21; 2 Kings iii. 11). And how deep the affection was with which he regarded his master the narrative of Elijah's last days on earth sufficiently testifies. At his translation Elisha asked a double portion of the departing prophet's spirit, secured his falling mantle, and had speedily full proof that the Lord God of Elijah was with him (ii. 1-15). Elisha, though a young man, was bald. There were evil-disposed persons in plenty to make a personal defect the subject of sarcasm. But their malice flew higher (Luke x. 16). They mocked at the great miracle just performed. Why should not the bald-head go up after his master? the world would be well rid of both. Such profanity must have an instant significant punishment. And at the word of the prophet, speaking in God's name, wild beasts destroyed a number of these mockers (2 Kings ii. 23-25). Many would hear and fear, and learn to reverence God's ambassador.

There are few chronological notes by which clearly to arrange the miracles of Elisha. One of the first, however, must have been when the three kings of Israel, Judah, and Edom applied to him in their distress for water for their troops. It was when Jehoram reigned over Israel; and Jehoshaphat was yet on the throne of Judah; therefore soon after Elijah's ascension (iii.). And then succeeds a continuous narrative of wonderful works (iv., v., vi., vii., viii. 1-15) grouped with the most consummate skill—just as Matthew wove afterwards that marvellous chaplet of divine parables in Matt. xiii.—but not naming the kings in whose reigns these works were wrought. We have no authority, therefore, for crowding them all into the single reign of Joram; more especially as it is clear, from the seven years of famine mentioned, the events preceding and the events following, that a considerable space of time must have been covered. They are related, the multiplication of the widow's oil, the raising of the Shunammite's son, the healing of the poisonous pottage, the increase of the first-fruits, the recovery of Naaman and punishment of Gehazi, the making of iron to swim, the disclosing of the king of Syria's plans, the blinding of the troops that besieged Dothan, the prophecy of plenty at the siege of Samaria, the interview with Hazael, to exhibit the wonderful work of God by the hand of his servant. And we see by incidental remarks how the prophet's influence grew, and how diligently he traversed the country, and how strong his faith was in divine protection, when his attendant trembled at the hostile bands specially sent forth to seize and destroy him.

When the time was come for the predicted vengeance upon Ahab's house, Elisha was divinely moved to anoint Jehu to be king over Israel. To have proceeded on the errand himself would have been to excite attention, and perhaps cause Joram to take measures for defending his person and crown. Accordingly one of the sons of the prophets is sent to Ramoth-gilead: he is to announce the word of the Lord and to perform the symbolical act; but he is to take no part in the actual revolution. The announcement was enough: Jehu, an ambitious man, readily seized the opportunity; he conspired against his sovereign; and the prophecy against Ahab's house is fulfilled to the very letter (ix.).

The life and ministry of this prophet lasted long, in four reigns at least. He was called by Elijah while Ahab was on the throne; and it would seem that Elijah was translated when Joram was king—in what year we know not. Now Jehu and his son Jehoahaz reigned together forty-five years. But Elisha was still alive when Joash succeeded Jehoahaz; we cannot therefore suppose his ministry after Elijah's ascension to have been less than between 50 and 60 years. He was now therefore an aged man; but the welfare of God's heritage was still dear to him. And, when he was sick in his house, and the king had come to lament over him with the very words which Elisha had used when parted from Elijah, the prophet roused himself to bid Joash take bow and arrows and shoot. It was a symbolical action, and implied the victories of Israel over Syria. The monarch did not understand, or he had little faith in the command: he smote upon the ground but thrice; and Elisha was grieved, and told him he should now smite the Syrians but thrice; had he been more energetic, he might have utterly destroyed the Syrian power. It was therefore with a gloomy prospect for his country that Elisha died (xiii. 14-19).

But God would still put honour on his servant. He was buried; and afterwards, when Moabite bands were ravaging the country, and some one was to be carried to the tomb, the attendants, surprised by the spoilers, hastily thrust the corpse into Elisha's sepulchre. But no sooner had it touched the great prophet's bones than the dead man lived again (20, 21).

Truly by all these wondrous works it was abundantly proved that there was a God in Israel.

ELV'SHAH (possibly this name might be adopted from Elis or Hellas?). One of the sons of Javan (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chron. i. 7). He has been supposed to be the father of the Æolians, or of the inhabitants of Elis. But Kalisch would include all the European Greeks (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., pp. 242, 243).

ELV'SHAH (id.). The 'isles' (maritime regions) of Elishah are mentioned as the locality from which blue and purple were carried to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 7). Kalisch confirms his view above adverted to, that Elishah was Hellas, Greece, by the fact that the shell-fish from which the purple dye was obtained abounded on the coasts of Peloponnesus.

ELI'SHAMA (whom God hears).—1. Prince of the tribe of Ephraim in the wilderness (Numb. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48, 53, x. 22). He appears to have been the grandfather of Joshua (1 Chron. vii. 26, 27).—2. One of the sons of David born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii. 8, xiv. 7).—3. The grandfather of that Ishmael who killed Gedaliah (2 Kings xxv. 25; Jer. xli. 1). He was of the 'seed royal.' He is by some identified with 4. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 41).—5. Another son of David born in Jerusalem (iii. 6). He must have been identical with Elishua (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. xiv. 5).—6. A priest whom Jehoshaphat sent with the book of the law to teach the people (2 Chron. xvii. 8).—7. A scribe, called one of the princes, in Jehoiakim's reign (Jer. xxxvi. 12, 20, 21). Perhaps he was the same with No. 3 or 4.

ELI'SHAPHAT (whom God judges). A captain whom Jehoiada associated with himself for the overthrow of Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

ELI'SHEBA (God her oath). A daughter of Amminadab of the tribe of Judah, whom Aaron married (Exod. vi. 23).

ELI'SHUA (God his salvation). One of David's sons born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. xiv. 5). He is called also Elishama (iii. 6).

ELI'SHMUS (1 Esdr. ix. 28). Eliashib (Ezra x. 27).

ELPU (Judith viii. 1). An ancestor of Judith.

ELI'UD (God of Judah, or God his praise). One in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. i. 14, 15).

ELI'ZAPHAN (whom God protects).—1. A Levite appointed chief of the Kohathites (Numb. iii. 30; 1 Chron. xv. 8; 2 Chron. xxix. 13). He is called also Elzaphan (Exod. vi. 22; Lev. x. 4).—2. A chief of Zebulun, selected to assist Joshua in the allotment of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 25).

ELI'ZUR (God his rock). The prince of the tribe of Reuben at the time of the census in the wilderness (Numb. i. 5, ii. 10, vii. 30, 35, x. 18).

ELKA'NAH (whom God created).—1. One of the sons or grandsons of Korah, whose children did not perish in his rebellion (Numb. xxvi. 11), of the family of Kohath, Levi's son (Exod. vi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 23).—2. The father of the prophet Samuel, a Levite of the family of Kohath, through Korah. Elkanah lived at Ramathaim-zophim, and had two wives, Hannah and Peninnah, but no children by Hannah till her earnest prayer at the sanctuary. He appears to have been a man of prudence and piety, going up to Shiloh every year to sacrifice. More of his history we know not than is mentioned in the account of Samuel's birth and childhood (1 Sam. i., ii. 1-21). His genealogy is given at length in 1 Chron. vi. 26-28, 33-38.—3, 4. Two other Levites of the same line (25, 36; and 26, 35). It is not easy to disentangle the genealogy here, or to see exactly which Elkanah is meant.—5. Another Levite at a later date (ix. 16).—6. One called a Korhite, who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 6).—7. A door-keeper for the ark (xv. 23).—8. A high officer in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 7).

EL'KOSH (God my bow). There are two places which have borne this name, one in Galilee, the other in Assyria, not far from Nineveh. It was at the first, most probably, that Nahum was born or resided. See NAHUM.

EL'KOSHITE. The designation of the prophet Nahum (Nah. i. 1), from the place where probably he was born, Elkosh.

EL'LASAR (the oak, or heap of Assyria). The country of which Arioch was king (Gen. xiv. 1, 9). There have been various conjectures as to this region; some confounding it with Theasar (2 Kings xix. 12); and others putting it in very improbable places. It was, according to Rawlinson, most likely Larsa or Larancha, a city of Lower Babylonia, about half-way between Ur and Erech. Old inscriptions show it to have been a very ancient city. It is now Senkereh.

ELM (Hos. iv. 13). The word here rendered 'elms' is that which is commonly translated 'oak'; see OAK.

ELMO'DAM (perhaps extension, a Greek form of Almodad). One in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 28).

ELNA'AM (God his delight). The father of two of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 46).

ELNA'THAN (whom God hath given).—1. The father-in-law of Jehoiachin (2 Kings xxiv. 8). He is probably the same with that son of Achbor, who vainly interposed to prevent Jehoiakim from burning the roll of Jeremiah's prophecies (Jer. xxvi. 22, xxxvi. 12, 25).—2, 3, 4. Three persons whom Ezra sent to prevail on some Levites to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 16).

EL'ON (an oak).—1. A Hittite, the father of one of Esau's wives, Adah or Bashemath, (Gen. xxvi. 34, xxxvi. 2).—2. A son of Zebulun (xvi. 14; Numb. xxvi. 26).—3. A judge of Israel; who is called the Zebulonite. His administration lasted ten years; he was buried in Aijalon, in the country of Zebulun (Judges xii. 11, 12).

EL'ON (id.). A city in the territory of Dan (Josh. xix. 43). It may possibly be the same with EL'ON-BETH-HA'NAN (oak of the house of grace). A place or district over which, with other places, one of Solomon's commissariat officers was appointed (1 Kings iv. 9).

EL'ONITES. A family of Zebulun, descendants of Elon, 2 (Numb. xxvi. 26).

EL'LOTH (a grove, perhaps palm-grove) 1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Kings xvi. 6, marg.; 2 Chron. viii. 17, xxvi. 2. See ELATH.

ELPA'AL (God his wages). A descendant of Benjamin, whose sons built Ono and Lod, and the neighbouring towns (1 Chron. viii. 11, 12).

EL'PALET (God his deliverance). One of the sons of David born in Jerusalem (1 Chron. xiv. 5). In iii. 6 the name is Eliphelet.

EL-PARAN (the oak of Paran). A spot marking the most south-western point to which the confederate kings advanced (Gen. xiv. 6). See PARAN.

EL'TEKEH (God its fear). A city of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), allotted to the Kohathites (xvi. 23).

EL'TEKON (God its foundation). A city in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 59).

ELTO'LAD (God its generation, or born of God). A city first allotted to Judah, and afterwards transferred to Simeon (Josh. xv. 30, xix. 4). It is doubtless identical with Tolad (1 Chron. iv. 29). Wilton would place it in the Wady el-Thoula or Lussân, where there are a few remains of rude walls and foundations (The Negeb, pp. 177-181).

ELUL' (nought, vain). See MONTHS.

ELU'ZAI (God is my praises, i. e., the object of my praise). One of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5).

ELYMA'IS (Tob. ii. 10). A province of the Persian empire. There does not appear to have been a town of the name (1 Macc. vi. 1): see Winer, Bibl. RWB. art. 'Elam.'

ELYMAS (wise man, sorcerer). The Arabic designation of the Jew, Bar-jesus, who resisted Paul and Barnabas in Cyprus, before the proconsul Sergius Paulus. He was miraculously struck blind (Acts. xiii. 6-12).

ELYME'ANS (Judith i. 6). The Elamites.

EL'ZABAD (whom God hath given).—1. A Gadite captain, who joined David when in hold (1 Chron. xii. 12).—2. A Levite of the sons of Korah, appointed one of the porters (xxvi. 7).

EL'ZAPHAN (whom God protects). A Levite chief of the Kohathites (Exod. vi. 22; Lev. x. 4). He is also called Elizaphan (Numb. iii. 30; 1 Chron. xv. 8; 2 Chron. xxix. 13).

EMBALMING. A process by which dead bodies are preserved from decay. When Jacob died in Egypt, 'Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father, for burial in Canaan.' The process occupied forty days. Joseph also was himself embalmed, that his mummy might be carried with the children of Israel when they left Egypt for Palestine (Gen. l. 2, 3, 26). The embalmers were, we are told, a distinct class of persons, regularly trained for their art; but there is nothing unreasonable in supposing that some of this class were attached to Joseph's household; or, if not, the whole body of them would be ready enough to consider and call themselves the 'servants' of so powerful a viceroy.

According to the accounts given by Herodotus (lib. ii. 86-88) and Diodorus Siculus (lib. i. 91), three modes of embalming were practised in Egypt. The first was the most expensive; its cost being a talent of silver, or about 250*l.* The brain was first extracted, so far as possible, by an iron or bronze hook, through the nostrils, and the rest destroyed by an infusion of caustic drugs. The dissector then, with a sharp Ethiopian stone, made a deep incision about five inches long, in a part previously marked by a scribe in the left side. It was a crime to mutilate a human body; and therefore this dissector, having done his work, ran hastily away. Afterwards the embalmer extracted through the incision which had been made all the intestines, except the heart and kidneys: every part of the cavity was then rinsed with palm-wine, and sprinkled with powdered perfumes. The body was next filled with pure myrrh, cassia, and other aromatics, but not frankincense, sewed up, steeped in natron for seventy days, then washed and enveloped in linen bandages covered with gum. This was a perfect mode of embalming: the features, and the hair of the eye-brows and eye-lids were preserved.

Bandaging a mummy. From a painting.

The second mode cost twenty minæ, or about 8*l.* The bowels were not taken out, nor generally were incisions made, though in some cases existing mummies show them. But oil of cedar was injected by means of syringes, and the body steeped in natron for seventy days. When the oil was drawn off, the intestines came out in a state of dissolution; and, the natron having consumed the flesh, only the skin and bones remained. The cheapest mode was a mere rinsing of the abdomen with syrmæa (a purgative liquid, composed, it is said, of an infusion of senna and cassia), and then steeping the body in natron for seventy days (see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 768, 769).

Now it will be observed that in all these cases seventy days are required for the process; whereas in the embalming of Jacob the time of forty days is specified. But there is no occasion to be disquieted at the discrepancy. The accounts of Herodotus and Diodorus differ in several material points. And, if it be alleged that they wrote in different ages, a similar reply is amply sufficient, viz., that the book of Genesis describes a practice of embalming long anterior to the earliest of these writers. Existing mummies, while they confirm in some respects the account of Herodotus, show in others a great variation. We may therefore well suppose that in the course of centuries different modes of embalming were in use. It is impossible to distinguish in the mummies now existing all the three kinds described above. Those who have made the most careful investigations distribute mummies into but two classes (each with some sub-divisions), one with ventral incisions, and others without them. 'Mummification was customary till the fifth century of the Christian era; but from that time it fell gradually into disuse. The modern Egyptians wash their dead thoroughly in water in which leaves of the lote-tree have been boiled, and use in that operation the fibres of the palm-tree, stop up with cotton every aperture, as the nostrils and ears, shave the body and remove all hair, sprinkle the corpse with a mixture of water, pounded camphor, dried and pounded leaves of the lote or other trees, with rose-water, aloe, and similar perfumes; and they then bind together the ankles, and place the hands upon the breast. If the deceased was a man of property, the body is afterwards wrapped in muslin, in cotton cloth of a thicker texture, striped stuff of silk and a variegated texture; the 'cunning work' patterns with design. Thus this last is said to be 'with cherubims' (xxxvi. 8, 35). Neither kind exactly answered to the notion of modern embroidery. For further discussion and other opinions the reader is referred to Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 547, 548.

EMERALD. One of the precious stones of the high priest's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 18, xxxix. 11). It is said to have been imported into Tyre from Syria, and to have been used there as an ornament (Ezek. xxvii. 16, xxviii. 13). In the margin of the last-named passage 'chrysoprase' appears; cotton intermixed, and a kashmere shawl: white and green are the usual colours: blue, or what approaches it, is generally avoided. The body of a poor man is simply surrounded with a few pieces of cotton, or put into a kind of bag' (Kalisch, ibid. p. 774: see pp. 771-775, for interesting further details of embalming, and of mummies).

A mummy with its inner and outer wrappers.

It does not appear that the Hebrews practised the systematic embalming of the Egyptians. Still some process was employed, tending to soothe surviving friends by arresting or delaying natural corruption. Thus Asa was laid in a bed 'filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art' (2 Chron. xvi. 14). Also the women who had followed Jesus 'bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him' (Mark xvi. 1; Luke xxiii. 56); and Nicodemus 'brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, and 'wound' the body 'in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury' (John xix. 39, 40). In some instances, too, the later Jews embalmed a body in honey, after having covered it with wax (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xiv. 7, § 4: comp. Strabo, Geograph., lib. xvi. 1, § 20).

EMBROIDER, EMBROIDERER, EMBROIDERY. We find the work of the 'embroiderer' spoken of (Exod. xxviii. 39, xxxv. 35, xxxviii. 23) in reference to the priestly vestments and the preparation of the tabernacle, also 'broidered' (xxviii. 4). But it is very doubtful whether the words are properly used. It seems probable that the production called 'cunning work' (xxvi. 1: comp. 31, marg.) was more like embroidery than the 'needle-work' (36) which the embroiderer is said to have made. The 'needle-work' perhaps may mean and other interpretations have been suggested. But there would seem no sufficient ground for disbelieving that the gem intended was really emerald. The rainbow round God's glorious throne is likened to an emerald (Rev. iv. 3); and this stone is described as one of the foundations of the new Jerusalem (xxi. 19).

EMERODS. A disease (Deut. xxviii. 27, 1 Sam. v. 6, 9, 12, vi. 4, 5, 11). There has been some difference of opinion on the subject; but the more probable belief is that the 'emerods' were hæmorrhoidal tumours, or bleeding piles, a disease which is said to be very common in Syria at the present time. The images that the Philistines made must have included the parts affected.

E'MIM (terrors, terrible men). A gigantic race of men, whose seats appear to have been on the eastern side of the Dead sea. They were smitten by Chedor-laomer and his confederates, as well as other gigantic tribes, probably of the same stock with the Emim (Gen. xiv. 5). They occupied the country to the south of the Arnon, from which the Moabites afterwards expelled them, and gave to this particular tribe of giants the name Emim (Deut. ii. 10, 11). Miss Corbaux supposes Sodom their ancient metropolis, and that after its destruction the royal seat was transferred to Heshben. (See Journ. of Sac. Lit., April 1852, pp. 55-80.)

EMMAN'UEL (God with us) (Matt. i. 23). See IMMANUEL.

EMMA'US (hot springs). The name of a village to which two of the disciples were going on the day of the resurrection, when the Lord appeared to them on the way (Luke xxiv. 13-35). According to the received text Emmaus was sixty furlongs, between seven and eight miles, from Jerusalem; but some

MSS. read 160. This last distance would nearly correspond with the position of another Emmaus (see next article), which various ancient writers, and, of the modern, Dr. Robinson, have supposed to be the village intended here. But the circumstances of the narrative forbid the supposition. The day was far spent when the party reached Emmaus. They had then their evening meal; and afterwards the disciples returned to Jerusalem, which they certainly could not have reached by midnight from a place more than twenty miles off. Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 534) is inclined to identify Emmaus with Kuriat el-Aineb.

EMMA'US (1 Macc. iii. 40, 57, iv. 3, ix. 50). A town in the Philistine plain, where Judas Maccabeus gained a victory. It was a place of some importance under the Romans, but was burnt by Varus. Early in the third century it was re-built by Julius Africanus, the Christian writer, and was then called Nicopolis; by which name it is frequently mentioned by Eusebius, Jerome, and others. The modern village 'Amwās occupies its site (Dr. Thomson, ubi sup.).

EM'MER (1 Esdr. ix. 21). Immer (Ezra x. 20).

EM'MOR (an ass). The New Testament form of Hamor (Acts vii. 16). See HAMOR. A discrepancy has been supposed between what Stephen says and the Old Testament history (Gen. xxiii. 16-18, 1. 13; Josh. xxiv. 32). Dr. Lee solves it by pointing out the way in which Stephen repeatedly alludes to the national history, combining different facts in a single phrase; which would be enough to convey to the Jews all he meant to say. See Lee, Insp. of H. Script., pp. 533, 534.

ENA'JIM (Gen. xxxviii. 14, 21, marg.). See next article.

E'NAM (the double spring). A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 34). It could not have been very far from Timnah; and it is possible that this town may be meant in Gen. xxxviii. 14. The rendering there is in the text of our version 'in an open place,' but in the margin 'the door of eyes, or of Enajim.' Taking the word as a proper name (see the Septuagint) the literal meaning is, 'at the doorway' or 'entrance of Enajim,' i.e. Enam.

E'NAN (having eyes). The father of a prince of Naphtali (Numb. i. 15, ii. 29, vii. 78, 83, x. 27).

ENA'SIBUS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Perhaps a corruption of Eliashib (Ezra x. 36).

ENCAMPMENT. The order in which the Israelites encamped in the desert was specially prescribed by divine command. The tabernacle was placed in the centre; and immediately round it were the tents of the house of Levi (Numb. i. 53) in four divisions; Moses and Aaron, with the priests, on the east side (iii. 38), the Gershonites westward (23), the Kohathites southward (29), and the Merarites northward (35). The great host, also in four divisions, encircled these. Three tribes lay to the east, Judah the chief, and in the camp of that tribe Issachar and Zebulun (ii. 2-9). On the south were three other tribes. It was the camp of Reuben;

Reuben first, then Simeon, then Gad, composed it (10-16). The three tribes of Joseph's house lay to the west; Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin (18-24). And on the north side was the camp of Dan, in the order of Dan, Asher, and Naphtali (25-31). And, when they were on march, these mustered at the sound of the silver trumpets (x. 5, 6), in the same order under their respective standards: Judah, with his two associate tribes, leading; then the Gershonites and the Merarites bearing; the tabernacle; next the host of Reuben; then the Kohathites with the sanctuary; and afterwards the host of Ephraim; and the rear-guard, the host of Dan (ii. 17, x. 13-28).

The form of this encampment is generally supposed to be square; but some have maintained that it was circular. Practically, we may most reasonably conclude, it was neither the one nor the other: the nature of the ground in the different halting-places in the desert would modify its form; and it is enough to believe that the prescribed distribution was as far as possible observed without imagining that there could be always perfect regularity. We read of gates to the camp (Exod. xxxii. 26, 27): the dead were buried outside these (Numb. x. 4, 5); also lepers, and various unclean persons, and captives, at least for a while, were to be there (Lev. xiii. 46, xiv. 3; Numb. v. 1-4, xii. 14, 15, xxxi. 19, 24; Josh. vi. 23). The skins, &c., of victims were burnt there, and ashes poured out and uncleanness removed thither, and criminals executed there (Lev. iv. 11, 12, vi. 11, viii. 17, xxiv. 14; Numb. xv. 35, 36; Deut. xxiii. 10-12). Not that any reasonable man supposes that there was one great line of circumvallation round the whole encampment of the nation, which was always to be passed for these purposes; but obviously that places for the occasions specified were to be selected apart from and out of the different clusters of tents, which together formed the vast Israelitish camp.

It was, no doubt, after the model of this that ordinary encampments were made. It is hardly necessary to say that they were pitched where there was a good supply of water (Judges vii. 1; 1 Sam. xxix. 1), or in a place of natural strength, as on a hill (xvii. 3); for armies of all nations, at all times, take similar precautions. They also surrounded a camp with some defence, a 'trench' (xxvi. 5, 7): either an embankment, or a barrier of waggons. They placed sentinels, at least by night (Judges vii. 19; 2 Kings ix. 17; Ezek. iii. 17, xxxiii. 7, 8, 9). The beasts of burden, too, were properly secured (2 Kings vii. 10). An encampment sometimes gave name to a place, as Mahaneh-dan, 'the camp of Dan' (Judges xviii. 12); just as many of our own towns derive their names from camps, e.g. Gloucester, Winchester.

ENCHANTMENT. This word is variously used in our version, and is the rendering of several Hebrew terms. In the case of the Egyptian magicians it describes the means, trick or otherwise, by which they pretended to emulate Moses, and deceived Pharaoh (Exod. vii. 11, 22, viiii. 7). The 'enchancements' (a different original word) which Balaam went to seek were no doubt some kind of omens (Numb. xxiv. 1). This term frequently occurs elsewhere. There is another word rendered 'enchantment' (Eccles. x. 11), where the charming of serpents is meant. Then again the 'enchantments' (yet another Hebrew term is used) noticed in Isai. xlvi. 9, 12 are magical spells. 'The enchanters' in Jer. xxvii. 2 is the translation of the word elsewhere rendered 'observed times' (2 Kings xxi. 6): it is explained by some of predicting from the clouds, and would seem to imply a kind of idolatrous divination. All these various enchantments were prohibited by the Mosaic law (Lev. xix. 26; Deut. xviii. 10); almost all the words which have been referred to being found in those passages. See DIVINATION, MAGIC.

END-IRONS (Ezek. xl. 43, marg.). This, with the addition of 'the two hearth-stones,' is for 'hooks' in the text. End-irons are the irons, on which the spit rests, at the ends of a grate.

EN-DOR (fount of the dwelling). A place territorially in Issachar, but assigned to Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11). It seems that the rout of Sisera and Jabin extended to En-dor (Psal. lxxxiii. 9, 10). It was here that Saul consulted the woman that had 'a familiar spirit,' and was warned by the appearance, which startled the woman, and which the scripture calls Samuel, of his approaching fate (1 Sam. xxviii. 7-25). En-dor retains its ancient name. It is on a slope facing Tabor, at about four miles distance, and is seven or eight miles from Gilboa. Fr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, pp. 445, 446) describes it as now 'a most wretched-looking place.' The declivity of the mountain is perforated with caverns; and most of the habitations are merely walls built round the entrances to these. The cattle are stalled in them as well as the owners.

EN-EGLA'IM (fountain of two calves, or of two pools). A place somewhere near the Dead sea, but of which nothing is known (Ezek. xlvii. 10). Some would identify it with Eglaim; but then one of the letters of the original word must be changed.

EN-GAD'DI (Ecclus. xxiv. 14). En-gedi.

EN-GAN'NIM (fountain of gardens).—1. A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 34).—2. A city in the territory of Issachar (xix. 21), but allotted to the Levites (xxi. 29); for which we find in 1 Chron. vi. 73 Anem substituted. There can be no doubt that Engannim is the modern Jentn, still surrounded by gardens, a place with about 2000 inhabitants, under a governor. It deals largely in the products of the country; but the people are fanatical and unruly. With En-gannim may probably be identified BETH-HAG-GAN, which see.

EN'GEDI (fountain of the kid). A place, originally called Hazezon-tamar, in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv. 62). It stood about the middle of the western shore of the Dead sea, on a gentle slope from the base of the mountains extending to the water. The fountain bursts from the limestone rock at an elevation of 400 feet above the sloping plain, fertilizing the soil around. But the spot is little cultivated. There is no habitation except the tents of a few Arabs; and ruins mark the site of the ancient city. The neighbouring cliffs are full of natural and artificial caves and sepulchres. In these strong-holds of En-gedi David at one time dwelt, eluding the pursuit of Saul. And here flourished the camphire and the vine; and still the wild goats, from which the name was derived, are found upon the rocks of 'Ain Jidy (1 Sam. xxiii. 29, xxiv. 1; 2 Chron. xx. 2; Sol. Song i. 14, Ezek. xlvii. 10).

EN-HAD'DAH (swift fountain). A town of Issachar (Josh. xix. 21).

EN-HAK-KO'RE (fountain of the crier). The spring which burst forth in Lehi on Samson's cry to God after the slaughter of the Philistines (Judges xv. 19). See LEHI.

EN-HAZ'OR (fountain of the village). A town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 37).

EN-MISH'PAT (fountain of judgment) (Gen. xiv. 7). See KADESH.

EN-RIM'MON (fountain of the pomegranate). A place which the children of Judah inhabited after their return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 29). There can be little doubt that this was a town in the south country of Judah; though the constituent parts of the name appear in Josh. xv. 32, xix. 7, Ain and Rimmon or Remmon, as distinct places: comp. 1 Chron. iv. 32, and see AIN. Mr. Wilton has carefully examined the matter, and finds En-rimmon in the modern name Um er-Rumâmtn (The Negeb, pp. 229-233). This place is perhaps the Rimmon of Zech. xiv. 10.

EN-RO'GEL (fountain of the scout, or fuller's fountain). A fountain on the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 16). Here Jonathan and Ahimaaaz waited for intelligence which they might convey to David, at the time of Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. xvii. 17); and here Adonijah made his feast when he aspired to the crown (1 Kings i. 9). Thus En-rogel must have been close to Jerusalem, and it is generally supposed to be the modern well of Job or Nehemiah, Bir Eyub, just below the junction of the valleys of Hinnom and Kedron, a little south of the pool of Siloam; though some would identify it with the fountain of the Virgin, a few hundred yards more north. See Sunday at Home, vol. x. pp. 441-444, for account of a descent into Bir Eyub; which was found to be a true spring.

EN-SHE'MESH (fountain of the sun). This spring appears to have been on the border-line of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 16, 17). Being between En-rogel and 'the going up of Adummim,' it must have been to the east of Jerusalem, beyond the mount of Olives. There is still a spring a mile below Bethany, which may with much probability be believed identical with En-shemesh.

EN-TAP'PUAH (fountain of Tappuah, or the apple-tree). A place or point in the border of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 7). See TAP-PUAH.

ENE'AS (Acts ix. 33, 34). See ÆNEAS.

ENEMES'SAR (Tob. i. 2, 13, 15). A corrupt form of Shalmaneser.

ENE'NIUS (1 Esdr. v. 8).

ENGINE. This word is used exclusively with reference to military matters. The Jews are said to have invented engines for propelling arrows and great stones in Uzziah's time (2 Chron. xxvi. 15), probably by means of a strong spring. It is a confirmation of this statement, that, according to Pliny (vii. 56), the balista, a machine for throwing stones, was devised in Syria; and besides, no such engines are figured in the Assyrian or Egyptian monuments. The engines of Ezek. xxvi. 9 were most likely battering-rams, mentioned under the name of rams (iv. 2, xxi. 22). Those used by the Assyrians appear to have consisted of a strong frame-work on wheels, so covered as to protect the soldiers working it, and armed with one, or sometimes two, pointed weapons. It differed considerably from the more familiarly-known ram employed by the Romans. 'Engines of shot' are mentioned in Jer. vi. 6, marg., xxxii. 24, marg.; Ezek. xxvi. 8, marg., but incorrectly.

ENGRAVE, ENGRAVER, ENGRAVING. In some places where one of these words is used, carving or stone-cutting is intended. But it is evident that the art of engraving, properly so called, was practised at a very early period among the Egyptians and other nations. Thus some device or words were engraven on signet rings (Gen. xxxviii. 18, xli. 42); the names of the twelve tribes on the stones in the high priest's breast-plate, and the shoulder-pieces (Exod. xxviii. 9-12, 21, xxxix. 6, 14); and 'Holiness to the Lord' upon the golden plate of the mitre (xxviii. 36, xxxix. 30). We also have the mention of graving with an iron pen upon a rock (Job xix. 24).

E'NOCH (initiating or initiated, i.e. dedicated).—1. A son of Cain (Gen. iv. 17, 18).—2. One of the most eminent of the antediluvian patriarchs, the son of Jared, and father of Methuselah. He has this remarkable testimony 'that he walked with God;' an expression denoting near communion with the Lord, and conformity to his will. And 'he was not; for God took him,' that is, like Elijah in subsequent times, 'he was translated that he should not see death.' His life was, for the age in which he lived, a short one upon earth, 365 years; but it was a life of faith, pleasing in the eye of his Maker (Gen. iv. 18-24; Luke iii. 37; Heb. xi. 56). St. Jude cites a prophecy of Enoch (14). See next article. In 1 Chron. i. 3, Enoch is called Hanoch.

E'NOCH, THE BOOK OF. There is a prophecy cited in the epistle of St. Jude ascribed to Enoch 'the seventh from Adam' (Jude 14). It is questioned from what source St. Jude obtained this. Now there is nothing incongruous in believing that a sacred writer might state a fact perfectly known to him from an authentic source, though not mentioned in any previous inspired book. In deed there are examples of this. Thus St. Paul appealed to the Ephesians as knowing 'the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, 'It is more blessed to give than to receive' (Acts xx. 35). But these words of the Lord are not recorded by any of the evangelists. Again, the same apostle, addressing Timothy, speaks of Jannes and Jambres withstanding Moses (2 Tim. iii. 8). But no such names are found in the Mosaic history. See also Heb. xi. 24, xii. 21. Well-known words of Enoch, then, may have been handed down; and the inspired apostle may have been moved to embody them in his epistle. There is, however, an apocryphal composition, styled the Book of Enoch; and in it the words appear. Perhaps St. Jude cited them from this work. He would give no sacred impress to it by his citation, any more than St. Paul did to Aratus, Menander, and Epimenides, heathen poets, by his quotations from them (Acts xvii. 28; 1 Cor. xv. 33; Tit. i. 12).

The book of Enoch was well known to the early Christian fathers; and certain fragments of it were preserved. But, as a whole, it was for long supposed to be irrecoverably lost, till, in 1773, Bruce brought from Abyssinia three manuscript copies of it in the Ethiopic language. Archbishop Lawrence printed first an English translation in 1821, and then the Ethiopic in 1838. Since that time the Ethiopic text has been published by Dr. Dillmann at Leipsic, 1851, and a German translation in 1853. The Ethiopic version appears to have been made from the Greek. But the most competent scholars believe that the book was originally composed in Hebrew or Aramæan; especially as it is said that a Hebrew book of Enoch was known to the Jews down to the thirteenth century. It is divided into five parts, comprising various revelations alleged to have been made to Enoch, visions, and parables, and addresses given by him to his children. 'No apocryphal book,' says Mr. Westcott, 'is more remarkable for eloquence and poetic vigour; and the range of subjects which it includes is as noble as its style. In its present form the book aims at little less than a comprehensive vindication of the action of providence, both in the physical and the moral world' (Introd. to the Study of the Gospels, chap. ii. p. 92). It points specially to the judgment reserved for sinners, the triumph prepared for the righteous, and Messiah the divine instrument of the twofold issue. The following is the passage which it is asserted that St. Jude cites: 'Behold he comes with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment upon them, and destroy the wicked, and reprove all the carnal, for everything which the sinful and ungodly have done and committed against him.'

There is considerable difficulty in ascertaining the real date of this book. Ewald is inclined to believe that it consists of four fragmentary compositions, of which the earliest was written in the first years of John Hyrcanus, 144 B.C., that the remaining three followed one the other at intervals of a few years, and that it assumed its present shape as a whole during the first half of the century before Christ. Dillmann attributes the greater part to an Aramæan writer, about 110 B.C., but thinks that certain additions were afterwards made. Mr. Westcott regards it 'as describing an important phase of Jewish opinion shortly before the coming of Christ' (Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 557). But Professor Volkmar, of Zurich, has undertaken to show that the book was produced at the time of the sedition of Bar-cochebas, about 132 A.D., and imagines that it was written by one of the followers of rabbi Akiba. He tries also to show that, assuming that the book of Enoch is cited in Jude, the epistle ascribed to Jude must have been of later date. But he fails, as Dr. Alford observes, to prove 'that the passage cited is so interwoven into the apocryphal book as necessarily to form a part of it, and that it may not itself have been taken from primitive tradition, or even from the report of that tradition contained in our epistle' (The Greek Test., proleg. on Jude, sect. v.). This, then, upon the whole, seems the most probable opinion, that St. Jude incorporated into his epistle a prophecy known to have been uttered by Enoch, and that the writer of the apocryphal work introduced afterwards the same into his own composition. But it is freely admitted that the question is one of considerable difficulty. The reader who desires more information may consult Moses Stuart's Christology of the Book of Enoch, in the American Bibl. Repos., Jan. 1840, pp. 86-137, with the dissertations of Mr. Westcott and Dr. Alford, already cited, and the books referred to by them.

E'NOCH (id.). A city built by Cain, and called after the name of his son (Gen. iv. 17).

E'NOCH (2 Esdr. vi. 49, 51). A name used for Behemoth.

E'NON (John iii. 23). See ÆNON.

E'NOS (man). One of the antediluvian patriarchs, the first-born of Seth (Gen. iv. 26, v. 6, 7, 9-11; Luke iii. 38). The name is given as Enosh in 1 Chron. i. 1. In the days of Enos, we are told, 'men began to call upon the name of the Lord.' Expositors have differed as to the interpretation of these words. Kalisch imagines that the earliest worship was only sacrifice; but that sacrifice was afterwards enhanced and dignified by prayer. So that, when men began to invoke the name of the Lord, either in private prayer or public supplication, a great step in spirituality was taken (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 153, 154). Bush, doubtful whether the rendering of the text, or that of the margin, 'to call themselves by the name of the Lord,' is preferable, sees here a more distinct gathering of God's worshippers, inasmuch as evil was more decidedly manifesting itself (Notes on Gen., iv. 26). Tyler, believing that the promised deliverer, 'He who shall be,' was not at first expected to be a divine Person, whence Eve supposed that Cain was he (Gen. iv. 1), imagines that now it was discovered that Jehovah was a name of God (Jehovah the Redeemer God, pp. 23-25), and remarks that it is hence clear that the early patriarchs were acquainted with the name, and that it is observable that the next who speaks of God uses it (Gen. v. 29).

E'NOSH (man). (1 Chron. i. 1). A form of Enos.

ENSIGN. In almost all the passages where we have this word in our version (Psal. lxxiv. 4 is an exception) the Hebrew is nês; which properly means something lifted up and conspicuous. Hence it is translated 'pole' in Numb. xxi. 8, 9; and it appears to have indicated the signal, either a bare pole or something attached to it, exhibited on a mountain-top or other prominent position, to give an alarm, or to call the people together (Isai. v. 26, xi. 12, xviii. 3). We find the word occasionally rendered in our translation 'banner' or 'standard' (Psal. lx. 4); but it does not mean a military flag. It has, indeed, been thought by some to be a flag in Isai. xxxiii. 23; Ezek. xxvii. 7; but perhaps our version, 'sail,' is in both these passages accurate. The adjunct verb 'implies expanding; and this would hardly suit the notion of a flag, still less that of a mere image or device, probably then used on ship-board instead of a flag. For military ensigns see STANDARD.

EP'APHRAS (contracted from Epaphroditus). A Christian, perhaps a Colossian by birth, who had ministered at Colosse, and probably founded the church there (Col. i. 7, iv. 12). He was with St. Paul at Rome when the letter to the Colossians was written, and he is styled 'fellow-prisoner' (Philem. 23). We know nothing more of him certainly. Tradition makes him bishop of Colosse, and martyr there.

EPAPHRODITUS (Venus-like, beautiful). A Christian who was sent from Philippi with contributions for St. Paul while prisoner at Rome. There he was sick; and a delightful view is afforded of the apostle's tenderness of spirit by the way in which he speaks of one so dear to himself, so dear to the Philippian believers (Phil. ii. 25-30, iv. 18). He was the bearer of the epistle to Philippi. Some have imagined him identical with Epaphras, because the one name is a contract form of the other; but we have no sufficient grounds for coming to such a conclusion.

EPE'NETUS (praised). A Christian to whom being at Rome St. Paul sends a salutation, calling him 'the first-fruits of Achaia,' or of Asia, which seems the preferable reading, 'unto Christ' (Rom. xvi. 5).

E'PHAH (darkness).—1. One of the sons of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chron. i. 33). No tribe has been identified as descending from him; but it may be fairly concluded (from Isai. lx. 6, 7) that there was some connection between Ephah's posterity and the Midianites and Ishmaelites.—2. One of the concubines of Caleb the son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 46).—3. One of Judah's posterity (ii. 47).

E'PHAH (from the Egyptian, a measure, spec. of corn). See MEASURES.

E'PHAI (weary). A Netophathite whose sons joined Gedaliah (Jer. xl. 8).

E'PHER (a calf).—1. A son of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chron. i. 33).—2. A descendant of Judah (iv. 17).—3. A chief of Manasseh east of the Jordan (v. 24).

E'PHES-DAM'MIM (boundary or cessation of blood). A place where the Philistines encamped before the combat of David with Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 1). It is also called Paddammim (1 Chron. xi. 13).

EPHE'SIANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. That the epistle so designated was really the composition of the apostle Paul cannot be reasonably doubted. It is true that some modern critics have chosen to question it, but upon utterly-unsubstantial grounds. For the very earliest and most trustworthy Christian writers either name St. Paul as the author, or substantially acknowledge his authorship of the letter by referring to it as canonical scripture. Of these, to say nothing of Ignatius (Ad Ephes. 12), and Polycarp (Ad Philip. 1, 12), we have the express testimony of Irenæus (Adv. Hæc., lib. i. 8, 5, lib. v. 2, 3), of Clement of Alexandria (Pæd., lib. i. cap. 5, p. 108; Strom., lib. iv. pp. 592, 593, edit. Potter), of Tertullian (De Præsc. Hæc. 36; Adv. Marcion., lib. v. 11, 17), and of many others (see Alford, The Greek Test., vol. iii. prolog. chap. ii. sect. 1); even heretics not denying its genuineness.

No doubt can be felt as to the time and place of writing. The apostle repeatedly calls himself a prisoner (Eph. iii. 1, iv. 1, vi. 20), and yet he was not, it would seem, precluded from preaching the gospel (vi. 19, 20). These circumstances suit better with his confinement at Rome, when all who chose had access to him (Acts xxviii. 30, 31), than with that stricter durance in which he was held at Cæsarea, where merely his acquaintances might visit him (xxiv. 23). We may therefore date this epistle from Rome in the earlier and less severe part of his imprisonment there, about 61 or 62 A.D.

There has been much discussion as to the church or persons to whom this letter was addressed. It has been thought strange that, if writing to the Ephesians, among whom the apostle had himself so diligently laboured, he should have conveyed no personal greetings. But analogy tells the other way. There are no express salutations in several of the epistles to churches (e.g. 2 Cor., Gal., Phil., 1 and 2 Thess.) where St. Paul had preached and resided: there are such salutations to those (e.g. Rom., Col.), which it is known he had not at the time of writing visited. Again, it is said that he speaks only by hearsay of the faith and love of those he was addressing; which could not be made to agree with the circumstances of the Ephesian church. The reply is very natural. St. Paul had heard much of the Ephesians since he had last been with them, just as he had 'heard' of the faith and love of Philemon, to whom nevertheless he had been a spiritual father (Philem. 5, 19). In fact, internal evidence speaks strongly for the Ephesians as the church addressed. For, not to insist on the peculiar propriety of a figurative reference to a temple (Eph. ii. 20-22) to persons who dwelt where there was a temple the wonder of the world, there are delicate, yet very noteworthy, resemblances between the address to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts xx. 18-35) and expressions in this epistle. Examples are given by Dr. Alford (ubi sup. sect. 2). It is, however, urged that the words 'at Ephesus' (Eph. i. 1) are omitted or supplied in a later hand, in the margin of some important manuscripts, such as the Vatican and the recently-discovered Sinaitic codices. Some of the ancient fathers, too, are supposed not to have had these words in their copies. But the grammatical construction of the text would be most peculiar, hardly defensible at all, if the words in question, or similar ones, were not found there. Hence, as the heretic Marcion considered the epistle written to the Laodiceans, two theories have found support; one that this was the epistle referred to in Col. iv. 16. But this is merely conjectural, and is contrary to the whole current of ancient testimony. For, whether or no the words 'at Ephesus' should be inserted, antiquity, with the single exception of Marcion, agrees in the belief that the epistle was intended for the Ephesians. The other hypothesis is that the letter was a circular, and that 'at Ephesus,' 'at Laodicea,' or the like, might appear in different copies, according to the places to which they were respectively transmitted. Many eminent critics regard this hypothesis with favour; and it must be confessed that it would solve some part of the difficulty. But it is probable that, had the apostle intended this epistle for the immediate use of several churches, he would simply have added a direction, as he did to that to the Colossians, that it should be read elsewhere. On the whole the most reasonable conclusion is that it was addressed, according to the general belief of the church, to the Christians at Ephesus.

This letter was written at the same time with those to the Colossians and to Philemon, and despatched by the same messenger. It is very similar in many respects to the epistle to the Colossians. Yet there is a marked difference—for the one is controversial, in the other the apostle teaches the most sublime truths with little or no reference to the enemies who would debase the gospel. We may fairly believe, then, that, having first, according to the circumstances of the church of Colosse, delivered the useful instructions and warnings, he was prompted with a more enlarged scope to exhibit to those, to whom he had for so long testified 'publicly and from house to house' with tenderest love, the widest view of the great mystery of godliness. 'He might pour forth to his Ephesians,' Dr. Alford well observes, 'all the fulness of the Spirit's revelations and promptings, on the great subject of the spouse and body of Christ. To them, without being bound to narrow his energies evermore into one line of controversial direction, he might lay forth, as he should be empowered, their foundation in the counsel of the Father, their course in the satisfaction of the Son, their perfection in the work of the Spirit.'

As the subject of this epistle is great, the style is animated and lofty. There are two principal divisions, (1) the doctrinal portion (i., ii., iii.), and (2) the practical (iv., v., vi.).

I. In the first, after a short address to the faithful in Ephesus (i. 1, 2), the apostle breaks forth into an inscription of praise to the Father who had chosen his people in Christ, and introduced them to the privileges of his family; it being his will to unite all in Christ, in whom those who believed were sealed for their eternal inheritance by the Spirit to God's glory (3-14). He then prays that they might be enlightened to know fully the hope of God's calling, the riches of the glorious heritage he bestows, and the mighty power displayed in raising Christ to the headship of the church, which is his body (15-23). He proceeds to remind them that they were delivered from the death of sin to the living fellowship with Christ by God's grace, not of their own desert (ii. 1-10); they must, therefore, remember their former state, and that it was by the blood of Christ they were brought nigh, in whom as the Peace both Jews and Gentiles were united, and built into a noble temple which God by his Spirit would deign to inhabit (11-22). Knowing, then, the gracious call to the Gentile world, which, once hidden, was now revealed, and which the apostle, in spite of opposition, was to proclaim, they were not to be discouraged at the troubles he on that account endured (iii. 1-13); indeed he prayed that they might have inward strength to know the love of Christ, and be filled with the fulness of God (14-19). A doxology concludes this part (20, 21).

II. In the second part the apostle intreats believers to walk worthy of their calling, showing how they, though each had his several place, were to be one body for mutual edification in love (iv. 1-16). They were to walk in newness of life (17-24), in all holy conduct and christian joy (25-v. 21). He then enforces relative duties (22-vi. 9); and, after a noble exhortation to war a good warfare (10-20), he notices the coming of Tychicus (21, 22), and concludes with a double benediction (23, 24).

EPHESUS. A very celebrated city, the metropolis of Ionia, and of proconsular Asia under the Romans. It was seated in a fertile alluvial plain, south of the river Cayster, not far from the coast of the Icarian sea, between Smyrna and Miletus, distant from the first-named city 320 stadia, or near forty miles. The plain was about five miles from east to west, with a breadth of three miles, bounded on three sides by steep precipitous hills, mount Galesius to the north, mount Pactyas to the east, mount Coressus to the south: on the west it was open to the sea. Ephesus lay on the south of this plain; its buildings partly ascending the hills. Ephesus under the Roman government was a free city, with its own magistrates and other officers (the 'town-clerk' is specially mentioned in Acts xix. 35), and legal assemblies: thus it was what might be called an assize-town, with court-days: we also read of 'deputies,' i. e. proconsuls, there (38).

Ephesus, in a rich country, and advantageously placed for commerce, with a carefully-constructed port, Panormus, became the great emporium of trade for the Asiatic regions. The inhabitants were in consequence luxurious and dissolute. Magic was studied and practised here: see MAGIC. But the great characteristic of the city was its devotion to Artemis or Diana. The temple of this goddess stood at the head of the harbour. It was burnt by Herostratus the night Alexander the Great was born, 355 B.C., but was re-built with amazing splendour. This structure was 425 Greek feet in length, 220 in breadth; and 127 pillars, each 60 feet high, embellished and sustained it, the roof being of cedar beams; so that it was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. From its devotion to its goddess, Ephesus had the title of νεκρορος, 'temple-keeper' (35, marg.), or warden of Diana; and a lucrative trade was driven by those who made 'shrines' (24), or small models of the temple with Diana's statue, phorus (2 Tim. i. 18), the mission of Tychicus (iv. 12), and the apocalyptic epistle to the Ephesian church, which had then declined from its first love (Rev. ii. 1-7). Trophimus was an Ephesian (Acts xxi. 29); and the apostle John is believed to have made Ephesus his residence during the later part of his life. The ruins of this city still exist of great extent; and there is a Turkish village, Ayasuluk, on the site. (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Ephesus.')

EPH'LAL (judgment). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 37).

EPHOD (vestment, that which is girded on). A chief of Manasseh, father of one appointed to superintend the allotment of Caanan (Numb. xxxiv. 23).

EPHOD. A vestment appropriated to the high priest (Exod. xxviii. 4-35). See HIGH PRIEST. An ephod is said to have been Coin of Ephesus, exhibiting the head of the emperor Nero, and on the reverse the temple of Diana with nekoron underneath.

which were eagerly purchased by visitors, who carried them home and set them up in their houses. Games were also held in honour of Diana; and officers called Asiarchs, rendered in our version 'the chief of Asia' (31), superintended them.

Ephesus, the civil and ecclesiastical centre of Asia minor, the meeting-point of oriental religions and Greek culture, would naturally be looked at by the apostle Paul as one of the most important places where the gospel could be planted. There were many Jews there in whose synagogue he might first preach. Accordingly we find that, on his second missionary journey, he paid a short visit to this city. Whether there were any believers already there we know not; nor is anything related of Paul's success. He left, however, Aquila and Priscilla at Ephesus; and they instructed an eloquent Jew of Alexandria, Apollos, who knew only of John's baptism, but preached boldly in the synagogue (xviii. 19-28). Paul afterwards, 'having passed through the upper coasts,' the higher land in the interior to the east, re-visited Ephesus. Of his residence and his labours there, extending over a space of between two and three years, and terminated by a popular tumult, we have a distinct notice (xix.). He afterwards, on his way to Jerusalem, summoned the elders of the Ephesian church to Miletus, and there bade them farewell (xx. 16-38). Other references to this city are found in the charge given to Timothy there (1 Tim. i. 3), the service rendered to the apostle when there by Onesiphorus (2 Tim. i. 18), the mission of Tychicus (iv. 12), and the apocalyptic epistle to the Ephesian church, which had then declined from its first love (Rev. ii. 1-7). Trophimus was an Ephesian (Acts xxi. 29); and the apostle John is believed to have made Ephesus his residence during the later part of his life. The ruins of this city still exist of great extent; and there is a Turkish village, Ayasuluk, on the site. (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Ephesus.') worn by Samuel (1 Sam. ii. 18), by the ordinary priests (xxii. 18), and by David (2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Chron. xv. 27); but this vesture differed from the high priest's, both in the extraordinary ornaments of the latter, and also in the material. The linen of the high priest's ephod is described by another and peculiar word. When idolatrous worship was set up, ephods were sometimes made for it (Judges viii. 27, xvii. 5, xviii. 14, 17, 18, 20).

EPH'PHATHA (be opened). A Syro-Chaldaic word, pronounced by our Lord when miraculously curing a deaf and dumb person (Mark vii. 34).

EPH'RAIM (double land, two-fold increase, very fruitful?). The second son of Joseph, born in Egypt before the famine (Gen. xli. 50-52), and therefore upwards of twenty at Jacob's death. Joseph, when he was apprised of his father's sickness, was anxious to obtain the recognition of his sons Manasseh and Ephraim as interested in the covenant blessing. And Jacob accordingly, outstripping Joseph's anticipation, adopted them as patriarchs, or heads of tribes, equally with his own sons. But he placed the younger, Ephraim, before the elder, Manasseh, 'guiding his hands wittingly,' in spite of Joseph's remonstrance, and prophetically declaring that the posterity of Ephraim should be far greater and more powerful than the posterity of Manasseh (xlviii.). The descendants of any other sons that Joseph might beget were not to be ranked separately, but to be 'called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance.' We can hardly doubt that Joseph did have other sons; and their posterity, perhaps, were sometimes deemed Ephraimites, and sometimes Manassites, according as they chose to locate themselves. And this may account for the reproach once thrown upon some Gileadites, as fugitives, belonging justly neither to the one tribe nor to the other (Judges xii. 5).

Of Ephraim personally we know little more. Three of his sons are enumerated as heads of families in the wilderness (Numb. xxvi. 35). But he had more sons, according to the pedigree preserved elsewhere (1 Chron. vii. 20-27). There is indeed some difficulty in arranging this pedigree. Perhaps the solution proposed by Mr. Birks (Exodus of Israel, chap. v. pp. 59-61) may be regarded as satisfactory. He supposes, first, the descents of Ephraim traced through his son Shuthelah (1 Chron. vii. 20); then those from another son, Zabad, not mentioned in the enumeration of Numb. xxvi., because he and his family were cut off in the raid they made from Egypt on the men of Gath (1 Chron. vii. 21). Deeply grieved was their father Ephraim at this catastrophe; and, when afterwards another son was born to him, he named him, with reference to the calamity, Beriah. Beriah's descendants are next given to Telah inclusive (22-25). Then, lastly, the line of Tahan, another son of Ephraim is chronicled (25-27), through Elishama, prince of Ephraim at the numbering (Numb. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48-53, x. 22), to Joshua (Comp. a somewhat different explanation in Browne's Ordo Sacrorum, part i. chap. vi. § 286, pp. 304-307).

At the first census in the wilderness, the number of the tribe of Ephraim was 40,500. Their encampment was to be on the west side of the tabernacle, and on march they were to head the third division (Numb. i. 32, 33, ii. 18, 19). At the second census they had diminished to 32,500 (xxvi. 37). But we may well believe that this numerical deficiency was more than counterbalanced by the fact that the great captain, under whose guidance the Israelites entered the promised land, was an Ephraimite. And, besides, as above noticed, some of the posterity of Joseph's other sons may have transferred themselves to Manasseh.

The tribes of Judah, Ephraim, and Manasseh first took their inheritance; and the boundaries of Ephraim's territory are given in Josh. xvi. (comp. 1 Chron. vii. 28, 29). But, from our imperfect knowledge of some of the places mentioned, we are not able to trace very exactly the boundary-line. The territory abutted on the Jordan to the east, and on the Mediterranean to the west; in the south it was contiguous to Benjamin's lot, and probably a part of Dan; the frontier running from near Jericho in a north-easterly direction to the neighbourhood of Japho or Joppa; while in the north it was separated from Manasseh by the river Kanah, and a line extending thence to the Jordan by Tappuah (Josh. xvii. 8-10): see Smith's Joshua and his Times, chap. xiv. pp. 214-216. Mr. Grove estimates the district allotted to Ephraim and western Manasseh 'at 55 miles from east to west by 70 from north to south, a portion about equal in extent to the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk combined' (Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 567). It was a rich and fertile territory, admirably situated in the heart of Palestine. What was called 'mount Ephraim' (perhaps extending across the border of Benjamin) consisted of rounded limestone hills, among which were valleys and plains, well-watered, yielding abundantly, as Moses had predicted, 'the precious things of the earth and fulness thereof' (Deut. xxxiii. 16). The tribes were not at first contented with the size of their allotted portion, but were told by Joshua (not without a touch of irony) that, if they were, as they called themselves, a great people, they ought to go boldly and occupy the adjacent mountain and woodland country (Josh. xvii. 14-18).

Not only was Ephraim located in the centre of the land, but the tabernacle was set up within their territory at Shiloh (xviii. 1), where it continued through the time of the judges. The influence of the tribe was thereby increased; and we find it bearing itself very haughtily. Examples of this we have in the remonstrance made to Gideon after his first victory, which that leader judged it prudent to pacify by a flattering answer (Judges vii. 24, 25, viii. 1-3). They were still more incensed with Jephthah, because they said he had not solicited their assistance. Jephthah, however, was not the man to yield: he boldly attacked and defeated them, and when they fled intercepted the fugitives at the passages of Jordan, so that there perished in that disastrous quarrel 42,000 (xiii. 1-6). It is evident, however, in spite of this heavy blow, that a rivalry prevailed between Ephraim and the great tribe of Judah. The Ephraimites did not at first submit to the authority of David (2 Sam. ii. 8, 9); and, though after the death of Ish-bosheth, a large body of them went to Hebron to join David (1 Chron. xii. 30), and that monarch could speak of Ephraim as the strength of his head (Psal. lx. 7), yet the jealousy sometimes broke out (2 Sam. xix. 40-43). David had his ruler in Ephraim (1 Chron. xxvii. 20), and Solomon his commissariat officer (1 Kings iv. 8). Still the spirit and weight of the tribe were so great that Rehoboam found it necessary to repair to Shechem, a city within its borders, for his inauguration (xii. 1). And there, on his foolish refusal of their demands, the ten tribes revolted, established a different mode of worship; and ever after Ephraim was the main support of a northern kingdom, which came to be designated by its name, and the re-union of which with Judah was the hope of the prophets as the fulfilment of Israel's glory (Isai. vii. 2, xi. 13; Ezek. xxxvii. 15-22; Hos. iv. 17). The subsequent history of Ephraim was that of the kingdom of Israel.

It may be observed that some peculiarities of dialect seem to have characterized the Ephraimites (Judges xii. 6).

EPH'RAIM (id.).—1. The place by which was Baal-hazor, where Absalom had a sheep-farm (2 Sam. xiii. 23). It was most likely a town of the name, rather than the territory of the tribe; but its locality, or identity with any other Ephraim, can merely be conjectured.—2. A city to which our Lord withdrew after the raising of Lazarus, and the counsel then taken by the priests and rulers to put him to death (John xi. 54). It is described as near the wilderness, that is perhaps the wild hill-country north-east of Jerusalem, towards the valley of the Jordan. Robinson believes it the Ophrah of the Old Testament, and would identify it with the modern et-Taiyibeh, five or six miles east of Beth-el, and about sixteen from Jerusalem, seated on a conical hill, and commanding a view of the Jordan valley and the Dead sea.

EPH'RAIM, GATE OF. One of the gates of Jerusalem (2 Kings xiv. 13; 2 Chron. xxv. 23; Neh. viii. 16, xii. 39). It must have been in the northern wall of the city, perhaps near the modern gate of Damascus.

EPH'RAIM, MOUNT. See EPHRAIM, MOUNTAIN.

EPH'RAIM, WOOD OF. The place where the defeat of Absalom occurred (2 Sam. xviii. 6). It must have been east of the Jordan, not far from Mahanaim, where David's head-quarters were. But it is difficult to account for the name Ephraim being applied to such a locality. It has indeed been suggested that the slaughter of the Ephraimites at the passes of Jordan by Jephthah and the Gileadites (Judges xii. 1-6), might have left some such memorial. But Mahanaim was a considerable distance, perhaps too far, from the river.

EPH'RAIMITE. A descendant of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 10; Judges xii. 4-6).

EPH'RAIN (the two fawns). A city which, with some dependent villages, Abijah took from Jeroboam (2 Chron. xiii. 19). It may be the same with Ophrah.

EPHRA'TAH (land, region, or perhaps fruitful). The wife of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 50, iv. 4), called also Ephrath.

EPHRA'TAH (id.).—1. A name of Beth-lehem, called also Ephrath (Ruth iv. 11; Mic. v. 2). See BETH-LEHEM, CALEB-EPHRA'TAH.—2. The word occurs in Psal. cxxxii. 6, where, according to Gesenius, it means Ephraim. If so, the reference may be to the abode of the ark in Shiloh.

