HASHABI'AH (whom Jehovah regards).—1. A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 45).—2. Another Levite of the same family (ix. 14; Neh. xi. 15): the lists in these two places are evidently the same, though some critics have imagined that in Chronicles to refer to David's time, not observing that Hilkiah (the high priest in Josiah's reign) and his descendants are mentioned.—3. A Levite singer, son of Jeduthun: he was head of one of the courses of the singers (1 Chron. xxv. 3, 19).—4. A Kohathite Levite descended from Hebron, Kohath's son (xxvi. 30).—5. A chief of the Levites in David's reign (xxvii. 17), perhaps identical with No. 4.—6. A chief Levite in Josiah's time (2 Chron. xxxv. 9). 7. A Levite or priest who accompanied Ezra (Ezra viii. 19, 24). In 19, Hashabiah and Sherebiah seem distinguished from those who were sons of Merari. If they be included among them, they cannot be identical with the Sherebiah and Hashabiah of 24.—8. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 17).—9. A Levite who sealed the covenant (x. 11); possibly the same with that in xii. 24.—10. One from whom the overseer of the Levites after the captivity was descended (xi. 22).

—11. A priest in the days of Joiakim (xii. 21).

HASHAB'NAH (id.). One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 25).

HASHABNI'AH (id.).—1. The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).—2. A Levite who took part in a solemn service (ix. 5).

HASHBADA'NA (thought in judging, or considerate judge). One who stood with Ezra at the solemn reading of the law (Neh. viii. 4).

HA'SHEM (fat). One called a Gizonite, whose sons were among David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 34). The corresponding list (2 Sam. xxiii. 32) differs: there the name is Jashen.

HASHMO'NAH (fatness, fat soil).—A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 29, 30). Mr. Wilton is disposed to identify it with Heshmon (Josh. xv. 27), now probably 'Ain Hasb (The Negeb, pp. 126, 134).

HASH'UB (intelligent, or esteemed).—1. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 11).—2. Another who also helped to repair the wall (23).—3. One who sealed the covenant (x. 23). It is very possible that these three may be the same person.—4. A Levite (xi. 15). He is called Hashhub in 1 Chron. ix. 14; and the two names being identical.

HASHU'BAH (id.). One of David's descendants (1 Chron. iii. 20).

HA'SHUM (opulent).—1. One whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 19; Neh. vii. 22). Several of these had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 33). It was perhaps the representative of this family or clan who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 18).—2. One who assisted when Ezra read the law (viii. 4).

HASHU'PHA (stripped). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 46). In Ezra ii. 43 the name appears more accurately Hasupha.

HASMA'AH (1 Chron. xii. 3, marg.). See SHEMAAH.

HAS'RAH (very poor) (2 Chron. xxxiv. 22). See HARBAH.

HASSENA'AH (the thorny). This is probably the name of a town Senaah (see Ezra ii. 35; Neh. vii. 38), with the definite article prefixed. The men of this place built the fish-gate at Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 3).

HAS'SHUB (intelligent or esteemed). A Merarite Levite (1 Chron. ix. 14). He is called Hashub in Neh. xi. 15.

HASU'PHA (stripped) (Ezra ii. 43). See HASHUPHA.

HAT (Dan. iii. 21). See DRESS, HEAD-DRESS.

HA'TACH (verity). One of the eunuchs or chamberlains at the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. iv. 5, 6, 9, 10).

HATE. The word in its ordinary sense means strong dislike (Jer. xlv. 4). But it is sometimes used in a way of comparison to signify the liking of one thing less than another (Deut. xxi. 15; Mal. i. 2, 3; Luke xiv. 26; Rom. ix. 13).

HA'THATH (terror). The son of Othniel (1 Chron. iv. 13).

HATI'PHA (seized, captive). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 54; Neh. vii. 56).

HATI'TA (a digging, exploring). A person whose children, porters, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).

HAT'SI-HAMMENU'CHOTH (born in the midst of resting-places). Perhaps this may be the proper name of a man (1 Chron. ii. 52, marg.); then the word below rendered 'half the Manahethites' (54) may be the patronymic and mean his descendants.

HAT'TIL (wavering). One of Solomon's servants, whose descendants returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59).

HAT'TUSH (assembled).—1. One of the descendants of David (1 Chron. iii. 22); possibly the same who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 2).—2. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).—3. A priest who accompanied Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (xii. 2); he or the representative of his family sealed the covenant (x. 4).

HAU'RAH (caves, cave-land). A district mentioned by Ezekiel as the frontier of the Holy Land (Ezek. xlvi. 16, 18). It appears to have constituted part of the ancient kingdom of Bashan and to have been afterwards known as Auranitis; being sometimes comprehended with Batanaea in 'the region of Trachonitis.' It probably took its name from the caves with which it still abounds. And its original appellation, the Haurân, it now retains. This name, however, is at present applied, Mr. Porter tells us, by those at a distance to the whole country east of Jaulân (Gaulanitis) and Jeidûr (Iturea). But by the people of that country it is used in a much more restricted sense, and is given only to the fertile plain on the south of the Lejah, with the narrow strip on the west. The whole of this district is perfectly flat, with little conical hills at intervals. The soil is the most fertile in Syria, and admirably adapted to the production of wheat. Not a tree is anywhere seen. There are many inhabited villages, and many more in ruins. The walls of these are of vast thickness, and evidently of remote antiquity. See Porter in Journ. of Sac. Lit. July 1854, pp. 302, 303.

HAVI'LAH (panic, terror?).—1. One of the sons of Cush (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9).—2. A son of Joktan (Gen. x. 29; 1 Chron. i. 23).

HAVI'LAH (id.). A country so named is described in the account of Eden as producing gold, bdellium, and the onyx-stone (Gen. ii. 11). It is also said to border, on the east towards Assyria, on the Ishmaelite, and on the Amalekite territory (xxv. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 7). It is reckoned among the Cushite countries, together with provinces on the Arabian gulf (Gen. x. 7), and among Joktanite countries with districts contiguous to the Persian gulf (29). There is, however, an intermixture in both the places referred to, in the first, of regions on the Persian, in the second, of regions on the Arabian gulf. 'It follows therefore,' says Kalisch, 'that in both instances Havilah designates the same country, extending at least from the Persian to the Arabian gulf, and, on account of its vast extent, easily divided into two distinct parts. Where these two centres of the people of Havilah were, it is at present impossible to decide: we have no means of ascertaining whether they were in the land of the Chaulotæi, near the Nabatæi, on the Persian gulf, or in the territory of the Avalitæ, on the African coast, near the Bab-el-Mandeb, the present Zeyla' (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., p. 93; comp. p. 249). Some writers, however, imagine that more than one Havilah is spoken of in scripture; and some find the name in Khawlan, a district of the Yemen. See Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 761, 762.

HA'VOTH-JAIR (villages of Jair). Some small towns or places of Gilead which Jair, who was reckoned of the posterity of Maunasseh, took and possessed (Numb. xxxii. 41). Other towns in Bashan appear to have been appropriated by the same person (Deut. iii. 14; 1 Chron. ii. 22, 23), and to have had the same name. Another Jair had thirty sons who occupied thirty of the Havoth-jair in Gilead (Judges x. 4). All these towns both in Gilead and Bashan formed one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 13). See JAIR.

HAWK. One of the birds pronounced unclean (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15). The original word, implying swift motion, seems to include various species of the Falconidae; more especially as in the passages referred to 'the kind' or family is mentioned. The hawk, though not migratory in this country, is so in parts of Asia and southern Europe. This seems to be alluded to in Job xxxix. 26. Dr. Thomson notices a remarkable illustration of this passage: 'I have often seen them returning south during the latter part of September, but never saw them migrating northward. I can only account for this by supposing that in going they straggle along in single pairs, and at no particular time, or else by some distant interior route, but that when their young are grown they come back southward in flocks; but even then they do not fly in groups, as do cranes, geese, and storks, but keep passing for days in straggling lines, like scattered ranks of a routed army. Here and there, as far as the eye can reach, they come, flying every one apart, but all going steadily to the south (The Land and the Book, p. 326). These birds are common in Syria, where many species occur, the merlin, the kestrel, the gerfalcon, &c.

The 'night-hawk' is also an unclean bird (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15). It is questioned what bird is here meant: according to Borchart the male ostrich. It is more probable, however, that some kind of owl, perhaps the Strix flammea, or white owl, is intended.

HAY (Prov. xxvii. 25; Isai. xv. 6; comp. Psal. lxxii. 6; Amos vii. 1). 'Mowings' are spoken of; but hay, in our full sense of it, was not made in Palestine. See GRASS.

HA'ZÆL (whom God beholds, i.e. cares for). A king of Syria. The first mention we have of him is when Elijah was in the wilderness (1 Kings xix. 15, 17), when he is designated as the future monarch of Syria, Jehu that of Israel, Elisha as the prophet in succession to Elijah himself. Jehu was to extirpate the authors of idolatry, Hazael to chastise the whole nation of Israel, and Elisha to slay with the quick and powerful sword of the divine word (comp. Jer. i. 10). It does not appear that Hazael was ever literally anointed by either prophet: the designation of him seems all that was intended. But, when afterwards Elisha visited Damascus, and Ben-hadad, who was sick, had sent Hazael, a trusted servant, to enquire whether he should recover, Elisha intimated his approaching sovereignty. Hazael was astonished: 'Shall I, who am but a dog, mean and insignificant, attain this splendid destiny?' The next day, however, Ben-hadad died, apparently by Hazael's hand (though some critics question this); and Hazael succeeded as king; and his reign, with the exception of the time when he was called on to defend himself against the Assyrian power, was occupied with continual wars upon Israel and even against Judah (2 Kings viii. 7-15, 28, 29, ix. 14, 15, x. 32, 33, xii. 17, 18, xiii. 3; 2 Chron. xxii. 5, 6). Hazael is supposed to have reigned about forty-six years, 886-840 B.C. He was succeeded by his son Ben-hadad (2 Kings xiii. 22-25; Amos i. 4).

HAZAI'AH (whom Jehovah beholds). A descendant of Judah (Neh. xi. 5).

HA'ZAR-AD'DAR (village of Adâr, or of greatness). A place on the southern frontier of Palestine (Numb. xxxiv. 4). It seems to be identical with Adar the south boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 3), and is possibly 'Ain el-Kudeirat, or Adeirat, to the west of Kadesh-barnea.

HA'ZAR-E'NAN (village of fountains). A place on the north-east frontier of Palestine (Numb. xxxiv. 9, 10). It is also mentioned as a boundary-place in Ezek. xlvi. 17, xlviii. 1. Mr. Porter supposes it the modern Kuryetein, ENE. of Damascus, where are large fountains.

HA'ZAR-GAD'DAH (village of fortune, or perhaps of the kid). A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 27). Perhaps this may be identified with Wady Mubughik, where there are extensive ruins of great antiquity (Wilton, The Negeb, pp. 114-121).

HA'ZAR-HAT'TICON (middle village). A place specified by Ezekiel (Ezek. xlvii. 16) as one of the boundaries of the land. It is said to be on the border of Hauran.

HA'ZAR-MA'VETH (court of death). One of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chron. i. 20). His descendants were the Chatramotitæ, who settled in the south of Arabia; and the name is preserved in the modern Hadramaut. This district is said to be very unhealthy; but it is cultivated; and the inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in frankincense, myrrh, gum, and other products. Their language is a dialect materially differing from that spoken in Yemen.

HA'ZAR-SHU'AL (village of jackals). A place in the south of Palestine, originally in the territory of Judah, afterwards allotted to Simeon (Josh. xv. 28, xix. 3; 1 Chron. iv. 28). It is mentioned as inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 27). Wilton would identify it with Beni-Shail, not far from Gaza (The Negeb, pp. 137-141).

HA'ZAR-SU'SAH (horse-village). A town in the territory of Simeon (Josh. xix. 5). It is also called HA'ZAR-SU'SIM (village of horses) (1 Chron. iv. 31). It might be, like Bethmarcaboth, 'the chariot-station,' a depôt for horses, such as those which in Solomon's time went to and fro between Egypt and Palestine (Stanley, Sinai and Pal., p. 160). It is probably identical with Sansannah, which Wilton believes to have been in the modern Wady es-Suny or Sunieh, not far from Gaza, on the caravan-road between that place and Sinai (The Negeb, pp. 212-215).

HA'ZAZON-TA'MAR (pruning or felling of the palm) (2 Chron. xx. 2). See EN-GEDI, HAZEZON-TAMAR.

HAZEL (Gen. xxx. 37). The original word rendered 'hazel' occurs as the name of a tree only in this place. Interpreters are divided between the hazel and the almond-tree: perhaps it is more probable that the last-named was meant.

HAZ'ELEL-PO'NI (the shade looking upon me). A daughter of the house of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 3). The original has the article prefixed, as if it were the name of a family rather than of an individual.

HA'ZER (a court, a village, a moveable encampment). This is the same with Hazar, occurring in composition with other words to form the names of places. It is not found alone as a proper name; but the two following are forms of its plural.

HAZE'RIM (villages). The Avims are said to have dwelt here (Deut. ii. 23). Instead of the name of a definite place, the meaning probably is that this nomad people had their villages, tent-villages, or encampments in the district.

HAZE'ROTH (id.). One of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xi. 35, xii. 16, xxxiii. 17, 18; Deut. i. 1). It is thought to be at Ain el-Hudhera about eighteen hours from Sinai.

HA'ZEZON-TA'MAR (pruning of the palm). The ancient name of En-gedi (Gen. xiv. 7). In 2 Chron. xx. 2 it is Hazazon-tamar. See EN-GEDI.

federacy against Joshua and the Israelites (Josh. xi. 1). It appears to have stood upon an eminence; for such is the meaning of the word tel, translated 'strength' (13) or 'heap' (marg.). Joshua destroyed Hazor (10, 11, 13, xii. 19); but it must have been afterwards re-built; for it was allotted to Naphtali (xix. 36); and later we find it again possessed by a Jabin, into whose hands God had delivered Israel for their sins (Judges iv. 2, 17; 1 Sam. xii. 9). It was fortified as an important post by Solomon (1 Kings ix. 15), and was one of the cities seized by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xv. 29). Its site is uncertain; though Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, pp. 285, 286) thinks he has found it in the modern Hazere, where there are many ruins.—2. A city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 23). It should probably be joined to the succeeding name, and be Hazor-ithnan; see ITHNAN.—3. 4. Two more towns of Judah, Hazor-hadattah, or New Hazor (for the words should not be separated as in our version), and Hezron which is Hazor (25). See HADATTAH, HEZRON.—5. A place perhaps to the north of Jerusalem, inhabited by the Benjamites after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 33).—6. An Arabian district (Jer. xlix. 28, 30, 33). See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Hazor, 4.'

HEAD. This word is of course most frequently used in the ordinary literal sense. The covering of the head was an indication of mourning (2 Sam. xv. 30), as was shaving the head (Lev. xxi. 5; Job i. 20); while anointing it was an expression of joy (Eccles. ix. 8; Matt. vi. 17). Sometimes men swore by their head (v. 36). The word also signified the chiefs, or most eminent of the people (Numb. xxv. 4). So the husband is called the 'head of the wife' (1 Cor. xi. 3; Eph. v. 23). And Christ is the 'head of his body the church' (i. 22, iv. 15; Col. i. 18). He is also the head over all creation (ii. 10). Again, the corner-stone of a building is 'the head of the corner' (Psal. cxviii. 22). These and other modes of using the word can present no difficulty to the observant reader of scripture.

HEAD-DRESS. So far as can be collected from the incidental notices of early Hebrew history, the probability is that coverings for the head were not in ordinary use. Thus it was a token of mourning to cover the head (2 Sam. xv. 30; Jer. xiv. 3, 4); and the ornament. This was specially the case with the high-priest's mitre, and the 'bonnets' of the ordinary priests, which are expressly said to have been 'for glory and for beauty' (Exod. xxviii. 36-40). And those which were intended by the Hebrew words tzantph both these head-coverings; just as turbans are now wrapped or bound about the head. Dr. Saalschütz is inclined to believe that these two together would constitute the modern turban, which consists of a conical cap, answering to the pêér, with folds of linen wound round it, the tzantph (Arch. der Hebr., cap. 3, vol. i. pp. 27, 28). The cap might be decorated with ornaments; as they were worked into the hair, and pendants worn. If, however, such coverings were only for official persons, or worn on festal days, there remains nothing to show that head-coverings were in ordinary use. The kish-urim 'head-bands' (Isai. iii. 20) imply binding: they were either fillets to confine the hair, or, as some imagine, girdles. The 'hats' of Dan. iii. 21 were mantles or outer tunics.

HEAL, HEALING. See PHYSICIAN. There is a peculiar expression in Mal. iv. 2, which may be explained here. A fresh gale is said to blow, in some parts of the Levant, at sunrise, from the sea across the land. This, from its salubrious effects, is called 'The Doctor.' Now we find 'the wings of the wind' mentioned (Psal. xviii. 10, civ. 3: comp. cxxxix. 9); we may therefore suppose this natural circumstance alluded to for illustrating the spiritual refreshment which attends and proceeds from the rising of 'the Sun of righteousness' with healthful beams (see Pict. Bible, note on place).

HEART. The Hebrews regarded the heart as the seat not only of the passions and emotions, such as love, hatred, pleasure, sorrow, &c., but also of the intellectual faculties (e.g. 1 Kings x. 24). We often therefore find the word 'heart' where, according to our present mode of expression, the 'mind' or 'understanding' would be used.

HEARTH (Gen. xviii. 6). There is no Hebrew word here separately to express 'hearth.' That for 'cakes' means round cakes which were baked, as at present, under hot ashes when haste was required: comp. 1 Kings xix. 6, 'a cake baked upon hot stones.' In Psal. cii. 3, the exact meaning of the original word used is 'fuel:' a different form of the same root occurs in Isai. xxx. 14, 'from the burning mass.' In Jer. xxxvi. 22, 23, we find another word: it means a brazier or stove. Such braziers are frequently now used. They are shaped like a large pitcher, and placed in a cavity in the floor. When the fire has burnt down, a kind of frame is placed over the brazier, and covered with a carpet; and persons warm themselves as they sit on the floor around by thrusting their legs under the carpet. In Zech. xii. 6 the original word means 'a fire-pan.'

HEATH (Jer. xvii. 6, xlviii. 6). It is doubtful whether any plant or tree is intended. Gesenius proposes to render 'like one forlorn,' or 'ruins,' as in Psal. cii. 17, where the same word is rendered 'deserted.' Henderson believes that it must be a tree, and supposes that some species of juniper is meant (The Book of Jeremiah, p. 105).

HEATHEN. The terms so rendered in our translation are occasionally represented by other words, as 'nations' or 'gentiles.' And the signification intended must have varied at different periods of the world's history. God 'made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth' (Acts xvii. 26); one word, therefore, goi, plur. goim, included all the people of the earth. And so we find it employed in Gen. x. 5, 20, 31, 32, where once it is in our version 'Gentiles,' the other times 'nations.' When, however, a single family was selected, to expand into a people, who were specially to be the depository of divine truth, and to become God's peculiar inheritance, then the word began to have a specific meaning, and to designate those who were not Israelites, even though they might locally inhabit Canaan (2 Kings xvii. 41). And, as just said, because among the Hebrews alone there was the knowledge of the true God, the word had a moral and religious sense, as nearly equivalent with ungodly or idolaters (e.g. Psal. ix. 5, 15, 17, where in the last-named verse 'nations'). It is still used among the Jews with somewhat of a contemptuous meaning (as Kafir, corrupted to Giaour among the Mohammedans) to designate persons not of their race, and therefore not entitled to their privileges.

The Greek word ethnos is in its signification nearly similar. It is true that it occurs (John xi. 50-52) for the Jewish people. But it has besides a larger sense (Acts xvii. 26; Gal. iii. 14), and also is expressly contrasted with the seed of Jacob or the circumcision (Luke ii. 32; Acts x. 45). We find, too, the idea of an ungodly person, or idolater, or one out of the covenant of grace, implied in it (Matt. vi. 7, xviii. 17). It is used in an extended sense in those passages which so emphatically inculcate the duty of the Christian church to the world (xxviii. 19; Luke xxiv. 47).

HEAVE-OFFERING (Numb. xv. 19-21). See OFFERINGS.

HEAVEN. A critical examination of the precise meaning of the Hebrew words so rendered in our version is obviously out of place in the present work. For such, lexicons must be consulted. But it may be observed that the term in most frequent use implies height, and that other terms imply either height or extension. The question what the Hebrews understood by the 'heaven' or 'heavens' has been keenly debated. Grave writers there are who seem really to imagine that the ancient Israelites believed there was a solid vault no great distance overhead, which was sustained by pillars, and provided with windows and doors, and in which the glittering stars were stuck. It is very possible that some children even among ourselves may entertain fancies of the kind; but few grown men, in any age or country, with any measure of intelligence or cultivation of the mind, could seriously accept a theory, the falsehood of which would be demonstrated by a journey of a few miles from home. The poetical expressions we meet with in scripture in reference to heaven must not be literally understood. See FIRMAMENT.

We ordinarily give three different senses to the word 'heaven.' We use it for the atmosphere immediately around, in which the birds fly and the clouds float; also for that immeasurable space in which other worlds, suns or planets, have their positions or their motions; and, further, for the glorious abode of the great King and Creator of the universe. Doubtless the ancients were not aware of the vast distances of the stars from our earth, which later science has revealed. But still the same three-fold use of the term may be observed in scripture (Gen. i. 20, xv. 5; Psal. xl. 4, xviii. 11; Jer. viii. 7, and elsewhere). Sometimes the expression 'heaven of heavens' is used for God's abode (Deut. x. 14; 1 Kings viii. 27; Neh. ix. 6). It is possible that St. Paul may speak of 'the third heaven' (2 Cor. xii. 2) with reference to this triple division; or, apart from this, he may mean simply the highest heaven. It has, indeed, been questioned whether there is sufficient authority for believing that the ancient Jews recognized the three-fold distribution; and certainly rabbinical legends say rather that there were seven heavens. But surely we may well imagine that the Jews would adopt that mode of using the word heavens which is so reasonable and natural to ourselves, and we need not require more explicit proof than the texts just referred to furnish.

Heaven, theologically, is understood to mean the state and place of blessedness which the saints attain after the present life. Scripture has revealed little on this subject to gratify men's curiosity, but quite enough to call out their better desires for such an inheritance. The prominent features of this blessed life are its holiness, its happiness, and the presence of the Lord in it. Various terms are used and various illustrations introduced to describe these. Into the heavenly city 'there shall in no wise enter anything that defleth' (Rev. xxi. 27). Nor shall any abide in God's tabernacle, or dwell in his holy place, but they that walk uprightly and work righteousness (Psal. xv. 1, 2). Those, therefore, that are before the throne of God must 'have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb' (Rev. vii. 14, 15). The unutterable joy they partake is further noted; 'They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes' (16, 17). The happiness shall be perfect in its degree, and eternal in its duration (Matt. xxv. 46; Rev. iii. 12). And he who hath now entered into the heavens, both as the priestly intercessor for his people, and as their fore-runner, will receive them into his intimate communion (John xiv. 2, 3; Phil. i. 23; Heb. vi. 20, xii. 22-24). But in truth we can form little idea at present either of the state or the place. And scripture itself can hardly do more than describe it by negatives (1 John iii. 2).

It may be added that the term 'heavens' is sometimes adopted for the Deity, the God of heaven (Dan. iv. 26).

HEAVEN, THE KINGDOM OF. A phrase frequently used (Matt. iii. 2, iv. 17, xiii. 11, 31, 33, 44, 47, xx. 1; 2 Tim. iv. 19, and elsewhere). Several equivalents occur, as 'kingdom of God' (Matt. vi. 33; Mark i. 14, 15; John iii. 3, 5), 'kingdom of Christ' (Matt. xx. 21; Rev. i. 9), 'kingdom of Christ and God' (Eph. v. 5), 'kingdom of David' (Mark xi. 10), and simply 'the kingdom' (Matt. xi. 35, xiii. 19). They all mean the kingdom of grace here, developing itself into the kingdom of glory hereafter. The grand idea implied is the theocracy, that formal establishment of Jehovah's lordship, in which he revealed himself as the King of his chosen people; all their earthly leaders being avowedly but his lieutenants. The picture of it in the Hebrew state and polity was the type of a far more glorious supremacy repeatedly predicted by the ancient prophets (Psal. ii. 6-12, cx.; Isai. ix. 7, 8, xi. 1-9, xxxii. 1; Dan. ii. 44, vii. 27). The rabbinical writers seem generally to have understood the Jewish religion by this phrase; but certainly in our Lord's time it must have been taken to indicate the establishment of Messiah's rule (Luke xix. 11; Acts i. 6), which was ordinarily conceived to be a temporal dominion. Christ checked this notion, and frequently demonstrated the spiritual character of his kingdom (Luke xvii. 21; John xviii. 36); but the error remained in the minds of even his disciples till the promised out-pouring of the Holy Spirit. Then, indeed, they understood its internal power, and proclaimed it as 'righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost' (Rom. xxi. 17). Some expositors deny that the phrase can mean the church or the religion of Christ here, but the kingdom of Messiah to be revealed hereafter. But this is clearly inconsistent with the sense of many of the places where the expression occurs. See Alford, The Greek Test., note on Matt. iii. 2.

HE'BEL (Gen. iv. 2, marg.). See ABEL.

HE'BER (society, fellowship).—1. One of the descendants of Asher (Gen. xli. 17; Numb. xxvi. 45; 1 Chron. vii. 31, 32).—2. A Kenite, of the family of Hobab, who was settled in Canaan. He appears to have been the chief of a separate clan; and it was his wife Jael who received and killed Sisera (Judges i. 16, iv. 11, 17, 21, v. 24).—3. A person mentioned in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 18).—4. A Benjamite chief (viii. 17).

HE'BER (the region beyond? a passer over?).—1. A descendant of Gad (1 Chron. v. 13).—2. A Benjamite chief (viii. 22). Our translators, it may be observed, have not been consistent in regard to this name. It is given as Eber in 12.—3. The patriarch Eber (Luke iii. 35).

HE'BERITES. A family of Asher, descendants of Heber (Numb. xxvi. 45).

HE'BREW, HE'BREWS. A name of the Israelitish nation. Critics are not agreed as to the origin of it. Some derive it from 'abar, to pass over, because Abraham crossed the Euphrates to Canaan; others from 'eber, beyond, because the patriarch had once dwelt beyond that river. But there is a strong objection to both these suppositions; for doubtless many dwellers beyond the Euphrates crossed it to seek fresh settlements: it is not, therefore, easy to see why the name should peculiarly attach to Abraham, or be continued to his descendants who never did dwell on the east of Euphrates. A better theory is that the appellation is a patronymic from Eber (Gen. x. 21, 24, 25, xi. 14-17). It is true there is no reason expressly given for regarding Eber as the head of the race from which the chosen people were to spring. But, as in the days of his son Peleg the earth was divided, colonies probably spreading themselves, and tribes beginning to assume a more definite position, we may not unfairly consider Eber as taking some kind of prominence as the original father of certain families; especially as the term Hebrews seems originally to have had a wider application (xl. 15, xliii. 32). An argument has been taken from xiv. 13; and it has been said that Mamre is designated by a patronymic, and so Abraham was likely to be. This is of little weight; we may find a better in Numb. xxiv. 24, where, as the Assyrians are called Asshur from their progenitor, the Israelites are denominated Eber from theirs. The term Hebrews, being eventually confined to the descendants of Jacob, was given them more especially by foreigners, or assumed by them in their intercourse with foreigners (Jonah i. 9): see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 279, note 3. They were known among themselves (though not exclusively: see 1 Sam. xiii. 3; Jer. xxxiv. 9) as Israelites, or sons of Israel, a theocratic and therefore more honourable appellation, the distinction probably being that Hebrew indicated the general political relation, Israelite the religious and religious-patriarchal relation. Hence a naturalized person would be called rather Hebrew than Israelite. Some time before the Christian era the ancient name Hebrews revived (Acts vi. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5), specially as distinguishing the pure Jews from the Hellenists or Grecian Jews. A 'Hebrew of the Hebrews,' as St. Paul called himself, implies the being from Hebrew parents on both sides.

From the name of the people naturally came the name of their language, Hebrew. This term, however, is not used in the Old Testament, but 'the language of Canaan' (Isai. xix. 18), 'the Jews' language' (2 Kings xviii. 26, 28; Neh. xiii. 24; Isai. xxxvi. 11, 13). 'In the Hebrew language' is first used in the prologue to Ecclesiasticus. The 'Hebrew' of the New Testament is Syro-Chaldaic.

HE'BREWESS (Jer xxxiv. 9). A Hebrew woman.

HEBREWS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. This letter, placed in our bibles after those which bear the name of St. Paul, is popularly ascribed to that apostle. There are, however, many questions connected with the authorship, canonical authority, the place in which, and the time when it was written, which have called forth the keenest discussions, and on which biblical critics are by no means as yet agreed.

It will be desirable to examine first, so far as space can be allowed in the present work, the authorship of this composition. Setting aside the supposed reference to it in 2 Pet. iii. 15, 16, we must acknowledge that the apostolic fathers were acquainted with it. Forster (Apost. Author. of Ep. to Hebr., pp. 541-613) maintains that Barnabas, Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp, all cite or allude to it. But none of these mentions the author's name. Pantænus, the head of the celebrated Christian school at Alexandria (about 180 A.D.) is the first who distinctly asserts the Pauline authorship. His successor, Clement, expresses the same belief. Origen is another witness. But this eminent man is hardly quite consistent; and his testimony may merely amount to this, that, while he believed the substance of the epistle to be Paul's, and considered the authority of tradition distinct in favour of its direct Pauline origin, he yet, impressed with the difference of style as compared with Paul's acknowledged writings, imagined that some one else, he is not able to say who, was the actual penman, not as an amanuensis, writing from dictation, but clothing Paul's sentiments in his own words. And this would seem to be the theory generally favoured in the Alexandrian church. Eusebius, later, though acknowledging that it had been questioned by some, expresses his own conviction of the Pauline origin of the epistle. And indeed, through Syria, Palestine, and Greece, it was generally ascribed to Paul before the rise of the Arian controversy, and afterwards almost universally the eastern Christians agreed in this belief. But in other parts of the church there was a difference of opinion. Justin merely alludes to it. Tertullian calls Barnabas the author; Cyprian does not appear to acknowledge it; and it may be safely said that, prior to the fourth century it was not considered in the west to be a genuine work of St. Paul's. The sum, therefore, of ancient testimony may be taken to be this, that, while the epistle was recognized in the earliest age, the authorship was not distinctly stated, that the eastern church soon began to ascribe it to St. Paul, while the western church denied or doubted that he was the writer, that there sprung up in Egypt first a belief, which afterwards spread, that, while the thoughts were certainly Paul's, they were expressed by some other person as the actual writer. After the fourth century the epistle was received as St. Paul's in the west; and this has since been generally the belief of Christendom, though the absence of his name, and the persuasion that another hand is apparent in the style of writing, have caused its place in the New Testament collection to be after Paul's acknowledged epistles.

Dr. Wordsworth, indeed, uses the diversity of opinions respecting the style and language of this epistle as a corroboration of St. Paul's authorship. 'They show that the question . . . had even then been discussed and examined. And this uniformity of independent witnesses (that the substance was Pauline), who differ from each other as to the minor matter of its phraseology, and whose testimony reaches back to primitive times, and comes from the most learned school of ancient Christendom (the Alexandrian), will not easily be shaken by any conjectural theories of later criticism' (The New Test., Introd. to Ep. to Hebrews, p. 357).

If Paul be not the author, it is impossible to decide who was. Barnabas, Silas, Apollos, and others have been suggested. But these have for the most part been but guesses, and can only be so treated. In Germany, indeed, one or other has been adopted by eminent writers, Apollos most frequently, as by Tholuck and Bleek; and Dr. Alford among ourselves, after careful examination of the pretensions of the rest, has declared his judgment to be in favour of Apollos, on the ground that the author, a Jew, must have been a Hellenist, imbued with the thoughts and phraseology of the Alexandrian school, intimately acquainted with St. Paul, belonging, however, to the second rank of apostolic men, not a dweller near Jerusalem, but of note and influence with those to whom he wrote (Proleg. sect. i. 148-191). Yet it may be fairly said that the general opinion of men, at least in this country, best competent to decide, is in favour of the Pauline authorship; either altogether, or, as has been explained, through the medium of some one who expressed Paul's thoughts.

An examination of the internal phenomena of this composition is necessary in order to reach any satisfactory conclusion. Prof. Robbins is one of the latest who has instituted such an examination, and has presented its results in a compendious form (Biblioth. Sacr., July 1861, pp. 492-535). The following considerations are especially relied on.

It is vain to allege as anything decisive that the style and mode of expression here differ from what we find in Paul's acknowledged compositions. Every writer will adapt himself to the circumstances of those he addresses. His own state of mind and feelings must have a material influence upon his pen; and, besides, so various are the topics on which St. Paul addressed different communities, that it is hardly possible to point out with precision any general characteristic of his diction.

Light is often thrown upon a vexed question of authorship by incidental expressions which have dropped from the writer. Critics have eagerly examined the epistle to the Hebrews for some of these indications. But there is little that can be laid hold of. It is urged that St. Paul would never have penned Heb. ii. 3, where the author seems to say he obtained his knowledge of the gospel at second-hand; whereas Paul lays stress on his apostolical authority, as in 2 Cor. xi., xii.; Gal. i. But it is replied that Paul, after the manner of most writers, frequently classes himself with those to whom he speaks (e.g. Rom. xiii. 11-13; 1 Cor. x. 8, 9; 2 Cor. vii. 1); and, further, that, in the place referred to, there is no question of apostleship, but the 'we' and 'us' are used for Christians generally, as distinguished from men of the Old Testament dispensation. The one had but the word spoken by angels, the others the personal witness of the Lord and of his immediate followers. It is said, again, that the description of the tabernacle and its furniture is erroneous (Heb. ix. 2-5). But it is replied that investigation (for which room cannot be found here) shows that there is no error, and, besides, that, if there were, it would affect rather the inspiration than the authorship of the work. Moreover, the mention of the 'bonds' (x. 34) is regarded as favouring the Pauline authorship. But stress must not be laid upon the passage: the reading is somewhat questionable. More weighty, perhaps, are the words of xiii. 18, 19, 23, which indicate an imprisonment and a hope of release, and also of a visit to be paid with Timothy. Still we have no mention elsewhere of Timothy's incarceration; but on the other hand the term rendered 'set at liberty' may mean simply sent away. 'They of Italy saluté you' (24) can tell little either one way or the other. There is no clear proof in the words of the writer's location. Italians, or persons from Italy, were with him when he wrote: nothing more can be concluded. These, it will be seen, are very uncertain traces; and we can infer from such personal references only that, if they do not prove the Pauline authorship, they as little disprove it.

The doctrine of this epistle must be compared with that of St. Paul's acknowledged letters. Of course there is an agreement, an unity of teaching, through the whole compass of the sacred scriptures, which all proceeded from the same informing Spirit. But yet in different writers we see truth in different aspects; and, if we can discover the same line of teaching in various compositions, the presumption is not weak that these flowed from the same pen. Now we are to take into account that the object of the epistle to the Hebrews was peculiar, and that it was addressed to a class of persons not the same with those to whom St. Paul writes in other letters. If, notwithstanding, we can trace the same kind of sentiments, the inference of identity of authorship will be so much the stronger. Observe, then, how the author exhibits the superiority of Christianity to Judaism, both in the Jewish dispensation being a type of the Christian (comp. Heb. viii. 5, x. 1 with Col. ii. 17), and also in the rites and observances of the law serving for an example of gospel blessings, which are far more complete and lasting (comp. Heb. vii. 15, 16, 19, viii. 1-9, ix. 9, with Gal. iii. 23-25, iv. 3, 9). No such coincidences with Paul can be found in the writings of Peter, James, or John. Then, further, the person, work, and offices of Christ are similarly set forth here and in Paul's acknowledged compositions. For Christ's person comp. Heb. i. 3 with 2 Cor. iv. 4; Phil. ii. 6; Col. i. 15. See also how creation is attributed to him (comp. Heb. i. 2, 3, 10 with 1 Cor. viii. 6; Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 16, 17). So again as to the relation between his humiliation and exaltation (comp. Heb. ii. 9, xii. 2 with Phil. ii. 8, 9); and Dr. Davidson observes that the idea 'that Jesus not only passed, through suffering obedience, to an exalted state, but obtained it as a reward for obedience unto death' is found in the New Testament only in the epistles of Paul (Introd. to N.T., vol. iii. pp. 211, 212). Similarly the idea that, through Christ's death, both death and the influence of Satan were destroyed occurs here and in the acknowledged Pauline epistles (comp. Heb. ii. 14 with 1 Cor. xv. 26, 56, 57; 2 Tim. i. 10). See, further, how the sacrifice of Christ and its effects are spoken of (comp. Heb. ix. 26, 28, x. 12 with Rom. vi. 9, 10; and Heb. ix. 15 with Rom. iii. 25). So, also, as to Christ's exaltation, and access to the Father by him (comp. Heb. i. 3 with Rom. viii. 34; Heb. ii. 8 with 1 Cor. xv. 27; Heb. iv. 14, vii. 26, with Eph. iv. 10; Heb. x. 19, 20 with Rom. v. 2; Eph. ii. 18). Then, again, the way in which faith, hope, and love are conjoined is thoroughly Pauline (comp. Heb. vi. 10-12 with 1 Thess. i. 3; 2 Thess. i. 4; and Heb. x. 22-24 with 1 Cor. xiii. 13). Many more such coincidences might be produced: the above may serve for a sample; and it is submitted that, if any singly are of little weight, taken together they furnish no contemptible proof of the Pauline authorship. It is indeed alleged that Christ's resurrection is not made prominent as in the epistles to the Corinthians and the Thessalonians. But as well might this be objected to those to the Romans and the Galatians, where equally no prominence is given to this truth. So again it is argued that we nowhere find in the Hebrews the contrast between faith and works. No more do we in the letter to the Thessalonians. Of course, as has been already said, the apostle would vary his line of admonition according to the special wants of those to whom he wrote. And then it is urged that the author of the epistle to the Hebrews is fond of allegorizing. This can be true only in the sense that he expounds the typical facts of the Old Testament; and surely this is no evidence against the Pauline authorship.

Another point must not be overlooked. The structure of St. Paul's epistles exhibits usually a particular type. There is first the doctrinal discussion, with occasional strains of hortatory application, or highly-raised feeling. Afterwards the practical admonitions follow, the prayer for those he addresses, the apostolical blessing, and the greetings. It is needless to say that these various parts are seen in the letter to the Hebrews. To be sure, personal matters are lightly touched; and the name does not appear. It may be hard to account for this; but there would be an almost equal difficulty in accounting for any early disciple withholding his name. Dr. Wordsworth, indeed, considers that the omission is more intelligible in St. Paul's case than it would be if any other man of that age were the writer. 'The divinely-inspired author,' he says, 'whoever he was, whose consummate wisdom is apparent from the epistle itself, was guided by God's Spirit, not only in writing the epistle, but in not prefaceing his name to it. And, if St. Paul had written such an epistle as this, we recognize strong and sufficient reasons why he should have been restrained from following his usual practice, and that of other writers of epistles, and from inserting his own name at its commencement. But we do not see similar reasons of equal force for the suppression of the name of Apollos, or Barnabas, or Clement, or of any other person, to whom the epistle has been ascribed. Therefore the non-appearance of the author's name in the epistle to the Hebrews does not diminish, but rather increases, the probability that its author was St. Paul' (ubi supr., p. 361).

The mode in which citations are made from the Old Testament deserves notice. Doubtless there are some variations from Paul's ordinary manner; but there are also some extraordinary points of resemblance. The whole subject cannot be investigated here; but the reader is requested to mark that Hab. ii. 4 is cited only in the Hebrews (x. 38), and, in a similar way, in Paul's acknowledged epistles (Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11), and that there is a still more remarkable coincidence between Heb. x. 30, and Rom. xii. 19; in both which places the Hebrew text and the Septuagint are departed from.

There are other topics which can here be only touched most briefly. Lists have been formed of leading passages in the Hebrews and St. Paul's acknowledged writings, which bear a marked resemblance, of expressions also similar, of words peculiar to both. As a single instance, comp. Gal. iii. 19 with Heb. ii. 2. And, though there may be some superiority of style visible here, yet still it would be hard to tie down an author at all times to just the same kind of style. It may be added that certainly upon this composition there is the impress of what we know from other sources was the character of this great apostle of the Gentiles.

The arguments which have been alleged are by no means dogmatically insisted on. Some doubts will probably always remain on this matter. But surely it is not going too far to say, with all appreciation of the eminent men who have reached a different conclusion, that the probabilities are much in favour of the Pauline authorship. Prof. Robbins sums up his investigations with the following remarks: 'The amount and value of the external evidence is, to say the least, strongly in favour of Paul as the author of the Hebrews. Internal evidence, though not perhaps in any one point taken by itself, so clear as not to admit of question, yet, in almost every particular, sufficient to render the composition by the apostle Paul probable. Circumstances alluded to in the epistle, if they do not point to the apostle to the Gentiles as author, do not, certainly, any more clearly suggest any other author. The sentiment and doctrines of the epistle, when its object and aim are taken into view, seem to us strikingly Pauline . . . The general characteristics of form are the same in the Hebrews and acknowledged Pauline epistles, with, however, many differences, such as we should expect in any encyclical letter purposely anonymous. While some of the formulas of quotation are unlike those most commonly used in some of the acknowledged epistles of Paul, as those epistles differ among themselves, still there are forms of reference to the Old Testament strikingly indicative of the same hand; and passages quoted with peculiarities which scarcely admit the supposition of diversity of authorship. . . . The superiority of style so generally attributed to the Hebrews, when brought to the test of a critical comparison, does not only not seem to demand diversity of authorship but indicates a higher and more studied effort of the same mind and pen. Similarity, rather than diversity, in the Hebrews and acknowledged epistles of Paul, in the use of particular words and phrases, is now generally acknowledged.' (pp. 533, 534).

Perhaps the considerations produced are sufficient to show that to Paul, as substantially the author, this epistle must be ascribed. But, granting this, there is the question before adverted to, whether the apostle was the sole author, or whether (as is supposed of Mark writing his Gospel under Peter's direction) he might not have employed some one to express, in a degree after his own fashion, his (the apostle's) meaning. An amanuensis we know (Rom. xvi. 22: comp. Gal. vi. 11) he frequently had: was the amanuensis here something more? Indeed it may be pertinently asked, did Timotheus, and Sosthenes, and Silvanus, so often joined in the superscriptions of other epistles, contribute any of their contents? If so, the supposition is the more probable that in this, intended for sufficient reason to be anonymous, another hand might be more largely used. Dr. Alford, however, decidedly rejects the supposition that two were concerned in the production of this work; while Mr. Roberts as decidedly expresses his belief that there must have been two, and fixes on St. Luke as St. Paul's coadjutor (Discuss. on the Gospels, part i. chap. vi. pp. 206-213), supposing that Paul himself added the closing verses (xiii. 19-25). On such matters the most clear-sighted critics will come to opposite conclusions.

In regard to the canonicity of this epistle little need be said. If the Pauline origin be taken as proved, the canonical authority will not be doubted. But, if it be supposed that Apollos, or other such writer, penned this letter, still the early testimonies above referred to, without naming the writer, sufficiently show how it was regarded from the beginning. It was included in the Peshito Syriac version. And, though for a while in the west certain doubts were felt, or it was left without notice, yet the testimony of the Greek and eastern churches was so strong that, from the days of Jerome and Augustine who received it, it was generally in the west also accounted canonical.

As to the time and place of writing, of course those who hold the Pauline authorship must differ from those who deny it. If St. Paul was the writer, it was perhaps sent from Rome about the close of his first imprisonment, 63 or 64 A. D. If it was the work of some other inspired man, it must still have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, perhaps 68 A. D. from, Dr. Alford guesses, Ephesus.

That this epistle was no translation, but written as we have it in Greek, may be considered certain. But it is a matter of dispute to whom it was addressed. To Jewish Christians indisputably; but to what special community of them? Here again we have a wide circle of conjectures; and there is hardly a country where such may be supposed to have settled, from Spain to Greece and Asia, which some critic has not discovered to be the original destination of this letter. Dr. Alford imagines it sent to the Jewish Christians at Rome. But it is difficult to understand how, on such a supposition, its authority was specially doubted in the west; and still more puzzling to believe that the writer should address a church in such terms as we find in Heb. v. 11, 12, when St. Paul had some time before spoken of the same in the language used in Rom. xv. 14. It was sent more probably to the Jewish Christians in Palestine; Prof. M. Stuart supposes particularly to those in Cæsarea; but perhaps even at first it had a yet wider range.

The epistle itself, which some have strangely doubted to be an epistle, sufficiently explains its object and the occasion of its being written. The enmity of the unconverted Jews to the gospel involved believers in a two-fold danger, that of persecution and that of apostasy. The writer would meet this by proving the superiority of Christianity to the earlier covenant. Hence he exhibits from the Old Testament, and from the nature of the case, the superiority of Jesus to the high priests of the law, and the consequent superiority and sufficiency of his sacrifice as a means of reconciliation with God. The most intimate understanding of the Mosaic ritual is evinced; and the reasonings are intermingled with various solemn warnings, and earnest encouragements to perseverance in the faith:

The epistle may be thus distributed.—1. A demonstration of the deity of Christ by explicit proofs from the Old Testament: his superiority to angels (i., ii.), to Moses and Aaron, to the whole Jewish priesthood, is insisted on (iii.-viii.) and the typical nature of the legal ceremonies shown (ix. 1-10); Christ's sacrifice being that true and only sacrifice by which all the Levitical sacrifices are superseded (ix. 11-x. 18).—2. The application of the preceding arguments and proofs: those addressed are warned of the danger of apostasy, and exhorted to steadfastness in the faith of Christ, being encouraged thereto by the examples of ancient worthies, also to patience, peace, holiness, &c. (x. 19-xiii. 19).—3. Conclusion, comprising a prayer and apostolical salutations (xiii. 20-25).

Of commentaries on this epistle, that of Dr. John Owen, to be found in his works, and re-printed (1840) in four 8vo. volumes, must always be highly valued. Philologically it is behind modern requirements, but it is a well-filled storehouse of doctrinal and experimental divinity. The modern ones of Stuart and Delitzsch may be consulted with advantage.

HEBRON (alliance).—1. A son of Kohath, the son of Levi. He was the ancestor of one of the Levitical families often referred to in the sacred history (Exod. vi. 18; Numb. iii. 19; 1 Chron. vi. 2, 18, xv. 9, xxiii. 12, 19; comp. xxiv. 23, where the word is supplied).—2. The name occurs in the genealogical lists of Judah (ii. 42, 43); but it is not clear whether a person or a place is intended, probably a place.

HEBRON (id.). An ancient city of Palestine, said to have been 'built seven years before Zoan in Egypt' (Numb. xiii. 22). Hebron bore also the name of Kirjath-arba, 'the city of Arba' (Gen. xxiii. 2; Josh. xiv. 15; Judges i. 10), because it was the residence of Arba, the progenitor of the Anakim. Which was the earlier of the two names is uncertain. Unless Arba was the builder, Kirjath-arba could not well have been the original. Some critics, indeed, assume that the city was not called Hebron till the Israelites had entered Canaan; they consequently infer that Moses was not the writer of a history in which the name Hebron occurs. But this conclusion is by no means just. There are instances in which cities and countries known by one name have had another put upon them, and have afterwards resumed the original appellation. See the question argued in respect to Hebron in Horne, Introd., vol. ii. p. 593, edit. Ayre.

Abraham dwelt at Hebron (Gen. xiii. 18): here Sarah died, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (xxiii. 2, 19): here also Isaac and Ishmael buried Abraham (xxv. 9): Isaac, too, and Jacob, lived some time here, and were buried in their father's sepulchre (xxxv. 27, xxxvii. 14, xlix. 29-32, l. 13). Machpelah, close by, is said to be before Mamre, which possibly may be another name for Hebron. See MACHEPELAH, MAMRE.

On the conquest of Canaan, Hebron was assigned to the tribe of Judah, and is described as being in the mountains (Josh. xv. 54). The Amorite king had been conquered and the city taken by Joshua (x. 3, 5, 23, 36, 39, xii. 10); but it would seem that the sons of Anak still occupied the position in force. It is, therefore, further related that Caleb, under Joshua as general-in-chief, succeeded in exterminating these giants (xi. 21, xiv. 6-14); and hence to Caleb Hebron was given for an inheritance (xv. 13, 14). It was subsequently made over to the priests, and constituted a city of refuge; the surrounding fields and villages being reserved for Caleb (xx. 7, xxi. 11-13).

We hear little more of Hebron till the time of David, who was here anointed king, and reigned over Judah seven years and six months (2 Sam. ii. 1-3, 11); six of his sons being born here (iii. 2-5). After he became king of all Israel, he quitted Hebron and fixed his residence at Jerusalem, which he wrested from the Jebusites (v.

4-10). This city was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 25). It was occupied by the Idumeans, but was captured by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. v. 65). In the New Testament it is not mentioned; but, according to Josephus, it was destroyed shortly before the taking of Jerusalem (Bell. Jud., lib. iv. 9, § 9).

Hebron, now el-Khulfi, stands twenty-two miles south of Jerusalem: its present population may be about 7,000 or 8,000, of whom 700 are Jews; there are no Christians in the town or district. Its appearance is described as beautiful. 'On gaining the summit of a rocky hill,' says Bartlett, 'Hebron burst suddenly upon us, with its smiling region of corn, olive-groves, and vineyards—the vineyards of Eshcol. . . . On a sloping hill-side, rising above the valley, is the quadrangle of massive and ancient stone-work, which encloses the building said to contain the cave of Machpelah. At its foot, occupying the valley and side of the opposite hill, lies the town itself, divided into three groups of flat-roofed and domed dwellings. The valley and its enclosing hills, winding into far perspective towards the desert-frontier, in the luxuriance of their eastern mode of cultivation, and covered with thymy pasturages, justify the description of a land flowing with milk and honey: afar, beyond the unseen caldron of the Dead Sea, the long range of the Moab mountains shuts in the extensive area' (Walks about Jerusalem, pp. 216, 217). A mile up the valley is a vast oak tree, popularly said to be the tree of Mamre under which Abraham pitched his tent. Two ancient pools remain, the lower one 133 feet square and 22 feet deep, the upper 85 feet by 55 feet and 19 feet deep (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 583). It might be over one of these that David hanged the murderers of Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 12).

HEBRON (passage?). A city of Asher (Josh. xix. 28). Probably it is identical with ABDON, which see.

HEBRONITES. A family of Levites, descendants of Hebron (Numb. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chron. xxvi. 23, 30, 31).

HEDGE. There are two words, each appearing with some variety of form, which are translated 'hedge' in our version: one simply means an enclosure, of whatever material; the other a tangled hedge formed of some prickly shrub. They both occur in Isai. v. 5, the fence, of loose stones or mud; the hedge, of thorns. Enclosures of any kind are rare in Palestine. Only gardens, vineyards, &c. are so protected. The prickly pear, a kind of cactus, is used for the purpose, well illustrating Prov. xv. 19; and the stone walls of sheep-folds are now often topped with thorns.

HEEL. To lift the heel against any one (Psal. xli. 9) was an act of insolent aggression: to make bare the heels of a female (Jer. xiii. 22) was to disgrace her; the heels of a modest woman being covered by her train. In Psal. xlix. 5 for 'heels' liers-in-wait or trackers must be understood. As to the sentence upon the serpent (Gen. iii. 15), the heel of the woman's seed would be the part most exposed to injury from his bite, while the victor's foot was on his head: but the injury would not be on a vital part, trifling compared with the crushing of the head.

HE'GAI or HE'GE (eunuch? venerable?). The eunuch or chamberlain who had charge of the women in the harem of Ahasuerus (Esth. ii. 3, 8, 15).

HEIFER. The words translated 'heifer' signify generally a young cow; thus, one of three years old (Gen. xv. 9), as used for ploughing (Judges xiv. 18), as giving milk (Isai. vii. 21, 22, in our version 'a young cow'), as treading out corn (Hos. x. 11), also as untamed and wilful (Jer. i. 11; Hos. iv. 16). It may be in the same sense that the term is applied to Moab (Isai. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34), to denote independent self-confidence. Some critics, however, prefer regarding the words as a proper name, Eglath-Sheleshiah, one of the places to which the fugitives would wander. See Henderson, Isaiah, note on xv. 4.

There was a remarkable ordinance prescribed in the Mosaic law, that a red unblemished heifer, never touched by the yoke, was to be slain (perhaps) by the priest, the blood being sprinkled before the tabernacle; and then the whole carcass was to be burned, cedar-wood, hyssop, and scarlet being also cast into the fire. The ashes were afterwards to be gathered and laid up. These ashes, mixed with running water, were applied to purify those who had contracted uncleanness by touching a dead body, or a bone, or a grave; the tent, too, and the vessels in it, where a person had died (Numb. xix.; Heb. ix. 13). It may be asked why pollution should be thus communicated. Death, we may reply, is the penalty of sin. He, then, that touched a corpse, touched that guilty thing on which the penalty had been executed, and contracted ceremonial defilement. The polluting character of sin was thus remarkably exemplified, and the need of some purification from it. See Fairbairn, Typol. of Script., vol. ii. pp. 376-380, 2d edit.

HEIR. See BIRTH-RIGHT, FIRST-BORN, INHERITANCE.

HEL'AH (rust). One of the wives of Ashur the father of Tekoah (1 Chron. iv. 5, 7).

HE'LAM (strong-hold). A place beyond the Jordan, but west of the Euphrates, where David gained a victory over the Syrians (2 Sam. x. 16, 17).

HEL'BAH (fajness, fertile region). A town in the territory of Asher (Judges i. 31).

HEL'BON (fat, fertile). A place noted for excellent wines which were conveyed to Tyre from Damascus (Ezek. xxvii. 18). It has been frequently supposed that Helbon is the modern Aleppo; but Mr. Porter has discovered a village and district, still bearing the ancient name, a few miles from Damascus, celebrated for peculiarly-fine grapes. It lies in a glen high up in Anti-libanus; and there are considerable ruins around.

HELCH'AH, HELCH'AS (1 Esdr. viii. 1; 2 Esdr. i. 1). Greek forms of Hilkiah.

HEL'DAI (worldly).—1. A captain of David's militia (1 Chron. xxvii. 15).—2. One who returned from Babylon, for whom with others memorial crowns were to be made (Zech. vi. 10): in 14 he is called Helem.

HE'LEB (fat, fatness). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 29).

HE'LED (life, the world). Also one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 30). He is identical with Heleb; possibly also with Heldai, 1.

HE'LEK (portion). A descendant of Manasseh (Numb. xxvi. 30; Josh. xvii. 2).

HE'LEKITES. The family of Manasseh descended from Helek (Numb. xxvi. 30).

HE'LEM (stroke). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 35).

HE'LEM (dream). A person mentioned in Zech. vi. 14, identical with Heldai, 2.

HE'LEPH (exchange). A place on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). Some have proposed to identify it with Beiliff to the west of Kades.

HE'LEZ (perhaps loin, strong?). One of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chron. xi. 27, xxvii. 10): in the first-named place he is called the Paltite, in the last two the Pelonite.—2. One of Judah's posterity (ii. 39).

HE'LI (summit, the highest). A person in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 23).

HE'LI (2 Esdr. i. 2). The name of a person alleged to be an ancestor of Esdras.

HEL'AS (2 Esdr. vii. 39). Elijah.

HELIODOR'US (2 Macc. iii. 7-40). The treasurer of Seleucus Philopator, king of Syria, sent to plunder the temple at Jerusalem. His purpose is said to have been supernaturally frustrated.

HELIO'POLIS (city of the sun) (Ezek. xxx. 17, marg.) See ON.

HEL'KAI (Jehovah his portion). A priest in the days of Joiakim, representative of the family or course of Meraioth, or Meremoth (Neh. xii. 15).

HEL'KATH (a portion). A border-city of Asher (Josh. xix. 25) afterwards allotted to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 31). In 1 Chron. vi. 75 Hukok is substituted.

HEL'KATH-HAZ'ZURIM (the portion, i.e. field, of swords, or, according to some, of strong men). A spot near Gibeon where twelve of Joab's encountered twelve of Abner's men, the whole of the combatants falling (2 Sam. ii. 16).

HELK'AS (1 Esdr. i. 8). Hilkiah the high priest.

HELL. In the way in which this word is commonly used, it is understood as implying the place of torment in another world. This, however, was not the original signification of the English; nor does such an idea accurately represent the meaning of the Hebrew and Greek words, the originals of 'hell' in our translation.

According to its derivation, our word 'hell' means the covered or concealed place, and this is akin to the Hebrew shēol, which most probably implies a cavity or hollow subterranean pit. It is poetically described in scripture as dark (Job x. 21, 22), as underground (Deut. xxii. 22), as having valleys or depths (Prov. ix. 18), as shut in with gates and bars (Job xvii. 16; Isai. xxxviii. 10). It is spoken of also as voracious, insatiable, and cruel (Prov. i. 12, xxx. 16; Sol. Song viii. 6; Isai. v. 14). Those who die are said to go down to it (Gen. xlii. 38; Psal. lv. 15; Ezek. xxxi. 15, 17). It is represented as laying snares for men (2 Sam. xxii. 6; Psal. xviii. 5); while such as escape or expect to escape death are said to have made a covenant or come to an agreement with it (Isai. xxviii. 15, 18). It is manifest that these expressions are used figuratively: the Hebrews were not so simple as to imagine shēol really fenced with gates and bars. It was the separate state, the 'under-world,' the receptacle of departed spirits, used indifferently in respect to all who were dead, whether they were the wicked to be punished, or the faithful to be blessed. Doubtless in earlier times the Israelites had no very distinct idea of the condition of the departed. Nor are we even now authorized to speak dogmatically. The veil is not yet lifted up from the world of spirits; and little beyond the broad outline are we able to discover of its form and character.

It is evident by what has been said that shēol by no means necessarily means a place of torment. In many cases our translators have properly rendered it 'the grave;' not the literal excavated pit, but more generally the state or condition of the dead. But they do not always adhere to this, and occasionally use language which conveys a wrong notion to ordinary readers. The Greek word hades is similarly treated. Of course a doctrine is not to be deduced merely from a parable; but yet parables offer valuable illustrations of scripture truths. And abp. Trench has said very justly on the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi. 19-31): 'Abraham's bosom is not heaven, though it will issue in heaven; so neither is hades hell, though to issue in it, when death and hades shall be cast into the lake of fire which is the proper hell. It is the place of painful restraint (1 Pet. iii. 19), where the souls of the wicked are reserved to the judgment of the great day' (Notes on Parables, pp. 467, 468, 6th edit.). So, when our Lord is said to have descended into hell (Psal. xvi. 10; Acts ii. 27, 31), the grave, the place of departed spirits, and not the region of eternal punishment, is to be understood. See Pearson On the Creed, art. v.; who discusses many opinions which have been propounded on the subject.

Other words are used when the place of final punishment is designated; such as geenna of fire, 'hell-fire' (Matt. v. 22, 29, 30), tartaros (2 Pet. ii. 4), the 'lake of fire' (Rev. xx. 14), and probably 'the bottomless pit' (ix. 1, 2, 11, xi. 7, xvii. 8, xx. 1, 3). See GEHENNA, HINNOM, PUNISHMENT.

HELL, GATES OF (Matt. xvi. 18). The power of the kingdom of death.

HELLENIST. In a few passages of the New Testament we find the Greek term hellenistes (Acts vi. 1, ix. 29, xi. 20; the reading being, however, in the last-named place questionable), rendered in our version 'Grecians,' used in a kind of opposition to Hebrews. The distinction was not of race or residence, but rather of language. A pure Jew, as in the case of St. Paul (Phil. iii. 5), might have been born or resided out of Palestine, but he spoke ordinarily the Syro-Chaldaic dialect, and read the Hebrew scriptures. A Hellenist or Grecian spoke Greek as his common language, and used generally the Septuagint translation of the bible. A Hellenist or Grecian might or might not be a Greek, that is, of Greek or foreign race: he might be a purely-descended Jew or a Gentile proselyte. The term Hellenist, therefore, indicates a class differing from the Hebrew on the one hand and not necessarily identical with the Greek on the other.

The existence of this class had a powerful influence, as preparing for the diffusion of Christianity and supplying the language in which the authorized documents of the gospel were composed. The Hellenists were a link of communication between the Palestinian Jews and the external world. Preserving for the most part their connection with the temple, they had adopted, with the language, much of Greek manners and modes of thought; and they were prepared, when converted to the faith of Christ, to become a body of missionaries to various regions. See DISPERSION, GREECE, GREEKS. Their language was not the classical Greek of earlier times. The Macedonian conquests had resulted in a breaking up of the Greek system of states; and hence the wide-spread use of what was called the common dialect of the Greek tongue. The staple of this was indeed of Attic texture; but certain Attic forms were disused in it: for various Attic words others were substituted; and some forms and words were introduced from other dialects. The language thus became modified into that kind of speech which prevailed at the courts of Syria and Egypt, and in the schools of Alexandria and Tarsus. But used by the Hellenist it had an additional element. Hebrew ideas were to be expressed, and religious truth conveyed in a tongue which was not originally formed to express it. A Hebrew spirit, therefore, breathed through the Greek words. But Hellenistic Greek was not less precise, not less governed by exact rules than the Greek of the Attic writers. Moulded after a different pattern, it retained all its flexibility and power of expression. It became thus most admirably fitted to be the medium through which the doctrines of Christianity were promulgated to the world. So that, in the tongue which distinguished the class of Hellenists, and in the circumstances of the class itself, we may see the remarkable providence of God preparing the best way for the accomplishment of his own gracious purposes.

The explanation given above of the term Hellenist is that which has been most generally received. But Mr. Roberts, in his valuable Discussions on the Gospels, 1862, takes a different view. He maintains, and with the greatest probability, that Greek was generally understood and spoken in Palestine concurrently with Hebrew, or rather Syro-Chaldaic, and he adduces many strong reasons to prove that our Lord and the apostles commonly used the Greek tongue. But, if this be so, the distinction between the Hellenists and the Hebrews could hardly have been one of language, but rather of principle and tendency. 'The term Hellenist, as applied to a Jew,' Mr. Roberts thinks, 'meant one who did not hedge himself round by the peculiar usages of Judaism, but, yielding, less or more, to the spirit of the age in which he lived, was ready in various ways to adopt and observe the opinions and practices of the Gentile world.' Hence, then, 'if Hellenists denoted those Jews who had relaxed in the stringency of their Judaism, Hebrews will be those who adhered more rigidly to the forms of their ancient faith.' It is evident that there were two such parties in the Christian church. The believing Jews who were 'zealous of the law' (Acts xxi. 20) suspected Paul's teaching and conduct; and it was those only who 'came from James' whom Peter feared (Gal. ii. 12); though certainly he must have found previously converts at Antioch who were Jews. They were Hellenists; the newcomers Hebrews. But the student is referred for full information to Mr. Roberts' book, part i. chap. v. pp. 145-165.

HELMET. See ARMS.

HE'LOH (strong). A Zebulunite, whose son Eliab was the chief of his tribe (Numb. i. 9, ii. 7, vii. 24, 29, x. 16).

HELPS (1 Cor. xii. 28). There does not appear to have been any order in the church specially so called. The word, being with others in the abstract, would indicate that the specified gifts were bestowed, not on one, but on many different classes.

HEM OF GARMENT. The Israelites were commanded to put fringes upon their garments (Numb. xv. 38, 39; Deut. xxii. 12), a kind of edging which would prevent the ends of the cloth from unravelling; also in the corners possibly of the outer garment, which was quadrangular, there was to be a narrow blue riband. These fringes or borders were in process of time enlarged; and it was one part of the superstition of the Pharisee, so to enlarge them as to attract special notice (Matt. xxiii. 5). Hence there was a kind of sacredness attributed to the hem of the garment; and this seems to have been the reason why diseased persons specially desired to touch the hem of Christ's garment (ix. 20, xiv. 36; Luke viii. 44).

HE'MAN (destruction) (Gen. xxxvi. 22). See HOMAM.

HE'MAN (faithful).—1. A person remarkable for his wisdom (1 Kings iv. 31). Possibly he may be the same person as the one mentioned of the posterity of Judah, in the line of Zerah (1 Chron. ii. 6); and this last, though called the 'son' of Zerah, may be, according to the ordinary usage of the word, a more distant descendant.—2. An eminent Levite, in David's time, grandson of Samuel the prophet. He had fourteen sons and three daughters, and was one of those who took a leading part in the administration of the sacred services; he 's also called (as Asaph and Jeduthun) 'the king's seer in the matters of God' (vi. 33, xv. 17, 19, xvi. 41, 42, xxv. 1, 4, 5, 6; 2 Chron. v. 12, xxix. 14, xxxv. 15). His sons continued to hold the position in which their family was placed by David. One of the psalms is ascribed to Heman the Ezrahite, i.e. the descendant of Zerah (Psal. lxxxviii., title); whether this Heman was identical with No. 1 must be uncertain.

HE'MATH (fortress). This name, so spelt in 1 Chron. xiii. 5, and in many copies of our version of Amos vi. 14, is identical with HAMATH, which see.

HEM'ATH (warm springs). The father of the house of Rechab (1 Chron. ii. 55).

HEM'DAN (pleasant). One of the descendants of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26). His posterity probably were some of the tribes of Arabia Petraea. In 1 Chron. i. 41 he is called Amram.

HEMLOCK (Hos. x. 4; Amos vi. 12). The word thus rendered in these places is elsewhere translated 'gall': see GALL.

HEN (favoured). A person to whom, with others, certain crowns were to be given as memorials (Zech. vi. 14). He is possibly the same as Josiah (10). But some critics do not suppose that the word is here a proper name.

HEN. This familiar bird is alluded to only in our Lord's touching simile when lamenting the perverseness of Jerusalem (Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 34; comp. 2 Esdr. i. 30). It is remarkable that a bird which must have been so common in Palestine should not be more frequently mentioned.

HE'NA (low ground?). A city conquered by some king of Assyria shortly before Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii. 34, xix. 13; Isai. xxxvii. 13). It was probably on the Euphrates, where now stands Ana or Anah.

HE'NADAD (favoured of Hadad). The head of a family of Levites, who were active in rebuilding the temple and repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Ezra iii. 9; Neh. iii. 18, 24, x. 9).

HE'NOCH (initiating or initiated).—1. (1 Chron. i. 3). See ENOCH.—2 (i. 33). See HANOCH.

HE'PHER (a pit, a well).—1. A son of Gilead, of the tribe of Manasseh (Numb. xxvi. 32, 33, xxvii. 1; Josh. xvii. 2, 3).—2. One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 6).—3. One of David's warriors (xi. 36): the name is omitted in the catalogue of 2 Sam. xxiii. 34.

HE'PHER (id.). The name of a territory in Palestine, whose king or petty chief was destroyed by Joshua (Josh. xii. 17). It formed part of one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 10).

HE'PHERITES. A family of Manasseh descended from Hephher (Numb. xxvi. 32).

HEPH'ZI-BAH (my delight is in her).—1. The wife of Hezekiah, and mother of Manasseh (2 Kings xxi. 1).—2. The name is symbolically used to designate Jerusalem restored and sanctified (Isai. lxii. 4). Professor Blunt observes on this that 'it is not improbable that the royal nuptials of Hezekiah occurred about the time of this prophecy, and that Isaiah, after the manner of the prophets in general, availed himself of the passing event, and of the name of the bride, as a vehicle for the tidings which he had to communicate.' He considers this as illustrating the trustworthiness of the sacred record (Undesigned Coincidences, 5th edit., pp. 236-238).

HERALD (Dan. iii. 4). There is no other notice but that just given in the Old Testament of a herald, properly so called, i.e. one who makes a public formal proclamation. In the New Testament the idea is familiar; and the word 'herald' might sometimes be well substituted for 'preacher' (e.g. 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 5).

HERB. See GRASS.

HERCULES (2 Macc. iv. 19, 20). The classical name for the tutelary deity of Tyre. Mr. Westcott believes that the proper name of this god was Melchart, i.e. king of the city (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 787).

HERD, HERDMAN, HERDSMAN. A considerable part of the riches of the patriarchs consisted in their flocks and herds, that is, their smaller and their larger cattle (Gen. xiii. 2, 5, xxvi. 14, xxxii. 5, 7; Job i. 3, xlii. 12); kine forming the greatest and most valuable portion of the herds. Oxen were bred in Egypt (xli. 2-4, xlvii. 17, 18); and Jacob and his family carried theirs down with them when they went thither (xv. 32, xlvii. 1). The land of Goshen, which was assigned them, was favourable for breeding and pasturing cattle; and, though shepherds and herdsmen were little regarded ('an abomination') among the Egyptians, yet it was not thought unfitting for some of Joseph's brethren to be placed over Pharaoh's cattle (xvii. 6). When the Israelites left Egypt, they took their flocks and herds with them, it is emphatically said, 'very much cattle' (Exod. xii. 38). It would seem probable that they multiplied in the wilderness, many parts of it supplying pasture (iii. 1); for we find the tribes of Reuben and Gad specially mentioned as possessing abundant herds, and on that account desiring to have their inheritance in the country on the east of the Jordan, which was 'a place for cattle' (Numb. xxxii. 1-5). Half the tribe of Manasseh, too, was located in Bashan (Josh. xiv. 29, 30), also well adapted for breeding cattle. This increase of the herds was partly due to the expedition against the Midianites (Numb. xxxi. 32-34). And we read that afterwards their cattle increased in Gilead (1 Chron. v. 9), and that other similar booty was obtained (21). Indeed, generally speaking, cattle were the prize of the victors in war (1 Sam. xxx. 20): the prohibition against appropriating the flocks and herds of the Amalekites was peculiar, and it was ill-obeyed by the people (xv. 3, 9, 14, 15). Hence we find oxen almost always mentioned, if any man's property is spoken of (Exod. xx. 17, xxiii. 4; 1 Sam. xi. 7; 2 Chron. xxvi. 10). It was not considered any degradation among the Hebrews personally to tend the cattle: Saul, Elisha, and others are mentioned in connection with them (1 Sam. xi. 5; 1 Kings xix. 19; Amos i. 1); and the chief of the herdsmen seem to have been persons of importance (1 Sam. xxi. 7; 1 Chron. xxvii. 29-31). But it was not customary, nor is it now, in the east, to eat much flesh-meat, specially of oxen (Numb. xi. 22); calves, however, were killed for food (Gen. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24; Luke xv. 23); and the herds yielded milk, butter, and cheese (Deut. xxxii. 14; 2 Sam. xvii. 29). Oxen were employed in agriculture, and were common victims in sacrifice (1 Kings viii. 63); generally when young (e.g. Exod. xxix. 1; Numb. vii. 15). At seasons when pasturage failed, oxen were kept in stalls (2 Chron. xxxii. 28; Prov. xv. 17; Hab. iii. 17; Mal. iv. 2). There they were fed with straw, chopped small (Gen. xxiv. 25; Isai. lxxv. 25), and 'fodder' or 'provender,' which seems to have been a mixture of different kinds of grain (Job vi. 5; Isai. xxx. 24); see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 788.

HE'RES (the sun).—1. A mount (Judges i. 35) near to or identical with IR-SHEMESH, which see.—2. (Isai. xix. 18, marg.). See IR-HA-HERES.

HE'RESH (artificer). A Levite (1 Chron. ix. 15).

HERESY. This word occurs several times in our version of the New Testament (Acts xxiv. 14; 1 Cor. xi. 19; Gal. v. 20; 2 Pet. ii. 1). The original Greek term is much more frequently met with; but in other places it is otherwise rendered. Its proper meaning is a choice; thence it comes to signify a chosen mode of life, and then in a religious sense a particular school or party. Thus it is used to designate the 'sect' of the Sadducees (Acts v. 17), that of the Pharisees (xv. 5); and the Christians were called the 'sect of the Nazarenes' (xxiv. 5): the appellation being given sometimes in a good, sometimes in a bad sense. The bad sense ultimately prevailed. The divisions which men made in the church by choosing to follow their own unbridled will were denunciations from apostolic doctrine; and heresy came to the sense which it at present bears—pernicious error in doctrine. This is almost exactly the meaning of the word in 2 Pet. ii. 1, strange self-chosen doctrines opposed to truth, and leading to destruction. The 'heretic,' therefore (Tit. iii. 10), was one who belonged to 'a self-chosen and divergent form of religious belief or practice' (Alford, in loc.). 'These early heretics,' as Conybeare observes, 'united moral depravity with erroneous teaching' (Life of St. Paul, vol. ii. p. 480, 1st edit.: see vol. i. pp. 479-492, for an account of heresies in the primitive church).

HER'MAS (Mercury, the god of gain, and messenger of the gods). A Christian at Rome, to whom St. Paul sends salutation (Rom. xvi. 14). To him has been attributed a work called 'The Shepherd of Hermas'; some, however, ascribe this to a later person of the same name, brother of Pius I., bishop of Rome. It was originally written in Greek, but it now exists entire only in a Latin version. It comprises three books; the first containing four visions, the second twelve commands, the third ten similitudes. There is much piety and truth in it; and much that is superstitious and absurd. And it is matter of astonishment that any should have been inclined to class it with the inspired scripture (see Gieseler, Kirchengesch. vol. i. pp. 147, 148).

HER'MES (id.). A Christian at Rome (Rom. xvi. 14).

HERMOGENES (begotten of Mercury). A person of whom nothing more is known than that St. Paul says that he and Phygellus had turned away from him (2 Tim. i.

15). There are others of the same name mentioned in ecclesiastical history.

HER'MON (lofty, or prominent peak). A high mountain on the north-eastern frontier of Palestine (Deut. iii. 8; Josh. xii. 1). It is also described as opposite to Lebanon (xi. 17), and as on the border of Bashan (xii. 5; 1 Chron. v. 23). Hermon was called Sirion by the Sidonians, and Shenir by the Amorites (Deut. iii. 9), or Senir (1 Chron. v. 23), likewise Sion (Deut. iv. 48). There is no difficulty in identifying Hermon. It rises boldly at the southern end of Anti-libanus to the height of about 10,000 feet above the level of the sea. Its summit (or rather summits, for there are three) is a truncated cone, elevated 2000 or 3000 feet above the more continuous chain. It is visible throughout almost all Palestine. Dr. Thomson describes it as seen from Sarepta, from Tyre, and from the Dead sea (The Land and the Book, pp. 159, 177, 611). Mr. Porter says: 'From the plain along the coast, from the mountains of Samaria, from the Jordan valley, from the heights of Moab and Gilead, from the plateau of Bashan, that pale-blue snow-capped cone forms the one feature on the northern horizon' (Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 789, 790). Hermon, now called Jebel esh-Sheikh, 'the chief mountain,' and sometimes Jebel eth-Thelj, 'the snowy mountain,' is never without snow. Through the spring till the earlier part of the summer, the top is covered; but, as the weather becomes hotter, large masses melt, and the snow remains only in streaks in the ravines. On one of the summits are the remains of a circular wall enclosing a small ruined temple. Probably this marked the site of one of the 'high places,' where worship was paid to idols. 'The dew of Hermon' (Psal. cxxxiii. 3) was the founder of it was an Idumean, governor of Idumea under Alexander Jannæus king of Judea and Alexandra his queen; the religion of the Idumeans after their subjection by John Hyrcanus, about 129 B.C., being the Jewish. This Antipater had a son of his own name, who was appointed by Julius Cæsar procurator of Judea, Hyrcanus II. being high priest, 47 B.C.

1. Herod, called the Great, was the son of this second Antipater, and was made governor of Galilee at the age, it is said, of 15 years (comp., however, Vssher's Annals, 47 B.C.), and afterwards governor of Cœle-syria. When Mark Antony was in Syria, he appointed Herod and his elder brother Phasaël (their father being dead) tetrarchs of Judea; but this government of the two lasted not long. The Parthians invaded Judea, and supported the pretensions of Antigonus, of the Asmonean family, to the throne. Phasaël died by his own hand in prison; and Herod fled to Rome. There by the favour of Antony, and with the assent of Octavianus (afterwards Augustus), he was declared by the senate king of Judea, 40 B.C. It was not however, till three years after that by Roman help he took Jerusalem, and fully established himself in his dominions. Though he had been an adherent of Antony he was confirmed in his authority, and his territories were enlarged, by Augustus after the battle of Actium; so that his power ultimately extended over Idumea, Judea, Samaria, Galilee, Perea, Trachonitis, Batanea, Gaulanitis, and Iturea, including the district of Paneas. Herod was fond of splendour, and lavished immense sums in adorning the cities of his kingdom. He restored or re-built the temple at Jerusalem (see TEMPLE), which was not, however, completed till many years after his death. He re-built very likely the distillation of the vapours condensed by the snowy crown of the mountain; and 'Zion,' in the same passage, is no doubt used as being one of the various names of Hermon. It may be added that the ridge Jebel ed-Duhy on the north of the valley of Jezreel has been called the 'Little Hermon.'

HER'MONITES (Psal. xlii. 6). This is an incorrect rendering. The mountain had three summits, and is therefore spoken of in the plural as 'the Hermons.'

HER'OD, THE HERO'DIAN FAMILY. The ancestry of the Herodian family is involved in much obscurity. But the Antipas or Antipater who may be considered also the Samaritan temple. But he showed his utter indifference to religion, by introducing heathen games at Jerusalem, providing for heathen worship at Cæsarea, and even sacrificing at Rome to the heathen deity, Jupiter, when appointed to his kingdom. The history of his domestic administration, and specially of his family, is a history of blood. He married many wives and had many children; and several of these he put to death. No wonder that such a man was troubled, when he heard the tidings of a new-born king (Matt. ii. 3), the true Prince of Zion. His last illness was signalized by various acts of cruelty, the execution of his eldest son Antipater, and

(about the same time doubtless) the murder of children at Beth-lehem (16-18); and he had intended that, when he was no more, many of the Jewish nobles should be slain, to spread that mourning through the land which he knew his own decease would not excite. He died in the 70th year of his age, most probably 4 B.C., shortly before the passover.

2. Archelaus was the son of Herod the Great and Malthace, a Samaritan. See ARCHELAUS. His administration was tyrannical, and his conduct disgraceful. He provoked his subjects to accuse him to the emperor, by whom he was banished to Vienne, in Gaul, 6 A.D., where most probably he died.

3. Herod Antipas was also the son of Herod the Great and Malthace. He obtained, according to his father's last will, the tetrarchy of Galilee and Perea. He married first the daughter of the Arabian king Aretas, but afterwards connected himself with Herodias, his niece, and the wife of his half-brother Herod Philip. Through her instigation he put John Baptist into prison and afterwards executed him (Matt. xiv. 1-12; Mark vi. 14-29; Luke iii. 1, 19, 20, ix. 7-9). This was the Herod to whom Pilate sent our Lord as one of his subjects (xxiii. 7-12). He appears to have been a weak and superstitious man, crafty and unprincipled (xiii. 31, 32); and he had his reward. Aretas, his father-in-law, revenged his daughter's wrongs by invading his territory and defeating him. And, urged by Herodias's ambition, he went to Rome to solicit the title of king, already conferred on his nephew Agrippa. His suit was unsuccessful, and he was first banished to Lyons, 39 A.D., whither Herodias accompanied him, and afterwards transferred to Spain, where he died. A writer in Smith's Dict. of the Bible suggests that it might not be to the well-

Philip that of an individual. This Philip lived as a private person.

5. Philip, or Herod Philip, to be carefully distinguished from his brother and namesake, No. 4, was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra. He was tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis (iii. 1); and some other territories, as Batanea, Gaulanitis, Paneas, and Auranitis being also under his sway (Joseph., Antiq., lib. xvii. 8, § 1, 13, § 4). It was he that built Caesarea Philippi (Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27) on the site of Paneas. He married the wicked Salome, daughter of Herodias, but was himself a mild prince, the most blameless of his family. He died at Julius (Bethsaida) 34 A.D.; and as he left no children his dominions were adjoined to the Roman province of Syria.

6. Herod Agrippa I., the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and the grandson of Herod the Great, was brought up at Rome, where he was thrown into prison by Tiberius. But on the accession of Caligula he was released, and had the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias assigned to him with the title of king. It was from jealousy of his prosperity that his uncle Herod Antipas made the application at the imperial court, which terminated in his own downfall, and the addition of his dominions to those of Agrippa. He soon after reached a still greater height of power. Having rendered considerable service to Claudius, his kingdom was by that emperor augmented with the provinces of Judea and Samaria, 41 A.D., so that he reigned over territories as wide as those of his grandfather. He professed great strictness in the religion of the Jews, and to please them put the apostle James to death, and seized also the apostle Peter, who was miraculously delivered from the prison. Soon after occurred the awful catastrophe at Caesarea, when Agrippa, in the midst of his vain-glorious known Lyons that Antipas was exiled, but to a town of similar name among the Pyrenees, close therefore on the borders of Spain (vol. i. p. 796). This, however, is but a conjecture.

4. Philip, or Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne. He had married his niece Herodias, and had by her a daughter, the too-famous Salome. Herodias left him to cohabit with his brother, Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17; Luke iii. 19). The evangelists call him Philip; whereas in the history of Josephus he is termed Herod. But this is no contradiction. Herod was a general family name, display, was struck with a terrible disease, 'because he gave not God the glory,' and perished miserably (Acts xii. 1-23). This was in 44 A.D.

7. Herod Agrippa II. was the son of the Herod just named. He was but seventeen at his father's death, and was judged too young to succeed to such dominions. But Claudius gave him first, 48 A.D., the principality of Chalcis, with the oversight of the temple of Jerusalem and the right of appointing the high priest, and four years after exchanged his principality for the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, allowing him also the title of king. Nero, 55 A.D., added to his dominions. It was before this Agrippa, who was suspected of incestuous connection with his sister Berenice or Bernice, that St. Paul pleaded at Cæsarea (xxv.

For further details respecting the Herodian family, Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Herodes,' with the writers there referred to, may be consulted. It should be added that some of these princes are termed kings in the gospel history, though not formally invested with the title by the imperial Roman court.

The following pedigree, abridged from that in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 792, may be useful as exhibiting the descent and relationship of the Herods mentioned in scripture: their names are printed in small capitals :-

no doubt there were many who would be glad of the relaxation of the strict Jewish ritual, and be disposed to admit that kind of compromise between Judaism and heathenism which characterized the Herodian rule. In both these respects this party would dislike our Lord's teaching and dread his success; and therefore, though disagreeing with both Pharisees and Sadducees, they would not hesitate to unite with them for his destruction (Matt. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6, viii. 15, xii. 13; Luke xx. 20).

HERO'DIAS. The daughter of Aristobulus, a son of Herod the Great by Mariamne. She first married her uncle Herod Philip, also a son of Herod by another Mariamne: by him she had Salome. She left him to cohabit with Herod Antipas, who had a wife alive, daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia. There was thus a double adultery; and, besides, Herod was her uncle by the half-blood. Aretas revenged his daughter's dishonour by attacking and defeating Herod. It was this wickedness that John Baptist reproved (Matt. xiv. 1-12; Mark vi. 14-29). Herodias accompanied Antipas in his exile to (it is generally believed) Lyons.

HERO'DION. A Christian whom St. Paul calls his kinsman (Rom. xvi. 11), being probably of the same tribe.

HERON. One of the birds prohibited to the Israelites for food (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18). Several species, it is likely, are included, as there is the addition 'after her kind.' But critics are not at all agreed as to the kind of bird meant. It is by no means certain that it was the heron. From the HEROD THE GREAT (Matt. ii. 1).

HERO'DIANS. The Herodians who are mentioned in the Gospels appear to have been rather a political party than a religious sect. They probably attached themselves to the family of Herod with the notion that their authority and influence would be the best security against the entire absorption of Judea into the Roman empire. And derivation of the original word we may conjecture that it was some bird that breathed hard, perhaps hissed, and was irascible. Some have therefore guessed it the goose. Mr. Gosse, however (Imp. Bible Dict., vol. i. pp. 737, 738) approves the common rendering, and suggests the Ardea russata, little golden egret, as a species abundant in Asia : it is called the caboga, or cow-heron, in India.

HE'SED (desire, mercy). The son of Hessed, or Ben-hesed, was one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 10).

HESH'BON (reason, device). The capital of Sihon, king of the Amorites. It appears to have been upon the western part of the plain, or high table-land, east of the Jordan. It had originally belonged to Moab; when Sihon was conquered it was rebuilt by the tribe of Reuben, but, lying just on the boundary-line of Reuben and Gad, it was reckoned as territorially a Gadite city when allotted to the Levites (Numb. xxi. 25-34, xxxii. 3, 37; Deut. i. 4, ii. 24-30, iii. 2, 6, iv. 46, xxix. 7; Josh. ix. 10, xii. 2, 5, xiii. 10-27, xxi. 39; Judges xi. 19, 26; 1 Chron. vi. 81). In later times the Moabites regained possession of Heshbon; so that it is mentioned as a Moabitish town in the prophetic denunciations against that people (Isa. xv. 4, xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlvi. 2, 34, 45, xlix. 3). The ruins of this city still exist, twenty miles east of the point where the Jordan falls into the Dead sea. They are called Heshbân, and occupy a low hill in the great plain. There are some remarkable remains among them; and cisterns are still to be seen, with an ancient reservoir (Sol. Song vii. 4).

HESH'MON (fatness, fat soil). A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 27), probably near the Edomitic border. Wilton would connect it with the Edomite king Husham (Gen. xxxvi. 34, 35), and identifies it with 'Ain Hasb. He also thinks that it is the same with Hashmonah, one of the stations in the wanderings of Israel (Numb. xxxiii. 29, 30) (The Negeb, pp. 121-134).

HES'RON, HES'RONITES. In some copies of our version HEZRON and Hezronites are thus spelt in Numb. xxvi. 6.

HETH (fear). One of the sons of Canaan, of the family of Ham. He was the progenitor of the people called first the sons and daughters of Heth, but afterwards known as Hittites (Gen. x. 15, xxiii. 3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 18, 20, xxv. 10, xxvii. 46, xlix. 32; 1 Chron. i. 13): see HITTITES.

HETH'LON (wrapped up, hiding-place). A place on the northern boundary of Palestine (Ezek. xlvii. 15, xlviii. 1). It must have been near, or perhaps identical with, the 'entrance of Hamath' (Numb. xxxiv. 8).

HEWING IN PIECES. This mode of punishment is said to have been inflicted by Samuel on Agag, king of the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 33). It was not a Hebrew form of putting to death; but Kitto (Pict. Bible, note on the place) gives some instances of its being employed, as in Abyssinia, and by Djeddar the notorious pacha of Acre : comp. Dan. ii. 5, iii. 29.

HEZ'EKI (strong). A Benjamite (1 Chron. vii. 17).

HEZEKIAH (Jehovah strengthens).—1. The son and successor of Ahaz, king of Judah, twenty-five years old when he ascended the throne. His reign lasted twenty-nine years, 725-696 B.C. (2 Kings xviii. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxix. 1). If the present text be accurate, Hezekiah must have been born in his father's eleventh year; for Ahaz died when he was thirty-six (2 Kings xvii. 2). Instances of paternity as early as this have been produced by various writers; so that the case, though extraordinary, is by no means unparalleled (Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 78, 79). But some critics have supposed an error in the numbers, and that either Hezekiah was but twenty at his accession, or Ahaz twenty-five at his. This last supposition has some countenance from ancient versions.

Hezekiah was one of the most godly of the sovereigns of Judah. His first acts were to re-open, repair, and cleanse the temple, celebrating the occasion by solemn offerings to the Lord. He also removed the high places, forbidding sacrifice even to the true God in them. And he broke in pieces the brazen serpent which Moses had made in the wilderness, because the people paid a superstitious reverence to it—calling it by a contemptuous name—'a piece of brass' (2 Kings xviii. 3-6; 2 Chron. xxx. 2-36; Isaiah xxxvi. 7). These proceedings, we may easily conclude, did not pass unquestioned. The evil counsellors of Ahaz would strive to maintain their influence in the new reign. So much, perhaps, we may gather from the reproofs of Isaiah (Isa. viii. 9-13, xxviii. 14-18). But the king had the inestimable advantage of the counsels of this great prophet, to whose divinely-inspired messages he appears to have given diligent heed. If, therefore, he encountered opposition, it did not turn him from his purpose. Subsequently the passover was kept, as it had not been for many generations, with a great concourse of people, not only from Judah but from the tribes of Israel. It has been thought that this passover was held after the fall of Samaria; for the remnant are addressed that were 'escaped out of the hand of the king of Assyria.' If so, it could not have been earlier than Hezekiah's sixth year. See Keil, ubi supr., pp. 79, 80. But the matter is uncertain; and it is worth noticing that Hezekiah's invitations were responded to rather by the northern section of the tribes, Manasseh, Zebulun, and Asher, than by the people immediately round Samaria (2 Chron. xxx.). The celebration of this feast was the signal for fresh measures of reformation, extending into the Samaritan kingdom; while the services of the temple and the rites of the law were yet more diligently observed in the king of Judah's own dominions (xxx.).

As Hezekiah honoured God, so God honoured him with temporal prosperity. He subdued the Philistines, and, according to the annals of Sennacherib, kept Padiya, king of the Ekronites, a prisoner in Jerusalem. He prospered also in other enterprises, and renounced his allegiance to the Assyrian monarch (2 Kings xviii. 7, 8). In the fourteenth year of his reign, however, he was obliged to purchase forgiveness for this by the payment of a large fine, for which he had to take some of the gold of the temple. For Sennacherib's forces had overrun the country: the fortified towns were taken (13-16; 2 Chron. xxxii. 1-8; Isa. xxxvi. 1); the Assyrian march towards Jerusalem being perhaps that described in x. 28-32.

The tribute thus yielded saved Jerusalem; and Sennacherib turned his arms elsewhere. It must have been at this time that Hezekiah was visited with that fatal sickness (supposed by some to be the plague), which he was warned would be unto death. At his earnest prayer, however, a prolongation of his life was granted for, as he was informed, fifteen years: a plaster of figs was by Isaiah's direction laid upon the boil: a miraculous sign was given; and a promise added of deliverance from the Assyrian power. Hezekiah recovered, and composed a plaintive elegy on the occasion. And then came the great fault of his life. Ambassadors from Babylon arrived to enquire of the wondrous retrocession of the sun, the sign of his recovery. To these the king vain-gloriously displayed his treasures, and was rebuked and told that his children should be made eunuchs in that Babylon, from which envoys were now courting his alliance (2 Kings xx.; 2 Chron. xxxii. 24-26, 31; Isai. xxxviii., xxxix.).

It is not easy to settle the chronology of this king's reign. Very many critics have believed that but a single Assyrian invasion occurred, and consequently that the destruction of Sennacherib's army took place about the time of Hezekiah's sickness. But we may with more probability suppose that there were two invasions—one that already noticed, the other so fatal for the Assyrian king some few years subsequently. This is the opinion of a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, whose article, however, vol. i. pp. 798-801, must be read with caution: comp. Rawlinson, Herodotus, vol. i. p. 477: see also for some further details the article below, SENNACHERIB.

If this supposition be well-founded, the narrative of 2 Kings xviii. 17-37, xix.; 2 Chron. xxxii. 9-23; Isai. xxxvi. 2-22, xxxvii., must describe the later invasion. The king of Assyria, who was besieging Lachish, sent Rabshakeh with an insulting and blasphemous message to Jerusalem. Afterwards, when alarmed by the news of the approach of the Ethiopian king, he reiterated his demands in a letter to Hezekiah. The Jewish monarch sought help where alone it could effectually be obtained. He asked the prayers and advice of Isaiah, and spread the Assyrian letter in humble supplication before the Lord. Speedily he had an encouraging reply. The Lord would interpose. The king of Assyria 'shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shields, nor cast a bank against it. By the way that he came, by the same shall he return, and shall not come into this city, saith the Lord. For I will defend this city to save it, for mine own sake, and for my servant David's sake.' And the infliction of the judgment is related with awful brevity. 'The angel of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred and four-score and five thousand; and, when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses.' Whether it was the simoom of the desert, or whether 'the pestilence that walketh in darkness' that was employed, as a secondary cause, we know not.

The work was God's own justly-inflicted vengeance.

Probably Hezekiah did not long survive this event. He was succeeded by his son Manasseh, born twelve years before his father's decease, of Hephzi-bah (2 Kings xx. 21, xxi. 2), to whom Prof. Blunt supposes an allusion in Isai. lxii. 4 (Undes. Coincid., part iii. 5, pp. 236-238). And, on Hezekiah's decease, the bright light of God's favour to Judah was clouded again; and the nation under their new king sunk once more into foul idolatry.

2. A descendant of the royal line of David (1 Chron. iii. 23).—3 (Ezra ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21). See ATER, 1.

HEZ'ION (vision). The grandfather of Ben-hadad I., king of Syria (1 Kings xv. 18). It has been conjectured that he was the same with Rezon (xi. 23); this is, however, but a conjecture.

HEZ'IR (a swine).—1. The head of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 15).—2. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 20).

HEZ'RAI (enclosed). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 35). He is also called HEZ'RO (id.). (1 Chron. xi. 37).

HEZ'RON (id.).—1. One of the sons of Reuben (Gen. xli. 9; Exod. vi. 14; Numb. xxvi. 6; 1 Chron. v. 3).—2. A son of Pharez and grandson of Judah (Gen. xli. 12; Ruth iv. 18, 19; 1 Chron. ii. 5, 9, 18, 21, 24, 25, iv. 1).

HEZ'RON (id.). A city in the south of Judah, called also Hazor (Josh. xv. 25). Wilton would unite the preceding name Kerioth with Hezron, and would translate 'Kerioth-hezron, which is Hazor-amam,' believing that we have here both the name which the city bore at the time, and that which it had previously to its conquest by the Anakim. It was originally, he thinks, a pastoral settlement of the Horites, one of whose chiefs was Heman or Homam (Gen. xxxvi. 22; 1 Chron. i. 39): it was afterwards taken and fortified by the Anakim, and eventually conquered by the tribe of Judah, who attached to it the name of one of their distinguished worthies. He would identify it with el-Kuryetein, where are some considerable ruins (The Negeb, pp. 99-106).

HEZ'RONITES.—1, 2. Two families in Reuben and Judah (Numb. xxvi. 6, 21).

HID'DAI (joyful). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 30). In 1 Chron. xi. 32 he is called Hural.

HID'DEKEL (the rapid Tigris, Tigris itself signifying velocity). One of the rivers of Eden (Gen. ii. 14), mentioned also as a great river by the prophet Daniel (Dan. x. 4). There can be no reasonable doubt that the Tigris is intended; the Arabic name of which is Dijleh. The principal source of this river is at an elevation of nearly 5,000 feet above the level of the sea, on the southern slope of that range of mountains which form the southern wall of the valley of the Murad-chal, at a point a very few miles distant from a bend of the Euphrates. The course of the Tigris is, generally speaking, south-east. It receives, besides many smaller tributaries, several large streams, such as the greater and the lesser Zab, and flows into the wide central plain at Samara.

Passing Baghdad it joins the Euphrates at Kurnah; and the united waters enter the Persian gulf. The whole length of the Tigris has been estimated at 1,150 miles. Between Diarbekr and Mosul, about 300 miles, it is navigable at seasons of flood for rafts; and below the last-named city it is generally navigable for vessels of no great draught, though the channel is impeded more or less by rocks and rapids, till it quits the hill-country. In 1838 the steamer 'Euphrates' ascended the stream to within twenty miles of Mosul.

HY'EL (God lives). A Beth-elite, who, in defiance, it would seem, of the curse denounced by Joshua (Josh. vi. 26), re-built Jericho (1 Kings xvi. 34).

HIERAP'OLIS (sacred city). A city of Phrygia Magna, east of Colosse, and about six Roman miles north of Laodicea. It was celebrated for mineral springs, and a cave where a stifling vapour was evolved; these springs still exist; and there are considerable ruins of the ancient town. Christianity was most probably introduced here at the same time as at Colosse (Col. iv. 13). The modern name is Pambouk-Kalessi.

HIER'EEL (1 Esdr. ix. 21). Jehiel (Ezra x. 21).

HIER'EMOTH.—1. (1 Esdr. ix. 27). Jeremoth (Ezra x. 26).—2. (1 Esdr. ix. 30). Ramoth (Ezra x. 29).

HIERIE'LUS (1 Esdr. ix. 27). Jehiel (Ezra x. 26).

HIER'MAS (1 Esdr. ix. 26). Ramiah (Ezra x. 25).

HIERON'YMUS (2 Macc. xii. 2). A governor under Antiochus Eupator, king of Syria.

HIGGAI'ON. One of the words occurring in the book of Psalms, which have most probably a technical meaning. We find it used occasionally in the sense of meditation, thought, device; so it is rendered in our version of Psal. xix. 14; Lam. iii. 62. Elsewhere it has obviously a different sense. What that sense is critics are not agreed. But, looking at the derivation of the word, its root being used for the deep sound of thunder (Job xxxvii. 2), and for the growl of the lion (Isai. xxxi. 4), we may most probably conclude that it means a deep solemn sound; so our version of Psal. xcii. 3. In ix. 16 it is joined with Selah and left untranslated.

HIGH PLACES. From a very early period it was customary to offer solemn worship upon hills. Thus Noah's sacrifice to the Lord was probably on one of the spurs of Ararat (Gen. viii. 20). Abraham certainly built an altar on a mountain to the east of Beth-el (xii. 8). In itself the practice was unobjectionable; and men seem to have imagined elevated ground peculiarly appropriate for divine worship. Perhaps they thought it nearer to the skies. It is not clear, however, that the so-called high places were always on hills: the two are distinguished in 2 Kings xvi. 4; and it is probable that, after being originally an eminence, any spot appropriated to worship was designated a 'high place.' See Kitto in Pict. Bible, note on 2 Chron. xxviii. 25. As pure worship degenerated into idolatry, and when superstitious reverence was paid to these heights, and foul rites were practised on them, God commanded the Israelites to break down the altars there and to destroy the sanctuaries (Exod. xxxiv. 13; Deut. vii. 5, xii. 2, 3), because they were polluted, and the Lord would have one place alone where his worship should be performed (10-14).