EPH'RATH (id.). The wife of Caleb the son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 19), called also Ephrathah (50, iv. 4).

EPH'RATH (id.). An ancient name of Beth-lehem (Gen. xxxv. 16, 19, xviii. 7).

EPHRA'THITE. This designation appears to be used both for an inhabitant of Beth-lehem, and for an Ephraimite. In Ruth i. 2; 1 Sam. xvii. 12, it manifestly means Beth-lehemite: in Judges xii. 5, it as manifestly indicates Ephraimite, and is so rendered in our version. It is less easy to decide in other cases. One occurs in 1 Sam. i. 1. But the probability is that the word here shows some connection with Beth-lehem; as a member of a family of Levites (such as Elkanah) would hardly be described (even if locally resident in Ephraim) as an Ephraimite. Jeroboam is called an Ephrathite (1 Kings xi. 26). But there is little to connect him with Ephraim.

It is true he was made 'ruler of all the charge of the house of Joseph' (26); Zereda, however, his city, was in Manasseh. As little is recorded connecting him with Beth-lehem. No certain decision, therefore, can be made.

EPH'RON (fawn-like). The son of Zohar, a Hittite, to whom Abraham applied for the purchase of a field and cave in Machpelah, for a burying-place. Ephron responded to the application in oriental fashion, that he would give the field and cave. But this was understood to be an ordinary respectful compliment; and Abraham paid 400 shekels of silver for the purchase (Gen. xxiii. 8-18, xxv. 9, xlix. 29, 30, l. 13).

EPH'RON (id.). The cities of mount Ephron are mentioned on the north-western border of the territory of Judah (Josh. xv. 9). The 'mount' is supposed to be the heights west of the Wady Beit-Hanina.

EPH'RON (1 Macc. v. 46; 2 Macc. xii. 27). A place east of the Jordan.

EPICURE'ANS. A philosophic sect, which derived its origin from Epicurus, of Athenian descent, but born in Samos 341 B.C. He lived much in Athens, where he had a garden in which he delivered his lessons to his disciples: he died 270 B.C. He divided the whole field of knowledge into canonic, physics, and ethics; the first two being subordinate to the last. Canonic treated of the means by which physical and ethical knowledge might be obtained, and of the conditions or criteria of truth. Physically he taught that the universe consists of matter reducible to atoms, and space in which matter moves according to a natural tendency, thus forming the different bodies which exist. In his ethics Epicurus denied that there was a Creator of the world; still he believed that there were gods, to be worshipped for the excellence of their nature: they lived in quiet, and did not interfere with the government of the universe. He made good and evil depend on the increasing of pleasure and diminishing of pain, or the reverse; esteeming the pleasures and pains of the mind superior to those of the body, so that a happy life must be a virtuous life. The soul, he taught, was indissolubly connected with the body. Hence it will be seen that the dogmas of Epicureanism, which in many degenerated into mere sensualism, were strongly in opposition to the truths of the gospel. Consequently the Epicureans at Athens, though differing from the Stoics in the rejection of absolute destiny, and on other points, yet equally with them ridiculed the doctrines of St. Paul (Acts xvii. 18).

EPIPH'ANES. (1 Macc. i. 10, x. 1). See ANTIOCHUS, 3.

EPISTLE. Epistles, or letters, are not likely to be often written or despatched in early phases of society. The art of writing is not widely extended; nor would there be much facility in sending from place to place. Anciently we hear little of letter-writing; nor is it by any means so common even at the present day in the east as among ourselves. We therefore find, in scripture history, intelligence conveyed by messengers (Gen. xxxii. 3-6; Numb. xxiv. 12; Judges xi. 13; 1 Sam. xi. 9; 2 Sam. xi. 23, 25; 1 Kings xx. 5; Job i. 14, and elsewhere); though it is not by any means improbable that, in some of the cases just referred to, the messengers might bear letters with them. In the time of David epistles are first noticed (2 Sam. xi. 14); and other instances follow (e.g. 1 Kings xxi. 8, 9; 2 Kings v. 5-7, x. 1-6; 2 Chron. ii. 11-16, xxi. 12-15; Isai. xxxvii. 14, xxxix. 1; Jer. xxix. 1, 3). Special messengers were sent to carry the letters; or advantage was taken of travellers proceeding to the place to be communicated with. The Hebrew kings sometimes dispersed their proclamations by runners or couriers; an establishment of these being probably attached to the court. There was such an establishment more fully organized in Persia (Esth. viii. 10); of which Xenophon gives an account (Cyrop., lib. viii. cap. vi. 17, 18). At present letters themselves are generally unsealed in the cast, but, if sent to persons of distinction, they are enclosed in a handsome sealed bag: in scripture we find letters sealed (2 Sam. xi. 14; 1 Kings xxi. 8: comp. Job xxxviii. 14). The seal was often a ring, on which perhaps the name was engraved, or some other known device (Gen. xxxviii. 18; Exod. xxviii. 21; Esth. iii. 12, viii. 10). An unsealed letter seems to have been regarded as a mark of discourtesy (Neh. vi. 5).

The epistles of the New Testament, specially so called, form a part or division of that sacred book, which may be termed the doctrinal part. They contain the record of apostolic teaching. Pre-supposing the facts delivered in the historical books, and often appealing to them, they are a kind of inspired comment upon them, and show how the principles of Christian truth have their influence, and are exemplified in the daily life of believers. Growing errors were thus confuted, practical difficulties solved, differences composed, abuses reformed, men stirred up to holy zeal in Christ's service, and encouraged to steady perseverance under the trials which beset the infant church. The principles thus applied are those which are always to guide professing Christians; and it is manifest that the epistolary form in which the apostolic instructions are conveyed exhibits the working life of those times more vividly than if any other mode of teaching had been adopted. This relative position of the Gospels and Epistles must always be borne in mind. Misapprehension will thus be avoided; and the one will not be set against the other, but both be regarded as necessary parts of a whole, each having its assigned office and occupying its fitting place.

The Epistles of the New Testament are twenty-one; fourteen of which are generally ascribed to St. Paul, all these bearing his name, except that to the Hebrews, respecting the authorship of which there is a question. The other seven are from the pens of James, Peter, John, and Jude. These are called catholic or general epistles; either because they were not (the most of them) directed to particular churches or persons, or because, while the authority of some of them was at first questioned, the first of Peter and the first of John were at once acknowledged, and the rest obtained afterward the same general sanction. An epistle usually begins with the names of the writer and of the persons addressed. Principles are then laid down; and afterwards the resulting duties are enforced. A benediction closes the whole. St. Paul commonly used an amanuensis, and subjoined only his autograph authentication. In one case the amanuensis sends his salutation (Rom. xvi. 22).

Commentaries on the Epistles are of course to be found in those on the New Testament generally. Bengel's Gnomon may be noted as very valuable; Macknight's Commentary on the Epistles is useful; and there are many later expositions on one or more separately. Some of these are noted in the articles on the various Epistles.

Commentary epistles from one church to another, in favour of an individual, are sometimes mentioned (Acts xviii. 27).

ER (watchful).—1. The eldest son of Judah, who, because of his wickedness, was cut off by God's judgment (Gen. xxxviii. 3-7, xlv. 12; Numb. xxvi. 19; 1 Chron. ii. 3).—2. A descendant of Judah by Shelah (iv. 21).—3. A person named among our Lord's ancestors (Luke iii. 28).

E'RAN (id.). One of the descendants of Ephraim (Numb. xxvi. 36).

ER'ANITES. A family of Ephraim, descended from Eran (Numb. xxvi. 36).

ERASTUS (amiable). A Christian, chamberlain or treasurer of Corinth (Acts xix. 22; Rom. xvi. 23; 2 Tim. iv. 20). It is impossible to say whether these references all belong to the same person.

E'RECH (length). One of the cities of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen. x. 10), in southern Babylonia. Formerly it was supposed identical with Edessa; but that is in the north, near the sources of the Chaboras. Erech is therefore, with more reason, believed to be the Orchoe of Ptolemy, among the marshes formed by the canals of the Euphrates, corresponding with the modern Wurka. It is eighty-two miles south, and forty-three east from Babylon on the Euphrates; a vast mound called el-Assagah (the place of pebbles), or Irka and Irak, covering the vicinity. It is thought to have been a city consecrated to the moon, and is a kind of necropolis, great numbers of tombs and coffins having been found here. To Erech belonged the Archevites (Ezra iv. 9). For interesting notices of the ruins and excavations at Wurka, see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 258, 293.

E'RI (watching, i. e., worshipping Jeŕohovah). One of the sons of Gad (Gen. xli. 16; Numb. xxvi. 16).

ER'ITES. A family of Gad, descended from Eri (Numb. xxvi. 16).

ESAYAS (Matt. iii. 3, iv. 14, viii. 17, xii. 17, xiii. 14, xv. 7; Mark vii. 6; Luke iii. 4, iv. 17; John i. 23, xii. 38, 39, 41; Acts viii. 28, 30, xxviii. 25; Rom. ix. 27, 29, x. 16, 20, xv. 12). The Greek form of ISATAH, which see.

E'SAR-HAD'DON (gift of fire). A powerful king of Assyria, son and successor to Sennacherib (2 Kings xix. 37; Isai. xxxviii. 38). It has been supposed that this prince was placed by his father at Babylon as viceroy; but there is no sufficient proof of this. Nothing, therefore, is certainly known of Esar-haddon till his accession to the throne of the empire, about 680 B.C.; nor are we able to say whether he was Sennacherib's eldest son. He was one of the mightiest of his race. He waged war with the tribes of Media: he extended his authority over the regions of Asia, between the Armenian mountains, the Persian gulf, and the Mediterranean: he was styled the conqueror of Egypt and Ethiopia; and he alone of the Assyrian kings did not entrust Babylon to a vassal prince, but reigned there himself, making it his residence alternately with Nineveh. This lasted for thirteen years: whether that was the whole length of his reign, or whether, retiring to Nineveh, he then placed a feudal chief at Babylon, has not been ascertained. It is probable, however, that his reign lasted in all about twenty years. Esar-haddon located Assyrian colonists in Samaria (Ezra iv. 2); and it can hardly be doubted that it was he who, as king of Assyria at Babylon, held Manasseh prisoner there, but afterwards released him (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11-13). This monarch built a palace at Babylon; bricks from which have been obtained, bearing his name. He built other palaces elsewhere, and thirty temples; and inscriptions have been discovered in which he boasts of the magnificence of his works. The south-west palace at Nimroud is said to be the best preserved of them. It is a remarkable structure, but has suffered by fire. Esar-haddon would seem to have been succeeded by his son Asshur-bani-bal.

ESAU (hairy). One of the twin sons (the eldest) of Isaac and Rebekah: he received his name from his being at his birth red, covered as it were with a hairy cloak (Gen. xxv. 24-26). It had been foretold to Rebekah that the elder of her sons should serve the younger (23). Isaac, nevertheless, placed his chief affection upon Esau. For he was a bold and successful hunter, of an impulsive nature, with many of the qualities which have in all ages made a daring youth the darling of a parent's heart (27, 28). Of the spiritual blessing to be inherited by Abraham's seed Esau recked little: hence he is called 'profane' (Heb. xii. 16). He came in faint one day from the chase, and saw Jacob preparing lentile-pottage. He demanded it to satisfy his hunger: and Jacob, always calculating, and no doubt aware of the prediction, thought it a good opportunity to obtain a recognition of his title to the birth-right. Esau heedlessly complied. A special covenant appears to have been made, and a new name imposed on Esau, viz., Edom, which was borne by his posterity (Gen. xxv. 29-34). After this he continued his roving independent life, at forty marrying two females of the daughters of the land, and to the grief of his parents (xxvi. 34, 35), and not improbably fixing very soon his chief residence in Seir (xxxvi. 6-8); that wild rocky country just suiting an Arab chief of habits such as his. Isaac still treated Esau as his first-born, and feeling the weight of years determined to pronounce on him a solemn blessing. He summoned him to his presence, bade him prepare materials for a feast, and promised then to bless him 'before the Lord.' The history of Jacob's deception and his brother's disappointment may be read in xxvii. Full of wrath, Esau determined on the first favourable opportunity to kill the deceiver. But, when Jacob was sent for safety to Padan-aram, on the plea that there was danger that he too might marry a heathen, Esau, whose natural affection for his father was strong, thought to gratify him by taking also a daughter of Ishmael (xxviii. 8, 9). Esau now grew very rich and powerful in Seir; and, when Jacob returned to Canaan, and sent a humble message to him, he received him generously, affectionately; his former wrath being all forgotten (xxxiii. 1-16).

Of Esau's personal history, we have only the further notice that he joined with Jacob in burying their father (xxxv. 29). For a notice of his posterity see EDOM.

ESAU (1 Esdr. v. 29). A form of Zihai (Ezra ii. 43).

ESAY (2 Esdr. ii. 18; Ecclus. xviii. 20-22). Isaiah.

ESDRAE'LOM (Judith vii. 3). Identical with

ESDRAE'LOM. This is the more generally used name of the plain or valley of Jezreel (Josh. xvii. 16); of which it is a Greek form, used in the Apocrypha (Judith iii. 9, iv. 6) with the variations of Esdraelom and Esdrelom (i. 8). It is also termed in scripture the valley of Megiddo, that town being on its southern border (Zech. xii. 11), and by Josephus the great plain. The plain of Esdraelom (excluding branching offshoots) is of triangular shape; the north side, abutting on the hills of Galilee, is thirteen or fourteen miles in length; the south-west bounded by the highlands of Samaria, about twenty; while the east from En-gannim to the hills below Nazareth is perhaps eighteen. It is by no means 'a dead level,' says Dr Thomson, 'the western half having a decided dip toward the sea; while its different parts roll up in long swells like gigantic waves, terminating in Jebel ed-Duhay (Little Hermon) in the centre, and the rocky ridges of Zer'in and Em Gabileh toward the south (The Land and the Book, p. 477). Besides its main extent, three great arms are thrown out eastward between Gilboa and Little Hermon. That most to the north runs up between Tabor and Little Hermon: into it Barak descended (Judges iv. 14): that in the centre is properly the valley of Jezreel: it reaches to the banks of the Jordan, embracing Beth-shean to the east. Here were the Midianites whom Gideon attacked (vii. 1); and here Saul suffered his fatal overthrow (1 Sam. xxix. 1, xxxi.). The southern branch is between Gilboa and En-gannim; Ahaziah fled across it from Jehu (2 Kings ix. 27). This portion of the country belonged specially to Issachar; but it is generally renowned as the great battle-field, in one or other of its parts, of Israelitic history; some examples of which have been already given. Chariots and cavalry, of little use in the hill-country, availed in the comparative level of Esdraelom; and Canaanites, Midianites, Amalekites, Philistines, and Syrians, in earlier or later times, occupied it; till at last Josiah met here the Egyptian hosts (xxiv. 29), and received his death-wound. In spring and early summer this plain is covered with luxurious vegetation; the cultivated portions producing the richest crops; but it is desolate, with scarcely a village in it, swept over by the wild Arab tribes in search of plunder. Round the borders, however, of the plain of Esdraelon were many of the most noted places in bible history, Nain, Nazareth, &c.; and through it ran the Kishon. It is now called Merj ibn 'Amir, the plain of the son of Amir.

ESDRAS. The Greek form of Ezra (1 Esdras viii. 1; 2 Esdr. i. 1, and elsewhere).

ESDRAS, THE BOOKS OF. Of the canonical authority of these books there is no occasion to speak. For, though there is some respect paid to them by ancient writers, and one at least may have been included in some of the old catalogues, yet they are not received even by the church of Rome, being excluded from the canon as settled by the council of Trent. In the sixth article of the church of England they are denominated 'the third and fourth books of Esdras'; as the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah were, according to old nomenclature, the first and second books.

The first apocryphal book is for the most part a translation of the genuine Ezra, pre-faced by the last two chapters of Chronicles, with a piece of Nehemiah at the end. The order, however, of Ezra is departed from: the reading of the law, too, is placed at an earlier date, with no reference to Nehemiah; and the translator took great liberties with the original text; if, indeed, his copy was conformable to that which we have. But one part (iii. 1—v. 6) is original, narrating a contest said to have taken place before Darius on the question, What was the strongest? Zorobabel was the victor, and as a reward had permission for the Jews to return and re-build their city and temple. There are contradictions discoverable; and it seems likely that the book in its present state is fragmentary and incomplete. The compiler is supposed to be a Greek-speaking Jew or Hellenist, resident in Palestine. And, as Josephus was acquainted with it, and followed it, the book may probably be assigned to the first century before Christ. The style is good; but the work is of no historical but only of some philological and critical value. There are several versions extant, Latin, Syriac, and Armenian.

The second book of Esdras is a curious specimen of what is called the Jewish apocalyptic literature. It well deserves attention as illustrating the state of the Jewish mind in special reference to their Messianic anticipations. It consists of an introduction (i., ii.), then a series of visions (iii.—xiv.), concluding with an appendix (xv., xvi.). But the introduction and appendix have no real connection with the intermediate chapters, and are, there is every reason to believe, of later date. The original portion is, as has been said, a series of visions, in which the writer, who assumes to be Ezra, is instructed in certain mysteries of the moral world, and receives assurance that the righteous will finally triumph. A variety of extraordinary legends are included. Mr. Westcott contrasts Esdras with the book of Enoch of possibly an earlier date: 'The fundamental difference of tone between the two'—the earlier expressed joyous anticipation—'appears to explain their divergences in detail. The burden of Esdras is throughout, "How long, O Lord?" The present world is utterly corrupt; a few only shall share in the promised redemption. Fasting and tears are the preparation for his visions; and the seer no longer looks upon the mysteries of heaven, but listens to them as they are revealed by the ministry of angels. Everywhere the language is that of an exile among the foul corruptions of Egypt, to whom the promised land is no longer the gathering-field of nations, "the joy of the whole earth." The "woes of the Messiah" are described with a terrible fulness which is hardly exceeded by the despairing traditions of the Talmud' (Introd. to the Gospels, chap. ii. pp. 102, 103). The date of this composition is undetermined. Some place it in the first century before Christ (from 40 to 25 B.C.); others long after (94 or 95 A.D.). Perhaps the earlier date is more probable. But the introduction and appendix are clearly of Christian times; and there is much reason to believe that in the visions some interpolations have been made by a Christian pen. A friend suggests, for some portions at least, the date of Macrinus: comp. xi., xii. with Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, chap. vi. The original appears to have been in Greek: this, however, is lost; and the Latin version was for a long time the only one known. An Arabic text of uncertain date, and not yet printed, was discovered in two Bodleian MSS. in the 17th century; likewise an Ethiopic text, not older than the fourth century, found also in a Bodleian MS., was printed by the late archbishop Lawrence in 1820. These Arabic and Ethiopic texts do not contain chaps. i., ii., xv., xvi., or the interpolations supposed to be of Christian origin in the visions. There are some other slight variations. All the book was written in Egypt.

ESDRE'LOM (Judith 1.8). See ESDRAELON.

ESEBON (Judith v. 15). Heshbon.

ESEB'RIAS (1 Esdr. viii. 54). Sherebiah (Ezra vii. 24).

E'SEK (strife). A well in the valley of Gerar, so called because, when Isaac's servants had digged it, the herdmen of Gerar strove with them for it (Gen. xxvi. 19, 20).

ESH'-BAAL (Are of Baal, or perhaps Baal's man). One of the sons of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39). He is doubtless identical with ISH-BOSHETH, which see. Baal and Bosheth or Besheth (shame) are often interchanged in proper names.

ESH'BAN (reason, or man of understanding). One of the descendants of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26; 1 Chron. i. 41).

ESH'COL (a cluster). An Amorite chieftain dwelling at Hebron, who, with his two brothers Aner and Mamre, joined Abraham in his attack on the confederate kings (Gen. xiv. 13-24).

ESH'COL (id.). The spies sent into Canaan explored a valley or wady thus named, and brought from it to the camp a cluster of grapes so weighty that it was carried between two men on a staff (Numb. xiii. 23, 24, xxxii. 9; Deut. i. 24). Eshcol was most probably not far from Hebron.

ESH'EAN (prop. support). A town in the mountainous district of Judah (Josh. xv. 52).

E'SHEK (oppression). A Benjamite, descended from Saul (1 Chron. viii. 39).

ESHKALO'NITES. The inhabitants of Ashkelon (Josh. xiii. 3).

ESH'PAR. A Hebrew word found only in 2 Sam. vi. 16; 1 Chron. xvi. 3; where in our version 'a good piece of flesh.' It is more likely a measure of wine, or other drink.

ESH'TAOL (possibly retreat). A city in the plain country, first assigned to Judah (Josh. xv. 33) and afterwards to Dan (xix. 41). It was in this neighbourhood that Samson first began to show his mighty strength, and here between Zorah and Eshtaol he was buried (Judges xiii. 25, xvi. 31). From these places went the band of Danites who attacked and occupied Laish (xviii. 2, 8, 11).

ESH'TAULITES. The inhabitants of Eshtaol (1 Chron. ii. 50).

ESHTEMO'A (obedience). A person, called the Maachathite, in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 19).

ESHTEMO'A (id.). A city in the mountains of Judah, called also Eshtemoah (Josh. xv. 50), allotted to the priests (xxi. 14; 1 Chron. vi. 57). This was one of the places which David used to haunt; and to the inhabitants of which he sent presents (1 Sam. xxx. 28). In 1 Chron. iv. 17 Ishbah is said to be the father, i. e. founder or first Hebrew settler, of Eshtemoa. It is still called Semu'a, a large village seven miles south of Hebron, where are considerable ruins.

ESHTEMOH' (id.). (Josh. xv. 50). Identical with Eshtemoa.

ESH'TON (womanish, uxorious). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 11, 12).

ES'LI (perhaps whom Jehovah reserved). A person in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 25).

ESO'RA (Judith iv. 4).

ESPOUSE. See MARRIAGE.

ES'RIL (1 Esdr. ix. 34).

ES'ROM (Matt. i. 3; Luke iii. 33). The Greek form of Hezron.

ESSE'NES. There is no express mention of the Essenes in scripture. They were, however, an important body among the Jews, one of the three most noted sects; and it is possible that, though not named, they, or persons influenced by their principles, may be referred to in Matt. xix. 11, 12; Col. ii. 8, 16, 18, 23.

The learned are by no means agreed as to the derivation of their name: it is useless, therefore, to transcribe mere conjectures. Of their origin, also, little is known. Men of a devout cast would naturally cherish desires after perfect purity; and it is likely that those, who in or before the Maccabean times had fled into deserts and caves to escape persecution, persuaded themselves that sanctity would be promoted by retirement from the world. Such notions are sure to become gradually more strict; and so each successive generation refined upon the practice of its predecessors, till a system of ascetic mysticism was fully developed. Those who wished to join them had to pass through two periods of probation. They were admitted to certain privileges at the end of a twelvemonth; but it was not till their manners had been tried for another term of two years that they were received altogether into membership. The actual tenets of the sect did not differ greatly from those of the Pharisees: it was in the rigour of their life that they stood out distinguished from them. They honoured Moses next to God, and observed the sabbath with peculiar strictness. They did not offer sacrifices at Jerusalem, on account of their own special rules of purity, but they sent their gifts thither. They admitted the immortality of the soul, but are said to have denied the resurrection of the body. They maintained the absolute power of God, and disapproved of dialectics and the various forms of natural philosophy. They employed themselves chiefly in agriculture, regarding slavery, war, and commerce as decidedly unlawful. They were devoted to contemplation and silence; and it was only those who had not quite withdrawn from association with other men who tolerated marriage. The Essenes, properly so called, were limited to Palestine and Syria, and were reckoned by both Philo and Josephus at about 4000. But there was a still further development of mysticism. The Therapeutæ, as the Egyptian ascetics were denominated, relinquished the bodily labours, in which their Palestinian brethren employed themselves, and became exclusively contemplative. The law they considered altogether allegorical, and dedicated their whole time to the study of its inner meaning. After the Jewish war the Essenes disappear from the page of history.

A large account of the Essenes may be found in Prideaux, Connection, vol. ii. pp. 291-309. To the information contained there later writers have added little; see, however, Westcott, in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 581-583; see also a notice of the variations of modern authors respecting their origin in Gieseler, Kirchen-gesch., vol. i. § 15, pp. 49, 50, note 9.

ESTHER (a star, the planet Venus). A Hebrew maiden, the daughter of Abihail, of the tribe of Benjamin. At the death of her father and mother she was adopted by her cousin Mordecai, the descendant of a Jew who had been carried away captive with Jehoiahin. Mordecai resided at Shushan, or Susa. See MORDECAI. On the repudiation of Vashti, Ahasuerus (that is Xerxes; see AHASUERUS, 2), king of Persia, ordered a large number of young virgins to be collected throughout his realm, and brought into his harem. Esther or Haddassah was distinguished among these, and was chosen by Xerxes to bear the title of queen. By her influence the plot of Haman to destroy the Jews was frustrated. Haman was hanged: the Jews revenged themselves on their foes; and Mordecai was advanced to a high place in the empire. It seems impossible to identify Esther with any wife of Xerxes mentioned by profane historians. Some have imagined her the ferocious Amestris; but there are insuperable objections to such a notion. It was common with Persian kings to have many wives; and Esther was one of these; whether of the highest class may be questioned.

ESTHER, THE BOOK OF. This book is so termed because Esther is the principal figure in it, not from any notion that she wrote it. It has generally been held in high estimation among the Jews, who class it with Ruth, Ecclesiastes, Solomon's Song, and the Lamentations, as the five megilloth or rolls, and solemnly read it at the feast of Purim. Objections have been made to the truthfulness of the history; and Bleek (Einleit. in das A. T., pp. 406, 407) enumerates a variety of particulars—the decree that every man should bear rule in his own house, the promulgation of the edict against the Jews, &c., &c.—which he conceives not at all likely to have occurred: he supposes, therefore, that there was at the most but some groundwork of fact. It would be easy to set aside all history, if its records are to be judged of by what may appear likely or unlikely to this or that individual. But the truth is that what we know of Xerxes from other sources, his mad and unprincipled conduct on various occasions, will point him out as just the person to act in the way which is represented in this book. Besides, there was the institution of the feast of Purim, in order to commemorate the deliverance of the Jews, a feast which we know (2 Macc. xv. 36) was observed at no great distance from the time when the events occurred, and which is observed to the present day. The observance of this feast is the very strongest proof that the history is true; it being manifestly far more improbable than any of the improbabilities Bleek has suggested, that a whole nation should observe for ages a solemn festival, to commemorate the incidents of a romance.

With regard to the writer of this book nothing certain can be said. Some have ascribed it to Mordecai, or to Mordecai and Esther jointly, grounding their notion on Esth. ix. 20, 23, 32. But the statements there made refer, not to the authorship of the book, but to the circular letters sent to the Jews. That it was written by a resident in Persia may very well be allowed. There is a thorough acquaintance evinced with Persian customs (see i. 1, 10, 14, 19, ii. 9, iii. 7, 12, 15, iv. 11, viii. 8). The diction closely resembles that of Ezra and Nehemiah, mixed with some Persisms, just such as we might suppose a contemporary of theirs likely to use. The arguments employed by some critics to bring the composition down to a late date, grounded on the language, are therefore of little weight. Neither is the alleged spirit of revenge pervading the narrative, nor the supposed formalism in religion, worth mentioning. The spirit of revenge is not in the writer, but, if anywhere, in the persons whose deeds are chronicled. And, as revengeful deeds have been committed in all ages, the occurrence of them cannot be taken as a chronological mark. Neither is more stress laid on fasting than in other times of Hebrew history: comp. Judges xx. 26; 2 Sam. xii. 16, 17, 21, 22. The composition, therefore, of the book may most reasonably be placed about or soon after the time when the facts occurred. But there is one great peculiarity of the history. The name of God does not occur in it. Various hypotheses have been devised to explain this fact. A very probable one is that, as the history of the reigns of Persian kings was duly chronicled (Esth. ii. 23, vi. 1, x. 2), and the events here narrated were of course recorded in the annals of the empire, this book may be a translated extract from those annals. There would be nothing more strange in such an extract's being preserved in the sacred canon than in Dan. iv. being, as it is, a decree of Nebuchadnezzar.

ESTHER, THE REST OF THE BOOK OF. There are certain additions in the Greek and Vulgate bibles to the canonical book of Esther. Of the Greek there are two texts. These additions are by the church of Rome included in the sacred canon. But, as they are not extant in Hebrew, and did not form part of the Jewish canon, they are deservedly rejected by protestants. They were probably the work of a Hellenistic Jew.

E'TAM (place of ravenous beasts).—1. A name found in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 3), most probably indicating a place, that perhaps which Rehoboam fortified (2 Chron. xi. 6). It has been identified as 'Urtas, not far from Tekoa.—2. A place in the territory of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 32).

E'TAM (id.). A rock to which Samson retired after one of his exploits against the Philistines. It seems to have been in the tribe of Judah (Judges xv. 8-11): it is therefore likely that it was some cliff near to the town mentioned above, no. 1.

ETERNAL, ETERNITY. See EVERLASTING.

E'THAM (boundary of the sea?). The second station of the Israelites as they were leaving Egypt (Exod. xiii. 20; Numb. xxxiii. 6, 7, 8).

E'THAN (perpetuity, firmness).—1. A man of Judah, celebrated for his wisdom: he was of the family of Zerah, or Zarah, and thence called the Ezrahithe (1 Kings iv. 31; 1 Chron. ii. 6).—2. A Gershonite Levite (vi. 42), called also Joah (21).—3. A Levite singer of the family of Merari (vi. 44, xv. 17, 19). Psalm lxxxix. is in the title ascribed to Ethan; but then the designation 'the Ezrahithe' is added. Also Ethan the singer has been supposed to be the same with Jeduthun: comp. 1 Chron. xxv. 1, 6. There is no certain evidence to decide these points.

ETHA'NIM (flowing brooks). See MONTHS.

ETH-BA'AL (with Baal, i. e. enjoying Baal's favour). King of the Zidonians, whose daughter Jezebel Ahab married (1 Kings xvi. 31). He is said to have reigned over the Tyrians also; and, having been priest of Astarte, to have assassinated Pheles the king, and succeeded to his throne. He reigned thirty-two years, about 940-908 B.C. He is known in secular history by the name Ithobalus. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Ethbaal.'

E'THER (abundance). A town originally allotted to Judah (Josh. xv. 42), afterwards transferred to Simeon (xix. 7). Tochen appears instead of Ether in 1 Chron. iv. 32.

ETHIOPIA (region of burnt faces, i. e., dark-complexioned people). The Greek name by which the Hebrew Cush is usually rendered. In its largest sense the term Ethiopia sometimes denoted all the African lands south of Egypt. More definitely eastern Ethiopia, or Ethiopia above Egypt, comprised the modern Nubia, Sennaar, Kordofan, and part of Abyssinia. It was bounded by Egypt on the north, Syene being the point of junction; but its other limits are more indeterminate. It may however be said that it was washed on the east by the Red and Indian seas, that on the west it extended to the Libyan desert, and reached on the south to the Abyssinian highlands.

We have various notices of this country in scripture, of its geographical character, its inhabitants, and its natural productions. Thus it is described as a well-watered region (Isai. xviii. 1; Zeph. iii. 10); and we know that it was traversed by the two branches of the Nile and by the Astaboras, now Tuazze. Of its people some characteristics are given under the word CUSH, which see. As to its productions, Ethiopian precious stones are mentioned in Job xxviii. 19; and it would seem, from the reference to its merchandize in Isai. xlv. 14, that it must have had some commercial intercourse with Syria.

But there was a yet more limited sense in which the term Ethiopia must sometimes be taken, as just the kingdom of Meröe, extending from the confluence of the two branches of the Nile to Egypt. This country was closely connected with Egypt, often united with it under the same sceptre. Thus Sesostris (probably Osirtasen I.) is said to have ruled Ethiopia. At a much later period, Shishak (Sheshonk) had Ethiopian troops in his army (2 Chron. xii. 3); and Zerah is called 'the Ethiopian' (xiv. 9, xvi. 8): he is thought to be Osorkon I., Shishak's successor; these two, therefore, must have had Ethiopia under their sway. Sometimes, on the other hand, Ethiopian kings have possessed Egypt. The sovereigns of the twenty-fifth dynasty, three in number, Ethiopians, whose capital was Napata, were masters of Upper Egypt, and sometimes, it would seem, of Lower Egypt also. So or Sebichus, and Tirhakah or Tehrak (2 Kings xvii. 4, xix. 9), were two of these (see Trevor's Anc. Egypt, pp. 311-313).

Prophetic threatenings were directed against Ethiopia (Isai. xx. 3-5; Nah. iii. 8-10); and these were most probably fulfilled in the conquest of it by Esar-haddon. Cambyses subjected Meröe; but the Ptolemies held only a partial sway in Ethiopia. We have mention of it in the New Testament. There had been dynasties of native sovereigns; and some of these were females, with the official title of Candace (Acts viii. 27). See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Ethiopian,' Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 588, 589.

ETHIOPIAN (Numb. xii. 1; 2 Chron. xii. 3, xiv. 9; Jer. xiii. 23, and elsewhere). An inhabitant of Ethiopia; more properly Cushite.

ETH'IA (1 Esdr. ix. 35). Nelo (Ezra x. 43).

ETH'AN (a gift, hire, e. g. of a harlot) One of Judah's descendants (1 Chron. iv. 7).

ETH'NI (munificent). A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 41).

EUBULUS (prudent). A Christian at Rome from whom St. Paul conveys a greeting to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21).

EUERGETES (benefactor). A title not unfrequently given to princes and statesmen. Two kings of Egypt, Ptolemy III., and Ptolemy VII., bore it (Ecclus. 2nd Prol.). Our Lord probably alludes to this title in Luke xxii. 25.

EUMENES (1 Macc. viii. 8). The second of the name, king of Pergamos, 197-150 B.C.

EUNATAN (1 Esdr. viii. 44). Elnathan (Ezra viii. 16).

EUNICE (happily conquering). A faithful Jewess married to a Greek, and mother of Timotheus or Timothy (Acts xvi. 1; 2 Tim. i. 5).

EUNUCH. This word, derived from the Greek, implies bed-keeper or chamberlain. But in its ordinary meaning it is an emasculated person. The practice was forbidden to the Hebrews (Deut. xxiii. 1); nevertheless, we cannot doubt that the use of eunuchs was common under the Hebrew monarchy (1 Sam. xviii. 15, marg.; 2 Kings ix. 32); though they might be foreigners and not native Israelites. Eunuchs have in all ages had great influence in oriental courts: they had access to the secrets of the palace, to such the care of harems being confided, and were thus brought into close intercourse with the sovereign. Hence we find them placed in various offices, occasionally in military commands. Thus Rab-saris, the chief eunuch, is named as one of the Babylonian princes at the sack of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix. 3). But perhaps the word is sometimes improperly used, and may signify merely an officer. For it is applied to Potiphar, who was married (Gen. xxxvii. 36, marg.), whereas, see Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, vol. ii. p. 61, it does not seem that literal eunuchs were employed in Egypt. Eunuchs are to this day common in the east: see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Verschnittene.'

EUODIAS (prospering). A Christian woman at Philippi, more properly Euodia, whom St. Paul exhorts to be of one mind with another, Syntyche (Phil. iv. 2).

EUPHRATES (sweet water, or the abounding river). A noted river of Asia. It has two principal sources in the Armenian mountains. The most northern branch, the Frat, or Kara-su (black river) rises about twenty-five miles north-east of Erzerum; the other, which is the chief, called the Murad-chai (river of desire) rises on the northern slope of the Ala-tagh, not far from Ararat. They meet after a course of 270 and 400 miles respectively, at Kebban Maden, in 39° east long. The combined stream is here about 120 yards wide: its course is at first nearly south: it then turns south-east, pursuing its long course to the sea. Joined by the Tigris at Kurnah it is called Shat-el-Arab, and ultimately falls into the Persian gulf. Its entire length is about 1780 miles; more than two-thirds of which is navigable for small steam-vessels. In the latter part of its course from Hit, the Euphrates flows through a low alluvial plain, where it often spreads and forms marshes; its width therefore varies and is said to be greatest about 700 or 800 miles from its mouth.

The Euphrates is first mentioned in scripture as one of the streams of Eden (Gen. ii. 14). Afterwards it was promised to Abraham that his seed should possess the land from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates (xv. 18), a promise frequently repeated to Israel (Deut. i. 7, xi. 24; Josh. i. 4), and subsequently fulfilled, when David extended his conquests to this stream (2 Sam. viii. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 3), when Solomon had dominion over all the kings 'on this side the river' (1 Kings iv. 24), and when the pastoral tribe of Reuben occupied the country up to it with their flocks and herds (1 Chron. v. 9). Euphrates is again mentioned in the struggle between Pharaoh-nechoh and the Babylonian king (2 Kings xxiii. 29, xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20; Jer. xlvi. 2, 6, 19). But perhaps it derives its greatest consideration from the fact that Babylon was built upon its banks, and was in a manner defended by it (ii. 63). It may be said to have had a part in the catastrophe of her fall, as it failed to keep out the foe (l. 38); for it was by diverting the course of the Euphrates that Cyrus entered the imperial city. It is often called 'the great river,' or emphatically 'the river' (Ezra iv. 10, 16, 20; Psal. lxxii. 8), as being far larger than the small streams of Palestine. The name is sometimes used symbolically (Rev. ix. 14, xvi. 12).

EUPOL'EMUS (1 Macc. viii. 17; 2 Macc. iv. 11). One of the ambassadors sent by Judas Maccabeus to Rome.

EUROCLYDON. The name given to the hurricane which seized the ship in which St. Paul was voyaging to Italy, while off the south coast of Crete (Acts xxvii. 14). Several particulars are mentioned by the sacred historian. There was, it appears, a sudden change in the direction of the wind; the change was accompanied by a violent squall; and, looking at the course along which the ship was driven by it, the Euroclydon must have blown ENE. The gale, too, lasted for a very long time, and was accompanied at the time of the wreck on Malta with rain (xxviii. 2). All these particulars are confirmed by the frequent experience of modern voyagers. See Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, pp. 94, &c., 154, &c. In some MSS. the name of the wind is Euroquilo.

EUTYCHUS (fortunate). A young man at Troas who, sitting in a window while Paul was long preaching at night, fell through drowsiness from the third story into the court below. He was killed by the fall, but was miraculously restored by the apostle (Acts xx. 7-12).

EVANGELIST. 'Evangelists were presbyters of principal sufficiency, whom the apostles sent abroad, and used as agents in ecclesiastical affairs, wheresoever they saw need. . . . And concerning evangelists afterwards in Trajan's days, the history ecclesiastical noteth that many of the apostles' disciples and scholars which were then alive, and did with singular love of wisdom affect the heavenly word of God, to show their willing minds in executing that which Christ first of all required at the hands of men, they sold their possessions, gave them to the poor, and, betaking themselves to travel, undertook the labour of evangelists, that is, they painfully preached Christ, and delivered the gospel to them, who as yet had never heard the doctrine of faith' (Hooker, Eccles. Pol., book v. 78). The 'work of an evangelist' (2 Tim. iv. 5) would seem to have been specially the carrying of the gospel-message to persons and places previously unacquainted with it. Hence, one bearing another office might be an evangelist. Thus Philip, 'one of the seven,' is called an 'evangelist' (Acts xxi. 8). Evangelists are distinguished from 'pastors and teachers,' and placed before them in Eph. iv. 11, as being itinerant; whereas pastors and teachers belonged more to a settled church: they are omitted in the list of 1 Cor. xii. 28; because no reference was there made to missionary extension of the church, but rather to its internal organization. Eusebius, Ecc. Hist., lib. iii. 37, speaks of evangelists as both preaching Christ and circulating the record of the holy Gospels. Hence, probably the ordinary usage of the word evangelists to denote the writers of the four Gospels.

EVE (life). The wife of Adam, and mother of mankind. Her formation, her yielding to the tempter, and inducing Adam to join her in disobedience to the divine command, the promise in respect to her seed, and the names she imposed on three of her sons, indicating her expectations and feeling in regard to them, are narrated in Gen. ii., iii., iv. See also 2 Cor. xi. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 13, 14.

EVENING. The evening, after sunset, was the beginning of the Jewish day. For explanation of the phrase, 'Between the two evenings' (Exod. xii. 6, marg., and elsewhere), see PASSOVER.

EVERLASTING. The kindred words 'everlasting,' 'eternal,' are used in scripture sometimes in their full and strict meaning, as when applied to the Deity (Gen. xxi. 33; Deut. xxxiii. 27; Psal. xli. 13, xc. 2), implying duration without beginning or end; sometimes to denote a long or indefinite period. Thus we have 'the everlasting hills' (Gen. xlix. 26), stable and deeply-founded; 'an everlasting priesthood' in the family of Aaron and of his grandson Phinehas (Exod. xl. 15; Numb. xxv. 13); because, through the whole Jewish polity, the Levitical priesthood should last on; the type, too, of that still more excellent priesthood which Christ would exercise. The word is applied to the future condition, happy or miserable, of men in another world. See PUNISHMENT.

EVI (desire, or dwelling). One of the kings or chiefs of Midian slain by the Israelites (Numb. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21).

EVIL. There is natural evil; and there is moral evil. Natural evil may be and sometimes is the penalty of moral evil or sin; as when the raging elements were roused to overflow the ancient world and destroy the guilty population. Or it may be caused for a beneficial purpose; as the storm which mutilates the trees of the forest clears off the noxious exhalations which produced disease and death. Hence God the great Ruler lays upon his people the cross of affliction—an evil in itself—but intended to refine and purify them as gold from the fire (John xv. 2; 1 Pet. i. 6, 7). Moral evil, the departure from the perfect standard, exists, we see, and is propagated in the world. It entered in and marred the condition in which man was created (Rom. v. 12), introducing innumerable natural evils. But this was not its primary origin. How it at first appeared in the universe scripture is silent. And why he who is himself most pure permitted it we know not. It is a problem which no man has explained. But even from moral evil we may sometimes see good results. Some of the highest moral virtues could not have been in exercise, had moral evil not existed. Indeed it is hard to see how else there could have been any probation of moral agents. We need not, however, involve ourselves in speculations which, with our present limited knowledge, must necessarily be futile. We must be content to confess that there are some things too hard for us to understand. But of this we may be assured, that God tempteth no man to evil (James i. 13), and that he will one day vindicate the equity of his government: the great Judge will be seen to have in all things done right (Gen. xviii. 25).

EVIL EYE (Prov. xxiii. 6). The envious or covetous who grudges the meat he sets before a guest. In the same sense elsewhere (Deut. xv. 9; Matt. xx. 15). It is curious to note how much power an evil or malignant eye is supposed in Syria to have at the present day. So ridiculously afraid are the people of a blight from this cause, that, 'if you merely look at a child, especially if it be pretty, you must repeat the name of the prophet, of God, or of the Virgin, with a brief petition for protection, or at least say mashallah (an exclamation of admiration or praise to God). If you extol the beauty of a horse, you must immediately spit on it; and the same is done sometimes to a child; more frequently, however, they merely blow in its face, and repeat a charm. The bright red or white figures made on fig-trees are designed to attract the eye from the fruit, lest it should wither and fall' (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 152).

E'VIL-MER'ODACH (Merodach's fool; but perhaps some name of Persian or Assyrian origin underlies this). The son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. He reigned two years, 561-559 B.C., and was murdered by Nergal-sharezer or Neriglissar, who had married his sister, and who seized his crown. He treated Jehoiachin with kindness; and possibly his mildness of rule may have given opportunity to the treason which cut him off (2 Kings xxv. 27-30; Jer. lii. 31-34). But some authorities report him to have been luxurious and intemperate.

EWE (Gen. xxxii. 14; 2 Sam. xii. 3; Psal. lxxviii. 71, and elsewhere). See SHEEP.

EXCOMMUNICATION. There were three degrees of excommunication in use among the Jews. The lightest was called niddui. According to the rabbinical writers this could be inflicted for twenty-four different causes. It involved various disabilities; as for example no person was to come within four cubits of the excommunicated man; and, if such a man died without repentance, a stone was placed upon the bier to indicate that he deserved to be stoned. It is supposed that this censure is referred to in Luke vi. 22; Joan ix. 22. The sentence lasted thirty days: if the man was impatient, it was prolonged to sixty, and then to ninety; and, if he still persisted in his fault, he then incurred the second degree of punishment, called hherem, which was of a much graver character. The sentence was pronounced in a solemn assembly or court: no one was to eat with the person so sentenced, no association was to be had, no business was to be transacted with him; nor could he purchase anything but food. Perhaps this censure may be referred to by St. Paul in 1 Cor. v. 11; though the cessation of private and social intercourse, not any public sentence, is what he seems to intend: see also 2 Thess. iii. 14; comp. Ezra x. 8. Shammatta was the severest form of excommunication, in which the offender was solemnly devoted to destruction, as in the case of Achan (Josh. vii.). It is said, however, that even this curse might be revoked upon repentance. St. Paul is thought to allude to it in 1 Cor. xvi. 22. The word he there uses, Maram-atha, is similar in meaning to Shammatta, 'The Lord cometh.' Full information on these various degrees of excommunication is given by Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. Talm. et Rabb., cols. 827-829, 1303-1307, 2466-2470.

EXECUTIONER. The word so rendered in the Old Testament denotes first an executioner, and then a guardsman; since the sovereign's body-guard in the east act as executioners. The captain of the guard is the chief of the executioners (Gen. xxxvii. 36, xxxix. 1). Hence, Potiphar had a prison in his house (xl. 3). Nebuzardan held this office (Jer. xxxix. 13), also Arioch (Dan. ii. 14), under the king of Babylon. And we find men of high rank, the very captains of the guard themselves, personally performing an execution (1 Kings ii. 34). The executioner in Mark vi. 27 was one of Herod's guard.

EXILE. See CAPTIVITY, PUNISHMENTS. EX'ODUS, THE BOOK OF. This is the second book of the Pentateuch: the name by which we commonly distinguish it is that attached to it in the Septuagint version, being a Greek word significant of the principal transaction recorded, viz. the departure of Israel from Egypt. The Jews generally designate it by the two initial words, or, more shortly, by the second of them.

In Hebrew bibles it is divided into eleven perashioth or chapters, and twenty-nine sedarim or sections; in our own it is distributed into forty chapters.

The contents of the book of Exodus may be regarded as comprising (1) historical, and (2) legislative matter; the first may be considered as extending from i. 1 to xix. 2 the second from xix. 3 to xl. inclusive. But there is some legislation intermixed with the former, and some narrative with the latter part; we may, therefore, note some subdivisions. I. In the first part we have (1) the condition of Israel in Egypt before their departure (i.) with the events preparatory to that deliverance, such as the birth of Moses and his settlement in Midian (ii.), the commission given him to liberate the people, and his announcement of this to them (iii., iv.), the negotiations with Pharaoh and infliction of the plagues, together with the institution of the passover (v.-xii. 30); (2) the thrusting out of Israel by the Egyptians, the departure, the passage of the Red sea, with the song of victory, and the march under the divine protection to Sinai (xii. 31-xix. 2). II. In the second part we find the preparation for the establishment of the theocratic covenant (xix. 3-25), the promulgation of the moral law (xx.), ordinances chiefly of a judicial kind (xxi.-xxiii.), the ratification of the covenant, with the summoning of Moses to receive directions for ceremonial worship (xxiv.), the orders for the construction of a sanctuary with things pertaining to it, and the selection of a priestly caste (xxv.-xxxi.), interrupted by the apostasy of Israel, and Moses' intercession for them (xxxii., xxxiii.), with the resumption of the divine directions, and the construction of the tabernacle in obedience thereto (xxxiv.-xl.).

The book of Exodus is closely connected with that of Genesis, yet it has a distinct character. Through the former book the large history of the human race was continually narrowing into that of a family to be separated from other nations as the chosen depository of divine truth, whose fortunes should exhibit the outlines of the divine dealings, to be filled up in the future trials and triumphs of the church. And branch after branch of that family is divided off, till a single nucleus is reached, to whom the promise of extended blessing was committed. The book of Exodus takes up the narrative of that family so circumscribed, and follows out its development in the increase of a household into a people, in the consolidation of vague promises into an orderly covenant, with its sanctions, and its regulations, and its priesthood, all pointing forward again to something still more substantial and more sufficient, when the teachings of a long minority should have ended, and the shadows of a tedious night have been succeeded by the bright rising of the Sun of Righteousness. Taken by itself, without reference to what preceded and what followed, the book of Exodus would be a riddle: viewed in its right proportion as but a part of the great counsel of God, it is luminous with instruction and encouragement. This topic is well illustrated in Macdonald's Introduet. to the Pentateuch, book i. chap. ii. §§ 2, 3, vol. i. pp. 72-85.

The time comprised in this book is generally believed to be about 145 years, from the death of Joseph to the erection of the tabernacle. This is of course on the supposition that the sojourn of Israel in Egypt was for 215 years; the 430 (Exod. xii. 40) being computed from the giving of the promise to Abraham (Gal. iii. 17). Some able writers take a different view (see Kurtz, Hist. of the Old Covenant, transl., vol. ii. pp. 133-147); but it would be difficult on the larger calculation to reconcile the statement that Jochebed was Levi's daughter (Numb. xxvi. 59), with the fact that she was Moses' mother.

The authorship of Exodus has through long ages been ascribed to Moses. But modern critics have disputed this; and have imagined that they discover the intertwining of certainly two leading documents, moulded into the shape in which we have the book by some comparatively-late editor. The question cannot be discussed here. See PENTATEUCH.

The credibility of the history has also been assailed. The book is said to be of a mythic or legendary character; and various parts of it have been declared to be impossible, if they are taken as literal narratives. Such are the vast increase of the Israelites (see CENSUS), the infliction of the plagues (see PLAGUES OF EGYPT), the passage of the Red sea (see SEA, RED SEA), &c. Several of these particulars are noticed in the articles just referred to. But the real objection to each and all of these narratives is that they assert or imply supernatural interference; and it is held that God does not, or cannot, interfere with the natural laws, which are imagined, by his disposition at the first it may be, or else by some strange inherent power of establishing and executing themselves, uninterruptedly to govern and control the universe (see MIRACLES). Only a few brief general observations can be made here. Exodus is bound up with the rest of the sacred volume. If this one stone be taken out as unsound, the whole structure is, to say the least, endangered. For all succeeding scripture writers go upon the presumption that the history of Exodus is fact. The following passages are but a sample of those which may be found in the Old Testament referring to events related in Exodus (Josh. ii. 10, iii. 3, xviii. 1; Judges xix. 30; 1 Sam. iv. 3-8, x. 18, xii. 6, 8, xxviii. 6; 2 Sam. vii. 2, 6; 1 Kings viii. 9, 16, 51, 53, ix. 9; 2 Kings xvii. 7, xxi. 15; 1 Chron. vi. 1-3, 49, xvii. 21; 2 Chron. v. 7, 8, 10, xxx. 18, xxxv. 6; Neh. xlii. 15; Psal. lxxvii. 20, lxxviii. 12-16, 23-25, 43-53, cv. 23-41; Isai. xi. 16, lxlii. 11-14; Jer. vii. 22, 25, xxxii. 18-21; Dan. ix. 15; Hos. xi. 1; Mal. iv. 4). Besides which, twenty-five passages, according to Rivet, are quoted in express words from Exodus by our Saviour and his apostles; and nineteen allusions to the sense are made in the New Testament. This number is enlarged by Gough, New Testament Quotations, pp. 26-56. The credit of this book is therefore well sustained by competent authority.

For replies to many particular objections Birks's Exodus of Israel, London, 1863, may be advantageously consulted; and for some notice of the miraculous departure of the Israelites, see ISRAEL, RED SEA.

EXORCIST. One who professed to cast out devils. We are told that there were vagabond Jews, exorcists, at Ephesus, who took upon them to use the name of Jesus over those that were possessed with evil spirits (Acts xix. 13-17). That in our Lord's time devils were actually cast out by the Jews can hardly admit of doubt: else he would not have made the appeal he did, had their practice been merely a juggle (Matt. xii. 27: see Dr. Alford's note on that place). But, doubtless, there were impostors also who pretended to a power which they did not really possess; and to the class of these the sons of Sceva belonged. It is well to observe that the terms 'exorcist' and 'exorcise' are never applied to miracles of Christ, or to the powers which he bestowed on his apostles.

EXPIATION (Numb. xxxv. 33, marg.). See ATONEMENT, SACRIFICE.

EYE, EYES. The practice of putting out the eyes as a mode of punishment has been both anciently and in modern times very common in the east. Captives in war, and those who might be supposed likely to head rebellions against the sovereign were frequently thus treated (Judges xvi. 21; 1 Sam. xi. 2; 2 Kings xxv. 7).

The painting of the eye was and is usual among eastern women. This was what Jezebel did (ix. 30, marg.: comp. Jer. iv. 30; Ezek. xxiii. 40). A peculiar brilliancy is imparted to the eye, and a languishing amorous cast given to the whole countenance. The eyelids and eyebrows are thus painted with what is called köhl. 'The powder from which köhl is made is collected from burning almond-shells, or frankincense, and is intensely black. Antimony and various ores of lead are also employed. The powder is kept in phials or pots, which are often disposed in a handsomely-worked cover or case; and it is applied to the eye by a small used to denote activity and vigilance (Ezek. i. 18, x. 12; Rev. iv. 6, 8). So at the Persian court there was an officer called the 'king's eye.' And, as the expression of the eye indicates various emotions, humility, envy, &c., these are often ascribed to the eye itself (Job xxii. 29, marg.; Prov. vi. 17, marg., xxviii. 22; Isai. iii. 16; Ezek. xxiv. 16, 25; Matt. xx. 15; 2 Pet. ii. 14; 1 John ii. 16).

E'ZAR (treasure). (1 Chron. i. 38.) See EZER.

EZ'BAI (hairy, or, according to another derivation, spoil). The father of one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 37). In the parallel list (2 Sam. xxiii. 35) we have for Ezbai 'the Arbitrator.'

EZ'BON (a worker, otherwise well-formed). 1. One of the sons of Gad (Gen. xlvi. 16). He is also called Ozni (Numb. xxvi. 16).—2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. vii. 7). He is nowhere else mentioned; and a conjecture has been hazarded that he was adopted into Benjamin from another tribe.

EZECH'AS. 1 (1 Esdr. ix. 14). A corrupt form of Jahaziah (Ezra x. 15). 2. (2 Esdr. vii. 40). Hezekiah.

EZECH'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 43). Hilkiah (Neh. viii. 4).

EZEK'AS (Matt. i. 9, 10). The Greek form of Hezekiah.

EZE'KIEL (whom God makes strong). A priest and prophet, the son of Buzi, who was among the captives carried away with Jehoiachin 599 B.C., and who prophesied in Chaldea at Tel-abib by the CHEBAR which see.

The word of the Lord came to him in the fifth year of the captivity: and his ministry lasted, so long as we have any account, to the twenty-seventh year (Ezek. i. 2, 3, xxix. 17). Whether he lived beyond this time, or how or where he died, there is no certainty. According to Jewish tradition he was put to death by the prince of the Jews, who was an idolater, and could not endure the prophet's censures. No dependence can be placed on this tale. We know little more of his history, save that he was married; this domestic relationship, as in the case of other prophets, being made subservient to his public teaching. His wife died; and the behaviour charged upon him was to be a sign to his people (xxiv. 15-24). Ezekiel was a man of marked and energetic character. Of a priestly family, he had been trained in the ritual lore, the symbolic and spiritual import of which he could well discern. His fancy was rich, and he was accustomed to utter words that burned. He attained a vast influence over those of his nation who were around him; for the people used, we are told, to assemble in his house, to hear the word of the Lord by him (xxxiii. 30-32). Such a man was an instrument well fitted to stand against the powerful Babylonian spirit of the time.

EZEKIEL, THE BOOK OF (595-573 B.C.). The collection of Ezekiel's prophecies. This book divides itself into two halves: I. The first, comprising prophecies and visions before the fall of Jerusalem (i-xxiv.); these are placed in chronological order, from the fifth year of the captivity, to the ninth (i. 2, xxiv. 1). II. The second is occupied with prophecies and visions after Jerusalem was taken (xxv.-xlvi.); including (1) denunciations against seven heathen nations disposed in the following order (xxv.-xxxii), Ammon, Moab, Edom, the Philistines, Tyre, Sidon, and Egypt, (2) predictions of the re-establishment of the theocracy (xxxiii.-xlvi.), an oracle against Seir being included (xxxv.); these, too, though dates are but sparingly noted, seem to be placed chronologically, the whole being, no doubt, arranged by the prophet himself.

It is only of late years that the authorship of Ezekiel's prophecies has been at all questioned; and most of the objections urged against the ordinary belief are so obviously baseless that it would be a waste of time to refute them. Zunz's arguments deserve a little more notice (Die Gottesdienstl. Vorträge der Juden, pp. 157, &c.). He conjectures that the book belongs to the Persian period, because there is, he says, no trace of Ezekiel's imagery in his alleged contemporary Jeremiah; because he does not seem to have rightly comprehended the shape of the cherubim; because his style has an Aramaic colouring, and betrays in several places an imitation of Jeremiah; and more particularly because there is a speciality in his predictions (e.g. xii. 12, &c.) which does not belong to a true prophet. It will readily be seen that these are but weak reasons, and they have been satisfactorily met by Hävernick (Einleit. in das A.T., § 232, vol. ii. 2, pp. 271-273); but it is well to protest against that irreverent spirit which carps at particular predictions; as if the Deity, before whom all future things lie spread, could not, and might not if he pleased, communicate by his servants the prophets the definite knowledge of an event about to happen. Objections on such a principle are of the earth, earthy.

The forms of Ezekiel's composition are varied. Sometimes the strain is didactic, in which proverbial expressions are interwoven (as in xii. 22, 23, xvi. 44, xvii. 1-10, xviii. 2), and extends itself in long-drawn sentences, with oratorical fulness and lyric spirit. Then, again, we find allegorical representation, unfolding a vast richness of majestic ideas and colossal symbols (illustrated, it may be said, by late Assyrian discoveries), including not unfrequently symbolic actions. Hence, as observed by Jerome, there is much that is dark and mysterious in his prophecies. Thus the symbolic cherubim are variously explained. It is enough to say of them here that, described as working one within another, they may be taken to symbolize the awful and mysterious providence of God, ministered by angelic beings, instinct with spiritual life. And the later chapters (xl.-xlviii.) have caused great difference of opinion. They have been referred to the restoration of the Jews after the Babylonish captivity; they have been supposed to depict by symbols the times of Messiah; and there are those who, regarding them as prediction yet unaccomplished, expect that at some future period the temple in the proportions here delineated will rise again, and the rites and regulations so minutely recorded be literally in force. These theories are lucidly described by Dr. Fairbairn, in his valuable 'Exposition' of Ezekiel. Such matters cannot be argued here. They belong rather to the province of the commentator.

But it may not be improper to give a summary of the view entertained by Hävernick of the purport of the prophet's vision. 'In the gospel times,' he thinks, 'there is to be, on the part of Jehovah, a solemn occupation anew of his sanctuary, in which the entire fulness of the divine glory shall dwell and manifest itself. At the last there is to rise a new temple, diverse from the old, to be made every way suitable to that grand and lofty intention, and worthy of it; in particular of vast compass for the new community, and with a holiness stretching over the entire extent of the temple; so that in this respect there should no longer be any distinction between the different parts. Throughout, everything is subjected to the most exact and particular appointments: individual parts, and especially such as had formerly remained indeterminate, obtain now an immediate divine sanction; so that every idea of any kind of arbitrariness must be altogether excluded from this temple. Accordingly, this sanctuary is the thoroughly-sufficient perfect manifestation of God for the salvation of his people (xl.-xliii. 12). From this sanctuary, as from the new centre of all religious life, there gushes forth an unbounded fulness of blessings upon the people, who in consequence attain to a new condition. There come also into being a new glorious worship, a truly-acceptable priesthood and theocratical ruler; and equity and righteousness reign among the entire community, who, being purified from all stains, rise indeed to possess the life that is in God (xliii. 13—xlvi. 12). To the people who have become renewed by such blessings the Lord gives the land of promise: Canaan is a second time divided among them, where, in perfect harmony and blessed fellowship, they serve the living God, who abides and manifests himself among them (xlvi. 13—xlviii.). See Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp. 434-447.

Ezekiel's style is characterized by a mass of peculiar and frequently-recurring expressions and forms; and, though he shows a dependence on earlier models, on the Pentateuch in particular, he has words, together with Aramaisms and corruptions, anomalies and grammatical incorrectnesses, testifying to the decline of the Hebrew language, and confirming the belief that the writer was residing in a foreign land. Some of his peculiarities are the constant use of the phrase 'son of man' as applied to himself (ii. 1, 3, 6, 8, iii. 1, 3, 4, and elsewhere), the designation of the people as 'a rebellious house' (ii. 5, 6, 7, 8, iii. 9, 26, 27, xii. 2, 3, 9, xvii. 12, xxiv. 3, xlv. 6); with many others, which Keil has enumerated (Einleit. § 79).

There is a somewhat-perplexing statement of Josephus (Antiq., lib. x. 5, § 1) that Ezekiel wrote two books. The most general explanation is that (if not a mere error on the part of the Jewish historian) he divided the book we have into two parts, making that which contains a description of the temple (xl.—xlviii.), a distinct treatise, as altogether apart from the preceding portion of his writings.

Among the numerous commentaries on this prophet may be mentioned those of Venema, 1790, Greenhill, 1650 (re-published 1863), Henderson, 1855, Fairbairn, 1851, &c.

EZEL (departure). A stone or stoneheap by which David and Jonathan parted (1 Sam. xx. 19). Some conjectural emendation of vv. 19, 41 have been proposed; but, as they rest on the text of the Septuagint, which is unsettled here, they can hardly be adopted.

EZEM (bone, strength). A city of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 29). In Josh. xix. 3 it is called Azem.

EZER (treasure). A descendant of Seir the Horite, one of the 'dukes' in the land of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 27, 30; 1 Chron. i. 42). He is called Ezar in 1 Chron. i. 38.

EZER (help). 1. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 4). 2. One of the sons of Ephraim, slain by the men of Gath, whose cattle they attempted to seize (vii. 21). 3. A Gadite chief who joined David in the wilderness (xii. 9). 4. A Levite who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 19). 5. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall (xii. 42).

EZERI'AS (1 Esdr. viii. 1). Azariah (Ezra vii. 1).

EZIAS (1 Esdr. viii. 2). Azariah (Ezra vii. 2).

E'ZION-GA'BER or GE'BER (the giant's backbone). A port of Edom on the Elanitic gulf of the Red sea. It was one of the encampments of the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness (Num. xxviii. 35, 36; Deut. ii. 8), and was attached to the kingdom of David by the conquest of Edom. Solomon made it the station of his navy that traded to Ophir (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. viii. 17); and here Jehoshaphat's fleet was 'broken' or wrecked (1 Kings xxii. 48; 2 Chron. xx. 36, 37). Josephus describes E'zion-geber as not far from the city Elana, i.e. Elath, and called Berenice (Antiq., lib. viii. 6, § 4). There is now no trace of it; and the site can be only conjectured. Dr. Robinson is inclined to believe that anciently the gulf ran up farther into the country, and that E'zion-geber may have been in a wady with brackish water called el-Ghudyán, a few miles north of Akabah.

EZ'NITE (2 Sam. xxiii. 8). See JASHOBEAM.

2. A celebrated scribe and priest, descended from Hilkiah the high priest in Josiah's reign (Ezra vii. 1). Of his early life we know nothing, nor how he acquired the influence he evidently had at the Persian court. In the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus we find a large commission granted him to return from Babylon at the head of a body of Jews, and to take upon him the administration of affairs at Jerusalem (vii., viii.) One of his first steps on his arrival was to remedy the unhallowed marriages which had been contracted by the Jews with Gentile unbelievers (ix., x.). These were to be broken off; and the whole business, it would seem, was settled in about eight months (vii. 9, x. 9, 17). Whether Ezra continued at Jerusalem is a question; it is generally assumed that he was in office till Nehemiah's arrival twelve or thirteen years later; but it seems hard in that case to account for the state of declension and confusion in which Nehemiah found the people. It is more likely, therefore, that Ezra's commission was temporary, that he returned to Babylon, and that shortly after Nehemiah's appointment as governor he again proceeded to Jerusalem; where we find him then very active (Neh. viii.).

The sealing of the covenant occurred at this time; and good men have indulged in unsatisfactory conjectures why Ezra's name is not found attached to it. It has been said, for instance, that he probably was ill, or that, as he had been the principal person in (as we should say) getting it up, no further ratification on his part was thought necessary. But, if we look at the record (x. 1-27), we shall see reason enough to believe that few of the names, if any (with the exception of Nehemiah the governor), were the signatures of men as individuals, but rather as representatives of classes or families. For of priests there are only twenty-two, of Levites seventeen, and of the people forty-four. Now, if we examine the lists of those who returned with Zerubbabel and with Ezra (Ezra ii., vii. 1-14) we shall find them divided into clans; for example, of the children of Azgad, 1,222 were in Zerubbabel's caravan, 110 in Ezra's; of the children of Bebai, 623 in Zerubbabel's, 28 in Ezra's, &c., &c. But Azgad and Bebai are among the signatures to the covenant. Surely it was in each such case as the representatives of a large body that there were these particular names; and it is expressly said that the rest of the people 'clave to their brethren' (Neh. x. 28, 29), that is, acknowledged themselves bound by what their chiefs, their representatives, had done. Ezra, then, we may well believe, though most eminent as an individual (specially called 'the scribe'), yet as a priest had his place in some particular class, the whole of which was included under the signature of its representative.

We find him again mentioned in xii. 26, 36; but not after the close of Nehemiah's first term of office. Probably he did not long survive. To him the Jews attribute, among other things, the institution of the great synagogue which settled the canon of scripture, and also the authorship of many of the sacred books, with the revision of the entire scriptures; and Christian writers have been too ready to follow them and to say, when they came upon an explanation or notice in any book which they thought not likely to belong to the author, that it was no doubt inserted by Ezra. As 'a ready scribe in the law of Moses,' we may well believe that he would take care to spread a knowledge of the law, and to circulate accurate copies of the holy books; but more can hardly be with any confidence asserted of him. See CANON.

3. A priest or head of a course of priests who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 1, 13): comp. x. 2, where Azariah is perhaps the same person.

EZRA, THE BOOK OF. This book commences with a notice of the edict of Cyrus permitting the exiled Jews to re-occupy their own country: it narrates the return of a large body under Zerubbabel, with their proceedings till the temple was re-built and dedicated: it gives an account also of Ezra's journey to Jerusalem, upwards of half-a-century later, and of the reformation effected by him. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah were reckoned by the Jews as one volume. Portions of Ezra (viz., iv. 8—

vi. 18, and vii. 12-26) are written in Chaldee: the rest is in Hebrew. It is questioned whether the whole is from Ezra's pen. Some critics maintain the affirmative: others, with greater apparent reason, dissent. Several of the arguments alleged are of no great weight; but perhaps, on a full consideration, we may divide the book into two parts: 1. i.—vi.; 2. vii.—x., and may ascribe vii.—x. to Ezra. It is true that in vii. 1-26 and x., the writer uses the third person; but this fact does not seem conclusive against Ezra's authorship. The former chapters i.—vi. are probably from different sources. Chap. i. is a continuation of 2 Chronicles; the last two verses in that book being identical with the first two in Ezra. Chap. ii., iii. is a document inserted with slight variation in Neh. vii. The portion iii. 2—vi. 22 (with the exception of iv. 6-23, possibly by a later hand) has been ascribed, from the similarity of style, diction, &c., to the prophet Haggai: see Lord A. C. Hervey in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. 'Ezra, Book of.' Be this as it may, Ezra, it is likely, had the preceding portions before him, and combined them with his own narrative; or it might be that the author of Chronicles was the final editor of those books, and of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. The zeal and piety of Ezra are admirably illustrated in the transactions that are here recorded. And, though some have objected to certain particulars, and impeached the credibility of the history on account of them, such objections are groundless. The canonical authority of this book is beyond dispute. It may be added that it comprises in its history a period of about eighty years.

EZRAHITE. Two persons are thus designated, Ethan (1 Kings iv. 31; Psal lxxxix. title), and Heman (lxxxviii. title). But in 1 Chron. ii. 6 they are both said to be sons of Zerah, i.e. Zerahites, or Zarhites; of which Ezrahites is probably another form.

EZRI (help of Jehovah). The superintendent of David's agricultural labourers (1 Chron xxvii. 26).

F

FABLE. A vehicle used, by the adoption of fictitious narrative, for the exhibition or illustration of some truth. In a fable the qualities or actions of a higher class of beings are attributed to a lower, as those of men to brutes or inanimate things. We thus see a great distinction between a fable and a parable; for in the latter, if brutes are introduced, they never contradict the law of their nature. So our Lord introduces sheep into his parables, but he never represents the sheep as speaking or doing anything but what sheep naturally do. 'The parable,' says archbishop Trench (Notes on the Parables, 2nd edit. chap. i. p.

10), 'differs from the fable while it moves in a spiritual world, and never transgresses the actual order of things natural.' There are two examples of fable, properly so called, in scripture, those of Jotham (Judges ix. 8-15), and of Jehoash (2 Kings xiv. 9); and they—the first at least—are older than any known to be produced by heathen authors. The 'fables' against which St. Paul utters a warning (1 Tim. i. 4, iv. 7; 2 Tim. iv. 4; Tit. i. 14) mean the Jewish unauthorized traditions, or simply untruths.

FACE. Most of the combinations into which this word enters are intelligible enough. It may be observed that, as to seek any one's face is to seek his favour, or admission to his presence (Psal. xxvii. 8; Prov. vii. 15), so to see his face is to see him in person (Gen. xlviii. 11), to have entrance to his court, if he be of high rank, as a king (xliii. 3, 5; 2 Sam. xiv. 24, 28, 32); hence this phrase denoted the royal favour, dignity, or privilege (Esth. i. 14). So to see God's face is to find him propitious, to have nearness of access to him (Job xxxiii. 26; Psal. xvii. 15); and this is specially said to be the privilege of the holy angels that they see God's face (Matt. xviii. 10; Luke i. 19).

FAIR HAVENS, THE. A harbour or roadstead off the south coast of Crete, mentioned in Acts xvii. 8, but in no other ancient writing. It has been lately identified and described by Mr. Smith of Jordan-hill (see his Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, Lond. 2nd. edit. 1856). This harbour still retains its old Greek name, and is situated four or five miles to the east of cape Matala, and about the same distance to the west of cape Leonda. It is a fair winter harbour, though by no means so good as that of Phenice, about forty miles farther westward. After passing cape Matala the coast trends to the north; hence the danger, if a northerly gale sprung up, of the vessel's being driven out to sea; and hence the advice given by St. Paul to lie still at the Fair Havens, instead of making for Phenice (Acts xxvii. 9, 10, 21). The advice was not taken: a gale did spring up, and caught the ship, which drifted across the sea till it was wrecked on the coast of Malta.

FAIRS. The word occurs repeatedly in Ezek. xxvii. 12, 14, 16, 19, 22, 27; but it is very doubtful whether there were fairs at Tyre, in the sense in which we understand the term. Tarshish is said to have traded in the 'fairs' of Tyre (12); but the Tyrians rather resorted to Tarshish than the people of Tarshish to Tyre. Also we can hardly understand how the 'fairs' could 'fall into the midst of the seas' (27). The word rather signifies 'gains' accruing from traffic, and is sometimes translated 'wares' (33); possibly it might be well to preserve that translation in all the places in which it occurs.

FAITH. A dependence on the veracity of another, or belief on testimony. In scripture the testimony which is the ground of faith means generally the divine testimony, announced either by God himself, or by his accredited messengers. Thus Noah credited the warning which the depraved antediluvians disregarded, and used the means which God pointed out to him for deliverance from the approaching deluge (Heb. xi. 7). Faith is distinguished from credulity in that it does not accept anything as true which is not based on sufficient evidence: it is contrasted with unbelief in that it accepts whatever is proposed to it when the testimony thereof is adequate. We are informed that faith may be dead, if it be merely in the understanding, admitting facts as true, but not realizing their bearing upon ourselves. Such a faith is that historical faith, which credits the narrative of our Lord's passion and death, but seeks not, through that, remission of personal guilt. The faith of devils goes farther than this; for they 'believe and tremble' (James ii. 19); but they find no means of release from their apprehended doom. True 'faith is the substance (or realizing) of things hoped for, the evidence (or sure persuasion) of things not seen' (Heb. xi. 1). With such a faith 'Abraham believed God; and it was counted unto him for righteousness' (Gen. xv. 6; Rom. iv. 3; Gal. iii. 6). So those who believe in Christ, accepting his offered mercy, relying on his never-forfeited word, are for his sake regarded as God's children. Hence men are said to be 'justified by faith' (Rom. iii. 23-26, v. 1). See JUSTIFICATION. Faith, if genuine, will work by love (Gal. v. 6), yielding the fruits of a holy life and conversation (Matt. vii. 20; James ii. 26).

There are various shades of meaning belonging to the word 'faith' in scripture, which may be sought in commentaries: it must be enough here to say that it sometimes means the gospel revelation (Acts vi. 7; Rom. x. 8).

The precious gift of faith and the increase thereof should be earnestly sought in humble prayer (Luke xvii. 5; Phil. i. 29).

FAITHFUL, FAITHFULNESS. This is an attribute often ascribed in scripture to God, to denote the certainty of his purpose, word, and covenant: see Deut. vii. 9; Psal. xxxvi. 5, xl. 10, lxxxviii. 11, lxxxix. 1, 2, 5, 8, 24, 33, xcii. 2, cxix. 75, 90, cxliii. 1; Isai. xl. 5, xlix. 7; Jer. xlii. 5; Lam. iii. 23; Hos. ii. 20; 1 Cor. i. 9, x. 13; 1 Thess. v. 24; 2 Thess. iii. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 13; Heb. ii. 17, iii. 2, x. 23, xi. 11; 1 Pet. iv. 19; 1 John i. 9; Rev. i. 5, iii. 14, xix. 11. Hence God's word or covenant itself is often called 'faithful,' as in Psal. cxix. 86, 138; Isai. xxv. 1; 1 Tim. i. 15; Rev. xxi. 5, xxii. 6. The term is also used to designate God's people, as in Numb. xii. 7; Neh. vii. 2; Psal. xii. 1; Matt. xxv. 21; 1 Cor. iv. 17; Eph. i. 1; 2 Tim. ii. 2; Rev. xvii. 14, and frequently elsewhere.

FALLOW-DEER. An animal whose flesh might be used for food (Deut. xiv. 5; 1 Kings iv. 23). It was a species of deer of a reddish colour, with serrated horns, cast every year, most probably Cervus dama, which is found in western and southern Asia. Kitto, however (Pict. Bible, note on Deut. xiv. 5), supposes the animal intended to be the Oryx leucoryx; and a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, app. p. xlix., holds it to be the Acelaphus bubatis, the wild ox of North Africa, called by the natives becker-el-uash.

FALLOW-GROUND (Jer. iv. 3; Hos. x. 12). See JUBILEE, YEAR SABBATICAL.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT (Lev. xx. 27, and elsewhere). See DIVINATION.

FAMINE. The usual proximate causes of famine in Egypt are failure in the regular inundation of the Nile; in Palestine, a want of rain affecting both the pasture-lands and the harvests. Several famines are noted in the scripture history. Two are mentioned as occurring in Canaan in the days of Abraham and Isaac, compelling those patriarchs to remove to Egypt and to Gerar (Gen. xii

10, xxvi. 1). Then succeeded that remarkable famine which Joseph was enabled to predict, and which extended widely over Egypt and various other regions (xli. 53-57). A scarcity in Palestine was once occasioned (Judges vi. 4-6) by the invasion of the Midianites, and another (or the same) is referred to in Ruth i. 1. Others are noted, sometimes caused by war or by locusts (2 Sam. xxi. 1; 1 Kings xvii. 1, 7, xviii. 2; 2 Kings iv. 38, viii. 1, 2; Lam. v. 10; Joel i. 10-12, 17, 18; Acts xi. 28). Famine is called one of the Lord's 'sore judgments' (Ezek. xiv. 21), and is often threatened as a punishment of sin (2 Sam. xxiv. 13). But it is observable that, even when not specially said to be inflicted for judgment, it is yet declared to be 'called for' by the Lord (2 Kings viii. 1; Psalm cv. 16); whence we learn that, though second causes are in operation, yet God administers his own sovereignty, not leaving events to an independent law, but guiding all things for his own wise ends.

Famine is sometimes used in a figurative sense; as when a worse destitution is described than that of bread, a sorer thirst than that for water—even a famine of the divine word, a thirst because the living streams of mercy flow out no more (Amos viii. 11-18).

FAN. An agricultural implement (Isai. xxx. 24; Jer. xv. 7; Matt. iii. 12; Luke iii. 17). The 'shovel' in Isaiah is probably the same with the 'fan' in the other passages. It was, no doubt, a broad scoop by which the corn was thrown against the wind, often perhaps during the evening breeze (Ruth iii. 2), in order that the chaff might be blown away. The word translated 'fan' in the first place above referred to has been thought to mean something of a similar kind, as a fork, said to be still used in Palestine. It was more likely a measure, or basket, in which to receive the grain. 'Very little use,' says Dr. Thomson, 'is now made of the fan; but I have seen it employed to purge the floor of the refuse dust, which the owner throws away as useless' (The Land and the Book, p. 540).

FARM, FARMING (Matt. xxii. 5). See AGRICULTURE.

FARTHING. There are two words which are thus translated. In Matt. v. 26; Mark xii. 42, the coin meant was the quadrans or fourth of a Roman as. It contained two lepta, mites, and was in value about three-fourths of our farthing. In Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6, the word is assarion, or small as, that is, three farthings of our money. See MONEY.

FAST. The only fast ordained by the Mosaic law was that of the day of atonement, on the 10th of the seventh month, on which the people were to afflict their souls (Lev. xxiii. 26-32). This appears to have been ever solemnly kept, and was 'the fast' mentioned in the narrative of St. Paul's voyage to Italy (Acts xxvii. 9). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF. But there were other fasts afterwards instituted on account of great national calamities; and these appear to have had prophetic sanction. They are enumerated as the fasts of the fourth, the fifth, the seventh, and tenth months (Zech. vii. 3-5, viii. 19). The fast of the fourth month was on account of the breaking up of Jerusalem by the armies of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. lii. 6, 7). The modern Jews couple with this event the breaking of the tables of the law by Moses (Exod. xxxii. 19). The fast of the fifth month commemorates the burning of the temple and the houses of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. lii. 12, 13), and afterwards by Titus, on the same day of the same month. It is now kept by the Jews with greater rigour than any other. The fast of the seventh month is for the murder of Gedaliah (xli. 1-10). That of the tenth month was instituted because the Chaldean army then laid siege to Jerusalem (lii. 4).

Extraordinary general fasts were not unfrequently appointed in consequence of some calamity, or to obtain God's blessing for the averting of some danger. Such were those of which we read at various times (Judges xx. 26; 1 Sam. vii. 6, xxxi. 13; 1 Kings xxi. 12; 2 Chron. xx. 3; Ezra viii. 21; Esth. iv. 15-17; Jer. xxxvi. 9; Joel i. 14, ii. 15-17). Such fasts are also mentioned in the Maccabean times (1 Macc. iii. 47; 2 Macc. xiii. 12); and in later ages we know that fasts were appointed when the seasons were unfavourable, or on other occasions of distress.

For individual fasts there was no commandment of the Mosaic law. There is, however, a reference to such in Numb. xxx. 13; where the force of a vow to fast by a married woman is made dependent on her husband's allowance of it. And private fasts were not uncommon (1 Sam. i. 7; 2 Sam. i. 12, xii. 16; 1 Kings xxi. 27; Ezra x. 6; Neh. i. 4; Dan. ix. 3, x. 3). Of course from this enumeration must be excluded the fasts of Moses upon Sinai (Exod. xxiv. 18, xxxiv. 28; Deut. ix. 9, 18), and the fast of Elijah as he travelled to the mount of God (1 Kings xix. 8). These were not self-imposed, nor were they endured by mere natural strength. After the captivity, the practice of individual fasting appears to have been stricter and more frequent. The Pharisees and others made a show of fasting, and believed that they purchased God's favour thereby (Matt. vi. 16, ix. 14; Luke xviii. 12); the two days in the week on which they ordinarily fasted being (according to the Talmud) the fifth, because Moses that day went up Sinai, and the second, because on that day he came down.

But there are fasts spoken of in the New Testament of a better kind. Such was the practice of the prophetess Anna (ii. 37). And our Lord himself, who at the beginning of his ministry fasted forty days in the desert (Matt. iv. 2), regulated the use of it (vi. 17, 18), and spoke of it as needful in order to the performance of certain wondrous works (xvii. 21). Accordingly there were solemn occasions on which we find fasting in the Christian church (Acts xiii. 3, xiv. 23; 1 Cor. vii. 5). The history of fasting in later days does not belong to this place. Large information respecting it, the times when it was practiced, and the mode of it, may be found in Bingham's Orig. Eccles., book xxi.

The Jews appear to have joined with fast ing the putting on of sackcloth, and other usual signs of distress (1 Kings xxi. 27). Sometimes they abstained altogether from food, from one evening to another; while at other times, especially when the fasts were of long duration, they ate food, but only of the plainest kind. They did not fast on the sabbath, or on festival-days. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Fasten.'

FAT. There were certain prohibitions in the Mosaic law in regard to the eating of fat. Pure fat was intended, that about the entrails, kidneys, &c.; this, in the case of sacrifices—especially sin-offering, trespass-offering, peace-offering—was to be solemnly burnt as presented to the Lord (Lev. iii. 3-5, 9-11, 14-17, iv. 8-10, 19, 26, 31, 35, vii. 3-5, 23-25, 30, 31, viii. 25; Numb. xviii. 17). Sometimes the word is used as including all the parts of an offering which were to be consumed by fire (1 Sam. ii. 15, 16). The fat was holy; it was the best and richest part of the animal; and therefore it was fitting that it should be offered to God (See Fairbairn, Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. sect. 7, vol. ii. p. 343). The prohibition did not extend to other parts than those above specified, or to that of animals not sacrificed; for we frequently meet with commendations of stall-fed and fattened cattle as specially eaten at feasts (1 Sam. xxviii. 24; 1 Kings iv. 23; Prov. xv. 17; Jer. xlvi. 21; Luke xv. 23, 30); and the 'fat' is spoken of in Neh. viii. 10, as a dainty. It may be, however, that not fat literally, but the choicest food is there meant.

FAT. This word appears in its un-compounded form only in Joel ii. 24, iii. 13. The original is in other places rendered 'wine-fat' (Isai. lxiii. 2), 'press-fat' (Hagg. ii. 16), &c. It is properly applied to the vat or receptacle into which the must, or new wine, flowed from the press. An equivalent Greek word is translated 'wine-fat' in Mark xii. 1. See WINE-PRESS.

FATHER. The word is continually used in its literal and proper sense. The father of a family in early times had great authority over his children and descendants, representing to them, in a certain sense, the Deity. He was often the head of blessing to his race, when they followed his faithful example (Gen. xviii. 18, 19; 2 Sam. vii. 12-16, 19). Or, if he trained his children in evil paths, so that they inherited his sinfulness as well as his blood, the judgment on a father extended to the children (1 Kings xiv. 10-13). It was not that the son should bear the responsibility of the parent's sin (Deut. xxiv. 16; Ezek. xviii. 14-18, 20); but the children too often copied the parent's faults; and it was natural—we see examples every day—that a man's ill-conduct should affect his children's welfare in the world. The greatest respect was enforced to a father by the divine law (Exod. xx. 12; Eph. vi. 1-3); the blessing or the curse of a father was regarded as of the weightiest force (Gen. ix. 25-27, xxvii., xlvi., xlix.); and there are numberless illustrations in scripture of the duty of honouring a father, and of the sin of disobeying him (Lev. xx. 9; Deut. xxi. 18-21; Prov. xiii. 1; Isai. xlv. 10; Mal. i. 6; 1 Tim. i. 9; 2 Tim. iii. 2, and elsewhere). The word is also used, in the sense of originator, for any ancestor (1 Kings xv. 11; Isai. xliii. 27), for the founder of a tribe, nation, or city, or the first of a class who have practised some art or profession (Gen. iv. 20, 21, x. 21, xvii. 4, 5, xix. 37, 38; 1 Chron. ii. 50-52; comp. Rom. iv. 11, 12, 16), or the former or maker of any thing (Job xxxviii. 28). Also, as a father shows affection and care for his children, some figurative senses of the word imply such affection and care. Thus the word signifies a benefactor (xxix. 16; Isai. xxii. 21), a teacher (Judges xvii. 10, xviii. 19) in the same sense as when we speak of the fathers of the church, i.e. great doctors, a counsellor (Gen. xlv. 8), and any intimate relation or ally (Job xvii. 14). There are also other very similar modes in which the idea is introduced, as when a speaker, addressing a grave assembly, would show them deep respect (Acts vii. 2, xii. 1).

The most beautiful application of the word is to the Deity, who condescends to hold the relation of father to his creatures, and especially to his redeemed people, whom he has both formed as their Maker, and received into his family by adoption and grace (Deut. xxxii. 6; Luke iii. 38; Rom. viii. 14-17). To his throne then, as his dear children, believers may humbly resort through faith in Christ (Matt. vi. 9). But let those who cast off this relationship remember whose children they then become (John viii. 44). Repudiating the service they owe to God, they degrade themselves to the condition of Satan's slaves.

The term is also properly applied to the First Person in the Trinity: see TRINITY.

FATHOM (Acts xxvii. 28): see MEASURES.

FEAR. This word is sometimes, by a figure of speech, applied to the Deity. Jacob swore by 'the Fear of Isaac' (Gen. xxxi. 42, 53), i.e. by the Being whom Isaac feared and worshipped as the omnipotent Lord (see Isai. viii. 13). Fear is regarded under two aspects in scripture. There is the awful dread of impending evil generated by a sense of guilt (Prov. i. 26, 27). From this God's people are delivered (Rom. viii. 15; 1 John iv. 18) by a sense of his pardoning love in Jesus Christ. There is also the reverent fear which we are taught to cherish (Mal. i. 8); and this is so eminently a spiritual grace that it is frequently the appellation by which real piety is distinguished (Prov. i. 7; Mal. iii. 16; Acts ix. 31, x. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 17).

FEAST. See BANQUET, FESTIVAL.

FEAST OF CHARITY. A meal in which, in primitive times, Christians were accustomed to join as a symbol of loving fellowship. St. Paul had occasion to censure certain abuses which prevailed in the Corinthian church in regard to the eucharist. A feast was held before or at the time of the celebration, in which excesses occurred (1 Cor. xi. 20-22). In these, called love-feasts or agapæ, persons—the richer especially—brought food from their own houses, of which, according to the principle of the thing, all were equally to partake. But the object, as St. Paul shows, was often lost sight of: the poor were neglected and excluded from what the wealthier had fur nished. Subsequently these feasts were always held after the reception of the Lord's supper, and apparently distinct from it. But there were still objections to them. The abuses which began in apostolic days increased in the course of time. And, though Pliny in his celebrated letter to Trajan alluded to the Christian feasts as unobjectionable, yet, as they were held in the churches, it was obvious that those sacred places were put to an improper use; and, when corruptions had multiplied, the impropriety became yet more glaring, so that at last various councils prohibited the practice. There are canons against it by the councils of Laodicea, 361 A.D., the third of Carthage, 397 A.D., the second of Orleans, 541 A.D., that of Trullo, 692 A.D., till the love-feasts were entirely suppressed. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xv. chap. vii. 6-10. St. Jude refers to these love-feasts (Jude 12).

FEET. There are many cases in which the term foot or feet is used figuratively in scripture. The meaning generally is plain enough. Thus 'the place of the feet' (Isai. lx. 13) is easily understood when it is recollected that God calls the earth his 'foot-stool' (Isai. lvi. 1). Such phrases, too, as the feet sliding (Deut. xxxii. 35), need no explanation. Others, strange to us, are intelligible when the climate and domestic habits of the Hebrews are remembered. Walking barefoot or in open sandals, the feet of the traveller were necessarily soiled: hence the custom of offering water for the feet, which came afterwards to signify generally the exercise of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 4, xix. 2, and elsewhere; 1 Tim. v. 10). So the shoes were taken off out of respect on approaching a superior; and sacred offices seem to have been performed barefoot (Exod. iii. 5; Josh. v. 13). Moreover, to go barefoot expressed mourning or grief (2 Sam. xv. 30; Isai. xx. 2-4; Ezek. xxiv. 17, 23). It is easy from what has been said to understand Isai. lii. 7: however defiled by dusty travel the feet of the messenger, they would appear beautiful to those to whom he brought such happy tidings. To fall at the feet is to pay homage (1 Sam. xxv. 24; Rev. xix. 10); to follow at the feet to obey (1 Sam. xxv. 27, 42); to sit at the feet, to receive instruction (Luke x. 39; Acts xxii. 3). Watering with the foot (Deut. xl. 10) probably refers to irrigation by machinery. From the usual position at meals, it was easy to anoint our Lord's feet (Luke vii. 38). And there are expressions in which the word is introduced for delicacy's sake (Deut. xxviii. 57; Judges iii. 24, marg., and elsewhere).

FELIX (happy). Antonius Felix, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, was appointed procurator of Judea, according to Josephus, on the banishment of Ventidius Cumanus, 52 A.D. He was brother to Pallas, who had great influence over Claudius, and also with Nero: Felix was consequently continued in his government after Nero's accession. He cleared the country of banditti and impostors—the 'worthy deeds' alluded to by Tertullus (Acts xxiv. 2)—but he was in general a cruel and oppressive governor.

He was superseded by Porcius Festus about 60 or 61 A.D.; and charges from the Jews followed him to Rome; but he escaped punishment by means of his powerful brother. He married Drusilla, daughter of Herod Agrippa I., having induced her to abandon her husband Azizus, king of Emesa. His conscience therefore might well alarm him when St. Paul, who had been accused before him, reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come (xxiii. 23-xxiv. 27).

FELLOWSHIP (1 John i. 3). See COMMUNION.

FENCED CITIES. Three classes of places are enumerated in 1 Chron. xxvii. 25, 'cities,' 'villages,' and 'castles.' Cities were those that were walled: villages were open: the castles were probably towers, under the shelter of which habitations, not enclosed with walls, were gathered. They may be those elsewhere called 'towers of the watchmen' (2 Kings xviii. 8, and elsewhere)

Portion of ancient wall of Jerusalem.

The cities in Palestine were fortified by walls, one or more, with battlemented parapets. Towers occurred at intervals: one called the 'tower of Hananeel' is mentioned as belonging to the defences of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxii. 5; Neh. iii. 1, 11.

27; Jer. xxxi. 38). There were gateways also crowned with towers; the gates being perhaps a low rampart to protect it (2 Sam. xx. 15; 1 Kings xxi. 23, marg.). Sometimes, kept ward; and missiles were thrown from them (Judges ix. 52, 53; 2 Sam. xviii. 24; 2 Kings ix. 17; 2 Chron. xxvi. 15). A moat or ditch formed the outermost defence, with place of refuge (Judges ix. 44-51). Such was the castle of Antonia at Jerusalem. And at an earlier period the strong-hold or citadel of Zion was garrisoned by Jebusites for some generations, till David took it, and thus mastered the whole city of Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 6-9). Cities so defended occasionally hold out long against even a powerful invader. Thus Samaria was besieged three years by the Assyrians before it fell (2 Kings xviii. 9, 10). The fortifications of foreign cities, Babylon, &c., are often referred to by the sacred writers (e.g. 27; Jer. li. 58). In some of the Assyrian sculptures there are representations of fortified places. It may be further observed that the word 'build' is often used for 'fortify' a town (2 Chron. xi. 5-12, and elsewhere).

FERRET. The word, rendered 'ferret' in Lev. xi. 30, signifies a wailing cry. The animal so called, described as unclean, is supposed to be a species of the lizard genus. For there are some lizards which utter a kind of moan. Dr. Duns is inclined to suppose that the fan-foot, or house-gecko, Platydictylus gecko, is intended. It is very abundant in Egypt: it utters a croaking sound, softer than that of a frog, as it runs about in search of the insects, &c., on

xix. 18, where in our version 'ferry-boat' occurs, has been thought doubtful: certainly some of the ancient translators give a different rendering. Josephus imagines that a bridge, possibly of boats, was thrown across the river. But it is not at all unlikely that a ferry-boat or raft was used. The ancients had shallow flat-bottomed boats, suited to such rivers. The Hebrews must have been accustomed to the floats employed for crossing the Nile; and according to some travellers rafts are at present so used upon the Jordan.

FESTIVAL. This word may include, if understood in its largest sense, all the solemnities celebrated nationally or religiously by the Israelites. The application of the term is not, however, in every case quite proper; as some religious celebrations, e.g. the great day of atonement, were rather fasts than festivals.

The most important yearly festivals were three—the passover, the feast of pentecost, and the feast of tabernacles. These were times when the males were to appear before the Lord, that is, at the place where the tabernacle or the temple stood (Exod. xxiii. 14-17, xxxiv. 18-24; Deut. xvi. 1-17). Sometimes the women accompanied their husbands (1 Sam. i. 7, 21-23, ii. 19; Luke ii. 41). It is, however, doubtful whether practically even the more religious Israelites visited the sanctuary always three times within the year. The passover was the greatest gathering; and most would assemble then: at the other feasts the attendance was more optional. Elkanah seems to have contented himself with but a single yearly visit to Shiloh. So, when Hezekiah and Josiah were carrying out their reforms, they invited the people to the passover (2 Chron. xxx., xxxv. 1-19); but we read of no special calls to the other festivals. And, when the feast of tabernacles was solemnly kept with a large concourse after the captivity (Neh. viii.), the ceremonial appears to have been of an exceptional kind. But unquestionably those who most delighted in the Lord would be found most frequently treading the courts of his house. And there were doubtless devout men who rejoiced to avail themselves of every opportunity of holy service. These three festivals commemorated events in the national history, the deliverance from bondage, the giving of the law, and the dwelling in booths or tents; this last, indeed, not so much an event as a state, that of their pilgrim-life. They had also an agricultural character. The passover was at the beginning of the year; and the first-fruits were offered then (Lev. xxiii. 10-14): at pentecost was the feast of harvest: the corn was now made into bread, and so was presented to God (16, 17): the feast of tabernacles was at the time of final in-gathering, when all the productions of the earth had been housed, and the people were to rejoice before the Lord. Yet further, there was a spiritual significance, which the ancient Hebrews but dimly discerned, but which we under clearer light may contemplate with intelligent gladness. 'Christ our passover' was sacrificed for us at that especial festival: at pentecost he shed forth the Spirit on the infant church: redemption, and the gift of the Spirit, being thus symbolized, what is the third festival to indicate but that day of holy rejoicing, when the church, gathered into her eternal home, looks back upon her pilgrim-state when she dwelt in earthly tabernacles, and is glad with unutterable joy that she has now a sure habitation, whence she shall go forth no more for ever?

There were two other yearly celebrations, the feast of trumpets, and the day of atonement: the five are sometimes noted together (Lev. xxiii.; Numb. xxviii., xxix.). These all were sacred seasons. There were, indeed, necessarily certain days during the longer feasts on which ordinary employments might be carried on; but on the days of what were called 'holy convocation' all work was to cease (Exod. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 21, 24, 25, 27, 35, 36, 37).

Besides the yearly festivals there were others. The beginnings of the months were marked by special sacrifices and trumpet-blowings (Numb. x. 10, xxviii. 11-15); and feasts were then held (1 Sam. xx. 5; 2 Kings iv. 23). There was also the sabbath (Exod. xx. 8-11), the sabbatical year, and the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 1-13). And it is remarkable how much the cycle of feasts was made to depend on and be developed out of the sabbath, at least how frequently the number seven and multiples of seven recurred in the arrangements.

Apart from the religious aspect of these various festivals, and the occasions they provided of solemn worship, they were of national value as binding the tribes together, bringing them into fellowship, knitting the several communities into one body, having each a share in and a tie to that place which the Lord had chosen to put his name there. Jerusalem with its temple was not merely the political capital, but the religious home of the nation. And so Jeroboam felt, when he devised his festivals to keep his subjects from resorting to the city of David (1 Kings xii. 26-33). There were also festivals ordained from a better motive, though as it appears by no divine command, such as the feast of Purim (Esth. ix. 20-32), the feast of dedication (1 Macc. iv. 56-59), which our Lord himself observed (John x. 22).

In addition to the set festivals to be continually observed, there were occasionally some for special purposes; as when David brought up the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 12-19). And some there were altogether secular, as at the weaning of a child (Gen. xxi. 8), at sheep-shearing (1 Sam. xxv. 36), on a birth-day (Job i. 4, 5; Matt. xiv. 6), &c.

For a more particular account of each festival, see the different articles under their respective names.

FESTUS. Pordicus Festus was appointed by Nero to succeed Felix as procurator of Judea, about 60 or 61 A.D. He is said to have been on the whole a just and active magistrate, clearing his province very energetically of the robbers and murderers who infested it. Before him St. Paul had to defend himself, but removed his cause from the provincial tribunal by appeal to Cæsar (Acts xxiv. 27, xxv., xxvi.). Festus administered his government less than two years, and died in Judea.

FETTERS. Chains and rings to confine the feet. In Judges xvi. 21; 2 Sam. iii. 34; 2 Kings xxv. 7; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, xxxvi. 6; Jer. xxxix. 7, marg., lii. 11, marg., the original word is dual, and signifies the material used—a pair of brazen fetters. In Psal. cv. 18, cxlix. 8, the material is said to be iron: the word is singular, and possibly means a ring or link. The term in Job xxxvi. 8 is more usually rendered 'chains.' Its radical idea is that of binding, and it does not seem in any special way to apply to the feet. In Mark v. 4 (twice); Luke viii. 29, we have 'fettlers' given as the translation of a Greek word occurring in only three places of the New Testament, and signifying exactly that which binds the feet.

FEVER. There are several Hebrew words in Lev. xxvi. 16; Deut. xxviii. 22, which, implying heat or inflammation, may be taken to signify fever. Our translators, by the words they employ, have endeavoured to express the inflammatory nature of the malady. Burning fever, with ague or 'rigours,' is still a common disease in Palestine. The word used in the New Testament also signifies fiery heat (Matt. viii. 14, 15; Mark i. 30, 31; Luke iv. 38, 39). Fever often accompanies dysentery (Acts xxviii. 8).

FIELD. The Hebrew word generally so translated signifies the open fields or country lying unenclosed, as is still the custom in the east; being pretty nearly analogous to 'the common field,' well understood in England some years ago before enclosures were so generally made. It includes tilled land, and pasture (Gen. xxxi. 4, xxxvii. 7), mountainous ground, and woodland (Judges ix. 32, compared with 36; Psal. cxxxii. 6). So hamlets, or the houses of country-people not surrounded by a wall, were reckoned as open fields (Lev. xxv. 31). 'A man of the field' (Gen. xxv. 27) was a hunter, living in the open air; 'the beasts of the field' (Deut. vii. 22), wild beasts. 'The field' is used as in contrast with cities or camps (Gen. iv. 8, xxiv. 63; 1 Sam. xx. 5, 11); also with vineyards, which were fenced off (Exod. xxii. 5; Lev. xxv. 3, 41); and again for the land, as distinguished from the sea (Ezek. xxvi. 6, 8). The field of a city was the open country round about (Gen. xli. 48): a town in the field was a country-place, as opposed to the metropolis (1 Sam. xxvii. 5, where there is the same Hebrew word). Field also means a country or territory (Gen. xxxii. 3), especially a level country (Psal. lxxviii. 12; Hos. xii. 12, 'country' in our version); and the word is often so used in the plural number (Ruth i. 1, where literally 'fields of Moab').

FIG, FIG-TREE. This, Ficus carica, was a tree very common in Palestine (Deut. viii. 8). Mount Olivet was famous anciently for fig-trees; and still some are to be found there. The first notice we have of this tree is when Adam and Eve endeavoured to clothe themselves with leaves (Gen. iii. 7). Whether the leaves they used were those of the ordinary fig-tree may be questioned; but the practice of fastening leaves together for various utensils, as baskets, &c., is common in the east to the present day.

Not only was the fresh fruit of the fig-tree valued, but also cakes of figs are mentioned in scripture (e.g. 1 Sam. xxv. 18, xxx. 12). These were made either by simple compression, or by pounding them into a mass, sometimes together with dates. They were then cut into cakes, often similar to bricks, and hardened by keeping.

Twice the fig-tree is mentioned in the New Testament, on occasions that deserve notice. Our Lord, shortly before his passion, being hungry, sought fruit from a fig-tree, and, finding none, cursed it (Matt. xxi. 18-20; Mark xi. 12-14, 20). It was early in the season, not the ordinary time for figs; but yet, as the fruit precedes the leaves, and there were leaves on this tree, figs might naturally have been expected on it; and, as there were then none, there was proof enough that the pretentious tree was worthless. See Thomson's The Land and the Book, pp. 349, 350. The parable of the fig-tree spared at the intercession of the dresser of the garden (Luke xiii. 6-9) is easily expounded, and is full of instruction. There is, it may be added, an expressive phrase in which the fig-tree is introduced; when men are said to sit under their own vine and their own fig-tree (1 Kings iv. 25; Zech. iii. 10), a state of general peace and prosperity is indicated.

FILE. The word rendered 'file' in 1 Sam. xlii. 21, properly signifies the being notched, bluntness. Perhaps, therefore, the passage might be better translated, 'The Israelites went down to the Philistines,' &c., 'when the edge of the plough-shares,' &c., 'was notched or blunted.'

FINER (Prov. xxv. 4). See REFINER.

FINES. According to the Hebrew law a money compensation was to be paid for certain defaults; and even some criminal acts might be visited and satisfaction made by a fine. Thus a thief was to restore four or five-fold (Exod. xxii. 1). And commutation was thus made for injuring a woman or a servant, for the mischief done by an ox, for careless digging of a pit into which another's ox or ass had fallen, for damage by fire, &c. (Exod. xxi. 18-36, xxii. 5, 6; Lev. xxiv. 18; Deut. xxii. 19, 28, 29). Dedicated persons or things, also, might often be redeemed by fines (Lev. xxvii. 1-27).

FINGER. Some notices of the finger occur in scripture, which may be enumerated. The pointing with the middle finger was a gesture of contempt (Isai. lviii. 9). Hence, in classical writers, this finger was called infamis digitus, Pers., Sat. ii. 33: comp. Martial, ii. 28, 2. A finger was sometimes used for a measure: see Jer. lii. 21: four fingers were a hand-breadth, or palm, and twelve a span. The finger of God signifies his interference, operation, or power. Thus the Egyptian magicians, when compelled to admit that the signs given by Moses and Aaron were supernatural, said, 'This is the finger of God' (Exod. viii. 19; comp. xxxi. 18; Deut. ix. 10; Psal. viii. 3; Luke xi. 20). The sprinklings enjoined by the law were to be with the finger of the priest (Lev. iv. 6, 17, 25, 30, 34, viii. 15, ix. 9, xiv. 16, 27, xvi. 14, 19; Numb. xix. 4). And there is a remarkable physical peculiarity noted in an individual, which must not be passed over. One of the Philistine giants slain had six fingers on each hand (2 Sam. xxi. 20; 1 Chron. xx. 6).

FIR, FIR-TREE. The Hebrew word thus generally rendered in our version implies cutting up, i.e. into boards, planks, &c. Its wood was employed for various purposes, for the floors, ceilings, and doors of the temple (1 Kings vi. 15, 34; 2 Chron. iii. 5); for the decks of ships (Ezek. xxvii. 5); for spear-shafts (Nah. ii. 3); for musical instruments (2 Sam. vi. 5). It is not agreed what tree is intended; but very probably rather a class of trees than a single species may be meant. Thus the Pinus sylvestris, or Scotch fir, the Pinus brutia, Calabrian pine, Abies larix, larch, Cupressus sempervirens, cypress, have been suggested. But most of these are not found in Syria or Palestine. The Pinus halepensis and Juniperus excelsa both grow on Lebanon; and their wood would serve well for the purposes mentioned above. The fir-trees are finely personified in Isai. xiv. 8; Zech. xi. 2.

FIRE. Fire was of course used for culinary purposes among the Hebrews: see BREAD, COOKING. It was also sometimes necessary in Palestine for personal warmth. For this a hearth was constructed, on which wood was burned; or pans of charcoal were used (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Luke xxii. 55; John xviii. 18). There were various uses of fire; and regulations, sacred, municipal, and domestic, in regard to it must be briefly specified. Fire was employed religiously, partially or entirely to consume sacrifices. There can be little doubt that Abel's offering was made by fire; for evidently the animals he brought were killed, as the 'fat' of them is specified (Gen. iv. 4). Noah is distinctly said to have 'offered burnt-offerings' (viii. 20); and after his time the practice is frequently noticed. But no mention is made of fire from heaven for these sacrifices till after the giving of the law (Lev. ix. 24). The sacred fire was to be kept ever burning (vi. 9, 13). This which came 'from before the Lord' was to consume a burnt-offering; for no common fire was to be used for a burnt-offering or for burning incense; and for their offence in the last respect Nadab and Abihu were punished with death (x. 1, 2). Probably, in the times of confusion which followed apostasy and sin, the sacred fire was lost; for we find it again kindled from heaven on the dedication of the temple (2 Chron. vii. 1). Instances also are recorded when God vouchsafed supernatural fire at the offerings of individuals (Judges vi. 21; 1 Kings xviii. 38; 1 Chron. xxi. 26). Fire was, with something of a religious aspect, used as a means of purification (Numb. xxxi. 22, 23: comp. Zech. xiii. 8, 9; 1 Cor. iii. 13-15). Hence that which would not abide the fire was regarded as worthless. So devoted idolatrous cities were to be burnt with fire (Deut. xii. 3, xiii. 16); a doom executed on certain Canaanitish cities (Josh. vi. 24, viii. 28, xi. 13). And occasionally criminals were burnt, but not, some have thought, among the Hebrews, till death by some other mode had been inflicted (vii. 25: comp. Jer. xxix. 22). By the Mosaic law a fire was not to be kindled on the sabbath (Exod. xxxv. 3). There was also a provision for the making good the damage occasioned to a neighbour's corn by kindling a fire (xxii. 6). Such a provision is very needful in a dry climate, where, too, wheat is suffered to become dead ripe before it is cut (see Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 342, 343). Fire had, besides, a figurative meaning. The fire of God sometimes denotes lightning (Exod. ix. 23; 2 Kings i. 12; Job i. 16).

Fire is the symbol of the divine presence (Exod. iii. 2, xix. 18, xxiv. 17; Deut. iv. 36; Heb. xii. 29). The purifying influence, too, of the Holy Spirit is implied by fire (Matt. iii. 11). Moreover fire symbolizes what is injurious (Prov. xvi. 27; Isai. ix. 18), severe affliction (1 Peter iv. 12), and the eternal punishment of the wicked (Matt. v. 22; Mark ix. 43-48; Rev. xx. 14, 15). For notice of children passing through the fire, see MOLOCH.

FIRE-PAN (Exod. xxvii. 3, xxxviii. 3; 2 Kings xxv. 15; Jer. lii. 19). This was one of the vessels of the tabernacle and temple service: the original word is not uniformly rendered in our version: sometimes, as in Lev. xvi. 12, it is a 'censer.' The utensil meant seems to have been a pan or chafing-dish, in which live coals might be carried for burning incense. See CENSER. It is occasionally found in the plural, as in Exod. xxv. 38, xxxvii. 23; Numb. iv. 9; where it is translated 'snuff-dishes,' meaning then some vessel used for trimming the lamps.

FIRKIN (John ii. 6). See MEASURES.

FIRMAMENT. This word, derived from the Latin firmamentum, does not well express the Hebrew râkîd, which properly signifies expanse (Gen. i. 6-8, 14, 15, 17, 20; Ezek. i. 22-26, x. 1), and does not necessarily involve the idea of solidity. Saalschütz (Arch. der Hebr., cap. 45, vol. ii. pp. 67, 68, note) very well maintains the true meaning of the word, pointing to the use of the kindred verb, rightly translated in our version 'that stretched out the earth' (Psal. cxxxvi. 6), and showing that the rising of the mist (Gen. ii. 6) would be inconsistent with the notion of a solid vault which water could not penetrate. It is true some critics strenuously contend that the Hebrews believed the firmament to be a material solid arch, in which the heavenly bodies were fixed like nails, which had windows and doors through which the rain and the snow descended, and which, constructed with beams, was supported on the mountains at the edge or rim of the earth's disk. (See Mr. Bevan in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. 'Firmament.') The Hebrews must have been a singularly-obtuse people, if they received such a theory as this. But it is certainly rather hard upon them to tie down the symbolical expressions of their poetry to an exactly-literal signification. Were such a principle of interpretation admitted, many modern writers might equally be convicted of the ignorance of imagining that the sky is supported by pillars. This view is satisfactorily refuted by Dr. M'Caul, Aids to Faith, Essay v. 15, who furnishes abundant proof 'from the usage of the biblical writers, the uniformity of the Jewish tradition, and the LXX., that the meaning of râkîd is an expanse, and not a solid vault'; in which fowls certainly could not fly, as they are repeatedly said to do in the heavens. With cutting but deserved reproof Dr. M'Caul adds: 'With equal reason might these wise interpreters say that the Hebrews believed that there were bottles in heaven, and that the celestial ocean, or part of it, was first bottled off before the earth could be supplied with rain, or that "the waters are bound up in a garment" (Prov. xxx. 4), or that the ocean has bars and doors (Job xxxviii. 10, 17), or that the shadow of death and the womb have doors (Job iii. 10); for all these are spoken of. If these are figurative, so are the windows and doors of heaven. As in Job xxxviii. 37, "Who can number the clouds in wisdom? or who can stay the bottles of heaven?" bottles are parallel to and explained by "clouds," so in Psal. lxxviii. 23 there is a similar explanatory parallelism, "Though he had commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven;" and few children in a Sunday or national school would take bottles or doors literally. The common people are not so dull as Gesenius and some other intellectual wonders of the day think.'

FIRST-BORN. To the first-born son special privileges belonged. See BIRTH-RIGHT. In consequence of the preservation of the Israelites, when the Egyptian first-born, of man and beast, were destroyed, the first-born of Israel were regarded as holy to the Lord, his special property (Exod. xii. 12, 13, 29, xiii. 1), perhaps intending those only born after the command was given at the time of the departure from Egypt: see CENSUS. The tribe of Levi was, however, subsequently taken in exchange (Numb. iii. 12, 13, viii. 17, 18); and a money payment was made for 273 more than the number of the Levites (iii. 44-51). Also, ever after the first-born were to be redeemed at the price of five shekels each. With regard to beasts, the firstlings of those that were unclean were to be redeemed: of those which might be sacrificed, as of a cow, a goat, or a sheep, the firstlings were not to be redeemed, but offered to the Lord. Various special regulations were made for the carrying out of these commands (Exod. xiii. 12, 13, xxxiv. 19, 20; Numb. xviii. 15-17). If the animal was not redeemed or exchanged, then it was to be killed.

The term 'first-born,' or 'first-begotten,' is sometimes used without reference to any other succeeding births. It was simply a term of highest preeminence (Job xviii. 13; Isai. xlv. 30). Thus it is applied to Christ (Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 6).

FIRST-FRUITS. As the first-born of men and firstlings of beasts, so the first-fruits of the increase of the land were regarded as holy to the Lord. A testimony was thus given of thankfulness, and an acknowledgment made that all good things proceed from the divine bounty. This, indeed, was a practice common among other nations, as Winer instances in respect to Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and others (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Erstlinge'). But there were special regulations prescribed to the Israelites; and from the habitual recurrence of such offerings, the word first-fruits had a significance which made it of frequent use for illustration among the sacred writers (Rom. viii. 23, xi. 16; 1 Cor. xv. 20, 23, xvi. 15; James i. 18; Rev. xiv. 4).

One remarkable provision of the law was that the Hebrews must not for three years touch the produce of any fruit-tree they planted. Three years the fruit was considered uncircumcised, the fourth year of bearing it was consecrated as the first-fruits to the Lord (Lev. xix. 23-25); in the fifth year it was free for the owner's use. This rule is not supposed to have applied to the trees the people found on entering Palestine.

There were general commands as to the offering of the first-fruits (Exod. xxii. 29, xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26), and also specified times when such offerings were to be publicly made. The first-fruits of the harvest in the sheaf were to be presented at the feast of the passover, on the morrow after the sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 9-14). Till this was done, no harvest-work was to be proceeded with. Jewish writers give various particulars of the way in which, as they tell us, the sheaf was to be selected (of barley according to Josephus, Antiq., lib. iii. 10, § 5), and the offering to be made. At the feast of pentecost the first-fruits of the completed harvest in the shape of two loaves made of the new flour were to be presented (Exod. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 15-17; Numb. xxviii. 26). Besides these public and national oblations, there were others of a more private and individual kind. Such were the first-fruits of the dough (xv. 20, 21), and of the threshing-floor, which Jewish writers distinguish into two kinds, the first including wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and figs; the second oil, wine, and other produce which supported human life, also the first of the fleece and the hair of goats. No rule was laid down in scripture as to the proportion the offered first-fruits ought to bear to the whole produce; but one-sixtieth is said to be the least: sometimes one fortieth or one thirtieth part was presented (see Winer, ubi supr.). The address which the offerer was to make to God is prescribed in Deut. xxvi. 1-11. Doubtless in times of national declension less regard would be paid to the law of the first-fruits; but we find that during the various reforms they flowed in abundantly (2 Chron. xxxi. 5; Neh. x. 35, 37; comp. Ezek. xx. 40, xlvi. 14). The first-fruits generally became the portion of the priests and Levites, to be eaten by them and their families (Numb. xviii. 12; Deut. xviii. 4; Ezek. xlv. 30). In Israel after the schism they were sometimes offered to the prophets (2 Kings iv. 42).

FISH, FISHING. The word 'fish' is used in scripture for any inhabitant of the waters (Gen. i. 20-22, 26-28, ix. 2; Numb. xi. 22; Deut. iv. 18; 1 Kings iv. 33; Psal. viii. 8). There is, however, a kind of classification made in Gen. i. 20, 21, where the great monsters, in our translation 'whales,' including also perhaps some land, or at least amphibious, creatures, are distinguished from those moving or creeping in the waters, that is, having no feet. Fish, likewise, were divided into clean and unclean. Those that had fins and scales might be eaten: others were considered an abomination (Lev. xi. 9, 12; Deut. xiv. 9, 10; comp. Matt. xiii. 47, 48); hence the Jews at this day do not touch shell-fish. It may be added that fish without scales are now thought generally unwholesome in Egypt (Lane, Mod. Egypt, 5th edit. p. 25, note).

While the Israelites were in Egypt, fish was a common and favourite article of diet (the Egyptian priests, however, not using it); for they specified this in their murmurings for food in the wilderness (Numb. xi. 5). We find afterwards notice of fish brought from Tyre to Jerusalem (Neh. xiii. 16); and in the New Testament there is repeated mention of fish as readily procured known: that already noted as brought up from Tyre must have been salt fish. And we may not unreasonably suppose that there was a regular fish-market at Jerusalem; as we find one of the city-gates denominated the fish-gate (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3, xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10). Whether fish were bred in ponds and reservoirs among the Hebrews we have no information. The 'fish-pools of Heshbon' (Sol. Song vii. 4) were, so far as the original of the passage informs us, simply 'pools.'

The allusions to the modes of catching fish are numerous in scripture. Thus, we have the mention of angling: the hook (like a thorn) and the line are noticed (Job xli. 1; Isai. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15; where 'angle' in our version is the hook); but nothing is said of a rod. Fish were sometimes speared (Job xli. 7); but the most common process of fishing would seem to have been by nets; both the casting-net and the larger drag-net, which required the use of boats, being employed (Isai. xix. 8; Ezek. xxvi. 5, 14, xvii. 10; Hab. i. 15; Matt. iv. 18, 20, 21, xiii. 47; Mark i. 16, 18, 19, and elsewhere); and it is observable that distinct words occur in the original in the different places, indicating accurately the sort of net employed. It is said also that a kind of weir was sometimes used; the fish being caught in an inclosure of reeds or canes: this was forbidden on the lake of Gennesaret on account of the damage done by stakes to fishermen's boats (Lightfoot on Matt. iv. 18, vol. ii. p. 132).

and constantly eaten (Matt. iv. 18-20, xiv. 17). The Nile abounded in fish; and therefore that judgment, which turned its waters into blood, and destroyed life therein, must have been grievously felt by the Egyptians (Exod. vii. 19-21). In the Red sea and in the Mediterranean (Ezek. xlvii. 10) there were many kinds of fish. In the lake of Gennesaret there were the mulil or chub, the Sparus Galilæus, a species of bream, the Silurus, which, as having no true scales, would be ranked among the unclean kinds, and various others; while in the Jordan and the perennial streams and brooks fish small but plentiful were found. The curing of fish by salting was unquestionably

According to the accounts of travellers, these ancient modes of fishing are still practised. That by 'the hand-net,' says Dr. Thomson, 'is beautiful and picturesque. You see it to best advantage along the coast from Beirût to Sidon. The net is in shape like the top of a tent, with a long cord fastened to the apex. This is tied to the arm, and the net so folded that, when it is thrown, it expands to its utmost circumference, around which are strung beads of lead to make it drop suddenly to the bottom. . . . Away goes the net, expanding as it flies; and its leaded circumference strikes the bottom ere the silly fish is aware that its meshes have closed around him. By the aid of his cord the fisherman leisurely draws up the net, and the fish with it. . . . Then there is the great drag-net, the working of which teaches the value of united effort. Some must row the boat, some cast out the net, some on the shore pull the rope with all their strength, others throw stones and beat the water round the ends, to frighten the fish from escaping there; and, as it approaches the shore, every one is active in holding up the edges, drawing it to land, and seizing the fish. This is that net which "gathered of every kind" (Matt. xiii. 47, 48). . . . I have watched this operation throughout a hundred times along the shore of the Mediterranean. Again, there is the bag-net and basket-net, of various kinds, which are so constructed and worked as to enclose the fish out in deep water. I have seen them of almost every conceivable size and pattern' (The Land and the Book, p. 402). The best time for fishing is generally the night (Luke v. 5; John xxi. 3); and at present, according to the same writer, the night is always chosen for certain kinds of fishing. It may be added that on Genesaret fishing has almost entirely ceased. The habits of the modern Arab are not adapted to such an employment.