This command was very imperfectly executed (Judges ii. 2); and we find high places used and honoured, and in some degree sanctioned, for some ages of Israelitish history; a great distinction being always made between those where service was paid to Jehovah and those where idolatry was practised. It is difficult to explain all the examples we find; though various writers have exaggerated the difficulty, and by strange mistakes have confused matters in themselves very plain. Thus it is likely that high places may have supplied the want which afterwards caused the establishment of synagogues. And, if they were frequented merely for devotion, there was not even a shade of infringement of the law. What we have to account for is the building of altars and the offering of sacrifice. Now some sacrifices were offered by special divine injunction, as those of Gideon and Manoah (vi. 25-27, xiii. 15-20); he who gave the law certainly having power to suspend it at his will. Then again, when the land was convulsed by civil discord, or overrun by enemies, it might often be physically impossible to reach the place where the tabernacle stood. This fact will explain many of the apparent anomalies. The offerings mentioned in xx. 26-28, xxi. 4, seem to have been perfectly regular, made before the ark by Phinehas the high priest. The sacrifice at Mizpeh by Samuel is accounted for by the imminent danger of the country from the Philistine supremacy (1 Sam. vii. 9, 10); as also that of Saul (xiii. 9, 10). Altars, it is true, are said to have been built by Samuel at Ramah (vii. 17), and by Saul at Ajalon (xiv. 35); but it does not necessarily follow that sacrifices were offered upon either (comp. Josh. xxii. 11, 21-29). There was a high place at Ramah (1 Sam. ix. 11-14), and another at or near Beth-el (x. 5, 13); but we are not told that sacrifices were offered at these. The sacrifices at Beth-lehem was by God's especial command (xvi. 2-5), as also that by David at Araunah's threshing-floor (2 Sam. xxiv. 18-25), for which also there was an additional reason (1 Chron. xxi. 18-30) in the awful presence of the destroying angel. Any difficulty in respect to Elijah's sacrifice is obviously imaginary (1 Kings xviii. 17-40). Sometimes, indeed, the legal worship of the nation was at a high place. Thus the tabernacle made by Moses was for a while at Gibeon while the ark was in Jerusalem; Zadok and Abiathar, it has been thought, officiating respectively at these two shrines (iii. 4; 1 Chron. xv., xxi. 29). The considerations adduced will go far to explain the apparent sanction given to the establishment or allowance of high places by prophets and holy kings; and, if they are not entirely satisfactory, it is probably because we have not all the information necessary for full explanation.

After the building of the temple no doubt the precept of the law was held more strictly binding. And the rather, because high places for idol-worship soon began to rise, crowned with shrines, and furnished with priests. Solomon himself was the first offender (1 Kings xi. 7, 8). In Israel, of course, after the disruption, Jeroboam had an establishment of mock priests for his high places (2 Chron. xi. 15); and idolatrous rites prevailed there from generation to generation. In Judah, as already observed, there were similarly high places for false gods; there were also such places dedicated to Jehovah. The first the pious kings removed (xiv. 3, 5, xvii. 6), while the latter, not without at least implied censure, they allowed (1 Kings xv. 14; 2 Chron. xv. 17, xx. 33). At last, in the reformations of Hezekiah and Josiah, all the high places were discontinued and annulled (2 Kings xviii. 4, xxiii. 1-20; 2 Chron. xxxi. 1, xxxiv. 3-7). It would seem that it was not without opposition, or some discontent of the people, that this was effected; for Rabshakeh relied on the fact as a means of stirring up rebellion against Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 22). It is clear that some of the line of Aaron had officiated at these unlicensed places: their priesthood was admitted; but they were disqualified for God's holy service (xxiii. 5, 9).

HIGH PRIEST. Aaron, the elder brother of Moses, who had been associated with him in announcing God's message to Pharaoh, and working the miracles which preceded the deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Exod. iv. 14-16, vi. 20, 26, 27), and who afterwards received sundry marks of sacred notice (xxiv. 1, 9-11, 14), was subsequently with his family specially appointed to the priesthood (xxviii. 1); the father being the chief, to be succeeded in his supremacy in a regular order throughout their generations.

It is not possible to trace with certainty the descent of the high-priesthood. Ordinarily it was hereditary; and we may suppose that the rule was for the elder son to succeed the father. But there are examples of its being held (we know not exactly why) in the younger line. And in later periods of the Jewish state great irregularities prevailed, the dignity frequently being not kept for life, and passing sometimes to those who had no legal right to hold it, and were not even of the family of Aaron. Nor do we know at what age a son might properly, at the death of his father, assume his office; but it may be that it was twenty (2 Chron. xxxi. 17); also it is uncertain how far, in early times, the civil ruler acted, on a vacancy in the high priesthood, in either selecting or inaugurating his successor. Besides, though we have priestly genealogies from Aaron downwards, it by no means follows that all in the line actually held the pontifical office. The following table, therefore, is given as only probably exhibiting the succession of the high priests:—

Aaron.

Eleazar (Numb. xx. 25-28).

Phinehas (Josh. xxii. 13, 30-32; Judges xx. 28).

Abishua?
Bukki?
Uzzi?

These three are in the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. vi. 4-6); but it is not clear from scripture whether all or any of them were actually high priests: see Josephus, Antiq., lib. v. 11, § 5, lib. viii. 1, § 3; Selden, De Success. in Pontif. Ebr., lib. i. cap. iv.

Eli, of the line of Ithamar (1 Sam. i. 9).
Ahitub (1 Sam. xiv. 3; 1 Chron. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11).

Ahiah
Ahimelech

These names are mentioned as of persons filling the high priest's office (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18, xxi. 1, xxii. 9, 11, 20); they may have been different appellations of the same person; if they are really two, they were brothers.

Abiathar (1 Sam. xxii. 20, xxiii. 6, 9).
Zadok

He was of the line of Eleazar, and was for long associated with Abiathar, and ultimately succeeded him (2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Kings ii. 26, 27, 35).

Azariah

(1 Chron. vi. 9, 10). The observation made on a high priest of this name shows that he was in office at the completion of the temple. But there are two Azariahs mentioned, one the grandson of the other: perhaps there is some confusion in the text; the note appended to the last name belonging to the first.

Johanan?
Azariah?

Amariah (1 Chron. vi. 11; 2 Chron. xix. 11).
Jehoiada (2 Kings xi. 4, 9, 15, 17). Jehoiada's name does not appear in the genealogy of 1 Chron. vi. 1-15; but it seems evident that some persons are omitted there; and certainly the sacred narrative implies that Jehoiada was more than an inferior priest.

Zechariah? (2 Chron. xxiv. 20-22).

Azariah (2 Chron. xxvi. 17, 20).

Urijah (2 Kings xvi. 10, 11, 15, 16).

Azariah (2 Chron. xxxi. 10, 13).

Shallum? (1 Chron. vi. 13).

Hilkiah (2 Kings xxii. 4; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9).

Azariah? (1 Chron. ix. 11).

Seraiah (2 Kings xxv. 18).

Jehozadak (1 Chron. vi. 15).

Jeshua, or Joshua (Ezra ii. 2, iii. 2; Hagg. i. 1).

Joiakim

Eliashib

Joiada

Jonathan

Jaddua

Neh. xii. 10, 11.

This and the following names are taken with scarce any variation from Selden, ubi supr., capp. vii., ix., x., xi.

Simon I. or the Just.

Eleazar.

Manasseh.

Onias II.

Simon II

Onias III.
 Jason.
 Menelaus.
 Lysimachus, or Alcimus, that is, Jakim or Joakim.
 Jonathan Maccabeus. Selden introduces Judas Maccabeus before his brother; but it is doubtful whether Judas ever held the dignity.
 Simon.
 John Hyrcanus.
 Aristobulus.
 Alexander Jannæus.
 Hyrcanus II.
 Aristobulus II.
 Hyrcanus II. restored.
 Antigonus.
 Ananel.
 Aristobulus, last of the Asmonean family.
 Ananel restored.
 Jesus, the son of Phabes.
 Simon, son of Boethus, father-in-law of Herod the Great.
 Matthias, son of Theophilus.
 Joazar, son of Simon, Herod's brother-in-law.
 Eleazar, brother of Joazar.
 Jesus, son of Sie.
 Joazar restored.
 Ananus, son of Seth, the Annas of the New Testament.
 Ismael, son of Phabi.
 Eleazar, son of Ananus.
 Simon, son of Camithus.
 Joseph, called Caiaphas, son-in-law of Ananus or Annas.
 Jonathan, son of Ananus.
 Theophilus, also son of Ananus.
 Simon Cantheras.
 Matthias, another son of Ananus.
 Alioneus, son of Cantheras.
 Joseph, son of Caneus.
 Ananias, son of Nebedeus.
 Ismael, son of Phabi.
 Joseph, called Cabel, son of Simon Cantheras.
 Ananus, a fifth son of Ananus.
 Jesus, son of Dameus.
 Jesus, son of Gamaliel.
 Matthias, son of Theophilus.
 Phannias, or Phanasus, son of Samuel. It was in his pontificate that Jerusalem was destroyed.
 It will be seen that there is considerable uncertainty in regard to several who held the pontifical dignity. Other lists, with some variations, may be found in Herne's Introduct., vol. iii. pp. 309-311; Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 809.
 Some of the garments worn by the high priest were common to the whole body of the priests, such as the drawers, the brodered coat, and the girdle: for an account of these see PRIEST. But there were others peculiar to the chief, the robe of the ephod, the ephod with its curious girdle, the breast-plate, and the mitre: of these a brief description shall be given here:—
 1. The robe (mê'it) of the ephod was of woven-work, all blue. It had no sleeves; but there was a hole through which the head passed; and round this there was a binding of woven-work to prevent tearing. It is not agreed what length it was; longer undoubtedly than the ephod, and perhaps as long as the brodered coat or tunic over which it was worn. On the hem of this vestment were small golden bells, alternating with a kind of tassel of blue, purple, and scarlet, in the shape of a pomegranate. The sound of the bells was to be heard as the priest entered and quitted the sanctuary, 'that he die not' (Exod. xxviii. 31-35; xxxix. 22-26). Perhaps one use of the bells was to give notice to the people without of the movements of the priest.—2. The ephod was a short robe covering the shoulders, the breast, and upper part of the body; the back and front portions of it being united by shoulder-pieces, on which were onyx-stones set in golden sockets. On these stones were engraven the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. According to Josephus the ephod had sleeves (Antiq., lib. iii. 7, § 5). It was of rich materials, 'gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen of cunning work': a girdle or belt of the same kind was attached to it (Exod. xxviii. 5-14, xxxix. 2-7). Ephods were worn by others than the high priests, as by Samuel (1 Sam. xi. 18), by inferior priests (xxii. 18), by David in a solemn procession (2 Sam. vi. 14); but these were 'linen' ephods: it was doubtless that of the high priest which Abiathar carried with him when he fled to David (1 Sam. xxiii. 6).—3. The breast-plate, like the ephod, was to be 'of cunning work' of 'gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen.' It was to be doubled, and then it would be four-square, a span every way. And then there were to be twelve precious stones upon it in four rows, set in gold sockets; and on these stones were to be graven the names of the twelve tribes, that they might be upon the high priest's heart. This 'breast-plate of judgment,' as it was called, was to be secured by wreathen chains of gold, uniting the onyx-stones on the shoulders of the ephod to two gold rings on the top of the breast-plate, and below by a lace of blue fastening two other rings to two corresponding rings on the ephod, so that the breast-plate might be kept above the curious girdle of the ephod. And then in 'the breast-plate of judgment' the Urim and Thummim were to be put (xxviii. 15-30, xxxix. 8-21). See URM.—4. The mitre was similar to the 'bonnets' or turbans of the ordinary priests, save that, according to Josephus, on the top was another turban of blue: encircling this was a triple golden crown, out of which rose a cup of gold resembling the inverted calyx of the herb hyoscyamus (ubi supr., § 6). The crown just described was perhaps added to the mitre when, as in the Asmonean family, the civil authority was united to the ecclesiastical. There was also a gold plate fastened by a blue lace to the fore-front, bearing upon it the inscription 'Holiness to the Lord' (xxviii. 36-38, xxxix. 30, 31). The identical plate made by Moses was, Josephus says, preserved to his time (ubi supr., lib. viii. 3, § 8).

The high priest was to be a person especially sacred. Hence any bodily imperfection or blemish excluded him from the office. The victims offered to the Lord were, it was repeatedly said, to be free from blemish: much more, therefore, must this rule hold in respect to the offering priest. A variety of physical disqualifications are enumerated in the law (Lev. xxi. 19-23). The Jewish writers have multiplied these, distributing them into three classes, those which would incapacitate both men and animals, those which incapacitate man only, those which are objectionable merely on account of the appearance. In the first class were 50; in the second 90; in the third 2—in all 142. There were, according to the Jewish doctors, besides bodily blemishes, certain other disqualifications, such as illegitimacy, idolatry, &c. And, even if a man had been already admitted to his function, he might, if a physical or mental incapacity occurred, be deprived (Selden, ubi supr., lib. ii. capp. v., vi.). Akin to these physical blemishes there were various restrictions laid upon the high priest, all indicating the purity of person and character which befitted such an office. He was not to rend his clothes, or uncover his head, to defile himself at the death of even his father or mother; and he could marry only a virgin (Lev. x. 6, 7, xxi. 10-15: comp. Ezek. xlv. 22).

The inauguration of Aaron is particularly described (Exod. xxix. 1-30, xl. 12-16; Lev. viii.). The holy garments were put upon him; and he was sprinkled with the blood of a victim and anointed with holy oil; the whole process of consecration lasting seven days. A special difference herein between the chief and the ordinary priests was, that the former had the anointing oil poured upon his head; some, however, imagine that it was only the greater abundance of this anointing which distinguished the high priest. Hence he is peculiarly called the anointed one (e.g. iv. 3, 5, 16; Psal. cxxxiii. 2). So a successor was to wear the garments seven days and be anointed in them (Exod. xxix. 29, 30): see Selden, capp. viii., ix.

The duties of the high priest as chief ecclesiastical dignitary were great and responsible. He especially represented the people. All Israelites were reckoned as being in him (Vitranga, Observ. Sacr., Franec. 1700, lib. ii. cap. 3, tom. i. p. 283). It was he, therefore, who was to officiate on the great day of atonement. Others, the inferior priests, might offer the ordinary sacrifices; but the chief alone must enter into the holiest with the blood of sprinkling (Lev. xvi. 1-28; Heb. ix. 7). It would seem that according to the original law the high priest was not dressed in his pontifical robes, when he performed this function. Josephus, however, contradicts this: we may therefore suppose that in the lapse of ages a change of custom was introduced (Bell. Jud., lib. v. 5, § 7: comp. Selden, cap. vii. ad fin.; Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Hoherpriester'). The high priest also, it is likely, officiated on various great and solemn occasions, when more than ordinary pomp was required: he frequently presided in councils (Matt. xxvi. 57, 62, 65, 66; Acts xxiii. 2); and it was at the death of the high priest that the manslayer who had fled to a city of refuge was free to return to his own home (Numb. xxxv. 25, 28, 32). The chief's maintenance must have been amply provided from the offerings allotted to the priestly body. He appears to have had a deputy, or one in office immediately next to him, called the sagan. Hence it has been supposed that, while Abiathar was high priest, Zadok was sagan. Some uncertainty rests on this; and in later times, when high priests were set up and deposed at the will of the Roman government, there were several contemporary pontifical men who had borne the supreme office, and who consequently retained the title and enjoyed great consideration.

The typical character of the high priest, as foreshadowing him whose sacrifice was the only really-efficient propitiation for sin, is dwelt on in the epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. iii. 1, ix. 7-14). For a fuller explanation of this, however, see PRIEST.

HIGH-WAY (Isai. xxxv. 8). In ancient times there must have been roads in Palestine. For carriages and chariots were in frequent use (Gen. xlv. 19, 21, l. 9; Josh. xvii. 16; Judges i. 19, iv. 13; 2 Kings ix. 16, 21, 24, x. 16; Isai. ii. 7; Acts viii. 28); and there are notices of the formation and improvement of roads (Isai. xl. 3, 4). At present there are no carriages in Syria, and no road fit for them in any part of the land. 'When the wild Arabs,' says Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 21), 'of the Mohammedan desolation became masters, wheeled vehicles immediately sunk into neglect. Accustomed only to the horse, the camel, and the ass, they despised all other means of travel and transportation. Good roads were not necessary for them, and, being neglected, they quickly disappeared from the land, and carriages with them.' There are some few traces existing of the Roman roads; but generally a road is merely a narrow track.

HIL'EN (perhaps place of caves). A city of Judah allotted to the priests (1 Chron. vi. 58). In Josh. xv. 51, xxi. 15, it is called Holon.

HILKIAH (portion of Jehovah).—1. The father of Eliakim, one of Hezekiah's officers (2 Kings xviii. 26, 37; Isai. xxii. 20, xxxvi. 3, 22).

2. The high priest in the reign of Josiah (1 Chron. vi. 13, ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11), probably Ezra's great-grandfather (Ezra vii. 1). The chief event which distinguished his administration was the finding of the book of the law in the temple, while the sacred pile was being repaired in Josiah's reformation. This book Hilkiah delivered to Shaphan the scribe, who carried it to the king and read it to him. The king, alarmed at what he heard, sent to enquire of the prophetess Huldah, and received her reply that for the wickedness of the people the threatenings of that book should be executed (2 Kings xxii. 8-20, xxiii. 4, 24; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8-33, xxxv. 8). Questions have arisen in regard to the book so discovered. There is some reason to believe that it was the original autograph. For that was to be deposited by the side of the ark of the covenant, in the most holy place (Deut. xxxi. 26). But, even if the original did not survive so long, the book must have been a standard, the temple-copy, kept in some place not generally accessible, for it was found by the high priest himself. It is doubted whether it contained the whole Pentateuch. Lord A. Hervey, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible (vol. i. pp. 813-815), maintains that it was only the book of Deuteronomy; but his arguments are not conclusive; and there is no clear proof that the five-fold division of the law had been at that time made; the probability therefore is that the whole formed but a single roll. Even De Wette seems to acknowledge that the book in question was the entire Pentateuch, for he considers the narrative as affording 'the first certain trace of the existence of our present Pentateuch' (Einleit., § 162 a). Lord A. Hervey thinks it probable that neither Josiah nor Hilkiah could read. But this supposition is groundless. For how should Hilkiah, if unable to read, have discovered what the book was, which he had found? as he must have done, for he announced it to Shaphan when he delivered it to him; and as for Josiah, he appears to have taken at least a part in the solemn reading in the temple (2 Chron. xxxiv. 30). There is no need to suppose that this law-book was the only existing copy: it is most likely that some were preserved by devout men in various parts of the land, though the evil reigns of Manasseh and Amon might have swept them from Jerusalem. But, even if it was the sole remaining copy, instances are not wanting in which a book has long been lost, and, when at length one single copy has been discovered, no difficulty has been found in identifying it. To imagine that Josiah and Hilkiah concocted this book of the law, and palmed it on the people, would be to make them most accomplished hypocrites; and Huldah the prophetess must necessarily have joined in the fraud. He must be credulous indeed who could believe that (see Kell, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 137, &c.; Hävernick, Einleit., vol. i. 2, § 139).

3. 4. Two Levites of the family of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 45, xxvi. 11).—5. One who stood with Ezra at the solemn reading of the law (Neh. viii. 4).—6. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (xii. 7, 21).—7. The father of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. i. 1).—8. The father of one of Zedekiah's ambassadors to Nebuchadnezzar (xxix. 3).

HILL, HILLS, HILL-COUNTRY. Palestine may be considered generally as a hilly country. There are also plains and valleys; so that occasionally we have the mountains or hill-country contrasted with the lowlands (Josh. xv. 33, 48). The hills specially named in scripture are noticed under their respective names.

There is a want of precision in our ordinary language in regard to the use of the terms 'hill' and 'mountain.' Properly they convey distinct ideas. But yet it is almost as common for us to speak of the 'highland hills' as of the 'Scottish mountains.' This want of precision sometimes produces confusion in our version of the scriptures. Thus, 'the hill-country' of Luke i. 39, 65 is 'the mountains' of Josh. xv. 48. So 'the mountain' (8) is 'the hill' (9); and the same eminence is termed 'mountain' (Luke ix. 28), and 'hill' (37), &c. There are two Hebrew words, one signifying a rounded hill, the other a mountain or mountain-chain, which are frequently thus confounded. There are also two Greek words used in the New Testament of distinctly-different meaning; and it would have been well to preserve the distinction in translating.

HIL'LEL (praise). The father of the judge Abdon (Judges xii. 13, 15).

HIN (perhaps vessel) (Numb. xv. 4, and elsewhere). See MEASURES.

HIND. The female of the common stag. See HART.

HINGE. Two words are used in the original which we translate 'hinge.' One occurs in 1 Kings vii. 50, conveying the idea of insertion. Now it is common to have doors hung, not on hinges, but on pivots inserted in sockets both above and below. Ancient doors of the kind may yet be seen in the Hauran; and such are modern Egyptian doors. But there is another word which implies turning; and this it is which we find in Prov. xxvi. 14. How appositely it is used is at once apparent.

HIN'NOM (perhaps lamentation). The valley of the son or sons of Hinnom, or, more concisely, the valley of Hinnom, is first mentioned as the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16). It was the place where children were made 'to pass through the fire to Molech,' and was defiled by Josiah, in order to extinguish for ever such detestable rites (2 Kings xxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3, xxxiii. 6; Jer. vii. 31, 32, xix. 2, 6, xxxii. 35). It is mentioned after the captivity again as the frontier of Judah and Benjamin (Neh. xi. 30).

The valley of Hinnom is generally supposed after its defilement to have received the sewage and filth of the city, and to have had perpetual fires kept up in it for the burning of the carcases of criminals and animals. On this, however, Robinson throws a doubt. 'This valley,' says Dr Thomson, 'commences north-west of the Jaffa gate, above the upper pool of Gihon. Descending eastward to the immediate vicinity of the gate, it turns south; and the bed of it is occupied by the lower pool of Gihon. Below this it bends round to the east, having the cliffs of Zion on the north, and the hill of Evil Counsel on the south. It is here that Hinnom properly begins, and it terminates at Bir Eyub, where it joins the valley of Jehoshaphat. The cliffs on the south side especially abound in ancient tombs; and it was this part that was called Tophet' (The Land and the Book, p. 641). 'There is something,' says Bartlett, 'in the scenery of this valley, and the hill above; its tombs hewn in the rock, long since tenantless; the gray gloom of its old fig and olive-trees starting from the fissures of the crags; the overhanging wall of Zion, desolate almost as in the time of her captivity, that forcibly recalls the wild and mournful grandeur of the prophetic writings. Within it, too, is the traditional "Aceldama," or field of blood, of the traitor Judas, a small plot of ground, overhung with one precipice, and looking down another into the glen below, on which is a deep charnel-house, into which it was formerly the custom to throw the bodies of the dead, as the earth was supposed to have the power of rapidly consuming them. The place was selected as the burial-place for pilgrims who died at Jerusalem in the middle ages. Such are the scenes that have passed in Hinnom—it is like the scroll of the prophet, "written within and without with mourning, lamentation, and woe," (Walks about Jerusalem, pp. 62, 63). See GEHENNA, TOPHET. The modern name is Wady Jehennam.

HIPPOPOTAMUS. A large animal inhabiting the banks and beds of great African rivers and lakes. At present it is found in the upper Nile; anciently there is reason to believe it haunted also the lower part of that stream. It also frequents the seashore. The hippopotamus is little inferior in bulk to the elephant, though lower in stature, on account of the shortness of its legs. The head is large, and the mouth wide. The lips are studded with bristles; the nostrils open on the top of the muzzle; and the small eyes are high in the head. Hence, raising only a small part of its head above the water, the animal can breathe and look round. The hide is thick, of a dusky brownish red. The hippopotamus generally remains in the water during the day, rising every five or six minutes to breathe. At night it comes to land, and feeds on vegetables and green crops. Its strength is great; and when attacked it becomes very furious. There can be little doubt that it is the behemoth of scripture (Job xl. 15-24). See BEHEMOTH, and the points of resemblance carefully drawn out by Carey (The Book of Job, pp. 401-406).

HIRAH (noble birth). An Adullamite, the friend of Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12, 20).

HIRAM (noble, high-born).—1. A king of Tyre, the ally and friend of David and Solomon. He is said to have been made tributary to Israel by David (Eupol. in Euseb., Præp. Evang., lib. ix. 30); but of this the scripture says nothing. Hiram (called also Huram) supplied David with materials for his palace, and with artisans (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chron. xiv. 1). He congratulated Solomon on his accession to the throne, made a treaty with him, and assisted him in the erection of the temple (1 Kings v. 1-12, 18, ix. 11-14). He also allowed the Hebrew monarch to share in the Tyrian commerce (26-28, x. 11, 22). More of Hiram's history we do not certainly know. Jewish and other traditions relate various particulars, which, resting on no sound authority, need not be here detailed. His reign is said to have lasted thirty-four years, 1023-990 B.C.—2. An artificer, son of a Tyrian by a woman of Naphtali, who was probably by birth of the tribe of Dan, and married to a man of Naphtali (see 2 Chron. ii. 14, and Keil's Comm. on Kings, vol. i. p. 122): he was sent by king Hiram to superintend the works of Solomon's temple (1 Kings vii. 13, 14, 40, where in marg. Hiram, 45). He also is called Hiram. See HURAM, 3.

HIRCANUS (2 Macc. iii. 11). A person spoken of as having much treasure in the temple at Jerusalem.

HIRELING. One who was employed on stipulated wages for a limited time (Job vii. 1, 2, xiv. 6). A labourer thus hired was by the Mosaic law to be paid when his work was completed (Lev. xix. 13; Mal. iii. 5). But, serving merely for gain, and with no permanent interest, he could often have little real concern for anything he was set to keep. Hence our Lord's contrast between the good shepherd and the hireling (John x. 11-13).

HIR'OM (1 Kings vii. 40, marg.). See HIRAM, 2.

HISS. The original word sharak is, like our words 'hiss,' 'whistle,' onomatopoeitic, expressive of its own meaning. It implies sometimes to summon by a hiss or whistle, as bee-keepers are said to do (Isai. v. 26, vii. 18), sometimes to hiss at in scorn (Job xxvii. 23; comp. Jer. xviii. 16; Mic. vi. 16).

HISTORY. Even though the bible were not regarded as an inspired book, and apart from its doctrinal lessons, it would have the highest value as a historical record. It contains the oldest history in the world, delivered with such an air of truth, and with so much simplicity and self-consistency, that a candid reader, if insensible to its higher claims, must feel that he has before him a narrative of facts. It becomes thus a standard by which to estimate and check other histories, the key, indeed, to the history of the world. Other histories have their value, too, in elucidating scripture; so that the interpreter of scripture must be a diligent student of history in general. The Hebrew people were to be specially the family of God. Nevertheless they had relations of some kind, hostile or pacific, with the nations around them. They had commercial intercourse with Egypt, Arabia, and Phœnicia: they were frequently at war with the Philistines and Syrians; they were subjected by the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Romans. To the deeds of these people, to their manners, customs, and religion, there is much reference in the sacred volume. The prophets also frequently addressed or threatened the heathen; so that many of their predictions, to be perfectly intelligible, must be read in the light of history. It is true that much of profane history has perished, and much of that which remains to us is not trustworthy. But modern research has discovered most valuable materials. Layard, Rawlinson, and others, have brought to light annals of the Assyrian and Babylonish empires, which will instruct us in many things respecting them of which we were ignorant. Without entering here into details, it may be observed that secular history confirms generally the truth of the bible, and that the study of it will often elucidate scripture, and is of extreme importance in scripture interpretation.

HITTITES. The tribe or nation descended from Heth, the son of Canaan (Gen. x. 15; 1 Chron. i. 13). They were inhabitants of Canaan in the time of Abraham (Gen. xv. 20). They then occupied the southern part of the land as Hebron (xxiii. 3-18) ex tending towards Beer-sheba; since Esau married Hittite wives, and Isaac and Rebekah feared that Jacob might follow his example (xxvi. 34, xxvii. 46, xxviii. 10). Hittites evidently, therefore, were in the neighbourhood: they were subsequently in the mountainous region near the Amorites and Jebusites (Numb. xiii. 29; Josh. xi. 3), and were perhaps some of the original inhabitants of Jerusalem (Ezek. xvi. 3, 45), as well as in the neighbourhood of Beth-el (Judges i. 22-26). Indeed they had spread so extensively, that Canaan, or at least the northern part of it, was called 'the land of the Hittites' (Josh. i. 4). Miss Corboux includes under the term 'Hittites,' used generally, all the junior branches of the two great Canaanitish stocks, descendants of Zidon and Heth, though more particularly she thinks it denotes but the elder tribe of the children of Heth (Journ. of Sac. Lit., Oct. 1851, p. 166). Some suppose them to have been a commercial people (Gen. xxiii. 16): this is, however, questionable; for they took fully their part in resisting Joshua (Josh. ix. 1, 2). In subsequent times we find two of David's warriors Hittites, Ahimelech (1 Sam. xxvi. 6) and Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 3). Solomon rendered those that yet remained in Palestine tributary (1 Kings ix. 20); and they are mentioned after the captivity (Ezra ix. 1).

But there are some remarkable notices of tribes of Hittites (Judges i. 26; 1 Kings x. 29; 2 Kings vii. 6; 2 Chron. i. 17), which seem to point to a people, a branch of the great family, or the descendants of those expelled from Palestine, who were settled independently beyond Lebanon, and it may be on the south-eastern frontier towards Arabia. And Egyptian annals speak of a war with Hittites; and Egyptian pictures are believed to represent Hittites. These representations may be taken not unfairly to figure the old Hittites of Canaan. We have them in both civil and warlike attire. 'The complexion given to them by the Egyptian artists is, though dark, rather florid than sallow, with black hair, regular features, with a very prominent and somewhat-hooked nose. The civil dress is a plain bright-coloured tunic, with a deep edging of lace or embroidery, gathered into a knot on the left shoulder, so as to leave the right arm at freedom. Under this was worn a kind of kilt or skirt, of similar colour and pattern, but reaching only to the knees. They shaved not only the beard and moustachios, but even the eye-brows, as did many other of the nations of Canaan; besides which the Hittites had an almost-peculiar custom of their own, of shaving a square place just above the ear, leaving the hair on the side of the face and whiskers hanging down in a long plaited lock. This frightful custom, and other eccentric dealings of the nations with their hair, throw some light upon the injunctions to avoid such customs, which we find in the books of the law. If we want to know what is meant by "marring the corners of the beard" (Lev. xix. 27), we have only to look at such pictures to be perfectly satisfied.' It remains to notice the war-dress of the Hittites. It consisted of a helmet skull-cap, extending down the neck, cut away high and square above the ear, so as to expose that bald place, which they seem to have regarded as peculiarly charming. It was fastened by a strong band or cheek-string, probably, like the helmet, of metal. The badges of distinction were one or two ostrich feathers worn drooping. They wore a kind of cape, or short mantle, tied close in front, either by the two ends of the cloth, or by a cord with tassels at the end. Over this was the girdle, which was broad and thick, and hung down in front with a long end, terminating in a ball and tassel. It was long enough to pass round the neck, across the breast, and thus formed a species of defensive armour, illustrative of the military use of the girdle so often mentioned in scripture. The only weapon assigned to the Hittites by the Egyptian artists is the arrow' (Kitto, Daily Bible Illustrations, forty-second week, fifth day).

HIVITES (villagers, according to some, serpents). The name of a tribe (uniformly found singular in the original, though frequently made plural by our translators) descended from Ham by his son Canaan (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chron. i. 15). They are enumerated among the nations of Canaan, whom the Israelites were to dispossess (Exod. iii. 8, 17, xiii. 5). They appear to have gathered round two principal centres, in the middle of Palestine, and towards the north. We first meet with them in Jacob's history, occupying Shechem, and very ready to be induced by what appeared worldly advantages to intermarry with the Hebrews at the cost of personal pain (Gen. xxxiv. 2, 20-24). Esau is also said to have taken a Hivite wife (xxxvi. 2); see however, BEERI. The inhabitants of Gibeon and the neighbouring towns were Hivites (Josh. ix. 7, 17); and in the deception they practised upon Joshua we may see somewhat of the same crafty calculating spirit which had distinguished this tribe at Shechem. As, however, these Hivites were not very powerful, and possibly because they were intermingled with others, they seem to have been sometimes termed Amorites (Gen. xlviii. 22; 2 Sam. xxi. 2). There was a large division of this tribe in the north, in Lebanon, under mount Hermon (Josh. xi. 3); and these were left in a measure unsubdued by Israel (Judges iii. 3). There were Hivite cities here at the time of David's census (2 Sam. xxiv. 7). The remnant of them were brought under tribute by Solomon (1 Kings ix. 20; 2 Chron. viii. 7).

A writer in the Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1860, pp. 266-283, suggests that Seir was originally a Hivite chieftain of the Lebanon, and that he emigrated, before Abraham's settlement in Canaan, into the south, where mount Hor received its name from the northern Hor, and various Hivite cities were founded, from which they were ejected by the Edomites. These Hivites were also called Horites, from, as the writer supposes, their mount Hor. But his theory cannot be fully admitted.

HIZKI'AH (Jehovah strengthens). An ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i

1). The name is the same with that of Hezekiah king of Judah; and it is very probable that that monarch was the person intended.

HIZKI'JAH (id.). A name among those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 17). Possibly it should be joined with Ater, which precedes: see ATER.

HIZKIJA'HU (id.) (1 Chron. iii. 23, marg.). A form of Hezekiah.

HO'BAB (beloved). The father-in-law of Moses, who visited him in the desert after the departure from Egypt, and whom Moses invited to accompany Israel into their land, with a promise of good. Hobab, it would seem, at first declined the offer, and returned to his own habitation; but afterwards he or his children must have complied, as we find descendants of theirs located in Palestine (Numb. x. 29-32; Judges iv. 11). Hobab was called also JETHRO, which see.

HO'BAH (hidden, hiding-place). The place to which Abram pursued the confederate kings (Gen. xiv. 15). It was to the north of Damascus. The village of Jobar, where the Jews have a synagogue dedicated to Elijah, is said by them (Mr. Porter tells us) to be the ancient Hobab.

HOD (splendour). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 37).

HODAI'AH (praise ye Jehovah). One of the descendants of David (1 Chron. iii. 24).

HODAVI'AH (id.).—1. A chief of Manasseh east of Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).—2. A Benjamite (ix. 7).—3. A Levite whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 40). He seems to be the Judah of iii. 9, and is called Hodevah in Neh. vii. 43.

HO'DESH (the new moon). The wife of Shaharaim a Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 9). Possibly she may be identical with Baara (8).

HO'DEVAH (praise ye Jehovah) (Neh. vii. 43). See HODAVIAH, 3.

HODI'AH (splendour of Jehovah). A wife of Ezra, one of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 19). She is probably the Jehudijah of 18. The name is identical with HODI'JAH (id.).—1. A Levite who assisted when Ezra read the book of the law, and sealed the covenant (Neh. viii. 7, ix. 5, x. 10).—2. Another Levite who sealed the covenant (13).—3. One of the people who sealed (18).

HOG'LAH (partridge). One of the daughters of Zelophehad, in whose favour certain regulations were made as to the descent of property to a female (Numb. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3).

HO'HAM (perhaps, whom Jehovah impels). A king of Hebron, who joined a confederacy to resist the Israelites after the cession of Gibeon. He and his allies were signally defeated (Josh. x. 3, 5, 16-27).

HOLINESS. The perfectly pure rectitude of God, being that excellent attribute of his which is opposed to evil or sin. In created beings holiness may be regarded as such a conformity to the nature and will of God, as evidences itself in purity of conduct. Holiness is predicated of the Deity (Psal. xxii. 3; cxlv. 17; Isai. lvii. 15); and distributively of the Father (John xvii. 11), of the Son (Luke i. 35; Acts ii. 27, iii. 14, iv. 30), of the Spirit (i. 2, 5;

2 Cor. xiii. 14). So angels are called holy (Matt. xxv. 31); and their holiness is a perfect holiness. Holiness is ascribed to men, to such as are sanctified by the Holy Ghost; their hearts being renewed and cleansed (Heb. iii. 1; comp. Gal. v. 22-25). And, though perfect holiness is not attained in this sinful world, it is set before the believer as the privileged state to which he is called (1 Thess. iv. 7; 1 Pet. ii. 9), as the end to which he is to aspire (i. 15, 16). So prophets are called holy (Luke i. 70), also apostles (Eph. iii. 5); and the brethren generally (1 Thess. v. 27). The term is descriptive of persons and things dedicated to God (Exod. xxx. 25, 35; Luke ii. 23; 1 Cor. vii. 14). It denotes, therefore, sometimes what men ought to be rather than what they are (Numb. xvi. 3). And in the sense of dedication or consecration to a holy purpose, or as a means of worshipping God, or leading men to him, the word is applied to a multitude of things, to the scriptures (Rom. i. 3), the sabbath (Exod. xvi. 23), the ark of the covenant (2 Chron. xxxv. 3), the furniture of the tabernacle and temple (1 Kings viii. 4), the city of Jerusalem (Matt. xxvii. 53), the temple (Jonah ii. 4), &c. And specially the inner part of the tabernacle and temple was regarded as holy, and that beyond the inner veil as the holy of holies (Heb. ix. 2, 3, 24). The name of God, too, was peculiarly holy (Psal. cxi. 9). Sometimes the term means pure, chaste, undefiled (1 Sam. xxi. 5; Rom. xvi. 16). Several words, especially in the New Testament, are used which present different shades of meaning, but in which holiness is the fundamental idea. Holiness of heart and life is inculcated upon Christians, whom God would have to be 'holy and without blame before him' (Eph. i. 4).

HOLM-TREE (Hist. Sus. 58). Most probably the Quercus coccifera.

HOLOFER'NES (Judith ii. 4, and elsewhere). An Assyrian general sent to invade Judea, and said to have been killed by Judith.

HO'LON (sandy).—1. A city in the hill-country of Judah, assigned to the priests (Josh. xv. 51, xxi. 15). In 1 Chron. vi. 58 it is called Hilen.—2. A town in the plain country of Moab (Jer. xlvi. 21). Nothing is known of it.

HOLY CITY (Neh. xi. 1, 18; Isai. xlvi. 2, lii. 1; Dan. ix. 24; Matt. iv. 5, xxvii. 53; Rev. xi. 2, xxi. 2, xxii. 19). See JERUSALEM.

HOLY DAY. See FESTIVAL.

HOLY GHOST. The distinctive name of the third Person of the blessed Trinity, designated also the 'Holy Spirit,' the 'Spirit of God,' the 'Comforter,' and with various attributive additions to the word Spirit, as the 'Spirit of adoption,' &c.

The name Spirit is given to this divine Person not simply as if he alone of the sacred Three were a spirit, but as specially indicating his relation to the Father and the Son, from whom he is breathed forth, emanates, eternally proceeds, and as being the Agent of divine operation upon men, the breath of grace (John xx. 22), like the wind blowing where it listeth, communicating the heavenly gift. He is called 'holy' both as in himself essentially holy, and also as the worker of holiness in men, the sanctifier of God's church.

The personality and the Deity of the Holy Ghost are abundantly proved in scripture. For, just as the Father and the Son are known to be persons by the operations and the power ascribed to them, so is the Holy Ghost distinctly said to work, to be sent, to come, to will, to have a mind that is known of God, &c. (John xvi. 7-15; Rom. viii. 26, 27; 1 Cor. xii. 11). Such expressions would be improper and unintelligible if the Holy Ghost were but a quality. See also Matt. iii. 16, 17. Again, he speaks by the prophets (Acts xxviii. 25; 1 Tim. iv. 1): he teaches (Luke xii. 12); he may be grieved (Eph. iv. 30); and he is joined with, and yet distinguished from, the Father and the Son in the form prescribed of Christian baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19). This last text alone would prove that, if the Father and the Son are persons, so is the Holy Ghost. As to his Deity, he is called 'God' (Acts v. 3, 4). And the body of the believer is called the 'temple of God' because the Holy Ghost dwells therein (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17, vi. 19; 2 Cor. vi. 16). This last argument Augustine thinks very convincing, and says that, if we were commanded to build him a temple like Solomon, of wood and stone, it would show that we were to pay him divine worship; but far more must this be when we do not make him a temple, but are his temple (Epist. ad Mac., clxx. 2. Op. Ed. Bened. tom. ii. cols. 608, 609). Still farther, he may be sinned against; and sin against the Holy Ghost hath no forgiveness (Matt. xiii. 31, 32). From this his essential Deity is easily concluded. Sin against the Holy Ghost, it may be added, is so fatal because it is sin against him who alone communicates spiritual life: it is a refusal therefore of the means of salvation, a rejection of that gracious agency by which men are brought to avail themselves of the precious blood-shedding of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is not that coming to Christ they are refused, but that they will not come to him. See BLASPHEMY.

The Holy Ghost is said to proceed from the Father and the Son. He is distinctly said to proceed from the Father (John xv. 26), and as distinctly is termed the Spirit of the Son (Gal. iv. 6).

The Lord the Spirit is called 'the Giver of Life.' He convinces men of sin, he shows them their need of a Saviour, he leads them to Christ, rendering Christ's work effectual for their salvation: he sanctifies them also by conforming them to Christ's image (John xiv. 26, xvi. 8, 14; Rom. viii. 9-11, 13, 14; Gal. v. 16-25). 'The Father as goodness,' says Hooker, 'the Son as wisdom, the Holy Ghost as power, do all concur in every particular, outwardly issuing from that one only glorious Deity which they all are. For that which moveth God to work is goodness; and that which ordereth his work is wisdom; and that which perfecteth his work is power . . . Life, as all other gifts and benefits, groweth originally from the Father, and cometh not to us but by the Son, nor by the Son to any of us in particular, but through the Spirit (Eccles. Pol., book v. 56).

HOLY LAND (Zech. ii. 12). See CANAAN, PALESTINE.

HOLY OF HOLIES. See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

HOLY SPIRIT. See HOLY GHOST.

HOM'AM (destruction). A descendant of Seir the Horite (1 Chron. i. 39). In Gen. xxxvi. 32 the name is Heman.

HOM'ER (a heap) (Lev. xxvii. 16, and elsewhere). See MEASURES.

HONEY. Canaan is frequently described as a land 'flowing with milk and honey' (e.g. Exod. iii. 8, 17, xiii. 5). And travellers now speak of the immense swarms of bees found in some rocky parts of the country (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 299: comp. 253). Several Hebrew words are in our version rendered 'honey,' Ya'ar, or ya'arâh, is honey from the bee (1 Sam. xiv. 27; Sol. Song v. 1), flowing from the combs. Nopheth is also honey dropping from the combs, and is often joined with a word signifying comb (Psal. xix. 10; Prov. v. 3, xxiv. 13, xxvii. 7; Sol. Song iv. 11). There is another term of wider signification, dêbash, meaning sometimes bee-honey (Deut. xxxii. 13; Prov. xvi. 24), and sometimes honey of grapes, syrup, that is, the newly-expressed juice of grapes boiled down to the half or third part. This, called dibs, 'is still prepared in many parts of Syria and Palestine, especially in the neighbourhood of Hebron, and is in great quantities exported into Egypt. Diluted with a little water, it is frequently used instead of sugar, or as a substitute for butter; and sometimes it is applied to wounds instead of wine. The same product is likewise mentioned, together with balm (Ezek. xxvii. 17), and is stated to have been sent from the land of Israel to the markets of Tyre. As Egypt abounds in excellent bee-honey, but was perhaps unacquainted with the preparation of grape-jelly, the latter was appropriately chosen as a part of Jacob's present' (Gen. xliii. 11), Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 667, 668. There is a vegetable honey distilling from trees, found in the peninsula of Sinai. Some have supposed this the 'wild honey' John Baptist ate (Matt. iii. 4); but his food was more probably the honey of wild bees. There was, still further, a kind of honey-syrup obtained from dates. Honey was forbidden as an offering (Lev. ii. 11), most likely because it fermented. It is often joined with milk, both being natural products; and 'honey and milk' are sometimes figuratively put for pleasant discourse (Sol. Song iv. 11).

HOOD (Isai. iii. 23). A tiara or turban as wound or folded round the head. But Henderson (note on Isai. iii. 23) says ribands for binding the hair, or a sash of fine linen round the bottom of the tiara. See DRESS, HEAD-DRESS.

HOOK, HOOKS. The word frequently occurs in scripture, as the translation of various Hebrew terms. Thus there were hooks or pins from which the curtains of the tabernacle were suspended (Exod. xxvi. 33, 37). There were also flesh-hooks, with which flesh was taken from the pot (xxvii. 3; Numb. iv. 14; 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14): these seem to have had three teeth. There were hooks, or rather rings, sometimes put through the nose of wild beasts by which to lead them. Captives were similarly treated (2 Kings xix. 23; Ezek. xxix. 4), a practice illustrated by some of the Assyrian monuments: comp. Job xl. 24. Such a ring was used to secure a fish or marine animal; a cord being attached, so that it might be preserved alive, without being able to escape (xli. 2; see Carey, The Book of Job, pp. 406, 407. Further, there were 'pruning-hooks' (Isai. ii. 4, xviii. 5), 'fish-hooks' (Amos iv. 2; comp. Isai. xix. 8, where our version has 'angle'), and 'hooks' (Ezek. xl. 43), with regard to which some uncertainty exists. Perhaps they might be forked projecting pins in the part of the court where the victims were killed, on which those victims were suspended in order to take off the skin.

HOPE. The reasonable expectation of good to be enjoyed, based on sufficient grounds, and encouraging to patient perseverance in the proper means for the attainment of it. It is reckoned as one of the three chief Christian graces (1 Cor. xiii. 3); and its excellencies are frequently described. It is lively (1 Pet. i. 3): it is invigorating (Tit. i. 2): it is joyful (Rom. v. 2, xii. 12): it tends to sanctification (1 John iii. 3). The Christian hope is sure (Heb. iii. 6, vi. 11); whereas the hope of the ungodly shall perish (Job viii. 13). Indeed the wicked are characterized as 'having no hope' (Eph. ii. 12), that is, no well-grounded hope, or hope of salvation. Sometimes hope is put for the thing hoped for (Tit. ii. 13), or the person in whom we hope. Thus Christ is called the 'hope' of his people (1 Tim. i. 1).

HOPH'NI (boxer). One of the sons of Eli, whose licentious conduct brought down judgment upon their family. They were both slain in a battle with the Philistines when the ark of God was taken (1 Sam. i. 3, ii. 34, iv. 4, 11, 17).

HOPH'RA (Jer. xlv. 30). See PHARAOH, 10.

HOR (mountain).—1. A noted mountain on the frontier of Edom (Numb. xx. 23, xxxiii. 37). The Israelites reached it on their march from Kadesh, their next station being Zalmonah, on their way round the Edomitish territory (xx. 22, xxi. 4, xxxiii. 37, 41). It was while they were encamped by Hor that the divine command was issued for Aaron (who, on account of his disobedience at the water of Meribah, was not to enter Canaan) to go up and die there. Moses and Eleazar accompanied the aged priest to his death; the eyes of the congregation being fixed on them as they ascended. The sacerdotal garments were taken from him and put upon Eleazar his son. So Aaron died; and Moses and Eleazar returned; and the people mourned for him thirty days (xx. 24-29, xxxiii. 38, 39; Deut. xxxii. 50). It is true that Mosera is elsewhere named as the place of Aaron's death (x. 6); but Mosera was close by the mountain.

Mount Hor is on the eastern side of the Arabah, a conspicuous object in the Edomitish chain, rising just to the west of the city of Petra, 4800 feet above the sea-level. It is entirely of sandstone, and has a double top. In the little hollow between the peaks it has been supposed that Aaron died. On the highest, the northernmost, is a small building 28 feet by 33 inside. It consists of two apartments one below the other: in the undermost is a recess, regarded as Aaron's tomb. This may be ancient: the structure above is modern. Mount Hor is now called Jebel Neby Harâu: the view from it on which Aaron's eyes must have rested just before he closed them on the world for ever is thus described by Dr. Stanley: 'He looked over the valley of the Arabah countersected by its hundred water-courses, and beyond over the white mountains of the wilderness they had so long traversed; and at the northern edge of it there must have been visible the heights through which the Israelites had vainly attempted to force their way into the promised land. This was the western view. Close around him on the east were the rugged mountains of Edom, and far along the horizon the wide downs of mount Seir, through which the passage had been denied by the wild tribes of Esau who hunted over their long slopes. . . . A dreary . . . scene, such it must have seemed to the aged priest. . . . The peculiarity of the view is the combination of wide extension, with the scarcity of marked features. Petra is shut out by intervening rocks. But the survey of the desert on one side and the mountains of Edom on the other is complete; and of these last the great feature is the mass of red bald-headed sandstone rocks, intersected not by valleys, but by deep seams' (Sinai and Palestine, p. 87).

But the traditional site of mount Hor, that hitherto described, is rejected by Mr. Wilton in his excellent book The Negeb (pp. 126-134), so frequently referred to in these pages. He thinks it highly improbable that a mountain by which the Israelites were encamped, and where the solemn close of Aaron's life occurred, could be in the heart of Edom, hard by the capital of a nation whose territory the Hebrews were not to touch, and from which they are said just before to turn (Numb. xx. 21, 22): he therefore supposes that the Jebel Moderah, some distance to the north-east, on the opposite side of the Arabah, is the veritable Hor. He thinks that the locality suits much better with the history of the attack of the king of Arad, shortly after the high priest's death (xxi. 1-3). The striking appearance of Jebel Moderah quite justifies the appellation of 'Hor the mountain,' i.e. the remarkable mountain, for such is the definite meaning of the original; and it is just 'by the coast,' or 'on the edge of the land of Edom' (xx. 23, xxxiii. 37), and is so situated that any transaction on its summit would be in full view, 'in the sight of the congregation' (xx. 27) encamped on the plain below.

Mr. Wilton's more extended arguments must be sought in the place referred to of his book: they are, to say the least, of considerable plausibility and weight.

2. Mount Hor is mentioned as the northern border of Palestine (Numb. xxxiv. 7, 8). We nowhere else find the name given to any northern height. But there can be little doubt that Lebanon, or some spur or peak of that range must be intended.

H'ORAM (lofty, mountaineer). The king of Gezer, who, coming to help Lachish, was destroyed by Joshua (Josh. x. 33).

HO'REB (dry, desert) (Exod. iii. 1, xvii. 6, xxxiii. 6; Deut. i. 2, 6, 19, iv. 10, 15, v. 2, ix. 8, xviii. 16, xxix. 1; 1 Kings viii. 9, xix. 8; 2 Chron. v. 10; Psal. cvi. 19; Mal. iv. 4). See SINAI.

HO'REM (devoted). A city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38).

HOR-HAGID'GAD (mount of thunder? the conspicuous mountain?). One of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 32, 33). It is in all probability the same with Gudgodah (Deut. x. 7). It is true that the order of the stations is different; but in the one case the direction of the journey is upwards (Numb. xxxiii. 31), then downwards (32-35), while in the other (Deut. x. 6, 7) it is altogether downwards. See Hengstenberg, Diss. on Genuineness of Pent., diss. vii. vol. ii. pp. 350-357.

Mr. Wilton is inclined to regard the visit to Hor-hagidgad (Numb. xxxiii. 32) as distinct from the journey to Gudgodah (Deut. x. 7); so that the two places are not absolutely identical. Gudgodah he considers the wady or valley, and Hor-hagidgad a mountain near. Now Dr. Robinson describes here 'a lone conical mountain' which 'forms a conspicuous landmark for the traveller.' This, now called Jebel Arâif en-Nâkah, may be Hor-hagidgad (The Negeb, pp. 131, 132).

HO'RI (a dweller in caverns).—1. A son of Lotan and grandson of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 22; 1 Chron. i. 39). Hori in Gen. xxxvi. 30 should be rendered 'the Horites,' as in 29.—2. The father of Shaphat selected from the tribe of Simeon to spy out the land (Numb. xiii. 5).

HO'RIMS, HO'RITES (id.). The original inhabitants of mount Seir (Gen. xiv. 6); they were smitten by Chedor-laomer and his confederates, and afterwards entirely dispossessed by the descendants of Esau (Deut. ii. 12, 22). Their genealogy is given in Gen. xxxvi. 20-30; 1 Chron. i. 38-42; but nothing further is recorded of them. They are probably designated more according to their mode of life than their specific race. See HIVITES.

HOR'MAH (place desolated). The city of a Canaanitish king who attacked the Israelites: on which they vowed that if they succeeded in defeating their assailants they would utterly destroy the city. It had before been called Zephath; but it had at once, as a doomed place, the name Hormah given it, though the vow does not seem to have been accomplished till a later period (Numb. xiv. 45, xxi. 1-3; Deut. i. 44). The king is enumerated among those that were destroyed in the general war (Josh. xii. 14); and the town was allotted first to Judah, afterwards to Simeon (xv. 30, xix. 4). It was Judah, therefore, and Simeon who sacked Hormah; but it seems to have been subsequently re-built (1 Sam. xxx. 30; 1 Chron. iv. 30). Robinson identifies the pass es-Sufâh with Zephath or Hormah: it is a gap in the southern mountain-barrier of Palestine. Mr. Rowlands, however, came upon a site called Sebâta, considerably more to the west, on the road from Khulashah to Suez, near the well of Rehoboth. This Mr. Wilton adopts as the true Hormah (The Negeb, pp. 203-206).

HORN. A weapon of defence with which many animals are furnished. The ordinary uses of it are sufficiently well known.

We find the original word for horn applied to a musical instrument. Such an instrument was probably at first made of this material; and afterwards, whatever the material, the name was retained (just as 'French horn' among ourselves). The translation, however, 'rams' horns' (Josh. xi. 4, 5, 6, 8) can hardly be maintained. The word also signifies 'a flask' (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 Kings i. 39); flasks having probably been made of horn (like our 'powder-horn'). There are other uses of the term derived from a real or supposed resemblance to a horn. Thus the projections at the corners of the altar were called its 'horns' (Exod. xxvii. 2, xxix. 12; 1 Kings i. 50; Psal. cxviii. 27): a hill or peak was a horn (Isai. v. 1, marg.); and elephants' teeth were 'horns of ivory' (Ezek. xxvii. 15).

We further find 'horns' used symbolically in prophetic language to signify powers, kingdoms, or sovereigns (Dan. vii. 7, 8, 20, 21, 24, viii. 3, 5-9, 20, 22; Zech. i. 18-21; Rev. xii. 3, xiii. 1, 11, xvii. 3, 7, 12, 16); the horn being the emblem of strength, or attacking force. We have hence the ordinary figurative meaning. God is called the horn of the psalmist's salvation (Psal. cxviii. 1), as being his powerful protector. Similarly, 'the horn of Moab is cut off' (Jer. xlvi. 25), i.e. his strength is broken,

So God exalts the horn of any one (Psal. lxxxix. 17), i. e. increases his dignity (comp. 1 Sam. ii. 1; Amos vi. 13). To lift the horn of God (1 Chron. xxv. 5) most probably is to praise him. Sometimes the expression is employed in a bad sense (Psal. lxxv. 4, 5) to denote proud self-sufficiency. Other uses of the word occur, as when the horn is said to be defiled in the dust (Job xvi. 15), the honour being brought low.

All these phrases are singularly illustrated by a fashion still prevailing among the Druze women in Lebanon of wearing artificial horns. 'I have seen them,' says Dr. Thomson, 'only a few inches long, made of paste-board, and even of common pottery. By degrees the more fashionable ladies used tin, and lengthened them: then rivalry made them of silver, and still further prolonged and ornamented them; until finally the princesses of Lebanon and Hermon sported gold horns, decked with jewels, and so long that a servant had to spread the veil over them' (The Land and the Book, pp. 73, 74). Men have in some parts of the world worn similar horns: comp. 1 Kings xxii. 11.

The horns coming out of God's hand (Hab. iii. 4) are rays of light. Arabian poets are said to compare the first beams of the rising sun to horns.

HORNET. The Hebrew name for this insect implied striking, i. e. when it stings. God promised that he would send hornets before the Israelites to drive out the nations of Canaan from before them (Exod. xxiii. 28; Deut. vii. 20; Josh. xxiv. 12). It is questioned whether this is to be taken literally, or whether, as enemies are sometimes said to cluster like bees (Psal. cxviii. 12), and as when foreign invasion is threatened the Lord is said to 'hiss for the fly' in the uttermost part of Egypt, and 'for the bee' in Assyria (Isal. vii. 18), we may not rather imagine that the insect is spoken of metaphorically to indicate the consternation with which the Canaanites should be overwhelmed. Had the Canaanites never ventured to resist, the metaphorical sense might be preferable; but as the case stands it is better to interpret literally. Armies have been put into confusion by such insects (Elian., De Animal., lib. xi. 28, xvii. 35). That hornets abounded in some parts of Palestine is clear from the fact that there was a place called 'hornets' town' (Zorah).

HORONA'IM (two caverns). A Moabitish town, possibly upon an eminence (Isal. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 3, 5, 34).

HORONITE. This term is applied to Sanballat (Neh. ii. 10, 19, xiii. 28). He was very probably a native of Horonaim.

HORSE. This most valuable animal, Equus caballus, is thought to be a native of the deserts north of India and Persia: it was first domesticated in the east, and was probably brought by those who emigrated westward from Asia into Arabia and Egypt.

No mention is made of horses as forming any part of the possessions of the patriarchs; nor are any noticed among the presents Abraham received from the kings of Egypt and Gerar (Gen. xii. 16, xx. 14). The fact appears to be that the horse was not in those early times used except for military purposes; indeed we find scarcely an allusion in scripture to its employment for the farm or any ordinary domestic service. Once the horse is said to tread out some species of corn (Isal. xxviii. 28); but it is as a war-horse, strong and fierce, that he is specially noted and commended (Job xxxix. 19-25). In armies horses were introduced as mounting cavalry, and also as drawing the formidable war-chariots. But the Israelites employed them in neither of these ways; and a positive command forbade them to multiply horses (Deut. xvii. 16); so that long afterward David contrasts the dependence placed by foreign potentates on chariots and horsemen with the simple trust that Israel without either reposed in the Lord their God (Psal. xx. 7). David, however, was induced to form a chariot-force (2 Sam. viii. 4); and from that time we find repeated mention of them in Israelitish history. Absalom had chariots and horses for the purpose of display (xv. 1); and Solomon possessed large numbers of chariot and riding-horses, which he kept partly at Jerusalem and partly in certain appointed cities (1 Kings iv. 26; 2 Chron. ix. 25). The number, it may be observed, in the first-named of these places is incorrect, no doubt by error of transcription: 4,000 horses will suit better with the number of Solomon's chariots, 1,400 (1 Kings x. 26). This monarch also appears to have established a regular trade in horses with Egypt, for the supply of both himself and other nations (28, 29). See Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. pp. 80, 81, 180, 181. After this horses were freely used in Israel (1 Kings xxii. 4; 2 Kings iii. 7, ix. 21, 33, xi. 16; Isal. ii. 7); and the Jews possessed some on their return from captivity (Ezra ii. 66; Neh. vii. 68). Among other nations they had been used from a very early period. There were horses in Egypt in Joseph's time (Gen. xlvii. 17, xlix. 17, 1. 9). They were in the armies of Egypt (Exod. xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xii. 3), of the Canaanites (Judges iv. 3), of the Philistines (1 Sam. xiii. 5), of the Syrians (2 Sam. viii. 4), of the Ethiopians (Cushites) (2 Chron. xiv. 9), &c. Among the Persians we find swift horses used for posts (Esth. viii. 10); and horses are mentioned as articles of trade between the Tyrians and the house of Togarmah (Ezek. xxvii. 14).

The furniture of the horse among the Hebrews appears to have been simple; a bridle, probably a mere slip-knot (Isal. xxx. 28), and a curb (Psal. xxxii. 9). Saddles were not used, only a cloth, or afterwards a pad. Nor were horses shod; hence it was desirable that their hoofs should be hard (Isal. v. 28). But the harness of Assyrian horses was decorated (Ezek. xxiii. 6, 12), also of those of Persia (Esth. vi. 8, 9). The Assyrian sculptures prove this. Furniture for chariots is among the merchandise of Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 20).

HORSE-GATE. One of the gates of Jerusalem near the temple (2 Chron. xxlii. 15; Neh. iii. 28; Jer. xxxi. 40).

HORSE-LEECH. The leech is mentioned once only (Prov. xxx. 15), where in our version the sense is weakened by the insertion of 'crying.' 'Give, give' are the two daughters. Dr. Thomson speaks of 'countless millions of leeches' in the Birket Ram, lake Phiala (The Land and the Book, pp. 240, 241). The medicinal leech, Hirudo, or Sanguisuga medicinalis, the horse-leech, Hæmopsis sanguisuga, and other species are all found in Palestine: see Duns, Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. pp. 442, 443.

HO'SAH (a refuge). A Levite of the family of Merari, appointed one of the porters or door-keepers before the ark (1 Chron. xvi. 38, xxvi. 10).

HO'SAH (id.). A city of Asher, a border-place towards Tyre (Josh. xix. 29).

HO'SAI (2 Chron. xxxiii. 19, marg.). In the text this word is translated 'the seers.' Gesenius is inclined to believe it the proper name of an individual.

HOSAN'NA (save now). An expression of joyful gratulation: it occurs in the original of Psal. cxviii. 25. At the feast of tabernacles it was customary for the Jews to recite the Great Hallel, viz. Psalms cxiii. cxviii., and at certain points, varying according to the teaching of different doctors, loud response was made by the multitude, waving the branches which they carried in their hands, and ejaculating Hallelujah, Hosanna, or Psal. cxviii. 25; children also being expected to take their part. The seventh day of the feast was called, from the reiterated ceremonies, the great Hosanna. Hence the branches, the prayers, the feast itself received the name Hosanna; and, as it was not unusual for the mode of rejoicing then observed to be transferred to other occasions of national exultation, it was natural that our Lord's entry into Jerusalem should be so welcomed (Matt. xxi. 8, 9; Mark xi. 8-10; John xii. 12, 13).

HOSEA (deliverance, safety). Hosea is stated (Hos. i. 1) to be the son of Beeri, whom some would erroneously confound with Beerah, prince of the Reubenites (1 Chron. v. 6); but we have no further certain information of the prophet's family or life. It is, however, reasonable to suppose that he was an Israelite. For his predictions have to do mainly with the kingdom of the ten tribes; and, had he been sent from Judah to utter them, it is not unlikely that, as in the analogous cases of 1 Kings xiii.; Amos i. 1, vii., the fact would have been stated. Corroboration has been found in his rough Aramaizing diction, which seems to indicate the north as his residence. Ingenious men have amused themselves with imagining further reasons, taken from a supposed special acquaintance with the Israelitish localities, &c.; but these are of no weight. And one critic (Ewald, Die Propheten des A.B., vol. i. pp. 118, 119) tells us that, after having completed his mission in Israel, Hosea retired into Judah to compose his book. There is no evidence in regard to this either one way or the other.

Hosea occupies the first place, in our bibles, of the minor prophets. His ministry extended over a long period of time, being exercised in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in that of Jeroboam II. king of Israel. The chronology of Uzziah and Jeroboam is somewhat confused; and it is difficult to say how long the two monarchs were contemporary on their respective thrones. Possibly the death of Jeroboam was about 783 B.C., and an interregnum occurred before the short reign of his son Zachariah. The prediction in Hos. i. 4 was apparently delivered under Jeroboam; perhaps therefore the prophet's ministry commenced 784 B.C., and, if we suppose that it closed before the full accomplishment of the threatenings against Samaria, which was taken in the sixth year of Hezekiah, 721 B.C.—else surely he would have noticed it—we may believe that it extended over over full sixty years. There is no improbability in this to outweigh the evidence furnished.

HOSEA, THE BOOK OF (784—723 B.C.) The contents of this book are mainly directed against the corrupt Israelitish kingdom. The sins of the people, committed against mercy and privilege, are denounced in strong language; and judgment is threatened against them. Judah is to take warning by her sister's fall; and promises of forgiveness to the returning backslider, with predictions of future blessing, to have their accomplishment in Messianic times, are given and enforced.

This book may be arranged in two parts: the first including i.-lii., in which we find the relation of certain symbolical actions: the second, iv.-xiv., is a series of prophetic addresses. The title, i. 1, has been made the subject of discussion: some suppose it an addition by a later hand: others with more probability believe that it was prefixed by Hosea himself. But, even if this were not the case, there is no reason, as we have seen, in the preceding article, to doubt its accuracy. The contents of the book prove this. For there are predictions which we must suppose uttered while the house of Jehu was yet on the throne of Israel; and there are descriptions which suit exactly with the state of things at a far later period: e.g. v. 10 may well be supposed to point to the conduct of Ahaz as narrated in 2 Kings xvi. 10-18. Then, again, Hos. x. 14, there is little doubt, refers to the invasion of Samaria by Shalmaneser, who must be identified with Shalman, while Beth-arbel is probably Arbela in Galilee, and the sacking of it occurred on the Assyrian's march towards Samaria (2 Kings xvii. 5, xviii. 9). Ewald's supposition that Arbela was the city so called on the Tigris, and Shalman the name of some unknown Assyrian king (ubi supr. vol. i. p. 157) is, to say the least, unlikely.

Of the first portion of the book, chaps. i., iii. are in prose. With regard to the symbolical actions narrated in this part, some critics believe that they were literally performed; that the prophet really contracted marriage as described. Others—and the opinion is now more generally adopted—suppose the whole a figurative representation, to inculcate more clearly the sin and ultimate destiny of Israel and Judah. There are obvious reasons why we should interpret these chapters figuratively; and, as Bleek sensibly observes (Einleitung in das A. T., p. 521), several years would have been required for the literal occurrence of the events; so that the impression intended to be made upon the people would have been frittered away. The second part (iv.-xiv.) has been divided into separate discourses; but critics do not agree upon the number of them; and all attempts at division are uncertain. It may be that Hosea uttered many more predictions, and that, when he collected and arranged his book, he did not comprise in it all the words he had spoken, but, under the guidance of the divine Spirit, those only which, not intended for mere temporary use, were to be the church's treasure for ever. This may in a measure account for the obscurity of Hosea's writings, which are marked by conciseness and abrupt transitions. But he evinces great poetic power: his descriptions are vivid, and his imagery rich: he is often, too, tender and pathetic.

There are several distinct quotations of Hosea in the New Testament, besides occasional adoption of his language: thus Hos. i. 10 is cited in Rom. ix. 26; Hos. ii. 23 in Rom. ix. 25; 1 Pet. ii. 10; Hos. vi. 6 in Matt. ix. 13, xii. 7; Hos. xi. 1 in Matt. ii. 15; Hos. xiii. 14 in 1 Cor. xv. 55; and Hos. xiv. 2 in Heb. xiii. 15. There would seem also an allusion to Hos. vi. 2 in 1 Cor. xv. 4, and to Hos. x. 8 in Luke xxiii. 30; Rev. vi. 16.

Bp. Horsley's commentary on Hosea, 1801 1804, is full of learned matter.

HOSEN (Dan. iii. 21). Under-garments, tunics. See DRESS.

HOSHAI'AH (whom Jehovah helps).—1. One who led half the princes of Judah at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 32).—2. A Maachathite, father of Jezaniah, Jaazaniah, or Azariah, which are most probably the varying names of one person (2 Kings xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8, xlii. 1, xliii. 2).

HO'SHAMA (whom Jehovah hears). A descendant of the house of David (1 Chron. iii. 18).

HOSHE'A (salvation).—1 (Deut. xxxii. 44). See JOSHUA.—2. The son of Elah: he conspired against Pekah king of Israel, and slew him, and after some time established himself as his successor (2 Kings xv. 30, xvii. 1). The conspiracy against Pekah was in the twentieth year after Jotham's sole reign began, i.e. in the fourth year of Ahaz; and the acknowledgment of Hoshea's rule, to be understood by the phrase 'began to reign,' was in the twelfth of Ahaz. Hoshea reigned nine years, 729-721 B.C. He was not a godly king, but he was less wicked than his predecessors. Now, however, the cup of Israel's iniquity was full. Shalmaneser invaded the land, and made Hoshea tributary. Endeavouring to evade his engagements by the help of So, king of Egypt, he was again attacked by the Assyrian, who besieged Samaria, which was taken in the third year, and the tribes carried away captive. Hoshea was made a prisoner, whether before or after the siege is not clear (xvii. 2-6, xviii. 1, 9, 10); nor is his death recorded: he disappeared, 'cut off as the foam upon the water' (Hos. x. 7). See Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 50-54.—3. The ruler of Ephraim in David's time (1 Chron. xxvii. 20).—4. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 23).

HOSPITALITY. We find the practice of entertaining strangers largely illustrated in the Old Testament history. Their company was solicited as a favour: water was brought to wash their feet: entertainment was given to themselves and to their beasts; and they were protected from rudeness and injury, sometimes even at the risk of extreme sacrifice and suffering on the part of the host (Gen. xviii. 2-8, xix. 1-9, xxiv. 25, 29-33; Exod. ii. 20; Josh. ii. 1-6; Judges xix. 15-24; Job xxxi. 32). The Mosaic law enjoined kind and hospitable treatment of strangers and sojourners (Lev. xix. 33, 34; Deut. xiv. 29), pressing the observance of it by the fact to be continually remembered that the Israelites had been themselves strangers in the land of Egypt. The one marked exception to the obligation of hospitality is the case of Jael in her behaviour to Sisera (Judges iv. 17-22); nor can this woman's conduct be excused on any other ground than the supposition that she had received some divine intimation that the enemy and oppressor of Israel was not to be protected.

In the New Testament the same principle is found. Hospitality is frequently enjoined and commended; and it is insisted on as a necessary qualification for ecclesiastical office (Matt. x. 40-42, xxv. 35, 43; Rom. xii. 13; 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8; Heb. xiii. 2; 1 Pet. iv. 9; 3 John 5). It was specially required among Christians because of the ban under which, on account of their religion, they were laid. A significant exception is, however, made. The faithful are forbidden to receive those who had rejected the cardinal doctrine of the gospel (2 John 9-11). No stronger expression of censure could have been conveyed.

Hospitality of the kind commanded in scripture is to be found to this day among races of men of simple and primitive habits. The Arabs of the desert are especially remarkable for their practice of it. It is the more necessary in regions where there is no provision made (as in western Europe) for the comfortable lodging of travellers in well-appointed inns. Even in the east there is some difference between the usage in towns and that among the wandering tribes, who pitch their tents when and where they choose. Travellers give us graphic descriptions of this hospitality. Thus Buckingham, speaking of the country beyond the Jordan, says, 'A foot-passenger can make way at little or no expense, as travellers and wayfarers of every description halt at the sheikh's dwelling, where, whatever may be the rank or condition of the stranger, before any questions are asked him as to where he comes from or whither he is going, coffee is served to him from a large pot always on the fire, and a meal of bread, milk, oil, honey, or butter, is set before him, for which no payment is ever demanded or even expected by the host... though it is considered as a necessary consequence of his situation as chief of a community, that he should maintain this ancient practice of hospitality to strangers.' In towns or villages, places of entertainment are often provided at the cost of the inhabitants.

Burkhardt tells us that he found eight such places, called medhafes, in Kerak, a town about nine or ten miles east of the Dead sea. Their expenses are not defrayed from a common purse; but, whenever a stranger takes up his lodging at one of the medhafes, one of the people present declares that he intends to furnish that day's entertainment; and it is then his duty to provide a dinner or supper, which he sends to the medhafa, and which is always in sufficient quantity for a large company. A goat or a lamb is generally killed on the occasion; and barley for the guest's horse is also furnished. . . . There are Turks who every other day kill a goat for this hospitable purpose. . . . Their love of entertaining strangers is carried to such a length, that not long ago, when a Christian silversmith, who came from Jerusalem to work for the ladies, and who, being an industrious man, seldom stirred out of his shop, was on the point of departure after a two months' residence, each of the principal families of the town sent him a lamb, saying that it was not just that he should lose his due, though he did not choose to come and dine with them. The more a man expends upon his guests, the greater is his reputation and influence; and the few families who pursue an opposite conduct are despised by all the others' (Travels in Syria, p. 384). Traces of this hospitality are to be still found in countries which have ceased to be under eastern sway. Thus it is in Spain a mark of only common civility for persons at a meal to invite a passer-by to sit down and share it. And it is to this principle that we may ascribe the claim which the even-accidental tasting of another's salt is held to give to his protection.

For a notice of hospitality as practised among the classical nations of antiquity, reference may be made to Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiq., art. 'Hospitium.'

HOST, HOSTS. See ARMY.

HOST OF HEAVEN. This expression is used in different senses. It sometimes means the angels (1 Kings xxii. 19; 2 Chron. xviii. 18; comp. Luke ii. 13). Hence the Lord is called 'Jehovah (God) of Hosts,' i. e. of the celestial armies. Sometimes the sun, moon, and stars, are intended, the visible host or multitude of heavenly bodies (e. g. Deut. iv. 19; Jer. viii. 2), whom the heathen worshipped. Sometimes also the expression is employed figuratively to designate rulers, perhaps specially ecclesiastical rulers (Dan. viii. 10; comp. Isai. xxv. 21).

HOSTAGE. It was common to give pledges as security for a debt: see PLEDGE. But there is no mention of persons being so detained till the victory of Jehoash, king of Israel, over Amaziah, king of Judah (2 Kings xiv. 14; 2 Chron. xxv. 24); when hostages were taken for the liberation of Amaziah: see Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. p. 14.

HO'THAM (a signet-ring). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 32).

HO'THAN (id.). The father of two of David's worthies (1 Chron. xi. 44). The name Hothan is an error in our translation for Hotham.

HO'THIR (whom Jehovah left, or saved?). A son of Heman, one of the chiefs of the musicians (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 28).

HOUR. The twenty-fourth part of the day. Such a mode of dividing time was not originally employed among the Hebrews. And, when the word 'hour' first occurs, it is used loosely and indefinitely (Dan. iii. 6, 15, iv. 19, 33, v. 5); as it is frequently in the New Testament (Mark xiii. 32; John ii. 4); and as very commonly among ourselves. At a very early period the Egyptians divided the day into twelve hours; and the same reckoning prevailed among the Babylonians, from whom the Greeks took it. It is likely that the Jews learned and adopted it at the period of the captivity. In our Lord's time, the day, that is, the space between sunrise and sunset, was confessedly distributed into twelve hours (John xi. 9); these, therefore, varied in length according to the season of the year. Generally, however, we may say that the third hour corresponded with our 9 A.M., the sixth with our noon, the ninth with our 3 P.M., &c. In Acts xxiii. 23, the hours of the night were reckoned from sunset; consequently the time named would nearly correspond with our 9 P.M.

Some difficulty has been felt in reconciling Mark xv. 25 with John xix. 14. But, as it is unreasonable to imagine that there is really a contradiction in regard to the most momentous event that ever occurred, we may fairly conclude that St. John, writing out of Judea, adopted a different mode of computation, reckoning, as we do, from midnight; so that the bringing forth of Jesus to the people was at 6 A.M., the actual crucifixion at 9 A.M. See this fully illustrated by Davidson, Sacr. Herm., chap. xii. pp. 563, 564; Lee, The Insp. of Holy Script., lect. viii. note, pp. 391, 392.

HOUSE. The habitations of the early races of mankind were doubtless very simple. Clusters of them would, however, naturally be gathered for mutual help and security. Hence we find Cain mentioned as having built a city (Gen. iv. 17). The advantages of a locality would of course invite permanent occupation; while the allurements of the chase, the necessity of finding sufficient pasturage for cattle, and probably the change of seasons, would foster roving habits. So that various tribes, dwellers in tents, which could be easily removed, were soon distinguished from those who inhabited cities. Such movable habitations were constructed with a view to mere temporary convenience; and ornament would have been wasted on them. The fathers of the Israelitish nation for the most part dwelt in tents. They were, in the providence of God, pilgrims in a land which should be given as a settled home to their posterity; wholesome lessons being thus taught them, and their example being to be afterwards quoted for the confirmation of the faith of the church (Acts vii. 4, 5; Heb. xi. 8-10). Jacob indeed is said to have 'built him a house at Succoth' (Gen. xxxiii. 17); but the original word so rendered is of vague signification, and comprises almost every kind of erection, from the humblest hut or even tent to the gorgeous palace or sacred temple. After leaving Egypt, the Israelites inhabited tents in the wilderness; so that it was not till they occupied Canaan that they were domiciled in houses properly so called. In the cities which they took (the few excepted which they were commanded to destroy) they found houses ready to their hand (Deut. vi. 10, 11; Josh. xxiv. 13). Some of these houses are still existing—the massive dwellings of Bashan, little altered, it would seem, from what they were when the victorious tribes took possession of them. See ARGOB, BASHAN, CITIES, HAURAN.

It is probable that the houses generally of the ancient Israelites differed little from those inhabited by modern oriental nations. We may well, therefore, derive our illustrations of such as are mentioned in the bible from usages of the present day.

ments are mud or sun-dried brick; they are therefore easily swept away by violent rains or floods (Matt. vii. 26, 27). In some districts stone is used. Caves, too, are not seldom still occupied as dwellings; of which indeed there are many examples in western Europe.

The materials of the better class of houses were stone, marble, and other costly kinds, perhaps porphyry, basalt, &c. (1 Chron. xxix. 2), carefully squared, panelled, and fitted (Amos v. 11), cemented in Babylonia with bitumen (Gen. xi. 3), with clay, or mortar composed of lime, ashes, and sand, straw being sometimes added. Inferior materials, and want of proper mixing, would make this mortar liable to crumble (Ezek. xiii. 10-15) in rainy weather. Sometimes stones were fastened together with iron clamps or lead. Bricks, kiln-burnt, were probably also used. Other materials were timber, such as cedar, shittim (acacia), sycamore, olive, and in palaces algum and cypress (Exod. xxvi. 15; 1 Kings vi. 15, 16, 32-34, vii. 8, 12, x. 12; Isai. ix. 10). The precious metals and ivory were also employed for overlaying wood-work, &c. (1 Kings vi. 35, xxii. 39; Amos iii. 15).

The general plan of an eastern house presents a dead wall to the street, and one or more interior courts. There is a low entrance-door with an inscription from the Koran, and over it a latticed window, or kiosk, sometimes projecting like our antique bay-windows; there may be also a few other small latticed windows high up in the wall.

A passage from the outer door, which is attended to by the porter (John xviii. 16, 17; Acts xii. 13, 14), leads into the first or outer court, but is so contrived that the entrance to the court is not exactly opposite to the external door; so that no view of the court is obtained from the street, nor any of the street from the court. ments look into this court, and some of them are open to it. It is occasionally shaded by an awning; and on the floor or pavement of it carpets are spread on festive occasions; while in the centre there is often a fountain. Around the court or part of it a verandah runs, and over this, when the house has more than one story, there is probably another balustraded gallery. In the corner of the court are the stairs to the upper apartments. Immediately opposite the side of entrance is the principal reception-room, open to the court. It has a raised terrace or platform, and is richly fitted up with sofas (the divan) round three sides, and probably with a fountain in the centre. Here the master of the house receives his visitors, his place being the corner of the divan, and each person taking off his shoes before he steps upon the raised portion of the

to some visitor of rank. There are other smaller rooms for visitors and retainers on this first floor; while beneath, on what may be called the basement, are servants' offices and store-places. If there be but one court, the apartments for the females are in the upper part of the house; if there be two courts, the innermost one is theirs; if more than two, the master occupies the second, and sees there those of his family whom he chooses to summon from the third court, in | alone, besides the occupants, has access: here he can repose undisturbed; for no man, however intimate a friend, is admitted.

which they live (Esth. iv. 11). The entrance to the second court is usually at the corner of the first, by a door and passage similar to that from the street into the first.

The interior or women's court is usually larger than the first: it is paved, except in the middle, where is a tank for bathing (2 Sam. xi. 2), and where a few trees, seldom more than two, and shrubs are planted. To the harem or women's apartment the master hiding-place (Judges xv. 1; 1 Kings vii. 6, xx. 30, xxii. 25). The arrangements of the inner court are similar to those of the outer. There are galleries or verandahs; in the centre of the principal front, a large open room, and other larger or smaller apartments, closed ordinarily with curtains instead of doors. The roof of a house is flat, except where domes are introduced. Twigs, matting, and earth are laid upon the rafters, trodden down, and covered with a compost, hard when it is dry. But it is necessary carefully to roll it after rain. On such roofs weeds often grow, but are speedily dried up and wither (Psal. cxxix. 6, 7; Isai. xxxvii. 27). These roofs were to be carefully protected by a battlement or parapet, lest accidents should occur (Deut. xxii. 8). This towards the street is a wall, towards the interior court usually a balustrade. It may have been through this that Ahaziah fell (2 Kings i. 2). The roof is reached by an external stair-case, so that it is not necessary to traverse any of the rooms in ascending or descending (Matt. xxiv. 17). Many uses were and are made of these roof-platforms. Linen and other articles were spread there to dry (Josh. ii. 6). They were places of private conference, of recreation, and for sleeping (1 Sam. ix. 25, 26; 2 Sam. xi. 2; Prov. xxi. 9): booths were erected there at the feast of tabernacles (Neh. viii. 16), and tents (2 Sam. xvi. 22). In times of public calamity, lamentations were uttered there (Isai. xv. 3, xxii. 1; Jer. xlviii. 38). There, too, was private prayer made, and sometimes idolatrous rites performed (2 Kings xxiii. 12; Jer. xix. 13, xxxii. 29; Zeph. i. 5; Acts x. 9).

A few additional particulars may be noted. Ceilings were made of cedar, and artistically coloured (Jer. xxii. 14, 15; Hagg. i. 4). There were no chimneys: that so called (Hos. xiii. 3) was but a hole: indeed there were ordinarily no fires except in a kitchen, where, on a kind of brick platform, places were provided for cooking. Apartments were warmed when needful by fire-pans: see HEARTH (Jer. xxxvi. 22); or fires were kindled in the court (Mark xiv. 54; Luke xxii. 55; John xviii. 18). Different rooms, too, as already mentioned in modern practice, were used in summer-time and in winter-time (Amos iii. 15); and, whereas those for use in warm weather were open to the court, those for colder seasons were closed in with lattice-work, and curtains, and, probably for want of glass in the windows, with shutters. There were no rooms specially appropriated as bed-rooms: just as it is common at the present day to sleep on the divan in the ordinary apartments. Hence the assassins would have easier access to Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 5-7).

The various notices we meet with in scripture will be easily understood, if the previous descriptions be borne in mind. The chamber on the wall designed for Elisha (2 Kings iv. 10) was probably the room over the gate, with the projecting window. Perhaps also the summer-parlour where Ehud found Eglon (Judges iii. 20) was the same. The 'guest-chamber' where our Lord commanded his disciples to prepare for the last supper (Luke xxii. 11, 12) was one of the large reception-rooms in an upper story. It was in such a room, but on the first floor, in the palace of the high-priest that Christ was examined, whence he could look down upon Peter at the fire in the court (61). The 'upper room' where the disciples assembled after the ascension (Acts i. 13) was similar to the 'guest-chamber' mentioned above. Similar also was that in which Paul was preaching (xx. 8, 9). Eutyclus sat by the latticed window and fell through it into the court below, whither Paul went down to him. Such also may have been the lattice through which Ahaziah fell, instead of from the balustrade at the house-top. The circumstances attending the cure of the paralytic (Mark ii. 2-4; Luke v. 18, 19) may hence also be explained. Our Lord was perhaps in the verandah; while the people crowded the court and impeded the passage from the street. The bearers therefore went to the roof, and, taking away part of the covering of the verandah, let the sick man down. Or it might be that Christ was in a small house with a single room, and that the friends, having mounted to the top by a ladder, either breaking through the battlement let down the sick man by the side of the house, or, actually uncovering the roof, passed the bed through the hole. Either of these modes was very practicable according to the circumstances, and will satisfy the terms of the narrative.

The house or temple, which Samson destroyed at his death by pulling down the central pillars (Judges xvi. 26-30), may be supposed to have had tiers of balconies, in which the spectators were accommodated. The cross-beams, loaded with an unusual weight, would probably break, the side-walls be forced out, and the roof fall; the whole structure thus becoming a ruin: see Pict. Bible, note on Judges xvi. 29.

It may be added that, when a man had built a house and had not dedicated it, he was free from military service (Deut. xx. 5). The use of the word in such passages as Exod. ii. 21; 1 Sam. iii. 12; 2 Sam. iii. 1, vii. 11; Ezek. ii. 5, is easily understood.

HUK'KOK (decreed, according to some, moat). A border-place of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34). On its site is the modern village Yakuk, to the west of the northern end of the sea of Galilee.

HU'KOK (id.). A Levitical city of Asher (1 Chron. vi. 75). For this we find Helkath in Josh. xxi. 31.

HUL (circle). A son of Aram, and grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 23; 1 Chron. i. 17). His descendants probably occupied the district to the north of the lake Merom, now Haleh.

HUL'DAH (a weasel). A prophetess, the wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, perhaps the royal wardrobe. Her residence was in the 'college,' or 'second part' (2 Kings xxii. 14, marg.: comp. Zeph. i. 10), probably the second or lower city, afterwards called Akra. To her Josiah sent for counsel on the finding of the book of the law (2 Kings xxii. 12-20; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20-28). Jeremiah had begun to prophesy before this time, and it has been questioned why the king did not apply to him; but he was young, and was, it is most likely, still residing at Anathoth (see Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 138-140).

HUMILITY. A Christian grace, the opposite of pride and self-confidence. This grace it was, perhaps, which could least be understood by the heathen; words exactly to express the idea not existing in the Greek and Latin languages; and, so far as it was comprehended, it was contemned by proud and vain-glorious men. Humility is impressed on believers both by the example of Christ (John xiii. 2-15; Phil. ii. 5-8), and by precept (1 Pet. v. 5, 6). It was the fruit of the Spirit; and cautions were given against a false humility (Col. ii. 18).

A special use of a kindred word may be here noted. To 'humble' a woman is to have unjustifiably carnal connection with her (Gen. xxxiv. 2, marg.; Deut. xxi. 14; Ezek. xxii. 10).

HUMTAH (a place of lizards, or, possibly, a bulwark). A city in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 54). Its site has not been identified.

HUNTING. We read of hunters in the early ages of the world, as Nimrod (Gen. x. 9), Ishmael (xxi. 20), Esau (xxv. 27). There were savage beasts in Palestine (Exod. xxiii. 29), lions (Judges xiv. 5; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Kings xiii. 24, xx. 36; 2 Kings xvii. 25; Jer. xlix. 19), wild boars (Psal. lxxx. 13), bears (1 Sam. xvii. 34; 2 Kings i. 24), &c.; and it must have been necessary to hunt and destroy them for personal protection. There were also harts, roe-bucks, and fallow-deer, animals coming under the description of game (1 Kings iv. 23), which were hunted and captured for food (Prov. xii. 27). Bows and arrows were used by the hunter (Gen. xxvii. 3). Pitfalls were also employed for larger and fiercer beasts (Ezek. xix. 4), also nets (Isai. li. 20; Ezek. xix. 8), and traps (Job xviii. 9, 10; Prov. xxii. 5). Care was taken, when animals for food were caught in the chase, to pour out their blood on the ground, as blood might not be eaten (Lev. xvii. 13, 14). Herod the Great, we are told by Josephus, was a keen sportsman; he kept a regular hunting-establishment, and was often very successful (Antiq., lib. xv. 7, § 7, xvi. 10, § 3; Bell. Jud., lib. i. 21, § 13). Hunting was a favourite pastime in Egypt and Assyria; and hunting-scenes are represented on the monuments.

Terms connected with hunting and fowling are often figuratively used to indicate the wiles of treacherous enemies, and the dangers to which men are exposed (Psal. ix. 16, lvii. 6, xci. 3; Prov. xxvi. 27; Isai. xxiv. 17, xlii. 22; Jer. v. 26, xvi. 17, xlviii. 44; Amos iii. 5). See FOWLING.

HU'PHAM (perhaps coastman). One of the children of Benjamin (Numb. xxvi. 39). He is called Huppin in Gen. xli. 21; 1 Chron. vii. 12.

HU'PHAMITES. A family of Benjamin (Numb. xxvi. 39).

HUP'PAH (a covering, a bridal bed). A priest, the head of one of the courses (1 Chron. xxiv. 13).

HUP'PIM (coverings). A son or descendant of Benjamin (Gen. xli. 21; 1 Chron. vii. 12, 15). He is called Hupham in Numb. xxvi. 39.

HUR (cavern).—1. A person intimately associated with Moses and Aaron, and, according to Jewish belief, Miriam's husband (Exod. xvii. 10-12, xxiv. 14). We may very reasonably suppose that it was the same who was of the tribe of Judah and the grandfather of Bezaleel (xxxi. 2, xxxv. 30, xxxviii. 22; 1 Chron. ii. 19, 20, 50, iv. 1; 2 Chron. i. 5). In 1 Chron. iv. 4 he is called the father of Bethlehem, probably because his descendants colonized or settled in that town: comp. ii. 50, 51.—2. One of the Midianitish chieftains slain by Israel (Numb. xxxi. 8; Josh. xii. 21). It might seem from the last-named passage that these chieftains were dependant upon Sihon.—3. One whose son (Ben-hur) presided over Solomon's commissariat service in mount Ephraim (1 Kings iv. 8).—4. The father of Rephaiah, who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 9).

HU'RAI (perhaps worker in linen). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 32). He is also called Hiddai (2 Sam. xxiii. 30).

HU'RAM (noble, high-born).—1. A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 5).—2. A king of Tyre (2 Chron. ii. 3, 11, 12, viii. 2, 18, ix. 10, 21). See HIRAM, 1.—3. The artificer sent by the king of Tyre to superintend the works of Solomon's temple (ii. 13, iv. 11, 16). The honourable title 'father' is here added to his name, which is not, as some have fancied, part of the name, but signifies master, counsellor, and shows the estimation in which he was held. See HIRAM, 2.

HU'RI (worker in linen). A descendant of Gad (1 Chron. v. 14).

HUSBAND. See MARRIAGE.

HUSBANDMAN, HUSBANDRY. See AGRICULTURE.

HU'SHAH (haste). A name found in the genealogies of Judah: it may designate a person, but more probably a place (1 Chron. iv. 4).

HU'SHAI (hasting). A person styled David's friend; whom the king desired to stay in Jerusalem during Absalom's rebellion that he might defeat the sagacious counsel of Ahithophel. Hushai was completely successful (2 Sam. xv. 32-37, xvi. 16-18, xvii. 5-16; 1 Kings iv. 16; 1 Chron. xxvii. 33). He is called the ARCHITE, which see.

HU'SHAM (haste). One of the early kings of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 34, 35; 1 Chron. i. 45, 46). Mr. Wilton supposes him connected with Heshmon, a town of Judah (The Negeb, pp. 123-126).

HU'SHATHITE. This designation is given to Sibbechai, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 18; 1 Chron. xi. 29, xx. 4, xxvii. 11): in the last-cited passage he is said to be of the Zarahites, i. e. the descendants of Zerah, the son of Judah. It is most probable that Mebunai (2 Sam. xxiii. 27) is the same person. See HUSHAH.

HU'SHIM (the hastening).—1. The son of Dan (Gen. xli. 23), called also Shuham (Numb. xxvi. 42).—2. A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 12).—3. One of the wives of Shalaraim, a Benjamite (viii. 8, 11).

HUSK. The 'husk' of Numb. vi. 4 is the translucent skin of the grape. By the word rendered 'husk' in 2 Kings iv. 42 Gesenius understands a sack or bag; see marg. rendering. We once more meet with 'husks' (Luke xv. 16). 'These,' says abp. Trench (Notes on the Parables, p. 398, note, 6th edit.) 'are not the husks or pods of some other fruit,' as of peas or beans, 'but themselves the fruit of the carob-tree. . . .

They are in shape something like a bean-pod, though larger and curved more . . . thence called little horn (the literal meaning of the Greek word). . . . They have a hard dark outside and a dull sweet taste: 'the shell or pod alone is eaten.

HUZ (light sandy soil?). The eldest son of Nabor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 21). The original word is that elsewhere rendered Uz: see Uz.

HUZ'ZAB (Nab. ii. 9). The meaning of this word can only be conjectured. Ewald supposed it the name of the queen of Nineveh (Die Proph. des A. B., vol. i. pp. 356, 357). Rawlinson suggests the Zab country (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 842, 843). Gesenius, uniting the word to the preceding verse, translates 'the palace is dissolved and made to flow down'; while Henderson, preferring an exactly opposite meaning, has 'the palace is dissolved, though firmly established' (Minor Prophets, p. 282).

HYÆNA. This word occurs in our version only in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. xiii. 18). But some critics believe that the hyæna is meant in Jer. xii. 9, rather than 'speckled bird.' This ferocious animal is common to the present day, and no doubt existed formerly (for Zeboim, mentioned in 1 Sam. xiii. 18; Neh. xi. 34, means place of hyænas) in Palestine; but the great difficulty of such a rendering is that a word is adjoined in the passage in question which wherever else it occurs implies a bird. Perhaps therefore it is better to adhere to the reading of our translation.

HYDASPES (Judith i. 6). It is uncertain what river is meant.

HYMENE'US (belonging to Hymen, nuptial). One who is said to have erred from the faith, and, in conjunction with Philetus, to have taught that the resurrection was past (2 Tim. ii. 17, 18). He is elsewhere coupled with Alexander, and was, we are told, 'delivered to Satan,' i. e. excommunicated (1 Tim. i. 20). But probably this intends something more than mere exclusion from the church. There was a special power for remedying disorders, with which the apostles were invested (2 Cor. x. 8, xiii. 10); and some peculiar exercise of this may be meant. See Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xvi. chap. ii. 15.

HYMN. Our Lord is said to have 'sung an hymn' with his disciples on the night of his passion, just before he went out to the mount of Olives (Matt. xxvi. 30; Mark xiv. 26). Critics are not altogether agreed what this 'hymn' was. Many suppose it to have been a part of what the Jews called the Great Hallel, i. e. Psalms cxliii.-cxviii.; of which Psalms cxliii., cxiv. were sung before the rest after the passover-feast. Hymns are generally distinguished from psalms in the New Testament (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16); and the term may probably have been applied first to some of those sacred compositions (apart from psalms) which are preserved in scripture, such as the songs of Moses, of Hannah, of Zacharias, of the Virgin, of Simeon, &c., and also to those praises which spiritual persons had the gift of uttering (1 Cor. xiv. 26). In this last-named place, however, it is observable that the composition is called 'a psalm.' Paul and Silas perhaps sung hymns in the Philippian prison (Acts xvi. 25); and, no doubt, the grateful joy of the first believers would soon find vent in hymns of praise; of which the doxology, the angelical and cherubical hymns in the Communion office are examples. Bingham traces the progress of hymnology in the early church in Orig. Eccles., book xiv. chap. ii.; and a writer in the Quarterly Review gives a compendious account of Hebrew, Syrian, Greek, Latin, and other hymns (vol. cxi. pp. 318-355), which, with the works there referred to, may be consulted with advantage.

HYPOCRITE. One who merely acts a part, i. e. a dissembler in religion, who has the form without the power of godliness. There are many severe censures upon hypocrites in our Lord's addresses (Matt. vi. 2, 5, 16, and elsewhere). The word rendered 'hypocrite' in Job viii. 13, xiii. 16, and elsewhere, is more properly goddess, profane.

HYSSOP. St. Augustine long ago remarked that readers of the scripture who did not know what hyssop was could not comprehend the full force of several of the passages in which the mention of it occurs (De Doctr. Christ., lib. ii. 24, edit. Ben., tom. iii. col. 29: comp. 62, col. 43). Augustine describes hyssop as a lowly and short-stemmed plant, with roots penetrating rocks or stones, and of purgative qualities. It is a singular fact, however, that even to the present day naturalists are by no means agreed what really was the hyssop of scripture.

Hyssop is first mentioned in the command to the Israelites to sprinkle with it the blood of the paschal lamb on the lintels and door-posts of their houses (Exod. xii. 22). The plant, then, must have been common in Lower Egypt, and it must have been large and leafy enough to be used for sprinkling. There are further notices of it in the books of Leviticus and Numbers. Thus, in the direction for the cleansing of the leper, hyssop was to be taken (Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 7, 51, 52); also in the ordinance about the red heifer (Numb. xix. 6, 18). Hence hyssop must have been procurable in the wilderness and on the outskirts of Palestine, and, if not bushy, it would not have been suitable to sprinkle with. To this use of it the Psalmist and a New Testament writer allude (Psal. li. 7; Heb. ix. 19). Again, when Solomon's knowledge of natural history is spoken of, it is said that he described 'trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall' (1 Kings iv. 33). Hyssop then must have grown (though not necessarily always) upon walls; and some have inferred that it was a small plant, being contrasted with the lofty cedar. Once more, the sponge full of vinegar offered to our Saviour on the cross, we are told (John xix. 29), was put upon hyssop. St. Matthew and St. Mark, however, do not mention the hyssop, but say that the sponge was put on a reed (Matt. xxvii. 48; Mark xv. 36). It is hence obvious that the hyssop was a plant of Judea, found in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem; and it is inferred from a comparison of the evangelists that it had a long stalk, which might be used as a stick or reed.