Very frequently scriptural allusions to fishing have a figurative meaning (Eccles. ix. 12; Jer. xvi. 16; Ezek. xxix. 4; Amos iv. 2). So our Lord, in calling his disciples who were fishermen, promised to make them 'fishers of men' (Mark i. 17).

Fish are remarkably prolific. Possibly from this fact the Hebrew word for a fish is dâg, which implies increase. And it may have been as embodying the principle of fecundity that fish became objects of worship; against which superstition the Israelites were warned (Deut. iv. 18); Dagon, the Philistine idol, was represented with a fishy stump. See DAGON.

Of the particular fish mentioned in scripture that which swallowed Jonah may be specified: see JONAH. The kind of that spoken of in Matt. xvii. 27 we can but guess at.

Among our Lord's miracles there are recorded on two separate occasions wonderful draughts of fish (Luke v. 4-9; John xxi. 4-11), also the multiplication of a few fish with some loaves for the feeding of several thousand people (Matt. xiv. 15-21, xv. 32-38; Mark vi. 34-44, viii. 1-9; Luke ix. 12-17; John vi. 5-13).

FISH-GATE. One of the gates of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3, xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10).

FITCHES. This word occurs in Isai. xxviii. 25, 27. It would seem to be the black cummin, Nigella sativa, used for both food and medicine. The seed is aromatic, and of a sharp taste. This plant was beaten out with a staff, because the heavy drag would have crushed the seeds. The 'fitches' of Ezek. iv. 9 was SPELT, which see.

FLAG. There are two Hebrew words which are rendered 'flag' in our version. One, of Egyptian origin, occurs in Gen. xli. 2, 18; Job viii. 11. In the first-named two places it is translated 'meadow.' Some have identified it with the Cyperus esculentus, or the Butomus umbellatus; but perhaps it may more generally signify marsh-grass, bulrushes, sedge, everything green which grows in wet ground. Another word, occurring in Exod. ii. 3, 5; Isai. xix. 6, is that which gives name in Hebrew to the Red sea, literally 'weedy sea.' See SEA, RED SEA. It designates in these places a water-plant growing by the river-side, probably the Alga Nilotica; but it may sometimes be used in a more general sense.

FLAGON. This word is found in 2 Sam. vi. 19; 1 Chron. xvi. 3; Sol. Song ii. 5; Hos. iii. 1; where the original term means grapes compressed into cakes: these were, it seems, an article of food, and were sometimes, as the passage from Hosea proves, offered to idols. The word 'flagons' is found again in Isai. xxii. 24, as the translation of a Hebrew term signifying a skin-bottle, any vessel, also an instrument of music. 'Flagons' very well expresses the meaning here.

FLAX. A well-known annual plant, Linum perenne, the fibres of which are spun into thread, and woven into linen cloth. It has a green stem, one and a half or two feet high, and a blue flower, succeeded by a capsule containing ten oblong flat brown seeds, from which linseed oil is expressed. There are several varieties of flax. It was cultivated in Egypt (Exod. ix. 31; Isai. xix. 9), especially in the Delta and the neighbourhood of Pelusium; and the stalk of Egyptian flax is said to have grown to the height of more than three feet and to the thickness of a reed. It is questioned in what state the flax was when smitten by the plague of thunder and hail. The more probable opinion is that of Gesenius that it was in the calix, i.e. in flower. Flax was very early cultivated in Palestine. Interpreters, however, differ in respect to the rendering of Josh. ii. 6; but 'the stalks of flax' of our version may be taken to give the true meaning of the sacred writer. The drying of the stalks was therefore one part of the process in the flax or linen manufacture, next came the separation of the fibres, for the Hebrew word implies separation, and then the combing (see Henderson, Isaiah, note on xix. 9). Tow made from the coarser fibres of the plant was known to the Hebrews (Judges xvi. 9; Isai. i. 31). Besides other uses it was employed for wicks (xliiii. 17); perhaps also a wick is to be understood in xlii. 3, the last faint flicker of the expiring light. Little flax in comparison with cotton is now grown in Palestine. See COTTON, LINEN.

FLEA (1 Sam. xxiv. 14, xxvi. 20). In the only places in which this insect is mentioned in scripture, David likens himself to it, while addressing Saul, out of humility. Fleas are very abundant in the east, to the great annoyance and piteous complaints of travellers.

FLESH. For flesh in its ordinary signification see FOOD. But the word is frequently used in a figurative way. Sometimes it signifies every thing living (Gen. vi. 13, 17, 19); sometimes mankind (vi. 12); sometimes the body as distinguished from the soul or spirit (Col. ii. 5; 1 Pet. iv. 6). By the Word's being made flesh we understand the incarnation of the Son of God (John i. 14). And by 'flesh' very generally is expressed the carnal nature of the unrenewed man (Rom. vii. 5, viii. 1, 5, 8, 9; Gal. v. 17, 19; Eph. ii. 3).

FLIES. See FLY.

FLINT. The word we translate 'flint' in Deut. viii. 15, xxxii. 13; Job xxviii. 9, marg.; Psal. cxiv. 8 signifies a hard stone, with the primary idea of smoothness. In Isai. l. 7 it is used figuratively to signify uncompromising firmness. In Ezek. iii. 9 our version has 'flint' for a Hebrew word frequently translated 'rock,' and united with 'flint' in some of the passages first referred to. A kindred word occurs in Isai. v. 23.

FLOCKS. See FOLD, SHEEP, SHEPHERD.

FLOOD, THE. We have a very brief account of the early history of the world from Adam to Noah. Arts and sciences were cultivated; and there was always a holy seed which walked with God. But, as men multiplied, they became more and more corrupt; till at length in vindication of his righteous moral government it became necessary for God to sweep away from the earth that depraved race. He declared, therefore, that he would bring a flood of waters upon it. The catastrophe is narrated in Gen. vi. 9-viii. 22. Let us review the circumstances.

First of all the coming judgment was revealed to Noah, 'a just man,' who was ordered to construct a large vessel or ark, 300 cubits long, 50 broad and 30 high, in which he and his family might be preserved. He was also to take in living creatures in pairs, and to provide store of food. The preparation would occupy a very considerable space of time, it has been thought a century or upwards. Afterwards, when all was complete, Noah received another and more particular direction. Of clean beasts he was to take seven pairs, of those which were unclean severally a single pair; and of birds in like manner. And within seven days he was warned the desolating rain would commence. There is no contradiction between the two commands respecting animals. It was sufficient at first to say that they should be preserved in pairs, with which the specification long after given that of some kinds there should be several pairs is a supplemental command thoroughly consistent. And in pairs we are subsequently told they did enter the ark. After this last intimation Noah commenced the embarkation. Some critics, disposed to find fault with everything, have complained that Noah was ordered to go into the ark seven days before the rain would descend; while shortly after it is said that 'in the self-same day,' viz. on which the rain began, Noah and his family went in. Such critics only proclaim their own folly in supposing that such an embarkation could be completed in a single day. Seven days' notice was given. All was immediately astir: the selected animals were led into the ark, where perhaps many of the stores were already accumulated. Seven days were doubtless thus fully occupied; and, when all had entered, and Noah and his family had gone in too, and were secured there by the Lord's protecting hand, then immediately after this last act, on that very day, the rain descended. It came with a sudden burst upon the careless ungodly world (Matt. xxiv. 37-39), and lasted forty days and forty nights. 'The fountains of the great deep,' moreover, were broken up. We are also told that 'the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days.' This statement has puzzled certain critics, as if it were inconsistent with the fact that therein lasted for but forty days; since they have adopted the opinion, which unfortunately for their notion ordinary experience does not confirm, that, the instant rain ceases, with no reference to other causes, an inundation must subside. It was one hundred and fifty days before any sensible diminution of the flood was perceived. And five months after the rain commenced, that is, on the seventeenth day of the seventh month, the ark grounded on Ararat. But it was not till the expiration of above two months more that the tops of the mountains were seen. Yet forty days Noah still waited, and then sent forth a raven and a dove; of which the last alone returned to him. He sent her out again, after seven days; and she brought him back an olive-leaf. Again seven days, and he let her fly again; but she returned no more. Then on the first day of the first month Noah removed the covering of his ark and saw that the earth apparently was dried. But till the Lord commanded him to come forth he would not quit his secure refuge; and it was not till the twenty-seventh day of the second month that the command came. Then all the human family and the animals and fowls preserved came forth; and Noah offered sacrifice to the Lord, and received an assurance that no such catastrophe should again befall the world.

Solemn, indeed, must have been his feelings, as he trod once more the ground and found himself the lord of a world which iniquity had utterly emptied, another head of mankind from whom again the earth was to be peopled. It was in faith that he had builded his ark, and while by his obedience he condemned the world he became the 'heir of the righteousness which is by faith' (Heb. xi. 7).

Such is the scripture narrative. It has remarkable confirmation in the traditions of almost every nation. Two or three of these shall be briefly noticed. The god Kronos appeared to king Xisuthros, warned him of a destructive flood, and commanded him to write a comprehensive history of things and to bury it, and to make a vessel in which he and his friends might be preserved. Xisuthros obeyed; and, when the flood had somewhat abated, he sent out some birds a first, second, and third time. As they did not then return, Xisuthros, finding that the ground was dry, with some of his party quitted his vessel, which was stranded on the side of an Armenian mountain, offered sacrifices to the gods, and disappeared. The rest of the company, as their friends did not return, also left the ship, and were admonished by a voice from heaven to repair to Babylon, to dig up the writing that was buried, and to live piously. This story is found in a fragment of Berosus (see Cory's Ancient Fragments, pp. 29-31). Again in China there is a tradition that a certain Fâh-he was preserved from an overwhelming deluge. He had a wife, three sons, and three daughters; and from them the world was replenished with people (see Hardwick, Christ and other Masters, vol. ii. p. 18, edit. 1863). There is also an Indian story, in various forms. Brama, in one, is stated to have warned Manu, a righteous person, to build a ship, and place in it seven holy beings, and all kinds of seeds, as a flood was imminent. The ship is ultimately made fast to a lofty summit of the Himalaya mountains; and Manu is the parent of a new race of men (ibid., vol. i. pp. 312-319). Nor are such traditions unknown in America. Coxcox or Tezpi is said to have preserved his wife and children, with certain animals and grain, during a deluge, in a large vessel. When the waters were abating, he sent out various birds, of which one alone, the humming-bird, returned with a leafy branch. Coxcox landed near the mountain Colhuacan (ibid., vol. ii. pp. 166, 167).

It is impossible to refer here to more of these traditional stories, which have been handed down in widely-separated regions of the earth, preserved sometimes in pictorial representations, or corroborated by coins—as in the medal struck at Apamea in Phrygia, about the time of the Roman emperor Septimius Severus, in the third century after Christ, which not only commemorates the deluge, but exhibits Noah's name—interwoven with religious observances, or worked into the literature of a people, found to exist among those least civilized, and those most so. Collections of these histories may be found in Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 202-205; H. Miller, Testimony of the Rocks, lect. vii. pp. 268-286.

But, when a tradition so largely prevails, when in the oldest memories of almost every people a similar belief is found to adhere, modified indeed according to circumstances, but identical in the main fact, it is hard to believe that so many independent structures of fancy could exist, if there were no foundation, if there were not really some great event which has impressed itself through all the generations of mankind; the traces of which, as we find them, bear strong witness to the truth of what the scripture unfolds.

Hitherto there were supposed to be other testimonies scattered over the face of the earth. The marine deposits, the shells, the various fragments into which rocks are found broken, were believed to be irrefragable proofs that the waters of the ocean had at no very distant date rolled over the whole world. Closer and more scientific examination has shown that there are no existing evidences in the state of the earth's crust of such an universal inundation. And the question must be fairly put, Does the scripture necessarily imply that the inundation was universal? It implies that the existing race of men were, with the exception of eight persons, swept off. But we have no proof that population had then spread over the entire world. It might amount to a vast many millions, and yet their seats have been in a comparatively-limited district, so as to be desolated by an extended but partial flood. It is true that 'all the high hills that were under the whole heaven' are said to have been 'covered' (Gen. vii. 19). But analogous phrases occur in other parts of the sacred book (e.g. Deut. ii. 25; Acts ii. 5; Col. i. 23), where certainly no one ever dreamed that the whole world literally was meant. And then as to the 'high hills' being covered, can the inspired writer intend by these words the Alps, the Andes, the great Himalayas? can he mean even those lower peaks and ridges, as Lebanon, which were better known to the Hebrews? Look at the narrative. The ark grounded on the seventeenth day of the seventh month. But it was not till the first day of the tenth month that the tops of the mountains appeared, that is, seventy-three days were required for the subsiding of the few feet of water, which, running off after the ark grounded, would leave the mountain-tops bare. And yet in three months, ninety days, more, the rest of the water was gone; and the earth was dry on the first day of the first month. We cannot imagine that the record means that within those ninety days 15,000, 10,000, 8,000, or 6,000 feet of water dried off. Surely, then, lower hills are intended. Besides, if the water during these last ninety days decreased so rapidly, how was it that forty days after the mountain-tops were seen the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot? and yet in seven days more an olive-tree was left uncovered, the olive being known not to grow even on mountain-slopes, but at a much lower elevation than many other common trees.

But to examine the whole matter fairly we must not forget the fact, sufficiently patent, that each region of the earth has its appropriate fauna and flora, that is, the animals and plants found in one country differ from those of another. Does the command to Noah, then, to take of the various creatures mean that he was to collect the animals of America as well as Asia? and that these, after the flood was over, were transported back to their own peculiar locality? or does it not rather mean those of the wide region around his own settlements?

There are other considerations—the immense numbers of the separate species of mammals, birds, and reptiles, far exceeding what naturalists, even a few years ago, were inclined to rate them at, the vast amount and the unlimited variety of food necessary for them, the destruction of marine animals, as also of fresh-water fish, which must have occurred, Noah not being directed to take any of these with him, the fact that cones of volcanic ashes and scoriae, of the remotest antiquity, may still be seen, with no mark whatever of having been washed over—these and similar considerations have led many to conclude that the deluge was not universal, and that the supposition of its being but partial is not contradictory to the inspired narrative.

Among the writers who have adopted these views, one of the most note-worthy is Hugh Miller. In his excellent book entitled The Testimony of the Rocks, there are two lectures specially devoted to the Noachian deluge. His arguments upon the subject are very ingenious. A brief description of his theory shall be given here.

Hugh Miller sets out by observing that, though we commonly speak of the stable earth and the inconstant sea, the land is far more liable to changes of level than the waters. There is no evidence to show that the sea-level has varied during at least the ages of the tertiary formations; while there is abundant proof that within the same period continents have sunk and mountain-chains been elevated to a vast height. Nay, such changes, and on a considerable scale, are occurring in our own times. In 1819, a great region, comprising 2,000 square miles of country in the delta of the Indus, sunk so much as to become an inland sea. And, a few years later, an area greater than our own island, lying between the Andes and the Pacific ocean, was elevated from two to seven feet. Inhabitants would not be able by their ordinary sensations to distinguish between the sinking of the land and the rising of the sea. So that, if a spectator were placed securely on a lofty peak in the midst of a country which was gradually subsiding, to his eye the spectacle would be represented of the water advancing day by day, flooding first the lowlands, covering then the lower hills, advancing up the sides of mountains, till at length the spot where he stood would be the only speck above the dashing waves of a mighty sea. May we then suppose that the flood was produced by a somewhat-similar depression of the land through a great region of the earth's surface? 'There is a remarkable portion of the globe,' says Miller, 'chiefly in the Asiatic continent, though it extends into Europe, and which is nearly equal to all Europe in area, whose rivers (some of them . . . of great size) do not fall into the ocean, or into any of the many seas which communicate with it. They are, on the contrary, all turned inwards, if I may so express myself, losing themselves, in the eastern parts of the tract, in the lakes of a rainless district, in which they supply but the waste of evaporation, and falling, in the western parts, into seas such as the Caspian and the Aral. In this region there are extensive districts still under the level of the ocean. The shore-line of the Caspian, for instance, is rather more than eighty-three feet beneath that of the Black sea; and some of the great flat steppes which spread out around it, such as what is known as the steppe of Astracan, have a mean level of about thirty feet beneath that of the Baltic. Were there a trench-like strip of country that communicated between the Caspian and the gulf of Finland to be depressed beneath the level of the latter sea, it would so open up the fountains of the great deep as to lay under water an extensive and populous region, containing the cities of Astracan and Astrabad, and many other towns and villages. Nor is it unworthy of remark, surely, that one of the depressed steppes of this peculiar region is known as the 'Low Steppe of the Caucasus,' and forms no inconsiderable portion of the great recognized centre of the human family' (pp. 344, 345). Miller goes on to consider what would be the result, both really and to appearance, if a gradual depression of the region indicated, like the depression in America in 1821, were to occur, the land sinking lower and lower for forty days, and drenching incessant rains at the same time falling. 'The depression, which, by extending to the Euxine sea and the Persian gulf on the one hand, and to the gulf of Finland on the other, would open up by three separate channels the fountains of the great deep, and which included, let us suppose, an area of about 2,000 miles each way, would at the end of the fortieth day be sunk in its centre to the depth of 16,000 feet—a depth sufficiently profound to bury the loftiest mountains of the district; and yet, having a gradient of declination of but sixteen feet per mile, the contour of its hills and plains would remain apparently what they had been before, the doomed inhabitants would see but the water rising along the mountain-sides, and one refuge after another swept away, till the last witness of the scene would have perished, and the last hill-top would have disappeared. And when, after a hundred and fifty days had come and gone, the depressed hollow would have begun slowly to rise, and when, after the fifth month had passed, the ark would have grounded on the summit of mount Ararat, all that could have been seen from the upper window of the vessel would be simply a boundless sea, roughened by tides, now flowing outwards with a reversed course towards the distant ocean, by the three great outlets which, during the period of depression, had given access to the waters. Noah would of course perceive that "the fountains of the deep were stopped," and "the waters returning from off the earth continually;" but whether the deluge had been partial or universal he could neither see nor know' (pp. 347, 348).

It does not become any one to speak positively and dogmatically of what actually took place at this great catastrophe; nor must he be so in love with his own theory as to maintain that that, and that alone, would satisfactorily account for the phenomena. But there is certainly something in Miller's theory which, while he treats the scripture record with deepest reverence, does seem to meet the difficulties which have been advanced on scientific and other grounds, and to show how the catastrophe might have been produced in a way most in accordance with the Deity's usual course of working. It is not necessary to insist on all the details, or that the depression was to the depth supposed; but, generally speaking, this theory well demands attention, and should not lightly be rejected. The present writer, therefore, while speaking on the subject with diffidence, is inclined to admit the great likelihood of its truth.

The construction of the ark has not yet been touched on. If the cubit be reckoned at 21 inches, the dimensions will be 525 feet in length, 87 feet 6 inches in breadth, 52 feet 6 in height. The proportions are those of the human body; and they are admirably adapted for a vessel required, like the ark, to float steadily with abundant stowage. This is proved by modern experiments. Upwards of 200 years ago a vessel was built by one Jansen a Dutch merchant, 120 feet long, 20 wide and 12 deep. She was not a quick sailor, but was found most convenient for stowage.

The ark was made of 'gopher-wood,' probably cypress; and it was to be divided into 'rooms' or 'nests,' that is, furnished with a vast number of separate compartments, placed one above another in three tiers. Light was to be admitted by a window, not improbably a sky-light, a cubit broad, extending the whole length of the ark. If so, however, there must have been some protection from the rain. A 'covering' is spoken of (Gen. viii. 13); but several writers have believed that some transparent or translucent substance was employed, excluding the weather and admitting the light (see Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. xxix. vol. i. p. 311, note). It is observable that the 'window' which Noah is said to have opened (Gen. viii. 6) is not in the original the same word with that occurring in vi. 16. Perhaps one or more divisions of the long sky-light were made to open. There was a door also, through which the persons and the animals would enter and pass out.

It is very likely that to a certain extent the instinct and habits of the animals might be modified and controlled; so that those, otherwise hostile, might for a time herd peaceably together. But there exists, as already said, more than one difficulty in supposing that all the living creatures throughout the world were collected into the ark. And, whereas it is sometimes asked why Noah should have been commanded to preserve the fowls of only a single region, seeing that after the desolation they would flock into it from contiguous districts, the reply is that this is not naturally the case. If certain kinds of birds are exterminated from a country, those of the same kind do not re-people it, though no physical obstacle exists to their migrating from other countries. Proof of this fact is evident in the disappearance here of many birds once common in England.

A reverent mind will not presume to limit the power of the Mightiest. Hard and easy lose their respective proprieties when applied to him. He that makes a single blade of grass to grow can as readily cause all that breathes upon the face of the earth to tend to a single spot, and afterwards to find their way back to fitting abodes. We need not stand aghast therefore at what men are sometimes pleased to call the stupendousness of some particular miracle. But still we may reason upon the ordinary workings of God when employing extraordinary power. He produces the effect he designs by the least possible departure from the regular operation of natural laws. And, if by a partial flood he could sweep off all an offending race, we hardly have a right to suppose that he would extend the inundation to regions uninhabited by men, producing thereby additional complications. But further research may throw greater light on this catastrophe. Men may strongly maintain what is evidently proved; but let them not venture to substitute crude speculation for solid proof: let them rather reverently wait the further lifting of the curtain which at present veils so much from their eyes.

The ark is said to have rested on the mountains of Ararat. If those which now bear the name be meant, we must suppose that the resting-place was on the side, not upon the peak of Ararat. But some lower chain of hills may be intended. On this point also opinions should be formed and maintained with modesty and forbearance.

FLOOR. See THRESHING.

FLOUR. See BREAD, MILL.

FLOWER. Many flowering plants are described by travellers as growing in Palestine. It must, however, be remembered that these vary in different parts of the country. The altitude and temperature differ; and consequently each region has its peculiar flora. The low valleys, rocky hills, plains, and sea-board are for half the year, from Christmas to midsummer, covered with vegetation, which is afterwards destroyed by the heat; so that for the other months the landscape is bare and apparently sterile. The mountains, on the other hand, rather yield alpine plants, mosses, lichens, &c. Very beautiful are many of the flowers of Palestine; and in the districts first mentioned, through spring and early summer, tulips, squills, poppies, pinks, geraniums, campanulas, irises, &c., give the country, with their rich and delicate colours, a most showy aspect.

Dr. Hooker has furnished an elaborate account of the botany of Palestine, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 683-689. He observes that in western Syria and Palestine about 2000 or 2500 plants occur; of which probably 500 are British wild-flowers. The most abundant natural families in this region are 1. Leguminosæ; 2. Compositæ; 3. Labiata; 4. Crucifera; 5. Umbellifera; 6. Caryophyllæ; 7. Boraginæ; 8. Scrophularinæ; 9. Graminæ; 10. Liliacæ. Dr. Hooker enumerates also other families less common, and remarks upon the showy character of the herbage mentioned above. In eastern Syria and Palestine (excluding the mountain-country east of the Jordan and Syrian desert, of the plants in which scarcely anything is known), the vegetation has more of a tropical character; and round the Dead sea saline plants appear. In the Jordan valley are tamarisks, the Acacia Farnesiana, of which the yellow flowers yield a delicious scent; while the superb milletoe, Loranthus acaciæ grows upon it, whose scarlet flowers are brilliant ornaments to the desert during winter, giving the appearance of flame to the bushes.' The common caper-plant, Capparis spinosa, is very common, and various others. In the middle and upper mountain-regions, there are variations at different heights. Hawthorn, dog-rose, honeysuckle, jasmine, primrose, &c., occur at an elevation of 4000 feet. Higher up are a few boreal and many cryptogamic plants.

Our Lord condescended to illustrate some of his discourses by a reference to flowers, as to the lilies (Matt. vi. 28, 29). And figuratively the term is often very appositely used to indicate the fading character of something that soon passes away (Job xiv. 2; Psal. ciii. 15; Isai. xxviii. 1, xl. 6-8).

FLUE-NET (Hab. i. 15, marg.) This is for 'drag' in the text. See FISHING.

FLUTE. A musical instrument, thought to be composed of a number of pipes (Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15), possibly equivalent to that which in our translation is called 'organ' (Gen. iv. 21). See PIPE.

FLUX, BLOODY. The dysentery (Acts xxviii. 8). This was probably the disease of which King Jehoram of Judah died (2 Chron. xxi. 15, 18, 19). See BLOOD, ISSUE OF.

FLY. The 'flies' which were sent as one of the plagues of Egypt have been supposed a mixture of noxious insects (Exod. viii. 21, 22, 24, 29, 31; Psal. lxxviii. 45, cv. 31). But it is quite as likely that some definite species of fly is meant: some have thought it the beetle (Blattia orientalis), some the gad-fly. But the beetle is a nocturnal insect. Mr. Gosse suggests some kinds of the Tabanidae, which spare neither man nor beast, gorging themselves with blood, and infusing an irritating venom (Imp. Bible Dict., vol. i. p. 597). But even the common flies, Muscidae, would inflict an intolerable plague. There is another Hebrew word rendered 'fly' in Eccles. x. 1; Isai. vii. 18. Henderson (Isaiah, note on vii. 18) considers that 'not only flies are meant there, but mosquitos, gnats, &c., which are found in immense multitudes in the marshes adjacent to the mouths of the Nile.' And he cites an account of the swarms, like volumes of smoke, of poisonous flies on the Danube, attacking every species of quadruped, covering every vulnerable part, and torturing to death. A more apt metaphor could not have been employed by which to describe the numerous army of Pharaoh-necho.

FOAL (Gen. xxxii. 15, xlix. 11; Zech. ix. 9; Matt. xxi. 5). The young of the Ass and Horse, which see.

FOLD. An enclosure for flocks. See PASTURE, PASTURAGE, SHEEP-FOLD. The word is sometimes used figuratively (e. g. John x. 16).

FOOD. It would seem most probable that animal food was not allowed to the antediluvian inhabitants of the earth (Gen. i. 29, ii. 16, 17, iii. 18, 19). But after the deluge there was a permission that animals generally might be eaten, 'even as the green herb,' with the single prohibition of flesh with the life thereof, that is, the blood (ix. 3, 4). Of course, though there was no religious injunction, there must have been then some distinction of meats, just as with ourselves, since, while we have free choice among the productions of the earth, common sense and experience teach us that there are some, animal and vegetable, which are pleasant and wholesome, and some that are unpalatable and injurious. The difference of climates occasions also a difference in the diet of men. In warmer regions lighter and in colder grosser aliment is suitable. Besides, the products of some lands are unknown in others; and naturally the staple food of the mass of the population must everywhere be that which is cheapest and most plentiful. The rarer dainties can be procured for the most part only by the rich.

We have much information in scripture as to the food generally consumed by the patriarchs and the children of Israel.

That derived from the vegetable world may be first considered. Of this, bread was the principal; the use of it being comparatively greater than among ourselves. This was called the 'stay,' or the 'staff' (Lev. xxvi. 26; Psal. cv. 16; Isai. iii. 1); and the phrase to 'eat bread' meant generally to make a meal, even though animal food was a part of the provision (Gen. xliii. 16, 25, 31, 32; Exod. ii. 20; Luke xiv. 1, 15). Ordinary bread was leavened; but, at certain times, unleavened bread was to be eaten (Exod. xii. 15-20). For some account of the kinds of bread in use see BREAD. Bread was dipped in the common light drink (Ruth ii. 14), or in the gravy of meat (John xlii. 26; comp. Judges vi. 19), with salt (Job vi. 6), with some of those vegetable accompaniments (Exod. xii. 8) which will be afterwards noticed, or perhaps with something like that kind of sauce now so much used in Egypt (Lane, Mod. Egypt., 5th edit. pp. 134, 192). Corn was also in itself an article of food, either as rubbed from the ears (Deut. xxiii. 25; Matt. xii. 1), parched (Ruth ii. 14; 1 Sam. xvii. 17), or bruised, probably kneaded into a kind of cake and eaten with oil (Lev. ii. 14-16; Prov. xxvii. 22). Many other vegetables, besides cereals, are mentioned, such as lentiles, of which, as well as of other herbs, pottage was made (Gen. xxv. 29-34), cucumbers, leeks, onions, garlic (Numb. xi. 5), 'mallows' or sea-purslane (Job xxx. 4), besides the 'bitter herbs' (Exod. xii. 8), and 'herbs' (2 Kings iv. 39), 'juniper-roots' or broom (Job xxx. 4), &c., eaten only in times of scarcity. Coriander, cummin, mustard, anise or dill, mint, and rue (Exod. xvi. 31; Matt. xiii. 31, xliii. 23; Luke xi. 42) were probably used as condiments. But a mere dinner of herbs was considered very homely fare (Prov. xv. 17).

Of fruits, figs and grapes were most abundant. Figs were eaten ripe (Hos. ix. 10), also dried and made into cakes (1 Sam. xxv. 18, xxx. 12); grapes, both fresh (Deut. xxiii. 24), dried as raisins (2 Sam. xvi. 1), and also as made like figs into cakes (vi. 19), where our version renders 'flavons of wine'. The 'summer-fruits' (xvi. 1), too, were probably cakes of figs. These fruit-cakes are a common article of diet now; and a refreshing drink is made by dissolving them in water. Pomegranates are mentioned (Sol. Song viii. 2; Hagg. ii. 19): a kind of wine seems to have been obtained from them; also apples or citrons (Sol. Song ii. 5), mulberries (Luke xvii. 6, where our translators give 'sycamine-tree'), the sycamore-fig (1 Kings x. 27; Amos vii. 14), also 'nuts and almonds' (Gen. xliii. 11)

Dates and olives were doubtless eaten; though there is little mention of them in scripture; and olives were chiefly used for the oil. They are, however, continually eaten as a fruit at present. 'The berry pickled forms the general relish to the farmer's dry bread. He goes forth to his work in the field at early dawn, or sets out on a journey, with no other provision than olives wrapped up in a quantity of his paper-like loaves; and with this he is contented' (Thomson's The Land and the Book, p. 55). The Egyptians cultivated melons (Numb. xi. 5).

Animal food is not even at the present day eaten so largely in Palestine as it is with ourselves. Nevertheless, the Hebrew people had full permission to enjoy it according to their pleasure; and it was one part of the blessing promised to their obedience in the land of Canaan that they should have abundance (Deut. xii. 5-7, 15, 20-22). Oxen, stall-fed and from the pasture, sheep, calves, lambs, kids (only not seethed in the dam's milk), harts, roe-bucks, and fallow-deer, are specially noticed as used for food, with various kinds of fowl (Gen. xviii. 7, xxvii. 9; Numb. xi. 31, 32; Judges vi. 19; 1 Sam. xvi. 20, xxvi. 20, xxviii. 24; 2 Sam. xii. 4; 1 Kings i. 9, v. 23; Neh. v. 18; Psal. lxxviii. 27; Prov. xv. 17; Isai. xxii. 13; Amos vi. 4; Matt. xxii. 4; Luke xv. 23, 29). Locusts also were eaten (Matt. iii. 4); and fish, both brought from the sea (Neh. xiii. 16), and fresh from the lakes (Matt. xiv. 17-19, xv. 34, 36; John xxi. 9). From many kinds of animal food, however, the Hebrews were prohibited; of which lists are given (Lev. xi.; Deut. xiv. 1-20). We may suppose that there were good reasons for these prohibitions; possibly that certain kinds of flesh were in that climate less wholesome. Blood, moreover, as noted above, was not to be eaten (Gen. ix. 4), nor that which died of itself, or was torn of beasts; the first prohibition being binding upon all men, the latter relaxed in the case of strangers (Lev. xvii. 10-16, xix. 26; Deut. xii. 23, xiv. 21; 1 Sam. xiv. 32, 33). Neither was the sinew in the thigh, nervus ischiadicus, eaten, in remembrance of Jacob's conflict with the angel (Gen. xxxii. 25, 31, 32), nor the fat of sacrifices (Lev. iii. 9-11, 14-16, vii. 23-25; 1 Sam. ii. 15, 16; 2 Chron. vii. 7). Perhaps 'fat' in Neh. viii. 10 meant, a different word being used in the original, choice portions: see FAT. The only restriction in regard to food which we find in the New Testament was that blood, things strangled, and meat offered to idols were not lawful (Acts xv. 20, 29, xxi. 25; 1 Cor. viii.). This, however, was mainly that reasonable ground of offence might not be given to the Jews, or to those who were likely to be scandalized (x. 19-33), as if honour to the idol was thereby shown.

Some other articles of food may be enumerated, such as eggs, milk, both fresh, and in its sour state, in which it is so commonly used at present (see MILK, BUTTER), or coagulated milk (see BUTTER, CHEESE), honey; butter and honey sometimes implying good fare, or perhaps the spontaneous produce of a thinly-populated country (Isai. vii. 15, 22), oil, &c. (Gen. xviii. 8, xliii. 11; Judges iv. 19, v. 25; 1 Sam. xiv. 27, xvii. 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 29; 1 Kings xiv. 3, xvii. 12-16; Prov. xxi. 17; Isai. x. 14, lix. 5; Luke xi. 12).

Of course in times of distress or famine various articles were used as food, from which men would have ordinarily shrunk (2 Kings vi. 25-29); and prison diet was meagre enough (1 Kings xxii. 27; Jer. xxxviii. 9).

As to drink, water was commonly used, also sour milk, vinegar, or sour wine (Ruth ii. 14), wine moreover, and strong drink. See ESHPAR, WINE.

Modern Jews observe as nearly as they can the precepts of the law in regard to food. Of course their diet must vary according to the custom of the country in which they dwell. But they still make the distinction between clean and unclean animals. Thus, they abstain from swine's flesh, as forbidden in the law (Lev. xi. 71), and, because of the fish tribe those only that have fins and scales are lawful (9-12), the Jews do not eat shell-fish. They do not partake of flesh and butter at the same meal; nor must these be placed on the table at one time; so that, when meat is eaten, from two to three hours must elapse before they take butter. This practice is grounded on Exod. xxiii. 19. Similarly they will not touch cheese made by Gentiles. There are special rules for slaughtering beasts; and, after the butcher or shohhet has done his work, the meat is examined and sealed by a shomer, inspector, who carefully takes out the sinews of the thigh: see Mills, British Jews, part i. chap. iii. pp. 61-65.

FOOL. This term implies moral pravity. The fool is not merely an unreasonable, he is a sinful person (2 Sam. xiii. 13; Psal. xiv. 1; Prov. xix. 1, 29, xx. 3, xxvi. 4, 5; Matt. xxiii. 17; Rom. i. 21, 22). Hence the censure of one who unjustifiably cast so great a reproach upon a brother (Matt. v. 22).

FOOT. See FEET.

FOOTMAN. This is sometimes the translation of a Hebrew word taken in a military sense (e.g. Judges xx. 2), to distinguish infantry. Again, it is used for the runners of the royal guard (1 Sam. xxii. 17), who were designated by a different Hebrew term. It was a high commendation of a man to call him swift (2 Sam. i. 23, ii. 18); and we find that the services of the king's runners were often required (1 Sam. viii. 11; 2 Sam. xviii. 21). A body of these appears to have been regularly kept up (1 Kings xiv. 27, marg.).

FOOT-STOOL. This was a necessary appendage to a throne (2 Chron. ix. 18). Hence the bowing down to the foot-stool; which expression is figuratively applied to divine worship (Psal. cxcix. 5, cxxxii. 7). Indeed the ark over which the divine glory rested was regarded as God's foot-stool (1 Chron. xxviii. 2). And elsewhere, as heaven is said to be his throne, the earth is appositely called his foot-stool (Isai. lvi. 1; Matt. v. 35). Conquerors trod upon their vanquished enemies (Josh. x. 24). And so Messiah's foes are to be made his foot-stool (Psal. cx. 1; 1 Cor. xv. 25).

FORD (Gen. xxxii. 22; Josh. ii. 7; Judges iii. 28, xvi. 5; Isai. xvi. 2). See BRIDGE.

FOREHEAD. It is customary among eastern nations to colour the face and forehead, and to impress marks thereon, for the purpose of signifying their devotion to some deity, or their belonging to some religious sect. We find allusions to this practice in scripture. Thus a mark (a cross, it has been thought, because the original word is the Hebrew letter Tau, anciently formed like a cross) was to be set upon the forehead of those who mourned for sin (Ezek. ix. 4, 6; see also Rev. vii. 3, ix. 4, xiv. 1, xxii. 4. And so the mark of the beast was impressed in the hand or on the forehead (xiii. 16, 17, xiv. 9, xvii. 5, xx. 4). Jewels for the forehead (Gen. xxiv. 22, marg.; Ezek. xvi. 12) were nose-jewels. It is not, however, uncommon for eastern women to wear jewels across their foreheads. 'Thou hast a whore's forehead' (Jer. iii. 3) may be explained by the fact that a modest woman would cover her face and forehead with a veil.

FOREIGNER (Exod. xii. 45; Deut. xv. 3; Obad. 11; Eph. ii. 19). See ALIEN.

FORE-KNOWLEDGE. The fore-knowledge of God is repeatedly spoken of in scripture (Acts ii. 23; Rom. viii. 29, xi. 2; 1 Pet. i. 2). There are curious and intricate questions in reference to his fore-knowledge, which it would be quite foreign to the character of the present work to attempt to discuss in it. It must be sufficient to say that the scripture attributes the most perfect prescience to the Deity. It is one of those high attributes which place him immeasurably above all pretended gods (Isai. xli. 22, 23, xlii. 9, xlii. 6-8). God does not gather knowledge as we do: before his eye all things past, present, or to come, are spread with equal clearness: he sees all possibilities, those events which may happen as well as those which will happen (1 Sam. xxiii. 9-13; Jer. xxxviii. 17-23, xlii. 9-22; Matt. xi. 21, 23; Acts xxvii. 24, 31). Yet this divine fore-knowledge does not compel men: it fetters not their free action: it does not deliver them from the responsibility of their own deeds (Gen. i. 20; Isai. x. 6, 7). And, if we are unable exactly to comprehend this, we may well remember that God's judgments are unsearchable (Rom. xi. 33), his ways higher than our ways, his thoughts than our thoughts (Isai. lv. 9).

FORE-RUNNER. A scout sent before an army: one who in a matter of public concern speeds on to a specified place, to do there, so far as he can, what pertains to the matter on which he is employed. Thus John the Baptist was a messenger who went beforehand to prepare the way of the Lord (Mark i. 2, 3). And Christ is said to be 'the fore-runner for us' (Heb. vi. 20), representing and introducing us. For, when as a priest he entered into the holy place, he went thither not for himself merely, but as the head and guide of his people, to open the way and conduct the whole church into his glory.

FORE-SKIN. See CIRCUMCISION.

FOREST. There is reason to believe that tracts of wood-land were more frequent in Palestine anciently than they are now.

Thus we read of various forests, not indeed as if the country were unbrokenly covered with trees, but, in the more proper sense as understood amongst ourselves at home, woods interspersed with open ground. These woods were probably for the most part in the valleys: sometimes we find them in higher situations (Josh. xvii. 15, 18). The principal woods and forests mentioned in scripture are (1) The forest of cedars in Lebanon (1 Kings iv. 33, v. 6, 9, 14), formerly far more extensive than at present; see CEDARS. The house of the forest of Lebanon (vii. 2) might either be a country palace among the mountains, or perhaps was so called as constructed with cedar pillars. (2) The forests of oaks in Bashan (Isai. ii. 13; Ezek. xxvii. 6; Zech. xi. 2); see BASHAN. (3) The wood or forest of Ephraim (Josh. xvii. 15-18). This is supposed to have been very extensive. It must not be confounded with (4) The wood of Ephraim, east of the Jordan, near to the city of Mahanaim (2 Sam. xvii. 6); see EPHRAIM, WOOD OF. (5) The forest of Hareth (1 Sam. xxii. 5): this was probably in the south of Judah. (6) The wood in the wilderness of Ziph (xxiii. 15), south-east of Hebron. (7) A nameless wood, through which Saul pursued the Philistines (xiv. 25, 26); probably on the slopes leading to the Philistine plain. (8) There were woods also about Kirjath-jearim, a city of Judah, near upon the Philistine border (vii. 1, 2; 2 Sam. vi. 2; Psal. cxxxii. 6). (9) Perhaps the forests in which Jotham built castles were in the same neighbourhood (2 Chron. xxvii. 4). (10) The wood of Beth-el (2 Kings ii. 24) was probably part of the great (western) wood of Ephraim.

Forests sometimes imply symbolically kingdoms, or eminent persons, devoted to ruin (Isai. x. 17-19, 33, 34; Jer. xxi. 14; Ezek. xx. 46, 47); they designate also sterility as opposed to the fruitfulness of a field (Isai. xxix. 17).

FORGIVENESS. The remission of a fault. In the gospel of Christ, free forgiveness of sins is set forth (Acts v. 31, xiii. 38, 39; 1 John i. 6-9, ii. 12). And the full remission, which transgressors have at God's hand for Christ's sake, is made the ground and the pattern of that forgiving spirit which is to be manifested by Christ's true followers (Matt. vi. 12, 14, 15, xviii. 21-35; Mark xi. 25, 26; Eph. iv. 32, and elsewhere). See ATONEMENT, JUSTIFICATION, PROPITIATION.

FORK (1 Sam. xiii. 21). Literally 'a triad of prongs,' i.e. a three-pronged fork, with which hay, straw, and the like are gathered up.

FORM. Christ is said to have been 'in the form of God;' by which must certainly be understood that he was really God; for it is also said that he 'took upon him the form of a servant' (Phil. ii. 6, 7), really became a servant; the same word being used in both verses. The term 'form' may be supposed further to imply something more than the divine nature; it may express the splendour of it. To the Only-begotten belonged that flashing glory (Heb. i. 3) which Deity alone can possess; and of this he divested himself when he became man, and assumed the humble port of a servant, the messenger of his Father, prepared to obey his will (x. 7). The contrast is between the state of the Son before his incarnation, and his state in flesh: he was very God and very man.

FORNICATION (Acts xv. 20, 29). See ADULTERY.

FORSWEAR (Matt. v. 33). See OATH.

FORTIFICATION. See FENCED CITIES.

FORTRESS. See CASTLE, FENCED CITIES.

FORTUNA'TUS (fortunate). A Christian of Corinth, mentioned in connection with Stephanas and Achaicus (1 Cor. xvi. 17). Some have imagined him one 'of the house of Chloe' (i. 11): it is more likely that he and Achaicus belonged to 'the household of Stephanas' (i. 16).

FOUNDER (Judges xvii. 4; Jer. vi. 29, x. 9, 14). See HANDICRAFT, METALLURGY.

FOUNTAIN. A natural gush of water from the ground, in opposition to a standing or stagnant pool, or an artificial well. Several words are used in Hebrew to signify a fountain: one of the most common, ain, means also an eye; and philologists are uncertain whether the eye is so called from its resemblance to a fountain, or a fountain from its resemblance to an eye. Hence many places took their name, some special spring being in the neighbourhood—as Eng-annim, fountain of gardens; Engedi, fountain of the gazelle or kid. It was one special feature in the description of Canaan, that it was 'a land of fountains' (Deut. viii. 7), the more alluring when Israel had so long dwelt in a region where they often wanted water. The springs in Palestine now are, as travellers assure us, abundant and very beautiful; so that we can easily understand how they express symbolically in the sacred writings refreshment to the weary, and the spiritual blessings, ever fresh and ever flowing, which God imparts to his people (Psal. xxxvi. 9; Jer. ii. 13; Joel iii. 18; John iv. 14; Rev. vii. 17). A multiplied posterity, too, is sometimes described as the waters running forth from the fountain, the progenitor (Deut. xxxiii. 28; Psal. lxxviii. 26).

FOWL, FOWLING. The Hebrew word 'oph includes collectively birds in general, frequently with the addition 'of the air' (e.g. Gen. i. 21, 30). The Greek word peteina has a similarly-extended meaning (Matt. xiii. 4; Luke xii. 24). The Hebrew ait denotes generally birds of prey (Gen. xv. 11; Job xxviii. 7; Isai. xviii. 6; Ezek. xxxix. 4). The corresponding Greek word is ornea (Rev. xix. 17, 21). The Hebrew tzippor signifies specifically a sparrow or other small bird (Psal. xi. 1, lxxxiv. 3); it is also used collectively for fowl, perhaps of the passerine order (Gen. xv. 10; Psal. viii. 8); fowl for the table (Neh. v. 18); joined with ait for birds of prey (Ezek. xxxix. 4). There is another word, barburim (1 Kings iv. 23), which also means fowls for the table, or specially, according to Gesenius, geese.

Birds afforded anciently, as at present, a cheap and plentiful article of food (Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6). There are various modes of obtaining them. Sometimes a stick is thrown, with which the Arabs dexterously disable the fowl; they then run up and seize them, and cut the throat, that the blood may not be eaten (Lev. xvii. 13). Nets are used, cages also, and traps, and snares. Many small birds are taken by loose nets on poles. A lantern is carried out at night; and the birds, startled at the glare, fall easily into the nets. Cages and snares are frequently set, and decoy-birds employed to allure the game; a run being occasionally constructed among brushwood, and nooses being placed near the decoy (see Psal. cxxiv. 7; Prov. i. 17), to entangle the legs of those that venture near. Large numbers of quails are caught at the times of migration, when they abound, by being driven towards a centre; and then, alarmed by the shouts of the fowlers, they are easily captured by the nets or clothes that are thrown over them. Similar modes of taking birds, both land and water-fowl, are figured in the Egyptian monuments, of which an interesting description is given by Dr. Kitto (Pict. Bible, note on Ezek. xvii. 20; see also illustrations of fowling and fishing in Carey's Book of Job, pp. 480, 481).

FOX. The same Hebrew word which signifies 'fox' seems also to denote a 'jackal'; and there can be no doubt that in many places jackals are meant where our version gives foxes. Thus, jackals being gregarious animals, it is far more likely that Samson caught 300 of them than of foxes, which are not easy to be taken (Judges xv. 4). Modern travellers tell us how they still abound in Palestine; there could therefore be no difficulty in collecting a great number of jackals. But in some passages the fox is doubtless meant, as in Sol. Song ii. 15. The word is also used figuratively (Ezek. xii. 4; Luke xiii. 32).

FRANKINCENSE. Ordinary frankincense is the produce of the Pinus abies, or common spruce fir. Much finer was the substance so called in the Hebrew law (Lev. ii. 1, 2, 15, 16, and elsewhere). The mention of it occurs also in poetry (Sol. Song iii. 6, iv. 6); and it appears to have been brought from distant countries (Isai. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20; Matt. ii. 11). It was a resinous exudation from some tree, possibly growing in Arabia, fragrant and costly. The Hebrew term tebōnah (implying white), equivalent to the Greek libanos, is nearly akin to the word olibanum now in use. But the Arabian olibanum or frankincense is at present considered of inferior quality: the best is from India; so that there must be a deterioration in the produce of Arabia, or else frankincense was anciently imported into Palestine through Arabia, and was therefore regarded as coming from the last-named country. There is no reason to suppose that the trees yielding it ever grew in Judea. The passage, Sol. Song iv. 14, which has been specially relied on for this opinion, more probably refers to aromatic plants generally. Frankincense is yielded from some species of Boswellia, a genus of the natural order Amyridaceae, or incense-trees. Probably the Boswellia serrata or thurifera may be fixed on as the species from which especially the precious resin is procured. It grows to the height of forty feet, and is found in Amboyna and mountain districts of India.

Frankincense is chiefly used now in the services of the Greek and Roman churches.

FREEDOM. The right of citizenship: see ALIEN, CITIZENSHIP. Deliverance from slavery or servitude: see SERVANT. Slaves were freed among the Romans either per censum, when a slave, with his master's knowledge or by his order, got his name inscribed upon the censor's roll; per vindictam, when a master took a slave to the praetor or consul and expressed his desire that he should be free; the praetor then placed a rod called vindicta on the slave's head, and pronounced him free, the master or the lictor turning him round and giving him a blow upon the cheek; or per testamentum, when the master gave freedom to the slave by will. There were in later times other modes of bestowing freedom, but they only discharged from servitude, and did not convey the privilege of citizenship. Slaves made free used to shave their heads in the temple of Feronia, and received a cap or hat as the badge of liberty. They were also presented with a white robe and a ring by their master, whose name they prefixed to their own, and with whom certain relations continued as patron and client. A freedman who was ungrateful was condemned to the mines, or reduced again to slavery. Several passages in scripture are hence illustrated (e.g. Rom. vi. 22; 1 Cor. vii. 22, 23; Gal. v. 1).

FREE-WILL-OFFERING (Lev. xxii. 21; Psal. cxix. 108, and elsewhere). See OFFERING.

FRIEND. This word is sometimes used in ordinary address (Matt. xxii. 12, xxvi. 50; Luke xi. 5). But it more generally implies affection. The divine condescension is shown in regarding his creatures as his friends (2 Chron. xx. 7; Isai. xlii. 8; John xv. 14, 15; James ii. 23).

FRINGE (Numb. xv. 38, 39; Deut. xxii. 12). See HEM OF GARMENT.

FROG. The original Hebrew word signifies a marsh-leaper. We find frogs mentioned only in connection with the plague inflicted upon the Egyptians (Exod. viii. 2-14; Psal. lxxviii. 45, cv. 30), and for illustration (Rev. xvi. 13). Naturalists disagree as to the species of frogs at present found in Egypt. Duns (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 15), and Gosse (Imp. Bible Dict., vol. i. p. 608), maintain that three or four kinds are very abundant there; as the Rana esculenta, edible frog, the Rana punctata, dotted frog of an ash colour with green spots, and the Rana temporaria, our common English frog; while Houghton (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 54) strenuously denies that any species except the Rana esculenta is to be found in Egypt. Further research must decide between these conflicting authorities.

FRONTLETS (Exod. xlii. 16; Deut. vi. 8, xi. 18). See PHYLACTERY.

FROST. There is a greater difference between the temperature of the day and that of the night in western Asia than in our own climate. This difference is most felt in spring and autumn, when the alternation is pretty much as if a day warmer than our ordinary summer days were succeeded by one of our winter nights. And even in winter the days are warm while the nights are frosty. European travellers especially feel the alternation; and the fact illustrates Jacob's complaint (Gen. xxxi. 40; Jer. Job xxxvii. 10; Psal. cxlvii. 16-18; Jer. xxxvi. 30).

FRUIT. The produce of the tree and of the field. We may learn how comprehensively this word was employed by a reference to the regulations for the offering of the first-fruits. When the first-fruits and the tithes were required, they are described as those of corn (or wheat), and wine, and oil (Numb. xviii. 12; Deut. xiv. 23). The same comprehensive terms are used elsewhere (xxviii. 51; 2 Chron. xxxii. 23; Joel ii. 19); evidently intended to include generally the fruitful productions of the ground. Lees (Kitto's Cycl. of Bibl. Lit.) makes, therefore, a three-fold division of fruit: corn-fruit or field-produce, vintage-fruit, and orchard-fruit. The first is denominated dāgān, which signifies not merely wheat or even corn, but, as Jahn says (Bibl. Antiq., p. 54), 'different kinds of grain and pulse, such as wheat, millet, spelt, wall-barley, barley, beans, lentils, meadow-cummin, pepper-wort, flax, cotton, various species of the cucumber, and perhaps rice.' Unless the word had a comprehensive signification, the spirit of the law would have been easily evaded, and first-fruits and tithes might have been limited to a comparatively-small portion of valuable produce. The next Hebrew word, tirōsh, is generally rendered 'wine,' specifically the new wine of the first year. But it clearly has sometimes a wider meaning; as in Mic. vi. 15, where the 'sweet wine' could not be literally trodden; hence Henderson translates 'the grape of the new wine' (Minor Proph., p. 261). It may, therefore, signify the fruit of the vine in general, whether grapes moist or dried, or the wine procured from them. The third word, yitzhar, may comprehend, besides olives, dates, pomegranates, citrons, nuts, &c., generally orchard-fruits; else, as observed with respect to dāgān, many products would escape the general law of tithing and offering of first-fruits. It may be added that we read of 'summer-fruits' (2 Sam. xvi. 1; Jer. xl. 10, 12), by which is probably to be understood those adapted to immediate consumption. The fruit of trees planted in Canaan was not to be eaten for the first three years, being counted as 'uncircumcised': in the fourth year it was to be holy to the Lord; in the fifth it might be freely used (Lev. xix. 23-25): see FIRST-FRUITS. Fruit-trees, moreover, were not to be cut down for purposes of war (Deut. xx. 19, 20). The term 'fruit' is often used metaphorically. Thus, children are said to be 'the fruit of the womb' (Psal. cxxvii. 3). The actions of men are called the 'fruits' of their principles (Matt. iii. 8; John xv. 8; Rom. vi. 22). Similarly the graces implanted by the Spirit are termed 'fruit' (Gal. v. 22, 23).

FUEL (Isai. ix. 5, 19; Ezek. xv. 4, 6, xxi. 2). See COAL.

FULFILLED. In the quotations by the New Testament writers of passages in the Old, we have frequently the introductory formula 'that it might be fulfilled.' It has been questioned how this phrase should be understood. Some critics are disposed to imagine that citations are merely accommodated to events, that, when circumstances occurred which brought to the writer's mind the utterance of an ancient prophet, or the narrative of a long-passed fact, he coupled it with what was then before his eye, and meant merely to say that the new occurrence corresponded with the old. But this is to deny an actual connection between prophecy and its fulfilment, to destroy the reality of any relation between a typical fact and the thing it was to pre-signify. Indeed, it repudiates prophecy altogether, and overthrows the basis of typical representation. The sound interpreter of scripture must not give countenance to such an opinion. The phrase 'that it might be fulfilled,' grammatically interpreted, shows that there must be a real designed connection between the prophetic word and the event it foretells. See QUOTATIONS.

FULLER. A person whose business it is to cleanse and whiten cloth (Mark ix. 3). This business was carried on without the walls of Jerusalem, probably because of the offensive smells occasioned by it. There was a 'fuller's field': see next article; and Josephus (Bell. Jud., lib. v. 4, § 2) speaks of a fuller's monument to the north of the city. There was also a fuller's fountain, EN-ROGEL (which see), to the south-east; and no doubt in these places the fullers plied their occupation. The cloth was trodden or beaten with heavy clubs, in water with which some alkaline substance had been mixed, potter's clay, or marl, or urine. Nitre also and fuller's soap are mentioned (Jer. ii. 22; Mal. iii. 2) as employed for cleansing purposes. See SOAP. The juices of some saponaceous plants and vegetable ashes were probably used. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Walker.'

FULLER'S FIELD. A place not far from Jerusalem, where fullers pursued their business. It seems that there was a high-way leading either to or by the fuller's field; and in or by this high-way was 'the conduit of the upper pool.' Here at this conduit Rabshakeh stationed himself when he came with his hostile message; and here Isaiah met Ahaz (2 Kings xviii. 17; Isai. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2). The fuller's field itself must have been somewhat farther off, as the stations taken were not at it, but in the road of it. Possibly it lay to the north of the city, the way an invading force would come; though it has been observed in the last article that En-rogel on the south-east was a place frequented by fullers. See Williams, The Holy City, vol. ii. pp. 471, 472; see also CONDUIT.

FULLER'S SOAP (Mal. iii. 2). See SOAP.

FULNESS. This is the translation of a Greek word, in regard to which much has been written. For the exact understanding of the various passages in which it occurs, exegetical commentaries may be consulted. It must be enough to say here that its simpler senses are the thing filled, also, abstractedly, the effect of filling, and thence the thing whereby the effect of filling is produced. Thus, when it is said that 'it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell' (Col. i. 19), that is meant by which the filling is effected, that of which Christ was full, that amount of complete grace which goes to make up the divine character, and which entirely and for ever dwells in Christ; as it is elsewhere said, 'In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily' (ii. 9), i.e. the essential being of the Deity. And of the abounding and excellent grace thus in Christ his believing people receive in continual flow (John i. 14, 16); so that they are 'filled with all the fulness of God' (Eph. iii. 19), or 'even to the fulness of God,' according to their measure, even as God is in his, immeasurably full. Then again, on the other hand, where the church is said to be 'the fulness of him that filleth all in all' (i. 23), we must take the sense first indicated; the church is that which is filled, the filled receptacle, that into which he, agreeably to what has just been said, pours of his inexhaustible grace, till he has filled it full. See Alford, The Greek Test., note on Eph. i. 23.

FUNERAL. See BURIAL.

FURLONG (Luke xxiv. 13; John vi. 19, xi. 18; Rev. xiv. 20, xxi. 16). See MEASURES.

FURNACE. There are various Hebrew words which are thus rendered; they doubtless describe different kinds of furnaces. Thus Khîbshan, derived from a verb signifying 'to subdue,' implies a furnace that subdues metals or whatever is subjected to it (Gen. xix. 28; Exod. ix. 8, 10, xix. 18), a smelting-furnace, and according to Kimchi a lime-kiln. Khâr, implying heat, is also a smelting-furnace (Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; Ezek. xxii. 18, 20, 22). This word is frequently used metaphorically, to indicate heavy trial (Deut. iv. 20; 1 Kings viii. 51; Isai. xlvi. 10). Tannâr, used sometimes generally (Gen. xv. 17; Isai. xxxi. 9), is more specifically a baker's furnace or an oven, as it is sometimes rendered (Exod. viii. 3; Lev. ii. 4, vii. 9, xi. 35, xxvi. 26; Neh. iii. 11, xii. 38; Hos. vii. 4, 6, 7). It is described as a kind of large round pot, earthen or of other material, two or three feet high. It is heated by a fire made within; and then the dough or paste is spread on the sides to bake, forming thin cakes. The Chaldee at-dwellings, especially in the earlier ages, was simple: the poorer classes had few but absolutely-necessary articles. The chamber which the rich woman of Shunem furnished for Elisha was deemed amply provided with 'a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick' (2 Kings iv. 10); for we may be sure that, as she intended to do the prophet honour, she would supply all fitting things; and he was gratified we find at the care bestowed upon him (13). Mats or skins were probably often used to recline upon; and these, with it may be a mattress spread upon them, served for a bed; while the upper garment was the covering (Exod. xxii. 25-27; Deut. xxiv. 12, 13). The whole could easily be rolled up; hence our Lord's command to 'take up' the bed and carry it to the house (Matt. ix. 6). The apartments even of the wealthier would seem empty to an European eye; nevertheless the luxurious had rich carpets, couches or divans, and sofas; and sometimes the frames of these were inlaid with ivory (Amos vi. 4), and the coverings of tapestry and fine linen carefully perfumed (Prov. vii. 16, 17). Dr. Thomson describes the lack of useful furniture in Palestine at the present day. For a dining-table 'a polygonal stool' fourteen inches high is brought into the room; and a tray tân is a large furnace built like a brick-kiln, and, as noted by a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, must have had an opening at the top to cast in the materials, and a door at the ground by which to extract the metal (Dan. iii. 6). The punishment of casting into a furnace has subsisted in the east to modern times. See Kitto's Pict. Bible, note on Dan. iii. 6. There are two Greek words used in the New Testament for furnace, kaminos, a smelting or calcining-furnace (Matt. xiii. 42, 50; Rev. i. 15, ix. 2); kli-banos, a baker's oven (Matt. vi. 30; Luke xii. 28).