Many conjectures have been made by various writers to identify hyssop, and to find some plant which shall satisfy the conditions referred to. Celsius enumerates no less than eighteen; each of which has had its supporters. Among these are rosemary, thyme, marjoram, &c. That most generally favoured is the Hyssopus officinalis, common garden hyssop, a perennial plant, usually very smooth. The root throws up several leafy stems, which are woody at the base, diffuse, and much branched: the branches are from one to two feet long. Dr. Kitto was at first inclined to believe hyssop the Phytolacca decandra, but he afterwards relinquished his own opinion in favour of that of Dr. Forbes Royle, who contributed two papers on the subject to the Church of England Magazine, vol. xviii. pp. 92-94, 179-181: to these papers the present article is greatly indebted.

Dr. Royle's attention was directed to a passage in Burckhardt's Travels in Syria, in which he speaks of the aszef which he saw in the Sinai peninsula. 'On noticing its presence in Wady Kheysey, he describes it as a tree which he had already seen in several other wadies. It springs from the fissures in the rocks; and its crooked stem creeps up the mountain-side like a parasitical plant. According to the Arabs, it produces a fruit of the size of the walnut, of a blackish colour, and very sweet to the taste. The bark of the tree is white; and the branches are thickly covered with small thorns: the leaves are heart-shaped, and of the same shade of green as those of the oak' (Syria, pp. 536, 537). Dr. Royle was from this description led to imagine that the plant Burckhardt saw was a species of Capparis; and on further investigation he found that the Capparis spinosa, or caper-tree (called by the Arabs asuf, a word very similar to the Hebrew term rendered 'hyssop') was to be met with in all the situations—Lower Egypt, Sinai, and Palestine—where it is mentioned in the bible. Dr. Royle concludes: 'Its habit is to grow upon the most barren soil, or rocky precipice, or the side of a wall. . . . It has, moreover, always been supposed to be possessed of cleansing properties: hence, probably, its selection in the ceremonies of purification; or its employment in these may have led to the supposition of its possessing the power of curing diseases like leprosy. Finally, the caper-plant is capable of yielding a stick to which the sponge might have been affixed; as we learn from St. John was done with the hyssop, when the sponge dipped in vinegar was raised to the lips of our Saviour. A combination of circumstances—and some of them, apparently, too improbable to be united in one plant—I cannot believe to be accidental, and therefore consider myself entitled to infer, what I hope I have now succeeded in proving to the satisfaction of others, that the caper-plant is the hyssop of scripture.' It is fair to add that naturalists are not prepared fully to adopt Dr. Royle's conclusion. In the present state of our knowledge, however, his opinion is entitled to very great deference.

I

IB'HAR (whom God chooses, chosen). One of the sons of David (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. iii. 6. xiv. 5).

IB'LEAM (he consumes the people). A city belonging to Manasseh, but territorially within the district of another tribe (Josh. xvii. 11; Judges i. 27; 2 Kings ix. 27). It is perhaps identical with Bileam (1 Chron. vi. 70).

IBNEI'AH (Jehovah will build). A Benjamite who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix. 8).

IBNI'JAH (id.). A Benjamite (1 Chron. ix. 8).

IB'RI (Hebrew). A descendant of Merari (1 Chron. xxiv. 27).

IB'ZAN (perhaps of tin, or splendour). One of the judges of Israel (Judges xii. 8-10). It is very uncertain whether the Beth-lehem to which he belonged was that in Zebulun, or the more illustrious Beth-lehem of Judah, perhaps the former. Some have groundlessly fancied Ibaz the same with Boaz.

ICE, or congealed water, is repeatedly mentioned in scripture, usually as giving point to an illustration (Job vi. 16, xxxviii. 29). Perhaps the Hebrews cooled their drinks with ice or snow (Prov. xxv. 13). In Psal. cxlvii. 17 it is put poetically for hail.

I'CHABOD (inglorious). The son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli, born when the ark of God was taken, and so named on account of that calamity (1 Sam. iv. 19-22). He was younger brother of Ahitub, father of Ahiah or Ahimelech (xiv. 3).

ICO'NIUM. A considerable city of Asia Minor, generally considered as belonging to Lycaonia, though Xenophon (Anab., lib. i. cap. ii. 19) calls it the last city of Phrygia, and Ammianus Marcellinus (Rer. Gest. lib. xiv. 2) places it in Pisidia. It lay in a fertile plain at the foot of Taurus, on the great line of communication between Ephesus and the more eastern cities of Tarsus and Antioch, and the Euphrates. In the decline of the Roman empire it was made a colony, and in the middle ages Iconium was still a place of consequence as the seat of the Seljukian sultans. It is now called Konieh and has a population of about 30,000, with some imposing remains of Saracenic architecture. St. Paul first visited Iconium with Barnabas from Antioch in Pisidia (a town to the west); and their preaching and miracles were made effectual to the conversion of many; but, a persecution being stirred up by the Jews, the apostles fled to Lystra and Derbe. They visited Iconium again, however, before returning to the Syrian Antioch (Acts xiii. 50, 51, xiv. 2; 1 Tim. iii. 11). St. Paul must have been at Iconium in his next journey with Silas (Acts xvi. 1-6), and very possibly at a later period (xviii. 23). It was well suited for a centre of missionary operations.

ID'ALAH (variously explained, as what God exalts, memorial stone of God, or he goes softly). A town of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15).

ID'BASH (honied). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 3).

ID'DO (timely). The father of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 14).—2. A Gershonite Levite (1 Chron. vi. 21) called also Adaiah (41).—3. The grandfather of the prophet Zechariah, a priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra v. 1, vi. 14; Neh. xii. 4, 16; Zech. i. 1, 7). There are some variations in the Hebrew in the spelling of this name.

ID'DO (loving). The ruler in David's time of Manasseh east of the Jordan (1 Chron. xxvii. 21).

ID'DO (nearly allied in meaning to the name of the first Iddo, with which it is sometimes interchanged). A seer, whose 'visions against Jeroboam the son of Nebat,' and book 'concerning genealogies,' and 'story' (midrash) or chronicle of the acts of Abijah, are referred to by the author of Chronicles (2 Chron. ix. 29, xii. 15, xiii. 22). There is a Jewish tradition that he was the disobedient prophet of 1 Kings xiii.

ID'DO (calamity). A chief of the Nethinim at Casiphia, to whom Ezra sent for Levites to join his caravan (Ezra viii. 17). Thirty-eight Levites, and two hundred and twenty Nethinim responded to the call (18-20).

IDLE. The word 'idle' does not often occur in our version, and generally is at once intelligible. But in Matt. xii. 36 the meaning of an 'idle word' has been questioned. It may best be taken as indicating the empty insincere language of a man who carelessly says one thing and means another, 'conducting neither to instruction nor innocent entertainment . . . not consecrated by any seriousness of purpose whatever' (Dr. Goulburn's The Idle Word, p. 93).

IDOL. A representation of some principle or being to whom worship was paid. It was intended to convey through the external senses a more vivid notion to the mind of the object adored, and thus to be simply a medium—as the Israelites meant to honour Jehovah by means of their calf-like image (Exod. xxxii. 5). But grosser ideas naturally prevailed; and men, having regarded the representation as sacred to the deity, came very often to consider it the deity itself, at least to offer it worship, as if the senseless stone or piece of metal could hear and help them. Sometimes living creatures, animals or reptiles, were objects of adoration; sometimes idols were molten or graven images, formed 'by art and man's device.' All such are equally prohibited in scripture. There are a vast number of words in the Hebrew bible by which idols are designated, some of a moral cast, to indicate the detestation in which they should be held, others implying that they represented some object, or idea, or attribute of a deity, and others having reference to the material of them, or their workmanship. To give lists and definitions of all these would pass beyond the limits and purpose of the present work. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 848-852, enumerates twenty-one such terms: to that, or to lexicons or similar books, the reader must be referred. Our word 'idol,' it may be observed, is from the Greek eidōlon, an image, spectre, or shade. The forms of idols were and are multifarious, from a shapeless block of wood or stone, to the elaborately-figured and ornamented human or bestial representation. Specimens of them, ancient and modern, are plentiful in the museums of the curious. Idols had temples where they were set up and fastened (Isai. xli. 7; Jer. x. 4), and priests appointed for the rites of their worship. Here as trophies the arms of defeated foes were hung (1 Sam. xxxi. 10). And sometimes idols were carried out to battle (2 Sam. v. 21). But they were essentially an affront and detestation to the holy Lord of heaven and earth (comp. 2 Chron. xv. 16, marg.), whether they were literal material idols, or whether merely some object or pursuit, incompatible with his service, to which the heart was given: see next article.

IDOLATRY. The worship of other objects or beings besides the one true God. This must have arisen from the neglect and deprivation of that knowledge of himself which the great Creator communicated to the common father of the human family.

Probably the heavenly bodies were among the earliest objects of idolatrous reverence. Their glorious splendour, and the influence which it was soon perceived they exercised upon mundane things, naturally impressed the minds of men, who, with indistinct notions of the mighty Former, transferred to them the honour due to him. This kind of idolatry is noticed in the book of Job (Job xxxi. 26-28: see some good remarks in Kitto's Pict. Bible, note on Job xxxi. 26). But a more subtle principle was introduced, regulating and intertwined with this worship. The power of nature was deified, that generative power, according to which life was communicated, and forms of existence were continually reproduced. And this power was separated into active and passive, male and female, the one, after the highest notion, the source of spiritual, the other of physical life. These powers were personified, sometimes separately, and sometimes in combination. Thus the sun and moon, the Baal and Astarte of Phœnician worship, were regarded as embodying these active and passive principles respectively. And the idol deities of other nations bore similar characters. It is easy to see how such worship would be tainted by licentiousness of thought, and that the rites of it would be immoral and obscene. Unnatural lusts would be indulged, till the frightful picture drawn by the apostle Paul of heathenism was abundantly realized among even the most refined nations of antiquity (Rom. i. 18-32). It was in order to guard the Israelites against such abominable things that many of the enactments of the Mosaic law were directed (e.g. Deut. xxii. 5).

It is impossible to follow out here the large subject of heathen idolatry, which would demand a volume for a full illustration and history of it. It will be more suitable to trace rapidly the course of that infection derived from their heathen neighbours, which tainted from time to time the Hebrew nation, and involved them in the guilt of idolatry; a sin which, because Jehovah had taken them into intimate covenant with himself, is often stigmatized as whoredom and adultery (e.g. Jer. iii. 1-3; Hos. ii. 2-5).

There are indications of idolatrous worship among the early patriarchs, relics, it is likely, of that from which God withdrew Abraham, intending to raise from him in his seed a covenant people (Josh. xxiv. 2). Thus Laban had images, which Rachel (it is to be feared with no good motive) purloined. And some such images continued in Jacob's family (Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, 32-35, xxxv. 2, 4). That the symbolic idolatry of Egypt made an impression on the Israelites may be concluded from the form of the image manufactured when Moses was in the mount (Exod. xxxii. 4; comp. Josh. xxiv. 14). Also that there was some kind of star-worship practised in the wilderness we may conclude from Amos v. 26; Acts vii. 43. Be this, however, as it may, we see at a late period of their wanderings the licentious worship of Baal-peor, contracted from the Moabites and Midianites (Numb. xxv.). It was so fearfully punished, that the Hebrews when they entered Canaan kept themselves pure from idolatry; and this faithful conduct lasted during Joshua's life and that of the elders of that generation who survived him (Josh. xxiv. 31). Afterwards the slackness of the people to take possession of the whole country, and their living in proximity to so many of the original possessors, and their habits of intercourse with them, produced a very natural effect. Again and again during the rule of the judges they served Baal and Ashtaroth, until warned by chastisement they returned to the God of their fathers (Judges ii. 10-19). From all the idolatrous nations that were on their borders, east as well as west, they borrowed deities, from the Phœnicians and Philistines, from the Syrians, from Moab, and from Ammon (x. 6). It was not till the days of Samuel that anything like a complete reformation was effected (1 Sam. vii. 3-6). But after this, through the reigns of the first kings, idolatry seems to have disappeared in Israel, till the miserable folly of Solomon, who was perverted in his old age by his foreign wives, led him to build shrines for the false gods of Moab and Ammon and Phœnicia just in front of his own glorious temple, in unnatural rivalry with Jehovah who had deigned to dwell there (1 Kings xi. 1-8). After the schism of the kingdom idolatry prevailed very generally among the ten tribes. The device of Jeroboam to prevent his subjects from worshipping at Jerusalem led easily to worse practices; and the alliance formed by Ahab with Jezebel well-nigh made Baal-worship the established religion of the land (xii. 26, 27, xvi. 31-33). This received a check, indeed, from Elijah (xviii. 40), and was eradicated by Jehu (2 Kings x. 18-28); still other forms of idolatrous worship were substituted or lasted on, till at length in just punishment for such defection God removed Israel by the hand of the Assyrian kings to distant exile (xvii. 6-18). Colonists from the east occupied their cities; and a mixed religion then prevailed, a certain fear of Jehovah combined with the worship of the idols of the respective peoples who had been introduced (24-41). Judah did not escape infection. Rehoboam copied the worst part of his father's doings (1 Kings xiv. 21-24). And, though Asa and Jehoshaphat promoted reformation (xv. 11-13, xxii. 43), yet the alliance with the house of Ahab (2 Kings viii. 18) produced the most evil consequences; and even the better-disposed kings by leaving the high places supplied opportunities for renewed apostasy. Hezekiah's reformation was more thorough (xviii. 4-6); and so was Josiah's subsequently (xxiii. 1-20); yet the work of these pious sovereigns passed away with them; and the last days of Jerusalem were her worst (Jer. ii. 28, vii. 17, 18, xi. 13); and Judah too was carried into captivity.

Besides that open idolatry which consists in worshipping false gods there was also continually the sinful endeavour to honour Jehovah by means of some image or representation. This was the fault of Israel when they erected the calf in the wilderness. We see traces of it in the ephod of Gideon (Judges viii. 27), in the house of gods which Micah made (xvii. 3-5, 13), and more formally in the calves of Jeroboam (1 Kings xii. 28-33). These two forms went hand in hand, the one easily leading to the other; for Israel entirely forgot that, if the one was a violation of the first commandment, the other was of the second (Exod. xx. 3-6).

The severe chastisement of the captivity in a great measure did its work. Perhaps those who went into Egypt were the worst class of the Jews (Jer. xlii. 15-30). Yet even there idolatry did not last among them. And, though after the return there was much lukewarmness shown, and alliances were afresh made with ungodly nations, and false prophets appeared (Ezra ix. 1, 2; Neh. vi. 14), yet, so far as we can judge by the national covenant (x.) and the general strain of the post-exilian prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, idolatry scarcely, if at all, existed. And subsequently, when Antiochus Epiphanes attempted to force idolatry upon the Jews, though some through fear complied (1 Macc. i. 43-50, 54), yet the heart of the nation was sound; and this tyrannical attempt roused that spirit of resistance which led to the Maccabean victories (ii., iii., &c); and the general establishment of synagogues in which the sacred books were publicly read contributed to preserve the purity of the faith. See this topic well illustrated by Garbett (Divine Plan of Revelation, 1864, lect. vii. pp. 435-444), who justly observes that the change in the national mind, if we 'endeavour to account for it on ordinary and human principles, becomes inexplicable.'

The modes of idolatrous worship which we find noted in scripture were reverent salutations (Job xxxi. 27), vows (Hos. ix. 10), offerings of incense (1 Kings xi. 8; 2 Kings xxii. 17, xxiii. 5; Jer. i. 16, vii. 9, xi. 12, 13, xviii. 13, xxxii. 29), unbloody (vii. 18) and bloody offerings (2 Kings v. 17), among which were human sacrifices: see MOLOCH. These offerings were made on high places and rocks (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 5; Isai. lvii. 7; Jer. ii. 20, iii. 6, xiii. 27; Hos. iv. 13), on the roofs of buildings (Jer. xix. 13, xxxii. 29), under shady trees (1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings xvi. 4, xvii. 10; 2 Chron. xxviii. 4; Ezek. vi. 13, xx. 28), in valleys (2 Chron. xxviii. 3; Jer. ii. 23), and gardens (Isai. i. 29, lxx. 3). Uncleaness and unnatural sexual commerce have been already hinted at. There was also a frequenting of graves, possibly to pacify the spirits of the dead (4). And indeed much of the system of idolatry implied that the beings worshipped were malignant, and must be conciliated in order to avert injury from the worshippers. The numbers of an idolatrous priesthood were commonly large (1 Kings xviii. 22; 2 Kings x. 21); and some of their practices are described in 1 Kings xviii. 26, 28, 29; Hos. x. 5: see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Götzendienst.'

In the New Testament the Christians, who were continually brought into contact with idolaters through the extent of the Roman empire, were cautioned as to their behaviour. Not only were they to abhor idol-worship itself, but they were also to abstain from meats which had been offered to idols (Acts xv. 29). It was true that the meat itself was not thereby defiled, for an idol was nothing; and therefore Christians need not be too particular in enquiring into the history of what was set before them. But, if any one apprised them that it had been so presented, they were not to eat, lest an occasion of offence should be given to a brother or to a censorious heathen (1 Cor. vii. 4-13, x. 25-32).

Sometimes, it would seem, idolatry is used in a figurative sense. God ought to have the whole heart. If a man sets it on any created object, he defrauds God of his right, and really pays worship to something else. And so his conduct is stigmatized as idolatry (Eph. v. 5; Col. iii. 5, and perhaps 1 John v. 21).

ID'UEL (1 Esdr. viii. 43). Ariel (Ezra viii. 16).

IDUME'A (Isai. xxxiv. 5, 6; Ezek. xxxv. 15, xxxvi. 5; Mark iii. 8). See EDOM.

IDUME'ANS (2 Macc. x. 15, 16). The inhabitants of Idumea or Edom. See EDOMITES.

IG'AL (God will avenge).—1. The spy selected from the tribe of Issachar (Numb. xiii. 7).—2. One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 36). He is also called Joel (1 Chron. xi. 38).

IGDALY'AH (Jehovah will make great). A person, named only once (Jer. xxxv. 4), as 'a man of God.'

IG'EAL (God will avenge). A descendant of David (1 Chron. iii. 22). The name is identical with Igal.

I'IM (ruins, rubbish).—1. One of the stations of the Israelites (Numb. xxxiii. 45): it is identical with IJE-ABARIM, which see.—2. A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 29). Wilton connects it with Azem which follows, supposes the real place to be Ije-azem, and identifies it with the ruins of el-Aujeh (or 'Abdeh) of the 'Azâzimeh Arabs (The Negeb, pp. 155-160, 169-172, 176).

I'IM (Isai. xiii. 22, marg.). This word is rendered in the text 'wild beasts of the islands:' it is doubtless jackals, from a word signifying a wailing cry. In Isai. xxxiv. 14, marg., it is Ijim.

I'JE-ABA'RIM (ruins of Abarim, or of the further regions). One of the stations of the Israelites (Numb. xxi. 11, xxxiii. 44), called also Iim (45). It must have been near the south-east frontier of Moab.

I'JIM (Isai. xxxiv. 14, marg.). See 2nd IIM.

I'JON (a ruin). A city belonging to Naphthali, in the north of Palestine. It was taken by Ben-hadad king of Syria, at the instance of king Asa (1 Kings xv. 20; 2 Chron. xvi. 4), and afterwards by Tiglath-pileser in the reign of Pekah. Its site has been identified. To the south of Lebanon there is a pretty plain, six miles long and two broad, called Merj Aiyûn. At its north end is a great mound, Tell Mamo, or Tell Dibbeen: the top of this mound is covered with the rubbish of the ancient city (Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 222, 223).

IK'KESH (perversé). The father of one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chron. xi. 28, xxvii. 9).

I'LAI (supreme). One of David's heroes (1 Chron. xi. 29). He is called Zalmon in 2 Sam. xxiii. 28.

ILLYR'ICUM. A country of Europe, named by St. Paul (Rom. xv. 19) as the farthest district to which he had 'preached the gospel of Christ.' Illyricum was then a Roman province, along the eastern shores of the Adriatic. It appears to have comprised Liburnia, Iapodia, and Dalmatia (comp. Ptolemy, Geograph., lib. ii. cap. xvii.). See DALMATIA.

IMAGE. See IDOL.

IMAGE OF GOD. Man was at first created after God's 'image,' in his 'likeness' (Gen. i. 26, 27). By this must be understood both a natural and a moral similitude to the Creator. The first consisted in that high prerogative of mind, the intellectual power by which man stands altogether above and distinguished from the brute creation; the other in that purity of heart in which his will was in unison with the holy will of God. By transgression this was lost; and perhaps the high faculties of the mind were also deteriorated. So that now men bear 'the image of the earthy;' and it needs the great power of God's Spirit to assimilate the descendants of 'the first man Adam' to 'the last Adam.' They must be renewed in the spirit of their mind ere they can 'bear the image of the heavenly' (John iii. 6; Rom. viii. 9; 1 Cor. xv. 45, 49). See ADAM.

IMAGE OF JEALOUSY (Ezek. viii. 3, 5). If any particular idol be here meant, it may have been Baal or Ashtoreth. But, as the Lord is described as a 'jealous God,' who will not bear the estrangement of his people, more probably the phrase is used generally, applying to all the abominations which the prophet afterwards witnessed.

IMAGERY, CHAMBERS OF. See CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY.

IM'LA, or IM'LAH (whom God makes full). The father of the prophet Micaiah (1 Kings xxii. 8, 9; 2 Chron. xviii. 7, 8).

IMMAN'UEL (God with us). The symbolic name given to the child whose birth the prophet Isaiah was commissioned to announce to Ahaz on occasion of the confederacy formed by Israel and Syria against Judah (Isai. vii. 1-16).

This passage has been cited by St. Matthew, and specially applied to the birth of Christ (Matt. i. 22, 23), who, though not bearing Immanuel as an ordinary name, is rightly regarded as 'God with us' in the conjunction formed in his person betwixt the Godhead and the manhood, and as ever present in his church, and with his people through the ages of the world (xxviii. 20). As an expressive title of honour therefore, as an appellation most dear to his believing followers, the name Immanuel has been always given to the Lord Jesus Christ. It is, however, fair to say that much difficulty has been felt in the application of the prophecy to the birth of Christ. Some years ago an opinion was expressed in Horne's Introd., vol. ii. pp. 202, 203, edit. Ayre; and subsequent consideration has not in any degree modified the view there propounded. There can therefore be no impropriety in transferring to these pages, with a few slight verbal alterations, the remarks heretofore published.

Opinions vary as to the aspect of the transaction which the prophet records. Some have denied its real connection with Christ; and some, who allow it a Messianic character, believe that an event occurring in the time of Ahaz was the primary object of the prediction. Thus the virgin is regarded as Isaiah's wife, the son to be born one of the prophet's children, actually receiving the name Immanuel. All this is gratuitous. There is no notice of the birth of such a son, as there is of Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Isai. viii. 1-4); and it is difficult to conceive why, if it were so, the land should be called Immanuel's (8). If there must necessarily be some immediate fulfilment of the prediction to encourage those who were then alive, it is not unreasonable to imagine that the child referred to (vii. 16) was Shear-jashub, for whose presence (3) there is otherwise no adequate ground. But this need not be insisted on. The main reason for some present fulfilment is the supposition that the birth of Messiah, centuries after, could not be a sign to Ahaz. This, however, is to forget the fact that the mere utterance of a prophecy or promise is often regarded as a sign. Thus, when Moses first hesitates about undertaking the divine commission, he is told, 'This shall be a token unto thee, that I have sent thee: when thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain' (Exod. iii. 12). It might equally be said that this could have been no encouragement to Moses to attempt the liberation of his people, since it was not to be fulfilled till that liberation had been accomplished. In Isaiah's own time there was a similar fact. When Hezekiah was alarmed by Sennacherib's declared intention to destroy Jerusalem, he was told that God would interpose to defend his chosen city, so that the Assyrian host should be consumed. Hezekiah's terror was great; for the danger was pressing, the foe at hand. But the sign given for his encouragement was comparatively distant. 'This shall be a sign unto thee. Ye shall eat this year such as groweth of itself, and the second year that which springeth of the same; and in the third year sow ye and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruit thereof' (xxxvii. 30). The sign would not be completed till after the invading enemy was discomfited. There is no necessity, therefore, for placing the fulfilment of the prediction of Immanuel in the time of Ahaz. But, even if any such inferior fulfilment then occurred (of which scripture says nothing), adumbrating the future, it would not derogate from the grand purpose of announcing the wonderful birth of him to whom the law and the prophets point.

There was reason for the announcement at that time: Syria and Israel were confederate against Judah. Their purpose was not to make an ordinary inroad, but to dethrone the heir of David, to bring to nought, that is, the Lord's covenant with that house. He that then filled David's throne was indeed unworthy of the honour; still God's counsel would stand. The confederate kingdoms should be put to shame; and, though on Ahaz and his people just punishment must be inflicted (17-21), and Judah be eventually laid waste, yet the design of Syria and Ephraim should be signally frustrated, and that glorious promise be fulfilled in establishing the sovereignty of David's divine Son, who should in special manner show that God, the covenant God of his people, would be with men. The evangelist takes up the prediction in its broadest meaning, and shows how it was accomplished. Before this every other interpretation is mean and inadequate: this was the mind of the inspiring Spirit, fully brought out in no other event than the incarnation of the Son of God. He only is the true Immanuel. And before his advent, not just the kings whom Judah trembled at (14), but their very kingdoms, had been swept away. There is no mere accommodation here: the event had come to pass for which the world had waited.

It is not possible to discuss in this place the minuter points of the phraseology employed: for such discussion the reader must consult other books. It may be added that a lucid view of this prophecy and its fulfilment is given in Fairbairn's Herm. Manual, part iii. sect. ii. pp. 416, &c.

IM'MER (talkative). A priest whose descendants are mentioned (1 Chron. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 13) after the return from captivity. He is probably the same with the chief of the sixteenth course (1 Chron. xxiv. 14). Some of the family returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 37; Neh. vii. 40): two of them had married foreign wives (Ezra. x. 20); and one aided in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 29). Perhaps Pashur (Jer. xx. 1) was of this family. See AMARIAH.

IM'MER (id.). A place from which some Jewish exiles returned who could not prove their pedigree (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61).

IMMORTALITY. A state of exemption from death. God is said alone to possess it (1 Tim. vi. 16), because it is his of his own essence, not derived from or held at another's will, as is the case with beings who are made immortal, as the risen dead shall be (1 Cor. xv. 53). In 2 Tim. i. 10 Christ is said to have 'brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.' But the original word here differs from that before used: it is better expressed by 'incorruptibility.' The Lord Jesus disclosed, uncovered from the original gloom, that new and glorious life of the Spirit, which undecaying is like a light that shines more and more unto the perfect day.

IM'NA (whom God keeps back). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 35).

IM'NAH (good fortune).—1. The eldest son of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 30). He is also called Jimna and Jimnah (Gen. xlv. 17; Numb. xxv. 44).—2. A Levite (2 Chron. xxxi. 14).

IMPRECATION, IMPRECATORY PSALMS. See PSALMS.

IMPUTE. This word is used in reference to Abraham's faith. He believed God; and it was 'counted to him (imputed, reckoned) for righteousness' (Gen. xv. 6; Rom. iv. 3, 22; Gal. iii. 6; James ii. 23). And this is propounded as the pattern of our justification (Rom. iv. 11, 23, 24). It is not that faith is meritorious; but, as Abraham, believing the revelation made to him, grasped the promise, and had therein the blessing, so those, who now accept by faith the offer of free pardon made to them in Jesus Christ, are no longer treated and condemned as sinners: they are 'made the righteousness of God in' Christ (2 Cor. v. 21). See JUSTIFICATION, and comp. Dr. Alford's remarks (The Greek Test., note on Rom. iv. 2, 3).

IM'RAH (refractory). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 36).

IM'RI (eloquent).—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ix. 4).—2. A person whose son helped to build the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4).

INCENSE. A fragrant composition burnt according to the Jewish ritual upon an altar (see ALTAR) before the Lord. The composition of it is minutely described by Moses: 'Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and galbanum, these sweet spices with pure frankincense: of each shall there be a like weight. And thou shalt make it a perfume, a confection after the art of the apothecary, tempered (salted, marg.) together, pure and holy. And thou shalt beat some of it very small, and put of it before the testimony in the tabernacle of the congregation, where I will meet with thee: it shall be unto you most holy (Exod. xxx. 34-36). There was a special prohibition added, that no man should make the like for private use (37, 38). According to Jewish writers there were other ingredients, the use of which was perhaps introduced at a later time. These may be found enumerated in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 865.

Incense was to be burnt on the altar specially appropriated for the purpose twice a day, in the morning when the lamps were dressed, and also when they were lighted in the evening. It might seem as if this office were restricted to the high priest (Exod. xxx. 7, 8); but certainly the ordinary priests are found burning incense (Lev. x. 1); and, in later times at least, those who so officiated were chosen by lot (Luke i. 8, 9); the people being of course without (10), and probably praying in silence (comp. Rev. viii. 1, 3). There was another solemn burning of incense—and this was the high priest's peculiar office—on the great day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 13). The burning of incense appears to have been customary among other nations. Thus the Egyptians burnt resin to the sun when it rose, myrrh at noon-day, and a mixture which was called kuphi at sunset (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., vol. v. p. 315). We find this also making a part of Jeroboam's idolatrous service (1 Kings xii. 33, xiii. 1); while Uzziah, for presuming to burn incense, as if he had been a priest, in the temple, was smitten with leprosy (2 Chron. xxvi. 16-21). The burning of incense to false gods is frequently reprehended (2 Kings xvii. 11; 2 Chron. xxviii. 3).

Jewish writers have said that the incense was to counteract the unpleasant smell which might arise from the carcases of victims. But it had a higher purpose. The psalmist (Psal. cxli. 2) indicates this; his words implying that prayer was in reality what incense was in the symbol. And Dr. Fairbairn well remarks on the natural connection of the two, that the odours of plants and flowers are the sweet breath which, so to speak, they exhale, while prayer can hardly 'be more suitably regarded than as the breath of the divine life in the soul' (Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. sect. 6, vol. ii. pp. 320, 321).

INDIA. This word occurs in Esth. i. 1, viii. 9. The Hebrew name is nearly identical with the old Persian Hidhus, for the Sanscrit Sindhus, the land of Sind (the Indus). It is evident that India as here mentioned did not include the peninsula of Hindostan, but the districts around the Indus, the Punjab, and, it may be, Scinde. India, in the same sense, occurs in the Apocrypha (1 Esdr. iii. 2; Rest of Esth. xiii. 1, xvi. 1); it is also mentioned (but by mistake, probably for Ionia) in 1 Macc. viii. 8. Though, however, India proper is not named in scripture, yet it is very likely that Solomon and the Tyrians carried on an Indian trade; and, at a later period, natives of that country seem to have been employed in guiding the elephants which were used in war (1 Macc. vi. 37).

IN-GATHERING, FEAST OF (Exod. xxiii. 16). See TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.

INHERITANCE. In the earlier ages, inheritance seems to have been very mainly at the will of the father (Gen. xxv. 5, 6). Afterwards, when the land of Canaan had been divided among the several tribes of Israel, that division was to be preserved: land was not to pass from tribe to tribe. Hence, when a man's daughter was an heiress, she was to marry only within her own tribe (Numb. xxxvi.). The children inherited the possessions of the father; the first-born having a double portion (Deut. xxi. 15-17). But, according to the principle just noted, provision was made that they should not be alienated altogether from the family, nor from their due distribution among the various branches of the family. For, if a married person died without children and left a widow, his brother was to take his wife to raise up seed to his brother; and the first-born of such an union would succeed to the name and inheritance of the dead (xxv. 5, 6). Again, there was a regular succession prescribed. In failure of sons, daughters inherited; if there were no daughters, the brothers of the dead man; if he had no brothers, his father's brothers; and, falling these, the next of kin (Numb. xxvii. 8-11). Besides, if any one alienated or mortgaged his inheritance, it could be only for a term of years. The land was Jehovah's, as sovereign Lord, and as held under him it must descend in the course he prescribed (Lev. xxv. 23). In the year of jubilee, therefore, every possession returned to the line of ing to the number of years which remained till that time. There were some exceptions made, as that houses in walled towns could not be redeemed after a year, and did not return at the jubilee. The Levites, however, might redeem houses at any time; and their houses did return to them at the jubilee. But they were forbidden to sell 'the field of the suburbs of their cities' (24-34). We see from all this why Naboth refused (which otherwise might seem a churlish act) to sell Ahab his vineyard (1 Kings xxi. 3). Wills, under such legal dispositions, were little needed; and we do not read of them in the Old Testament.

It may be added that the heavenly inheritance is illustrated by what we know of the Mosaic regulations (1 Pet. i. 4: comp. Eph. i. 11; Col. i. 12).

INIQUITY. The want of equity or righteousness, that which is done against or regardless of the law of God. To 'bear' iniquity is a phrase used both of one who suffers for his own sin (Numb. xiv. 34), and of one who makes expiation for the sin of another (Exod. xxviii. 38; Lev. x. 17, xvi. 22). And so it was predicted of Messiah, that he should bear men's iniquities, i. e. suffer the punishment which they had merited (Isai. liii. 4, 6, 11, 12). See Henderson, The Prophet Isaiah, note on liii. 4.

INK, INK-HORN (Jer. xxxvi. 18; Ezek. ix. 2, 3, 11; 2 Cor. iii. 3; 2 John 13). See WRITING.

INN. The word so rendered means rather a lodging-place: inns in our sense of the term were anciently unknown in the east; and even now they are hardly to be met with, except where established by Europeans. The inns, therefore, of Gen. xliii. 27, xliiii. 21; Exod. iv. 24 were merely the halting-places of caravans. Hospitality was generally practised; so that a traveller had little difficulty in obtaining shelter and food wherever he required it (Gen. xviii

Eastern inn or caravanserai. From an original sketch.

1-5, xix. 1-3). As travelling became more frequent, and the accommodation of way-faring persons began to be felt a burden, it is likely that a custom was introduced, which still subsists, of the inhabitants of a place making an allowance to the chief for him to entertain strangers. Then, too, khans, or caravanserais, were erected—large structures where the traveller might freely repair and find lodging and water for himself and his beast; he himself providing food and forage. Many such khans were placed at regular intervals in Persia. And to such a place was it, though already crowded, that Joseph and Mary resorted at Beth-lehem (Luke ii. 7). Dr. Kitto thus describes one: 'It presents an external appearance which suggests to a European traveller the idea of a fortress, being an extensive square pile of strong and lofty walls, mostly of brick upon a basement of stone, with a grand archway entrance. This leads . . . to a large open area, with a well in the middle, and surrounded on three or four sides with a kind of piazza raised upon a platform, three or four feet high, in the wall behind which are small doors leading to the cells or oblong chambers, which form the lodgings. The cell, with the space on the platform in front of it, forms the domain of each individual traveller, where he is completely secluded; as the apparent piazza is not open, but is composed of the front arches of each compartment. There is, however, in the centre of one or more of the sides, a large arched hall, quite open in front. . . . The cells are completely unfurnished, and have generally no light but from the door; and the traveller is generally seen in the recess in front of his apartment, except during the heat of the day. . . . Many of these caravanserais have no stables; the cattle of the travellers being accommodated in the open area. But in the more complete establishments . . . there are . . . spacious stables, formed of covered avenues extending between the back wall of the lodging-apartments and the outer wall of the whole building; the entrance being at one or more of the corners of the inner quadrangle. The stable is on the same level with the court, and thus below the level of the tenements which stand on the raised platform. Nevertheless this platform is allowed to project behind into the stable, so as to form a bench. . . . It also often happens that not only this bench exists in the stable, forming a more or less narrow platform along its extent, but also recesses corresponding to these in front of the cells towards the open area, and formed in fact by the side-walls of these cells being allowed to project behind to the boundary of the platform. These, though small and shallow, form convenient retreats for servants and muleteers in bad weather. . . . Such a recess we conceive that Joseph and Mary occupied, with their ass or mule—if they had one, as they perhaps had—tethered in front: . . . it might be rendered quite private by a cloth being stretched across the lower part' (Daily Bible Illustr., Sec. Ser., twenty-eighth week, seventh day).

The khan or inn mentioned in Luke x. 34, 35, appears to have had a host or keeper, who attended to some of the wants of travellers. In Egypt houses of entertainment are said to have been kept by females, whose character was generally not reputable (comp. Josh. ii.).

INSCRIPTION. It is sometimes objected that the inscription placed upon our Lord's cross is variously given by the different evangelists (Matt. xxvii. 37; Mark xv. 26; Luke xxiii. 38; John xix. 19). Dr. Townson had lucidly shown that, as it was thrice repeated, in three languages, it is likely that there would be differences; and Mr. Coker Adams has investigated the matter in a sensible way (The Inscription on the Cross, &c., a Sermon, &c., Oxford, 1858, pp. 23, 24). He believes that St. John records the very words written by Pilate, and that the three other evangelists have preserved the inscription in the three languages, Matthew in Hebrew, Mark in Latin, Luke in Greek. There could have been but a narrow space upon the cross; and yet the writing was to be fully legible. Now, if 'Jesus of Nazareth' were placed separately above the rest, and also larger, and if the three lines below declared the crucified to be 'the King of the Jews,' all the expressions would fall naturally into order:

JESUS OF NAZARETH.

THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

THE KING OF THE JEWS.

'With this interpretation,' says Mr Adams, 'every word and particle of the accounts given by all the four evangelists agree both with each other and with probability; the first three announcing the derisive yet true proclamation of their Lord to those three great nations, the fourth relating those words which visibly on the cross, no less than really in their sense, belonged alike to all.'

INSPIRATION. It has been elsewhere shown (see CANON OF SCRIPTURE) that the book which we call the bible contains the authoritative documents always appealed to as the source from which the doctrines of Christianity are to be learned: it is necessary to enquire whether these documents convey merely the opinions of men, or whether they are to be considered as in any respect communications from the Deity. The writers may be honest and trustworthy, so far as their own opportunities of observation extended; but we want to know, further, whether they were divinely guided in what they have recorded. Else we cannot be bound to submit our judgment to theirs: we may be as competent as they were to decide what is and what is not truth.

This is confessedly a difficult question. For it is acknowledged on all hands that the writers of scripture were men of like infirmities with ourselves. It is palpable, therefore, that there is a human element in the bible; and, if the presence also of a divine element is asserted, we cannot readily say how the two combine, or draw the separating line between them. But the same mystery runs through the whole gos-

pei. We believe that our blessed Saviour was perfect God and also perfect man; but mortal eye could never discern the meeting-point of Deity and humanity, or expound the mode of that wondrous combination. It is enough for our consolation and salvation that we accept the fact, which yet in the way of its subsistence we cannot comprehend.

So it is with scripture: it is essentially divine; it is yet intensely human. Let us take a few of the proofs which may be alleged for each of these assertions.

If it be granted that a revelation at all is made to men, the reason of the thing shows that the writers of the book in which it is contained must be divinely commissioned. If the bible be no more than a collection of histories, of letters, of moral precepts, and devotional reasonings, flowing only from human thought, its authority must be very light. The productions of gifted men may be admired and approved, but they may be superseded by others; so that we could have no assurance that the conclusions of to-day might not be recalled or overshadowed by those of to-morrow. The divine element is required to produce a standard. It would be easy to suppose greater poetic power than that manifested by the sacred poets, a larger intellect than was possessed by the simple-minded fishermen of Galilee; and we may call such genius, such philosophic capability, inspiration if we will; but, if it lacks the essential quality of being the authoritative message of the Deity, such inspiration is in its nature diverse from that of writers who were to convey heaven's message to the men of earth. That message may be conveyed in a rude and homely shape: it is not the outward accompaniment, it is the internal authority which constitutes the communication a veritable word of truth, announcing the will of the Highest to his creatures. So that, if there is any authoritative declaration of God's will in the bible, any standard established to be a certain rule for human conduct, it cannot be merely of man's devising; by the reason of the thing it must in some way come from God.

The mode in which the scripture has always been treated is no contemptible proof of a divine original. First of all placed solemnly before the Lord, when but a portion of it was written (Deut. xvii. 18, xxxi. 9, 25, 26), regarded afterwards, as it grew, as the very message of Jehovah (Psal. xix. 7-11, cxix.), submitted to as of divine authority (2 Kings xxii. 8-11; Zech. i. 6), held fast in spite of tyrannical persecution (1 Macc. i. 57), appealed to by Christ himself as settling controversy (Matt. xxii. 29-32, 43-45; Luke x. 26), and preserved for ages, even by those whose conduct it most severely censured, while other books have been mutilated and lost—how can all this be accounted for except on the supposition that these books were from God? Whence came the reverence paid to them? Was it a mere fancy—a superstitious notion, grounded on nothing, and transmitted onwards without any of the sages through whose hands the scripture passed detecting and exposing the delusion? Such a continuous mistake is more hard to be believed than the fact that God has really spoken to men.

Again, the contents of the bible offer additional proof. Granting that it is generally credible, it delivers things which could not have been known but by divine help. The narrative of creation, the notices of angels, the announcement of God's counsels, the description of the happy future inheritance of the righteous, and specially the utterances of prophecy, cannot have proceeded from man's unassisted powers. Either those high mysterious announcements are the vain speculations of an unbridled imagination, or they have been communicated by some divine teaching. Either the predictions of the bible are the mere guesses of sagacious men, or they are veritably the oracles of God. But see for a moment if they can be happy guesses. Let all licence be given for explaining events by calling them coincidences; let the times when they were uttered be brought down as low as ingenious critics desire to bring them; you have still the fact that, in the age of Christ, nay two centuries before Christ, there was a body of writings, referring to the future condition of the Jews, of Tyre, of Egypt, of Babylon, which the events of successive centuries, even to our own days, have been only more clearly confirming; so that we have standing proof before our eyes that things have happened, contrary to the probabilities of the times when these prophecies were delivered, but in singular accordance with the prophecies themselves. How is this to be explained? The only satisfactory conclusion is that the writers of such words were divinely guided. Any other hypothesis presents difficulties of the most formidable cast.

Further, how came the wonderful scheme of man's salvation into any one's thoughts unless by a divine communication? Christianity, so wonderful in its plan, so gracious in its purpose, so marvellously adapted to human wants, so productive of human happiness (see CHRISTIANITY), how was it devised? Was it the offspring of Grecian wisdom, or excogitated by the masculine mind of Rome? Did Egyptian sages discover it? or can you trace it to Persian lore? Nay, none of these suppositions can be maintained. The volume in which you find that wonderful delineation of a perfect character, in which you have adequate notions of the Deity produced, was composed by despised Jews! Who guided their minds to achieve such a moral wonder?

And again, the scripture consists of a multitude of books, written in different ages by men of different ranks and natural gifts. How is it that a unity pervades the whole? that you have in the first the germ of a religious system of which the last are but the harmonious development? This fact alone is sufficient to prove that there is something more than mere human composition in the bible. One may conceive of a single fanatic; but a series of them through successive centuries, all with the same bias, one taking up the strain where another ceased, producing only louder clearer gushes of the same harmony—how can you account for this save on the principle that the influence of one master mind pervaded all, the master mind of the changeless Deity, with whose message these his servants were entrusted? This topic is well illustrated in Garbett's Divine Plan of Revelation, 1864.

Still further, the writers of the books of scripture most distinctly claimed for themselves and their fellows to have the positive assistance of God. Large parts of the bible are prefaced with the solemn formula, 'Thus saith the Lord.' The writers give special words which they say the Deity uttered: they convey messages with which they say he commissioned them: they denounce threatenings which they say are by his command. And the later writers affirm of their predecessors that 'all scripture is given by inspiration of God,' 'the holy scriptures' being 'able to make wise unto salvation' (2 Tim. iii. 15, 16), and that 'holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' (2 Pet. i. 21). Now it is clear either that these assumptions and declarations are based upon a lie, or that there was really some divine influence exerted. And that divine influence is said to be of the Holy Ghost, in such a way that the sayings of the ancient prophets are sometimes quoted as the sayings of the Holy Ghost (Acts i. 16, xxviii. 25; Heb. iii. 7, ix. 8); at other times these prophets are described as speaking in spirit (Matt. xxii. 43: comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 2). Corroborative testimony is found in the fact that our Lord promised his disciples that in pressing emergencies they need not be solicitous as to the way in which they should defend the faith: 'For it is not ye,' he said, 'that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you' (Matt. x. 20). And they were instructed to suspend the assumption of their office as teachers of the gospel till they were endowed with power from on high. That power was imparted in the miraculous descent of the Holy Spirit on them on the day of pentecost (Luke xxiv. 49; Acts i. 8, ii. 1-4). And afterwards, in deciding a weighty point of Christian doctrine, they did not hesitate to say, 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us' (xv. 28). If in the decision of controversy, if in promulgating the gospel generally, they had this supernatural assistance, they had it surely in their authoritative writings. The scripture, therefore, there can be no doubt, emphatically claims for itself a divine element: it claims to be not merely 'the word of man,' but 'the word of God.' This claim has been generally allowed in the Christian church. So that testimonies of fathers and ecclesiastical writers in abundance might be produced, exhibiting the universal consent of Christendom to the fundamental truth that the Holy Ghost spoke by prophets and apostles. These testimonies have been collected and classified by Dr. Lee in his valuable treatise, The Inspiration of Holy Scripture, append. G. pp. 484-527, 2nd edit.

Let us now turn to the other side of the question. The scriptures are intensely human. Had they been simply the voice of God authoritatively promulgating his will, they would probably have altogether taken the form of those laws—the ten commandments for example—to which the Deity did give utterance. But we find them a collection of treatises, histories, annals, poetry of various kinds, letters, biographies, &c., making to be sure a complete whole, and such a whole that one book or composition could not be taken from it without seriously impairing the symmetry. We further find these various books presenting unmistakable characteristics of the several writers. They differ not only in subject-matter, but in style and language; so that we see clearly that they are not just repeating a dictated message, but that each expresses what he has to say after his own fashion. Nothing is more evident than that the writers of scripture were men of like passions and infirmities with ourselves. They use popular terms: they often let us see (as David, Jeremiah, and others) what their own feelings, of grief, and joy, and anxiety, &c. were: they are not angels describing as it were apart things not personally belonging to them: they are human beings most intimately connected with the things they record.

Moreover, these writings confessedly contain much which in itself is imperfect and erroneous. For example, Satan is introduced, distinctly contradicting God's declarations. The words and deeds of evil men are chronicled; and sometimes there are discussions in which a subject is more or less rightly handled, and in which therefore some of the opinions maintained are by no means to be taken as just. It would seem hardly necessary to give a caution on this point. Yet persons have fallen into the absurd mistake of denying the inspiration of scripture because Job and his friends advance positions which cannot be defended. They might as well object to the inspiration of the Gospels because Herod and the scribes and Pharisees and the chief priests therein utter untruths or malicious slander. The real conclusion to be drawn is that the bible is the work of men's hands, delivering according to the wisdom possessed by them narratives of good and evil, coming by these narratives into closest contact with the various phases of human life, but never intending to set up as a standard of thought or action the words and deeds of all whose history they chronicle.

There is a divine element, then, in scripture; and there is a human element; and the great question is, How far does the divine control the human? how far does the human overmatch the divine? Does the first preserve the second from error? or does the second alloy the first with imperfection? We know that the sacred writers, prophets and apostles, erred while they were upon earth in speech and action; the difference in the voice of a holy man or prophet when speaking from his own judgment, and when with a message from God, is seen in Nathan's two replies to David (2 Sam. vii. 1-17): did they—here is the weighty point for solution —did they err in these writings? They had sometimes to speak of natural things, of which the men of their age were ignorant, who consequently held notions which we now know to be erroneous: did the scripture writers share their errors?

Now we must consider the purpose with which the bible was composed. It was not to teach astronomy or physics, except so far as to lead the mind up from created works to the creative hand; not to deliver history, except so far as to expound the divine governance of the world; not to settle chronology, further than to illustrate the times and fitting seasons in which God's great plans were to be developed. We must not look for scientific information in the holy book. We may freely admit that the sacred penmen spoke on these topics as men of their day would ordinarily speak. And hence we should expect, as we find, the usual incorrect expressions of the sun's rising and the sun's setting. And we need not stumble at the poetical description of this luminary, coming, as it were, from his tabernacle like a bridegroom from his chamber, and making his circuit from the one end of the heaven to the other (Psal. xix. 4-6). Such expressions are common now; nor would the most accomplished astronomer hesitate in speaking or writing thus. There are necessary imperfections in language. When we have to speak of God, we must describe his piercing eye, his powerful hand, his melting heart. Is there anything inconsistent with the dignity of inspiration in this? any ground for a charge of inaccuracy? Considerations like these dispose of a large mass of objections taken against the notion of scripture-inspiration. And we must add to them, that, if the sacred writers had not spoken in a popular way, not only would their contemporaries have misunderstood them, but the multitude in every age would have been puzzled. 'Science,' says Dr. Whewell, 'is constantly teaching us to describe known facts in new language; but the language of scripture is always the same; and not only so, but the language of scripture is necessarily adapted to the common state of man's intellectual development, in which he is supposed not to be possessed of science. Hence the phrases used by scripture are precisely those which science soon teaches men to consider as inaccurate; but they are not on that account the less fitted for their proper purpose. For, if any terms had been used adapted to a more advanced state of knowledge, they must have been unintelligible among those to whom the scripture was first addressed' (Indications of the Creator, p. 175). Among ourselves, when knowledge has increased, and scientific research been widely diffused, works written with scientific accuracy of expression would unquestionably be beyond the comprehension of the people. For the bible to come home, as it was intended, to every man's house and heart, it must meet him on the threshold of his own knowledge and notions; it must intertwine itself with his every-day thoughts; else it could be but a sealed book to him, and it would lose one of its grandest characteristics as the book—not of an age, or a class, or a station—but of ancient and modern times, of old men and children, of princes and peasants, of Jews and Gentiles, of bond and free, the book for all, emphatically for the race of man. So that it has never grown antiquated: it travels as it were along with successive generations, and, it must be acknowledged, even by those who question its accuracy, that, though written most of it in a distant antiquity, the bible does not shock us, as some other professedly-sacred books do, by absurdities and violent misstatements.