FURNITURE. The furniture of eastern with the provisions set upon it (The Land and the Book, p. 126). Silver spoons are used by the richer people; but they have neither knives nor forks. And, if any of them try to imitate European customs, 'the knives, forks, and spoons are rusty; the plates, dishes, and glasses ill-assorted, dirty, badly arranged, and not in sufficient quantity: the chairs are rickety; and the table stands on legs spasmodic and perilous' (p. 128). There is, and no doubt there was, a hand-mill in every house: the few necessary utensils are made of earthenware, copper, and leather; and the light is obtained from lamps fed with olive oil.

G

GA'AL (loathing). A person who came to Shechem, and stirred up the inhabitants to resist Abimelech. He was worsted in an encounter, and was then ejected by Zebul, Abimelech's officer (Judges ix. 26-41).

GA'ASH (earthquake). A hill in the territory of Ephraim by Timnath-serah, Joshua's inheritance, and the place where he was buried (Josh. xxiv. 30; Judges ii. 9). One of David's warriors is said to be 'of the brooks of Gaash' (2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chron. xi. 32).

GA'BA (hill). A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 24; Ezra ii. 26; Neh. vii. 30). It is the same with GEBA, which see.

GA'BAEL.—1. An ancestor of Tobit (Tob. i. 1).—2. A person to whose charge Tobit entrusted money (i. 14, iv. 1, 20, v. 6, ix. 2, 5, x. 2).

GA'BATHA (Rest of Esth. xii. 1). A corrupt form of Bigthan (Esth. ii. 21).

GA'BBAI (tax-gatherer). One of the descendants of Benjamin (Neh. xi. 8).

GA'BATHA (platform, or elevated place). A place where Pilate took his seat when he pronounced sentence upon our Lord (John xix. 13). It appears to have been outside the prætorium or 'judgment-hall' (9). We may suppose, therefore that the bema, or regular seat of justice, was in front of the prætorium, on an elevated platform, which was floored with a tessellated pavement. It could not have been the paved room in the temple, as has been sometimes imagined, where the sanhedrim sat.

GA'BDES (1 Esdr. v. 20). A form of Gaba (Ezra ii. 26).

GA'BRIAS (Tob. i. 14, iv. 20).

GA'BRIEL (man of God). A name borne by one of the angels of God, despatched on beneficent errands to men in different ages of the church. It was he that was commissioned to expound the visions to the prophet Daniel (Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21). It was he that announced to Zacharias the birth of John, Messiah's fore-runner, and to Mary the incarnation of the Messiah himself (Luke i. 19, 26).

GAD (good fortune?).—1. One of the sons of Jacob by Zilpah, Leah's maid. At his birth, Leah exclaimed, 'A troop cometh' (Gen. xxx. 10, 11); but the rendering of several versions is 'In felicity.' The word Gad, then, may be differently interpreted; but, whatever meaning be preferred, the name was bestowed as evincing Leah's gratitude and confident expectation of yet greater blessing. Of the personal history of this patriarch no particulars are given: we are only told that, when Jacob went down with his family into Egypt, Gad had seven sons (xli. 16). In the prophetic blessing pronounced upon him, 'Gad, a troop shall overcome him; but he shall overcome at the last' (xlix. 19), or, more exactly, 'Gad, a plundering band presses on him; but he will press upon the heel,' i. e. will pursue the flying enemy, the warlike character of the tribe effectually repelling the forays made upon it is described. The benediction of Moses is very similar: 'Blessed is he that enlargeth Gad: he dwelleth as a lion, and teareth the arm, and the crown of the head. And he saw that the first part was his; for there the portion of (assigned by) the lawgiver was preserved. And he goes at the head (or with the heads) of the people: he executes the justice of the Lord, and his judgments with Israel' (Deut. xxxiii. 20, 21). Gad was to have a choice and ample territory allotted, which by his boldness he would extend; nor would he fail, though his own possession was secured, to march with the other tribes across the Jordan, executing with them God's judgments on the doomed people of Canaan. Dr. Kalisch, however, takes a different view of a part of this blessing: he considers that the 'portion of the lawgiver' implies his burying-place: 'The territory of Gad . . . was pre-eminently remarkable, because it contained the grave of the great general and lawgiver, Moses—a fact which so decidedly invested the province with a character of holiness, that, though situated on the east of the river, it was regarded as one of the most honoured parts of the promised land, from which the leaders of the people might legitimately arise' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 758).

At the first census in the wilderness the descendants of Gad had multiplied to 45,650. They were attached to the second division of the Israelitish host, following the standard of Reuben, and camping on the south of the tabernacle; Eliasaph, the son of Deuel, or Reuel, being their chief (Numb. i. 12, ii. 24, 25, iii. 10-16). In the second enumeration in the plains of Moab, this tribe, it appeared, had decreased: they amounted to but 40,500. When the Israelites had subdued the country east of the Jordan, the tribes of Reuben and Gad preferred their request to Moses to be allowed to settle there. It was a land, they said, adapted for cattle; and they had 'much cattle.' Moses was at first displeased with the request: he thought it would discourage the rest of the people, and perhaps bring upon the nation a fresh judgment from the Lord. But, on being assured that the tribes, if their wish was granted, would despatch their able-bodied men to aid in the conquest of Canaan, the great lawgiver assented, and distributed the territories of Og and Sihon among the Reubenites, the Gadites, and half-Manasseh, though the last-named people do not appear to have joined in the request when first made to Moses (xxxii. 1-33).

It is not easy to give exactly the limits of the portion of Gad. It must have comprised the central trans-Jordanic districts, the mountains of Gilead, extending to Jazer and Heshbon southward, and to the Aroer that faced Rabbah of Ammon, the river of Gad

2 Sam. xxiv. 5) being probably the Arnon, south-east; westward it abutted on the Jordan, and ran up the Arabah, or Jordan valley, in a narrow strip, to the edge or extremity of the sea of Chinnereth or lake of Gennesaret: it reached to Mahanaim northward, being bounded by Manasseh; while eastward no limit is distinctly assigned. Several very important cities were included in this territory: among them, besides those already named, may be mentioned Ramoth-gilead and Succoth. From the allotment of Gad four cities were assigned to the Levites of the family of Merari, viz. Ramoth-gilead, which was also a refuge-city, Mahanaim, Jazer, and Heshbon, which, though sometimes reckoned to Reuben (Josh. xiii. 17), as being on the border of the two contiguous tribes, must really have belonged to Gad (xxi. 38, 39; 1 Chron. v. 80, 81). Close upon the Jordan the country of this tribe was low; but farther eastward it was a high rich table-land, of which various travellers, Buckingham, Stanley, Porter, and others, speak in terms of warm commendation. 'Gentle slopes,' says one, 'clothed with wood, gave a rich variety of tints. . . . Deep valleys, filled with murmuring streams and verdant meadows, offered all the luxuriance of cultivation; and herds and flocks gave life and animation to the scenes;' while another describes the country as occasionally presenting the appearance of 'a noble park.' A happy inheritance! a blessed home, not to be forfeited but by the unfaithfulness of those to whom it was granted.

The history of the tribe of Gad, after its settlement, began well. Faithfully did the trans-Jordanic tribes perform their promise of aiding their brethren in the conquest of Canaan; and when the land was subdued they returned to their own cities with Joshua's blessing, and enriched with large spoil. There was a misunderstanding, indeed, about their building a memorial altar near the Jordan, by which the rest of the tribes at first imagined they intended to break away from the holy bond of national worship. But this was soon explained; and the circumstance exhibits both parties in a most favourable light; the western Israelites offering to cede part of their own territory; their eastern brethren disclaiming with loyal earnestness all notion of religious or civil schism. In subsequent years we have no distinct account of the tribe. But Jephthah has been supposed a Gadite: more probably (Judges xii. 4) he was of Manasseh. Later, the seat of Ish-bosheth's sovereignty was established in this territory. For Abner brought him to Mahanaim; and there he reigned (2 Sam. ii. 8), and there he was assassinated. The Gadites could not, however, have been very enthusiastic in favour of the house of Saul; for many chiefs, bold enterprising men, expressing very well the general characteristics of the tribe, had joined David while in hold (1 Chron. viii. 15). And, when a few years later David was obliged to flee across the Jordan on account of Absalom's rebellion, he found a secure position in Mahanaim, while the country round manifested their attachment to him, and supplied him with abundant stores (2 Sam. xvii. 24, 27-29). We have evidence in the time of Solomon of the richness of this province. For, of the twelve commissariat officers appointed by that monarch, three seem to have had more or less to do with Gad. There was the son of Geber stationed in Ramoth-gilead, Ahinadab in Mahanaim, besides Geber, to whom was committed the sole charge of the rest of Gilead (1 Kings iv. 13, 14, 19). The jurisdiction of some of these officers extended beyond the original boundaries of Gad. But we may observe that the prediction was accomplished: the tribe was 'enlarged.' We read that the Gadites, at what exact period is not clear, dwelt in 'Bashan unto Salcah' (1 Chron. v. 11), either intermingling with the Manassites, or probably (comp. 23) pushing them farther northward. In the place just referred to the genealogies of the tribe are noted till the days of Jeroboam II. king of Israel, and Jotham king of Judah; and there is an account of a raid made by Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, with a force of 44,760, upon the Hagarites of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab, Ishmaelite clans, in which they took a vast deal of booty, and occupied the country they had invaded (17-22). In the division of the kingdom, Gad of course fell to the northern state; and many of the wars between Syria and Israel must have ravaged its territory (2 Kings x. 33). Ramoth-gilead is repeatedly mentioned as the centre of engagements (1 Kings xxii.; 2 Kings viii. 28, 29, ix. 14). And then the sun that rose so brightly set in gloom: for the sins of the people, Tiglath-pileser carried the Gadites and the neighbouring tribes away captive into Assyria (xvi. 29; 1 Chron. v. 26); and it is the mournful lament of Jeremiah that Ammon occupied the lost cities of Gad (Jer. xlix. 1). We hear no more of Gad save in some of (probably) the yet-unfulfilled utterances of prophecy (Ezek. xlviii. 27, 28, 34; Rev. vii. 5).

2. A prophet, called 'the king's seer,' who joined David when he was in hold through fear of Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 5). It was he that was afterwards sent with a heavy message to the king, on the unjustifiable numbering of the people, inviting him to choose one of three modes of divine judgment (2 Sam. xi. 11-25; 1 Chron. xxi. 9-13). He is also said to have written the acts of David (xxix. 29), and to have taken part in the arrangement of the Levites for the musical services (2 Chron. xxix. 25). But this is all we know of him. His parentage and tribe are not recorded; and no notice is taken of his death.

3. The name Gad has been supposed to be that of an idol worshipped by the Jews during the Babylonian captivity (Isai. lxx. 11, marg.). But this is unlikely. It does not appear that the Jews were idolatrous while in Babylon; rather they were cured by that sharp discipline of their idolatrous propensities. Henderson (Isaiah, p. 462) therefore believes that the prophet, denouncing persons who prepared a table for Fortune ('troop' in our version is not admissible), meant to censure those, not literal idolaters, who, with greedy selfishness, make wealth their god (comp. Col. iii. 5). It is true that such a deity seems to have been worshipped near mount Hermon: see BAAL-GAD; but perhaps the prophet merely borrowed his terms from the nomenclature of idolatry. See, however, Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Gad': see also MENI.

GAD'ARA. A strong city, called by Josephus the capital of Peræa. It was situated to the south-east of the sea of Galilee, over-against Tiberias, south of the Hieromax, on the top of a hill, at the foot of which were warm springs called Amatha. Destroyed in Jewish civil wars, it was re-built by Pompey, and added by Augustus to the dominions of Herod the Great, but subsequently to his death it was incorporated with the province of Syria. The district around was called Gadaritid; and in this district was the scene of the miracle narrated in Matt. viii. 28-34; Mark v. 1-20; Luke viii. 26-39. Gadara has been satisfactorily identified with Um Keis, seated near the crest of the chain of mountains which bound the valley of the lake of Tiberias and the Jordan on the east. It is about sixteen miles from Tiberias, three miles south of the Sheriat el-Mandhar, the ancient Hieromax, or Yarmuk; and at the base of the hill warm springs still exist. There are caverns, too, used for both habitations and tombs, all round. And thus the circumstances of the miracle seem admirably illustrated (see Porter in Journ. of Sac. Lit., July, 1854, pp. 286, &c.). But Dr. Thomson objects that Gadara itself is too far from the lake; so that, if the miracle were performed there, the swine would have had to run for many miles, fording the deep Yarmuk, before they could reach the lake itself. And he has discovered a place very near the shore, called Kerza or Gersa, which he supposes to be the ancient Gergesa, and thinks that it was here the miracle was wrought (The Land and the Book, pp. 375-377). This would be in the district of Gadaritid, and so might well be described as 'the country of the Gadarenes.'

GADARE'NES. The inhabitants of the city or district of Gadara (Mark v. 1; Luke viii. 26, 37). In Matt. viii. 28 we find them called GERGSENES, which see.

GAD'DI (fortunate). The spy selected from the tribe of Manasseh (Numb. xiii. 11).

GAD'DIEL (fortune of God, i. e. sent from God). The spy selected from the tribe of Zebulun (Numb. xiii. 10).

GAD'DI (a Gadite). The father of Menahem, a king of Israel (2 Kings xv. 14, 17).

GAD'ITES. Persons of the tribe of Gad (Deut. iii. 12, 16, iv. 43, xxix. 8; Josh. i. 12; and elsewhere).

GA'HAM (perhaps having flaming eyes, or sun-burnt). A son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 24).

GA'HAR (urking-place). One of the Nethinim, whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 47; Neh. vii. 49).

GAI'US. A name identical with Caius. —1. A Macedonian, one of St. Paul's companions in travel (Acts xix. 29). —2. Another of St. Paul's companions: he was of Derbe (xx. 4). —3. A Corinthian Christian, whom Paul calls his 'host,' and whom he baptized

(Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14). —4. A person to whom St. John addressed his third epistle, and whom he commends for his hospitality and liberality (3 John i. 5, 6). This may be identical with one of those before named.

GAL'AAD (Judith i. 8; 1 Macc. v. 9, and elsewhere). A form of Gilead.

GA'LAL (perhaps weighty, worthy). —1. A Levite (1 Chron. ix. 15). —2. Another Levite, son of Jeduthun (16; Neh. xi. 17).

GALA'TIA. A province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Paphlagonia and Bithynia, on the east by Pontus and Cappadocia, from both of which it is separated by the river Halys, on the south by Cappadocia and Phrygia, and on the west by Phrygia and Bithynia. The boundaries, however, seem not always to have remained the same: thus Lycaonia and Pisidia were at one time included in it, so that it then reached to Cilicia and Pamphylia on the south; and in fact the kingdom of Galatia extended beyond Galatia itself. The inhabitants were of Gallic and German origin. Their ancestors, after various wanderings, reached Asia Minor, and defeated about 233 B.C., by Attalus I., king of Pergamos, settled in a district previously Phrygian, which obtained from them the name of Galatia, or Gallo-græcia, from their mixture with the Greeks. This country was subdued by the Roman consul Cn. Manlius Vulso, 189 B.C.; but the people had still their own princes, first called tetrarchs, afterwards kings; the last of whom, Amyntas, the favourite of Mark Antony, and then of Augustus, possessed, besides Galatia and Pisidia, Lycaonia, and Pamphylia also. After his death, 26 B.C., Galatia and Lycaonia were placed under the rule of a Roman governor. The country was fruitful, particularly near the river Halys. The people were of impulsive character, fond of war, and had preserved much of their ancient German language. Their principal towns were Ancyra, made the capital by Augustus, Tavium, and Pessinus, both these last-named having a good deal of trade. St. Paul is said to have twice visited this country (Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23), but he does not appear to have taken his post, as elsewhere he often did, in any of the principal towns, to organize there a central church. At a later period he speaks (2 Tim. iv. 10) of a visit of Crescens to Galatia. This person is nowhere else mentioned in scripture, but is traditionally said to have preached in this province and elsewhere.

GALA'TIANS (Gal. iii. 1). Inhabitants of Galatia. The word occurs in the Maccabean history (1 Macc. viii. 2; 2 Macc. viii. 20). In the first-named place some have supposed the Gauls intended. But the defeat of the Galatians by Vulso (see last article) is more likely intended. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Galatia.'

GALA'TIANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. The gospel had been originally preached by St. Paul to the Galatians, who had received it with readiness, and had evinced the most remarkable affection for the apostle (Gal. iv. 14, 15). But when he was absent a change had occurred. Judaizing teachers had depreciated his apostolic authority, and had endeavoured to enforce the necessity of circumcision. The Galatians, true to their impulsive character, had eagerly given ear to the fresh teachers; the news of which reaching Paul caused him to write in order to check the growing mischief.

This epistle may be distributed into three sections: I. (i., ii.). This is apologetic, in which he maintains his own position as an apostle, independent of those in Jerusalem, and as having received the gospel by special revelation, with a peculiar commission to preach to the Gentiles, so that he had not hesitated, in defence of his principles, to rebuke Peter himself when he showed symptoms of wavering. II. The next section (iii. 1—v. 15) is controversial. Here St. Paul argues the question of justification, maintains that men cannot be justified before God by works of law, that Abraham's righteousness was by faith, that his true children who inherit his blessing are those who are of faith, that the law was given as a schoolmaster to lead men to Christ, but that if they looked to it for justification they cut themselves off from the benefit of Christ's work, for by their circumcision they would become bound to keep the whole law. III. A practical and hortatory conclusion (v. 16—vi. 18), in which the apostle gives various admonitions, touches again on the main subject of the letter, observes how, contrary to his custom, he had written (probably) the whole with his own hand, and conveys his apostolical blessing.

It will be observed that this epistle is addressed to the churches of Galatia (i. 2); it was intended, therefore, for all the believing communities through the province. The date of its composition has been much questioned. It has been placed early by many critics, not long after St. Paul's first visit to the country. The expression 'so soon removed' (i. 3) countenances this; and it must be confessed that it is the obvious inference from the passage. Nevertheless, by a careful putting together of various hints which are scattered through the epistle (i. 9, iii. 2-5, iv. 13, 16, v. 7, vi. 6), it would seem probable that some time had elapsed since the conversion of the Galatians, and also that the reference is rather to the apostle's second visit than to his first. Many of the best critics, therefore, decide that this epistle could not have been written before that residence of St. Paul at Ephesus which is recorded in Acts xix. Absolute certainty it is perhaps not possible to attain; but on the whole the balance of probabilities would seem in favour of this view. And there is another consideration which may have some influence on the question. There is a great similarity between this epistle and that to the Romans. In the last-named, indeed, the subject is treated more comprehensively, expanded into a complete theological argument; while here, as the dealings and the teachings of the Judaizers furnished the occasion of writing, so they are continually met with special reference to the influence they had acquired among the Galatians. It is clear, therefore, that the epistle to the Galatians precedes that to the Romans. How long it is not easy to say. Some have placed them in point of time very close together. But St. Paul wrote to the Romans from Corinth, not till after his nearly-three years' residence at Ephesus. To imagine that the letter to the Galatians was not composed till he reached Corinth is certainly not in harmony with the expression 'so soon' (Gal. i. 3), already referred to. Perhaps, therefore, while still connecting this epistle with that to the Romans, the latter being the filling out of the sketch in the former, we may not improperly suppose that St. Paul addressed the Galatians from Ephesus about 54 or 55 A.D. This letter is composed with great force and energy of language, mingled with touching pathos. The genuineness and authenticity of it have been universally acknowledged. It is expressly cited by Irenæus; and there are repeated allusions to it by various early fathers. The objections which have been brought against it are quite unworthy notice.

Among the commentaries on this epistle may be named the celebrated one of Luther, on which see Milner, Church Hist., vol. iv. pp. 509-524, edit. 1827, and those of Olshausen, Königsb. 1840, and Ellicott, Lond. 1854, 1859, 1864.

GAL'BANUM. One of the ingredients of the sacred perfume (Exod. xxx. 34). It is a resinous gum of a brownish-yellow colour, generally occurring in masses, and of a strong disagreeable odour. When mixed with other fragrant substances, it made the perfume more lasting. It has generally been supposed the product of the Babon galbanum of Linnæus, which grows in Syria and Arabia; but naturalists now question this. Probably the galbanum brought from different countries comes from different plants. One to which the name Opoidia galbanifera has been given grows in Persia, and yields, it would seem, the Persian galbanum.

GAL'EED (witness-heap). The name which Jacob gave to the heap of stones raised in mount Gilead for a memorial where he and Laban made a covenant (Gen. xxxi. 46-49). See GILEAD, JEGAR-SAHADUTHA.

GAL/GAL (Ezek. x. 13, marg.). Translated 'wheel' in the text.

GAL/GALA (1 Macc. ix. 2). Probably Gilgal.

GAL'LEE (circle, or circuit). The name by which a region of Palestine was commonly known. We find it first of all mentioned to indicate the locality of Kadesh, a town of Naphtali (Josh. xx. 7, xxi. 32; 1 Chron. vi. 76). Probably Galilee was then but the district which lay around Kadesh, in which were the twenty small cities that Solomon proffered to Hiram (1 Kings ix. 11). These appear to have been inhabited chiefly by Gentiles, especially by Phœnicians, whose country was near: hence the name 'Galilee of the nations' (Isai. ix. 1: comp. 1 Macc. v. 15, 20-23). It was natural that by degrees, especially after that part of the country had been subdued and the original inhabitants deported by the Assyrians, strangers should increase and occupy the surrounding territory. Hence the name Galilee was given to a region of wider extent, till in our Lord's time it was one of the great divisions of Palestine, embracing the possession of the four northernmost tribes of Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali, together with the out-lying portion of Dan.

Galilee was bounded on the west by the district of Ptolemais: on the south it skirted Carmel and the hills of Samaria by Scythopolis to the Jordan: eastward it was separated by the Jordan and the lakes of Gennesaret and Merom from the regions beyond; and to the north the border ran from Dan westward to the territory of Tyre.

The province was divided into upper and lower Galilee. The former comprised the mountain-range, a southern prolongation of Lebanon, which lay between Phœnicia and the upper Jordan. According to Josephus, it extended from Bersabe on the south to the town of Baca bordering on Tyre, and from Thella, a place near the Jordan, to Meroth (Bell. Jud., lib. iii. 3, § 1). These places have not been identified, and therefore the exact limits cannot be determined; but, as Capernaum was in upper Galilee, the district must have touched the lake of Gennesaret. It was this which more especially was 'Galilee of the Gentiles' (Matt. iv. 15); reaching to 'the coasts of Tyre and Sidon' (Mark vii. 31). This region is picturesque: much of the table-land on the mountain-ridge is wooded and it is still well-peopled.

Lower Galilee was a rich and beautiful region, comprehending the plain of Esdraelon with the hill-country extending to the mountain-range. Josephus says (ubi supr.) it reached from Tiberias to Chabulon in the coasts of Ptolemais, and from Xaloth (perhaps Chesulloth, Josh. xix. 18) to Bersabe in the north: it would seem, however, to have extended south to Engannim, Ginea, or Jenin (Bell. Jud., lib. iii. 3, § 4; Antiq., lib. xx. 6, § 1). Tiberias, Nazareth, and Cana were in lower Galilee.

From the intermixture of Gentile inhabitants, Galilee was little regarded by the Jews (John vii. 41, 52). But it was highly honoured by the residence of our Lord; and most, if not all, of his apostles were Galileans (Acts ii. 7). In the cities of Galilee Christ taught; and we have the fullest record of the miracles he performed in this province. Indeed, the first three Gospels are almost exclusively dedicated to the narration of his Galilean ministry till the approach of the period of the passion, to the exclusion of the history of his work in Judea. The natives of this region are noted for their bold and warlike character: their dialect differed from that of Judea (Matt. xxvi. 73; Mark xiv. 70), of which Buxtorf gives some curious examples (Lex. Talm. &c., cols. 434-436). After the destruction of the Jewish polity, some of the most eminent schools of Hebrew learning were established in Galilee, especially at Tiberias. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Galiläa'; Porter, Handb. for Syria and Palestine.

GAL'ILEE, SEA OF (Matt. iv. 18; Mark i. 16; John vi. 1). See GENNESARET, SEA OF.

GALILE'ANS. Inhabitants of Galilee.

The slaughter of Galileans by Pilate (Luke xiii. 1, 2) probably occurred at some feast at Jerusalem. Riots were not uncommon then. But we have no account of that here referred to.

GALL. The Hebrew word rôsh, rendered 'hemlock' in Hos. x. 4, Amos vi. 12, elsewhere generally 'gall,' is some noxious plant (Deut. xxix. 18; Psal. lxxix. 21), most probably the poppy; and thus (Jer. viii. 14) water of gall' would be poppy-juice. It stands sometimes for poison generally (Deut. xxxii. 32). There is another word, mer'raih, or merorah, signifying the gall of the human body (Job xvi. 13, xx. 25), also that of asps (xx. 14), the poison being supposed to lie in the gall. The Greek cholê means a bitter humour of man or beast, taking sometimes a more general signification (Matt. xxvii. 34): it is used metaphorically in Acts viii. 23.

The draught offered to our Lord at his crucifixion is said by St. Matthew to be mingled with gall, by St. Mark with myrrh (Matt. xxvii. 34; Mark xv. 23). If the same transaction be intended, Mark specifies the ingredient, while Matthew shows that the effect was to render the mixture bitter; as we say 'bitter as gall.'

GALLERY. The word occurs in Sol. Song i. 17, marg.: it means, probably, a carved or fretted ceiling. A nearly-similar word (vii. 5) means flowing locks: the original term is derived from a root signifying to flow. As to the 'galleries' of Ezek. xli. 15, 16, xlii. 3, 5, they may be pillars to support a floor, or projections, ledges.

GALLEY (Isai. xxxiii. 21). See SHIP.

GAL'LIM (fountains). A town, the native place of Phalti to whom David's wife Michal had been given (1 Sam. xxv. 44). The only clue we have to its position is its being enumerated in the list of places on the line of Sennacherib's march (Isai. x. 30): we may hence infer that it was in the territory of Benjamin, to the north of Jerusalem.

GAL'LIO. Marcus Annæus Novatus, brother of the eminent philosopher, Lucius Annæus Seneca, was adopted into the family of the rhetorician Lucius Junius Gallio, and was thenceforth designated Junius Annæus Gallio. To him his brother Seneca dedicated one of his works, De Ira. He was proconsul of Achaia under the emperor Claudius, about 53 and 54 A.D.; when St. Paul was accused before him (Acts xviii. 12-16). He resigned his post because the climate was injurious to his health. He is described as a man of singularly-amiable character. The manner of his death is variously stated. Winer (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Gallio') thinks he was put to death by Nero: Jerome says he committed suicide.

GALLOWS (Esth. v. 14, vi. 4, vii. 9, 10, viii. 7, ix. 13, 25). See PUNISHMENTS.

GAM'EL (1 Esdr. viii. 29). Daniel (Ezra viii. 2).

GAMA'LIEL (recompence of God).—1. The prince of the tribe of Manasseh in the wilderness (Numb. i. 10, ii. 20, vii. 54, 59, x. 23).

—2. A celebrated Pharisee and doctor of the law. He had great authority in the sanhedrim, where he gave the prudent advice to let the apostles alone (Acts iv. 33-40). St. Paul was his pupil (xxii. 3). He is doubtless the same with Rabban Gamaliel the aged, son of Simeon, and grandson of Hillel. Christian tradition asserts that he was baptized by St. Peter and St. Paul; but the Jewish authorities are more likely right, when they assert that he died a Pharisee, about eighteen years, it is thought, before the destruction of Jerusalem.

GAMES. Of games understood as mere amusements of children or young people but little is said in the sacred volume. There are, however, a few allusions to the games which must have been common enough; for, whatever may be the character generally of a people—more staid like the Hebrews and Arabs, or more mercurial like the Greeks—we cannot doubt that boys are boys all the world over, thoroughly disposed for play and well accustomed to it. And so we find freedom for such pastimes mentioned as descriptive of prosperity and populousness: 'The streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof' (Zech. viii. 5). Another passage of the same prophet (xii. 3) has been supposed to allude to an amusement practised by youths, viz. the lifting of heavy stones, which it was a trial of strength and skill to raise, and which different persons raised to the knees, to the breast, or above the head. St. Jerome declares that stones were placed for the purpose in his day, and that it was a custom that had descended from ancient times (Comm. in Zach., imagined, as of some manly military play (2 Sam. ii. 14), of intellectual contests (Judges xiv. 12-19), of fishing, and snaring or training birds (Job xli. 1, 5; comp. Carey's note, The Book of Job, p. 407). There were also the festal amusements of song, and the use of floral crowns, of which we occasionally read (Psal. xxx. 11; Isal. xxx. 29; Jer. xxxi. 13; Lam. v. 16; Luke xv. 25). But these last belong more particularly to private enjoyment; and for some notice of them see BANQUET, MARRIAGE.

Public games, such as those in which the Greeks delighted, were introduced into Judea by foreign influence. Thus we find the Syro-Macedonian kings promoting them. Antiochus Epiphanes built a gymnasium at Jerusalem (1 Macc. i. 14). The prevalence, however, of heathen manners was deeply felt as a national sin by those Jews who strictly observed the ordinances of the law (2 Macc. iv. 12-20). Theatres and amphitheatres were subsequently erected in many cities of Palestine by the Herodian family; and in these gymnastic contests were engaged in. Such contests were familiar, too, to the apostles who visited and preached in Greek and Roman towns, and wrote letters to churches in whose vicinity the most remarkable games of antiquity were celebrated. It is not surprising, therefore, that we meet with frequent allusion to them in the New Testament.

The most noted games in Greece were the Olympian, the Pythian, the Nemean, and the Isthmian; at the last of which St. Paul was

lib. iii. cap. 12). Another interesting allusion to street-games occurs in Matt. xi. 16, where children are represented as divided into two parties, the one proposing to imitate first the mirth of a wedding and then the mourning of a funeral; to neither of which their companions would agree. Of other sports a few faint traces have been perhaps present on his first visit to Corinth; near to which city they were held. The contests here were the pentathlon (five contests), leaping, running, quoiting (see Discus), wrestling, and hurling the spear; and the pankration (general trial of strength), wrestling, and boxing.

or unworthy of the crown (1 Cor. ix. 26, 27: comp. Alford's note on the place).

St. Paul borrows his figures from both and altogether overcoming him—such is the meaning in the verses just referred to. And this effect might well be produced; for the hands of the boxer were armed with the cestus, leather straps studded with nails or bosses. In the race too (the metaphor being taken from the foot-race, though there were also chariot and horse-races), the apostle ran not with vague uncertainty, but as making steadily for the mark in view. He 'brings vividly,' says a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, 'before our minds the earnestness of the competitor, having cast off every encumbrance, especially any closely-fitting robe (Heb. xii. 1), holding on his course uninterrupted (Phil. iii. 12), his eye fixed on the distant goal (Heb. xii. 2, xi. 26), unmindful of the space already passed (Phil. iii. 13), and stretching forward with bent body, his perseverance (Heb. xii. 1), his joy at the completion of the course (Acts xx. 24), his exultation as he not only receives (Phil. iii. 12) but actually grasps (1 Tim. vi. 12, 19) the crown which had been set apart (2 Tim. iv. 8) for the victor' (vol. i. p. 659).

they were delivered with force and precision, not at random into the air, but bruising, so to speak, the face of the opponent, were placed in the victors' hands (see Rev. vii. 9).

But these crowns, so fading, were prized most highly, and the name of one who conquered became illustrious: how much greater then should be the patience, the perseverance, the exertion of the Christian combatant, who gains not a mere perishable chaplet, not just a name in the world, (comp. abp. Trench, Comm. on Epist. to Seven Churches, p. 147, who observes that the prize is promised not to those that enter the lists but to those that persevere).

but a crown incorruptible, and whose glorious success is a theme of rejoicing through eternal ages (1 Cor. ix. 25)! In the earthly contest, many must be defeated in spite of all their pains; one alone can receive the prize: in the Christian course, all who rightly contend shall obtain (2 Tim. iv. 8); there are many mansions in the heavenly Father's house (John xiv. 2), for all that have faithfully trodden the way thereto (6); nor does the triumph of one individual prevent, it rather enhances, the happiness of ten thousand times ten thousand others these, who, like the bull-fighters of Spain, made the dangerous pastime their profession. But the compulsion generally used had a mournful significance for the early Christians, who were repeatedly thrown to the beasts in the amphitheatres, as a due punishment, it was thought, for what was called their execrable superstition. St. Paul may allude to these contests in 1 Cor. xv. 32: the allusion is, however, there more probably a figurative expression. Some other references to them may be found scattered in his writings (see iv. 9; 2 Cor. i. 9; those so condemned were reserved for the last and exposed with their sentence; 2 Tim. iv. 17). Nero refined upon this mode of cruel execution by dressing the victims in the skins of beasts (Tacitus, Annal., lib. xv. 44).

GAMMA'DIMS (Ezek. xxvii. 11). This word has given occasion to numberless conjectures: see Gesenius, Thesaurus, p. 292. Perhaps it may signify bold warriors, watchful guards. The practice of hanging shields upon the walls of fortresses is illustrated by some of the Assyrian sculptures.

GA'MUL (weaned). The chief of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 17). GAR (1 Esdr. v. 34).

GARDEN. The Hebrew word so translated signifies an enclosed place, hedged or fenced around to keep it from trespass or injury from animals. This is implied in the description of the happy garden of paradise. It was planted in Eden, garnished with trees 'pleasant to the sight and good for food,' well-watered also; 'and the Lord God took the man and put him into the garden, to dress it and to keep it' (Gen. ii. 8-10, 15). The care of such a garden would be easy and pleasant, in contrast with that hard labour which after the fall was needed to make the earth yield her increase (iii. 17-19, 23). It must mainly have consisted in the protection of it by fencing, the loosening of the soil, and gathering out of stones (like that required for a vineyard, Isai. v. 2), and the careful directing of water to the plants and shrubs. This watering was essential to the very idea of a garden. Hence we find fruitful districts, well-watered, described as gardens. Such, before the destruction of Sodom and the neighbouring cities, was the plain in which they stood (Gen. xiii. 10). Such was Egypt, fertilized by the Nile and by the canals, or by wheels worked by the feet, made to convey the water to places which the natural inundations would not reach (Deut. xi. 10). And, as there must be a sufficiency of water, so a redundancy must be specially guarded against. Hence, when gardens were cultivated on terraces, they must be fenced with walls, that the violent rains might not in their downward rush carry off the soil and leave but the bare rock.

The trees and plants cultivated in gardens of course vary with the situation. Those which grow in some countries wild, or need but little care, must in others be most carefully tended. In Palestine the gardens were supplied with fig-trees (Gen. iii. 7), pomegranates (Sol. Song iv. 13), nut-trees (vi. 11), pines, olive-trees (John xviii. 1)—those places specially appropriated to the vine and the olive being called 'vineyards' and 'oliveyards' (Josh. xxiv. 13)—and other fruit-trees (Jer. xxix. 5; Amos ix. 14). Modern gardens and orchards there are described as stocked with orange, lemon, and mulberry-trees. Fruit-trees were not to be felled for purposes of war (Deut. xx. 19, 20); while the quiet enjoyment of them indicated a state of security and comfort (1 Kings iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4).

Besides fruit-trees, belonging to what we should more particularly call orchards, gardens were embellished with flowers and aromatic shrubs (Sol. Song iv. 13, 14, 16, v. 1, vi. 2). Dr. Saalschütz, and a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible (vol. i. p. 651), infer from Isai. xvii. 10, and the Targum on Eccles. ii. 5, 6, that exotics were cultivated. There were also kitchen-gardens for culinary herbs, such as the Israelites longed for in the wilderness after tasting them in Egypt (Numb. xi. 5; Deut. xi. 10; 1 Kings xxi. 2; Isai. i. 8; Luke xiii. 19). The lodge for the watchman or keeper (see LODGE) is sometimes mentioned: also in the Apocrypha we read of a 'scare-crow' (Bar. vi. 70). How beautiful these gardens, well-cultivated and adorned, were we may judge from the comparisons in which they are occasionally introduced (Numb. xxiv. 5, 6; Isai. li. 3; Joel ii. 3). The comparison which Balaam makes between a garden and the good order of the Israelitish encampment is the more just, when we remember that Egyptian gardens, as we gather from the monuments, were laid out in regular compartments. This, too, is said by Talmudical writers to have been the custom with the Hebrews, who, in order to observe precisely the prohibitions of the law (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 9), carefully fenced off these separate divisions.

Gardens were contiguous to palaces and large mansions (Esth. vii. 7). Great care was taken in the cultivation of them, for which gardeners were employed (John xx. 15), who were acquainted with the art of grafting (Rom. xi. 17-24). They were the resort of persons for private meditation or social converse (see GETHEMANE); also as places of idolatrous worship (Isai. i. 29, lxxv. 3, lxxvi. 17). Feasts, too, were celebrated in them (Esth. i. 5; Sol. Song v. 1). They were, besides, used sometimes as places of burial (2 Kings xxi. 18, 26; John xix. 41).

Solomon pleased himself with planting gardens (Eccles. ii. 5): the position of those specially called his is supposed to be in the Wady Urtas, to the south of Beth-lehem (see POOL). There was also 'the king's garden' repeatedly mentioned (2 Kings xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4, liii. 7). It appears to have been near the pool of Siloam, where the valleys of the Kidron and of Hinnom meet. See Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 11, vol. i. pp. 117-125, to which this article is much indebted.

GARDEN-HOUSE (2 Kings ix. 27). See AHAZIAH, 2, BETH-HAGGAN.

GA'REB (scabby). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chron. xi. 40). He is said to be an Ithrite.

GA'REB (id.). A hill near Jerusalem (Jer. xxxi. 39). Some have fancied that the lepers were placed there. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Gareb.'

GAR'ZIM (2 Macc. v. 23, vi. 2). A form of Gerizim.

GARLAND (Acts xiv. 13). It was customary at sacrifices to decorate, not only victims, but the altars, the priests, the very doors of the houses, with garlands or wreaths. Guests at feasts were occasionally crowned with flowers (Wisd. ii. 7, 8).

GARLIC. One of the Egyptian plants for which the Israelites murmured (Numb. xi. 5). It is the Allium sativum; and large quantities of it were anciently raised in Egypt.

GARMENT. See DRESS.

GAR'MITE. This appellation is given to Kellah, apparently the town (1 Chron. iv. 19). Nothing can be affirmed with certainty of it.

GARRISON. The different Hebrew words so rendered are from the same root; but they do not all express the sense of our term 'garrison.' The translation is accurate in 1 Sam. xiii. 23, xiv. 1, 4, 6, 12, 15; 2 Sam. xxiii. 14; but in 1 Sam. x. 5, xiii. 3 probably a pillar or monument was meant, which the Philistines had set up to mark their superiority or some victory gained, and which Jonathan threw down. The same word designates the 'pillar of salt' of Gen. xix. 26. Further, in 2 Sam. viii. 6, 14; 1 Chron. xviii. 13; 2 Chron. xvii. 2, officers rather than garrisons are intended; and in Ezek. xxvi. 11 pillars (perhaps those of the temple of the Tyrian Hercules) are meant.

GASH'MU (rain) (Neh. vi. 6). A form of the name Geshem.

GATAM (one puny and thin). One of the sons of Eliphaz, Esau's eldest son, reckoned among the 'dukes' in Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 16; 1 Chron. i. 36).

GATE, GATE-WAY. Gates and doors are the entrances to enclosed places, cities, and buildings; the latter term, doors, being more generally applied to houses.

The gates of cities were intended for security, and were therefore composed of durable materials. Thus we find brazen gates and iron bars mentioned (Psal. cvii. 16; Isai. xlv. 2), also an iron gate belonging to a prison (Acts xii. 10). We may suppose that they were sheathed with metallic plates.

Assyrian gate. From Nineveh marbles.

Gates, or at least doors, seem sometimes to have been made of stone. Thus Mr. Porter describes the yet-existing houses of Bashan, of which 'the doors are massive slabs of stone' (Journ. of Sac. Lit., July 1854). Probably allusion is made to such gates in Isai. liv. 12; Rev. xxi. 21. Occasionally gates were of wood; this is evident from the attempt of Abimelech to burn the gate of the fortress he was attacking (Judges ix. 52; comp. Neh. i. 3, ii. 17). Gates were generally two-leaved, and, as well as the gate-ways, were often highly ornamented:

inscriptions being occasionally placed upon or over them (Deut. vi. 9, xi. 20).

The gates of the temple were massive, made of fir, adorned with carved work, and overlaid with gold; those of the oracle being of olive-wood, similarly carved and overlaid (1 Kings vi. 31-35; 2 Kings xviii. 16; Ezek. xli. 23-25). There were nine gates in Cyclopean gate of Segni.

Herod's temple overlaid with gold and silver; but the most costly was the great external eastern gate, between the upper court and the court of the women. It was probably that called the 'beautiful gate,' and made of Corinthian brass. The eastern gate of the interior sanctuary required twenty men to close it (Josephus, Bell. Jud., lib. v. 5, § 3, vi. 5, § 3).

Gates were secured by bolts or bars and locks (Deut. iii. 5; Judges xvi. 3; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7; 1 Kings iv. 13; 2 Chron. viii. 5; Neh. iii. 3, 6, 13, 15; Psal. cvii. 16, cxlvii. 13; Isai. xiv. 1, 2; Jer. xlix. 31; Ezek. xxxviii. 11). In an unsettled state of society they were ordinarily closed: hence the throwing of them open signified peace or triumph (Psal. xxiv. 7; Isai. lx. 11; Rev. xxi. 25). There were, however, wickets to afford a passage when the great gate was shut. Sometimes there was an inner and an outer gate (2 Sam. xviii. 24); and towers or other works were constructed to defend the gates of a city: watchmen also had the charge of them, or were placed on some adjoining turret, in order to detect the approach of a foe (2 Kings vii. 10, ix. 17; Neh. xlii. 22; Esth. ii. 21; Jer. xxxv. 4, xxxix. 4). Enemies were of course anxious to possess themselves of the gates; and when these were occupied a town was usually regarded as taken (Deut. xxviii. 52, 57; Jer. xxxix. 3).

minals were executed outside (1 Kings xxi. 13; Acts vii. 58): so it is noted that our Lord suffered without the gate (Heb. xiii. 12).

The same customs that we read of in scripture still prevail in the east. Thus Gate of Damascus.

Dr. Thomson says, 'You observe that the gate-way is vaulted, shady, and cool; that is one reason why people delight to assemble about it. Again, the curious and vain resort thither to see and be seen. Some go to meet their associates; others to watch for returning friends, or to accom-

Gate at Antioch.

At the gates were places of public resort. Persons are therefore represented as sitting there, or as being likely to be met with there, as passing in and out (Gen. xix. 1, xxiii. 10, xxxiv. 20, 24; 1 Sam. iv. 13, 18; 2 Sam. xv. 2; Neh. viii. 1, 3; Psal. lxxix. 12; Prov. i. 21). Markets were occasionally held at the gate (2 Kings vii. 1, 17, 18, 20; Neh. xlii. 20, 21), but rather of country produce than of manufactured goods. Courts of justice, solemn assemblies, pageants, &c., were also at the gates (Deut. xvi. 18, xxi. 19, xxv. 7; Josh. xx. 4; Ruth iv. 1-12; 2 Sam. xix. 8; 1 Kings xxii. 10; 2 Chron. xviii. 9; Job xxix. 7; Psal. cxxvii. 5; Prov. xvii. 22, xxiv. 7, xxxi. 23; Jer. xvii. 19, xxxviii. 7, xliii. 9, 10; Lam. v. 14; Amos v. 12; Zech. viii. 16). Sacrifices appear to have been offered to idols, or in heathen cities, at or without the gates (2 Kings xxiii. 8; Acts xv. 13). Over gates were chambers (2 Sam. xviii. 23); and there were probably recesses or places adapted for the business usually transacted there. Cri-

pany those about to depart; while many gather there to hear the news, and to engage in trade and traffic. I have seen in certain places—Joppa, for example—the kady and his court sitting at the entrance of the gate, hearing and adjudicating all sorts of causes in the audience of all that went in and out thereat' (The Land and the Book, pp. 26, 27).

The gates of cities had particular names given to them: thus we find those mentioned by which the gates of Jerusalem were known: see JERUSALEM. This, too, is the modern custom: 'Gates have the same kind of names now as in ancient times, generally derived from some accidental circumstance connected with them. One is Bab el-Bahar, because it leads to the sea. That near which the tanners carry on their business is Bab el-Dubbâga. Then one is Bab es-Shurraiyeh, because the governor's palace is near it. And thus, too, the streets and different quarters of the city derive their names. Those who follow the same trade congregate in the same street. This is saddlers', the next blacksmiths' street, and so on to the end of the list' (ibid., pp. 28, 29).

The term 'gates' is sometimes used figuratively: thus we have the 'gates of hell,' or 'of death' (Job xxxviii. 17; Isai. xxxviii. 10); and there was a remarkable promise given by our Lord, that the gates of hell should not prevail against his church (Matt. xvi. 18); where, says Dr. Alford on the place, 'the gates of death, by a well-known oriental form of speech, are equivalent to the power of the kingdom of death. The form is still preserved when the Turkish empire is known as "the Ottoman Porte." The figurative expression to 'exalt the gate' (Prov. xvii. 19), i. e. to have the opening of the gate-way lofty, implies ostentation, which is likely to provoke envy, and therefore leads often to destruction. It has been said that gates and gate-ways are ornamented: this is especially the case with gates of palaces, on which is much richness of decoration, found also on the doors of private dwelling-houses. Ancient Egyptian doors, with the modes of fastening them, sometimes by bolts or locks (comp. Judges iii. 23, 25), and occasionally by sealing them with a mass of clay, are represented in the sculptures, and serve to illustrate passages of scripture in which doors are mentioned.

It may be added, that it is not uncommon in the interior of eastern houses to have curtains instead of doors. So there was a curtain at the entrance of the tabernacle, and also to separate the sanctuary from the holy of holies (Exod. xxvi. 31-33, 36, 37).

GATH (a wine-press). One of the five principal cities of the Philistines, first mentioned (Josh. xi. 22) as a place where some of the Anakim remained. There was, however, a raid yet earlier, in point of time, made into the territory of Gath by some of the sons of Ephraim who were slain by those whom they were plundering (1 Chron. vii. 20-22). To Gath in turn the ark of God was carried when captive; and it shared with other cities the heavy plague inflicted, and joined in the offerings made as atonement (1 Sam. v. 8, vi. 17). Gath, somewhat later, was one of the points to which the Israelites pushed their conquests after the great day of Mizpeh (vii. 14). The race of Anak was for long not extinct in this city. For several men of great stature are mentioned as having been destroyed by David and his officers (2 Sam. xxi. 15-22; 1 Chron. xx. 4-8). The most noted, however, of these was Goliath, whom David himself slew in the valley of Elah (1 Sam. xvii.). To Gath David fled when Saul sought to kill him. It was a strange place of refuge to select; and, though Achish, the king, seems to have been willing to receive him, yet the jealousy of the people was excited, and David feigned himself mad to secure his escape (xxi. 10-15). A few years afterwards he again resorted to Gath, and was favoured by Achish, who exercised kingly rule there (xxvii.). And, though it does not appear distinctly that this authority extended over the whole Philistine country, and his wish was resisted of taking David with him to invade Israel, yet it does seem as if he had a pre-eminence, a kind of suzerainty among the other chiefs, who are called but 'lords. David, when king of Israel, subjected Gath (1 Chron. xviii. 1), probably allowing Achish some authority there as his vassal. For we find the same, or another bearing the like title, still called 'king' in Solomon's reign

(1 Kings ii. 39-41). Rehoboam fortified Gath (2 Chron. xi. 8): in the reign of Jehoash, king of Judah, the Syrians took it (2 Kings xii. 17); and then it seems to have returned under Philistine occupation. Uzziah, however, captured and dismantled it (2 Chron. xxvi. 6), but possibly did not retain possession; as in the prophecies of Amos and Micah it is regarded as a Philistine city (Amos vi. 2; Micah i. 10). At what date the encounter between the Benjamites and the men of Gath, mentioned in 1 Chron. viii. 13, occurred, is not easily to be ascertained.

The site of this celebrated city is uncertain; and men most competent to judge, who have personally examined the country, differ in their conclusions. Mr. Porter tells us (in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 655, 656), that, after careful search, 'he came to the conclusion that it was placed upon the conspicuous hill now called Tell es-Sâfieh. This hill stands upon the side of the plain of Philistia, at the foot of the mountains of Judah, ten miles east of Ashdod, and about the same distance south-by-east of Ekron. It is irregular in form, and about 200 feet high. On the top are the foundations of an old castle; and great numbers of hewn stones are built up in the walls of the terraces that run along the declivities. On the north-east is a projecting shoulder, whose sides appear to have been scarped. Here, too, are traces of ancient buildings; and here stands the modern village, extending along the whole northern face of the hill. In the walls of the houses are many old stones; and at its western extremity two columns still remain on their pedestals. Round the sides of the hill, especially on the south, are large cisterns excavated in the rock.' Mr. Porter then examines the indications we have in scripture of the position of Gath, and thinks that the spot he describes just answers all the conditions. Dr. Thomson forms a different judgment. He identifies Gath with the afterwards-noted Eleutheropolis, now Beit Jibrin. 'It appears to me,' he says, 'that Bethogabra, Eleutheropolis, Beit Jibrin, and Gath, are all one and the same city. Khurbet Get, ruins of Gath, is the name now applied to one of the heaps of rubbish a short distance westward from the castle of Beit Jibrin. The Hebrew word Bethogabra and the Arabic Beit Jibrin may be rendered "house of giants;" which reminds us of Goliath of Gath and his family. And, further, I think that the Mareshah of Josh. xv. 44, which was re-built by Rehoboam, and is repeatedly mentioned in connection with Gath (2 Chron. xi. 8) was a suburb of the great capital of the Philistines. Benjamin of Tudela makes Mareshah and Beit Jibrin identical; and Jerome places them so near each other that they may be regarded as one and the same place. Micah probably wrote Moreseth-gath (Mic. i. 14), in order to fix the location of the suburb by the name of the main city' (The Land and the Book, pp. 564, 565).

GATH-HE'PHER (wine-press of the well). The native place of the prophet Jonah (2 Kings xiv. 25). It is the same with Gittah-hepher, a frontier town of Zebulun (Josh.

xix. 13). It is now called el-Meshhad, a village two miles east of Sefurieh.

GATH-RIM'MON (wine-press of the pomegranate).—1. A city in the territory of Dan (Josh. xix. 45), afterwards assigned to the Levites (xxi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 69).—2. Another city of the same name is also said to be allotted to the Levites from Manasseh west of the Jordan (Josh. xxi. 25). But perhaps this is a copyist's error: in 1 Chron. vi. 70 the place is called Beileam.

GAULANITIS. See GOLAN.

GA'ZA (the strong).—1. A city in the south-west of Palestine, lying on the great road from Egypt to Syria. It was a strong place, and, from its position, very important: it suffered, therefore, many sieges, and was frequently taken by conquerors. It is first mentioned (Gen. x. 19), in describing the extent of the Canaanite frontier. It is afterwards noted, in the detail of Joshua's conquests, that he smote the people of the land to Gaza (Josh. x. 41); and, though it was assigned to the tribe of Judah, the place was not then conquered, but served as a refuge for some of the Anakim (xi. 22, xiii. 3, xv. 47). Afterwards Judah stormed Gaza (Judges i. 18), but do not seem to have retained possession of it. Perhaps it was lost in the Midianitish invasion (vi. 4); at all events we find it afterwards a Philistine town (1 Sam. vi. 17). There Samson performed his exploit of carrying off the city-gate: thither he was brought a captive; and there (as if it were then the Philistine metropolis) was that great exhibition of him when he avenged himself by the destruction of the house in which they were assembled (Judges xvi. 1-3, 21-30). Whether it was taken by David we do not know; but Solomon seems to have possessed it (1 Kings iv. 24, where it is called 'Azzah'). In later times it was again Philistine, but was probably captured by Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 8). In the prophets, also, it is spoken of as Philistine (Jer. xxv. 20, where 'Azzah,' xlvii. 1, 5; Amos i. 6, 7; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5). Pharaoh-necho is said to have smitten Gaza; and probably this catastrophe is that mentioned by Herodotus, who says that Necho took Cadytis (lib. ii. 159). Cadytis has been supposed to be Jerusalem (see Prideaux, Conn., vol. i. pp. 49-51): it is with more reason believed to be Gaza. The disasters of this city were not ended. Alexander the Great took it: it continued, however, a strong place, and is frequently mentioned in the Maccabean wars (e. g. 1 Macc. xi. 61, xiii. 43). It was destroyed by Alexander Jannæus, 96 B.C., but shortly re-built: it was given by Augustus to Herod, and after his death included in the province of Syria. It was noted also in the crusades. We find a mention of Gaza (Acts viii. 26) which has caused some discussion. Most probably the words 'which is desert' were part of the direction of the angel to Philip. There were, it seems, two roads from Jerusalem to Gaza, one through a tract of country desert, or without towns: this Philip was commanded to take. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Gaza;' Alford, Greek Test., note on Acts viii. 26. Gaza, now Ghuzzeh, is a large town, with 16,000 or 18,000 inhabitants, partly on an oblong hill, partly in the valleys north and south. It is a little distance from the sea, in which there is a so-called port, but really an open roadstead. The commerce of Gaza is considerable: corn-fields are in the neighbourhood; and the grinding of the mill is perpetually heard in the city (Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 549, &c.).—2. A city named as belonging to Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 28); but the name differs in several MSS. It could hardly have been the noted Philistine city.

GAZ'ARA (1 Macc. ix. 52, xiii. 53, xiv. 7, 34, xv. 28). Possibly Gezer.

GAZATHITES. The inhabitants of Gaza (Josh. xiii. 3), called also Gazites.

GAZER (a steep place) (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chron. xiv. 16). See GEZER.

GAZE'RA.—1. (1 Esdr. v. 31). Probably a corruption of Gazzam (Esra ii. 48).—2. (1 Macc. iv. 15, vii. 45). Identical with Gazara.

GAZEZ (shearer).—1, 2. The name of two persons, the son and grandson of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 46).

GAZITES. The inhabitants of Gaza (Judges xvi. 2), called also Gazathites.

GAZZAM (devouring). One of the Nethinim, whose descendants returned from Babylon (Esra ii. 48; Neh. vii. 51).

GE'BA (hill). A city of Benjamin (otherwise called Gaba), afterwards allotted to the priests (Josh. xviii. 24, xxi. 17; 1 Chron. vi. 60). It was here that, in the early part of Saul's reign, the Philistines had 'a garrison' (1 Sam. xiii. 3); though, most likely, the word so translated means a pillar or monument which they had set up to commemorate some victory. However this may be, Geba marks the scene of an exploit of Jonathan, where a narrow pass is described between two rocks, one over-against Michmash, the other over-against Geba; for such, not Gibeah, is the word in the original (xiv. 5). And this locality seems to have been identified. There is now a village, Jeba, on the summit of a hill just opposite another village, Mukhmas. The identification is confirmed by the notice of the march of the Assyrian army (Isai. x. 28-32): the 'carriages,' or heavy waggons, had to halt at Michmash: the lighter troops passed the ravine, and took up their quarters at Geba; the nature of the ground giving the strongest testimony to the accuracy of the detail. It was from Geba to Gazer, or Gezer, that David's pursuit of the Philistines extended (2 Sam. v. 25): the place was fortified by Asa (1 Kings xv. 22; 2 Chron. xvi. 6), and is mentioned as the northern limit of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kings xxiii. 8). The name repeatedly occurs elsewhere (1 Chron. viii. 6; Esra ii. 26; Neh. vii. 30, xi. 31, xii. 29; Zech. xiv. 10).

GE'BA (Judith iii. 10). This is probably the modern Jeba, a large village on the brow of a hill, three or four miles north-east of Samaria.

GE'BAL (mountain).—1. A name occurring in Psal. lxxxiii. 7, as confederate with many enemies of Israel. It is generally supposed to indicate the mountainous tract extending from the Dead sea southward to Petra, still named Jebal. But some writers identify it with No. 2, as mentioned in conjunction with Tyre. The confederacy referred to was probably that against Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 1, 2). The psalm might have been composed on that occasion: it is ascribed to Asaph; and one of the family of Asaph was inspired to encourage the Jewish king with the assurance of victory (14-17).—2. A place spoken of in connection with Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 9), most probably the residence of the Glibites, and therefore to the north of Palestine (Josh. xiii. 5). The Glibites were employed as stone-carvers by Solomon at the building of the temple (1 Kings v. 18). It appears to be the town afterwards known by the name Byblos, and now called Jebail by the Arabs. It is seated on an eminence near the Mediterranean, north of Beirut.

GE'BER (a man).—1. One whose son had one of Solomon's commissariat districts in Argob and the adjacent country (1 Kings iv. 13).—2. A person who himself took charge of a district in Gilead, south of that just named (19). The latter part of the verse probably means that he was the chief, the single superintendent of the other trans-Jordanic officers, or of the rest of the country.

GE'BIM (trenches). A place apparently not far from Jerusalem on the north, the inhabitants of which are represented as preparing to flee on the approach of Sennacherib's army (Isai. x. 31).

GEDALIAH (whom Jehovah has made powerful).—1. The son of Ahikam Jeremiah's protector, who, after the taking of Jerusalem, was appointed governor of the land under Nebuchadnezzar. He was treacherously murdered by Ishmael (2 Kings xxv. 22-25; Jer. xxxix. 14, xl. 5-16, xli. xliii. 6). Gedaliah's death was afterwards observed as a national fast in the seventh month (Zech. vii. 5, viii. 19).—2. One of the sons of Jeduthun, a chief musician (1 Chron. xxv. 3, 9).—3. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Esra x. 18).—4. One of the princes, son of Pashur, who complained of Jeremiah to Zedekiah the king (Jer. xxxviii. 1-5).—5. The grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i. 1).

GED'DUR (1 Esdr. v. 30). Perhaps a corrupt form of Gahar (Esra ii. 47).

GEDEON (Heb. xi. 32). The Greek form of GIDEON, which see.

GED'EON. An ancestor of Judith (Judith viii. 1).

GE'DER (a wall). A city, perhaps in the south of Palestine, whose king was one of those overcome by Joshua (Josh. xii. 13).

GEDERAH (an enclosure, a sheep-fold). A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 36).

GEDE'RATHITE. A native or resident of Gederah (1 Chron. xii. 4). Jozabad, so called, was a Benjamite, but he might have lived at Gederah.

GEDE'RITE. A native of Geder, or Gederah (1 Chron. xxvii. 28).

GEDE'ROTH (sheep-folds). A city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41; 2 Chron. xxviii. 18).

GEDEROTHA'IM (two sheep-folds). A place in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 36).

GE'DOR (wall).—1, 2. Two names, occurring among the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 4, 18): it is questionable whether persons are here meant, or a place.—3. A Benjamite mentioned in the genealogy of Saul (viii. 31, ix. 37).

GE'DOR (id.).—1. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 58). It is probably the modern Jedâr, halfway between Bethlehem and Hebron.—2. A place to the entrance of which the Simeonites are said to have gone to seek pasture for their flocks (1 Chron. iv. 39). It was, perhaps (comp. 42) in the direction of mount Seir. But some would read Gerar, after the Septuagint. See Wilton, Negeb, pp. 248, 249.—3. The birth-place or residence of Jeroham, father of two chiefs who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 7). Most likely it was in Benjamin.