But, after all that has been so far conceded, after the admission of the thoroughly-human character of this book, it is reasonable to expect that the divine influence, if divine influence there is, will be fully felt. If the book were to open with a demonstrably-false account of creation, if it were to contradict the proved facts of history, an unfavourable conclusion must necessarily be reached. But then it would be a conclusion, not that the human element predominated over the divine, but that there was no divine element in the book at all. If it can be proved, and considerations adverted to above show that it can be proved, that a divine influence guided the sacred writers, though it did not annihilate their personality, or interfere with their being the very authors severally of their books, we need not be solicitous to determine the exact point—difficult enough it has been said—where the two elements combine. It is sufficient to know that they do combine for the greatest practical good; and the fact that they so harmoniously and perfectly weld, as it were, together is no unimportant corroboration of the truth that the bible is the word of God. It is not, as some men would have us believe, that crass mixture of iron and miry clay, of which the feet of the figure that Nebuchadnezzar saw were composed (Dan. ii. 33, 41-43), gaping and discordant, which shrewd men may easily dis sever, and, picking out the pieces, may lay each sort apart; it is rather that wondrous interpenetration of divine and human, each element being united in every particle, so that the whole is bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, men speaking like men to men, and yet perfectly the message of the Divine Being to his creatures. We need not necessarily assume what is called the verbal inspiration of scripture, the dictation of that which men mechanically wrote down; even without this we acknowledge fully here the utterances of eternal truth. Very sensibly does Dr. Hannah (Bampton Lectures, 1863, pp. 139-141) reason on this part of the subject: 'If we have realized the influence of that special inspiration which distinguishes the sacred writers from every other class of human agents, the strength of our own faith should be enough to save us from sharing in the fears which have been aroused by the assertion that the human element, through which those divine gifts were communicated, was not only moulded by the individual characteristics of the writers, but was adjusted to the scientific opinions and literary habits of the times in which they severally lived . . . . . We have dwelt on some few of the leading features which prove the reality and influence of that divine presence which shines through every part of scripture, reconciling the seeming contrarieties of human formulas, and spreading out a broad range of divine significance as the basis on which the human language rests . . . . . When we are now asked to gaze with reverence but with firmness on the nature of the earthly apparel in which these shapes of heavenly truth are robed, we may surely enter on the task in a spirit of frank confidence, and with entire freedom from any unworthy alarm. We risk but a small venture on the separate value of the earthen vessels, when the possession of the heavenly treasure is secured . . . . . Setting forth from the firm foundation of faith, we shall find that disputes on details have a growing tendency to settle themselves and disappear. It is a dangerous and mistaken policy to raise these disputes to adventitious importance, by treating them as though they necessarily involved the issue of our highest interests.'

No exact definition of inspiration has as yet been given; but the observations already made will tend to illustrate it. It is that guiding influence which, while it gives free scope to the natural qualities of the sacred writers, and makes itself known to men by human organs, elevates the message thus delivered so that it is the word of God. In this aspect of it some of the common objections are seen to be irrelevant. It is asked with apparent triumph, Did St. Paul need inspiration to send for the cloak he had left at Ephesus (2 Tim. iv. 13)? Of course not; but this direction is found in a letter written under divine guidance, a letter, instinct with all human feelings, from a suffering man to a trusted friend. The objection that there are touches of humanity, of common-place humanity, in the bible, as if that excluded the divine element, is quite beside the mark. It has been shown that the great cause of this book's being just suited to man's necessities and feelings and confidence is that it was written by men. There may be noted, too, the distinction, sometimes lost sight of, between inspiration and revelation. Mr. Westcott has characterized them very well. 'By inspiration,' he says, 'we conceive that man's natural powers are quickened; so that he contemplates with a divine intuition the truth as it exists still among the ruins of the moral and physical worlds. By revelation we see, as it were, the dark veil removed from the face of things; so that the true springs and issues of life stand disclosed in their eternal nature' (Introd. to the Gospels, p. 8).

Various examples of inaccuracy in scripture are produced. The narrative in one place, it is said, does not agree with the narrative in another. In addition to the fact that the bible was written by human pens, must be taken that other fact, that it has been preserved by human hands. No miracle was wrought to keep it from the usual fortune of books. Those that copied it were as likely to make mistakes as those who copied other works. Accordingly we find a multitude of various readings in the present text of scripture, which critical sagacity may well investigate, and through which we must, as nearly as we can, reach the text as it proceeded from the pen of the writer. Many of the errors now found or fancied are errors of number; such being those most likely to have arisen from inexactness of transcription. And many are merely that, of two writers, one gives a fuller account than the other; and such difference is called contradiction. But, when we look at all which can be produced, they are trifling in importance, and by no means touch the question whether or no the books of scripture are really from the divine mind, conveying God's message to men.

Into an examination of alleged discrepancies it is impossible here to enter: some of them will be found disposed of in other articles; and the reader may be referred for fuller explication to other books. See Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, chap. xii. pp. 516-611; Horne's Introd., edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 432-492. Neither can the contradictions said to subsist between the sacred historians and other writers be dwelt on. The weighty general observations of Dr. Lee on this topic may, however, be properly introduced. 'Should any statement,' he says, 'of the Old or of the New Testament seem to be at variance with that of an un-inspired historian, it is taken for granted, without further inquiry, that the sacred narrative is false. Every presumption in favour of the un-inspired writer is brought prominently forward; nor are his statements, as to matters of fact unnoticed by others, thought to require corroboration; while the assertion of a prophet, or of an evangelist, if similarly unsupported, is immediately subjected to an unscrupulous or prejudiced criticism. This is a species of unfairness to which the bible, above all other books, affords an opportunity; for it is remarkable with what uniformity the sacred writers abstain from directly touching upon topics of common history, except in cases where their narrative absolutely requires it' (Insp. of Holy Script., lect. viii. pp. 399, 400). Happily from time to time secular research disinters corroborative proof of scripture authority; and statements, which once stood upon its single evidence, and were thought to be in contradiction to other testimony, are now amply vindicated. Familiar examples might easily be produced.

That the word of God is to be found in scripture, that is, that we are to learn his will from it, is admitted by many who yet deny that it is an infallible record of truth. If this be so, surely man must need some other guide to instruct him what he is to accept and what he may safely reject in the bible. It is idle to suppose that there is an adequate power in individual minds to decide such a question. For not only has human wisdom proved itself unable to grasp divine things; but, as the conclusions of different persons are sure to vary, so scripture would have to be subjected to an infinite number of tribunals, the verdicts of which would not agree. How should, in such a case, the really divine be ascertained? Surely the great purpose of revelation would be frustrated; and the communications of God to man be of little practical service.

It must never be forgotten that, besides the actual announcement of the divine will, God has a moral probationary purpose in view. All his dealings with mankind are modelled for this end. So it was in his theocratic government of Israel, so it is in the training of each individual man. Here is a great reason for the difficulties which beset this subject. It requires a teachable mind, a will submissive to God's will, a trusting heart, the simplicity, to use our Lord's illustration, of little children, to appreciate and really to receive the divine word. The proud self-confident spirit will stumble where the humble will pass safely. It was Christ's acknowledgement that many things were hidden from the wise and prudent which God had revealed unto babes (Luke x. 21; 1 Cor. i. 26, 27). He, then, that puts aside carnal reasoning, and prayerfully searches God's word for God's will, shall not be disappointed. 'Origen,' says bp. Butler, 'has with singular sagacity observed that "he, who believes the scripture to have proceeded from him who is the Author of nature, may well expect to find the same sort of difficulties in it as are found in the constitution of nature." And in a like way of reflection it may be added that he, who denies the scripture to have been from God on account of these difficulties, may, for the very same reason, deny the world to have been formed by him' (Introd. to Analogy, pp. 53, 54, edit. 1828).

The whole matter may briefly be thus summed up. Seeing from the nature of the case that if there is a divine revelation made at all it must come with divine authority; seeing that there are promises that God will expressly help his servants in communicating religious truth; seeing that the volume in its external aspect and its wonderful contents varies from every other book; seeing that there are claims in scripture itself to something beyond mere human instrumentality, we are surely justified in believing that we have here the communication of the Creator to his creatures, fashioned in such a way as may best bring home necessary truth to the human heart. Well and wisely has our Lord commanded to 'search the scriptures. Those who have humbly searched them have discovered wisdom more precious than rubies: they have perceived an influence far beyond mere moral suasion. By the perusal of the scripture, those that once were ignorant and perverse have been enlightened, and become holy. Cordially accepting the scripture revelation, they have been made sensible of the true purpose of their being. Implicitly trusting the scripture promises, they have met death with joyful hope. Whence this marvellous power of the word? It cannot be merely the production of the human mind: it is, it must be from such results, the holy word of God.

The student may be directed to many valuable works on inspiration. Some have been already adverted to: others are Dr.

INSTANT, INSTANTLY. Some examples will illustrate the meaning of these words. In Luke ii. 38 'that instant' is that very hour. But in vii. 4 by 'they besought him instantly' must be understood earnestly: so in xxiii. 23 'they were instant,' i.e. they were urgent. The signification is somewhat different elsewhere: thus 'instantly serving God' (Acts xxvi. 7) is expectantly, or fervently; 'continuing instant in prayer' (Rom. xii. 12), persevering or persisting: comp. Acts xii. 5, marg.; 'be instant in season' (2 Tim. iv. 2), be active or ready.

INSTRUMENTS, MUSICAL. See MUSIC.

INTERCESSION. The act of interposing or intertaining in behalf of another. Thus Jeremiah is forbidden to pray for the rebellious Jews, i.e. to 'make intercession' to God for them (Jer. vii. 16: comp. xxxvi. 25). It is not, however, always used in a favourable sense. For Elijah is said to have made 'intercession to God against Israel' (Rom. xi. 2). In a special way it is taken to describe that part of Christ's office which he fulfils in his Father's presence for his people (viii. 34; Heb. vii. 25, ix. 24), that 'whole mediatorial work,' says Dr. Alford 'which the exalted Saviour performs for his own, with his heavenly Father either by reference to his past death of blood, by which he has bought them for himself, or by continued intercession for them' (The Greek Test., note on Heb. vii. 25). A view of this gracious interposition of Christ is full of unspeakable comfort, encouraging the penitent soul 'to come boldly to the throne of grace, that' it 'may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need' (Heb. iv. 16).

INTERPRETATION. It is of the utmost importance that the student of the sacred book should be furnished with right principles for the due understanding of its contents. The variations and frequent absolute contradictions between those who have taken upon themselves to expound it sufficiently prove that there must be radical error somewhere, and that consequently the system of certain interpreters is thoroughly unsound.

Thus some have proceeded on the supposition that every possible sense that the words can be made to bear may be put upon the scripture. Every plain historical statement is supposed to have a deep meaning: narratives are allegorized; and the very names of men and places believed to teach mysteries. The sacred book is thus made little more than a book of riddles, for the amusement and ingenuity of the curious. Others, as the Romanists, would receive only the interpretation which the church, speaking in the decrees of councils, the decisions of popes, and the consent of fathers, has sanctioned. Mystics would interpret according to some inward light. Rationalists would make everything square with their own notions of probability, and pronounce even the sense of scripture as declared by our Lord and his apostles but an accommodation to Jewish prejudice. See, for a fuller account of various systems of interpretation, Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, chap. vii.; Horne's Introduction, edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 242-254.

In attempting to lay down some just principles of biblical interpretation the greatest brevity must be here observed. But, though it is impossible to compress the substance of a volume within the limits of a short article, it is hoped that a right direction may be given to the student's investigations, so that he may be prepared to avail himself of other works which will be recommended to him, and may at least be warned to avoid the glaring errors which have been just noted.

Interpretation has been defined by Ernesti (Principles of Bibl. Interp., edit. Terrot, vol. i. p. 6) 'the art of teaching the real sentiment contained in any form of words, or of effecting that another may derive from them the same idea that the writer intended to convey.' It is manifest that the first object must be to ascertain the meaning of simple terms; from that we may proceed to examine the meaning of words or terms united into sentences or propositions, and thus arrive at the real sense of the sacred penmen.

Words are the exponents of thoughts. To every word a certain idea or notion must correspond; and this is called the sense or meaning of it. It is the literal sense, and is so united to a word by custom, as that, when that word is heard, the sense is at once conceived in the hearer's mind. But the same word has not always the same meaning; and hence ambiguity will arise. For we are manifestly not at liberty to give any word any one of its meanings we may choose: we are bound to ascertain that which rightly belongs to it in the place or on the occasion on which it may be used. The sense of words has in a considerable degree been impressed upon them by derivation; yet we must not forget that the connection between words and ideas is moulded by custom. To ascertain, therefore, the signification of terms we must examine what has been called the usus loquendi, the usage of language. This, indeed, is by no means invariable. It is affected by the time, the religion of the writers, the habits of ordinary life, the political institutions of a country, &c.; so that a word, which in one place or period conveys one idea, conveys in another an idea very different. 'Liberty,' for instance, as understood by ourselves, has a much more extended meaning than it had in the mouth of our ancestors. The knowledge of the usus loquendi, the basis of sound interpretation, is naturally more difficult to acquire, when we have, as in the case of the scriptures, to do with works composed in a dead language. It can be successfully pursued only in a way of historical investigation. And the following plain rules for this have been given by Dr. Davidson (ubi supr., chap. viii. pp. 227, 228). The usus loquendi of a dead language must be ascertained—

'1. From the works of those who lived when it was current, and to whom it was vernacular. Thus, in investigating the meaning of a term, we naturally consult the writer himself by whom it was used. He may give a definition of the word in question. Or its connection may probably explain it; or, again, parallel passages point out its signification with sufficient clearness. If we do not find its signification in the author himself, we have recourse to some other writer who employed the same language.

'2. From the traditional knowledge of the usus loquendi, retained partly in ancient versions, partly in commentaries and lexicons.

'3. From writers who employed a cognate dialect.

'These are general principles applicable to all languages. They are the true means of discovering the legitimate usage of every tongue which has ceased to be spoken.'

These general rules might be amplified and illustrated to almost any extent. But it must be the aim of the present article, as indeed already hinted, not so much to present a mass of details as to indicate how those details may be safely reached. The student must ever remember that, though words may have to be examined separately for their meaning, yet it is not their independent meaning which is to be traced, but that which belongs to them in the position in which they are found. A word will often have many and various meanings: to gather up these is the province of the lexicographer. To select out of possible meanings that one which belongs to it in relation to those words with which it is in connection is the duty of the interpreter. And for this he must consult the context. Here he may find the definitions which a writer sometimes gives of the terms he employs: here by the adjuncts of a word, or, by the position of comparison, parallelism, or contrast in which it stands, he may infer the sense in which it is introduced in the place where he meets with it. The immediate context will perhaps throw the greatest light upon its signification; but the remoter context also must be examined. The tone of a paragraph, the subject of a section, will often point out the particular idea which is to be attached to a given word. And the way in which the writer uses it elsewhere, the way in which other writers treating on similar subjects use it—in a word, the cautious use of parallel passages, may lead to a just discrimination. A version shows what sense has actually been selected for the word. And, if he who made the version had a competent knowledge of the language from which and the language into which he translated, and can be seen to have performed his task conscientiously and with fidelity, his authority must be high: his version serves as an adjudged case in the courts according to which others are determined. And, if two languages have flowed from the same source, and have run, so to speak, side by side with the same general complexion, used by kindred peoples, it is manifest that a term in the one may well be illustrated by an allied term in the other.

Perhaps two or three examples are necessary for the full appreciation of the rules which have thus been briefly explained. See, then, how the author of the epistle to the Hebrews defines in xi. 1 that 'faith,' the effectual working of which he intends to exhibit in the rest of the chapter. See, again, how the meaning of denying one's-self is fixed by the connection. In Luke ix. 23, where it is coupled with taking up the cross, it is to be understood as sacrificing personal gratifications; while in 2 Tim. ii. 13, where it closely follows 'he abideth faithful,' being spoken of God, it as clearly signifies that he cannot be inconsistent with himself. So, also, from the parallel form of Hebrew sentences, we may determine the word rendered 'deceased' in our version of Isai. xxvi. 14. Some have translated it 'physicians;' but, as it corresponds with 'dead' in the preceding clause, it must have a similar signification: it is not identically the same, but closely allied, having, as Dr. Davidson says, from whom the example is taken, 'the accessory idea of debility and incorporeity.' Further, the word rendered 'daily' in the Lord's prayer (Matt. vi. 11; Luke xi. 3) occurs nowhere else. Here then we are led by the judgment of Greek fathers and the early Peshito Syriac version to that etymological derivation of it which gives the sense of 'proper for our sustenance:' see Dr. Alford's note on the first-named place. Once more, the root of Eloah, Elohm, appellations of the Deity, would seem to be lost in the Hebrew; but in a cognate dialect, the Arabic, a root exists involving the idea of admiration and adoration: therefore it has with some reason been inferred that God is so called as being the admirable and most glorious One. Examples might be multiplied to any extent; but these must suffice.

It is in this way that the meaning of terms is to be carefully ascertained; and, when direct modes fail, subsidiary processes must be resorted to; but a fuller explication of them cannot be given here.

Attention having been carefully paid to determine the signification of words and phrases, we are next in due order to examine the meaning of propositions and sentences, that is to say, to investigate the sense of the sacred text. A preliminary note may, however, be properly introduced. There is an obvious distinction between the sense and the signification of terms. The words of a writer in one language may be exactly rendered into the corresponding words of another; and yet the sense intended be not thereby conveyed. For example, we may take the modes of ordinary familiar salutation. The phrases so used in France and Spain, literally translated, would be unintelligible in England. Hence we must seek terms in one language equivalent to those employed in another. See MORIS, On the Difference between the Sense and Signification of Words and Phrases, translated in Amer. Bibl. Repos., 1834, vol. iv. pp. 61 &c.

The investigation of the sense of scripture must be pursued on principles similar to those adopted in ascertaining the meaning of terms. The passage must be systematically examined, and additional light be sought from the context, from parallels, and other less immediate sources. The first step must be to settle the right construction of a sentence. A sentence is not a mere mass of words: it possesses organization: it has parts and members more or less closely united; the dependence of which on each other, and relation of each separate one to the whole, is to be determined. Hence we must attend to the punctuation: we must see whether there are ellipses to be supplied, whether or no the sentence is interrogative, and must make a proper adjustment of the various parts. Take an example or two. The authorized version supplies a word in Prov. xxx. 15. But a slight consideration will show that there is no ellipse. 'Give, give' are the names of the two daughters of the horse-leech. Again, the common punctuation should be abandoned in Rom. viii. 33, 34. The clauses are interrogative: 'God that justifieth?' 'Christ that died?' So also the sense is not so good if 'Father, save me from this hour' (John xii. 27) be taken affirmatively. Our Lord exclaims 'What shall I say? Father, save me from this hour?' No, I will not shrink from it. It is fair, however, to say that some eminent expounders of this text dissent. Then, further, we must ascertain the proper construction of a period, its syntactical principles, the relation between the subject and the predicate, with the due dependence of the subordinate clauses on the main part. Some knowledge of the grammar is of course required. Ordinarily the subject and the predicate of a proposition are readily distinguished. As general rules, to which, doubtless, there are exceptions, it may be said that the subject for the most part precedes the predicate. The first has the article in Greek; not so the other. In Hebrew, if a substantive is the predicate, it follows the subject, which stands after the verb: if an adjective is the predicate, it has no article and comes first. We conclude from these principles that, in 2 Kings viii. 13, it was the greatness, not the atrocity of the thing that startled Hazeael. The meaning is, What is thy servant, who is but a dog? what power has he to accomplish so great an object? So in 1 Tim. vi. 5 we must translate 'that godliness is a source of gain,' and in 2 Tim. ii. 13 'the solid foundation of God continues to stand.' And, just as the signification of a word, as before shown, is often determined by a parallelism, so the meaning of sentences may be similarly ascertained. There are various kinds of parallelisms: see PARALLELISM, POETRY. There is that of members, where one clause by comparison or contrast illustrates the other (e.g. John iii. 6); and there are numerous historical and doctrinal parallels, as when the same events are narrated in different places (e.g. 2 Sam. xxi. 18-22 compared with 1 Chron. xx. 4-8), or when the same point of teaching is insisted on (e.g. Eph. i. 5, 6 compared with Col. ii. 13).

Into the numberless ramifications of special rules and illustrations it is impossible to go. But perhaps enough has been said to exhibit the proper mode of fair interpretation—that which has been called the literal and historical, or historico-literal mode, 'that method which,' to adopt the language of bishop Ellicott (Aids to Faith, essay ix. 12, pp. 426, 427), 'not only concerns itself with the simple and grammatical meaning of the words, but also with that meaning viewed under what may be termed, for want of a better word, its historical relations, viz., as illustrated by facts, modified by the context, substantiated by the tenor of the holy book, and receiving elucidation from its minor specialities and details.' We are frequently told that the bible must be interpreted like any other book; and the rule is admirable so far as it resembles any other book. But to apply no other rule than this is to assume that the scripture is but of human origin, that it contains no prophetic disclosures of things not yet come to pass, that it teaches not the future by the past, that there is in it no system of typical development, no principle of expansion which makes it emphatically the book of all ages and of all men. To treat this—'a world,' it has been called, 'in itself'—as but an ordinary book is palpably unfair, until by clear and convincing proof it shall have been shown to be no more than an ordinary book. Men who so cramp themselves must fail in the interpretations they attempt.

Far wiser are the directions which bishop Ellicott supplies for right interpretation; and he who has learned justly to follow these directions will have attained no mean proficiency in the understanding of the scripture. 'Interpret,' says the bishop, 'grammatically': 'interpret historically': 'interpret contextually': 'interpret minutely': 'interpret according to the analogy of faith.' To the brief illustration of these rules some space shall be dedicated; and for matter tending to illustrate them deep obligation to the bishop's admirable essay must be at once acknowledged.

1. Little need be said upon the first. It is just the embodiment of the principles before laid down. Let the signification of words in themselves, and the sense of them as combined in sentences, be carefully and systematically sought in accordance with the fundamental rules of language. We shall not then be in danger of making prophets and apostles speak according to our own notions, or be induced to substitute a human gloss for the veritable language of the sacred record. Man's liability to such freedom of exposition, unless guarded by a strict adherence to grammatical propriety, is well exposed by bishop Ellicott. 'To sit calmly in our studies, to give force and meaning to the faltering utterances of inspired men, to correct the tottering logic of an apostle, to clear up the misconceptions of an evangelist, and to do this without dust or toil, without expositors and without versions, without anxieties about the meaning of particles, or humiliations at discoveries of lacking scholarship—to do all this, thus easily and serenely, is the temptation held out; and the weak, the vain, the ignorant, and the prejudiced are clearly proving unable to resist it. Hence the necessity of a return to first principles, however homely they appear.'

2. Equally important is the second direction. Late researches have poured a flood of light upon the history, the topography, the antiquities of eastern lands. Assyrian and Babylonian discoveries are giving form and precision to prophetic imagery; the examination of Palestine and the adjacent regions, their natural characteristics, and the remains of human works which they contain, is corroborating the truthfulness of the sacred narratives; while the historical facts from time to time springing forth teach us how to connect and explain circumstances heretofore deemed inexplicable. Take a single instance. The explorations of BASHAN, discovering the massive ruins of numerous cities yet studding portions of its surface, are an admirable commentary upon Deut. iii. 1-7, a passage in regard to which interpreters heretofore felt inclined to explain away the grammatical force of the expressions used: see ARGOB, BASHAN. All the helps thus supplied must be diligently adopted; and many an incident, many a description, many a precept, will start up with life-like reality before the student's gaze, who uses these keys for unlocking the recesses of what had once seemed a sealed book.

3. The third direction has been already in some measure illustrated. Half the puzzles which have bewildered men in the scripture, and more than half the strange and erroneous inferences which have been drawn, have originated in the determination of a meaning apart from the connection in which it lay (so to speak) imbedded. The limitations of the context, then, must be exactly observed. The interpretation of a single passage, to be sound, must agree with the general scope and meaning of the rest, with the circumstances under which it was produced, with the purpose of the writer. This rule is useful both negatively and positively: it will prevent improper applications, and it will decide which of two interpretations—so far as grammar goes equally tenable—is to be preferred. An example or two of its use shall be produced. How often do we find St. Paul's declaration 'whatsoever is not of faith is sin' (Rom. xiv. 23) stretched to every possible case, as if it had been a general admonition for the guidance of all thought, and feeling, and conduct. But look at it in its connection: see how it is a part of a particular discussion, and then, however it may be taken by inference to extend to other difficulties beyond that immediately in hand, we cannot hesitate in deciding that as a plain rule the words were never meant 'to be applied to all imaginable cases, but to be restricted to scruples or cases of conscience that bear some analogy to the instances which the apostle is discussing.' So the prophetic blessing of Asher (Deut. xxxiii. 25) is appropriated by men who might shrink from a similar application of that on Dan (22)

4. Of vast importance, too, is the direction to examine scripture with so much care as to bring out its full significance. There is no superfluity in the word of God. Nothing is put down at random there; and it is the business of the interpreter, while he does not introduce more from his own fancy into a passage than is actually in it, to discover all the instruction which it was really intended to convey. Instances innumerable might be produced, in which, by a word, a touch, the turn of a sentence, the order of names, some necessary information, some important conclusion, not the product of mere imagination, but the sober result of sound reason, is obtained, which cursory readers altogether fail in appreciating. It is by a course of such minute investigation that Paley, in his Horæ Paulinæ, and Blunt, in his Undesigned Coincidences, have collected such a mass of evidence to the veracity of the sacred writers. Let an illustration or two be added here. It has been sometimes wondered why the hands of our Lord's attached female attendants were not employed in preparing his precious body for the tomb. A single word, 'sitting' (Matt. xxvii. 61), supplies the explanation. They were on the spot, but they could not bestir themselves; their stupefying grief disabled them; they could but sit by to watch the last sad rites performed. And again, from the order in which St. Peter names the countries where those he wrote to dwell (1 Pet. i. 1), we may not uncertainly gather his locality when writing. That which was natural in the east would have been unnatural had he been at Rome.

5. There is yet another direction specially applicable to the book of revelation. Ordinarily we should say that a writer was his own best expositor; and, seeing that the scripture is an organized and harmonious whole, we may well add that one part throws light upon another, even if both proceed not from identically the same pen. But, when we go, as we are authorized in going, still further, and regard the book as containing divine communications, from which may be gathered, as there has been gathered, a body of doctrine, held always in its main points by the church, and compressed into her creeds and confessions, which, though of human compilation, 'may be proved by most certain warrants of holy scripture;' then we are justified in concluding that no interpretation can stand which contradicts the analogy of faith. Doctrines indeed may be true, and yet may not belong to the analogy of faith; which is the general rule deduced, not from two or three parallel or coincident passages, but from the harmony of all parts of scripture on the fundamental points of faith and practice. But we can never receive those which are plainly contradictory to it. Take, as an illustrative example of its value, such an assertion as that Christ is 'the first-born of every creature' (Col. i. 15): by itself it is not perfectly clear, whether, giving him a pre-eminence, it excludes him from the class of creatures. But compare it with the whole tenor of scripture teaching, place it beside the multifarious testimonies to the proper divinity of Christ, and it will be seen at once how it maintains the dignity of him who of the same essence with the Father was begotten before the worlds of creation. Any other interpretation would be opposed to the analogy of faith.

It is hoped that, brief as these observations have necessarily been, they may have indicated the safe course of scripture interpretation. They have, however, touched only that historico-literal interpretation, as it has been called, in which we reach the plain meaning of the sacred writers, and discover what it is that they really intended to say. But beneath the letter there is to be discerned a deeper meaning. If we at all admit the authority of scripture, we cannot deny this. Our Lord often showed it in his discourses: the apostles have carried out the same truth. For God is in the habit of teaching not only by words but by facts, representing, in the histories of the past, things which after a higher significance occur again, and making his dealings of old ensamples and admonitions of his dealings with his church for ever. Of these deeper meanings—the spirit under the letter of scripture—more cannot be here said. Many of the topics connected therewith are treated of under the heads of PROPHECY, TYPES, which see. Only let it be remembered that these, too, must be regulated by certain laws; and that it is not the fancy, it is the sober judgment, which must be exercised upon them.

One word must be said on the temper in which men should approach the great business of scripture interpretation. It must be in a candid and trustful spirit, not allowing small difficulties to neutralize extended proofs: it must be with a sincere desire to discover truth, whatever prejudices may have to be cast aside: it must be with earnest prayer for the illumination of that Holy Spirit by whose means holy men of old were enabled to speak.

Many books have been produced on the interpretation of scripture. For the New Testament, Dr. Fairbairn's Hermeneutical Manual, 1858, is valuable: notices of other works may be found in Dr. Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics.

IPHEDEIAH (whom Jehovah sets free). A Benjamite chieftain (1 Chron. viii. 25).

IR (a city). A Benjamite (1 Chron. vii. 12), called also Iri (7).

I'RA (wakeful).—1. One of David's great officers (2 Sam. xx. 26). He is called a Jairite, perhaps descended from JAIR, which see, No. 1, or, as some have imagined (from the reading of the Peshito Syriac version), of JATTIR, which see. In this case he would be identical with No. 3.—2. A Tekoite, one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chron. xi. 28, xxvii. 9).—3. An Ithrite, also a warrior of David (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chron. xi. 40).

I'RAD (wild ass). A grandson of Cain (Gen. iv. 18).

I'RAM (belonging to a city). One of the dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 43, 1 Chron. i. 54).

IR-HA-HE'RES (city of the sun, or city of destruction). This word occurs only once (Isai. xix. 18), where in our version it is rendered 'the city of destruction,' and in the margin 'of Heres,' or 'of the sun.' The reading of the original passage is uncertain; and, according as heres or heres is preferred (the difference being only a single letter), one or other meaning will be adopted.

The prophecy would seem to point to the time when, by the influx of the Jews into Egypt, the knowledge of the true God would be disseminated there, and a way made for the fuller reception of divine truth in the gospel dispensation. Under the Greek dominion the Jews were permitted to build a temple in Egypt, in which the services nearly imitated those at Jerusalem. The scriptures were translated into Greek; and many became thereby instructed in God's will. And, though a philosophizing spirit prevailed and grew, yet Moses and the prophets were read in Egypt, and their testimony was ready there to corroborate the claims of Messiah. So had the prophecy its fulfilment. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, discussing the particular interpretation of Ir-ha-heres, and preferring the meaning 'city of destruction,' observes that, 'if the prophecy is to be understood in a proper sense, we . . . must suppose that Ir-ha-heres was one of the cities partly or wholly inhabited by the Jews in Egypt: of these Onion was the most important, and to it the rendering "one shall be called a city of destruction" would apply, since it was destroyed by Titus, while Alexandria and perhaps the other cities yet stand' (vol. i. p. 870).

But possibly 'city of the sun' is a preferable interpretation; and then Heliopolis or On might be intended. It was at Leontopolis, in the Heliopolitan nome or district, that the Jewish temple stood. And this view seems confirmed by the mention of Beth-shemesh, with the same meaning (Jer. xliii. 13); the same place being referred to (comp. Judges i. 35). Some writers, however, would give the whole passage a figurative interpretation: comp. Henderson, The Book of Isaiah, pp. 176-180. See On.

IRI (citizen) (1 Chron. vii. 7). A Benjamite, called also Ir (12).

IRI (1 Esdr. viii. 62). Uriah (Ezra viii. 33).

IRIJAH (whom Jehovah looks upon). An officer who arrested Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvii. 13, 14).

IR'NAHASH (serpent-city). The name of a city of which nothing is known. It is found among the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 12); in the margin it is called 'the city of Nahash.'

IRON (piety, pious). A city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38).

IRON. A well-known metal very widely diffused, but scarcely ever found in the metallic state. A doubt used to be expressed whether iron was known in Old Testament times: positive proof however of this has been furnished by Assyrian and Egyptian discoveries; for iron implements have actually been found of remote antiquity at Nineveh; while Egyptian paintings exhibit its use among that people. The working of iron, so scripture tells us, was understood in the earliest ages; for Tubal-cain is mentioned as an artificer in it before the flood (Gen. iv. 22). Allusions are perpetually made in scripture to the use of iron. Thus for domestic purposes, and as the material of tools for artizans, we have it in axes (Deut. xix. 5; 2 Kings vi. 5, 6; Isai. x. 34), chisels (Deut. xxvii. 5), saws and harrows (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chron. xx. 3), nails (xxii. 3), graters (Job xix. 24; Jer. xvii. 1), cooking utensils (Ezek. iv. 3), agricultural instruments (Amos i. 3: comp. Isai. xli. 15). It was employed for armour and weapons of war (1 Sam. xvii. 7; 2 Sam. xxiii. 7; Job xx. 24; Rev. ix. 9). War-chariots were plated with it, or studded with iron nails (Josh. xvii. 16, 18; Judges i. 19, iv. 3, 13). And there were many other purposes for which this metal was employed, as for the frame of a bedstead (Deut. iii. 11), fetters (Psal. cv. 18, cxlix. 8), bars (Job xi. 18; Psal. cvii. 16; Isai. xlv. 2), gates of prisons (Acts xii. 10), and for cauterizing (1 Tim. iv. 2). There are, moreover, various references to iron in the Apocrypha (Wisd. xiii. 15, and elsewhere).

The Israelites were told that the land of Canaan produced iron (Deut. viii. 9). This is not the case now; though it is said that there are iron-mines in some districts of the Lebanon (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Eisen'): it has been fancied, therefore, that basalt is meant. An ancient iron-working has been discovered in Egypt (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt., vol. iii. p. 246); but the Tyrians are said to have procured it from 'Dan and Javan' (Ezek. xxvii. 19) very probably Arabia. At all events it was abundant, as David's collections show (1 Chron. xxii. 3, 14, 16). Of the mode in which iron was wrought among the Hebrews we know little; and it is uncertain whether they were acquainted with cast iron. There is, however, the description of a smith's forge in Eccles. xxxviii. 28. Wilkinson (ubi supr., p. 243) says, 'The Jews appear to have been acquainted with two kinds of iron, previous to the Babylonish captivity, the barzel, which was in common use, and the northern iron, as well as steel (Jer. xv. 12): even as early as the days of Job (Job xxviii. 2) iron was known; and Moses mentions an iron-furnace (Deut. iv. 20): see STEEL.

The word is often used in a metaphorical sense to express something hard and unyielding (xxviii. 48, xxxiii. 25; 1 Kings vii. 51; Psal. ii. 9; Jer. i. 18, xxviii. 13, 14, Rev. ii. 27).

IR'PEEL (what God heals). A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27).

IR-SHE'MESH (city of the sun). A city of Dan (Josh. xix. 41). Some have supposed it identical with BETH-SHEMESH, which see.

IRU (belonging to a city). A son of the eminent Caleb (1 Chron. iv. 15).

ISAAC (laughter, sporting). The heir of promise, the long-looked for son of Abraham by his wife Sarah, born probably in the territory of Gerar, when his father was one hundred years old. His name, prescribed before his birth (Gen. xvii. 19), was highly significant. Abraham had smiled incredulously when the promise was renewed to him and Sarah designated as the mother of the covenant seed (17); and Sarah laughed derisively afterwards when she heard the reiterated word (xviii. 12). The son by his very name, therefore, was to warn the parents against unbelief, and characterized the jubilant satisfaction with which they received at last the fulfilment of the promise (xxi. 6).

Isaac's life was far less stirring than that of his father Abraham, or that of his son Jacob. He was a man of mild contemplative character, without much strength of mind, suffering more than acting, easily persuaded, yet upon occasion firm. The incidents related of his history illustrate this.

When he was weaned Abraham made a feast (8, 9). Ishmael had, probably, till Isaac's birth conceived himself the heir. He would naturally become jealous of his young brother; and very likely this jealousy was fostered and aggravated by his mother. At the feast, therefore, the wild, ungovernable, and pugnacious character ascribed to his descendants began to develop itself, and to appear in language of provoking insolence: offended at the comparative indifference with which he was treated, he indulged in mockery, especially against Isaac, whose very name furnished him with satirical sneers' (Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test., Gen., p. 435). It is to this that St. Paul alludes (Gal. iv. 29). And there is no occasion to imagine, as some have done, that the apostle followed here a Jewish tradition: he simply gives the full sense of the original expression (see Dr. Alford's valuable note on Gal. iv. 29). When a young man, possibly about five-and-twenty, Isaac was taken by his father to mount Moriah, there to be offered as a burnt-sacrifice (Gen. xxii. 1-19). For the reasons of this extraordinary incident see ABRAHAM. But the unresisting meekness which Isaac evinced should not be passed over without notice. When he was thirty-seven his mother Sarah died, for whom he grieved with all the tenderness of an affectionate heart. Afterwards Abraham selected through the steward of his house a wife for him from his own kindred. His evening meditation in the field, his reception of Rebekah, and his being comforted in her after his mother's death, are very characteristic (xxiv.). Isaac was forty at his marriage; and twenty years elapsed before his sons Esau and Jacob were born. In fifteen more years his father Abraham died; and he united with his brother Ishmael, now an aged man of eighty-nine, in burying him.

Isaac did not rule well his own house. His sons grew up apparently uncontrolled. And, though before their birth the younger was marked out as the heir of the covenant, yet the father let his partiality for the elder appear; while the mother favoured the other (xxv.). Isaac had lived by the well Beer-lahai-roi (xxiv. 62, xxv. 11), and, on occasion of a famine, would probably have followed his father's example and gone into Egypt. He was, however, divinely directed not to quit the land of Canaan. Moving, therefore, but a little way, he settled himself at Gerar. And here he repeated the fault of Abraham: when asked of his wife, he represented her as his sister; a fault which some have vainly striven to palliate. But the Lord is very pitiful and of tender mercy: he delivered Isaac from the evil which might have fallen upon him, and blessed him with so large an increase of the seed he sowed, and so much other wealth, that the Philistines became jealous of him. He left Gerar, therefore, and, after some opposition on the part of Abimelech and his people, on account of certain wells, he fixed his abode at Beer-sheba, where the Lord appeared to him with words of encouragement, and where he built an altar (xxvi.). In his age (not less than one hundred and twenty, perhaps one hundred and thirty-seven) Isaac's eyesight had failed, and probably sickness was on him, which made him anxious to give a solemn blessing to his favourite son. The occasion was to be marked by a feast, which Esau was to procure. Jacob, however, instigated by his mother, appeared first with the savoury meat his father loved, and obtained the blessing. When Isaac discovered the fraud, he still firmly held to what he had done, blessed Jacob again, and sent him away to provide a wife from among his relatives at Padan-aram (xxvii., xxviii. 1-5). We know little more of Isaac. His latter days appear to have been spent at Hebron, where Jacob with his family returned from Padan-aram visited him, and where he died aged one hundred and eighty, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah by his two sons (xxxv. 27-29).

Isaac stands forth to view especially as the affectionate obedient son, the model of that loving submission which those who become, as inheritors of his father Abraham's faith, sons and heirs of God, ought to pay to their heavenly Parent; the highest type of which is to be seen in the perfect performance of his Father's will by the only-begotten Son of God (Psal. xl. 6-8; Matt. xxvi. 39, 42; John v. 30, vi. 38). This is the character in which we best love to contemplate Isaac: his figure recurs to us as bearing the wood with his father up the slopes of Moriah. Gentle, pious, conciliating as he was through the rest of his days, he never rose higher in after-life, he hardly fulfilled this promise of his youth. Indeed it is not too much to say with Dr. Fairbairn that 'in the more advanced stage of his history he fell into a state of general feebleness and decay, in which the moral but too closely corresponded with the bodily decline' (Typol. of Script., book ii. chap. vi. sect. 5, vol. i. p. 334). Yet Isaac was a man of faith and prayer; and God was not ashamed to be called his God (Heb. xi. 16). His history conveys many instructive lessons; and his memory has always been had in honour as one of the great patriarchs and progenitors of Israel.

ISA I (1 Chron. x. 14, marg.). Jesse.

ISAIAH (salvation of Jehovah). One of the most eminent of the Hebrew prophets. Of his personal history very little is known. He was the son of Amoz (Isai i. 1), whom rabbinical tradition represents as the brother of king Amaziah. He was married, his wife being called 'the prophetess' (viii. 3), not because she exercised the prophetic gift herself, but simply because she was married to a prophet. He had at least two sons, with symbolical names, Shear-jashub and Maher-shalal-hash-baz (vii. 3, viii. 1-3). It is presumed that he ordinarily wore a hair-cloth garment (xx. 2); but there is no reason for believing that he was an ascetic. He would seem to have resided at Jerusalem, where he exercised his prophetic ministry during a long course of years. Isaiah prophesied under Uzziah, receiving the divine call in the last year of that monarch's reign (vi.), and under the succeeding kings, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (i. 1). Whether he lived on into Manasseh's reign is uncertain. Jewish tradition asserts that he did, and that he was martyred by being sawn asunder; and this has been supposed to be alluded to in Heb. xi. 37. And to this day a spot at Jerusalem is pointed out where the martyrdom occurred, just by an old mulberry-tree near the pool of Siloam. Besides this tradition, it is said that, as the acts of Hezekiah 'are written in the vision of Isaiah' (2 Chron. xxxii. 32), the prophet must have survived the king. But this is not a necessary inference. It by no means follows that, because Isaiah recorded some of the history of Hezekiah, he recorded the whole of it. It is further alleged that the later portions of Isaiah's prophecy (Isai. xl.-lxvi.) are better suited to Manasseh's reign than to a previous time. But little stress can be laid on such an argument. On the contrary side is the fact that the inscription (i. 1), which belongs to the whole book, and not, as some critics imagine, to a fragment of it, does not go beyond Hezekiah. Besides, if Isaiah began to prophesy in the last year of Uzziah, there are sixty years from that period to the end of Hezekiah's reign. Supposing the prophet to have had his commission quite in youth, when eighteen or twenty, he would have reached extreme old age at Manasseh's accession. And therefore, though by no means impossible, it is not probable that he lived so long. There is, however, another fact which must not be passed lightly over. In the historical part of Isaiah's book Sennacherib's death is noted (xxxvii.). Now, Sennacherib survived Hezekiah, according to some chronologers, seventeen years. If Isaiah recorded Sennacherib's death, it must have been in Manasseh's reign. Perhaps more light may be thrown upon the question by further investigation of the Assyrian inscriptions. The acts of Uzziah were written by Isaiah (2 Chron. xxvi. 22); and two apocryphal books have been ascribed to him, 'The Ascension of Isaiah,' and 'The Apocalypse of Isaiah.' They are both forgeries; and the Apocalypse has long since perished.

ISAIAH, THE BOOK OF. 754-694 B.C. This collection of prophecies, though delivered later in point of time than several of those uttered by other prophets, occupies in our bibles the first place, both on account of its bulk, and also for the sublimity and importance of the predictions.

They have been uniformly ascribed by the Jews to the great prophet whose name they bear. Modern criticism, however, has been very busy upon them; so that, if we could trust the conclusions to which various writers have come, everybody has been heretofore mistaken about this book, which is nothing but a collection of fragments, for the most part later than the times of the real Isaiah, gathered after the Babylonian captivity. The only portions which some critic or other has not questioned are said to be Isai. i. 3-9, xvii., xx., xxviii., xxxi., xxxiii. Of course opinions are discordant: what one rejects another defends. And it has happened that men who have at one time maintained the integrity of Isaiah have at another attacked it. We may respect their candour in so retracing their steps; but we can have no confidence in their judgment. Their changeableness disqualifies them as public teachers.

It will be impossible, in the limited space which can be here allowed, to discuss all the objections which have been brought against the Isaian authorship of the book. Leaving, then, some of the earlier chapters which have been questioned, it will be better to confine the observations which can be made to the later portion (xl.-lxvi.), which have been most specially and most confidently pronounced to be not earlier than the Babylonian captivity.

Here are the chief arguments that are urged. The writer, it is said, is describing not a future but a present exile. The desolations of which he speaks in Edom and Judea (lxiii., lxiv.) must have already taken place. They would not else have been dwelt on with such a minuteness of detail, which is quite alien to the genius of prophecy foretelling the far-distant future. Again, in Hezekiah's days Babylon was a mere tributary province: there was no great Chaldean monarchy: the Medes and Elamites, mentioned as the destroyers of Babylon, were at that time petty undistinguished nations. Isaiah, it is therefore urged, would never have passed from the Assyrian to the Babylonian age, omitting all notice of the actual conquest of Judea by Babylon, and, placing himself at once as it were in the last times of the captivity itself (xliv. 26-28), have spoken as quite familiar with the nations which then, and not till then, were prominent, expressing even the name of the actual conqueror of Babylon, Cyrus (xiv. 1). That Cyrus was so named, that the predictions down to him were perspicuous, while those referring to later events were obscure, is declared to be convincing proof that the writer was contemporary with Cyrus. Further, the strain of this part of the book is said to be hortatory, fitting enough for one really addressing exiles among whom he lived, but inconceivable in a writer a century and a half before, who could not enter into all the relations in which the captive people would stand, or so thoroughly identify himself with their feelings and aspirations. Moreover, it is urged that the style differs much from that of the rest of the book, there being many peculiarities of diction, also that the tone is not that of Isaiah—the descriptions of the ‘servant’ of Jehovah (xii. 8, 9, xlii. 1-4, 19, xlv. 1, xlviii. 12, 20, xlix. 7, lii. 13, and elsewhere), the derisive contempt of idolatry (xl. 19, 20, xlv. 9-20, xli. 5-7), the extraordinary expectations of Jewish supremacy, and of the relation which the Jews would bear to the Gentiles, being, it is declared, unparalleled in the genuine productions of Isaiah—and that there is an appeal (xl.-xlvii.) to ancient prophecy respecting the Babylonish captivity; none such being existent in Isaiah’s time. It is, besides, said that, had these chapters been known to Jeremiah, that prophet, we may be sure, would have made some reference to them.

The objections taken from the alleged difference of style and tone are of a very unsubstantial character. They have weight only on the presumption that an individual, however long his life, however varied the circumstances under which he is at different times called to speak, will always fall into the same strain of thought, will always express himself in the same way. To be sure, if there are on other grounds grave doubts in regard to the authority of any piece, this may be taken as corroborative testimony, but in itself, were it even true to the extent claimed, it is not to be relied on. Prof. Lee has well observed that Cicero, Virgil, Shakspeare, Milton, and others might be dismembered on the same principles as those applied to Isaiah (Six Sermons on the Study of Script., pp. 158, &c.)

But we must take higher ground. The original fault which has prompted the denial of the Isaian authorship is an imperfect view of the nature of prophecy. If the Hebrew seers were but sagacious men, with a quick eye for the turns of the times, and with merely a political object, which as active perhaps unscrupulous partizans they determined to promote, we might well allow all that has been objected. Obscurity and vagueness would characterize their so-called predictions; and their view must be limited to the events and the agents then upon the stage of the world. But once establish the fact that the prophetic gift is a reality, that God does unveil to his servants the events that are coming to pass, that it is one great test of his supremacy that he stands alone, ‘declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done’ (Isai. xlv. 10), and the difficulty vanishes. As St. Paul rebuked the sarcastic unbelief of Agrippa and Festus, ‘Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?’ (Acts xxvi. 8), so may we well ask, Why should he in whose eternal mind all past and future occurrences are fully present, for adequate reasons—and the establishment of his kingdom and the administration of his church are adequate reasons—not make known his will beforehand, and trace out from old time the lineaments of that magnificent plan, according to which, by an appointed Saviour, he restores the ruin which sin and Satan had occasioned? Are his people to have no strong warrant for their faith? Is the High and Lofty One to be limited to the petty grasp of a human understanding? The plainest facts attest the contrary. There is prophecy fulfilled and fulfilling before our eyes. No prescience of man, no sagacious guess, no keenness of natural instinct, mysterious as in the response of an ancient oracle, or far-reaching as that of a finished modern German professor, could have fore-shown the present condition of the Jews, of Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, Egypt, depicted, as we may see, in prophecies delivered demonstrably while those nations and cities were existing and prosperous. The prophetic vision is a reality, then. And the Old Testament is one great prophecy of the New, and God’s dealings with his church the gradual unfolding of that sublime purpose according to which the Just was to suffer for the unjust. By means of the prophets God revealed his will for human guidance. When temporal deliverance from earthly foes was predicted, there was yet a further meaning in the prophetic utterances. Mightier victories over adversaries more implacable were pre-signified; and the immediate fulfilment was but the proof, or it may be the type also, of that more complete accomplishment of the good pleasure of God’s goodness in the redemption of the world, and the glorious establishment of his holy kingdom. It is quite a mistake, therefore, to imagine that Isaiah’s later prophecies respected merely the return from the literal Babylon. Hence Stuart observes (Crit. Hist. and Def. of O. T. Canon, sect. iv. p. 103, edit. Davidson), ‘It is only when chaps. xl.-lxvi. are viewed in the light of a great Messianic development—a series of predictions respecting the person, the work, and the kingdom of Christ—that the earnestness, the protracted length, the fullness, the deep feeling, the holy enthusiasm, the glowing metaphors and similes, and the rich and varied exhibitions of peace and prosperity, can well be accounted for. The writer, in taking such a stand-point, uses the exile and the return from it as the basis of his comparisons and analogies. It was a rich and deeply-interesting source, from which he might draw them. Any other solution of the whole phenomena is, to my mind at least, meagre and unsatisfactory.’ See Henderson, Book of the Proph. Isaiah, introd. pp. xvii., &c.; Horne, Introd., vol. ii. edit. Ayre, p. 790; and comp. proofs of accomplishment of prophecy in such works as those of Newton, Keith, &c.

If principles like these be established, a satisfactory reply may readily be given to the specific objections before noticed. Isaiah, occupying a prophetic not a historical position, is carried forward into future ages; and the lamentable condition of Judah desolated and captive is before his eye. It is not as a historian that he writes. Nor are there any such details as we discover in the prophets who lived really in the period of the exile. Just in accordance with prophetic usage there is no note of time. The nations referred to were not altogether unknown. Babylon was brought prominently forward by the embassy from its king to Hezekiah. And Hezekiah's vanity on that account gave occasion for the predicting of the Babylonian conquest; while his submission may be said to invite the cheering assurances of deliverance from it. Nor did Isaiah stand alone in the character of his predictions. Micah, his contemporary, delivered a similar message, as if writing amid the actual exile (Mic. iv. 10, vii. 7-11). And to these declarations, and to those of Isaiah himself already delivered, and not to any more ancient utterances, reference was made. As to Cyrus, he is spoken of in general terms. And, though he is called by name, yet such designation is not unprecedented. Besides, after all, it is very probable that the word Cyrus was rather a title of dignity, as Pharaoh in Egypt, than a name properly so called. The silence of Jeremiah, even if it could be proved that he made no use of Isaiah's prophecies, surely is small evidence that such prophecies were not then existing. But there is great reason to believe that later writers were acquainted with what Isaiah delivered here, and in earlier chapters, against Babylon, and embodied thoughts and expressions from him. Some illustrative proof of this is produced by Keil (Einleitung, §§ 68, 72, pp. 252, 253, 281). If, further, a difference of style be perceptible in these last chapters as compared with the earlier ones, it is conceived that an ample explanation is supplied by the fact that the earlier oracles were various, called forth by passing events, and were consequently more abrupt; while the later chapters are one long discourse more carefully elaborated, hence naturally exhibiting a greater copiousness and flow of language. If there are some Chaldaic words introduced, they may easily be accounted for by the intercourse in Hezekiah's time with Assyria. But some of those objected to may be paralleled from parts of Isaiah generally acknowledged genuine; as may also the strain of thought and the imagery employed (see Keil, ubi supra). Besides, had the writer really lived in the time of the exile, there would certainly have been more peculiarities of diction, and a greater diversity of thought and expression.

Much more might be said on this topic. But it is believed that sufficient reason has been produced to show that the objections against the Isaian authorship of the later chapters are by no means conclusive. And it may be added, in the words of Hengstenberg, that 'it is a principle of higher criticism that both whole works, and the single parts of the same, must be regarded as the production of the author to whom they are attributed, so long as it is not shown, by internal and external grounds, that he could not have been the author. This has not been done in the present case' (Amer. Bibl. Repos., Oct. 1831, p. 723).

But there are some more positive evidences for the genuineness of these prophecies which must now be looked at. It is obvious that a writer, endowed with the prophetic gift or not, will allude to the things around him, will reprove the sins actually committed by his own generation. It is not natural, one may almost say it is not possible, for a Jewish teacher, without divine help too—for the very object of placing these chapters at a late date is to show that they were the production of no prophet—it is hardly possible that a teacher, addressing his people in the time of the captivity, should accuse them of sins which they could not then commit, and warn them against an untheocratic behaviour the opportunity for which had passed away. Now observe: the people are cautioned against seeking for foreign help (Isai. lvii. 3), censured for hypocritically observing fast-days (lviii. 3-6), and nevertheless exacting burdens and usurious profits, and keeping their brethren in bondage, for profaning the sabbath (13), for confounding the distinction between clean and unclean meats (lxv. 4, lxvi. 17). There are frequent allusions, too, to false prophets in Jerusalem; and idolatry is ceaselessly denounced. Again, the Assyrian oppression is referred to as if it were the last then suffered (lii. 4). In short, these and many similar allusions are suitable only to a time when the Jewish state was still existing, and are not likely to have been made by any, except, as Prof. Blunt says, by 'a man dwelling in Judea before the captivity, during a period which, as historically described in the latter chapters of the books of Kings and Chronicles, presents the exact counterpart of those references in the prophet' (Undesigned Coincidences, part iii. 6, p. 239). Much stress need not be laid upon the curious observation by the same writer (ibid., 5, p. 238), that Hezekiah's wife and Manasseh's mother was named Hephzi-bah (2 Kings xxi. 1), and that the marriage of the land is described, and the name applied to it is Hephzi-bah (Isai. lxii. 4). But it is a very natural illustration, if the king's marriage occurred about the time the prophecy was uttered.

There is still more remarkable evidence. Kleinert has shown how the decree of Cyrus (Ezra i. 2-4) actually incorporates words and expressions from the later chapters of Isaiah (Ueber die Echtheit in dem B. Jesaia Weiss., pp. 134-142). And this gives consistency to the statement of Josephus (Antiq., lib. xi. 1, §§ 1, 2) that Isaiah's prophecies were communicated to Cyrus, and that he was hence induced to issue his decree for the Jews' return and the re-building of their temple. We cannot very well suppose that the Jewish exiles ventured to palm some late compositions upon the great conqueror, and made him believe that they were the solemn utterances of ancient prophecy. It must be noted, further, that there are many peculiarities of diction found in all parts of the book, in the earlier as well as the later chapters, of such a kind as to render it most probable that the composition proceeded from the same source. Illustrations and examples have been supplied in abundance by various critics, to whose works the reader must be referred: see Kleinert, ubi supra, pp. 220, &c.; Hengstenberg in Kitzo's Cycl. of Bibl. Lit., art. 'Isaiah'; Keil, Einleitung, § 72; Horne, ubi supra, p. 796.

And, though the later chapters have been here almost exclusively referred to, yet it must be remembered that, as before said, various other parts have been assailed with similar objections, and must be defended on similar grounds. But consider for a moment the result, if all or if many of these objections could be substantiated. What a strange phenomenon would the conglomerate, a congeries of fragments, be! Is such a construction probable? Well and pertinently, therefore, does Stuart enquire, 'What example is there, among all the prophets, of a book so patched up by putting together six different authors, five of them without any names? Who did this? Where, when was it done? If parts of the book are so late as is alleged, why have we no hint about its compilation, no certain internal evidence of it? How can we account for it that all the minor prophets, even Obadiah with his one chapter, should be kept separate and distinct, and this even down to the end of the prophetic period, and yet Isaiah be made up by undistinguished fragments and amalgamations? These surely are serious difficulties; and they have not been satisfactorily met' (ubi supr., p. 97).

There is another point which must be pressed earnestly and reverently. These chapters repeatedly cited in the New Testament are there ascribed to Isaiah. Thus Isai. xl. 3 is introduced by the words, 'This is he that was spoken of by the prophet Esaias' (Matt. iii. 3; see Luke iii. 4; John i. 23). So Isai. xlii. 1 is introduced by 'That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Esaias the prophet' (Matt. xii. 17). Again of Isai. liii. 1 we have, 'That the saying of Esaias the prophet might be fulfilled which he spake' (John xii. 38); and in the following verses reference is made to Isai. vi. in terms which show that the two quotations were considered as belonging to the same prophet: comp. Rom. x. 16. Once more, St. Paul expressly attributes Isai. lxxv. 1, 2 to Isaiah, 'Esaias is very bold and saith' (Rom. x. 20). It cannot be denied that our Lord and his apostles received the passages so cited as really written by Isaiah. Surely a devout mind will not lightly set their judgment aside. It is beside the mark to say that Christ did not come to rectify critical error, or that perchance he was ignorant, like religious Jews in general, of the true authorship of these portions of the book. For if not from Isaiah's pen they are not prophecy. What confidence could the church repose in a divine Teacher who mistook mere human utterance for inspired prediction, and could not distinguish between God's genuine word and a counterfeit?

It is not intended to deny that able and conscientious men have arrived at a different conclusion, or to refuse to their arguments their fair weight. But, looking at the whole question, and laying together all the considerations, of which a mere outline has been here presented, it does seem that the difficulties, on the presumption that these prophecies are not genuine, are enormous. And the objections are not more formidable than an ingenious man could frame against the credit of almost every ancient writing. Some have suggested a kind of compromise. There was, they have guessed, a second Isaiah, the author of the later chapters—a man unknown to history, but who has had the advantage of being combined with and mistaken for his namesake. Serious disproof of such a theory is little needed. And as little can it be imagined, when every other prophetic book is assigned definitely to its author, that he who delivered this grand revelation, enclosing the most extraordinary descriptions of the person and work of Messiah, and promising the establishment of that kingdom into which Gentiles as well as Jews should be gathered—in itself, it may be by the way remarked, a sufficient authorization—that he, who by universal consent stands foremost for sublimity of thought and vastness of conception among the Hebrew seers, should never have gained a name among his people, and have been degraded into a mere appendage to a writer a century and a half before him. Besides, to a careful observer the later portions are but the development of the earlier. Allusions and references in confirmation might easily be pointed out. Take a single instance: the lofty consolations of Isai. xl. only open forth in louder notes the strains which are heard in i. 16-19, 25-27. This fact increases the difficulty of supposing an appendix by a strange and later hand. The conclusion then, maintained by all external evidence, and corroborated in spite of objection by internal proof, to which the thoughtful student who believes that 'holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' must come, will surely be that Isaiah the son of Amoz it was to whom it was given to promulgate these oracles of God.

We may be content to let the question rest whether Isaiah's own hand arranged the book in its present form. The chapters do not follow in chronological order. And it is not easy to discover any distinct principle which has guided the distribution. Keil sees in the whole two great groups of prophecies. He supposes chap. i. an address to Isaiah's contemporaries, and an introduction to the rest; and then he includes in the first group ii.-xxvii., in the second xxviii.-lxvi. The two great events of the time were the combination of Syria and Ephraim against Judah, and the invasion of Sennacherib; and to these as the special objects the mission of the prophet was directed. The centre and nucleus of the first group is chap. vii., of the second chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix. And to these the rest of the predictions are subordinate, either as preparatory to them, or as taking occasion from them to develop the future manifestation of God's kingdom (Einleitung, § 66).

Such a classification is perhaps too artificial; but objections may be made against any others—and they are numerous—which are proposed. And, it may be added, it is hardly possible to specify with exactness the dates of the particular portions. After observing, however, that the book seems naturally to fall into three parts:—I. A collection of separate prophecies in regard to Israel, Judah, and neighbouring nations (i.-xxxv.). II. The historical portion (xxxvi.-xxxix.). III. The discourse respecting Messiah and his kingdom (xl.-lxvi.)—the first of these having special reference to Assyria, linked by the second to the third, which points to Babylon and onwards—it may be an assistance to the reader if a compendious view of the dates of the several oracles, taken from Browne's Ordo Sæclorum (part i. chap. iv. append. pp. 249-252), be presented to him: I. i. (i.-v.) Prophecies against Jerusalem delivered in the reigns of Uzziah and Jotham, the section being completed by the narrative of the prophet's mission (vi.); ii. (vii.-xii.) Prophecy of Immanuel, delivered on occasion of the confederacy against Jerusalem in the first year of Ahaz; iii. (xiii. 1-xiv. 27) Prophecies against Babylon and Assyria; iv. (xiv. 28-xxiii. 18) Prophecies immediately relating to the Assyrian invasion, including: 1. (xiv. 28-32), against Philistia, delivered in the death-year of Ahaz, 726 B.C.; 2. (xv., xvi.), against Moab, relating to the invasion of Shalmaneser, 723-721 B.C.; 3. (xvii.), against Damascus and Ephraim, fulfilled 721 B.C., (xviii.), connected with the preceding chapter, and relating to Ethiopia; 4. (xix.), against Egypt, about 718 B.C.; 5. (xxi. 1-10), the capture of Babylon; 6. (11, 12), oracle concerning Dumah; 7. (13-17), that against Arabia; 8. (xxii.), vision of the siege of Jerusalem; 9. (xxiii.), against Tyre. In all these subdivisions, Mr. Browne thinks he perceives a connecting link, there being some relation more or less near to Assyria as threatening or conquering each people or country named. v. (xxiv.-xxvii.) Desolation of Judah and Jerusalem; after the judgment, Messiah's kingdom; vi. (xxviii.-xxxv.) The same general subject, with particular application to the prophet's own times (xxx., xxxi.). The latter series was delivered before the catastrophe of Samaria; xxviii. prophesying the desolation of that kingdom. Probably nos. v. and vi. start from the same point as iv., i.e. the year of the death of Ahaz. II. The historical chapters (xxxvi.-xxxix.). III. (xl.-lxvi.). An interval of many years probably separates these from the former.

It must be added that a careful study of the history of the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, and Manasseh, with that of contemporaneous Israelitish kings, is necessary for the understanding of Isaiah's prophecies.

Of the character and merits of Isaiah's style little need be said: every reader can in some degree appreciate the majesty of his sentiments, the propriety and elegance of his imagery, the beauty and energy of his language; the different excellences being so tempered that, as Ewald acknowledges, 'one cannot say of Isaiah, as of other prophets, that he had some special peculiarity or favourite mode of colouring. . . . As the subject requires, every kind of diction and every change of method are respectively manifested' (Die Propheten des A.B., vol. i. p. 173).

It may be desirable to say somewhat of the 'servant of the Lord,' of which, in the later chapters, the prophet frequently speaks. The title is given sometimes to specified persons (Isai. xx. 3, xxii. 20), but it is used in a peculiar sense in xlii. 1-7, xlix. 1-9, l. 5-10, lii. 13, liii., with which compare Zech. iii. 8. Here we find it predicated of the character intended that he was 'called from the womb,' fitted and prepared for the office in which he was to glorify God (Isai. xlix. 1-3); he was endued with the Spirit to be the source of blessing and deliverance to the world, to inaugurate a new dispensation (xlii. 1-7); he was to be despised and to suffer, becoming a sacrifice for sin, though not his own (liii. 1-10); he was, however, to have a splendid recompence for his sufferings (11, 12), his exaltation being as great as his humiliation had been before (lii. 13-15).

There have been many interpretations attempted of the prophet's meaning. Laying out of view those that are manifestly untenable, we shall see five specially maintained by different writers—viz., that the Jewish people is described; that it is Cyrus; Isaiah himself; the prophets collectively, the Messiah. This last supposition is alone satisfactory. Henderson (Isaiah, note on xlii. 1) briefly sums up the proof of it:—'First, the passage (xlii. 1, &c.) is directly applied to our Saviour by the inspired evangelist Matthew (Matt. xii. 17-21); and part of the first verse is verbally adopted in the divine testimony to his Messiahship at the Jordan (iii. 17), and on the mount of transfiguration (xvii. 5; Mark ix. 7; Luke ix. 35). To which add the reference made to the sixth verse by Simeon in his inspired testimony (ii. 32). Secondly, this interpretation is that of the Chaldee paraphrast, and is advocated by Kimchi and Abarbanel, notwithstanding the narrowness of their hereditary notions. The latter writer scruples not to assert that all those who do not interpret the prophecy of the Messiah have been struck with blindness. Thirdly, the totality of character exhibited in the passage is such as to render it inapplicable to any but our Lord.'

But so close is the union between Christ and his church, that sometimes what is predicated of the one is applied to the other; because he is the Head, and his people members of one mystical body (Rom. xii. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 12, 13); he the chief cornerstone, his servants living stones built upon him, in whom the whole 'building, fitly framed together, groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord' (Eph. ii. 20-22). So that we have here exhibited, as Dr. Alexander well says (Prophecies of Isaiah, earlier and later, chap. xlii. p. 623), 'the Messiah and his people, as a complex person, and as the messenger or representative of God among the nations.' Sometimes therefore Christ, sometimes his people are more especially pointed to. Thus in Isai. xlii. 18-25, 'the church or body of Christ, as distinguished from its Head, and representing him until he came, is charged with unfaithfulness to their great trust, and this unfaithfulness declared to be the cause of what it suffered.' So there is an analogy in Deut. xviii. 15-19, where the prophet intended is not Christ in an exclusive sense, but rather as the Head of that prophetic body to whom his Spirit was imparted. There is something, then, of truth in several of the various interpretations propounded, but not the whole truth. The offices and excellences borrowed in description from inferiors and typical personages have their full signification in One to whom they point; who 'is more than a prophet, for the isles wait on his law; more than a priest, for he offers up himself; more than a king, for through his glory he makes kings to tremble. Not mere prophet, mere priest, mere king is the servant of the Lord, who is none of them exclusively, but is all together; and they are only three emanations of his individual glory' (Delitzsch in Kudelbach und Guericke's Zeitschrift, 1850, p. 54). This is no ideal: the notion is fully realized in him, who in the fulness of the time personally appeared in the world, and gathered around him the true Israel, and thus has become indeed 'the first-born among many brethren' (Rom. viii. 29). See Horne, ubi supr., pp. 605-807.

The commentaries on the book of Isaiah's prophecies are numerous; it must be sufficient here to mention the following: Vitringa, Comment. in Lib. Proph. Isaia, 1714; Bishop Lowth, Isaiah, a new transl., &c., 1778, &c.; Dr. Henderson, The Book of Isaiah, with Commentary, 1857, 2nd edit.; Dr. J. A. Alexander, The Prophecies of Isaiah, earlier and later, 1846, 1847, 1848.

IS'CAH (she looks abroad, covering?). The daughter of Haran, Abraham's brother, and sister of Lot (Gen. xi. 29). Jewish tradition identifies her with Sarah.

ISCAR'IOT. See JUDAS, 2.

IS'DAEL (1 Esdr. v. 33). Giddel (Ezra ii. 56).

ISH'BAH (praising). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 17).

ISH'BAK (leaving). One of the sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chron. i. 32). Various conjectures have been started as to the locality of the tribe which may be supposed sprung from Ishbak; but no certainty can be as yet arrived at; only as Kalisch suggests, the etymology would seem to allude to a wandering people.

ISH'BI-BE'NOB (his seat is at Nob). One of the sons of the Philistine giant, who thought to have slain David, but was killed by Abishai (2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17).

ISH-BO'SHETH (man of shame, or bashful). One of the sons, probably the youngest, of king Saul. He is called Esh-baal in 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39; the adjunct Baal, a name of heathen worship, being here, as in some similar cases, interchanged with Bosheth, shame. After the death of Saul and three of his sons upon Gilboa, when the state was in confusion, and many were looking to David, Abner carried Ish-bosheth across the Jordan, and established him at Mahanaim. He was a man of no energy; but Abner's influence was great; and by degrees the greater part of the kingdom was brought to acknowledge Ish-bosheth's sovereignty; only the tribe of Judah adhering to David. And from this time of real submission to him his reign of two years is to be dated (2 Sam. ii. 8-12, 15). There was war, however, between the two kingdoms; and at length the ambitious Abner, receiving an affront from Ish-bosheth, resolved to join David. This chief's assassination by Joab followed; and soon after Ish-bosheth was murdered by two of his officers, who thought to obtain David's favour by it, but were by his order immediately executed (iii., iv.).

ISH'I (saving, salutary).—1. 2. Two descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 31, iv. 20).—3. The father of four chiefs of Simeon (42).—4. A chieftain of Manassch, east of the Jordan (v. 24).

ISH'I (my husband). A Hebrew term symbolically used (Hos. ii. 16) in opposition to the Canaanitish or heathen word Baali, the signification being the same, but in the last case an idolatrous notion was included.

ISH'AH (whom Jehovah lends). A chieftain of Issachar (1 Chron. vii. 3).

ISH'JAH (id.). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 31).

ISH'MA (desolation). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 3).

ISH'MAEL (whom God hears).—1. The son of Abraham by the Egyptian Hagar, servant of Sarah, whom her mistress, despoiling of children herself, gave to her husband (Gen. xvi. 1-3). Before the birth of Ishmael Hagar had fled from Sarah's severity, but was commanded by an angel to return and submit herself, and was assured that her son (whose name was prescribed) should be the progenitor of a numerous seed, that he should be bold and independent—this being the characteristic of his race—and should dwell in the presence of or before all his brethren, an expression indicating the localities to be occupied by his posterity close to kindred tribes. Hagar returned to Abraham's encampment; and Ishmael was born when his father was eighty-six (4-16).

At thirteen years of age Ishmael was circumcised; that rite being then undergone by Abraham and all his household, as a seal of the covenant thus renewed. Abraham, in some doubt, it would seem, whether after all this son were not to be the heir of promise, prayed at the time, 'O that Ishmael might live before thee!' He was assured, however, that, though Ishmael should be the father of a great nation, yet the heir of promise should be a child to be born of Sarah (xvii.). It was a great privilege the being members of Abraham's family and included in Abraham's covenant; but Hagar and Ishmael were insensible of it. And, when Isaac was weaned, and the feast of joy was held, Ishmael, now a grown lad of fifteen or sixteen, mocked. The guilt, says Kalisch, was obvious: 'both had insulted those who ought to have been to them objects of respect and veneration: Hagar despised Sarah: Ishmael sneered at Isaac: the former boasted of her conception; the latter of his primogeniture: the one forgot the dignity of a prophet's wife; the other the higher promises vouchsafed to her son' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 437). The result was that Hagar and Ishmael were expelled from the encampment; and, though Abraham, whose affection for his son was strong, had supplied Hagar with bread and water, yet the two were soon destitute in the wilderness. Ishmael, still but a boy, was at once ready to sink. But again there was a divine interposition; and the assurance was re newed that Ishmael should multiply into a nation. He grew and became skilful in archery, dwelling in the wilderness of Paran. In due time his mother took him a wife from her own country, Egypt (Gen. xxi.). Little more is recorded of him. He joined with his brother Isaac in burying their father (xxv. 9). He had twelve sons, the heads of tribes, and he died 'in the presence of all his brethren,' his descendants dwelling 'from Havilah unto Shur that is before Egypt, as thou goest towards Assyria' (12-19). For some of the Arabian stories respecting Ishmael, see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., arts. 'Ismael,' 'Ismail ben Ibrahim.'

The descendants of Ishmael were mixed Arabian tribes; the purer Arabs boasting that they were the posterity of Joktan or, as they call the name, Kahtan (see JOKTAN). The proper settlements of the Ishmaelites were in the desert Arabia. They were therefore bounded in the east by Babylon and the Euphrates, extended in the north to Syria, spread in the west to Coele-syria and Palestine, and in the south indefinitely into the peninsula of Arabia proper. They lived, therefore, regularly indeed "to the east" of their Abrahamic brethren; but they extended their predatory excursions to the borders of all contiguous countries: their erratic mode of life gave them the character of ubiquity; they wandered wherever their wild spirits incited them; and thus they might be said to be always "before their brethren": they restlessly strayed through the greater part of Arabia Petraea, and reached not unfrequently even the borders of Egypt' (Kalisch, ubi supr., pp. 379, 380). The predictions in regard to Ishmael have, indeed, been wonderfully fulfilled. The wide conquests of the Saracens and the mode of life of the modern Bedouins alike testify to the truth of the prophetic word. The Bedouins are literally 'wild-ass-men': lawless, and despising the agricultural population, they live by plunder; their hand being lifted against every man. Nor have their habits, their mode of tent and desert life been changed for centuries; there they are, as described by every traveller, the living witness to the literal truth of the oracles of God.

2. One of the royal family of Judah, who treacherously murdered Gedaliah, appointed governor after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans (2 Kings xxv. 23, 25). Ishmael had with several followers joined Gedaliah. His base purposes were not unknown; for he had been tampered with by Baalis, king of the Ammonites; and Johanan warned Gedaliah against him. The governor, however, with generous but (as it proved) misplaced confidence, refused to credit Ishmael's treason. Accordingly Ishmael had full opportunity of perpetrating the atrocious act. He associated ten men with him, murdered Gedaliah and various other Jews, kept the massacre for a while secret, imposed on eighty persons who were bringing offerings, killed all of them as they entered the residence but ten, who bought their lives by disclosing where certain stores were treasured, and then carried off the rest of the people with the princesses to go into the land of Ammon. Johanan, however, hastily collected forces, pursued Ishmael, overtook him at 'the great waters,' probably the pool of Gibeon, and rescued the prisoners. Ishmael escaped with eight men to the Ammonites (Jer. xl. 7-16, xli.).

3. One of the descendants of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 38, ix. 44).—4. A chief of Judah (2 Chron. xix. 11).—5. One who joined Jehoiada in the successful attempt to place Joash on the throne of Judah (xxiii. 1).—6. A priest who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 22).

ISH'MAELITES (Judges viii. 24; 1 Chron. xxvii. 30; Psal. lxxiii. 6). Sometimes the actual descendants of Ishmael are meant by the term Ishmaelites; sometimes the appellation would seem to comprehend more generally the neighbouring Abrahamic tribes.

ISHMAI'AH (whom Jehovah hears). A chief of Zebulun in David's time (1 Chron. xxvii. 19).

ISH'MEELITES (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, xxxix. 1; 1 Chron. ii. 17). See ISHMAELITES.

ISH'MERAI (whom Jehovah keeps). A chieftain of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 18).

ISH'OD (man of glory). A descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 18).

ISH'PAN (eminent, or perhaps bald). A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. viii. 22).

ISH'TOB (men of Tob). The name of a small Syrian territory, the forces of which were employed by the Ammonites against David (2 Sam. x. 6, 8). But probably the district of TOB, which see, is meant; in the margin of our version we have 'the men of Tob.'

ISH'VAH (level). The second son of Asher (Gen. xli. 17). The same name is in our version spelt Isuah in 1 Chron. vii. 30: it does not appear in Numb. xxvi. 44.

ISH'VAI (id.). One of the sons of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 30), elsewhere called Isui and Jesui (Gen. xli. 17; Numb. xxvi. 44).

ISH'UI (id.). One of the sons of Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 49). He is not elsewhere mentioned: perhaps he was also called Abinadab: see 1 Chron. viii. 33, marg.

ISLE. The original word thus rendered has a wider meaning than our term isle or island. It is properly, according to Gesenius, habitable ground, dry land, as contrasted with water, the sea, rivers; and thus it is used in Isai. xlii. 15. Hence it signifies sea-coast, either the shore of a continent, or actually an island. Examples of its implying the coast of any country may be found in xx. 6, xxiii. 2, 6; Ezek. xxvii. 7: 'the isles of Elishah' being the coasts of Greece. But it is an island literally in Jer. ii. 10, xlvii. 4, marg.; Ezek. xxvii. 6; so too in Esth. x. 1, where there is an antithesis between islands and continent. In the plural the word occurs for maritime regions, especially beyond sea, that expression being sometimes added (Jer. xxv. 22); and so generally remote coasts and islands (Isai. xxiv. 15, xl. 15, xli. 1, 5, xlii. 4, 10, 12, xlix. 1, li. 5), particularly those of the Mediterranean (Psal. lxxii. 10; Dan. xi. 18). And these are sometimes specially called 'the islands of the sea' (Isai. xi. 11), 'the isles of the Gentiles' (Gen. x. 5; Zeph. ii. 11). IN Ezek. xxvii. 15 the Indian Archipelago is intended.

ISMACHI'AH (whom Jehovah upholds). An overseer of the offerings under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

ISMAEL.—1. (1 Esdr. ix. 22). Ishmael (Ezra x. 22).—2. (Judith ii. 23). Ishmael, the son of Abraham.

ISMAT'AH (whom Jehovah hears). A Gibeonite chief who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4).

IS'PAH (perhaps bold). A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. viii. 16).

IS'RAEL (warrior, prince, or soldier of God). A name specially bestowed on Jacob after his mysterious wrestling with God (Gen. xxxii. 28), and confirmed to him at Beth-el (xxxv. 10). It was, in consequence, the national appellation of his descendants (Exod. i. 1, iii. 16), and, though sometimes used in contradistinction to Judah (2 Sam. ii. 10, xix. 43), especially after the secession of the ten tribes (1 Kings xii. 20, xxii. 2), yet it was not entirely lost in the southern kingdom (2 Chron. xi. 3, xii. 6); and it was applied to the returned captives after the Babylonish exile (Ezra ii. 70, iii. 1).

The term is also sometimes used in a figurative sense to designate God's faithful people (Gal. vi. 16).

Israel grew from a family into a nation in Egypt. Their early history was a history of subjection and sorrow, so grievous and long-continued that they 'sighed' by reason of it; and they cried, and their cry came up unto God by reason of the bondage' (Exod. ii. 23). But it is 'good' for any one to 'bear the yoke in his youth' (Lam. iii. 27). And the early discipline of Israel was intended to prepare and fit them for the high place they were to hold among the nations. This point is well illustrated by Garbett, Divine Plan of Revelation, lect. v. pp. 272-358. They had promises of certain deliverance: they had the assurance that their fathers' God would give them an inheritance, where, secure from molestation, they should live and prosper in a most delightful land. A magnificent destiny was theirs as they left the house of bondage. They were enriched with the spoils of their late oppressors; the visible symbol of God guided them as they passed triumphantly through the Red sea, divided by a notable miracle (see RED SEA); and they had statutes and ordinances dictated to them, which if they and their children had regarded, they would have been blessed in their fair heritage for ever.

But they were a stiff-necked people; and God's great purpose, which, had they been obedient, he would have accomplished in one way, had to be carried out in another. In the wilderness they murmured and rebelled again and again. They were sentenced, therefore, to a forty years' sojourn in that desert, till the adult population had perished. This severe lesson might have been expected to tell on them. And, indeed, when they entered Canaan under Joshua, and set up their sacred tabernacle, and occupied cities which they did not build, and achieved victories by divine help over nations mightier than themselves, it did seem that now they would realize all that had been promised. But a fatal sloth soon enervated them; they did not push their conquests as they ought. And intercourse with the idolaters they spared perverted them: they began soon to worship their foul gods. So that the history of Israel during the years that they were under the government of judges records repeated backslidings and chastisements; bondage to the neighbouring nations being usually the mode of their punishment, till in their distress they cried to the Lord, and were delivered by some chosen instrument for a few years of prosperity, to be succeeded by the same melancholy round of sin, and correction, and piteous cry to the Lord whom they had dishonoured.

During the administration of the judges the Israelites were not knit into one compact body. The bond of connection between the tribes was loose; and the authority of the magistrate who ruled in one district was often hardly recognized in another. In the expressive language of their own chronicles, 'Every man did that which was right in his own eyes' (Judges xvii. 6). When at length they demanded a king, it cannot be doubted that the result was a more vigorous concentration of force. Hitherto all wars had been defensive, or rather struggles to escape from the yoke of invaders. But under Saul the Israelites began to be aggressive. They maintained themselves abreast of neighbouring nations, and, advancing into their territories, made conquests there. Saul's victories over the Amalekites, the Ammonites, the Edomites, the Syrians, and others are specially recorded (1 Sam. xiv. 47, 48).

Saul's policy made way for that of David. After a preliminary civil contest, in which Israel appears distinguished from and in opposition to Judah, the monarchy was reunited and consolidated; and then Israel took place as a great power of the world. Neighbouring countries were subdued, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Syria, made dependent provinces; and David's empire—for such it was—extended from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates (2 Sam. viii. 1-14). This splendid inheritance he transmitted to his son Solomon, who ruled with unexampled magnificence (1 Kings iv. 21, 24, x. 23). But the folly of Rehoboam shattered the Israelitish kingdom; and thenceforth Israel was the kingdom of (as it was called) the ten tribes, the fortunes of which must now be briefly detailed.

There had been for long a rivalry between the powerful and haughty Ephraimites and the imperial tribe of Judah, indications of which were from time to time visible (Judges viii. 1, xii. 1; 2 Sam. xix. 41-43); and, as the territory of Judah lay to the south, while that of Ephraim occupied the centre of Palestine, it was hardly to be expected that the house of Joseph would contentedly submit to the authority of a line of rulers of the tribe of Judah. With a view of conciliating the Ephraimites probably, the solemn inauguration of Rehoboam was to be in one of their chief cities—Shechem. But they were ready with their grievances to be redressed first; and they presented themselves under the ominous leadership of one of the house of Joseph, Jeroboam, whom even Solomon had feared, to demand satisfaction. The wisest statesmanship was needed at such a crisis. And it was not merely political discontent which manifested itself. It is evident that there was religious alienation. Ephraim and the other tribes did not choose to be bound to worship at Jerusalem. Accordingly, on the disruption, Jeroboam, to the high satisfaction, it would seem, of the mass of the people, appointed new feasts, and home-sanctuaries, and, as it would probably be thought, an unsectarian priesthood and mode of worship (1 Kings xii.). Here was the great line of demarcation between the two states into which the nation was split; this especially the principle of repulsion which forbade any future union. The priests and Levites and the more faithful servants of Jehovah poured from Israel into Judah (2 Chron. xi. 13-16); while from Judah proceeded divine messages condemning the apostasy of Israel (1 Kings xiii. 1-3); and it was not till the downfall of Israel as a kingdom that there was again any national gathering of the tribes at the sacred feasts (2 Chron. xxx., xxxiv. 6, 7, 9, xxxv. 1-19). It is true that a succession of great prophets lived in Israel, that schools of prophets were established there, that remarkable miracles were performed—the like to which were not seen in Judah. But all this was in conformity with God's usual dealings. He saw it necessary in his wisdom that, while the priesthood, and the ceremonies of the law, and the temple belonged to Judah, there must be special witnesses for him in Israel, if at all, amid the overflowing corruption, there was to be any remnant preserved 'according to the election of grace'—the more because of the nineteen, or, if Tibni be included, the twenty kings of Israel, not one was a godly man; all did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. This, then, must never be lost sight of: the animating principle of this kingdom, that which bound its parts together, that which no doubt was lauded as evincing a high degree of enlightenment and freedom from narrow prejudice, was its irreligion, its Baal-worship, its compliance with the customs of the nations round about, which effectually kept it in a state of antagonism to Judah; except when for a time, by a disastrous alliance and intermarriage of the house of Ahab with the house of David, solemnly rebuked by the Lord's prophets (ix. 1-3, xx. 35-37), Israel had leavened Judah with its own evil. The theocracy, though with many imperfections and backslidings, was yet upheld in Judah: it was nationally lost in Israel, which was thus held up by the prophets as a warning to the southern more faithful state (Hos. iv. 15).

The Lord had promised to give his servant David a light always before him in Jerusalem (1 Kings xi. 36). Yet Judah was to be the smallest of the two kingdoms. Israel is called the ten tribes; and it would seem that at first all the tribes, save Judah and Benjamin with the Levites, were included in it. But, as Simeon's inheritance lay interspersed within that of Judah, and Dan's half-overrun by the Philistines could be sheltered only by Judah, so ultimately it would seem that the northern kingdom comprised Asher, Naphtali, Zebulun, Issachar, Ephraim, western Manasseh, with the trans-Jordanic tribes of Reuben, Gad, and eastern Manasseh, encroaching probably somewhat upon the Benjaminitish territory. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible estimates its area at 9,375 square miles, and its population at about three millions and a-half (vol. i. p. 897). Of David's empire much, as the Syrian districts, had been lost; but for a time Edom was still subject to Judah, and Moab to Israel.

So far as respects fertility and beauty of scenery, the kingdom of Israel had greatly the advantage of its southern sister. 'Nearly through its whole extent,' says Drew, 'up from the boundary-line to the entrance of Hamath, and from the Sharon plains to beyond the mountains of the Hauran, it was wealthy, picturesque, fertile, and magnificent. Nearly all the features which realized the glowing descriptions of the promised land were comprised in this one of the two parts into which it was now divided' (Script. Lands, chap. vi. pp. 168, 169). But Judah was more defensible: east and west it could be reached only through mountain-passes, and southward it extended to the desert. And it was by no means weaker than Israel. For in the only great battle in which the two contended for several generations Judah had most decisively the victory (2 Chron. xiii. 3-18). Probably the more fertile soil of Israel fostered greater luxury among the people; while the easier access to neighbouring nations contributed both to the influx already noted of heathen practices and the inroads of heathen enemies. At first Jeroboam made Shechem his capital (1 Kings xii. 25): afterwards it would seem that Tirzah was the metropolis (xiv. 17, xv. 33, xvi. 8, 9, 15, 17, 18). Omri, at length, seeing the necessity of some fortress-city for the seat of power, fixed upon the hill of Samaria. His choice was amply justified. Beautiful for situation, Samaria could be well defended. It was repeatedly besieged; but it held out against the Assyrian power for three years (2 Kings xvii. 5); while Jerusalem itself was reduced by Nebuchadnezzar in a year and a half (xxv. 1-3).

The dynasties of Israelitish kings were frequently broken. Jeroboam was succeeded by his son; and then there was a revolution. Baasha, the new king, was succeeded by his son; and then there was another revolution. Omri, after the destruction of one or two temporary princes, transmitted the sceptre to his descendants. His son and two grandsons reigned, lamentably distinguished as the maintainers of Baal-worship. Then Jehu quenched their line in blood; and his posterity sat upon the throne to the fourth generation. But they were disastrous times. Repeatedly the Syrian power imposed the most humbling terms on Israel. There was now and then a breathing-time, and victories were gained over Syria; but the monarchy was surely sinking (1 Kings xv. 20, xx. 1-4; 2 Kings xiii. 3-7, 22-25, xiv. 25-28). Moab was lost (i. 1). And, besides the pressure from Syria, the great Assyrian monarchy began to make its supremacy felt. There would seem, too, to have been intervals of anarchy. And, when one after another the few remaining sovereigns appeared, nearly all obtaining the crown by blood, it was over a circumscribed territory that they reigned; for the northern districts were overrun and the people carried into captivity (xv. 29), and the trans-Jordanic tribes, or those that remained of them, in like manner (1 Chron. v. 26); and then at last, under Hoshea, in spite of the help he reckoned on from Egypt, Samaria fell, and multitudes of the people were transported into Assyria, their country being occupied by colonists from the east (2 Kings xvii. 6, 24). It was a mixed population that subsequently inhabited the land (see SAMARITANS); and, though many individuals of the various tribes returned after the fall of Babylon with their Jewish brethren, yet nationally Israel no more existed, a just punishment having fallen on them for their repeated idolatries and sins. Verily the way of transgressors is hard; and judgment must be executed on those who refuse to listen to the Lord's warning voice.

Conjecture has been very busy as to the localities in which the descendants of Israel are to be now found; and there is scarcely a country in the world that some theorist has not fixed on for their present home. Into speculations of this kind the present work cannot enter: see CAPTIVITY, p. 141.

The following list of the kings of Israel may be found useful: between each dynasty a line is drawn. Another list, showing the contemporaneous sovereigns of Judah, will be found in the article KINGS, which see.

The length of time which the Israelitish kingdom lasted has been variously estimated by different biblical critics. Keil exhibits the dates assigned by several of the most eminent (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. pp. 204-208). He himself would fix on somewhat upwards of 253 years: Winer supposes 255.

ISRAELITE. One of the nation of Israel (Lev. xxiv. 10; 2 Sam. xvii. 25; John i. 47; Rom. ix. 4, xi. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22), and feminine (Lev. xxiv. 10, 11). The word is sometimes used in a higher sense, as indicating the spiritual character which one so designated ought to bear (John i. 47).

ISS'ACHAR (there is reward, or he brings reward or wages).—1. One of the sons of Jacob by Leah (Gen. xxx. 17, 18). We have no information whatever of this patriarch's personal character or history. At the going down into Egypt he is said to have had four sons, who multiplied into the four great families of the tribe; the numbers at the first census being 54,400, while at the last (before the passage of the Jordan) they were 64,300 (xlv. 13; Numb. i. 28, 29, xxvi. 23-25). In the camp the position of Issachar was next to Judah, on the east of the tabernacle (ii. 5, 6). The prophetic blessing of Jacob on this tribe corresponds with that of Moses; the one comparing it to a strong ass 'crouching between the folds' (so Kalisch renders), pleased with rest and ready to become a tributary servant (Gen. xlix. 14, 15); the other speaking of its home-life, in close connection with Zebulun (Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19).

The territory assigned to Issachar was just such as to promise domestic ease. Hilly towards the east and south, in the central part lay that most fertile plain of Esdraelion almost proverbial for richness and beauty. The boundaries we may gather from Josh. xix. 17-23. The frontier-line commenced on the west of the Jordan, somewhat to the south of Beth-shan; then passing under Gilboa it swept round the base of the mountains of Ephraim, to Engannim: whence it ran north-westward to the foot of Carmel, crossed the Kishon, and went easterly by Tabor to the Jordan valley below the lake of Gennesaret. Sixteen cities are said to be comprised within these limits: only fifteen, however, are named in the place above cited; some of them, as Jezreel, Shunem, and Engannim, being of special note. Four cities (one Dabareh, or Daberath, being named in addition to those before enumerated) were allotted from this tribe to the Levites of the family of Gershon (xxi. 28, 29; 1 Chron. vi. 72, 73). Besides, there were five towns, Beth-shan, En-dor, Ibleam, Megiddo, and Taanach, territorially in Issachar, which yet belonged to western Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11: see however 1 Chron. vii. 29).

This tribe materially assisted in the victory of Barak over Sisera (Judges v. 15); but afterwards we hear little of their warlike exploits. They multiplied largely; for in David's time the total number fit for military service, taken probably by Joab, was 145,600 (1 Chron. vii. 1-5). Of these 36,000 are said to have been 'bands of soldiers for war.' It is not quite clear what is intended by this expression. A writer in Dr. Smith's Diet. of the Bible (vol. i. p. 902) believes them to have been marauding mercenary troops. This, however, is quite foreign to the general character of the tribe; and, though the word translated 'bands' certainly often means such troops, yet it is used to designate angels (Job xxv. 3), to whom such an idea is by no means applicable. Perhaps the 'bands' of Issachar were those of the tribe not merely fit for military service but actually trained for war. It is character-tic that, when other tribes joined David at Hebron in large bodies, only 200 of Issachar resorted thither. They had their brethren at their disposal; but they were counsellors rather than warriors, 'men that had understanding . . . to know what Israel ought to do' (1 Chron. xii. 32). The descendants of Issachar 'were men,' says Kalisch, 'of prudence and wise calculation. Having, therefore, gained abundant wealth and resolved to enjoy it, they pursued a domestic and foreign policy calculated to realize this end. Their shrewdness not only enabled them safely to keep aloof from all external dangers, and . . . peacefully to yield themselves to secure tranquility, but to win the esteem and deference of the fraternal tribes by useful and valuable councils' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 754). Thus Issachar 'bowed his shoulder to bear,' and seems to have placed himself under the protection of a more active tribe, such as Zebulun, with whom he is generally linked, and whose territory joined his own. Yet there were some rulers of this tribe. Among the judges Tola was a man of Issachar, though he dwelt in Ephraim (Judges x. 1, 2). And one of the kings, the ferocious Baasha, was of Issachar also. He destroyed the whole family of Jeroboam, but walked in his evil ways; though, therefore, he left his throne to his son Elah, yet a disastrous message came to him by the prophet Jehu; and in two short years judgment was executed upon the house of Baasha, and neither kinsman nor friend of his doomed race was left (1 Kings xv. 27-34, xvi. 1-14). Somewhat more is recorded of Issachar. Men of that tribe humbled themselves in the days of Hezekiah, and at his invitation repaired to Jerusalem to the great passover (2 Chron. xxx. 10, 11, 18). A few years more, and Issachar was carried captive into Assyria.

2. A Levite porter (1 Chron. xxvi. 5).
ISSHIAH (whom Jehovah lends).—1. A Levite descended from Moses (1 Chron. xxiv. 21). He is called Jeshaiah in xxvi. 25.
 —2. A Kohathite Levite descended from Uziah (xxiv. 25). He is called Jesiah in xxiii. 20.

ISSUE. This appears to mean a milder form of gonorrhœa (Lev. xv. 2-15, xxii. 4; Numb. v. 2; 2 Sam. iii. 29). The severer character of the disease is generally said to have manifested itself first in the fifteenth century; but it seems likely that its virulence has varied in different climates. The monthly courses of females are also referred to (Lev. xv. 19-30), both ordinary, and protracted (25) to a morbid extent. Certain ritual observances were prescribed, after the disease had ceased, before the individual was purified. See BLOOD, ISSUE OF.

ISTALCU'RUS (1 Esdr. viii. 40). A strange perversion of Zabbud or Zaccur (Ezra viii. 14).

IS'UAH (level). The second son of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 30). See ISHUAH.

IS'UI (id.). The third son of Asher (Gen. xli. 17). See JESUI, ISHUAI.

ITALIAN BAND (Acts x. 1). A cohort not levied in Syria (though probably the body-guard of the Roman procurator of that province), but composed of volunteers from Italy.

IT'ALY. The well-known country between the Alps and the straits of Messina. The name was at first applied to the southern part of the peninsula, but in New Testament times it included all that we understand by Italy now. Italy is repeatedly mentioned by the sacred writers (Acts xviii. 2, xxvii. 1; Heb. xiii. 24); Judea being then a dependency of imperial Rome. There must, therefore, have been a continual intercourse between Palestine and Italy; and a large body of Jews was attracted to the last-named country.

ITCH (Deut. xxviii. 27). The original word embodies the idea of scraping or scratching; the disease intended was probably therefore some feverish cutaneous eruption.

IT'HAI (with the Lord). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 31). He is called Itai in 2 Sam. xxiii. 29.

IT'HAMAR (palm-coast). The youngest son of Aaron (Exod. vi. 23; Numb. xxvi. 60; 1 Chron. vi. 3), consecrated with his father and brethren to the priesthood (Exod. xxviii. 1). He had first in charge the reckoning of the articles made for the tabernacle (xxxviii. 21). On the death of Nadab and Abihu, he and his elder brother Eleazar received a strict command to show no outward signs of mourning, but to perform their priestly office (Lev. x. 6, 12, 16; Numb. iii. 2-4). Ithamar was specially to superintend the Gershonites and Merarites (iv. 28, 33, vii. 8). Originally the high-priesthood was in the family of Eleazar; but afterwards it passed, we know not why, or how, or when, into that of Ithamar; Eli being of his house. In the person of Zadok it returned to Eleazar's line; the prophecy against Eli being then fulfilled (1 Sam. ii. 30-36; 1 Kings ii. 35). In David's reign, when the courses of the priests were arranged, the descendants of Ithamar were found less numerous than those of Eleazar (1 Chron. xxiv. 1-6). One of his house is mentioned as returning from captivity (Ezra viii. 2).

IT'HIEL (God with me).—1. A Benjaminite (Neh. xi. 7).—2. An unknown person to whom Agur delivered his discourse (Prov. xxx. 1).

IT'HMAH (orphanhood). A Moabite, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 46).

IT'H'NAN (bestowed). A city of Judah in the extreme south (Josh. xv. 23). Mr. Wilton would connect Ithnan with Hazor preceding it, and supposes that Hazar-ithnan was originally a Horite settlement, perhaps occupied by Ithran, and this settlement he identifies with el-Hhora (The Negeb, pp. 81-85), no great distance east of Beer-sheba.

IT'H'RA (excellence). The father of Amasa (2 Sam. xvii. 25). See JETHER, 3.

IT'H'RAM (id.).—1. One of the descendants of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26).—2. A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 37). Possibly he is the same with Jether (38).

IT'H'REAM (abundance of people). One of David's sons born at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chron. iii. 3).

IT'H'RITE. The designation of two of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 38). The Ithrites are said to be one of the families of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. ii. 53). They may have been the descendants of some one named Jether, or possibly from Jattir.

IT'TAH-KA'ZIN (time of the judge). A border-town of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 13).