GEHA'ZI (valley of vision). The minister or attendant on the prophet Elisha. He it was that suggested that the Shunammite had no child, when the prophet had proposed to do something for her; and he, when the child that was given died, was sent to lay his master's staff upon its face (2 Kings iv.). For his false and fraudulent conduct in regard to Naaman, he was punished with incurable leprosy (v.). He is once again heard of narrating to the king (Joram ?) the wonderful deeds of Elisha (viii. 4, 5).

GEHEN'NA. The Greek form of gêhinnom, 'the valley of Hinnom' (Josh. xv. 8), a ravine to the south of Jerusalem, where the Jews offered their children to Moloch, and which was polluted by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 10). In consequence of its gloomy appearance, of the fires burning there, and of its being a receptacle for foul things, the word was used as symbolizing the place of eternal punishment, and translated 'hell' (Matt. v. 22, 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxiii. 15, 33; Mark ix. 43, 45, 47; Luke xii. 5; James iii. 6). See HINNOM.

GELI'LOTH (regions, borders, perhaps circles). A place mentioned in describing the boundary of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 17). But, when the same frontier is elsewhere described, we find Gilgal (xv. 7). Gelliath was therefore either another name for Gilgal, or appears by a transcriber's error.

GEMAL'LI (camel-driver). A descendant of Dan, whose son Ammiel was one of the selected spies (Numb. xiii. 12).

GEMARIAH (whom Jehovah has perfected).—1. The son of Hilkiah, sent on an embassy from Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxix. 3).—2. The son of Shaphan, from whose chamber Baruch read to the people the roll of Jeremiah's prophecies (xxxvi. 10, 11, 12, 25). His name is spelt in the original somewhat differently from that of the first-named person.

GEMI'NI (Judges iii. 15, marg.). There can be little doubt that the textual rendering is right, and that Gera was a Benjamite.

GEMS. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

GENEALOGY. The lineage of a race, by which, as on a connecting thread, the history of families and then of nations is arranged in order. The scripture narrative has much of a biographical character; and it is by means of the genealogies which are interwoven that the chronological sequence is preserved. These genealogies are highly valuable as early ethnographical documents; but there is a still higher purpose that they are intended to serve. On man's first creation he was commanded to increase and multiply; and the first promise after the fall was that the woman's seed should be a deliverer from the curse which sin had inflicted. It was important, therefore, to trace the line of succession, and to show how that promise held, link by link proceeding in an orderly chain, till in the fulness of the time the Son of God appeared, born of a woman. And, besides, it was in one particular line, limited from time to time to Abraham's posterity, and then to the tribe of Judah, and afterwards to David's family, that the fulfilment of the original utterance would be seen. So that, to make manifest how God's word was faithful, and how in Abraham all nations would be blessed, and how the stem of Jesse should shoot forth, and David never want a man to sit upon his throne, to expound to the world the long-drawn prophecies, guided by a faithful hand, all converging to one object, the Messiah—for such reasons it was needful to preserve the genealogies.

And those other lines of descent which we find in scripture illustrate God's faithfulness also. Ishmael was to swell into a vast nation; and we have his generations recorded; how twelve patriarchs issued from his loins, each the father of a multitudinous tribe, till the expanse of country from Assyria to Egypt was filled with them (Gen. xxv. 12-18). Esau was to become a nation; and we have his descendants chronicled, and the princes and the kings that ruled over them (xxxvi.).

But it was in the covenant-people that the greatest minuteness of detail was required. Not only must the line of Messiah be distinctly marked; but, as to Judah the kingdom, so to Levi the priesthood was assigned; and the priests for their respective courses (1 Chron. xxiii.-xxvii.; 2 Chron. xxxi. 15-19) must show their genealogies; else they could not be permitted to minister before the Lord (Ezra ii. 61-63; Neh. vii. 63-65). The heritage of Canaan, moreover, was parcelled out among the tribes: Israel alone must have it (Ezra ii. 59, 60; Neh. vii. 61, 62); and inheritances could not pass from tribe to tribe. These were sufficient reasons why the genealogies are found in the sacred records. And, when the reasons ceased, no more genealogies were detailed. The Aaronic priesthood came to an end; the tribes were carried into captivity; and their land was given to strangers: Messiah was come, all promise being fulfilled in him, for it was 'evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah' (Heb. vii. 14); and therefore we have in the New Testament only the genealogy of Christ recorded.

The genealogy of Christ is twice given, by St. Matthew (i. 1-17), and by St. Luke (iii. 23-38). But there is a remarkable variation. For, though so far as David it is the same, yet from David two lines diverge, two names alone occupying a place in both.

Hence there has been endless debate; and, because so many have persisted in regarding one as the line of our Lord's ancestry by his reputed father, and the other that by his real mother, attempts, always unsuccessful, have been made to force the two into accordance. For the appearance of Zerubbabel and Salathiel in each line was perplexing, on the principle adopted perplexing in the extreme. It might, indeed, be assumed that the genealogies were not in reality discordant: they were, we might say, extracted from the public registers; and the sacred historians, as men of common sense, would not load their cause with a contradiction, which if real must inflict most serious discredit on them. But the question is not to be put aside in this manner. And there is one plain solution of the difficulty, sanctioned from very early times, and grounded on reasons so satisfactory, that it is matter of surprise that any other should have been resorted to. According to this the genealogies are both of Joseph, the oneshowing him legal successor to the throne of David; his personal pedigree supplying the material of the other. If it be objected that Christ ought to be proved David's son through his real mother, it must be replied that on Jewish principles it was quite sufficient for Christ to be born of one who, by her marriage with David's descendant, had acquired a right to be counted of the royal line. But yet, as we shall see, there is a very high probability, amounting well-nigh to certainty, that Mary was by blood as well as by marriage of that line.

Now let it be remembered that there are very strong denunciations against both Jehoiachin and Jehoiakim (Jer. xxii. 30, xxxvi. 30). It is not easy to suppose that either of them could be a progenitor of Messiah. We should rather imagine that any children they might have would be cut off without continuing the royal line. And, if this were so, Solomon's house falling, the next heir to David's throne would be David's descendant through some other of his sons. It is thus, then, that Salathiel and Zerubbabel, the posterity of Nathan, are brought into the regal line and placed in succession to Jehoiachin. Still the regal line and Joseph's actual genealogy separate again. But it only requires one or two very natural suppositions to bring the closing parts into harmony. For if, as there can be little doubt, the Matthan of St. Matthew is the Matthat of St. Luke brought into the succession as Salathiel was, we have but to believe that Jacob and Heli were both his sons. And then, if Jacob had no sons, but only daughters, and Joseph, Heli's son, married one of these—very reasonable suppositions—then he became, on the principle of St. Matthew's table, also Jacob's son, the heir in succession as Jacob had been. And, if, once more, the daughter he married was the Virgin Mary, Mary and Joseph would be, in that case, first cousins in the line which had the right of succession to the throne; and thus the birth of our Lord would be fully complete both in respect to consanguinity and relationship to the throne. It must not be forgotten that the Jews were in the habit of making inheritance and blood-relationship go together; so that the marriage under the circumstances supposed would be entirely natural. It may be added, that it is implied that Mary, as well as Joseph, was of David's line, by its being necessary for her, as well as for him, to go to Beth-lehem at the enrolment. It is further deserving of notice that, though we read of Mary's sister, we read of no brother belonging to her; and this, if not positive evidence, at least favours negatively the explanation given.

As to the omission of certain generations by St. Matthew, it was a common practice with the Jews to arrange genealogies in divisions, each consisting of some particular number; and for this they did not hesitate to repeat or to leave out generations.

There are pedigrees of the house of David in 1 Chron. iii. Lord A. C. Hervey has carefully examined these, and has shown that, by rectifying a transcriber's error, remarkable confirmation is given to the genealogies of the New Testament. But for details the reader must be referred to his valuable work on the Genealogies of Our Lord Jesus Christ.

GENERAL (1 Chron. xxvii. 34). See ARMY, CAPTAIN. The captain of the host or commander-in-chief is here intended.

GENERATION. This word, the rendering of more than one original term, is variously used in our version of scripture. It sometimes signifies a history or family descent. Thus in Gen. ii. 4 it implies the history of the origin of the heavens and of the earth; in v. 2, vi. 9; Matt. i. 1 the genealogical record of Adam, &c. Sometimes it means those living at any given time (Psal. xc. 10; Matt. xxiv. 34, where, however, comparing xii. 45, some have understood, and perhaps rightly, the Jewish nation; Luke xi. 29-32; Heb. iii. 10); hence a class of persons (Prov. xxx. 11-14; Acts ii. 40; 1 Pet. ii. 9); or those of a like quality (Psal. xiv. 5); men of the same disposition and pursuits (Luke xvi. 8), where our Lord intended to say that the generation or class of the worldly take more care for what they deem their own interest than the generation or class of the children of light. The word in Isal. liii. 8 has been variously interpreted, 'eternal production,' 'length' or 'manner of life,' 'posterity,' &c., but perhaps it may be understood here as above, 'contemporaries': the generation in which Messiah lived was of that evil character that tongue could scarcely describe their depravity (see Henderson, Isaiah, note on liii. 8).

The term is also sometimes supposed to signify a definite time, according to our usage, when we call thirty or thirty-three years a generation. But it seems better to interpret Gen. xv. 16 literally of descents. Moses, and Aaron, and others who went out of Egypt, were the fourth generation from Jacob. To many, however, of their contemporaries, there were more links in the chain. Between Nahshon, prince of Judah in the wilderness, and Jacob, five intervened; between Joshua and Jacob eleven (1 Chron. vi. 22-27) Moses and Aaron, too, had children, and Aaron probably a grandson, born before the exodus. Still there were those, as above shown, of the fourth generation from Jacob, who actually went out. The reader will find this topic discussed, with a reply to recent objections, in Birks' Exodus of Israel, chap. iv. pp. 32-47.

Of descent the word must also be understood in Gen. 1. 23; Deut. xxiii. 2, 3, 8; it is used indefinitely in xxxii. 7; Psal. xc. 1, c. 5.

GEN'ESIS, THE BOOK OF. The first of the five books into which the Pentateuch is now divided, so called from its Greek title in the Septuagint version; the word signifying generation or production. By the Jews it is usually termed Berëshith ('in the beginning'), that being its initial word.

Genesis is divided in Hebrew bibles into twelve perashioth or larger sections, and forty-three sedarim or shorter sections: with us it is distributed into fifty chapters. Various other divisions have been proposed. Thus Kurtz (Die Einheit der Genesis, pp. lxvii., lxviii.) supposes that after an introduction (i. ii. 3) it contains ten sections, each with a special and similar heading, 'These are the generations,' or 'This is the book of the generations.' They are the generations (1) of the heaven and the earth (ii. 4-iv. 26); (2) of Adam (v. 1-vi. 8); (3) of Noah (vi. 9-ix. 29); (4) of the sons of Noah (x. 1-xi. 9); (5) of Shem (xi. 10-26); (6) of Terah (xi. 27-xxv. 11); (7) of Ishmael (xxv. 12-18); (8) of Isaac (xxv. 19-xxxv. 29); (9) of Esau (xxxvi.); and (10) of Jacob (xxxvii. 1-1. 26). This distribution illustrates the plan and unity of the book. But perhaps, with reference to the scope and purpose, which is to exhibit the foundation of the theocracy afterwards established, and to describe the origin of God's church in the world, which, placed upon the firm rock of primary promise, shall be gradually tried, and beautified, and glorified in a happier state than man forfeited by the fall, we may regard Genesis as comprising two parts. I. The early history and genealogies of mankind (i.-xi. 26) including, from the creation to the flood, man's formation and settlement in paradise (i., ii.), his fall and expulsion (iii.), the state of the antediluvian world (iv. 1-vi. 8), the flood and restoration of the world (vi. 9-ix. 29); from the flood to the call of Abraham, the genealogy of nations (x.), the confusion of tongues, and the line of descent from which the chosen race should come (xi. 1-26). II. The early history of that race (xi. 27-1. 26), under three leading patriarchs: Abraham, detailing his call and the limitation of the promise in his son Isaac (xi. 27-xxv. 18)—Isaac (xxv. 19-xxxviii. 9)—Jacob, including his family history, into which is introduced a notice of Isaac's death, and of the posterity of Esau (xxxv. 28-xxxvi. 43), and the descent into Egypt, with some supplementary particulars to the death of Joseph (xxviii. 10-1. 26).

Many modern critics have employed themselves in trying to detect a mythical element in the book of Genesis, as if its statements, particularly the earlier ones, conveyed truth only in an allegorical form; and in dissecting its style in order to show that it is not the work of a single historian, but a mere aggregate of documents, separate traditions of primeval story put together without much skill or exact precision.

The ground of the first is a reluctance to admit the supernatural. Events are assumed to be the mere sequence of natural causes; and the writer who mentions the active working of the Deity is thought either in his ignorance to have transformed the wonderful into the miraculous, or, if better informed, to have consulted the taste of his age by investing very common occurrences with a mythic colouring, and thus to have produced mere 'unhistoric' legend. It is not explained why a prose history, for the most part plain and straight-forward which can be tested, and has been shown, by the accounts given of manners, scenery, climate, natural productions, to contain literal truth, should from time to time suddenly interweave incredible stories. The ordinary rule is that, if a witness is accepted so far as he can be confirmed, credit is extended to him even where corroborative proof cannot be obtained. And therefore we do not hesitate to receive Genesis as a record of facts, careful only not, by a wrong interpretation, to make the writer speak our own notions rather than what his words properly expounded would really mean. Many who regard this book, and others of scripture, as embodying legends, profess at the same time great reverence for them, and will not allow the rejoinder that no creditable person would write legend as if it were truth, or introduce himself to his readers in grave composition as other than he really was. We must not be afraid of the offence so taken, but must hold to the solid maxim, that, if the supernatural element we find in a record claiming God's authority, proves to be only legend, such claim is false in fact, and also in intention, and is therefore deserving of the highest moral blame. Even ignorance with such pretensions would be no excuse. This topic cannot be pursued here. For some notice of the literal truth of the earlier chapters of Genesis see CREATION, and for the vindication generally of supernatural power see MIRACLE.

Critics, moreover, have attempted to dismember Genesis, as if it were the inartificial combination of two or more distinct writers. If this meant merely that the author had made use of previously-existing truthful documents, no valid objection could be urged. Such documents are introduced by several of the sacred penmen into their respective books. But it is further assumed that each distinct writer had his own purpose and predilections, and has fashioned his narrative, not according to truth, but according to his particular temperament and ruling notions. Dr. Hupfeld, in his Quellen der Genesis, is one of the most noted critics who has so amused himself. He dissects the book of Genesis after a marvellous fashion, and finds, as he believes, additional writers cropping out in places least suspected. No learning could justify such rash presumption. Dr. Hupfeld's mode of proceeding is in some degree exposed in Horne's Introduction. vol. ii. edit. Ayre, pp

580, 583-587, 605. It is remarkable that, generally speaking, the critics who propose to dismember Genesis do not by any means agree together. They imagine two principal writers; but portions, that some confidently ascribe to the one, others equally sagacious as confidently ascribe to the other. Of this subject little more can be said here; and the reader must be referred to the article on the PENTATEUCH.

The unity of Genesis may be successfully defended. Even if it be granted, as above said, that early documents were used, yet it was a master-hand that, under divine guidance, moulded them into shape, and developed through the whole one leading idea; so that, as by a golden thread, all the parts are connected, that thread being the thread of promise, inviting the faith of the infant church, and exhibiting the most remarkable proof that the ancient fathers were not content with transitory things. Their faith begat a steady expectation of good to come; and in that faith they died, 'not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth' (Heb. xi. 13). Genesis is an appropriate introduction to Exodus; and it is the key to the rest of the scripture. Without its narratives the mission of the Redeemer could hardly have been comprehended; and therefore very properly may it be said with respect to Genesis, as our Lord said generally, that Moses wrote of him (John v. 46).

Various questions respecting the author and date of this book will be more properly considered elsewhere, in the article already referred to on the Pentateuch.

It may be added that the period of time comprised in the history of Genesis is, according to the vulgar computation, about 2,369 years. Many chronologers, however, would extend this period. See CHRONOLOGY.

Prophecies specially pointing to the Messiah are found in Gen. iii. 15, xii. 3, xviii. 18, xxii. 18, xxvi. 4, xxviii. 14, xlix. 10.

GENNESAR, THE WATER OF (1 Macc. xi. 67). The lake of Gennesaret.

GENNESARET, SEA OR LAKE OF. A lake of Palestine (Luke v. 1), called also the 'sea of Chinnereth' (Numb. xxxiv. 11; Deut. iii. 17), 'Chinneroth' (Josh. xi. 2), there being a town called Chinnereth near (xix. 35), 'the sea of Galilee' (Matt. iv. 18; Mark i. 16, vii. 31), and 'the sea of Tiberias' (John vi. 1). In 1 Macc. xi. 67 it is called Gennesar, and it is now Bahr Tubartyeh. This lake is described as not presenting, at least as to its modern aspect, any particular feature of beauty. Anciently it was surrounded by busy cities: vessels crossed its waters: the sights and sounds of life were there. Now it is solitary: the cities are no more: the fishing-vessels have ceased to ply their occupation: the aspect is bleak, and the scenery monotonous. Yet, almost more than to any other spot, do the affections of the Christian heart cling to the lake of Gennesaret. It was by its shores that the divine Redeemer walked: in the towns adjacent to it he lived and taught. He calmed the storms which disturbed it. He brought miraculous draughts of fish from its waters. He selected his apostles from those who dwelt close by it. Most of the deepest recollections of him, apart from his birth and death, are somehow connected with the lake of Gennesaret:—

'How pleasant to me thy deep blue wave,
O sea of Galilee!

For the Glorious One who came to save,
Hath often stood by thee.

* * * * *
It is not that the wild gazelle
Comes down to drink thy tide;
But he that was pierced to save from hell
Oft wandered by thy side.

* * * * *
O Saviour, gone to God's right hand,
Yet the same Saviour still,
Graved on thy heart is this lovely strand,
And every fragrant hill!

McCHEYNE.

The shape of this lake is an irregular oval; the larger end being towards the north: its greatest length is fourteen miles, its greatest breadth nine (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 400); but the dimensions given by other authorities are slightly different. Its level is 652-2 feet below that of the Mediterranean. It is therefore a deep basin, formed most likely by volcanic agency, through which the Jordan flows, entering the lake on the north, quitting it at its southern extremity. The cliffs by the shores are mostly of a hard porous basalt. The banks on the east are nearly 2,000 feet above the waters, being the huge buttress-walls of the table-land of Bashan. The heat is great along the shores; but the waters are cool, sweet, and abound with fish. Like other mountain-lakes it is often suddenly and violently agitated with winds (Matt. viii. 23-27).

A district adjoining to the lake is called the 'land of Gennesaret' (xiv. 34; Mark vi. 53). Some abortive attempts have been made to identify this with a plain on the north-eastern shore; but, as the miracle of feeding the 5,000 was performed on the eastern side of the water, and as our Lord, with his disciples, afterwards crossed to the other side, there can be no reasonable doubt that the district intended is that now called el-Ghuweir, between Khan Minyeh and Mejdal. Josephus describes it as of marvellous beauty, and exceeding fruitfulness (Bell. Jud., lib. iii. 9, § 8). But it is now waste, and, as Dr. Thomson says, 'pre-eminently fruitful in thorns.' It is, according to the same author, somewhat more than thirty furlongs in length, and not quite twenty broad. In summer and spring it is watered by various streams, which in summer are dry (pp. 347, 348).

GENNEUS (2 Macc. xii. 2).

GENTILES. The Hebrew word goyim (plur.), often rendered 'nations,' is occasionally used geographically, in a more or less indefinite sense, as in Gen. x. 5, where lands in the far west are intended. But it generally signified those who were not Hebrews; and, as they were aliens from the worship, rites, and privileges of Israel, the word acquired a hostile meaning. Gentiles were those whom Jews disliked and accounted as profane, incapable of God's favour. In Josh. xii. 23 the original might be more properly rendered 'the king of the Gentiles at Gilgal,' where, Gesenius remarks, apparently Gentiles had settled down among the Hebrews. 'Galilee of the nations,' or of the Gentiles (Isai. ix. 1; Matt. iv. 15), the same critic interprets 'the circle of the Gentiles,' i.e. the district inhabited mostly by Gentiles, especially by the neighbouring Phœnicians. The Greek word ethnē (plur.) is used for Gentiles in Rom. xi. 13; Eph. iii. 1, 6; so also hellenē (plur. hellenēs), Greek or Greeks, very often indicated Gentiles, that is, those who were not Hebrews. In some places, indeed, it occurs in its proper sense (Acts xvi. 1, 3, xviii. 17; Rom. i. 14), but more generally, even when our translators render it 'Greeks' (e.g., Rom. ii. 9, 10; comp. x. 12, marg.), it has the wider signification. The disciples of Christ, being Jews, inherited the national dislike to Gentiles; and it was with astonishment that they learned that 'God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life' (Acts xi. 18). See HEATHEN.

GENU'BATH (theft). The son of Hadad, an Edomite of the royal family, by the sister of Tahpenes, the king of Egypt's wife (1 Kings xi. 20).

GE'ON (Ecclus. xxiv. 27). The river of Eden, Gihon.

GE'RA (a grain, seed, or berry).—1. A son or, more probably, grandson of Benjamin (Gen. xli. 21; 1 Chron. viii. 3, 5, 7). It is likely that but a single person is spoken of in these places, a grandson of Benjamin: had Gera been a son of the patriarch, he would doubtless have been named in Numb. xxvi. 38-40, as head of a family. The genealogy in 1 Chron. viii. 1-7 is confused; and possibly there may be some transcriber's error. Or Gera, Benjamin's son, may have died young and childless; and there may have been a grandson of the same name.—2. The father of Ehud (Judges iii. 15).—3. The father of Shimei (2 Sam. xvi. 5, xix. 16; 1 Kings ii. 8). Lord A. C. Hervey is inclined to believe Nos. 2 and 3 identical with No. 1, the common ancestor of Ehud and Shimei.

GE'RAH (id.). See MEASURES.

GE'RAR (a lodging-place). A city and territory of the Philistines, which had at a very early period a king named Abimelech, perhaps the regular title of its chiefs (Gen. x. 19, xx. 1, 2). It is possible that this district might be the birth-place of Isaac. Abraham sojourned here, as also Isaac, and both committed the sin of denying their wives in Gerar. Both, too, made a treaty with the reigning sovereign, after departing from Gerar, to dwell in Beer-sheba. Amid the simple habits of nomad life such a repetition of events is not improbable (xx., xxi. 22-24, xxvi.). Gerar was a fertile country; for there Isaac reaped a hundred-fold. The exact limits of its territory it is not possible to ascertain; but it lay to the south of Gaza, extending, it would seem, almost to Beer-sheba. It was the point to which Asa pursued the Ethiopians; and the expressions then used prove it to have been a rich pastoral country (2 Chron. xiv. 12-15). The valley of Gerar has been thought to be the modern Wady es-Sheriah; and some travellers have found traces of an ancient city near. Mr. Wilton has investigated the matter with much care. He believes that the country of Gerar reached far to the south; as the settlements of the Philistines were certainly in earlier times to the south of the districts they subsequently occupied along the sea-coast. The metropolis, to which Isaac first went, he admits may have been at Khirbet el-Gerar, three hours south-south-east of Gaza; but the 'valley of Gerar,' to which he retired at Abimelech's suggestion, he believes to be the modern Wady el-Jerar, much more to the south. There are indications here of fertility and ancient tillage (The Negeb, pp. 237-250).

GERGESE'NES (Matt. viii. 28). According to several manuscripts, the right reading in this place is thought to be Gerasenes, i.e. inhabitants of Gerasa, a city not mentioned in scripture, but yet known to be anciently of considerable importance. It was a town in Gilead, now termed Jerash, about twenty miles east of the Jordan, and five miles north of the Jabbok, the modern Zurka. The ruins are very beautiful and extensive: vast numbers of columns still remain, and huge masses of masonry. This place was too far from the lake of Tiberias to be the scene of the miracle described; but, as in its days of prosperity it had a large district attached to it, called by its name (possibly, too, superseding the name derived from Gadara), the spot where the possessed with devils were cured might be in the province. See GADARENES, GADARA: see also Dr. Alford's note on the place.

GERGESITES (Judith v. 16). The Girsashites.

GERZIM (mountain of the Gerzites, dwellers in a shorn or desert land). A mountain in close proximity to Shechem, and opposite to mount Ebal. There is a Samaritan tradition that it was on Gerizim that Abraham was called to offer Isaac; and it is urged, in support of it, that to a traveller journeying from the Philistine plain, Gerizim would be seen afar much more conspicuously than Moriah at Jerusalem, and, further, that there was a Moreh near to Shechem (Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 30). But those most competent to form an opinion are decidedly opposed to the supposition. Dr. Thomson does not believe that Abraham would traverse the Philistine plain on his route, and declares it impossible, the habits of the country considered, that the patriarch, starting from Beer-sheba or near Beer-sheba, could reach Gerizim the third morning (The Land and the Book, p. 475). Besides, the site of the temple was specially called mount Moriah (2 Chron. iii. 1). See MORIAH. There is another tradition, still less trustworthy, that Melchizedek met Abraham on Gerizim. The only shadow of a reason in favour of it is that there is said to be a Shalem or Salem near Shechem; but the Salem of which Melchizedek was king was far more probably Jerusalem.

Passing from the region of conjecture to that of certainty, we find Moses directing that, when Israel had passed into Canaan, they should place a blessing upon mount Gerizim, and a curse upon mount Ebal, six tribes standing upon each, and all the people responding to what the Levites pronounced; an altar, too, being built on Ebal, or, according to the Samaritan Pentateuch, on Gerizim, on which the words were to be written (Deut. xi. 29, 30, xxvii.). This was accordingly done (Josh. viii. 30-35). Some difficulty has been felt in regard to the topographical description of the two mountains as 'in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over-against Gilgal.' But it is very probable that this Gilgal was not the place of the Israelites' early encampment after crossing the Jordan: see GILGAL. Besides, as bp. Patrick observes in his note on Deut. xi. 30, 'it is not said that the mountains were over-against Gilgal, but the dwelling of the Canaanites (in whose country these mountains were) was over-against it:' see EBAL, where some other considerations are urged. It may be added that it was from Gerizim that Jotham addressed his parable to the men of Shechem (Judges vii. 20).

Objections have been made to these statements, as if it were impossible for the human voice to be sufficiently heard. Dr. Thomson has some good remarks on the matter (pp. 473, 474); and a late traveller, Mr. Mills, has effectually settled it. His tent was placed between the mountains, in a spot where he thinks the ark might have stood. He ascended Gerizim, while a friend stood on Ebal. Mr. Mills read out the blessings; and his voice was distinctly heard at the tent, and by his friend on Ebal; who then read the curses with a similar result (see Mills, Three Months' Res. at Nablus, and Account of Mod. Samaritans, pp. 49, &c.).

After the captivity, Sanballat obtained leave from Darius Nothus to erect a temple on Gerizim: here, therefore, the Samaritans worshipped, till their temple was destroyed by Hyrcanus (Prideaux, Connect., vol. i. pp. 358-368, vol. ii. p. 262, edit. 1858). They still, however, had an altar here, and cherished a determined hatred against the Jews (John iv. 20, 21). Of the later history of Gerizim it must be sufficient to say that a Christian church was at one time built on it, that it is still highly venerated by the small remnant of Samaritans, and called Jebel et-Tur.

Dr. Thomson believes the yet-existing ruins to be those of the Samaritan temple; more probably they may be those of the Christian church. They are extensive; the main building being 241 feet from east to west, and 255 from north to south. 'The walls are about six feet thick, and from seven to fifteen feet high. There are no ornamental carvings on any of the stones; but they are well cut, and bevelled after the Jewish or Phœnician manner. On the north there is a lower terrace of the mountain, covered with ruins, as of a village; and west of the main edifice is a smooth plat, now used by the Samaritans for their tents when they go there to celebrate their feasts. For vastness and variety the prospect from this temple is not surpassed by any in Palestine' (pp. 476, 477).

GERRHENIANS (2 Macc. xiii. 24). The inhabitants of Gerar, Gezer, or possibly Gaza.

GER'SHOM (expulsion, according to some, a stranger there).—1. The eldest son of Moses by Zipporah (Exod. ii. 22, xviii. 3). The family of Moses were not elevated above the ordinary Levites (1 Chron. xxiii. 14); hence we find his descendants filling subordinate posts. One of these was probably that Jonathan who was priest in Micah's house of images, and afterwards at Dan (Judges xviii. 30); for the 'Manasseh' named as his ancestor is not unreasonably thought to be Moses. Another was Shebuel, treasurer in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxiii. 15, 16, xxvi. 24).—2. The form in which the name of Gershon, the son of Levi, appears in several places (vi. 16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71, xv. 7).—3. A priest who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 2).

GER'SHON (expulsion). The eldest son of Levi (Gen. xlv. 11; Exod. vi. 16, 17; 1 Chron. vi. 1). Gershon is repeatedly written Gershom. See GERSHOM, 2.

GER'SHONITES. One of the great families of the Levites, descendants of Gershon (Numb. iii. 21, 23, 24, iv. 24, 27, xxvi. 57; Josh. xxi. 33; 1 Chron. xxiii. 7; 2 Chron. xxix. 12). When the census was taken in the wilderness, the number of their males above a month old was 7,500, those between thirty and fifty, 2,630 (Numb. iii. 22, iv. 40). The Gershonites appear to have held the middle rank of the three families of Levites. It was their duty, when the tabernacle was moved, to carry the coverings and hangings (iii. 17-26, iv. 22-28, 38-41, vii. 7, x. 17, xxvi. 57). When they reached Canaan, thirteen cities were allotted to them out of the territory of Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and eastern Manasseh (Josh. xxi. 6, 27-33). Several eminent men were, in later times, of this family, as Asaph (1 Chron. vi. 39-43); and their service was duly arranged in the days of David (xxiii. 7-11).

GER'SON (1 Esdr. viii. 29). Gershom (Ezra viii. 2).

GER'ZITES (1 Sam. xxvii. 8, marg.). See GEZRITES. A connection has been supposed between this tribe and Gerizim, as if they had once occupied the district around that mountain, and had afterwards migrated southwards. But there is no historical trace of this, only a presumption arising from the name.

GE'SEM, THE LAND OF (Judith i. 9). The land of Goshen.

GE'SHAM (filthy). A descendant of Judah, probably of the family of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 47). In several editions of the bible it is more accurately called Geshan.

GE'SHEM (rain). An Arabian, possibly chief of some tribe, or holding some appointment from the Persian king, who united with Sanballat and Tobiah to oppose Nehemiah in re-building the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. ii. 19, vi. 1, 2). He is called Gashmu in vi. 6.

GE'SHUR (a bridge). A small principality of Syria, allotted to the tribe of Manasseh, but not for some time subjected (Josh. xiii. 13). It seems to have formed part of Bashan, a district perhaps of or beyond Argob, bordering on the territory of Damascus. Jair's conquests could scarcely have comprised Geshur (comp. Deut. iii. 14 with 1 Chron. ii. 23); and we find that, in David's time, it was ruled by a petty prince, Talmi, whose daughter David married, and by whom he had Absalom. To his father-in-law's protection Absalom fled after the murder of Amnon (2 Sam. iii. 3, xiii. 37, 38, xiv. 23, 32, xv. 8; 1 Chron. iii. 2).

GESHU'RI.—1. The inhabitants of Geshur (Deut. iii. 14).—2. A tribe bordering on the Philistines to the south (Josh. xiii. 2). The same word appears also as GESHU'RITES.—1. The people of Geshur (Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 11, 13).—2. A tribe of the desert to the south of Palestine, bordering on Arabia and the Philistines (1 Sam. xxvii. 8).

GETHER (dregs?). One of the sons of Aram (Gen. x. 23; 1 Chron. i. 17). The tribes descended from him have not yet been ascertained.

GETHSEM'ANE (oil-press). This was, perhaps, originally a small grange, with a garden attached to it, one of the pleasure-grounds which, in the happier days of the holy city, abounded in the country just outside the walls. Gethsemane must have been beyond the Kidron (John xviii. 1), on the slopes of Olivet (Mark xiv. 26; Luke xxii. 39), a place well known, and where Jesus often resorted with his disciples (Matt. xxvi. 36; Mark xiv. 32; John xviii. 2). It was there that the agony of the passion afflicted the Redeemer, there that he prayed so earnestly to his Father, there that the sweat, like blood-drops, dripped upon the ground.

The place supposed to be Gethsemane is about half-a-mile from the city. 'We descend,' says Bartlett, 'the steep broken path into the valley of the Kidron, and, crossing its dry bed by a small arch, reach a group of singular and venerable objects. First, on our right, is a stony plot of ground, surrounded by a low wall, and enclosing eight olive-trees of very great antiquity . . . supposed to be those of the garden of Gethsemane, a tradition we would not willingly disturb. There is something very impressive in the spot, shady and silent as it is, shut in by the high dead wall of the temple above on one side, and the woody heights of Olivet on the other. The hum of the insect, a distant cry, or occasional foot-fall seem to deepen its profound quietude, which, as Robinson remarks, is almost like the loneliness and stillness of the desert. Through an opening in the trees is seen the angle of the wall, hanging above the sepulchral valley of Jehoshaphat, whose melancholy cliffs close in the view. The trees themselves reminded me of the celebrated cedars of Solomon on mount Lebanon, in the disproportionate hugeness of their venerable trunks to the thin foliage above. For ages the pilgrim has knelt and kissed them with tears, carrying thence a few of the scattered fruit, or a portion of the bark, to remind him of the spot where, for his salvation, the soul of his Redeemer "was so rowful even unto death." And, though there may be nothing which establishes this as the exact site of the garden of Gethsemane more than any other place in the immediate neighbourhood, yet there is, perhaps, no instance in which the pious feeling that led the early Christians to fix every trace of the Redeemer's footsteps has so nearly lighted on the actual locality as here; while the character of the spot is such as powerfully to impress the imagination. To him, indeed, who has once sat beneath the shadow of these trees, there is scarcely any scene which is more deeply traced in his memory, clothed in its peculiar indescribable mournfulness. Immediately opposite to this group of trees is a descent, by steps, to the singularly-picturesque front of an extensive cavern, originally an important sepulchre, in latter ages called "The Tomb of the Virgin" (Walks about Jerusalem, pp. 98, 99). Just adjoining this cavern is another, called 'The Grotto of Gethsemane.' Dr. Thomson is not disposed to admit the spot described to be really Gethsemane. 'When I first came to Jerusalem,' he says, 'and for many years afterwards, this plot of ground was open to all whenever they chose to come and meditate beneath its very old olive-trees. The Latins, however, have, within the last few years, succeeded in gaining sole possession, have built a high wall around it. . . . The Greeks have invented another site a little north of it. . . . My own impression is that both are wrong. The position is too near the city, and so close to what must have always been the great thoroughfare eastward, that our Lord would scarcely have selected it for retirement on that dangerous and dismal night. In the broad recess north-east of the church of Mary there must have been gardens far larger and more secluded; and . . . it is nearly certain that all the gardens around the city were thrown open, during the great feasts, for the accommodation of the pilgrims; so that he could select the one best adapted to the purpose for which he retired from the crowded city. I am inclined, therefore, to place the garden in the secluded vale several hundred yards to the north-east of the present Gethsemane' (The Land and the Book, p. 634).

GEU'EL (majesty of God). A person of the tribe of Gad, selected as one of the spies (Numb. xiii. 15).

GE'ZER (a steep place). One of the ancient cities of Canaan, which Joshua took (Josh. x. 33, xii. 12). It lay upon the western border of the tribe of Ephraim, to whom it was given, but was not at once thoroughly subdued (xvi. 3, 10; Judges i. 29; 1 Chron. vii. 28). Yet it was a Levitical city (Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Chron. vi. 67). It is named as the point to which David on one occasion pursued the Philistines (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chron. xiv. 16); and, possibly having revolted, or still being held by the Canaanites, it was destroyed by Pharaoh, and given up to Solomon, who fortified it as an important post (1 Kings ix. 15-17). In Maccabean times it was known by the name of Gazera.

Its site has not been exactly identified; but it is evident that it must have been beyond the lower Beth-horon towards the sea (Josh. xvi. 3). Once it is named as the same with Gob (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chron. xx. 4), and twice it is called Gazer (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chron. xiv. 16).

GEZRITES. A tribe on whom David made incursions while resident in Philistia (1 Sam. xxvii. 8). They are called also Gerzites. It is not easy to identify them. Gezer was too far north.

GHOST. See SPIRIT.

GHOST, HOLY. See HOLY GHOST.

GI'AH (breaking forth, i. e. of a fountain). A place named (2 Sam. ii. 24) to indicate the position of the hill of Ammah.

GIANT. There is repeated mention in scripture of individuals and races of extraordinary stature. We find them noticed prior to the deluge, as generated by those 'sons of God' who came in unto the daughters of men, a fierce and depraved race—nephilim they are called—who had filled the earth with violence, and, by their ungodliness, provoked the awful judgment which followed (Gen. vi. 1-7). There have been various speculations as to the true meaning of this account: for some brief notice see SONS OF GOD.

In after-times we have mention of the Rephaim, noted first in xiv. 5, of whom Og king of Bashan is said to have been a solitary remnant (Deut. iii. 11); see REPHAIM. The Anakim were also a gigantic tribe; and they inspired the unfaithful spies with such terror, that they describe them in exaggerated terms: 'We saw the children of Anak there.' 'We saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants; and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so were we in their sight' (Numb. xiii. 28, 33). These people must, however, have been of remarkable size, as we find that their names had passed into a proverb (Deut. ii. 10, 11; ix. 2). Mr. Drew's note (Scripture Lands, pp. 77, 78) on this subject is worthy attention. 'Judging,' he says, 'from mummies, the figures of the ancient Egyptians were slight; and their stature averaged about 5½ feet. The contrast between them and the robust descendants of the giant settlers in Hebron would strike the people with the same impression that the traveller from Egypt, who comes into Palestine across the desert, now feels when he finds himself surrounded by the groups of stalwart men of Dhohireyeh.' At the time of the Israelitish conquest of Canaan, as previously, the Anakim were settled in the neighbourhood of Hebron, divided probably into three clans (Numb. xiii. 22), and were extirpated by Joshua, with the exception of some few of the race, who lingered in certain Philistine cities (Josh. xi. 21, 22, xiv. 12-15; Judges i. 20). There were also other gigantic tribes, as the Emims in the region of Moab (Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 10, 11), and the Zuzims, or Zamzumims, in the country of Ammon (Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 20). Individual descendants of the Anakim were Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 4), whose height was six cubits and a span (upwards of ten feet), Ishbi-benob, Saph or Sippai, Lahmi, and another not named, all slain by David and his warriors (2 Sam. xxi. 15-22; 1 Chron. xx. 4-8).

The accounts of gigantic tribes have been supposed to be confirmed by the discovery of vast bones. Modern science, however, has generally proved these bones to be the remains of animals, not of men. And, so far as research has gone, ancient tombs, mummies, armour, &c., give evidence that, from the earliest historic ages, the ordinary size of the human race has been nearly the same. But the existence of certain tall tribes is neither incredible nor improbable: indeed, we know on the surest evidence that, according to climate, there is a variety in the sizes of men; the natives of the extreme north, as the Laplanders and Esquimaux, being diminutive, while those of other regions—the Patagonians, for example, and other tribes of South America—though not so gigantic as they were once represented, are remarkably tall. Tallness of stature is often found to run in families; and there are plenty of examples within modern memory of individuals attaining the extraordinary height of seven or even eight feet. See ANAKIMS.

GIB'BAR (a warrior). One whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 20). In the corresponding list (Neh. vii. 25) the name is Gibeon. It is likely that the well-known city is meant.

GIB'BETHON (a height). A city in the territory of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), assigned to the Levites (xxi. 23). It was in the possession of the Philistines after the secession of the ten tribes, probably because the Levites generally quitted their abodes in the rival kingdom to resort to Judah (2 Chron. xi. 13, 14); and it was while besieging it that king Nadab was killed by Baasha (1 Kings xv. 27), and during a later siege that Zimri conspired against Elah (xvi. 8-17).

GIB'EA (hill). A name in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 49). It would seem to denote a place rather than a person: perhaps it was locally within the territory of Judah; but this is uncertain.

GIB'EAH (a hill, a city on a hill). Several towns in Palestine bear this name, distinguished often by some adjunct, as Gibeah of Benjamin, Gibeah of Saul, &c. Similarly among ourselves numerous places bear names compounded with hill, as being upon or near some eminence. So these Israelitish towns stood on or adjacent to some of the low bare rounded hills (for to such the word is specially applied), of which there are many in central Palestine.

1. A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 57). Possibly this may be the Gibeah of the preceding article. It has not yet been certainly identified.

2. Gibeah of Benjamin was a place which acquired a dreadful notoriety in early Israelitish history. It was here that the outrage was committed on the Levite's concubine which caused her death, and led, in consequence of the refusal of the Benjamites to deliver up the guilty persons, to the almost-entire extermination of the tribe (Judges xix., xx.). It must have been a considerable town, for it could furnish 700 men for war, skilled as slingers, able to use either hand indifferently. Its site was a little north of Jerusalem; for the Levite, who quitted Beth-lehem in the afternoon, and was over-against Jebus or Jerusalem when the day was far spent, had yet time to reach either Gibeah or Ramah by sunset. Gibeah, therefore, may be identified with the modern Tuleil el-Fâl, on a conspicuous hill about four miles north of Jerusalem, and in full view of er-Ram, the ancient Ramah, two miles away. When Gibeah re-appears in the history it is called Gibeah of Saul (1 Sam. x. 26, xi. 4); the place of Saul's abode when chosen king, and where he received the intelligence of the danger of Jabesh-gilead; and it seems to have continued to be his residence during his whole reign (xv. 34, xxii. 6, xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1; 2 Sam. xxi. 6). It is again Gibeah of Benjamin in the narrative of Jonathan's exploit. Saul had mustered 3,000 men, with 2,000 of whom he occupied Michmash and the range of heights towards Beth-el; while Jonathan held the ancestral home, Gibeah, with 1,000. The first event which roused the Philistines was the destruction by Jonathan of some monumental pillar they had placed in Geba; and they mustered in force. Saul then retired to Gibeah, effecting a junction with Jonathan there; while the Philistines occupied his former position at Michmash. The bold attack on them by Jonathan and his armour-bearer, which resulted in a panic and their total defeat, is narrated at length by the sacred writer (1 Sam. xiii., xiv.). Little more notice is taken of Gibeah, save that its ancient guilty history is occasionally referred to (Hos. ix. 9, x. 9). Gibeah of Benjamin and Gibeah of Saul have been treated here as identical. And, in truth, there can be little doubt of this. If proof were wanting, it is supplied by Josephus, who places Gabath-saoule just at the point where Gibeah of Benjamin must have stood (Bell. Jud., lib. v. 2, § 1). See Robinson's Bibl. Res., 2nd edit., vol. i. pp. 577-579.

3. Gibeah-in-the-field. A place mentioned only once by this name (Judges xx. 31). It appears that a little to the north of Gibeah of Benjamin the road divided: one way led to Beth-el, the other to this Gibeah-in-the-field. Now to the north of Tuleil el-Fâl the road still divides; one way leading to Beitin, Beth-el, the other to Jeba, Geba. There can be little doubt, then, that Gibeah-in-the-field is Geba; Gibeah and Geba being sometimes interchanged in the original. The relative positions of Geba and Gibeah are indicated in Isai. x. 29.

4. The place where the house of Abinadab was where the ark was left (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4). But the word should have been translated: it was 'the hill of Kirjath-jearim,' where Abinadab's residence was. See GIBEATH.

There are some other places where the word Gibeah occurs in the original, but where our translators have rendered it into English 'hill.' In some of these perhaps it would have been better to treat it as a proper name. See a list in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 692.

GIB'EAH-HAARA'LOTH (hill of the fore-skins). A place so called because the children of Israel were circumcised there (Josh. v. 3, marg.). See GILGAL.

GIB'EATH (hill). A city enumerated among those allotted to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28). It is often supposed to be identical with Gibeah of Saul; but Mr. Grove, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, urges that, if such were the case, it would have been grouped with Gibeon and Ramah, close to which places Gibeah stood, rather than with Jerusalem. He imagines that it is rather Gibeah of Kirjath, i. e. the hill of Kirjath, afterwards mentioned in connection with the preservation of the ark, in Abinadab's house (1 Sam. vii. 1; 2 Sam. vi. 3, 4). If, however, this be admitted, the number of cities (fourteen) assigned to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28) is not made up. But this may not be a fatal objection.

GIB'EATHITE. An inhabitant of Gibeah (1 Chron. xii. 3).

GIB'EON (belonging to a hill, i. e. hill-city). A large and noted city of the Hivites, whose inhabitants obtained terms of peace by craft from Joshua and the Israelites. It seems to have been the capital of a district with other cities—four of them are mentioned—dependent on it (Josh. ix. 3-27) Joshua, though he spared the lives of the people, yet reduced them to servitude. He did not, however, refuse to defend them when the neighbouring kings resolved to punish them for their submission to Israel. And this gave occasion to the most remarkable battle of the war (x). In the division of the country, Gibeon was in the lot of Benjamin (xviii. 25), and was afterwards assigned to the priests (xxi. 17).

Many notable events are connected with this city. It was at Gibeon, 'by the pool,' that the battle was fought in which Abner killed Asahel (2 Sam. ii. 12-24, iii. 30), and 'at the great stone' in Gibeon that Joab assassinated Amasa (xx. 8-10). Saul oppressed and slew some of the Gibeonites, his family probably taking part in the crime: it was therefore visited upon his house by the execution of seven of his sons (xxi. 1-9). We are not told when Saul's cruelty occurred; but his family seem to have been intimately connected with the place; and one of his ancestors colonized it (1 Chron. viii. 29-33, ix. 35-39). Hence, though his zeal for the children of Israel is mentioned, some personal less worthy motive may have intermingled. In David's reign we find the tabernacle at Gibeon, and Zadok ministering there (1 Chron. xvi. 39, 40, xxi. 29). The ark was in the city of David, but the altar of burnt-offering was at Gibeon; and thither most likely Joab fled, and was there put to death, where one of his murders had been committed (1 Kings ii. 28-34). To Gibeon Solomon went to sacrifice; on which occasion the Lord appeared to him in a dream, and gave him his choice of a boon: the young king asked wisdom (iii. 4-15, ix. 2; 2 Chron. i. 3-12). The false prophet Hananiah was of Gibeon (Jer. xxviii. 1); and it was there that Johanan overtook Ishmael after the murder of Gedaliah (xli. 12). Men of Gibeon returned from the Babylonish captivity (Neh. iii. 7, vii. 25); but the name is Gibbar in Ezra ii. 20.

There is no difficulty in identifying Gibeon. It is the modern el-Jib, a village on a rocky hill five or six miles to the north of Jerusalem, a little west of the main north road. There are large remains of ancient buildings, testifying to its former importance. It is well supplied with water; for there is a copious fountain in the vale south-east of the village, and a considerable pond (in the wet season) in the plain below. This was probably the 'pool' where Joab and Abner fought, and the 'great waters' where Johanan came up with Ishmael. Dr. Thomson supposes it to be 'the sea' mentioned as the frontier of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 14); see The Land and the Book, pp. 669, 670. The hill where 'the great high-place' was can only be conjectured.

GIB'EONITES. The inhabitants of Gibeon (2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 3, 4, 9; 1 Chron. xii. 4; Neh. iii. 7: comp. Jer. xxviii. 1). Although cursed and reduced to servitude, this was eventually a sacred cast; as they were employed about the sanctuary. Hence probably the crime of slaying them was the more aggravated.

GIB'LITES. A people inhabiting the north of Palestine (Josh. xiii. 5; 1 Kings v. 18, marg.). See GEBAL, 2.

GIDDAL'TI (I have trained up). A Levite of the sons of Heman, the head of a division of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 29).

GID'DEL (perhaps too great) 1, 2. Two persons whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 47, 56; Neh. vii. 49, 58).

GID'EON (tree-feller, i. e. impetuous warrior). The son of Joash, of the family of the Abiezrites of the tribe of Manasseh. His place of residence was Ophrah. At a time when Israel was overrun by the Midianites, Gideon was threshing some corn, not on the usual 'floor,' but by a wine-press, that the invaders might not discover and seize it; when an angel appeared to him and announced that the Lord would deliver Israel by his hand. Whether Gideon had ever previously distinguished himself we do not know: most probably not, as he calls himself in his reply the least of his father's house. He at first hesitated to accept the commission, till he was convinced by a remarkable sign that his visitant was an angel. The same night he was commanded, perhaps in a dream, to destroy the altar and symbol of Baal, and to sacrifice a bullock upon an altar he was to build to the Lord. Afraid to do this by day, he did it by night; and the next morning, when the whole was discovered, the people of the city were inclined to put Gideon to death, but were restrained by Joash his father (whom some have imagined to be Baal's priest), with the sarcastic observation that Baal might plead or avenge his own cause. Gideon hence had the name JERUBBAAL, which see (Judges vi. 1-32).

Perhaps some intelligence of the movement had reached the Midianites, for they gathered their armies into the valley of Jezeel; and possibly then it was that they slew Gideon's brethren at Tabor (viii. 18, 19). Stirred up by the Spirit of the Lord, the Hebrew champion blew his trumpet, and was at once joined by the Abiezrites; he summoned also all Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali. Doubts still seemed to trouble him whether he could indeed prevail against the mighty eastern host; and he asked and obtained two encouraging signs from God (vi. 33-40). He was now on march; and he took up his position to the south of the Midianitish camp, by the well Harod, most likely that fountain of Jezeel now called 'Ain Jalud. But his people were too many: the Lord needs no human instrumentality, and would show that it was his mighty hand that defeated Midian. The proclamation was therefore made, according to the law of Moses (Deut. xx. 8), that who- so was faint-hearted might depart 'from mount Gilead.' The expression is perplexing, for the muster was not in Gilead; perhaps, it has been suggested, the chieftain used the war-cry of the tribe: see, however, GILEAD. Two-and-twenty thousand fearful men did withdraw, leaving but 10,000, who were further reduced by trial at the water to 300, to match themselves with the countless thousands that lay swarming below in the valley. Gideon was encouraged, however, afresh by over-hearing one Midianite recount his dream to another, prognosticating defeat to the invaders; and then, having furnished each of his little band, divided into three troops, with a trumpet, and a flambeau in a pitcher, he set upon the sleeping foe. The trumpets pealed: the flambeaux flashed out from the broken pitchers; and above all was heard the startling shout, 'The sword of Jehovah and of Gideon!' The rout was at once complete: there was no thought of resistance; and the Midianites rushed hastily in their terror towards the Jordan. Gideon pursued: the northern tribes gathered and joined him; and Ephraim, to whom he sent, rose and held the fords, and there, routing again the panic-stricken multitude, seized and slew two of their chiefs, Oreb and Zeeb, whose heads they presented to Gideon (vii.). These Ephraimites, however, haughty and jealous, remonstrated with the victor for not having summoned them at first; but he appeased them by a politic answer, and pursued the Midianite remnant eastward. One scarcely knows how to account for the treatment he now received from some of the Israelitish towns on his line of march. They refused him supplies with scornful taunts. He was faint, but he bore bravely on. He came up with the Midianites, who thought themselves in security in the far wilderness, and dashed on them unexpectedly, routed them a third time, took their two kings Zebah and Zalmunna, whom he put to death because they had slain his brethren, and gathered an enormous spoil. Of 120,000, of whom 'the children of the east' originally consisted, but 15,000 escaped—for so, perhaps, the narrative is best interpreted. Gideon now, returning in triumph, inflicted merited punishment on the inhabitants of Succoth and Penuel, GIBBON AND NEBI SAMUEL, FROM N.W.

and declined the offered government of Israel.

Of the share of Midianitish spoil allotted him, he made an ephod, which he placed in his city Ophrah. Doubtless this was an irregular act; but we can hardly suppose, with Gesenius, that by an 'ephod' an idol is here meant. Still it became eventually a snare and a scandal to Gideon's family and to Israel. He had seventy sons, besides one by a concubine. He died at an advanced age, and was buried in the sepulchre of his father. It may be added that after Gideon's victory the land had forty years of quiet (viii.). The memory of his acts was carefully preserved in Israel (1 Sam. xii. 11; Psal. lxxxiii. 11; Isai. ix. 4, x. 26); and Gideon's faith is noted in the New Testament (Heb. xi. 32).

GIDEONI (a cutting down). The father of Abidan, prince of Benjamin in the wilderness (Numb. i. 11, ii. 22, vii. 60, 65, x. 24).

GIDOM (id.). A place to which the pursuit of the Benjamites extended after the battle of Gibeath (Judges xx. 45).

GIER-EAGLE. An unclean bird (Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 17). It is probably supposed to be the Neophron percnopterus, Egyptian vulture, often called Pharaoh's chicken. This is not much larger than a raven, white, with some of the wing-feathers black, foul in its appearance, and preying on carrion. It was anciently a sacred bird in Egypt, and is now protected for the service it does in clearing the soil. But some critics, observing that in the passages referred to the bird in question is classed with the pelican, &c., imagine that one of the Grallatores is intended, and fix upon the Fulica porphyrio, sultana-hen. Duns would identify it with the swan (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. pp. 90, 91). But this is not a happy conjecture.

GIFT. Almost every transaction of eastern life involves a gift. In public affairs and state ceremonials there must be gifts. In alliances, covenants, contracts, there must be the interchange of gifts. Family arrangements and friendly association imply gifts. Examples continually occur in scripture: and various words are used in the original to distinguish the various kinds and occasions of the gifts. There were gifts from superiors to inferiors, as from sovereigns to the subjects they desired to honour (Esth. ii. 18). There were gifts from inferiors to those above them, as to monarchs (Judges iii. 15; 1 Kings x. 25). And not to bring a present when it was expected, as to a king on his inauguration, was the highest affront that could be offered (1 Sam. x. 27). Gifts of this kind were almost taxes. Thus we find the tribute imposed on a conquered nation called 'gifts' (2 Sam. viii. 2). There were gifts on marriages. The bridegroom gave a present besides the dowry (Gen. xxxiv. 12); and the bride's father made a gift to his daughter (1 Kings ix. 16). Gifts were interchanged among friends, especially in times of rejoicing (Neh. viii. 10, 12, Esth. ix. 19, 22). Gifts were offered at visits, especially if at all of a formal character. Thus Saul felt it necessary to make a present to Samuel when he went to consult him (1 Sam. ix. 7, 8; comp. 2 Kings viii. 8). Sometimes, indeed, these presents degenerated into bribes; by which significant word they were then stigmatized, and were strictly forbidden (Exod. xxiii. 8; Isai. i. 23, v. 23). Gifts were of every conceivable kind—jewels, spices, robes, money, &c. (e. g. Gen. xxiv. 22, 53, xliii. 11; 2 Kings v. 22, 23; Job xlii. 11); and they were presented in the most respectful manner possible.

The blessings of the gospel are often termed gifts; as are the special powers communicated by the Spirit (1 Cor. i. 7, xii. 4, 9, 28, 30, 31, and elsewhere). The term is properly applied; as they all proceed from the free mercy of God.

GIHON (a river, as breaking forth from fountains).—1. One of the four rivers of Eden (Gen. ii. 13). See EDEN.—2. A place close by Jerusalem, where Solomon was anointed king (1 Kings i. 33, 38, 45). There must have been some reservoir of water there; for Hezekiah is said to have stopped the upper course of it (2 Chron. xxxii. 30). It is further mentioned as indicating the position of the wall which Manasseh built round the city of David (xxxiii. 14). There are two reservoirs still existing in the valley of Hinnom, called by the Arabs Birket Mammilla and Birket es-Sultan. The first is about 150 rods west of the city, at the head of the valley: it is 300 feet long, 200 wide, and 20 deep, and is dry. The other is in the same valley south of the Jaffagate: it is 600 feet long, 250 broad, and 40 deep. 'The aqueduct from the pools of Solomon passed along west of it, round the north end, then down the east side, and so round Zion to the temple. At some former time a pipe led the water from the aqueduct to an artificial fountain on the top of the south wall of the pool, where it emptied into troughs made of old sarcophagi' (Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 655). These reservoirs are generally designated the upper and lower pools of Gihon. But Mr. Grove, in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, suggests that Gihon must have been at a low level, because persons are said to have gone 'down' to it, that the word rendered 'valley,' in which it is said to stand (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14), is that always used for the valley of Jehoshaphat, never for the valley of Hinnom, and that it is mentioned in conjunction with Ophel; so that it must rather be in the position of Siloam. See CONDUIT, JERUSALEM.

GIL'ALAI (dunghy? according to some, rolled off of the Lord). A priest who played on musical instruments (Neh. xii. 36).

GILBO'A (bubbling fountain). A mountain-range rising on the east of the plain of Esdraelon, over-against Jezreel, where Saul pitched just prior to his last fatal battle with the Philistines (1 Sam. xxviii. 4). His body was found upon the field; and the enemy stripped it and cut off the head, and fastened the corpses of the king and his sons to the wall of Beth-shan. Then it was that the men of Jabesh-gilead, remembering how the first act in the reign now so disastrously closed had been to deliver them from Nahash king of the Ammonites resolved to rescue the bodies. There were bold and loving hearts among them; and they mustered and marched by night to Beth-shan. They were perfectly successful. And they returned to Jabesh, and buried there the royal bones, and fasted reverently seven days (xxxi. ; 2 Sam. xxi. 12-14; 1 Chron. x.). David's beautiful lament over the slain is preserved in 2 Sam. i. 19-27. The range of Gilboa, now Jebel Fukāah, extends above 10 miles, bleak and barren. The height is only about 500 or 600 feet above the plain. A little village, Jelbāu, is still on the top of the mountain. And there is a lofty promontory called el-Mazar, where Dr. Thomson thinks Saul and his sons fell; the name (implying a sacred tomb) to which pilgrimages are made) being given because the daughters of Israel went thither to weep for Saul (The Land and the Book, pp. 462, 463).

GILD, GILDING (Rev. xvii. 4, marg.). See HANDICRAFT.

GIL'EAD (hard, rough).—1. A son of Machir and grandson of Manasseh (Numb. xxvi. 29, 30, xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 1; Josh. xvii. 1, 3; 1 Chron. ii. 21, 23, vii. 14, 17).—2. The father of Jephthah (Judges xi. 1, 2).—3. A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 14).

GIL'EAD (hard stony region? hill of witness?).—1. A district east of the Jordan, first mentioned as 'mount Gilead' (Gen. xxxi. 21, 23, 25, xxxvii. 25): it was afterwards shared between Sihon and Og (Josh. xii. 2, 5), and consequently came into the possession of the Israelites when they subdued those two kings (Deut. iii. 8, 10). It was subsequently distributed among the trans-Jordanic tribes; the portion which had been ruled by Sihon being shared between Reuben and Gad, and the part included in Og's kingdom of Bashan being assigned to Manasseh (12, 13; comp. Josh. xvii. 1).

By a comparison of various passages in which Gilead is noticed, we may pretty exactly ascertain its boundaries. The northern limit must have been the Hieromax or Yarmuk, a stream flowing into the Jordan just below the lake of Gennesaret; for the territory of Gad reached to the edge of that lake; and yet all Bashan was allotted to Manasseh (xiii. 27, 30): the Yarmuk, therefore, must have separated Gilead and Bashan. The Jordan was the western boundary (1 Sam. xiii. 7; 2 Kings x. 33). Gilead probably extended on the east to the country occupied by the Ammonites; and Heshbon was perhaps its southern limit. But a small part of it therefore was included in the territory of Reuben (Porter in Journ. of Sac. Lit., July, 1854, pp. 284, &c.). It may be considered as in length about 60 miles, from nearly the end of the lake of Gennesaret to the north end of the Dead sea, with a breadth of about 20 miles. Sometimes, however, by Gilead is to be understood more loosely the whole of the Israelitish trans-Jordanic territory (Josh. xxii. 9; Judges xx. 1). Among the noted cities of this province may be mentioned Jabesh, Ramoth, Mahanaim, Gadara, and Pella.

Gilead was eminently 'a place for cattle' (Numb. xxxii. 1). The mountains rise from the depressed valley of the Jordan between 3,000 and 4,000 feet: the scenery among them is described as picturesque, often well-wooded, with much excellent pasture-land. The mountain-range runs from north to south; the eastern face being apparently of much lower elevation, because the Arabian plateau into which these hills melt down has an elevation of about 2000 feet. Aromatic balsams or gums seem to have been produced in this district (Jer. viii. 22, xlvii. 11).

It was to be expected from the character of the country, and the views with which it was occupied, that the inhabitants of Gilead would be a rough nomad race. Accordingly we find bold chieftains among them, like Jephthah (Judges xi. 1). It was to Gilead that after Saul's death Abner conveyed Ishbosheth, as sure of support among such a people (2 Sam. ii. 8, 9); and David himself took refuge there in Absalom's rebellion (xvii. 22, 24). Elijah, moreover, was a Gileadite (1 Kings xvii. 1). It was with Gileadites that Pekah rebelled against and slew Pekahiah (2 Kings xv. 25); and not long after Gilead was overrun by the Assyrian king (29). It is now (the northern half) called Jebel Ajlun, the rest the Belka.

The mention of mount Gilead in Judges vii. 3 has created a difficulty, as if there were a mount of that name west of the Jordan. Some critics, therefore, would read Gilboa. But Winer has probably given the true interpretation. It was from mount Gilead that the Midianites had passed over into western Palestine, through mount Gilead they would be driven back: the fearful, therefore, must depart from mount Gilead as likely to be the theatre of war (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Gilead'; but comp. GIDEON).

2. A city so called (Hos. vi. 8), probably Ramoth-gilead. But it may be that the province is intended, 'the whole land banded in one, as one city of evil-doers' (Pusey, Minor Prophets, p. 41).

GIL'EADITES. A family of Manasseh, descendants of Gilead; also inhabitants of the territory Gilead (Numb. xxvi. 29; Judges x. 3, xi. 1, 40, xii. 7; 2 Sam. xvii. 27, xix. 31; 1 Kings ii. 7; 2 Kings xv. 25; Ezra ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63).

GIL'GAL (a rolling away).—1. The place where the Israelites first encamped in Canaan, and where they had for some time their head-quarters. It received its name from the circumcising of the people there, apparently at or near some hill, when the reproach of Egypt is said to have been rolled away (Josh. iv. 19, 20, v. 1-11, ix. 6, x. 6, 7, 9, 15, 43, xiv. 6). Gilgal was at the eastern extremity of the district of Jericho: it must have been near (according to Josephus, fifty stadia, or about six miles away) the Jordan, in the low hot plain. It does not appear that a city was built here; yet Gilgal continued long a place of rendezvous, and perhaps a sanctuary (Judges ii. 1, iii. 19; 1 Sam. vii. 16, x. 8, xi. 14, 15, xiii. 4, 7, 8, 12, 15, xv. 12, 21, 33); and it was here that the men of Judah met David on his return from the country beyond Jordan, after the defeat of Absalom (2 Sam. xix. 15, 40). In later times Gilgal was a seat of idolatry (Hos. iv. 15, ix. 15, xii. 11; Amos iv. 4, v. 5). It may be added that in describing the frontier of Benjamin and Judah it is once called Geliloth (Josh. xv. 7; comp. xviii. 17). The exact site of Gilgal cannot now be identified: it was probably near the present little village of Riha.

—2. A 'king of the nations of Gilgal' is enumerated among the chiefs conquered by Joshua (xii. 23). This has been supposed to be the Galgulis of Jerome, said to be six miles north of Antipatris. Dr. Thomson found a Jiljulieh six miles south of Antipatris (The Land and the Book, p. 524).—3. The Gilgal which Elijah and Elisha visited (2 Kings ii. 1, 2, iv. 38) could not have been that which stood in the low plain of the Jordan; for the prophets are said to have gone down to Beth-el. There is a Jiljilieh about four miles from Beth-el and Shiloh respectively; perhaps that is the site of the place in question. Winer suggests that this may be the Gilgal of Deut. xi. 30 (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Gilgal'). Perhaps also it is that of Neh. xii. 29. But see ERAB.

GIL'LOH (exile). A city in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 51). It was the native place of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12, xvii. 23).

GIL'ONITE. An inhabitant of Giloh; the designation of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12, xxiii. 34).

GIM'ZO (place fertile in sycamores). A city, which with the villages thereof was seized by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). It is now a considerable village called Jimzá, about three miles south-west from Lydd.

GIN (Isai. viii. 14; Amos iii. 5). In both these passages we find 'gin' and 'snare'; but the Hebrew word translated 'gin' in one is rendered 'snare' in the other. The trap-net used consisted of two parts: the net was spread upon the ground, and so fastened with the trap-stick that, if a bird or animal touched the stick, the parts flew up and enclosed the bird in the net, or caught the foot of the animal. Thus the text in Amos may be rendered, 'Doth a bird fall into a net upon the ground, when there is no trap-stick for her? doth the net spring up from the ground and take nothing at all?' Gesenius illustrates Psal. lxxix. 22 from this: the table is the oriental cloth or leather spread upon the ground like a net. 'Gin' occurs in Job xl. 24, marg., where the word signifying the trap-stick is used: it must mean a ring or hook in the nostrils.

GIN'ATH (protection, garden). The father of Tibni, who, after the death of Zimri, was Omri's rival for the throne of Israel (1 Kings xvi. 21, 22).

GIN'NETHO (gardener). A priest who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 4).

GIN'NETHON (id.). A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 6). A representative of his in the time of Joiakim is also mentioned (xii. 16). He is probably the same with Ginnetho.

GIRDLE. An article of both male and female attire. The common girdle was of leather, sometimes studded with metal bosses (2 Kings i. 8; Matt. iii. 4). Girdles of a finer kind were of linen, or perhaps cotton or silk, embroidered occasionally with gold (Jer. xiii. 1; Ezek. xvi. 10; Dan. x. 5; Rev. i. 13, xv. 6). The girdle was fastened with a clasp, or sometimes tied in a knot, the ends hanging down. It was worn about the loins (Isai. v. 27, xi. 5); hence to gird up the loins, confining the ordinary flowing dress (Job xxxviii. 3; Luke xii. 35; 1 Pet. i. 13), signifies to be ready for active service; and the loosening of the girdle (Isai. v. 27) implies remissness. The girdle of the women was worn more loosely than that of the men, and was generally more highly ornamented. The 'head-bands' (iii. 20) were possibly girdles. The same word occurs rendered 'attire,' that is bridal attire, in Jer. ii. 32. Also the word translated 'stomacher' (Isai. iii. 24) has been thought to be a costly girdle; though other critics believe it an embroidered festive garment or mantle. In the military girdle the sword or dagger was suspended (Judges iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Psal. xlv. 3); ink-horns, also, were carried in them (Ezek. ix. 2); and they were used as pockets or purses (Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8; where the original word is literally 'girdle').

There was a girdle attached to the priestly ephod, of the same materials with the ephod itself (Exod. xxviii. 8, xxxix. 5); and another girdle to be worn over the 'coat of fine linen' (xxviii. 39, 40, xxxix. 29). This was of needle-work. It is said to have been of delicately-fine texture, embroidered with flowers of scarlet, purple, blue, and fine linen. It was four fingers broad, and went several times round the body, the ends hanging down to the feet, or, when the priest was sacrificing, thrown over his left shoulder (Joseph., Antiq., lib. iii. 7, § 2). According to some Jewish authorities, the girdle common to all the priests was of white linen, embroidered with wool; that of the high priest, on the day of atonement, entirely of linen. It was worn just under the arm-pits to check perspiration. Girdles were made by women (Prov. xxxi. 24), and often given as presents (1 Sam. xviii. 4; 2 Sam. xviii. 11).

The word is not unfrequently used with a symbolical meaning (Isai. xi. 5; Eph. vi. 14).

GIR'GASHITES (dwelling in clayey or loamy soil). A tribe descended from Canaan, and repeatedly mentioned as one of the doomed nations of the country called after him (Gen. x. 16, where Girgashite, xv. 21; Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10, xxiv. 11; 1 Chron. i. 14; Neh. ix. 8). Their locality is nowhere distinctly indicated; but they are named in such a connection that we may suppose them to have inhabited the central part of western Palestine.

GIR'GASITE (Gen. x. 16). The Girgashites.

GIS'PA (caress, flattery). One of the rulers of the Nethinim after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 21).

GIT'TAH-HE'PHER (wine-press of the well) (Josh. xix. 13). See GATH-HEPHER.

GIT'TAIM (two wine-presses). A town probably in Benjamin, of which we are only told that the Beerothites fled thither (2 Sam. iv. 3), and that it was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 33).

GITTITES. The inhabitants of Gath (Josh. xiii. 3; 2 Sam. xxi. 19; 1 Chron. xx. 5). The term is applied also to the 600 men who came with David back into Israel after his residence at Gath. Many of these were doubtless Hebrews; as 600 seems to have been the strength of David's little army before he went to Achish (1 Sam. xxiii. 13, xxv. 13, xxvii. 2). But certainly some were natives of Gath, who must be supposed to have joined him there; for Ittai is addressed as a stranger and exile (2 Sam. xv. 18-22, xviii. 2). Obed-edom, in whose house the ark was placed, is also called a Gittite (vi. 10, 11; 1 Chron. xiii. 13). It seems improbable that the ark should be intrusted to a Philistine; it has been therefore imagined that Obed-edom belonged to Gittaim or Gath-hepher.

GIT'TITH (a stringed instrument?) This has been supposed to be a musical instrument brought from Gath. Another supposition is that it denoted a song sung at the time of vintage; this meaning being derived from the signification of the word Gath, which is a wine-press. It is impossible to speak with certainty; but probably an air, light and joyous, rather than an instrument, is intended. The word is found in the titles of Psalms viii., lxxxi., lxxxiv.

GIZONITE. An appellation given to Hahshem, father of certain of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 34). Why he is so called can only be conjectured.

GLASS. The manufacture of this substance was known at a very early period. 'Glass bottles of elegant design have been met with in Egyptian monuments more than 4,000 years old; and in the paintings of Beni Hassan are depicted the various processes of glass-blowing, as practised nearly forty centuries ago' (Carey, note on Job xxviii. 17). A glass bottle (the earliest known specimen of transparent glass) with the name of Sargon on it, in the seventh century, therefore, B.C., was found in the north-west palace of Nimroud (see Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 197, 503). Glass consequently must have been known to the Israelites, and yet it is certainly not more than once mentioned in the Old Testament. Our translators render the word there (Job xxviii. 17) 'crystal': there is, however, little doubt that glass is meant. See CRYSTAL. In the New Testament it is occasionally referred to as indicating a bright transparent substance (Rev. iv. 6, xv. 2, xxi. 18). But it is singular that, though in frequent use, and though some modes of working glass were practised by ancient artists of which modern workmen are ignorant, it was not generally employed for mirrors, which were preferred of metal (Exod. xxxviii. 8; Job xxxvii. 28; Isai. iii. 23; 1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 18; James i. 23). See LOOKING-GLASS. The story that glass was discovered by Phœnician sailors at the mouth of the Belus need not be further adverted to.

GLEAN, GLEANING. The right of gleaning in corn-fields, vineyards, and oliveyards was secured to the poor by the Hebrew law (Lev. xix. 9, 10; xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 19-21). But it does not appear that persons could insist on gleaning indifferently on any man's property. The power was reserved to the owner of determining whom he would admit. Poor relations and dependents were no doubt considered as having the first claim. Accordingly we find Ruth soliciting leave to glean in the fields of Boaz, and special directions given thereupon by the master (Ruth ii. 2-9, 21, 22).

GLEDE. A name by which the common kite (Milvus ater, or vulgaris) was formerly known. It occurs in Deut. xiv. 13 as one of the unclean birds. In the parallel list, Lev. xi. 14, by an alteration of a single letter the vulture is named. It is not improbable that the word signifying vulture is the right reading in both places.

GLORY. This word is used in a variety of senses all easily intelligible, for worldly magnificence (Matt. vi. 29), for the majesty of God (Psal. xix. 1), for those who are pre-eminent in a nation (Isai. v. 13, marg., xvii. 3, 4), for the noblest part of a man, i.e., his heart, or, as some believe, his tongue (Psal. xvi. 9, lvii. 8; comp. Acts ii. 26), for the beauty or excellence of a place or natural production, as 'the glory of Lebanon' (Isai. xxxv. 2). To give glory to another is to honour him (1 Sam. vi. 5).

GNAT (Matt. xxiii. 24). The Geneva note on this verse is, 'Ye stay at that which is nothing, and let pass that which is of greater importance.' In that and other early English translations the reading is 'strain out a gnat.'

GOAD. An instrument used by ploughmen, still commonly to be seen in Palestine. It is a strong pole eight or ten feet long, with a pointed prick at one end to urge on the oxen, and a kind of chisel at the other to clear the plough-share from earth and weeds, and to cut the roots and thorns that catch or choke the plough. The Hebrew word in Judges iii. 31 specially signifies the pole; and that in 1 Sam. xiii. 21; Eccles. xii. 11 the point. The author of Ecclesiastes calls the words of the wise 'goads,' because they keep in the right path, and stimulate the idle. There is a reference to the goad in Acts ix. 5, xxvi. 14. The idea is taken from an unruly ox, who, when pricked by the goad, kicks back and receives a deeper wound. This kicking is against the instrument used to guide him rightly: it is more than folly, therefore, it is rebellion to resist the hand that has a right to direct.

GOAT. A well-known animal, belonging to the family Capridæ of the order Ruminantia. There are many varieties of the goat. Kitto mentions four as most likely to be known to the Hebrews: '1. The domestic Syrian long-eared breed, with horns rather small and variously bent; the ears longer than the head, and pendulous; hair long, often black: 2. The Angora, or rather Anadolian breed of Asia Minor, with long hair, more or less fine: 3. The Egyptian breed, with small spiral horns, long brown hair, and very long ears: 4. A breed from Upper Egypt without horns, having the nasal bones singularly elevated, the nose contracted, with the lower jaw protruding the incisors' (Pict. Bible, note on Gen. xv. 9). Hence several words are used in Hebrew for this animal, no doubt indicating different varieties. Goats possess singularly-acute instinctive habits. Nothing seems to escape their observation: their senses, too, of taste and smell are delicate. They constituted a large part of Hebrew flocks; for the milk and the flesh were articles of food (Gen. xxvii. 9; 1 Sam. xxv. 2; Prov. xxvii. 27). As clean animals they were used in sacrifice (Exod. xii. 5; Heb. ix. 13); and their hair was manufactured into a thick cloth. Of this one of the coverings of the tabernacle was made (Exod. xxv. 4, xxvi. 7); and it was on this material that in all probability St. Paul was employed (Acts xviii. 3). It is not easy to decide what is the original stock of the common goat, Capra hircus, and the other varieties. Some would suppose it to be the ægagrus, or wild Caucasian goat, others the ibex. The wild goat in Deut. xiv. 5 has been regarded as a gazelle: some, however, would have it the Capra ibex, others the Capra ægagrus. There is a Hebrew word also which occurs four times, rendered thrice 'wild goats' (1 Sam. xxiv. 2; Job xxxix. 1; Psal. civ. 18), and once 'roe' (Prov. v. 19, fem.). This, there can be little doubt, is the ibex, which is specially formed for climbing, its fore-legs being shorter than the hinder. It is observable that the Hebrew term implies the notion of ascent.

The word translated 'devils' in Lev. xvii. 7; 2 Chron. xi. 15 is one of the ordinary terms for a goat, signifying hairy. It may be observed, in connection with the practice forbidden, that in Lower Egypt the goat was considered sacred.

This animal is sometimes introduced in scripture symbolically, as in Dan. viii. 5, 21: comp. Matt. xxv. 23, 33.

GOAT, SCAPE (Lev. xvi. 8, 10, 26). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF, SCAPE-GOAT.

GO'ATH (lowing). A place mentioned only in Jer. xxxi. 39. Nothing certain can be said of it.

GOB (a pit, cistern). A place named as the scene of two battles with the Philistines (2 Sam. xxi. 18, 19). One of these is said in 1 Chron. xx. 4 to have occurred at Gezer.

GOBLET (Sol. Song vii. 2). A round vessel for liquor. The same word is translated 'basins' (Exod. xxiv. 6); and 'cups' (Isai. xxii. 24).

GOD. The scriptures do not attempt to prove the being of a God. They proceed on the assumption that the existence of the Deity was generally acknowledged, and in forcible language characterize him, if such a one there were, who disbelieved this truth, as utterly without understanding. 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God' (Psal. xiv. 1).

The proofs, indeed, from external nature of the being of a personal God are such as to convince the candid enquirer. He who yields himself to the subtleties of a vain philosophy, striving to measure the Infinite by his own finite standard, will fall into a thousand inconsistencies. We see the dreary round which such scollists have trodden in our own day. Observation and experience are rejected. The existence of a personal Deity is denied: all things are said to be God: existence as a whole is God; and all finite being, nature and the soul of man, is but the exterior manifestation of the Infinite God. This pantheism, as it is called, is really but a refined atheism. Nor is it a mere harmless speculation. It destroys, as its necessary result, the very principles of morality. For, 'the whole phenomena of the universe being regarded by the pantheist as but a chain of necessary developments, man and all his actions being but necessary products of the restless activity of the one great Being, there can be no such thing as a distinction between moral good and evil, between virtue and vice' (Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Jan. 1858, pp. 309, 310). Common sense revolts from such a system. The consideration of the visible universe, its mechanism and its evident purpose, might teach men better. So St. Paul argues, when describing the foul degeneracy of the heathen world. From the things that were made they should have deduced the 'eternal power and Godhead' of a Maker. But 'their foolish heart was darkened: professing themselves to be wise they became fools.' And therefore in just retribution 'God gave them up' to their evil courses (Rom. i. 18-32).

It is not possible, in the few lines which, in such a work as this, can be allowed to this great subject, to give even an outline of the argument for the being of a God. It must suffice to say that in the workmanship the hand of the worker may legitimately be traced. We see not only matter with its properties, which may be called its laws, but a disposition made of such matter which points surely to an end, and shows us the intelligence which designed that end. The constitution of the human body, too, and its harmonious relations to external nature, tend to the same conclusion. Who formed the eye, with its properties of vision? is a telling question. But there is yet another. For not only is there the wonderful instrument, but, besides and apart from it, material just fitted for the application of that instrument. How was it that the landscape was so laid out, and the light that discovers it turned upon it, and the colouring which adorns it so disposed and modified that it presents its pleasing picture in marvellous correspondence to the visual organ? We might gaze upon a heap of materials, each fragment with properties that could be turned to use, we might even stumble upon implements adapted for working them, and yet not be convinced that an artificer had been there. But, when we see that those implements have been employed, and that the materials were fitted each in accordance with its nature one to another, into a glorious building, where no mistake of adaptation was apparent, we cannot evade the conclusion that the mind of an architect has designed and his hand completed the structure. It is on principles of this kind that Christian philosophers have satisfactorily reasoned, clearing away objections, and proving that the connection of cause and effect may be safely inferred, and is justly applicable to the subject. See, for example, the masterly disquisitions of Chalmers, Natural Theology, Select Works, vol. v. pp. 1-497; Institutes of Theology, book ii. vol. vii. pp. 71-125.

The human mind has leaned in general rather to polytheism than to atheism. Accordingly the scripture testimony is most especially pointed against the worship of 'gods many and lords many.' The charge to Israel was: 'Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord' (Deut. vi. 4), a charge reiterated and enforced throughout the sacred volume, both vindicating the unity of the Godhead, and refuting the notion entertained by some of a co-ordinate evil principle' (xxxii. 39; Isai. xlv. 7).

The mode of God's subsistence is also revealed, so far as it can be comprehended by our minds. He is one; and yet in the divine unity there are three, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. See TRINITY.

The attributes of God are set forth in scripture. But in describing him the imperfection of language is obvious. Expressions are applied to the Deity, which, in their literal exactness, do not suit him. He is said to be angry, to repent, to be grieved, &c. (Gen. vi. 6; 1 Sam. xv. 11; Psal. vii. 11), also to have hands, eyes, &c. (Exod. xxxiii. 22; Psal. xi. 4), to sit on a throne, to use a sword, &c. (1 Kings xxii. 19; Isai. xxvii. 1; xxxiv. 5). By such expressions, the ideas intended are best conveyed to us, without implying that God has really parts and passions like ourselves. He is perfect in all the various qualities which are represented as belonging to him. Infinitely loving and merciful, he is also infinitely holy and just. Men are apt to exalt one of his attributes at the expense of another; as when they suppose his mercy not allowing the deserved punishment of the ungodly. Whereas the scripture represents the divine attributes in complete harmony, no one interfering with or opposing another, but rather combined in one glorious crown of infinite and various perfection.

The scriptures, through their whole compass, describe God as administering the government of the universe. He does not leave it to itself, to be ruled by laws which could have no effectual power but as he enforces them. It is rather as an ever-watchful, ever-working, ever-present God that the scripture exhibits Jehovah. And any other conception of him is unworthy of his great dignity.

GODLY, GODLINESS. The general meaning of 'godly' as a quality of any one is 'pious' (e. g. Psal. xii. 1; 2 Pet. ii. 9); and 'godliness' is commonly 'piety' (e. g. 1 Tim. ii. 2). See Alford's note on Tit. ii. 12.

GODS. So judges or rulers are sometimes called (Exod. xxii. 28; Psal. lxxxii. 6; John x. 34, 35, as being God's representatives on earth: comp. Exod. iv. 16, vii. 1; Rom. xiii. 1, 4). More generally the word means false gods (1 Cor. viii. 5). See IDOL, IDOLATRY.

GOG (extension).—1. A Reubenite (1 Chron. v. 4).—2. The name given to some great leader, who is prophetically described as gathering many nations against the people of God, to invade their land and sanctuary (Ezek. xxxviii, xxxix.; Rev. xx. 8, 9). See MAGOG.

GO'LAN (exile). A city of Bashan, in the territory of the half-tribe of Manasseh, but assigned to the Levites, and appointed one of the refuge-cities (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8, xxi. 27; 1 Chron. vi. 71). Of this place we have no further mention in scripture; but we know that subsequently it was the centre of a district called after it Gaulanitis. This extended from the Yarmuk (Hieromax) in the south to the fountains of the Jordan or the confines of Dan and Cæsarea Philippi in the north. On the west it was bounded by the Jordan and the two upper lakes: on the east it reached to the Hauran. It was as nearly as possible coincident with the modern Jaulân. Gaulanitis must anciently have been very populous. Mr. Porter speaks of a list of a hundred and twenty-seven cities and villages; but nearly all of these are now but masses of ruins. The towns most noted were Golan (possibly the present Nimr el-Jaulân), Hippos, Gamala, Bethsaida or Julias, Seleucia, and Sogane. The east and south are a flat and generally-fertile table-land. The western slopes, seen from Tiberias, are barren mountain-sides, furrowed by ravines. The mountain-range on the north-west exhibits varied and pleasing scenery. These hills are clothed with noble forests, chiefly of the evergreen oak (Journ. of Sac. Lit., July, 1854, pp. 292-294).

GOLD. The most precious of metals, so that its name has become synonymous with wealth. Gold was known in the very earliest times (Gen. ii. 11, 12), and, as modern discoveries show, it is widely diffused over the earth's surface. 'The chief quantities of gold,' says Sir R. I. Murchison, 'having been originally imbedded in the upper parts of the vein-stones, have been broken up and transported, with the debris of the mountain-tops, into slopes and adjacent valleys. . . . Modern science . . . confirms the truth of the aphorism of the patriarch Job, which thus shadowed forth the downward persistence of the one, and the superficial distribution of the other: "Surely there is a vein for the silver:" "The earth hath dust of gold"' (Siluria, pp. 457, 458, edit. 1854). Gold is not affected by air or moisture, nor does it suffer diminution by heat: the furnace simply frees it from other matter which may have been combined with the pure metal. Hence there are repeated references in scripture to its purity and splendour (Job xxiii. 10; 1 Pet. i. 7). There are several Hebrew words used for gold, variously implying its colour, its being dug out of the ground, its being stored up, &c. It was procured by the Israelites from distant regions—Arabia, Ophir, Parvaim, Sheba, Uphaz (1 Kings ix. 28, x. 1, 2; 2 Chron. iii. 6; Job xxviii. 16; Psal. xlv. 9, lxxii. 15; Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 22; Dan. x. 5).

Gold is early mentioned as a part of a man's wealth (Gen. xiii. 2); but it seems to have been used rather for ornaments (xxiv. 22, 53; Exod. xii. 35, xxxii. 2; Numb. xxxi. 50-52, 54) than as a medium of exchange; and it does not appear that any gold coins have been found among the Assyrian or Egyptian monuments. So that when employed in commerce it was weighed out (1 Chron. xxi. 25). The mode of working gold was understood at an early period: thus, the priest's ephod and girdle had gold in them; many utensils of the sanctuary were formed of gold, beaten out, or overlaid (Exod. xxv. 17, 18, 24, 31, xxviii. 6, 8); and there was some process known of reducing it to powder. See CALF.

GOLDEN BOWL (Eccles. xii. 6). Kitto (Pict. Bible) interprets this of the skull, and the 'silver cord' of the spinal marrow. Mendelssohn, however, more suitably refers the metaphor to the working of a wheel and the drawing of water, and supposes that the human heart, with its veins and arteries, is the thing signified: see Preston's Ecclesiastes, pp. 340-342.

GOLDSMITH (Neh. iii. 8, 31, 32; Isai. xl. 19, xlii. 7, xlvi. 6). See HANDICRAFT.

GOL'GOTHA. See CALVARY.

GOLIATH (great, or an exile). A Philistine of Gath, descended, perhaps, from the ancient Rephaim. He was of vast stature, variously reckoned from seven feet to ten and a half. He defied the army of the Israelites, and demanded a champion who might fight with him. But no one dared—not even the gigantic Saul—to accept the challenge, till David, indignant that a Philistine should defy the armies of the living God, boldly offered himself, in faith that the Lord would give him the victory. It was in the valley of Elah that the combat took place. David prevailed against the giant with a sling and a stone, and cut off his head with his own sword; while the dismayed Philistines fled in confusion (1 Sam. xvii., xxi. 9, xxii. 10). There were others of the same family, whose destruction by the hand of David and by the hand of his servants is recorded in the sacred story (2 Sam. xxi. 15-22; 1 Chron. xx. 4-8).

GOMER (complete, perfection).—1. The eldest son of Japheth (Gen. x. 2, 3; 1 Chron. i. 5, 6). His descendants are generally supposed to be the ancient Cimmericians, the Cimbr of after times, whose name is yet to be traced in the Crimea—that great Celtic family of which we have in these islands the Gael of Ireland and Scotland, and the Cymri of Wales. Their migrations are recorded in history. Pressed by the Scythians, the wave of their population flowed into the western part of Asia Minor; and thence, resisted and expelled by the Lydians, they turned to other quarters and found settlements in the north and west of Europe. Of them came the occupiers of Denmark, the German coast, Belgium, and Britain. The name of Gomer occurs in Ezek. xxxviii. 6 as joining with his bands the army of Gog.—2. The daughter of Diblaim, whom the prophet Hosea was commanded to take to wife (Hos. i. 3).

GOMOR'RAH (submersion). One of the five cities of the plain, apparently next in importance to Sodom (Gen. x. 19, xiii. 10). It was with the others subdued and plundered by Chedor-laomer and delivered by Abram (xiv. 1-16). It shared the destruction of Sodom, as it had shared its sin (xviii. 20, xix. 24-29); and its fate is frequently alluded to in the later parts of scripture. The position of Gomorrah has been a fruitful subject of discussion. See SODOM.

GOMOR'RHA (Matt. x. 15; Mark. vi. 11; Rom. ix. 29; 2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude 7). The Greek form of Gomorrah.

GO'PHER-WOOD. The material of which the ark was to be made (Gen. vi. 14). A variety of conjectures have been hazarded respecting this wood. 'It is evidently a tree,' says Kalisch, 'which yields a resinous pitch-like substance, as the pine, fir, and cedar; gopher signifies here most likely the cypress, which was in some parts of Asia exclusively used as the material of ships; in Athens for coffins; in Egypt for the mummy-cases, for which purpose it was peculiarly adapted, on account of its great durability and hardness' (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., p. 181).

GORGET (1 Sam. xvii. 6, marg.). See ARMS, p. 53.

GORG'IAS (1 Macc. iii. 38, iv. 1, 5; 2 Macc. viii. 9, and elsewhere). A military officer of Antiochus Epiphanes.

GORTY'NA (1 Macc. xv. 23). A city of Crete in which there were Jewish residents.

GO'SHEN (frontier? but the meaning is very uncertain).—1. A district of Egypt assigned as the residence of Jacob and his family, and which the Israelites occupied till their deliverance from bondage (Gen. xlv. 10). We gather from the scripture narrative several particulars concerning it. It was one of the best and most fertile parts of the country (xlvii. 6, 11), with excellent pasture-land, and therefore a most desirable abode for those whose trade had been about cattle (xlv. 34, xlvii. 4). It must have lain to the east of the Nile; for the Israelites on their departure had no occasion to cross that river. But it may be probably supposed to border on the Nile or some branch of it; since the inhabitants of Goshen had an abundant supply of fish (Numb. xi. 5). Then it could not have been far from the royal residence; for Jacob would there be near to Joseph (Gen. xlv. 10); and easy intercourse between the two is evidently implied (xlviii. 1, 2; Exod. v. 20). Again Joseph is said to have gone up in his chariot to meet his father in Goshen (Gen. xlv. 29). Hence, it must have been to the north-east of the metropolis, wherever that was. It was also called the land of Ramesses (xlvii. 11; Exod. xii. 37); the towns Pithom and Raamses lying within its border (i. 11). From indications of this kind a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 711, infers that Goshen must have been between the eastern part of the ancient Delta and the western borders of Palestine, that it was hardly a part of Egypt proper, and that it was probably identical with the modern Wady Tumeylat, the valley along which ran the canal of the Red sea. Dr. Kalisch does not exactly agree with this identification. Goshen did not reach to the wilderness (Exod. xiii. 20), and was not, he believes, a frontier province. Such passages as viii. 21-23, ix. 25, 26 show, he thinks, that it was surrounded by other Egyptian districts, and properly belonged to Egypt. He supposes it impossible therefore to define its boundaries, and concludes that we must be satisfied with a more general idea of its position (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 678-330). The Israelites were not all confined to the land of Goshen; for the parents of Moses clearly lived in the capital (Exod. ii. 3, 5, 8). Neither were the inhabitants of Goshen exclusively Israelites; for Egyptians are described as their neighbours (iii. 22, xi. 2, xii. 35, 36); and that the houses of the two peoples were intermixed may be inferred from the necessity of marking off those of Israel with the blood of the paschal lamb (xii. 23). Moreover, Pharaoh's flocks and herds seem to have been pastured in Goshen (Gen. xlvii. 6). But it is probable that foreigners also lived there; for a mixed multitude accompanied the Israelites on their march (Exod. xii. 38).—2. A district in Palestine, apparently lying between Gaza and Gibeon (Josh. x. 41, xi. 16). It probably included some of the rich low country of Judah; and the Israelites may hence have given it its name.—3. A town in the mountains of Judah (xv. 51). It may have had some connection with the district just mentioned; but this is merely a conjecture.

GOSPEL. This word is derived from the Anglo-Saxon god and spel, signifying good tidings. It is very appropriately used, therefore, to indicate that message of mercy which proclaims to mankind the mode of reconciliation with God through Jesus Christ. It is called 'the gospel of the grace of God' (Acts xx. 24), because it is the exhibition of God's free favour to sinful men; 'the gospel of peace' (Eph. vi. 15), because it peacefully unites God and man, those who stood before apart and alienated; 'the gospel of salvation' (i. 13), because by means of it the lost may be saved; 'the gospel of the kingdom' (Matt. iv. 23), because it announces the spiritual reign of Messiah; 'the gospel of God concerning his Son' (Rom. i. 1, 3), because it relates the history of all that Christ did for the procuring of our salvation. Hence it is taken for Christian doctrine or teaching, and sometimes more generally for that which only professes to be such (Gal. i. 6-9). The word is never used in scripture for a written document or narrative; but at an early period it very naturally began to be applied to the books in which the personal history of Christ and his words are contained, i. e. to those four narratives respectively which are the text-books of our Lord's life and actions.

GOSPELS. The several books in which, as observed in the preceding article, the personal history of Christ is recorded; the authors being termed evangelists. Four such books have been transmitted to us; and to their early authority in the church the whole current of ecclesiastical Christian literature gives evidence. For not only were they known independently, but as a collection the four were acknowledged and used in the second century; as we learn from Irenæus, Tertullian, and other writers of the time. Reasons, not always very grave ones, were alleged why these histories should be just four; and fanciful comparisons have been devised to illustrate the propriety of such a number. Without discussing these, we may well be thankful that God has given us four independent witnesses to the truth of transactions most momentous in themselves, and most necessary for our well-being. Each has its peculiar character; and they must be taken together if we would have a complete portrait of the Divine Redeemer. He is delineated from different points of view; and, though each delineation is in itself faultless, conveying only truth, it does not from the nature of things convey the whole truth. For completeness we need them all.

The Gospels are ranged in order in the New Testament, as those of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John; two of them written by apostles, and two by apostolical men, the friends and companions of apostles. They have the authority which the productions of mere contemporaries would not have. Many contemporaries, as we learn from the author of one of these records (Luke i. 1, 2), had committed to writing the events of the time; and their productions may have been valuable and curious. But these—the four—stand on much higher ground: they have flowed down, a precious heir-loom, from men whom the Holy Ghost influenced and guided in their work. As such we receive them on an equality with the sacred books of the earlier dispensation.

The most cursory reader must have observed that the fourth Gospel stands apart from the rest. Those of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, usually called the Synoptic Gospels, bear a far-closer mutual relation. They narrate the same leading events, and they exhibit much verbal agreement, with at the same time remarkable variations. Critics have drawn out and classified the particulars of agreement and variation. Thus archbishop Thomson, after giving some details, remarks: 'The verbal and material agreement of the first three evangelists is such as does not occur in any other authors who have written independently of one another. The verbal agreement is greater, where the spoken words of others are cited, than where facts are recorded, and greatest in quotations of the words of our Lord. But in some leading events, as in the call of the first four disciples, that of Matthew, and the transfiguration, the agreement even in expression is remarkable: there are also narratives where there is no verbal harmony in the outset, but only in the crisis or emphatic part of the story (Matt. viii. 3 = Mark i. 41 = Luke v. 13; and Matt. xiv. 19, 20 = Mark vi. 41-43 = Luke ix. 16, 17). . . . The agreement in the narrative portions of the Gospels begins with the baptism of John, and reaches its highest point in the account of the passion of our Lord and the facts that preceded it; so that a direct ratio might almost be said to exist between the amount of agreement and the nearness of the facts related to the passion. . . . In quotations from the Old Testament, the evangelists, or two of them, sometimes exhibit a verbal agreement, although they differ from the Hebrew and from the Septuagint version' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 714). Mr. Westcott gives a yet fuller account of the coincidences and variations, and remarks, quite in accordance with the archbishop: 'In the distribution of the verbal coincidences, a very simple law is observable. They occur most commonly in the recital of the words of our Lord or of others, and are comparatively rare in the simple narrative' (Introd. to the Gospels, chap. iii. pp. 175-182).

It has appeared exceedingly difficult to account for the phenomena which thus present themselves. If we suppose one evangelist to have copied from another, his testimony as an independent witness is seriously impaired. And such a supposition would not solve the difficulty. It might account for the agreement of one or more writers: it would fail to explain the continually-occurring insignificant differences. For it is not likely that a transcriber would alter expressions, unless he intended thereby to improve upon them, or to supply further information. Elaborate hypotheses have, therefore, been devised, such as that there was some original common document, probably Aramaic, from which there were translations variously modified, and that one or more of these, in conjunction with the original and with other sources, were the materials made use of more or less by the different evangelists. It cannot be denied that a passage before referred to (Luke i. 1, 2) gives some countenance to hypotheses of the kind. But then, in order to make them at all satisfactory, the documents have to be so multiplied and combined, that it is hard indeed to imagine the toil which each evangelist must have undergone to construct his book. Besides, it is extraordinary that all these supposed documents should have perished; especially that no ancient writer appears to have seen or known the original common record, which surely would have been highly prized by all who had access to it. Lists of these supposed documents are given by many biblical critics. Thus archbishop Thomson enumerates them as five according to Eichhorn, and multiplied to eight in the improved scheme of bishop Marsh (ubi supr., p. 715). Dr. Alford also exhibits Marsh's scheme in a sufficiently-puzzling form, and expresses his dissatisfaction with these attempts at explaining the phenomena of the Gospels (The Greek Test., Proleg. chap. i. sect. ii.).

It is far more easy to show the imperfection of the plans proposed by learned men than to devise a better mode of solving the difficulty. Any opinion must, therefore, be stated with modesty, and maintained only so far as it can be proved to rest on solid grounds.

Mr. Westcott is inclined to believe rather in what may be called an 'oral Gospel.' He cannot approve of any artificial theory: 'Such a combination of research and mechanical skill in composition as it involves is wholly alien from the circumstances of the apostolic age, and at variance with the prevailing power of a wide-spread tradition.' He points out, therefore, how the work of the apostles was to instruct by preaching, narrating, and insisting upon the things which they had seen and heard (Acts iv. 20, vi. 4). Their Master left them no written code: he taught them by his discourses. And in discourse to the people, in the synagogues, in the temple, before the rulers, exhorting, persuading, disputing, they would naturally make known their message. All was too perfectly in their minds and memories to require written documents. The scriptures to them were the books of the ancient canon; and books to form a fresh supplementary canon were not the foundation but the result—not immediately necessary, and therefore not arrived at till a fresh stage of the church—of apostolic teaching. 'The hypothesis, then,' says Mr. Westcott, 'of an oral Gospel is most consistent with the general habit of the Jews and the peculiar position of the apostles . . . it is supported by the earliest direct testimony, and in some degree implied in the apostolic writings' (ubi supr., p. 188). Naturally, when each related some great gospel event which all had witnessed, he would describe in terms similar to those which the rest used. And the all-important words of the Master, fixed deeply in every mind, would be repeated with little if any variation. A body of events, too, of chief moment, to be mainly dwelt on, would soon be collected; and these again and again set forth would assume an almost-stereotyped form. So that, when at length the circumstances of the church demanded it, an apostle, or apostolic man, imbued with the common teaching, drawing at the same time from his own stores, would give with some variety of circumstances and expression his record of facts; while, the nearer he drew to the weightiest matters of all, especially when relating the ever-to-be-remembered words of Christ, the more minute would be his verbal agreement with his fellows.

Yet if we go no farther, a considerable difficulty yet remains. If we may suppose the apostles teaching in the language which Christ used, we can understand verbal coincidences, while we are not puzzled by various differences, especially of description. But it is hard to imagine them translating into another tongue independently, and falling into so close a similitude, in many cases, into an identity of renderings. But what if the language Christ generally used, what if the language in which the apostles for the most part taught, were the language in which they have written? Perhaps if we come to examine we shall find some reason to believe this. That Hebrew so called, more properly Syro-Chaldaic or Aramaean, was vernacularly spoken in Palestine in our Lord's time no one will deny; but it is very likely that concurrently with it there was Greek, commonly understood, and specially used in public addresses. Consider the sermon on the mount. The persons assembled to hear it were 'from Galilee, and from Decapolis, and from Jerusalem, and from Judea, and from beyond Jordan' (Matt. iv. 25). Now it is well known that the cities of Decapolis were generally what were called Greek cities; and certainly the mixed population beyond the Jordan were little likely to be familiar with Aramaean. Is not the probability strong, then, that our Lord delivered that memorable address in Greek? And, when Peter on the day of pentecost addressed a multitude gathered from far-distant countries, in which were various native dialects, would he have spoken in a tongue not common to them all? and was there any such common language at the time but Greek?

This question, however, cannot be argued in this place. The student who desires more information on the subject must seek it elsewhere. The whole matter has been elaborately discussed by Mr. Roberts (Discussions on the Gospels, 1862). But, if we admit it as a fact that Christ generally used Greek, and that the apostles in their teaching employed commonly the same language, the difficult question of the origin of the Gospels is exceedingly simplified, and we have a key to the verbal coincidences, and can understand the variations of narrative. It has been already observed that the chief agreement is in the recital of the words of others, specially of those of our Lord. What if there were no need to translate, what if the identical utterances, deep, as before said, in every mind, are given us in the gospel records? This is fully argued by Mr. Roberts (chap. vi. pp. 429-465), whose conclusion is that 'our Lord Jesus Christ spoke in Greek, and the evangelists independently narrated his actions, and reported his discourses, in the same language which he had himself employed.' Dogmatic assertion must not be ventured on such a subject; but it is believed that the explanation hence afforded is more satisfactory than the cumbrous hypotheses before noted; and it is not unlikely that it will ultimately receive the approval of biblical critics best qualified to decide.

The remarks hitherto made have concerned the synoptic Gospels. That of St. John stands in a very peculiar relation to them. It is supplementary, for it assumes facts as known, of which it gives no account, but which are found in them; it is also independent, presenting a different aspect of our Lord's character, while its points of coincidence with the others show the working of the 'self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will' (1 Cor. xii. 11). It is in St. John's Gospel only that we find any detail of Christ's early Judean ministry; the synoptists relating his works in Galilee.

Very admirably has bishop Ellicott illustrated the distinctive characteristics of the four Gospels; the first of his Historical Lectures being devoted to the consideration of these. The student will do well to refer to his excellent volume; from which it may be allowed here to introduce a summary. 'In regard of (I.) the external features and characteristics, we are perhaps warranted in saying that (a) the point of view of the first Gospel is mainly Israelitic; of the second, Gentile; of the third, universal; of the fourth, Christian; that (b) the general aspect, and, so to speak, physiognomy of the first is mainly oriental; of the second, Roman; of the third, Greek; of the fourth, spiritual; that (c) the style of the first is stately and rhythmical; of the second, terse and precise; of the third, calm and copious; of the fourth, artless and colloquial; that the most striking characteristic of the first is symmetry; of the second, compression; of the third, order; of the fourth, system; that (e) the thought and language of the first are both Hebraistic; of the third, both Hellenistic; while in the second the thought is often occidental, though the language is Hebraistic; and, in the fourth, the language Hellenistic, but the thought Hebraistic. Again (II.), in respect of subject-matter and contents, we may say perhaps (a) that in the first Gospel we have narrative; in the second, memoirs; in the third, history; in the fourth, dramatic portraiture; (b) that in the first we have often the record of events in their accomplishment; in the second, events in their detail; in the third, events in their connection; in the fourth, events in relation to the teaching springing from them; that thus (c) in the first we more often meet with the notice of impressions; in the second, of facts; in the third, of motives; in the fourth, of words spoken; and that, lastly (d), the record of the first is mainly collective, and often antithetical; of the second, graphic and circumstantial; of the third, didactic and reflective; of the fourth, selective and supplemental. We may (III.) conclude by saying that, in respect of the portraiture of our Lord, the first Gospel presents him to us mainly as the Messiah; the second, mainly as the God-man; the third, as the Redeemer; the fourth, as the only-begotten Son of God, (pp. 33, 34, note).

It is evident that four different truthful pictures of the same person and events must agree, and that all the details if properly combined must exactly fit. But such a combination is not easy. Comprehensive as the Gospels taken together are, they yet do not give us the whole of what Jesus did and taught (John xxi. 25). There are interstices, therefore, which it is hard to fill up. So that those who have attempted to harmonize (as it is called) the Gospels have been in some respects unsuccessful, and are by no means in mutual harmony. As in every other department of literature, men have brought often their own prejudices to the construction of Harmonies, and have strained sometimes the sacred narratives in order to bend them to their own purpose. In every thing human there is imperfection. But this work has been with many a labour of love; and their earnest study of the holy books has been of no mean service to the church. They do not deserve the censure which Dr. Alford has amused himself with perpetually inflicting upon them.

It is almost invidious to select for commendation from the many useful Harmonies which have been formed; still the reader may not be displeased to have that of Dr. Robinson mentioned, and also that appended by archbishop Thomson to his article already noticed pp. 720-723. See JOHN,

MARK, MATTHEW, LUKE, THE GOSPELS OF.

There are some apocryphal Gospels in existence. They are of considerable antiquity; but, as they are evidently legendary, they need not be further noticed here.

GOTHOLIAS (1 Esdr. viii. 33). Athaliah (Esra viii. 7).

GOTHONIEL (Judith vi. 15).

GOURD. A wild vine is mentioned in 2 Kings iv. 39, as producing wild gourds which were poisonous. It was probably called a vine as having pendulous shoots. It has been supposed by many to be the Citrullus colocynthis, or Cucumis colocynthis, bitter apple, an annual plant, the fruit of which is about the size of an orange, but of a lighter colour: from the light spongy pulp or pith, colocynth, a drug used in medicine, is obtained. But the Hebrew word, pakkwoth, implies splitting or bursting; wild or squirting cucumbers, therefore, Cucumis sylvestris, or Ecbalium agreste, which are egg-shaped, and when touched burst and scatter their seeds, may perhaps be intended. The same word (in a different form of the plural) is employed for an architectural ornament. See KNOP.

There has been much diversity of opinion as to the plant mentioned in Jonah iv. 6-10. The Hebrew name is kitkayon, bearing a near resemblance to the Egyptian kiki, which is the Ricinus communis, Palma Christi, or castor-oil plant. This in warm countries is ligneous and perennial, in cold annual and herbaceous. It is of rapid growth, and flourishes in the driest soil; and, as the stem is soft and has little substance, it may easily be destroyed by insects. It abounds also near the Tigris, and grows there to a considerable size. Hence it is now pretty generally agreed that this must be the plant intended. Dr. Thomson, however, very properly observing that, though the rapid growth might be miraculously produced, still God would most likely select the plant naturally best adapted for the purpose, remarks that the gourd, when it has fairly begun to run, will in a few days cover a whole arbour. He adds that the orientals would never dream of training a castor-oil plant over a booth, or cultivating it for a shade. He therefore adheres to the belief that by kitkayon we may understand some species of gourd (The Land and the Book, pp. 69, 70).

GOVERNOR. This word is used in our bibles with considerable latitude, as implying persons of rank, or those who exercised independent or delegated authority, civil or ecclesiastical, in a kingdom, a province, a town, or a household. Various Hebrew terms are thus translated, some of them very nearly synonymous, and all implying one or other of the prerogatives or qualifications belonging to a ruler or chief. Accurately to define these several terms is the work rather of a lexicographer than of a compiler of such a book as the present: a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 724-726, enumerates ten Hebrew and four Greek words translated 'governor'; and he might have added to his list. It must be sufficient here to explain the term in those few cases in which, to the English reader, it may seem to require illustration.

Thus it is used to designate certain provincial officers of the Assyrian, Babylonian, Median, and Persian empires. The original word is pehhah, probably akin to the modern pacha. Several of these governors presided over districts on the western side of the Euphrates (Neh. ii. 7, 9); and they were inferior to the satraps or king's lieutenants (Esra viii. 36). Sheshbazzar, doubtless identical with Zerubbabel, is said to have been 'governor' (v. 14, vi. 7; Hagg. i. 1). Nehemiah, too, was 'governor' (Neh. v. 14, 15, 18), both bearing also the title of 'the Tirshatha' (Esra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 70, viii. 9, x. 1). The exact duties of these officers are not defined: they seem to have had a salary or allowance (Esra iv. 14; Neh. v. 15, 17, 18), and were probably assisted by a council (Esra iv. 7, vi. 6; Neh. iv. 14, vi. 10). It is the same officer who is mentioned in Mal. i. 8. Possibly Pahath-moab (Esra ii. 6) should be translated chief or governor of Moab.

In the New Testament the Roman procurator of Judea is called the 'governor' (e.g., Matt. xxvii. 2, 11, 14); a kindred word being used to describe the authority of Tiberius (Luke iii. 1, where in our version 'reign'). The 'governor' of a marriage-feast was the bridegroom's friend, who took charge of the entertainment (John ii. 8, 9). The 'governor' of Damascus would seem to have been the ethnarch who held the place as the king's lieutenant or vassal (2 Cor. xi. 32). The 'governors' of a minor were the trustees of his property (Gal. iv. 2). The 'governor' of a ship was the steersman (James iii. 4).

GO'ZAN (quarry?) A district to which the Israelites were carried captive (2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11, xix. 12; 1 Chron. v. 26; Isai. xxxvii. 12). Gozan must not be considered as a river: rather the river mentioned in 1 Chron. v. 26 ran through it: it was probably the region called Gauzanitis by Ptolemy, and Mygdonia by other writers. It was watered by the Habor, now the Khabour, a tributary of the Euphrates. See, however, the Imp. Bible Dict., vol. i. pp. 676, 677, where Gozan is taken to be a river, and is identified with the Kizzil Ozan, or Golden river of Media.

GRA'BA (1 Esdr. v. 29). A form of Haggabah (Esra ii. 45).

GRACE. There are many shades of meaning which this word bears in scripture. Simply it implies a gift, something bestowed by favour of the donor (2 Cor. viii. 19), and hence the excellent qualities with which any one is endowed (Prov. iv. 9, xxii. 11; 2 Pet. iii. 18). More particularly it denotes that free and wonderful love which God has evinced to mankind in bestowing a Saviour, his only-begotten Son, and accepting those that believe in him (John i. 17; Eph. i. 7, ii. 4-9; Tit. ii. 11, iii. 7). Gifts are the manifestation of love, proofs of favour: hence grace is often put for favour, or favourable help; as respects the Deity (Gen. vi. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 10; 2 Cor. xii. 9), or as respects man (Gen. xxxix. 4; 2 Sam. xiv. 22). Other modifications of the sense of this word will present no difficulty to the reader.

GRAFT. The well-known practice of grafting is resorted to, to improve the quality of fruit yielded by a tree. The branch grafted in preserves its own character, and does not take that of the stock, though it may derive sap and nutriment through it. St. Paul refers to the custom of grafting (Rom. xi. 17-24), but reverses the natural process, for the better illustration of his meaning. See Alford, note on Rom. xi. 16-24.

GRAPE. See VINE.

GRASS. There are several Hebrew words which are translated 'grass' in our version; but the translation is not uniform. It may be sufficient to observe here that herbage generally, every kind of verdure in the state of sprouting, fodder, food for cattle, is indicated: the exact meanings of the original words respectively must be sought in lexicons. Once (Numb. xi. 5) the word ordinarily translated 'grass' is rendered 'leeks': see LEEK. The rapid growth and tenderness of grass are often alluded to in scripture as illustrating the fragility and fleeting character of man's existence. That which grows upon the flattened terraces of eastern house-tops is very soon withered by the scorching rays of the sun (2 Kings xix. 26; Psal. xc. 5, 6, cxxix. 6; Isai. xl. 6-8; 1 Pet. i. 24).

GRE'CIA, GRE'CIANS, GREECE, GREEKS. Greece or Hellas, properly so called, was a country in the south-east of Europe lying between 36° and 40° N. lat. It was bounded on the north by Illyricum and Macedonia, from which a range of mountains separated it. On the other sides it was washed by the sea. There were numerous islands off the coasts inhabited by the Greek race, who had also established colonies elsewhere. In after-times the word was applied in a larger sense; and under the Roman dominion Greece was considered as comprehending the provinces of Macedonia and Achaia. So they are mentioned together in the New Testament (e.g. Acts xviii. 21; Rom. xv. 26). In Acts xx. 2, however, the term 'Grecia' is used in its more restricted proper sense as distinguished from Macedonia.

In the Old Testament little notice is taken of Greece. The Hebrew term for it is Javan; as it was peopled by the descendants of Japheth in the line of Javan (Gen. x. 2, 4, 5). The name Javan may be traced in Ionia, the western region of Asia Minor (see JAVAN). In later books, Greece or Grecia appears in our translation, designating sometimes the Macedonian kingdom of Alexander (Dan. viii. 21, x. 20, xi. 2), and sometimes the Græco-Syrian kingdom which arose after Alexander's death (Zech. ix. 13). There was little early communication or connection between Palestine and Greece. In Maccabean times, however, we find a correspondence of the Jews and the Lacedæmonians, with a reference to a yet earlier document in which the last-named people professed to discover that they were descendants of Abraham (1 Mace. xii. 2-23).

The distinction between 'Greek' and 'Grecian' in the New Testament is hardly enough marked. Hellenes, 'Greeks,' it may be said generally, were Greeks by race (Acts xvi. 1, 3, xviii. 17, and elsewhere), or Gentiles as opposed to Jews (e.g. Rom. ii. 9, 10, marg.). Hellenistai, 'Grecians,' were foreign Jews as opposed to those of Palestine; but see HELLENISTS.

GREEK (Luke xxiii. 38; John xix. 20; Acts xxi. 37; Rev. ix. 11). The language of the Greeks. The original, when an adjective, is hellenikos.

GREEN (Esth. i. 6; Sol. Song i. 16). The word is often applied to vegetable productions. Comp. Lev. xiii. 49, xiv. 37. See COLOURS.

GREYHOUND (Prov. xxx. 31). The literal meaning of the two words so translated is 'girded about the loins.' Some understand a wrestler, others a war-horse; to each of which it is supposed the expression will apply. It must be allowed that it aptly describes the shape of the greyhound, with the loins contracted and slender.

GRIND, GRINDING. See MILL.

GRINDERS (Eccl. xii. 3). The double teeth, dentes molares.

GRISLED, or grizzled (Gen. xxxi. 10, 12), spotted, spoken of goats; (Zech. vi. 3, 6), piebald, spoken of horses.

GROVE. A word repeatedly used to designate something connected with idol-worship. Groves were often consecrated to religious rites, and were planted round temples. Their solemn gloom both befitted and inspired reverential thought; and, besides, they were conveniently made the covert of obscene and cruel practices. There were sacred symbolic trees, too; and it is noted that idolatrous rites were performed under a tree (Isai. lvii. 5). Various trees were objects of worship among different heathen nations; some of which were oracular. In scripture we find many remarkable trees mentioned (Gen. xxxv. 8; Josh. xxiv. 26; Judges iv. 5), which it is likely might in time become objects of superstitious veneration. But the 'grove' so frequently spoken of could not have been a plantation of trees, as Josiah's proceedings show (2 Kings xxiii. 6). It was rather a pillar (of wood) or symbolical image of the idol-goddess. Or it might have been a single living tree. Such a sacred tree is figured in the Assyrian monuments. See ASHERAH.

There are two cases in which 'grove' represents another Hebrew word (Gen. xxi. 33; 1 Sam. xxii. 6, marg.). This word most probably denotes a tamarisk, myrica, the Tamarix orientalis of Linnæus.

Observe that elom, in our version 'the plain,' is a tree, specifically an oak (Gen. xii. 6), and, in the plural, a plantation of trees, a grove (xiii. 18, xiv. 13; Deut. xi. 30).

GUARD. This is the translation of three different Hebrew words, expressing the different duties that were to be performed. The guard were sometimes executioners (Gen. xxxvii. 36; 2 Kings xxv. 8; Dan. ii. 14), sometimes runners (2 Kings xi. 4); sometimes watchmen (Neh. iv. 23). These were not, however, necessarily different sets of men; as we occasionally find the runners called on to become executioners (1 Sam. xxii. 17).

GUDGO'DAH (thunder? well abounding in water?). A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Deut. x. 7). Perhaps the Wady Ghüdäghidh. See HOR-HAGIDGAD.

GUEST. See HOSPITALITY.

GUNI (coloured, dyed).—1. A son of Naphthali (Gen. xlv. 24; Numb. xxvi. 48; 1 Chron. vii. 13).—2. One of Gad's posterity (v. 15).

GU'NITES. The family of Naphtali descended from Guni (Numb. xxvi. 48).

GUR (a whelp, lion's cub, or dwelling). The place where it is said that Ahaziah received his mortal wound when flying from Jehu (2 Kings ix. 27). 'The going up to Gur' was probably some steep ascent from the plain of Esdraelon. See AHAZIAH, 2.

GUR-BA'AL (dwelling of Baal). A place in Arabia, perhaps so called from there being a temple of Baal there. Uzziah subdued the Arabians of this locality (2 Chron. xxvi. 7).

H

HAAHASH'TARI (the muleteer). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 6).

HABAI'AH (whom Jehovah hides). A priest whose descendants returned from captivity; but their genealogy was defective (Ezra ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63).

HAB'AKKUK (embrace). A prophet, of whose history we know literally nothing. He is described in the title to the book which bears his name simply as 'the prophet' (Hagg. i. 1, see also iii. 1). There is thus a wide open field for conjecture; and various traditional guesses have been hazarded. It is useless to chronicle them here. Suffice it to say that the pseudo-Epiphanius calls him a native of Beth-zocher, and of the tribe of Simeon. With very little more probability he has been supposed, from the subscription (iii. 19), a Levite. Nor does it add weight to the supposition that the Habakkuk of the apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon is said in the Septuagint of Origen's Tetrapla (Cod. Chis.) to have been the son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi.

There are, however, in this prophet's writings a few indications of the time when he lived. Thus, in i. 5, 6, a threat is uttered of the Chaldean invasion, of which at the time no danger, obviously, was apprehended; and yet it is said that it should come in the days of that generation. This would point to the reign of Josiah. And, as we can hardly imagine ii. 20 (comp. iii. 19) written before the reformation or re-establishment of the temple-service, we may with some probability place Habakkuk's ministry in the later years of Josiah (See 2 Chron. xxxiv.). Some have imagined, by comparing Hab. ii. 20 with Zeph. i. 7, that Habakkuk preceded Zephaniah, and further, by a comparison of Hab. i. 8 with Jer. iv. 13, v. 6, that he prophesied before Jeremiah that is before the thirteenth year of Josiah. But little stress can be laid on such deductions.

HAB'AKKUK, THE BOOK OF (620-609 B.C.). This book stands in our ordinary bibles eighth among those of the minor prophets. It forms a complete whole, in three parts, corresponding to our division of chapters: (1) describing an impending judgment, (2) the downfall of the enemy of God's church, (3) the answer of that believing church to the two-fold revelation, a magnificent ode, expressing the fear which the threatened judgment inspired, and the consolatory hope imparted by the promised gracious retribution; the whole illustrated by the remembrance of God's great deeds in old time. More particularly, in i. 1-4, the prophet bewails the corruption of his people: in 5-11, the Lord threatens righteous punishment: in 12-17, we have the prophet's expostulation. In ii. 1 he expresses a determination to watch and wait for a reply: this he is told (2) to make plain: a general denunciation follows (3-5); and then the various nations oppressed are represented as uttering woes upon the Chaldeans for their prominent vices, their ambition (6-8), their covetousness (9-11), their cruelty (12-14), their debauchery (15-17), their idolatry (18-20). Each stanza here (so to call it) commences with 'woe,' and concludes with a verse introduced by a word signifying 'for' or 'because.' In the fifth stanza, however, there is an introductory verse. Chap. iii., though intimately connected with what precedes, is a complete poem in itself. This is unrivalled in its conception, and in the sublimity of its thoughts. The entire prophecy must, indeed, be placed high among the remains of Hebrew poetry. The majesty of the ideas, and the purity of the diction, are alike most perfect.

HABAZINI'AH (lamp of Jehovah, according to some, whom Jehovah covers with a shield). One of the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv. 3).

HABERGEON. This term occurs in our version as the rendering of three different Hebrew words. One of them is used (Exod. xxviii. 32, xxxix. 23) to illustrate the mode of making the priest's ephod. Gesenius describes it as a military garment, properly of linen, strong and thickly-woven, furnished with mail round the neck and breast; the hole of the ephod was to be like the hole of this habergeon, with a binding that it might not rend. In 2 Chron. xxvi. 14; Neh. iv. 16, the word so translated means corslet, coat of mail. But that in Job, xii. 26 must word will present no difficulty to the reader.

GRAFT. The well-known practice of grafting is resorted to, to improve the quality of fruit yielded by a tree. The branch grafted in preserves its own character, and does not take that of the stock, though it may derive sap and nutriment through it. This would point to the reign of Josiah. And, as we can hardly imagine ii. 20 (comp. iii. 19) written before the reformation or re-establishment of the temple-service, we may with some probability place Habakuk's ministry in the later years of Josiah (See 2 Chron. xxxiv.). Some have imagined, by comparing Hab. ii. 20 with Zeph. i. 7, that Habakkuk preceded Zephaniah, and further, by a comparison of Hab. i. 8 with Jer. iv. 13, v. 6, that he prophesied before Jeremiah that is before the thirteenth year of Josiah. But little stress can be laid on such deductions.

HAB'AKKUK, THE BOOK OF (620-609 B.C.). This book stands in our ordinary bibles eighth among those of the minor prophets. It forms a complete whole, in three parts, corresponding to our division of chapters: (1) describing an impending judgment, (2) the downfall of the enemy of God's church, (3) the answer of that believing church to the two-fold revelation, a magnificent ode, expressing the fear which the threatened judgment inspired, and the consolatory hope imparted by the promised gracious retribution; the whole illustrated by the remembrance of God's great deeds in old time. More particularly, in i. 1-4, the prophet bewails the corruption of his people: in 5-11, the Lord threatens righteous punishment: in 12-17, we have the prophet's expostulation. In ii. 1 he expresses a determination to watch and wait for a reply: this he is told (2) to make plain: a general denunciation follows (3-5); and then the various nations oppressed are represented as uttering woes upon the Chaldeans for their prominent vices, their ambition (6-8), their covetousness (9-11), their cruelty (12-14), their debauchery (15-17), their idolatry (18-20). Each stanza here (so to call it) commences with 'woe,' and concludes with a verse introduced by a word signifying 'for' or 'because.' In the fifth stanza, however, there is an introductory verse. Chap. iii., though intimately connected with what precedes, is a complete poem in itself. This is unrivalled in its conception, and in the sublimity of its thoughts. The entire prophecy must, indeed, be placed high among the remains of Hebrew poetry. The majesty of the ideas, and the purity of the diction, are alike most perfect.

HABAZIN'AH (lamp of Jehovah, according to some, whom Jehovah covers with a shield). One of the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv. 3).

HABERGEON. This term occurs in our version as the rendering of three different Hebrew words. One of them is used (Exod. xxviii. 32, xxxix. 23) to illustrate the mode of making the priest's ephod. Gesenius describes it as a military garment, properly of linen, strong and thickly-woven, furnished with mail round the neck and breast: the hole of the ephod was to be like the hole of this habergeon, with a binding that it might not rend. In 2 Chron. xxvi. 14; Neh. iv. 16, the word so translated means corslet, coat of mail. But that in Job, xii. 28 must intend rather an offensive weapon. Carey translates it 'battle-axe' (The Book of Job, note on xli. 26). See ARMS, p. 56.

HA'BOR (joining together). A river, which must be distinguished from the Chebar of Ezekiel (2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11; 1 Chron. v. 26). The district through which it runs was one of the countries into which the ten tribes were carried captive. This river, the Chaboras, now called the Khabour, has several sources; the principal of which is said to be to the west of Mardin. It runs in a winding course, but generally south-south-west, through a rich country, till, having been augmented by tributaries, it falls into the Euphrates at Karkesia, the ancient Circesium.

HACHALI'AH (whose eyes Jehovah enlivens). The father of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 1, x. 1).

HACH'ILAH (darksome). A hill in the neighbourhood of Ziph, facing the wilderness; in the woody fastnesses of which David and his men were lurking when twice the Ziphites sent to inform Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1). But their treachery was bootless. In the first case, Saul was diverted from the pursuit by the intelligence of an incursion of the Philistines: in the second, David and Abishai stole into Saul's camp by night and carried off the king's spear and cruse of water. Hachilah has not been identified.

HACH'MONI (wise). The father or founder of a family, of whom were two of David's officers, Jashobeam and Jehiel (1 Chron. xxvii. 32).

HACH'MONITE. The patronymic of the descendants of Hachmoni (1 Chron. xi. 11). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 it is Tachmonite.

HA'DAD (clamour, a Syrian deity, the sun).—1. One of the kings who reigned in Edom: his capital city was Avith. He defeated the Midianites in the field of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Chron. i. 46).—2. Another later king of Edom, the last enumerated in the early genealogies (i. 50, 51). In Gen. xxxvi. 39 he is called Hadar; and his death is not mentioned; from which it has been inferred that he was living when the history was written. In 1 Chron. i. 51, a later record, his death is noted.—3. An Edomite of the royal family, carried away while a child when Joab was in military occupation of the country. Coming subsequently into Egypt, he married the sister of the Egyptian queen; but after David's death he desired to return to his own land, and proved one of the adversaries of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 14-25). The Septuagint translators give an account somewhat differing from that in the Hebrew text, making Hadad and Rezon of Damascus to rebel jointly against Solomon. Keil, however, considers their version founded on misapprehension (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. p. 198, note).

HA'DAD (sharp). One of the sons of Ishmael (1 Chron. i. 30). He is called Hadar in Gen. xxv. 15.

HADARE'ZER (whose help is Hadad) 2 Sam. viii. 3-12; 1 Kings xi. 23). See HADAREZER.

HADADRIM'MON (probably named from the two Syrian divinities Hadad and Rimmon). A place in the valley of Megiddo, where there was a national lament for the death of Josiah (Zech. xii. 11).

HA'DAR (ornament) (Gen. xxxvi. 39). See HADAD, 2.

HA'DAR (enclosure) (Gen. xxv. 15). See HADAD, 2nd article.

HADARE'ZER (ornament of help). The king of Aram-Zobah, whom David defeated 'as he went to establish his dominion by the Euphrates' (1 Chron. xviii. 3-10). In another campaign Hadarezer was still more completely subdued; and his dependent princes transferred their allegiance to David (2 Sam. x. 16-19; 1 Chron. xix. 16-19). He is called also Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 3-12; 1 Kings xi. 23).

HADA'SHAH (new). A town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 37).

HADAS'SAH (myrtle). The earlier name of Esther (Esth. ii. 7).

HADAT'TAH (new). A city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 25). In 21-32 a number of places are enumerated, twenty-nine it is said in all. But there are thirty-eight names: it is probable, therefore, that some are compound, and that Hadattah may belong to the preceding Hazor, New Hazor, to distinguish it from other places of the name. Wilton identifies it with Kusr el-Adadah, a ruin of imposing appearance on the summit of a hill (The Negeb, pp. 98, 99).

HA'DID (sharp). A town mentioned with Lod and Ono (Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, xi. 34). It was probably on the site of the modern village el-Hadith, three miles east of Lydd or Lod.

HAD'LAI (resting). An Israelite, father of Amasa (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

HADO'RAM (noble honour).—1. A son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chron. i. 21). It is not certainly known where his descendants settled. Perhaps they were the Adramitæ: see EARTH, p. 232.—2. The son of Tou, king of Hamath, sent to congratulate and bring presents to David after his conquest of Hadarezer (1 Chron. xviii. 10). He is called Joram in 2 Sam. viii. 10.—3. The principal collector of taxes, who was stoned by the Israelites on the revolt from Rehoboam (2 Chron. x. 18). He is also called Adoram (2 Sam. xx. 24; 1 Kings xii. 18), and Adoniram (iv. 6).

HAD'RACH (enclosure?). A district of Syria (Zech. ix. 1). Nothing certain is known of it: it can only be conjectured that the land of Hadrach is the region of Damascus.

HA'GAB (locust). One of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 46).

HAGA'BA, HAGA'BAH (id.). Also one of the Nethinim, whose descendants returned after the captivity (Ezra ii. 45; Neh. vii. 48).

HA'GAR (flight). An Egyptian female, handmaid or slave to Sarah, and given by her in consequence of her own barrenness to Abram as his concubine. When she found herself with child, Hagar despised her mistress. Being in consequence severely treated, she fled into the wilderness, but was commanded by an angel to return and submit herself to Sarah. He told her also the destiny of the son that she should bear; whose name was prescribed as a significant memorial that God hears the moan of those who complain to him. Hagar seems to have learned much by the heavenly vision: she had learned to look up to the living and all-seeing One; and the well by which she had sat received a title commemorative thereof (Gen. xvi.). Hagar's son Ishmael was born, and became dear to his father; but we hear no more of herself till the day when Isaac, the child of promise, vouchsafed at last a gift to waiting faith, was weaned. Then it appears Ishmael was seen mocking. This excited Sarah's anger; and she insisted on the expulsion of Ishmael and Hagar. Abraham unwillingly consented; and Hagar was again a wanderer. The simple beauty of the narrative that follows attests its truthfulness. No water could be found; and Hagar left her son a little way, because she could not bear to see him die. But again she had a divine communication: there was a fountain near; and the two were saved from death. Ishmael grew; and his mother provided him with a wife from Egypt (xxi. 9-21, xxv. 12).

St. Paul refers to Hagar (Agar) as a type of the old covenant (Gal. iv. 24, 25).

HAG'ARENES, HAG'ARITES. A tribe to the east of the Jordan, with whom the Reubenites, Gadites, and eastern Manassites had wars (1 Chron. v. 10, 19, 20). It is not easy to say who these people were; as they seem distinguished from the Ishmaelites (Psal. lxxxiii. 6). They were possibly the Agrai in north-eastern Arabia, on the borders of the Persian gulf, where are now the town and district of Hejer.

HAG'ERITE. Jaziz, the superintendent of David's flocks, is thus designated (1 Chron. xxvii. 31).

HAG'GAI (festive). Haggai is the tenth in order of the minor prophets, according to the arrangement of our bibles, and the first of those who prophesied after the captivity. Very little is known of him; as neither his tribe nor residence is mentioned in scripture. According to the pseudo-Epiphanius he was born in Babylon and returned to Judea with Zerubbabel: there he died and was buried among the priests: the inference is that he was a priest himself. He is said, too, to have been a member of what is called the Great Synagogue. All this, however, is merely traditional. Ewald is inclined to believe from Hagg. ii. 3 that Haggai had seen the former temple (Die Proph. des A.B., vol. ii. p. 516): if so, he must have lived to an advanced age; for his prophecy is dated the second year of Darius (son of Hystaspes), sixty-eight years after the destruction of the temple of Solomon. For a notice of the opinion that part of the book of Ezra was written by Haggai, see EZRA, THE BOOK OF.

HAGGAI, THE BOOK OF (520 B.C.). This book is very brief, and comprises four prophetic messages which Haggai was instructed to deliver, in the sixth, seventh, and ninth months of Darius's second year. The rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem by the returned exiles had been intermitted, in consequence of the opposition of the neighbouring satraps and their complaints at the Persian court to Cyrus, Cambyses, and the pseudo-Smerdis. It was not till Haggai and Zechariah were commissioned to stir up Zerubbabel and the Jews to renewed exertions, that the work was re-commenced. The representations made against it to Darius were discountenanced; and at length, in the sixth year of that monarch, 515 B.C., twenty-one years after the original decree of Cyrus (Dan. x. 13), the new temple was solemnly dedicated (Ezra v. 1, 2, vi. 14, 15).

In the first of his prophetic messages (Hagg. i. 1-11) Haggai rebukes the people for their supineness. They dwelt at ease in their own houses, and did not seem to care that the Lord's house lay desolate. Therefore they were visited with drought. The remonstrance was effectual; for on the 24th of the same month, little more than three weeks after the utterance, the building was re-commenced (12-15). In his second message Haggai encourages the people (ii. 1-9). Those who remembered the former temple grieved over the diminished splendour of that which was now rising; but the prophet was to tell them that it should be made more glorious than the first house. And this was fulfilled when Christ himself taught within its courts. The other two messages came the same day. In the first (10-19) the Jews were warned that none of their ritual observances was accepted so long as the temple was disregarded: their sluggishness polluted every action; nor could their care of anything else do away with their fault in this respect; but now, from the day of their active service, God would bless them. In the second addressed to Zerubbabel, the representative of David's house (20-23), a promise is given that, though the kingdoms of the world might be shaken and fall, yet a lasting dominion (pointing forward to Messiah) should be established on their ruins.

The style of Haggai is prosaic; but parallelisms occasionally appear: see i. 6, 9, 10, ii. 6, 8, 22. He frequently introduces interrogatories, as in i. 4, 9, ii. 3, 12, 13, 19. It may be added that 'the desire of all nations' (ii. 7) cannot apply directly to Christ. It should rather be rendered 'the choice of all nations.' All shall be shaken, or fear; but the choicest, the best, shall come to give honour to God. It is not denied that this has its full accomplishment in Messianic times.

Among the commentaries on Haggai, besides those contained in works comprising all the minor prophets, may be named the Exposition of bishop Pilkington, 1560, 1562, re-printed by the Parker Society, and that in Sundry Sermons, by Dr. John Rainolds, re-printed 1864.

HAGGEDO'LIM (Neh. xi. 14, marg.). The word is translated in the text. De Wette renders it as a proper name, Gedolim.

HAG'GERI. Mibhar, one of David's warriors, is said to be the son of Haggeri (1 Chron. xi. 38); but in the margin he is called the

HAG'GERITE. Perhaps one of the descendants of Hagar, Ishmaelites, is intended.

HAG'GI (festive). One of the sons of Gad (Gen. xlv. 16; Numb. xxvi. 15).

HAGGI'AH (festival of Jehovah). A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 30).

HAG'GITES. The family descended from Haggi, the son of Gad (Numb. xxvi. 15).

HAG'GITH (festive, or perhaps a dancer). One of the wives of David, the mother of Adonijah (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Kings i. 5, 11, ii. 13; 1 Chron. iii. 2).

HA'GIA (1 Esdr. v. 34). Perhaps a perverted form of Hattil (Ezra ii. 57).

HA'I (heap of ruins) (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3). See AI.

HAIL, HAIL-STONES. Besides the literal meaning of hail—and fearful hail-storms are recorded in the scriptures (Exod. ix. 18-35)—the word is symbolically used to denote the terrible judgments which the divine hand showers down upon ungodly nations (Isai. xxviii. 2, 17; Rev. viii. 7, xi. 19, xvi. 21).

HAIR. It would seem to have been the practice among the Hebrews to allow the hair to grow thick and somewhat long (Ezek. viii. 3). Baldness was disliked, as sometimes symptomatic of leprosy (Lev. xiii. 40-44): hence the reproach uttered which Absalom let his hair grow was no doubt the vanity of a young and handsome man (2 Sam. xiv. 26); still there are indications that ordinarily the length of men's hair in Israel was greater than with us. Thus, to uncover the ear is a common phrase for communicating a secret (1 Sam. ix. 15, marg., xx. 2, marg.), as if it were necessary to put aside the locks in order to whisper in the ear. There was, however, a clear distinction made between the sexes in this respect (1 Cor. xi. 14, 15); so that the women wore their hair very long (Luke vii. 38; John xii. 3). Hence, perhaps, the long hair of the Nazarites was to indicate humility and subjection (Numb. vi. 5). It does not appear that the custom of wearing wigs, usual among the Egyptians, of which specimens are yet preserved, obtained among the Hebrews. The colour of the hair was generally black (Sol. Song v. 11); but the white hairs of age were regarded as especially venerable (Prov. xvi. 31): on this account, perhaps, the hairs of the Ancient of Days are likened to the 'pure wool' (Dan. vii. 9). Dyeing the hair was not unknown in ancient times, and is still practised in the east. We have no mention of it in scripture; but, according to Josephus, against Elisha (2 Kings ii. 23). And it has been imagined that it disqualified for the priesthood. Cuttings of the hair, such as were usual in idolatrous worship, were forbidden (Lev. xix. 27; Deut. xiv. 1). Still this seems to have been a Hebrew custom in mourning (Jer. vii. 29); while, on the contrary, the Egyptians let their hair grow when in distress, and shaved or cut it on returning prosperity (Gen. xii. 14: comp. Herodotus, lib. ii. 36, iii. 12). The way in Herod dyed his grey hair (Antiq., lib. xvi. 8, § 1).

As to the mode of wearing the hair, when long it was braided or plaited. Thus Samson had his in seven plaits (Judges xvi. 13, 19); and these must have been fastened with a fillet (Ezek. xxiv. 17). Of course greater pains were taken by females in thus adorning themselves; so that we read in many passages of both scripture and the Apocrypha of tiring the head and braiding the hair (2 Kings ix. 30; 1 Tim. ii. 9; 1 Pet. iii. 3; Judith x. 3). It was also worn in curls: the 'well-set hair' (Isai. iii. 24) probably implied the artistical arrangement of these. There are several references to the curls in the descriptions of Solomon's Song. Thus 'the chain of the neck' (Sol. Song iv. 9) might be a long lock or curl falling down upon the neck; and the 'galleries' (vii. 5) were the curls in orderly array. The hair was commonly anointed with fragrant oil or perfume (Psal. xxiii. 5, cxxxiii. 2; Matt. vi. 17; Luke vii. 46). And, though modern powder was unknown, it was sometimes powdered with gold dust (Josephus, Antiq., lib. viii. 7, § 3). Combs are not mentioned in scripture, but both they and hair-pins are in the Talmud, and Egyptian combs have been found. Ornaments were some times worn in the hair. Perhaps the 'cauls' (Isai. iii. 19) were such: see CAUL, DRESS. Further illustrations may be found in Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Haar, Haupthaar,' and in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 738-740.

Hair was often used in proverbial expressions for something small, or collectively to express large numbers (Judges xx. 16; 1 Sam. xiv. 45; 1 Kings i. 52; Psal. xl. 12; Matt. x. 30).

HAKKA'TAN (the small). One of the children of Azgad, whose son Johanan returned with Ezra (Ezra viii. 12).

HAK'KOZ (the thorn). The head of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 10). This word is Koz with the article prefixed. See Koz.

HAKU'PHA (crooked). One whose children, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

HA'LAH (derivation of the name uncertain). A place in Assyria to which the ten tribes were carried captive (2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11; 1 Chron. v. 26). Halah is probably the Chalcedis of Ptolemy, and is thought to be the modern Gla, a mound on the upper Khabour, above its junction with the Jeruger.

HA'LAK (smooth). The name of a mountain mentioned as the southern limit of Joshua's conquests (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7). It was in the direction of Seir, but has not yet been identified.

HAL'HUL (trembling). A town in the mountain-district of Judah (Josh. xv. 58). Its ruined site on a hill retains the name Hulhal, about three or four miles to the north of Hebron.

HA'LI (ornament, necklace). A border-town of Asher (Josh. xix. 25).

HALICARNASSUS (1 Macc. xv. 23). A renowned city of Caria, the birth-place of Herodotus and of Dionysius the historian. It was here that, in early times, the Carian kings resided; and here was the famous Mausoleum erected by Artemisia. Many Jews settled here, and had licence to hold their assemblies for prayer by the sea-side (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xiv. 10, § 23; comp. Acts xvi. 13). The modern name is Bodru, or Budron.

HALL (Matt. xxvii. 27; Mark xv. 16). See PRÆTORIUM. The 'hall' in Luke xxii. 55 was the court of the high priest's palace, most probably uncovered. The 'porch' in Matt. xxvi. 71 was the vestibule to it.

HALLELU'JAH (praise ye Jehovah). An ascription of praise prefixed to ten of the psalms, cvl., cxl., cxil., cxiii., cxxxv., cxlvi.-cl., which are hence called the Hallelujah psalms. Its Greek form, Alleluia, is found In Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6. The word is still in common use.

HALLO'HESH (the enchanter). One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 24).

HALLOW, HALLOWED. See HOLINESS, SANCTIFICATION.

HALO'HESH (the enchanter). A person whose son held to repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 12). The name is identical with Hallohesh.

HAM (warm, black). The younger of the three sons of Noah. Of his personal history one disgraceful incident is recorded, which was the occasion of a prophetic curse upon one of the large and wicked families of Ham's descendants (Gen. ix. 20-27).

Four great branches of the posterity of Ham are enumerated, Cush, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan; and from these, speaking generally, the southern tribes of the globe proceeded. See EARTH, CUSH, MIZRAIM, PHUT, CANAAN. The Hamite nations, so far as we can trace their early history, attained considerable prosperity, they formed powerful kingdoms, cultivated commercial intercourse with other peoples, were rich, and have left remarkable traces of their enterprise and perseverance in their massive buildings. But in almost every case they have been sooner or later subjected to the sons of Shem and Japhet, and mingled with the descendants of other stocks. Whether the languages which prevailed among them can be referred to a single trunk, and of what nature such a trunk would be, with what derivative dialects, are questions on which philologists are not at present agreed.

It is remarkable that Egypt is repeatedly called in Hebrew poetry 'the land of Ham' (Psal. lxxviii. 51, cv. 23, 27, cvi. 22). To no special district are the names of the other two sons of Noah given. It might almost be inferred that Egypt was the region where Ham himself settled. And it is a fact that in the ancient Egyptian language a nearly-similar word, said to imply blackness or heat, denoted that country. It occurs many times in the Rosetta inscription as chmē.

A Hamite, perhaps an Egyptian, clan, would seem to have been settled near Gedor, whom the Simeonites attacked and destroyed (1 Chron. iv. 40).

HAM (noisy, multitude). The principal town of the Zuzim (Gen. xiv. 5). Its locality can only be guessed at: maybe it was in or near the country of Ammon.

HAM'AN (magnificent). The son of Hammedatha the Agagite, that is, most probably, of the royal seed of Amalek, who became vizier or prime minister to king Ahasuerus, from whom he obtained an edict for the destruction of the Jews throughout the Persian empire. In order the better to persuade the king to sanction the nefarious proposal, he engaged to pay into the royal treasury ten thousand talents, meaning, no doubt, that spoil to that amount would be obtained from the Jews. By the providence of God his evil designs were frustrated; and Haman was hanged on the very gallows which he had prepared for the Jew Mordecai (Esth. iii. ix.).

HA'MATH (fortress). An important city or territory of Upper Syria; the inhabitants of which seem to have been of the posterity of Ham (Gen. x. 18). 'The entrance of Hamath' is repeatedly mentioned as the northern boundary of Palestine (Numb. xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5). In David's time, Toi king of Hamath sent his son to congratulate the Hebrew king on his victory over Hadadezer, king of Zobah, Toi's enemy (2 Sam. viii. 9, 20), and perhaps to place himself under David's protection. For Hamath must have been one of the kingdoms included among those which paid Solomon tribute (1 Kings iv. 21, 24). Indeed it is expressly said that he had store-cities there (2 Chron. viii. 4). Afterwards, no doubt, it recovered its independence, till Jeroboam II. again subdued it (2 Kings xiv. 28). And then it sank; Amos speaks of its desolation (Amos vi. 2); and Rabshakeh asks insultingly where its 'protecting gods were' (2 Kings xviii. 34). It was afterwards called Epiphaneia, from Antiochus Epiphanes. Hamath still exists as Hamah, a considerable city standing on the Orontes, now the Nahr el-Asy, with 30,000 inhabitants. By means of huge water-wheels the water of the river is extensively used for irrigation; and the neighbouring territory is said to be very fertile.

HA'MATH-ZO'BAH (fortress of Zobah). A city which Solomon subdued (2 Chron. viii. 3); probably a different place from Hamath.

HAM'ATHITE. One of the families descended from Canaan (Gen. x. 18; 1 Chron. i. 16). They were most likely those who settled at Hamath.

HAM'MATH (warm springs). A city assigned to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). There is every reason to believe that this place, so called from its 'springs,' was close to Tiberias, and was the Emmaus mentioned by Josephus as in the immediate neighbourhood. These springs still exist just by the ruins of the ancient city. The water has a disagreeable sulphureous smell, and is too nauseous to be drunk. But, as it has a high reputation for medicinal properties, it is used for baths. 'The accommodations for bathing,' says Dr. Thomson, 'are everything but satisfactory; and the entire establishment is filthy and offensive in the extreme; and yet it is always crowded with the lame, the halt, the withered, and the leprous' (The Land and the Book, p. 396). The heat of the water ranges from 136° to 144°. At the earthquake in 1837, the temperature rose, and more water than usual was for a short time thrown out. But the buildings were not injured.

HAMMEDA'THA (perhaps twin or double). The father of Haman (Esth. iii. 1, 10, viii. 5, ix. 10, 24).

HAMME'LECH (the king). The father of Jerahmeel and Malchiah (Jer. xxxvi. 26, xxxviii. 6). Very probably this is not a proper name, and these two persons were of the royal family.

HAMMER. Two or three Hebrew words are used for this tool, one which implies striking (Isal. xii. 7); another hollowing (1 Kings vi 7): there is a third, occurring but once (Judges v. 26) : it also is connected with striking. The term hammer is employed symbolically for mighty force (Jer. xxiii. 29, 1, 23).

HAMMO'LEKETH (the queen). The sister of Gilead (1 Chron. vii. 18).

HAMMON (warm, sunny). 1. A city of Asher (Josh. xix. 28). 2. A Levitical city of Naphtali (1 Chron. vi. 76).

HAMMOTH-DOR (warm-springs-dwelling). A Levitical city of Naphtali (Josh. xii. 32) : it is possibly identical with Hammath and also Hammon, 2.

HAMO'NAH (multitude). The prophetic name of a city near which the slaughtered multitudes of Gog are to be buried (Ezek. xxxix. 16).

HA'MON-GOG (multitude of Gog). The prophetic name of a valley, 'the valley of the passengers on the east of the sea,' in which Gog and his multitude shall be buried (Ezek. xxxix. 11, 15).

HAMOR (an ass). A Hivite, prince of Shechem, and father of the young man of that name who defiled Dinah, Jacob's daughter. For this Simeon and Levi destroyed the city (Gen. xxxiii. 18-xxxiv. 31; Josh. xxiv. 32; Judges ix. 28). In the passage last referred to, Hamor is called the father of Shechem, the town, as being the founder, or colonizer of it. His name appears under the Greek form Emmor in Acts vii. 16.

HAMU'EL (wrath of God). A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 26).

HAMUL (pitied, spared). Younger son of Pharez, and grandson of Judah (Gen. xlv. 12; Numb. xxvi. 21; 1 Chron. ii. 5).

HAMULITES. A family of Judah, descended from Hamul (Numb. xxvi. 21).

HAMUTAL (akin to the dew). One of the wives of king Josiah, mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 Kings xxiii. 31, xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1).

HANA'MEEL (whom God has graciously given). The cousin of Jeremiah the prophet; from whom Jeremiah, having the right of redemption, purchased a field in Anathoth (Jer. xxxii. 6-12). Anathoth was a city of the priests, whose lands could not be alienated (Lev. xxii. 34); but in this case both parties were priests.

HANAN (merciful).—1. A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. viii. 23).—2. A descendant of Saul (38, ix. 44).—3. One of David's warriors (xi. 43).—4. One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 46; Neh. vii. 49).—5. A Levite, who with others expounded the law which Ezra read (viii. 7) : it was probably he who sealed the covenant (x. 10).—6. 7. Two other persons who sealed (22, 26).—8. One of the treasurers for the tithes (xiii. 13).—9. A person whose sons had a chamber in the temple (Jer. xxxv. 4).

HANA'NEEL (whom God has graciously given). A tower is so called in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 1, xii. 39; Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10). It must have been near the sheep-gate and the fish-gate. See JERUSALEM.

HANA'NI (gracious).—1. The father of that Jehu who pronounced the divine sentence against Baasha (1 Kings xvi. 1); the same Jehu perhaps who rebuked Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xix. 2, 3). This Hanani, it is likely, was the seer who censured Asa, and was imprisoned for it (xvi. 7-10).—2. One of the sons of Heman, chief of a division of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 25).—3. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 20), perhaps the same who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 36).—4. A brother of Nehemiah, put in charge over Jerusalem (Neh. i. 2, vii. 2).

HANANI'AH (whom Jehovah has graciously given).—1. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 19, 21); perhaps identical with the Joanna mentioned in Luke iii. 27).—2. A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. viii. 24).—3. One of the sons of Heman, and chief of a division of singers (xxv. 4, 23).—4. A captain in the reign of Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 11).—5. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 28).—6, 7. Two who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 8, 30) : it is possible these two names belong to one person.—8. An officer styled 'ruler of the palace,' to whom Nehemiah gave charge over Jerusalem as being a faithful man (vii. 2).—9. One who sealed the covenant (x. 23), perhaps identical with the preceding.—10. A priest in the days of Joiakim (xii. 12).—11. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (41); he may be identical with No. 7.—12. A false prophet of Gibeon, who in the fourth year of Zedekiah opposed the prophet Jeremiah, predicting (probably in dependence on Egyptian help) that Nebuchadnezzar's authority would be overturned. His bold falsehood and fearful end are related at length in Jer. xxviii.—13. The father of one of Jehoiakim's princes (xxxvi. 12).—14. Grandfather of a captain who apprehended Jeremiah (xxxvii. 13).—15. The original name of Daniel's companion Shadrach (Dan. i. 6, 7, 11, 19, ii. 17).

HAND. The various modes in which this word (or rather the original generally so translated) is employed are to be sought in a lexicon instead of in a work like the present. It must be sufficient to point out here a few of the most noticeable meanings and phrases in which the term occurs. With the article we find it denoting the hand of God, as in Isai. viii. 11, 'with strength of the hand,' i.e. with God's mighty hand. The sense is not pointedly enough brought out in our version. Without the article it is the human hand, as in Job xxxiv. 20; Dan. viii. 25, with man's interference. The hand of the Lord is said to be upon a person when he has God's favour (Ezra vii. 6); hence to withdraw the hand is to take away his favour (Psal. lxxiv. 11). Sometimes a similar phrase means that the individual was inspired or under divine influence (Ezek. i. 3, iii. 14). Occasionally this is used in a bad sense (Amos i. 8, where our version rightly interprets 'against'; Acts xiii. 11). There is the same varying usage of the word with another preposition in the original (Gen. xxxvii. 27; 2 Sam. iii. 12). Again, to give the hand is a pledge of agreement or fidelity (2 Kings x. 15), sometimes of submission (1 Chron. xxix. 24, marg.; Ezek. xvii. 18). 'Hand to, or 'in hand' indicates succession one after the other: thus, in Prov. xi. 21, through all generations the wicked shall not be unpunished. To lay the hand upon the mouth is to be silent (Job xxi. 5; Prov. xxx. 32); to place the hands upon the head is a gesture of desperate grief (2 Sam. xiii. 19; Jer. ii. 37).

'Hand' is sometimes employed figuratively for power (Psal. lxxvi. 5; Isal. xxviii. 2); or for a powerful deed (Exod. xiv. 31, marg.). It is because the hand, with its wonderful conformation, evidences the Creator's providence, and is the means of strength and the instrument of skill to men that it has this signification of efficacy. It may be added that the right hand was considered the chief place of dignity and authority (Psal. xlv. 9, cx. 1; Matt. xxvi. 64). Imposition of hands was part of the ceremonial in consecrating persons to office, especially religious or ecclesiastical office (Numb. xxvii. 18; Acts vi. 6, viii. 17; 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6).

HAND-BREADTH (Exod. xxv. 25, xxxvii. 12; 1 Kings vii. 26; 2 Chron. iv. 5; Psal. xxxix. 5; Ezek. xl. 5, 43). See MEASURES.

HANDICRAFT. There is mention in various parts of scripture of different mechanical arts in which the Hebrews were more or less skilled. Several of these are noticed under their respective headings; but it may be well to give here a general view of the principal arts practised, that both the variety of them may be better seen, and also that a few more particulars may be introduced.

1. Apothecaries are mentioned in Exod. xxx. 25, 35; 2 Chron. xvi. 14; Neh. iii. 8; Eccles. x. 1. But the word is not used in our ordinary modern sense as the compounders of medical drugs; it rather implies perfumers, makers of unguents. In 1 Sam. viii. 13, referred to females, it is rendered 'confectionaries.' The primary idea of the original Hebrew word is heating or boiling. We may suppose, therefore, that the 'apothecaries,' who seem to have been a caste, or a kind of guild, were those who concocted perfumes for a monarch's palace, or for luxurious personal ornamentation, or for employment at royal funerals when sweet odours were customarily burnt.

2. Baking was an art which necessarily must have been known at a very early period of human history. It has been already sufficiently illustrated. See BAKING, BREAD.

3. Whenever shaving was practised there would of course be barbers, as a man could not conveniently shave his own head. Samson's hair was shaved off by a professional operator as he lay asleep in Delilah's lap (Judges xvi. 19); and such persons are elsewhere named (e.g. Ezek. v. 1). Barbers have generally been people of importance in the east.

4. The trade of carpenters must have been exercised very early. For the erection of habitations, for the construction of furniture even of the simplest kind, some carpentering was needful. And it is perfectly evident that the commands given to Noah in regard to the ark pre-suppose a considerable degree of skill among those who were to be manually employed upon it. Merely the dimensions and general plan are indicated, pretty much after the fashion in which such directions would be given now-a-days (Gen. vi. 14-16). And continually through the sacred writings there are references made both to the carpenter's work and to his tools. Thus, when the tabernacle was set up in the wilderness, there were the acacia-boards to be prepared and fitted, the ark, the table, the altars, &c.; in all of which there was wood-work (Exod. xxv. 10, 13, 23, 28, xxvi. 15-30, 37, xxvii. 1, 6-8, xxx. 1, 2, 5). Later we find, when work of peculiar nicety and excellence was to be done, that foreign artists were employed; as in David's palace, for which he had carpenters from Tyre (2 Sam. v. 11), as probably also for Solomon's temple (1 Kings v. 6). Yet it cannot be doubted that there was a good deal of native skill, and much working in wood by Hebrew handicraftsmen (2 Sam. vi. 5; 1 Kings x. 12; 2 Kings vi. 1-7, xii. 11; 2 Chron. xxiv. 8, 12; Ezra iii. 7). And there are several notices of such work in the Psalms and the prophets (Psal. lxxiv. 5, 6; Isal. xli. 7, xlv. 13-15; also tools mentioned, as the rule, the measuring-line, the plane, the compass, the hammer, nails, the saw (Isal. x. 15, perhaps an axe), the awl (Exod. xxi. 6), &c. Many of these implements have been brought from Egypt, and are to be seen in public museums. In the New Testament the occupation of Joseph the husband of Mary was that of a carpenter; and it may be that our Lord himself in his youth worked at the same trade (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3).

5. The art of carving was early known among the Hebrews. Thus we find a Hebrew artist skilled in working or carving in wood and stone (Exod. xxxi. 5, xxxv. 33). The carved work for the temple was under the superintendence of Hiram, a foreigner by his father's side. Some of this work was in relief (1 Kings vi. 18, 29, 32), or engraving (35), which had gold inlaid or fitted to it; also there was open work (2 Chron. iii. 7). This is the kind of carved work which the Psalmist complains was ruthlessly broken down by the adversary (Psal. lxxiv. 6).

6. It is evident that there were dyed fabrics among both the Egyptians, Canaanites, and ancient Hebrews, and this not only in linen or woollen cloth, but also in leather; there must therefore have been professional dyers. See DYEING.

7. Engraving was also practised both on stones and on metal (Exod. xxviii. 9-11, 21, 26; Jer. xvii. 1). See ENGRAVE.

8. In consequence of the prevalence of white as the ordinary hue of wearing apparel (see DRESS), the fuller's art was specially needed. Accordingly we find frequent mention of fullers; and various localities near Jerusalem had their name from the fullers' work carried on in their neighbourhood. See FULLER.

9. Gilding was probably known to and practised by the Israelites. There is indeed no distinct mention of it in our version, save in Rev. xvii. 4, marg.; but probably, when 'overlaying' with gold is spoken of as it frequently is (e.g. Exod.

xxv. 11; 2 Chron. iii. 7), it does not always mean covered with plates of the precious metal, but rather gilt. Traces of gilding are found on existing mummies and mummy-cases; the film of gold being by no means so thin as that to which modern gold-beaters reduce it. See an interesting note in Kitto's Pict. Bible, on Exod. xxxvi. 34.

10. Leather fabrics were in use. One of the coverings of the tabernacle was of rams' skins dyed red (Exod. xxvi. 14); and skins and things made of skin are mentioned as being subject to the strange plague called leprosy in garments (Lev. xiii. 47-59). It is clear, therefore, that leather-dressers, curriers, and tanners must have exercised their craft. Thus we have a tanner's house designated as the place where Peter lodged at Joppa (Acts ix. 43, x. 6).

11. Masonry, like carpentering, was an art which men would soon begin to practise. Cities were erected before the flood (Gen. iv. 17); and afterwards we find the presumptuous builders in the land of Shinar attempting a gigantic structure, for which their materials were brick and bitumen (xl. 2-4). The Israelites must have had experience enough as masons during their Egyptian servitude (Exod. i. 11, 14). In later times David and Solomon employed Phœnician workmen (1 Kings v. 17, 18; 1 Chron. xiv. 1), probably, however, only as master-builders. Great skill was shown in masonry. The stone required for the temple was cut and shaped in the subterranean quarries, which may yet be visited under some parts of Jerusalem. And so exactly were the masses fitted to each other that no tools were employed upon them when they were laid in their places (1 Kings vi. 7). The stones of the great wall built to support the temple-platform were, however, according to Josephus, fastened with lead (Antiq., lib. xv. 11, § 3; comp. lib. viii. 3, § 2). Some of the ancient stones are yet existing: they are of vast size, and generally bevelled, or, to speak more properly, panelled, the surface at the edges all round being slightly cut away (see Mark xiii. 1, 2). Among the tools employed by masons were saws (1 Kings vii. 9), measuring-reeds, plumb-lines, &c., specimens of which are yet preserved, or may be seen on Egyptian monuments. Plastering was customary within and without (Lev. xiv. 40-42; Matt. xxiii. 27), mortar being used: that called 'untempered' (Ezek. xiii. 10-15) was, perhaps, mere mud, which would be washed away by heavy rain. See ARCHITECTURE.

12. Mining must have been early practised (Job xxviii. 1-6). See METALS, METALLURGY.

13. Potters are not unfrequently spoken of (e.g. Jer. xviii. 2-6). See POTTER.

14. Also, as foreign commerce was introduced and fostered by Solomon and some of the succeeding kings, ship-building must have been undertaken; at first, it would seem, in conjunction with the Tyrians (1 Kings x. 22, xxii. 48, 49; 2 Chron. xx. 36, 37). These operations were carried on at the Red sea ports. See SHIP.

15. Smiths or workers in metal were of various kinds, from the diggers or smelters of ore to the skilled artificers in gold and silver. We read of artificers 'in brass and iron' before the flood (Gen. iv. 22); and that working in metals was very common afterwards the frequent mention of gold and silver ornaments, as bracelets, nose-jewels, &c., &c., sufficiently prove (e.g. xxiv. 22). For some account of chain-work, lily-work, net-work, see TEMPLE. Metals must have been used, too, for tools in other departments of mechanical art, as for making the ark. When the Israelites were in the wilderness, both graving and casting gold, silver, brass (copper or bronze) are spoken of (Exod. xxv. 11-13, 17, 18, xxvi. 6, 21, xxviii. 36, xxxii. 2-4). Iron seems to have been in less general use. Joshua made knives of stone (Josh. v. 2, marg.) for the circumcising of the Israelites. But after the tribes were settled in Canaan smiths are referred to as a well-known separate class of workmen (1 Sam. xiii. 19). Goldsmiths, too, there were (Neh. iii. 8), who were well acquainted with the mode of purifying the precious metals (Psal. lxxvi. 10; Prov. xvii. 3); and we find it stated that in one of the deportations under Nebuchadnezzar a thousand craftsmen and smiths, probably the most skilled in their art, were carried to Babylon (2 Kings xxiv. 16). In the New Testament we have the silversmiths of Ephesus (Acts xix. 24, 25), and a coppersmith (2 Tim. iv. 14) mentioned. The utensils of smiths referred to are furnaces, bellows, hammers, anvils, tongs, fining-pots (Isai. xli. 7, xlv. 12; Jer. vi. 29), &c.; and various processes, as of soldering, &c., were known.

16. Tanners are noticed above, No. 10.

17. Tent-makers are mentioned in Acts xviii. 3, where the material was the hair-cloth of Cilician goats.

18. Weaving, too, was an art often practised, with spinning, by women (2 Kings xxiii. 7; 1 Chron. iv. 21; Prov. xxxi. 13, 19, 24); gold wire being sometimes worked in (Exod. xxxix. 3). See WEAVING.

Thus it will be seen that very many trades were practised by the Hebrews, and considerable perfection attained in them. See Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 14, vol. i. pp. 136-158.

HANDKERCHIEF. The 'kerchiefs upon the head of every stature' (Ezek. xiii. 18) were probably cushions or quilts, articles of luxury, made to suit the height of every person who might use them. 'The females in question not only employed flattering words to decoy the souls of the unwary, but by their seductive speeches lulled them as effectually as if they had literally prepared articles of luxury for their bodily repose' (Henderson, The Prophet Ezekiel, p. 57). We find 'handkerchiefs' once in our version of the New Testament (Acts xix. 12); but the same original word occurs elsewhere, and is rendered 'napkin': it was that in which anything might be folded (Luke xix. 20), also the cloth tied about the head of a corpse (John xi. 44, xx. 7). The article seems to have been used as handkerchiefs are with us, for wiping the face or hands, and perhaps it (or at least a very similar piece of cloth) was sometimes worn on the head. The 'aprons' (Acts xix. 12) differed little from the handkerchiefs. They must have been something easily detached from the body.

HANDMAID (Gen. xvi. 1, xxix. 24, 29). See SERVANT.

HAND-STAVES (Ezek. xxxix. 9). Darts or javelins.

HAND-WRITING (Col. ii. 14). 'The hand-writing that was against us in ordinances' may require explanation. It is the condemnation of the law we have broken, which is blotted out by the grace of the gospel.

HA'NES. A city of Egypt mentioned only once (Isai. xxx. 4). It has been generally identified with the Heracleopolis, Hercules city, of the Greeks in middle Egypt on the west of the Nile, called in Coptic hnes, or ehnes. But the Chaldee paraphrase reads Tahpanhes. And there are reasons for believing that this was the place really meant, for which Hanes might be a transcriber's error or an abbreviation. See TAP-PANHES.

HANG, HANGING (Esth. vii. 9, 10). See PUNISHMENTS.

HANGING, HANGINGS. The 'hanging' was a curtain or covering to close an entrance. There was one, variously coloured and embroidered, at the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 36, 37, xxxix. 33; Numb. iii. 25), another at the entrance of the court (xxvii. 16, xxxviii. 18; Numb. iv. 26). The same original word is sometimes applied to the veil that separated the holy place from the holy of holies (Exod. xxxv. 12, xxxix. 34, xl. 21; Numb. iv. 5); where in our version 'veil of the covering,' or 'covering veil,' 'hangings,' a different Hebrew word, formed the sides of the court of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvii. 9, xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 9; Numb. iii. 26, iv. 26). These hangings were five cubits, half the height of the tabernacle boards (Exod. xxvi. 16, xxvii. 18). The 'hangings' of 2 Kings xxiii. 7, 'houses,' marg., were perhaps sacred tents.

HAN'IEL (grace of God). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 39).

HAN'NAH (grace, or prayer). One of the wives of Elkanah, and mother of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. i, ii). With her prophetic hymn (ii. 1-10) compare Psal. cxliii., and the Virgin's song (Luké ii. 46-55).

HAN'NATHON (graciously regarded). A town on the northern border of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 14).

HAN'NIEL (grace of God). A chief of Manasseh, chosen to assist in the allotment of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 23).

HAN'NOCH (initiating or initiated).—1. One of the sons of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4). He is also called Henoch (1 Chron. i. 33).—2. A son of Reuben (Gen. xli. 9; Exod. vi. 14; Numb. xxvi. 5; 1 Chron. v. 3).

HAN'NOCHITES. A family of Reuben, descended from Hanoeh (Numb. xxvi. 5).

HAN'NUN (favoured).—1. The son of Nabash king of the Ammonites. He disgraced David's ambassadors, and thus caused the ruin of his people (2 Sam. x.; 1 Chron. xix.).—2. One who, with the inhabitants of Zanoah, helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 13).—3. Another person (apparently) who also helped in repairing the wall (30).

HAPHRA'IM (two pits). A city of Issa-char (Josh. xix. 19). Mr. Grove suggests that the present village of el-Afaleh, near Solam, the ancient Shunem, may mark its site.

HA'RA (mountainous land). A place or district to which some of the Israelitish captives were carried (1 Chron. v. 26). It may be the same with Haran or Charran in Mesopotamia. If not, it seems impossible to identify the place intended. But see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Hara.'

HARA'DAH (fear). A station of Israel in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 24, 25).

HA'RAN (mountaineer).—1. The brother of Abraham. He was the father of Lot, Milcah, and Iscah, and died before his father Terah in Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi. 27-31). This is all that is certainly known of him: the Jews have added some traditional stories to his real history.—2. A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. xxiii. 9).

HA'RAN (parched, dry). A son of the eminent Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 46).

HA'RAN (id.). The city to which Abraham and his family migrated when they left Ur of the Chaldees. And still, when Abraham proceeded into Canaan, his brother Nahor remained at Haran, and his descendants established themselves here; so that it was sometimes described as the city of Nahor (Gen. xxiv. 10). Here Terah died, and here Jacob sojourned with Laban (xi. 31, 32, xii. 4, 5, xxvii. 43, xxviii. 10, xxix. 4; 2 Kings xix. 12; Isai. xxxvii. 12; Ezek. xxvii. 23). It is called Charran in Acts vii. 2, 4. Haran was situated in Mesopotamia, more exactly in Padan-aram, a plain bounded by hills. It was famous for being close to the scene of the defeat of Crassus, and is generally believed to be the modern Harrân on the Belik, which flows into the Euphrates. It is but a village now, inhabited by Arabs.

But this conclusion is liable to very great doubt, so far at least as concerns the Haran in which members of the Abrahamic family were settled. It has been proposed, therefore, to identify the Mesopotamia of the early scripture writers, Aram-naharaim, Aram of the two rivers, with Aram of Damascus, where certainly there were two noted streams, Abana and Pharpar, and to look for the city of Haran in that neighbourhood. It is clear that there must have been some connection between Abraham and Damascus; for Eliezer, 'born in his house,' is denominated 'of Damascus' (Gen. xv. 2, 3). Still further Jacob, travelling of necessity, on account of his cattle, slowly, reached mount Gilead in ten days after leaving Padan-aram. The distance is between three and four hundred miles, if the usual theory be adopted; it is, therefore, physically impossible that the journey could have been accomplished within the specified time (xxxii. 22, 23). Moreover, it is not easy to understand how a pillar on mount-Gilead could be a boundary-mark between Jacob and Laban (52), if the latter lived far away beyond the Euphrates. There is, therefore, a high probability that the Haran in question is a place of the name near Damascus, visited in 1861 by Dr. Beke (see Notes and Queries, Feb. and March, 1862, pp. 95, 192; and comp. Miss Corboux, in Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp. 386, 387).

HARA'RITE. A designation (perhaps the mountaineer) given to three of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 11, 33; 1 Chron. xi. 34, 35).

HARBO'NA or HAR'BONAH (perhaps ass-driver, according to some, warlike). One of the chamberlains or eunuchs of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10, vii. 9).

HARE. One of the animals prohibited as food to the Israelites (Lev. xi. 6; Deut. xiv. 7), not, as some critics erroneously say, because it chewed the cud, but because, though it was said to chew the cud, it did not divide the hoof. In fact the hare is not, properly speaking, a ruminating animal; but it has a peculiar movement of the mouth resembling that of those who do chew the cud. And therefore, as the description was of a popular character, intended not for zoologists but for ordinary observers little likely to make nice distinctions, and especially as, in this case, the non-division of the hoof, and not the chewing of the cud, or otherwise, was the characteristic which determined the cleanness or uncleanness of the hare for food, no charge can properly be made against the sacred writer, for using language likely best to be understood by those he addressed. Indeed there appears to be special wisdom in the mode of expression. 'The rule given,' as Kitto says (Pict. Bible, note on Lev. xi. 5), 'was that no animal popularly held to ruminate should be regarded as fit for food unless it were cloven-footed. And this rule was most effectual for the intended purpose, because all real ruminants are cloven-footed, although all cloven-footed animals are not ruminants.' The Lepus Syriacus is very common in Palestine: another species of hare, smaller and darker, the Lepus Sinaiticus, abounds in the desert (see Imp. Bible Dict., vol. i. pp. 699, 700).

HAR'EL (mount of God). A name given to the altar of burnt-offering (Ezek. xliii. 15, marg.).

HAREM. See HOUSE.

HAR'EPH (plucking off). A son of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 51).

HAR'ETH (perhaps thicket). A forest in the territory of Judah, to which David went after the admonition of the prophet Gad (1 Sam. xxii. 5). Its locality can only be conjectured.

HARHAI'AH (he was dry). The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem, said to be 'of the goldsmiths' (Neh. iii. 8).

HAR'HAS (very poor). An ancestor of Shallum, husband of the prophetess Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 14). He is called Hasrah in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22.

HAR'HUR (inflammation, nobility?) One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

HAR'RID (Ezra ii. 33, marg.). See HADID.

HAR'RIM (flat-nosed).—1. A head of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 8). His descendants in considerable numbers returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra ii. 39; Neh. vii. 42). Some of them had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 21); and their name is mentioned as having sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 5). The representative of the course or family in the days of Joiakim was Adneh (xii. 15); but elsewhere (3) for Harim we find Rehum.—2. One whose son helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 11).—3. Another, not a priest, whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 32; Neh. vii. 35). Some of these also had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 31), and they sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 27).

HAR'IPH (autumnal ram?). One whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 24), called Jorah in Ezra ii. 18. The name, probably of their representative, is among those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 19).

HARLOT. This class of persons evidently existed in very early times, and were distinguished, as afterwards, by publicly exposing themselves and by their dress (Gen. xxxviii. 14, 15: comp. Prov. vii. 10, 11). Rahab is a somewhat-later example (Josh. ii. 1). It has, indeed, been maintained that she was merely an inn-keeper, but, as a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible (vol. i. p. 756) well observes, knowing what we do of the morals of the Canaanites (Lev. xviii. 27), we may easily conclude that women keeping houses of entertainment were little likely to be chaste. Besides New Testament evidence is against Rabab (Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25), where the attempts to explain away the word used are futile.

The Mosaic law utterly discountenanced unchastity (Lev. xix. 29; Deut. xxiii. 17). The term employed in the last-named place properly means consecrated; there being doubtless a reference to the foul rites of heathen deities, to whom, as to Ashtoreth or Astarte, young females were devoted for prostitution. The severe law enacted against a priest's daughter (Lev. xxi. 9) was probably intended to brand this kind of worship, as well as to indicate that the whole family of one who ministered before the Lord should give example of purity in morals. Another word 'stranger,' frequently occurs in the sense of harlot (e.g. Prov. vi. 24). It was likely then, as we find it now, that foreigners would swell the class of harlots, more especially as the Hebrews lived often in close contact with the heathen, and had constant intercourse with them. The manners and allurements of this class are frequently described in scripture (1 Kings iii. 16, 17; Prov. vi. 24-26, vii. 6-27, xxiii. 27, 28; Isai. xxiii. 16). Their gains were sometimes considerable (Ezek. xvi. 33, 39); but no gift arising from such iniquity was to be received in the sanctuary (Deut. xxiii. 18). Repeated mention of them occurs in the New Testament, where publicans are classed with them; and it was made a charge against our Lord that he extended mercy to these outcasts (Matt. xxi. 31, 32; Luke vii. 34, 37-48). Unchastity is frequently censured by the apostles (1 Cor. vi. 15, 16; 1 Thess. iv. 3; 1 Tim. i. 10). The children born of a harlot lay under disabilities (Deut. xxiii. 2; Judges xi. 1, 2), being distinguished from those of the concubine or secondary wife.

The term 'harlot' is frequently used in a figurative sense, implying intercourse with idols (Isai. i. 21; Nah. iii. 4; Rev. xvii. 5). Jehovah had condescended to illustrate his kindness to his people by the marriage-tie; virgin purity, therefore, fitly signified his spiritual worship, and departure from him was foul fornication or adultery.

HARNE'PHER (snorter). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 36).

HARNESS, HARNESSED (Exod. xiii. 18). Various explanations have been given of the original word. It has been interpreted to mean in five divisions, i.e. a centre, two wings, a vanguard and a rearguard; but probably Gesenius's translation is preferable, 'fierce,' 'eager.' 'Harness' is used for a corslet or coat of mail (1 Kings xxii. 34) 'between the jointings and the corslet,' or possibly 'between the arm-pits and the corslet.' The ancient harness, in the ordinary sense of the trappings of a horse, was often richly decorated (Jer. xlvi. 4); as existing Assyrian monuments show.

HA'ROD (trembling, terror). A spring by which Gideon encamped, and where probably the trial of the army by their mode of drinking was made (Judges vii.); perhaps the same with the fountain of Jezreel (1 Sam. xxix. 1). It is likely that the modern 'Ain-Jalad' is the spring of Harod.

HARO'DITE. The designation given to two of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 25), derived perhaps from Harod just mentioned. But one is called a Harorite in 1 Chron. xi. 27.

HARO'EH (the seer). A name in the genealogical lists of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 52). Perhaps he is the same with Reaiah (iv. 2).

HARO'RITE (1 Chron. xi. 27). See HARO'DITE.

HARO'SHETH (a carving or working, as in wood, stone, &c., perhaps manufactory). The place where Sisera, the captain of Jabin's host dwelt (Judges iv. 2, 13, 16). From Harosheth Sisera had to march up to Tabor to attack Barak; and after the defeat the pursuit continued to Harosheth back again, till the proud army of Jabin was destroyed. Its site has been identified. 'About eight miles from Megiddo, at the entrance of the pass to Esdraelon from the plain of Acre, is an enormous double mound called Harothieh. This tell is situated just below the point where the Kishon in one of its turns beats against the rocky base of Carmel, leaving no room even for a foot-path. A castle there effectually commands the pass up the vale of the Kishon into Esdraelon; and such a castle there was on this immense double tell of Harothieh. It is still covered with the remains of old walls and buildings' (Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 436, 437). Perhaps the place was called Harosheth of the Gentiles, because it belonged to those tribes which Israel could not subdue. See BARAK.

HARP. A musical instrument, the invention of which is traced up to Jubal of the line of Cain (Gen. iv. 21). It is most probable, however (as Kalisch on the place suggests), that the word khinnor, as there used, represents generally stringed instruments, rather than that one especially to which the name was afterwards assigned.

modern harp, or like our guitar. The number of its strings, too, is not precisely ascertained. Josephus (distinguishing it from the nebel, generally rendered 'psaltery,' which he tells us was played with the fingers, and had twelve strings) says that it had ten, and was played on with a plectrum (Antiq., lib. vii. 12, § 3): other authorities speak of a different number of strings. Probably the strings varied at different periods. Probably, too, these instruments varied in size. For we find them sometimes used in processions (1 Sam. x. 5; 2 Sam. vi. 5); so that they must have been light enough to be carried. And David is said to have played with his hand (1 Sam. xvi. 23, xviii. 10, xix. 9). The lyre or guitar may, therefore, be a more appropriate representation of the instrument in question than the harp. It appears to have been made of costly woods. David used fir, or perhaps cypress (2 Sam. vi. 5); while Solomon employed the almuq or almuq tree for the purpose (1 Kings x. 12). The strings were of hemp or flax. The harp was a favourite instrument with nations bordering on Palestine; and we have representations of it in the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. Ezekiel speaks of it in Tyre (Ezek. xxvi. 13). It was used only on occasions of joy and festivity (Gen. xxxi. 27; 2 Chron. xx. 28; Psal. xxxiii. 2, cl. 3; Isai. v. 12, xxiii. 16, xxiv. 8). On mournful occasions it was laid aside (Psal. cxxxvii. 2). In the time of David this instrument may be supposed to have reached its highest excellence. Distinguished musicians were appointed to play on it at religious festivals (1 Chron. xvi. 5, xxv. 3); and David himself is thought to have made some improvement in it (Amos vi. 5).

HARROW. It is very questionable whether the Hebrews used a harrow in our sense of the term. In Job xxxix. 10; Isai. xxviii. 24; Hos. x. 11 breaking the clods is alluded to; but this was before sowing the seed, just to level the ground. The word translated 'harrow' in 2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chron. xx. 3 means a sharp threshing-sledge. See AGRICULTURE.

HAR'SHA (enchanter). One of the Nethinim, whose descendants returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54).

HART. This was one of the clean animals which might be used for food (Deut. xii. 15, xiv. 5, xv. 22; 1 Kings iv. 23). The species intended was probably the Cervus elaphus, the European stag, or the Cervus barbarus, the Barbary deer. A variety of illustrations are drawn from the hart, and its female the hind. We have the activity of the hart (Isai. xxxv. 6), and its earnest longing for water (Psal. xlii. 1), the affection of the hind (Prov. v. 19), &c. Naphtali, too, was likened to a hind (Gen. xlix. 21); 'so that,' says Dr. Kalisch, alluding to Barak's victory (Judges iv.), 'with a simile frequently employed in Hebrew poetry for the achievements of strength and endurance, they (the tribe) were compared with the "graceful hind," which, light-footed and swift, easily eludes its persecutors on the mountain-heights' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 761).

HA'RUM (high). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8).

HARU'MAPH (snub-nosed). One whose son helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

HARU'PHITE. The designation of Shephatiah, a Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5).

HA'RUZ (eager, decided). The father of Meshullemeth, mother of king Amon (2 Kings xxi. 19).

HARVEST. See AGRICULTURE, SEASONS. Sometimes the word is used figuratively, as in one of our Lord's parables (Matt. xiii. 39).

HASADI'AH (whom Jehovah loves). A descendant of the royal line of Judah (1 Chron. iii. 20).

HASENU'AH (the bristling). A Benjamite (1 Chron. ix. 7).