IT'TAI (with the Lord).—1. An officer of David, denominated 'the Gittite,' most probably because he was a native of Gath, and had joined David when with Achish in that city. He faithfully maintained his allegiance to his Hebrew lord. And, when David's dark days were come, and he was obliged to flee from Jerusalem in Absalom's rebellion, and scarcely more than his household troops accompanied him. Ittai was there. The monarch expressed his gratified surprise. But why should the Gittite, who had been comparatively a little while in Israel, be dragged down by his misfortunes? He had better return to his place, and mercy and truth should be with him. But Ittai would not fail David: in life or in death he would be faithful to him. And then David replied, we may be sure with thankfulness to God, 'Go and pass over.' And Ittai marched on with his troop, and 'the little ones,' no doubt the families of the band (2 Sam. xv. 19-22). We only hear of Ittai again as in command of part of the army in the battle (xviii. 2, 5, 12).—2. A Benjamite warrior (xxiii. 29), called also Ithai (1 Chron. xi. 31).

ITURE'A, or ITURÆ'A. A province which appears to have derived its name from Jetur, one of the sons of Ishmael, whose descendants settled in this locality (Gen. xxv. 15). But, after the people of Israel had received their inheritance, the trans-Jordanic tribes attacked the Hagarites (as Ishmael's posterity were called), on what ground is not stated, clearly, however, with the divine sanction, and overcame them; and their country was possessed by the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. v. 18-23). But for their own apostasy the Israelites were afterwards carried into captivity, and their land became a part of the Assyrian empire (25, 26). The Ishmaelites were not entirely rooted out from Iturea; for, when Aristobulus king of the Jews re-conquered it in the second century before Christ, and gave the inhabitants the alternative of exile or accepting Judaism, many preferred the first. Iturea was subsequently made a part of the dominions of Herod the Great, who bequeathed it with some adjoining territories to his son Philip. It is a small province, bounded on the west by Hermon, on the south by Galanitis, on the north by the plain of Damascus, and on the east by Trachonitis. It consists of table-land, with an undulating surface, the northern part covered with jagged basaltic rocks, as if molten lava had been forced up through the ground, had spread itself around, and been torn and dislocated in cooling. The southern district is rich and well-watered. The towns and villages this province contains are poor and desolate. Its modern name is Jedâr.

IVAH (overturning, ruin, or possibly the name of a Babylonian god, Iva, representing the sky or ether). A city in Babylonia, mentioned as having been subdued, in spite of its gods, by the Assyrian power (2 Kings xviii. 34, xix. 13; Isai. xxxvii. 13). It appears to be the same with Ava, from which colonists were brought into Samaria (2 Kings xvii. 24). It was very probably the modern Hit, lying on the Euphrates, and noted for bitumen springs. Perhaps Ivah may be the Ahava of Ezra (Ezra viii. 15, 21, 31).

IVORY. This substance is denoted sometimes by the single Hebrew word shên, tooth, sometimes by a compound word shên-habbim, about the exact meaning of which there is some doubt. Possibly it is made up of shên, and a foreign word signifying elephant. Ivory is the substance of the tusks of the elephant (1 Kings x. 22); and we find it mentioned as an article of Tyrian commerce (Ezek. xxvii. 15). It was largely used in ornamental work (Rev. xviii. 12). Solomon had a throne of ivory overlaid with gold (1 Kings x. 18). Ahab is said to have made an ivory house (xxii. 39), probably a palace, of which the walls were inlaid with ivory (comp. Psal. xlv. 8); though perhaps in this last-named place ivory perfume-boxes may be intended. Beds or couches were also inlaid with this material (Amos vi. 4); and many specimens yet preserved of Assyrian and Egyptian ivory-work sufficiently show the uses to which it was put.

IZ'EBEL (1 Kings xviii. 4, marg.). Jezebel.

IZ'ECHAR (oil) (Numb. iii. 19). See IZHAR, of which name it is another form.

IZ'ECHARITES (Numb. iii. 27). See IZHARITES.

IZ'HAR (oil). One of the sons of Kohath, and grandson of Levi (Exod. vi. 18, 21; Numb. xvi. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 2, 18, 38, xxiii. 12, 18). But in vi. 22 Amminadab is substituted for Izhar. This may be the error of a copyist.

IZ'HARITES. A Levitical family descended from Izhar (1 Chron. xxiv. 22, xxvi. 23, 29).

IZRAHI'AH (whom Jehovah brings forth). A chieftain of Issachar (1 Chron. vii. 3).

IZ'RAHITE. Shambuth, one of David's military officers, is thus designated (1 Chron. xxvii. 8); perhaps it is for ZERAHITE, or ZARHITE, which see.

IZ'Ri (the Izrite, or Jeserite). The head of a division of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 11). He is also called Zeri (3).

J.

JA'AKAN (he twists, he shall surround like a necklace, i.e. he shall be the glory of his parents) (Deut. x. 6). See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN. The name is the same with that given as Jakan in 1 Chron. i. 42.

JAAKO'BAH (heel-catcher, supplanter). A chieftain of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 36).

JA'ALA, JA'ALAH (a wild she-goat). One of Solomon's servants, whose descendants returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58).

JA'ALAM (whom God hides). One of Esau's sons, a chief or 'duke' of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. i. 35).

JA'ANAI (whom Jehovah answers). A chieftain of Gad (1 Chron. v. 12).

JA'ARE-O'REGIM (forests of the weavers).

A Beth-lehemite, whose son Elhanan is said to have killed the brother of Goliath (2 Sam. xxi. 19). But in 1 Chron. xx. 5 he is called Jair. Perhaps Oregim, weavers, occurring as it does rightly at the end of the verse in the first-named place, may have been written twice by mistake, and the name be properly Jair.

JA'ASAU (whom Jehovah has made). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 37).

JAAS'EL (whom God has made). The son of Abner, a chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron. xxvii. 21).

JAAZANI'AH (whom Jehovah hears).—1.

One of the captains who, with Johanah, joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 Kings xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8, where he is called Jezeniah). He most probably aided in recovering those whom Ishmael carried off after the murder of Gedaliah, and with them went down to Egypt (Jer. xli. 11-18, xliii. 1). In xliii. 2 he is called Azariah.—2. A Rechabite, probably chief of the tribe (xxxv. 3).—3. One whom Ezekiel saw, with seventy elders, worshipping abominable idols (Ezek. viii. 11).—4. One of the princes of the people, against whom Ezekiel was directed to prophesy (xi. 1). Possibly he may be identical with no. 3).

JA'AZER (whom he, i.e. God, helps). A city of the Amorites (Numb. xxi. 32), which was conquered and assigned to the tribe of Gad (xxxii. 35), and afterwards allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 39); it seems, however, in David's reign, to have been occupied by Kohathites (1 Chron. xxvi. 31), Hebron being a son of Kohath. In later times Jaazer had fallen into the hands of the Moabites, and is repeatedly mentioned in the prophetic denunciations against Moab (Isa. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32), in connection with the vine of Sibmah. A sea of Jaazer, too, is spoken of: this may be some lake or pool in the neighbourhood; or it may be the not-distant Dead sea. Jaazer appears to have been twelve or fifteen miles from Heshbon; but its site has not been fully identified. The name often appears as JAZER, which see.

JAAZI'AH (whom Jehovah consoles). A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron. xlv. 26, 27).

JAAZI'EL (whom God consoles). A Levite porter, most probably the same with Aziel, a musician (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20).

JA'BAL (a stream). The son of Lamech, of the line of Cain, described as 'the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle' (Gen. iv. 20). He probably led a nomad or migratory life.

JAB'BOK (a pouring out). A brook or river, rising in the eastern uplands of Gilead, and flowing into the Jordan about half-way between the lake of Tiberias and the Dead sea. It was after Jacob had passed to the south bank of the Jabbok that his brother Esau met him; the mysterious wrestling with God having just occurred (Gen. xxxii. 22, 23). Jabbok is subsequently spoken of as the border of the children of Ammon (Numb. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 37, iii. 16; Josh. xii. 2; Judges xi. 13, 22). It would seem that the territory of Ammon once extended as far north as this stream, but that Sihon drove them beyond the Arnon; and then, when Israel conquered Sihon, they also took possession of the territory between the two rivers; Jabbok, however, still retaining the name of the Ammonite border. And the Ammonites had lingered in the neighbourhood. For, on Sihon's conquest, some of them retreated to the mountains where the Jabbok rises, and established themselves in their strong defiles: these places Israel did not touch; and here was their capital, Rabbath-ammon. The Jabbok is now called the Zurka, or blue river: it receives several tributaries, most or all of them winter-torrents. It runs through Gilead in a deep defile: its upper banks are clothed with oak-forests, and below with oleander and cane. In the winter it is a considerable stream.

JA'BESH (dry). The father of Shallum, one of the kings of Israel (2 Kings xv. 10, 13, 14).

JA'BESH (id.). A town generally called Jabesh-gilead, seated on a mountain east of the Jordan. The inhabitants seem to have been an independent race. They would not join in the crusade against Benjamin; and for this the whole male population were devoted to destruction (Judges xxi. 8-14). Yet Jabesh survived and recovered its importance. And, when it was besieged by Nabash, king of Ammon, the Israelites rose under Saul to rescue it (1 Sam. xi. 1-11). Gratefully did the people of Jabesh remember and requite the kindness Saul had shown them. A bold troop stole down by night and took the bodies of Saul and his sons from the wall of Bethshan, where, after the fatal field of Gilboa, they were exposed, and buried them, and fasted (xxi. 11-13; 1 Chron. x. 11, 12)—a service which David thankfully acknowledged (2 Sam. ii. 4-6), though he afterwards removed the bones to the sepulchre of Kish (xxi. 12-14). The ruin ed-Deir, on the south of Wady Yabes, is supposed to mark the site of Jabesh-gilead.

JA'BEZ (he causes pain). A person named among the posterity of Judah, remarkable for his prayer and for the gracious answer to it (1 Chron. iv. 9, 10).

JA'BEZ (id.). A place where some families of scribes resided, who appear to have been Kenites (1 Chron. ii. 55). Jewish tradition supplies some strange conjectures respecting it.

JA'BIN (whom he, i.e. God, observes).—1. A king of Hazor, who headed a confederacy of northern chiefs against Joshua: they were entirely defeated; and Joshua, turning back to Hazor, whither perhaps Jabin had escaped, destroyed that city, making a special example of it, and slew the king (Josh. xi. 1-13, xii. 19).—2. Another king, of Canaan he is called, into whose hands for twenty years the Israelites were delivered for their sins. Hazor, it would seem, had been re-built, and was the residence of the second Jabin. Sisera was the captain of his host, over which a mighty victory was gained by Deborah and Barak; and Jabin was destroyed (Judges iv.; Psal. lxxxiii. 9). Some critics have chosen to imagine the two Jabin but one, defeated by both Joshua and Barak. Most justly does Winer record his indignant protest against such a mode of dealing with history (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Jabin').

JAB'NEEL (God lets build).—1. A town on the border of Judah (Josh. xv. 11). It appears afterwards to have been occupied by the Philistines, for (under the name of Jabneh), it was one of the places which Uzziah dismantled (2 Chron. xxvi. 6). It was known as Jamnia in Maccabean history (1 Macc. iv. 15), and was noted as a school of learning after the fall of Jerusalem. Here, according to Jewish tradition, Gamaliel was buried. The modern name is Yebna, on a hill two miles from the sea and eleven south of Jaffa. It contains about 3,000 people, all agriculturists, with threshing-floors ranged all round the town.—2. A town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). Its position is uncertain.

JAB'NEH (he lets build) (2 Chron. xxvi. 6). See the preceding article, no. 1.

JA'CHAN (afflicted). A chieftain of Gad (1 Chron. v. 13).

JA'CHIN (whom he, i.e. God, makes firm).—1. The fourth son of Simeon (Gen. xli. 10; Exod. vi. 15; Numb. xxvi. 12): he is also called Jarib (1 Chron. iv. 24).—2. A priest after the captivity (ix. 10; Neh. xi. 10).—3. The head of one of the courses of priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 17). Perhaps the name no. 2 means the representative of this course.

JA'CHIN (id.). One of the columns set up in or before the porch of Solomon's temple (1 Kings vii. 21; 2 Chron. iii. 17). It was on the right hand, that is, to the south (1 Kings vii. 39). See BOAZ, TEMPLE.

JA'CHINITES. The family descended from Jachin, son of Simeon (Numb. xxvi. 12).

JACINTH. One of the precious stones enumerated (Rev. xxi. 20) as forming the foundations of the New Jerusalem: it is identical with that elsewhere called 'figure' (Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12). It is said to be a red variety of zircon. There is no reference to the gem in Rev. ix. 17: the word is there used simply as descriptive of colour, a dull dark-reddish or purple hue.

JA'COB (heel-catcher, supplanter).—1. The second of the twin-sons of Isaac and Rebekah, born when their father was sixty years old (Gen. xxv. 26).

As the brothers grew up the difference of their characters was soon manifested. Esau was 'a man of the field': 'Jacob was a plain man dwelling in tents' (27). Esau was the chief favourite of his father; but 'Rebekah loved Jacob.' Jacob was quiet, fearful, and submissive to those who had acquired an influence over him, but selfish, and not scrupulous as to the means by which he gained anything he desired. The first action of his mentioned in scripture does not tell well for him. Esau had come in faint from hunting; and Jacob would give him his pottage only on condition that Esau resigned to him the birth-right. The reckless hunter, perhaps without much thought, agreed to the bargain; and so Jacob purchased that chiefship of the tribe (29-34), involving temporal and spiritual pre-eminence, which indeed it had been said before the children's birth should belong to the younger, but which God could and would have given to Jacob of his own gracious pleasure, without the intervention of any questionable expedient. Jacob's next recorded conduct is still more to be censured. At the instigation of his mother he obtained his father's blessing by deceit: Isaac, however, confirmed it to him even after he became sensible how he had been imposed on (xxvii.). But it was necessary now for Jacob to flee from his brother Esau's vengeance; and Rebekah desired him to go to Padan-aram, which Isaac, ignorant of Esau's threats, sanctioned also, in order that Jacob might marry with his own kindred, and not imitate his brother by taking a wife of the daughters of Canaan. On his solitary journey Jacob was favoured with a divine vision at a place to which he gave in consequence the name of Beth-el; and here, perhaps for the first time, his heart was lifted above mere worldly thoughts, and he took and acknowledged the Lord for his God (xxviii.).

His subsequent history at Padan-aram may be read in the later chapters of Genesis—his love for Rachel, his servitude of seven years for her hand, the cruel deception practised on him, his taking both Leah and Rachel for wives, the birth of his eleven sons and one daughter by these wives and their dotal slaves, his continued service with Laban, and the means, evincing probably some of the old craft of his natural character, by which he became rich, till his departure, unknown to Laban, for the land of Canaan. Laban pursued him in anger, but was forbidden by a divine warning to do Jacob any harm; and the two parted with a friendly covenant. The time Jacob spent in Padan-aram is generally estimated at twenty years; and then he must have been seventy-eight when he left his father's house. But it has been imagined by some critics that in xxxi. 38, 41 he speaks of two different terms of twenty years each: if this be so, he was fifty-eight when he went to Padan-aram and ninety-eight when he left that country. After Laban's departure Jacob had a fresh fear: his brother Esau might avenge himself for the ancient grudge. Jacob therefore sends him a humble message, and beseeches the Lord's protection in a prayer, almost the first recorded in scripture, which may well serve as a model for all special supplications. He had a gracious answer; and in a visible manifestation of the Deity he was assured that he had power with God to prevail; and a new covenant-name, Israel (warrior, or soldier of God), was bestowed upon him, to be the appellation of his seed for ever, the name of blessing which was to designate God's church through countless generations (xxxii.). The brothers met in peace; and Jacob re-entred Canaan.

Here peculiar trials awaited him. Benjamin was born; but Rachel died: the ill-conduct of his sons alarmed and distressed him: Joseph his darling was lost; and the aged patriarch was sorely chastened; the trial touching him in his tenderest part. Though, as we have seen, naturally selfish, he loved warmly where he did love—Rachel, Joseph, Benjamin. The first two were taken from him; and in the famine, when he must send down for food to Egypt, Benjamin was demanded. We cannot wonder that his faith well-nigh failed: 'All these things,' he cried, 'are against me.' Yet God was chastening him in mercy, purging out his dross. Jacob had no doubt experienced this when in his deep sorrow for Rachel he had changed the infant's name from Ben-oni to Benjamin, from a memorial of grief to a name of strength, a name of gladness and of power (xxxv.). With his sorrows he had doubtless their divine consolation. And yet more: his long-lost Joseph was discovered to be the lord of Egypt; and the patriarch and his household went down thither, to be kept under God's shelter till his posterity grew into a nation. He saw and blessed Joseph's sons, and, having predicted the fortunes of the tribes, he died in peace at one hundred and forty-seven years of age; his body being carried into Canaan, to hold it (with the bones of Abraham and Isaac) in pledge, till in the fulness of the time his seed should come to possess it for their pleasant heritage (xlii., xlv.-l.).

In after-days, and in later books of scripture, Jacob's name is mentioned with honour, as one that had the promises, and the selfish supplanter mercifully pardoned and sanctified and made a venerated head of God's people.

2. The father of Joseph, the Virgin's husband (Matt. i. 15, 16).

JACOB'S WELL. The well by which our Lord held his interesting conversation with the Samaritan woman. He was passing through Samaria on his way to Galilee, and being wearied with his journey 'sat thus on the well,' that is to say, as a weary man would. This well was near to Sychar, in the ground which Jacob had purchased of the sons of Hamor. There Joseph was buried; and the children of Joseph had it for their inheritance (Gen. xxxiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32; John iv. 5, 6). There is no reason to question the identity of the well at present known as Jacob's. It is about two miles from Shechem or Nablous, dug in a firm rock about seventy-five feet deep, and nine feet in diameter. But it is now deserted; and the surrounding terrace of rude masonry has been broken down; so that there is nothing striking in the aspect of it. See SYCHAR.

JACUB'BUS (1 Esdr. ix. 48). Akkub (Neh. vii. 7).

JA'DA (knowing, wise). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 28, 32).

JA'DAU (loving). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 43).

JAD'DUA (known).—1. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 21).—2. A Jewish high priest, whose name is given in the genealogy recorded in the book of Nehemiah (xii. 11, 22). This genealogy may be supposed a later addition to the book; for the Darius spoken of as 'the Persian' is perhaps the last Persian monarch of the name, conquered by Alexander the Great: see DARIUS, 2. According to Josephus (Antiq., lib. xi. 8, §§ 1-5), Jaddua went to meet the conqueror, who visited Jerusalem in peace and conferred various privileges on the Jews. There are circumstances, no doubt, with which this story is embellished, but the main fact is not unlikely to be true. Jaddua is said to have held the high priest hood twenty years, and probably to have survived Alexander.

JA'DON (judge). A person who took part in building the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 7).

JA'EL (mountain-goat). The wife of Heber the Kenite, a nomad chief who, having separated from the body of his tribe, was camping near to Kedesh. There was a treaty of peace between him and Jabin king of Canaan; so that Sisera, when defeated and flying from Barak, thought himself safe if he could but reach the Kenite encampment. He left his chariot, therefore, and, to escape observation, sought the friendly shelter on foot. He was welcomed by Jael, introduced into her own, that is, the women's tent, and, the more effectually to hide him, covered over with some article of dress or furniture. When he asked, in his thirst, for water, she proffered him curded milk or buttermilk, a refreshing beverage, and at least seemed to acquiesce in his request that, if any of his pursuers wandered near, she would say she had not seen him. Sisera having tasted food at her hand might well feel safe: he dropped to sleep; and then Jael, taking one of the tent-pins and a mallet, struck it through his temples and pinned him to the earth. She immediately went to find Barak, and brought him to see the Canaanitish general dead (Judges iv. 11, 17-22). Nothing can excuse this deed, unless a special command were received from God to destroy the enemy of Israel; and that no such command was received we may conclude from Jael's dissimulation and the stealthy way in which she committed the murder. The expression in Deborah's song (v. 24-27), while extolling the deliverance obtained and the boldness of the Kenite woman, which would doubtless long be commemorated, by no means asserts the moral rectitude of the deed performed. Some have supposed the Jael of v. 6 another person; but this is very unlikely.

JA'GUR (lodging-place). A town of Judah to the extreme south (Josh. xv. 21). Wilton, proposing a different reading of this word, and connecting it with the following name Kinah, calls it Hazar-kinah, and supposes it the ruined site el-Hud-hairah, the main encampment of the Jehalim, an Arab tribe (The Negeb, pp. 74-76).

JAH (Psal. lxxviii. 3). A poetic form of JEHOVAH, which see.

JA'HATH (perhaps union).—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 2).—2. A Levite of the family of Gershon (vi. 20, 43).—3. Another chief of the same family in David's time (xxiii. 10, 11).—4. A Levite of the Kohathite family (xxiv. 22).—5. A Levite of the family of Merari, in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12).

JA'HAZ (a place trodden down). A place where the decisive battle was fought between the Israelites and Sihon, which resulted in the occupation of the district between the Arnon and the Jabbok (Numb. xxi. 23, 24; Deut. ii. 32; Judges xi. 20). It was allotted to the tribe of Reuben, and afterwards assigned to the Levites of the family of Merari; but at a later period it seems to have been in the possession of Moab (Isai. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 34). Jahaz lay probably just north of the Arnon; but it has not yet been quite satisfactorily identified. It is called also Jahaza (Josh. xiii. 18), Jahazah (xxi. 36; Jer. xlviii. 21), and Jahzah (1 Chron. vi. 78).

JA'HAZA, JA'HAZAH (id.) (Josh. xiii. 18, xxi. 36; Jer. xlviii. 21). See the preceding article.

JAHAZI'AH (whom Jehovah beholds). One who took part with Ezra in investigating the cases of marriage with foreign wives (Ezra x. 15).

JAHA'ZIEL (whom God beholds).—1. A Benjamite chief, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4).—2. A priest whom David appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark (xvi. 6).—3. A Kohathite Levite (xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23).—4. A Levite of the sons of Asaph, inspired to encourage Jehoshaphat when marching against the Moabites and Ammonites (2 Chron. xx. 14-17).—5. One whose son was the chief of the sons of Shechaniah, who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 5).

JAH'DAI (whom Jehovah directs). A name in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 47).

JAH'DIEL (whom God makes joyful). A chief of Manasseh beyond the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).

JAH'DO (his union). A Gadite (1 Chron. 7. 14).

JAH'LEEL (hoping in God). One of the sons of Zebulun (Gen. xlvii. 14; Numb. xxvi. 26).

JAH'LEELITES. A family of Zebulun descended from Jahleel (Numb. xxvi. 26).

JAH'MAI (whom Jehovah guards). One of Issachar's posterity (1 Chron. vii. 2).

JAH'ZAH (a place trodden down) (1 Chron. vi. 78). See JAHAZ.

JAH'ZEEL (whom God allots). A son of Naphtali (Gen. xlvii. 24; Numb. xxvi. 48). He is called Jahziel in 1 Chron. vii. 13.

JAH'ZEELITES. A family of Naphtali, descended from Jahzeel (Numb. xxvi. 48).

JAH'ZERAH (whom God leads back). One of the priests (1 Chron. ix. 12). He may be the person called Alasai in Neh. xi. 13).

JAH'ZIEL (whom God allots) (1 Chron. vii. 13). See JAHZEEL.

JA'IR (whom God enlightens).—1. The grandson of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah, and of the daughter of Machir, a distinguished descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. ii. 21-23). Jair is hence sometimes called the son of Manasseh. He took the district of Argob (Trachonitis), and many villages of Gilead, which he called Havoth-jair, the villages of Jair (Numb. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xiii. 30).—2. A Gileadite, who judged Israel twenty-two years. He had thirty sons, who possessed thirty places in Gilead, also called Havoth-jair (Judges x. 3-5). Possibly this judge was a descendant of no. 1.—3. A Benjamite, father of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).

JA'IR (whom God awakes). The father of Elhanan, who killed Lahmi, Goliath's brother (1 Chron. xx. 5). This Jair is also called Jaare-oregim (2 Sam. xxi. 19).

JA'IRITE. A descendant of the first Jair, 1 (2 Sam. xx. 26).

JA'IRUS (the Greek form of Jair, probably the first). The father of a young girl whom our Lord restored to life (Matt. ix. 18-26; Mark v. 22-24, 35-43; Luke xlii. 41, 42, 49-56). Jairus was ruler of a synagogue.

JA'TRUS (Rest of Esth. xi. 2). Jair, Mordecai's father.

JA'KAN (he twists; see JAAKAN). One of the sons of Ezer the Horite (1 Chron. i. 42). He is called Akan in Gen. xxxvi. 27.

JA'KEH (pious). The father of Agur, whose words are recorded in Prov. xxx. Nothing is known of him; and consequently conjecture has been busy. Some would alter the text: some would suppose a symbolical meaning. But their guesses cannot be recorded here.

JA'KIM (whom God sets up).—1. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 19).—2. The head of one of the courses of the priests (xxiv. 12).—3. A marginal reading of Matt. i. 11, where it means Jehoiakim.

JA'LON (passing the night, abiding). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 17).

JAM'BRES (2 Tim. iii. 8). See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

JAM'BRI (1 Macc. ix. 36, 37). The name of a tribe who had attacked the Jews in the Maccabean wars. Nothing is certainly known of them.

JAMES.—1. The son of Zebedee and Salome, one of the twelve apostles.

Zebedee was a fisherman, plying his trade on the sea of Galilee, and was therefore, no doubt, a resident in one of the towns or villages close upon the margin of that lake. According to an old tradition he lived at Japhia, a little to the south of Nazareth but this place must have been too far from the water: it is therefore more probable that Zebedee with his two sons, James and John, belonged to Bethsaida, which we know was the town of Andrew and Peter their partners (John i. 44). Zebedee was a man, it appears, of some property; for besides his sons he employed hired labourers in his fishery (Mark i. 20). John, it is likely, was one of the two disciples of the Baptist who were by him pointed to Jesus (John i. 35-37); but of James we first hear during our Lord's Galilean ministry, when he was called with his brother to a personal attendance upon Christ (Matt. iv. 21, 22; Mark i. 19, 20; Luke v. 1-11; these three accounts most probably referring to the same event: see Wieseler, Chron. Synops., pp. 280, 285, 286). It was not till some time after this (nearly a twelvemonth, according to the computation of some) that Christ formally commenced the framework of his church by choosing the twelve apostles, among whom were James and John; and, as James is mentioned first, and John designated as his brother, it is probable that James was the elder of the two (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 17; Luke vi. 14). These brothers were, most likely at the same time, surnamed Boanerges, 'the sons of thunder,' indicating that burning and zealous spirit which we find occasionally manifesting itself in their anger against the Samaritans, and their eagerness for pre-eminence. Peter and Andrew, James and John, are always named first of the apostles, and seem generally to have taken the lead (Mark xiii. 3); and three of them, Peter, James, and John, alone accompanied our Lord on some special occasions (Matt. xvii. 1, xxvi. 37; Mark v. 37). It was on the last journey to Jerusalem that Salome, their mother, the sons joining in the petition, asked for the first place in Messiah's kingdom for James and John (Matt. xx. 20, 21; Mark x. 35-37). It is possible that there was some jealousy, specially in Salome's mind, of the sons of Jonas, the late neighbours and partners of her own children. Be this as it may, the expression of the wish called out the indignation of the other ten apostles; and the ambitious thought had a mild rebuke from the Lord himself. Nothing further is recorded of James, save his presence with the rest of the apostles, till his martyrdom. He is after the passion less prominent in sacred history than his brother John. That he was considered, however, a leader of the disciples is evident from his being the first whom Herod Agrippa seized. He was slain 'with the sword' (Acts xii. 2), about the time of the passover, 44 A.D., the foremost of the 'glorious company' to rejoin his beloved Master.

2. There was another apostle named James, called 'the son of Alphaeus' (Matt. x. 3); and there are difficult questions connected with him, whether he was the same with 'James the Lord's brother,' whether it was he that appears in the later chapters of the Acts to have been prominent in the church of Jerusalem, whether he wrote the epistle which bears the name of James, and whether the so-called 'brethren' of Jesus were his brethren really, or his cousins.

It may be convenient to examine the last-named question first. It is freely admitted that some of the reasons for believing that these persons were literally our Lord's brethren are of considerable weight. Thus it is the natural inference we should draw from the scornful words of the people of Nazareth (xiii. 55, 56; Mark vi. 3). Further, these 'brethren' appear to be usually with Mary, the Lord's mother, as if living with her: they are also distinguished from the twelve (Acts i. 13, 14); and, above all, they are said, after the apostles were chosen, not to have believed in him (John vii. 5). These facts, however, admit of explanation. For we know that the word 'brother' is used very commonly in scripture in a large signification. And Mary the mother of James and Joses (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40), the very names which the 'brethren' bore, may well be taken as identical with 'Mary the wife of Cleophas' (John xix. 25), or Alphaeus, who was the Virgin's sister. It is not an unnatural supposition that, the father (of whose doings we hear nothing) being dead, the widowed mother, with her children, formed one family with Mary the mother of Jesus — also, most probably, now a widow. Still further, our Lord upon the cross committed his mother to the apostle John, who, 'from that hour took her unto his own home' (27). It is almost inconceivable that, if she had sons and daughters at home, she should be taken from them to the house of another, even though that other was the beloved disciple of Jesus. It is alleged, indeed, that it was because they did not believe. But this is a very unsatisfactory reason. At all events they believed a few days afterwards (Acts i. 14). And perhaps too great stress is laid on this. For what does the statement of their not believing amount to? Was their unbelief so much greater than the wavering which John evinced when he sent to put the question to Jesus whether he was really the Messiah? or than the unbelief which our Lord was continually reproving in his apostles (Matt. xvi. 8; Mark vi. 52; John xvi. 31, 32)? It must have been near akin to that distorted persuasion of the nature of the Lord's kingdom, which made the twelve utterly discredit his words when he told them of the death he should die, and obstinately refuse to receive the testimony that he was risen. Consequently they were perplexed (as also his mother was) when the report came that he was beside himself, so that they came out to get hold of him to satisfy themselves (Mark iii. 21, 31); and they could not understand why he seemed unwilling to go at the feast of tabernacles to Jerusalem, where of course they expected Messiah's temporal kingdom to be established (John vii. 3-10). It might, indeed, disqualify those who were so faithless for the apostleship; and some of our Lord's brethren seem both here and in Acts i. 14 to be distinguished from the apostles. But some might believe, and others not: and it is allowed on all hands that all of them were not apostles; whereas, if words are to be taken in their plain meaning, one must have been an apostle. For Barnabas brought Paul to the apostles (ix. 27); whereas Paul himself declares that the only apostles he saw on that visit to Jerusalem were Peter and 'James the Lord's brother' (Gal. i. 18, 19). And we can hardly imagine that the writer of the Acts would have asserted that Paul was brought to the apostles if Peter were the only apostle he saw. More cannot be said in this place; but it is submitted, with a full appreciation of the difficulty of the question, that what has been alleged will tend to establish the fact that 'James the Lord's brother' was, strictly speaking, his cousin, and that he was an apostle, and not one so called in a secondary sense, but one of the twelve, that is, James the son of Alphaeus. If, however, it be allowed that James the son of Mary, James the Lord's brother, James the brother of Jude, was identical with James the son of Alphaeus, we can have little difficulty in admitting further that this is the James whom we find prominent at Jerusalem (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, &c., xxi. 18; Gal. ii. 9, 12; possibly also 1 Cor. xv. 7), and who was the author of the canonical epistle. See Mill's Myth. Interp. of the Gospels, part ii. chap. ii. 3, pp. 219-274.

What is certainly known of the rest of his life is comprised in the passages just referred to. He seems to have been chief pastor of the church in the holy city: he presided in the council held of apostles and elders: to him Paul paid a visit in form, as acknowledging his place of authority: he was held in high esteem by the many thousands who believed who were zealous for the law—more is not recorded in the scripture. But tradition tells us more; and, on the whole, there is no reason to discredit it. Hegesippus (Euseb., Hist. Eccles., lib. ii. 23) and Josephus (Antiq., lib. xx. 8, § 1) relate his death. Their accounts do not exactly tally; but in the main fact of his being martyred they both agree. He observed, we are told, the Nazarite rule, and was so assiduous in prayer and supplication in the temple that he acquired the surname of 'the Just.'

Faithfully confessing Christ, he suffered death for his sake shortly before Vespasian commenced the siege of the city. He is said to have been succeeded in the presidency of the Hebrew church by Simeon or Simon, also a relative of our Lord.

JAMES, THE EPISTLE OF. The author of this epistle, if not James the son of Zebedee, which is very unlikely, must be that prominent James who, it has just been shown, was most probably the son of Alphaeus and the Lord's brother. He addressed it to Hebrew Christians of the dispersion (James i. 1), to those primarily that were scattered throughout Judea (Acts viii. 4), but with a further purpose of reaching generally those of Abraham's seed who anywhere had embraced the faith of Christ. His object was to fortify the minds of the disciples against the trials to which for their faith they were exposed, and to warn them against the sins of which as Jews they were specially in danger.

Bengel divides this epistle into three parts:—I. The inscription (i. 1). II. The exhortation (i. 2—v. 18), enforcing (1) patience against external trials and inward temptations (i. 2-15); (2), and then, from regard to the divine goodness (16-18), the importance of being 'swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath' (19-21); the special admonitions for each being that hearing must be accompanied by doing (22-25), in silence (26), with compassion and self-denial (27), without regard of persons in public assemblies (ii. 1-13), so that generally faith must not be separated from works (14-26); that speech must be bridled (iii. 1-12); that wrath, with other swelling passions, must be restrained (13—iv. 17); (3), patience again, which the coming of the Judge, with the consequent destruction of the wicked (v. 1-6), and the deliverance of the just (7-12) should encourage, and which prayer will cherish (13-18). III. The conclusion, in which the apostle, having shown his care for the spiritual welfare of those he addresses, would have them diligent for the salvation of others (19, 20).

The time when this epistle was composed is uncertain. Some critics, believing that if written after the council of Jerusalem there would have been allusion to that, place it early, 45 A.D.; others, seeing a reference to the name of Christian (ii. 7), to what Paul had written upon faith, and to the near destruction of Jerusalem, think its date later, perhaps 61 or 62 A.D. The last supposition seems the more reasonable. The place of writing was doubtless Jerusalem. The canonicity of this epistle has been doubted. Eusebius ranks it among the New Testament books that were excepted against, but testifies that it was acknowledged and read as genuine in very many churches (Hist. Eccles., lib. ii. 23). It formed a part of the ancient Syriac version, which omitted some other of the questioned epistles, and was at length generally acknowledged. At the time of the Reformation doubts were again entertained of it; but they arose mainly from a notion that it did not harmonize with the epistles of St. Paul. On this topic little can be here said. The two apostles had each his own aspect of a cardinal truth; and their expressions have reference to the special need of those they respectively addressed. St. Paul vindicates the power of a living faith: St. James shows that if it be not a living faith it is worthless. The two are not at variance. The style of this epistle is earnest; the Greek comparatively free from Hebraisms.

For commentaries upon it the reader must be referred to those including the New Testament generally.

JAM'LN (right hand, prosperity).—1. A son of Simeon (Gen. xlvii. 10; Exod. vi. 15; Numb. xxvi. 12; 1 Chron. iv. 24).—2. A descendant of Judah (ii. 27).—3. One who expounded the law in the time of Ezra (Neh. viii. 7).

JAM'NITES. A family of Simeon, descended from Jamin (Numb. xxvi. 12).

JAM'LECH (whom God makes king). A chieftain of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 34).

JAM'NIA (1 Macc. iv. 15, v. 58, x. 69, xv. 40). Most probably Jabneel.

JAM'NITES (2 Macc. xii. 8, 9, 40). Inhabitants of Jamnia or Jabneel.

JAN'NA (whom Jehovah bestows). A person in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 24).

JAN'NES AND JAM'BRES. Two persons mentioned by St. Paul as having withstood Moses (2 Tim. iii. 8). They are generally supposed to have been some of the Egyptian magicians, whose enchantments for a while appeared to rival the miracles performed in the sight of Pharaoh (Exod. vii, viii.). The question is, from what source did the apostle obtain the names? Origen says that there was an apocryphal book extant in his days entitled 'Jannes et Mambres' (In Matt. Comm. Ser., tom. iii. p. 916, edit. Bened.). But the more probable view is that there were some historical facts handed down and known to the Jews, and yet not chronicled in the scripture, and that St. Paul therefore had in this way, by certain tradition, the knowledge of these magicians' names. It is a corroboration that the names are found in the Targum of Jonathan upon Exodus. As to the derivation and meaning of the words Jannes and Jambres, nothing satisfactory can be said: they must have been Egyptian (Jambres being also written Mambres). The rev. D. I. Heath, having examined the contents of some ancient papyri, believed that he discovered there the names Jannes and Jamr. His conclusions have, however, been called in question. A summary of them may be seen in the Journ. of Sacr. Lit., April 1854, pp. 254, 255. Certain legendary accounts have been given of Jannes and Jambres, which do not deserve notice. See Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. Talm. et Rabbo., cols. 945, &c.

JANO'AH (rest). A place, evidently in the north of Palestine, seized by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xv. 29). It is identified as Yanoah to the north-east of Acre (Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 300, 301).

JANO'HAH (id.). A border-town of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 6, 7). It is the modern village Yanân, about eleven or twelve miles south-east of Nablous.

JANUM (slumber). A town in the mountain-district of Judah (Josh. xv. 53): for which we find in the margin

JANUS (flight).

JAPHETH (widely spreading). One of the sons of Noah (Gen. v. 32, vi. 10, vii. 13; 1 Chron. i. 4). Japheth is generally mentioned last of the three; yet he was not the youngest (Gen. ix. 24), and indeed he is generally considered the eldest (x. 21); but it is more probable that he was younger than Shem, and that the verse just referred to should be translated, 'Shem . . . the elder brother of Japheth.' These two obtained a blessing from their father for their behaviour when Noah lay uncovered in his tent (ix. 18-27). Of Japheth it was predicted that God would enlarge him, and that he should dwell in the tents of Shem—a prediction which has been accomplished by the wide spread of Japheth's posterity, occupying 'the isles of the Gentiles,' i.e. the maritime coasts of Europe and Asia Minor, whence they spread over Europe and much of Asia (x. 1-5; 1 Chron. i. 5-7). See EARTH.

JAPH'IA (splendid).—1. The king of Lachish who joined a confederacy against Israel, and was defeated and slain by Joshua (Josh. x. 3-26).—2. One of the sons of David born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. iii. 7, xiv. 6).

JAPH'IA (id.). A border-place of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 12). It is now called Yafa, about two miles south-west of Nazareth. There is a tradition that this was the birth-place of Zebedee and his two sons.

JAPH'LET (whom God delivers). A descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 32, 33).

JAPHLE'TI (the Japhletite). A land-mark on the southern frontier of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3). It probably had its name from some individual Japhlet, or some tribe or clan of which we have now no knowledge.

JAPHO (beauty). A sea-port town in the allotment of Dan (Josh. xix. 46). It is better known by the name Joppa, by which it is called in 2 Chron. ii. 16; Ezra iii. 7; Jonah i. 3, and in the New Testament. See JOPPA.

JAR'AH (honey). One of Saul's descendants (1 Chron. ix. 42). He is called Jehoah in viii. 36.

JAR'EB (an adversary). It is questioned whether this (Hos. v. 13, x. 6) is the name of a king, or of a country, or whether it is used as an appellative. The grammatical form of the original forbids the first supposition. The second has some reasons in its favour; but perhaps, referring it to the king of Assyria, we may best understand the meaning of the prophet if we adopt the third and translate 'the hostile king.' See Henderson, Minor Prophets, note on Hos. v. 13.

JAR'ED (descent). One of the ante-diluvian patriarchs, the father of Enoch (Gen. v. 15-20; Luke iii. 37). In Gen. v. 15, marg.; 1 Chron. i. 2 he is called Jered by our translators.

JARESI'AH (whom Jehovah makes fat). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 27).

JAR'HA (perhaps an Egyptian name: no certain signification of it can be given). An Egyptian servant to whom his master She-shan gave his daughter (probably Ahlai) in marriage (1 Chron. ii. 31, 34, 35). It is not possible to say when this alliance took place.

JAR'IB (an adversary).—1. One of the sons of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 24). He is elsewhere (Gen. xli. 10) called Jachin.—2. One who accompanied Ezra, and was sent by him to invite priests and Levites to go to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 16).—3. A priest who had married a foreign wife (x. 18). He may be the same with no. 2.

JAR'IB (1 Macc. xiv. 29). Identical with Joarib (ii. 1), i.e. Jehoiarib (1 Chron. xxiv. 7).

JAR'IMOTH (1 Esdr. ix. 28). Jeremoth (Ezra x. 27).

JAR'MUTH (height).—1. An Amorite town whose king joined in the confederacy against Gibeon, but was defeated and destroyed (Josh. x. 3-5, 22-26, xii. 11). It is said to have been in the plain country of Judah, to which tribe it was allotted (xv. 35). We find it inhabited after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 29). Jarmuth is the modern

Yarmak, situated among the hills which rise from the low Philistine country, about eight or nine miles from Beit Jibrin, the ancient Eleutheropolis.—2. A city of Issachar assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 29). It is perhaps the same with Remeth (ix. 21), and Ramoth (1 Chron. vi. 73).

JARO'AH (noon). A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 14).

JA'SAEL (1 Esdr. ix. 30). Sheal (Ezra x. 29).

JA'SHEN (sleeping) A person of whose sons one at least was among David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 32). The list is somewhat different in 1 Chron. xi. 34: probably there is some transcriber's error.

JA'SHER (upright?). 'The book of Jasher,' understood generally to mean 'the book of the upright,' i.e. annals of upright or faithful men, is twice referred to in scripture (Josh. x. 13; 2 Sam. i. 18). Nothing is with certainty known of it. There are various conjectures as to its name; among which one of the most reasonable perhaps is that of bishop Lowth (Lect. on Sac. Poetry of the Hebrews, lect. xxiii. vol. ii. pp. 152, 153, edit. 1787), who, considering it a collection of national poems, thought it might begin with the triumphal ode of Moses (Exod. xv.); the initial words of which are az yashir, 'then sang,' and so, after a common Hebrew custom, might receive yashir or jasher as its distinctive name. It is useless to set down here other conjectures, or to try to amuse the reader with the strange speculations with which ingenious men have pleased themselves. Suffice it to say that, while some fancy it was the book of Deuteronomy, others imagine it that of Judges, some the collection of the minor prophets, and others the book of God's eternal predestination. Those who are desirous of seeing these and other conjectures may refer to Sixtus Senensis, Biblioth. Sancta, lib. ii. 'Justorum Liber,' or to Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 932-934. The only particulars which can be gathered with anything like certainty are that it must have been a poetical work or collection, and that it is now lost. Josephus has been supposed to allude to it (Antiq., lib. v. 1, § 17); but this is very doubtful.

There are some rabbinical works still extant which bear this title; and an impudent forgery was printed in English, in 1751 and 1829, pretending to be the book of Jasher. It would be a waste of time to refute such impostures. See Horne's Introd., vol. iv. pp. 741-747. Neither need Dr. Donaldson's strange notions, embodied in his Jashar, be noticed here.

JASHOB'EAM (to whom the people turns). One of David's chief mighty men, the son of Zabdiel, a Korhite, called also a Hachmonite, perhaps a descendant of one named Hachmoni. He joined David at Ziklag, and attacked on one occasion 300 men whom he slew, very likely with the aid of the troop he commanded (1 Chron. xi. 11, xii. 6). He was captain of the first military course, to which the first month was assigned as the month of duty (xxvii. 2). Jashobeam is the same with the officer called Adino the Ezrite (2 Sam. xxiii. 8). Different as the words are in our version, a very slight alteration in the Hebrew letters will make the text there signify 'the Hachmonite, Jashobassebet (or Jashobeam)'; 'he shook it, even his spear against eight hundred.' Whether Hachmonite or Hachmonite is the correct reading is questionable: as to the difference in numbers, it has been supposed that 300 were slain at the first onset, or by Jashobeam himself, and an additional body afterwards, or by the help of others.

JA'SHUB (he turns).—1. One of the sons of Issachar (Numb. xxvi. 24; 1 Chron. vii. 1). He is called Job in Gen. xli. 13.—2. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 29).

JASHU'BI-LE'HEM (a returner from battle, or a returner to Beth-lehem). A person or a place found among the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 22).

JA'SHUBITES. A family of Simeon, descended from Jashub (Numb. xxvi. 24).

JAS'EL (whom God has made). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 47). The name in the original is the same with that rendered Jaasiel.

JA'SON (one who will head). A Thessalonian Christian who received Paul and Silas, and was attacked for this by the mob (Acts xvii. 5-9). He is very likely the same that St. Paul calls his kinsman (Rom. xvi. 21).

JA'SON.—1. A Jewish ambassador sent to Rome (1 Macc. viii. 17). He is probably identical with the individual mentioned in xii. 16, xiv. 22.—2. A person of Cyrene, from whose historical work the second book of Maccabees was mainly compiled (2 Macc. ii. 19-32).—3. A high priest of the Jews, son of Simon II. and brother of Onias III., who corruptly obtained the office from Antiochus Epiphanes, 175 B.C. His administration was in every respect ungodly. He was at length supplanted by Menelaus; and, though, on a report of the death of Antiochus, he attempted to recover his power, he was unsuccessful, and died in exile (2 Macc. iv. 7-v. 10). See Winer, Bibl. RWB. art. 'Jason, 3.'

JASPER. One of the gems in the high priest's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13). It is also mentioned as adorning the king of Tyre (Ezek. xxviii. 13), and is repeatedly introduced by St. John (Rev. iv. 3, xxi. 11, 18, 19). From the Hebrew term yashpeh, the Greek and Latin words and our own jasper are derived, which is an opaque species of quartz, red, yellow, or green, sometimes striped or spotted. It takes a fine polish; and that the Hebrew word may imply. But such a stone as jasper does not seem to agree with the characteristics which we must, from the way in which this is mentioned in scripture, suppose that it possessed. Some have therefore imagined that the diamond is intended. We can only conjecture, and cannot in the present state of our knowledge speak with certainty.

JASU'BUS (1 Esdr. ix. 30). Jashub (Ezra x. 29).

JA'TAL (1 Esdr. v. 38). A corrupted form of Ater (Ezra ii. 42).

JATH'NIEL (whom God bestows). One of the Levite porters (1 Chron. xxvi. 2).

JAT'TIR (pre-eminent). A town among the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 48). It was allotted to the priests (xxi. 14; 1 Chron. vi. 57), and was one of the places to the inhabitants of which David sent presents (1 Sam. xxx. 27). It has been identified with Attir, a place about ten miles south of Hebron.

JA'VAN (clay?). One of the sons of Japheth (Gen. x. 2, 4; 1 Chron. i. 5, 7). His descendants colonized Greece and other maritime countries.

JA'VAN (id.).—1. This name is sometimes used more specifically for Ionia (Isai. lxvi. 19; Ezek. xxvii. 13; see Kallsch, Comm on Old Test. Gen., p. 242); for the Macedonian empire (Dan. viii. 21, x. 20, xl. 2); for the Græco-Syrian empire (Zech. ix. 13); so that it comprehends generally the Greek race.—2. A place in the southern part of Arabia, which traded with the Phœnicians (Ezek. xxvii. 19). It is possible that the reference of Joel iii. 6 may be to this Javan, which Tuch supposes to have been a Greek colony. See UZAL.

JAVELIN (1 Sam. xviii. 11). See ARMS.

JA'ZAR (1 Macc. v. 8). Most probably identical with Jazer, or Jaazer.

JA'ZER (whom God helps) (Numb. xxxii. 1, 3; Josh. xlii. 23, xxi. 39; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5; 1 Chron. vi. 81, xxvi. 31; Isai. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlvi. 32). See JAAZER.

JA'ZIZ (whom God moves, i. e. to whom he gives life and motion). An officer, called a Hagerite, who had charge of David's flocks (1 Chron. xxvii. 31).

JEALOUS, JEALOUSY. The term 'jealous' is sometimes applied to the Deity, as indicating the watchful care with which he requires the whole love of his people, espoused to himself, that his honour be not touched by their infidelity (Exod. xx. 5, xxxiv. 14; Deut. iv. 23, 24, vi. 14, 15, and elsewhere: comp. 1 Cor. x. 22; 2 Cor. xi. 2).

In the Mosaic code was a very remarkable enactment, called 'the law of jealousies.' If a man suspected the virtue of his wife, but had no witnesses for proof in the ordinary way, he might bring her to the priest with an offering, a tenth part of an ephah of barley-meal, but, it is significantly said, with neither oil nor frankincense—oil the symbol of the Spirit, incense the symbol of acceptable prayer. The woman's head was to be uncovered, in a state of humiliation: the offering, as hers, was to be in her hands, that, as maintaining her innocence, she might present a meat-offering, which betokened good works. Then the priest was to charge her with an oath, and make her drink water (holy water it is called) either from the laver, or more probably the 'water of separation' (Numb. xix. 9), in which some dust of the floor of the tabernacle was cast. He next took the offering from her hand, waved it, and presented it upon the altar to the Lord, as referring to him the decision. And, if the woman were guilty, her belly would rot, and her thigh would swell, God's curse penetrating to the innermost parts; but, if the curse took no effect, and her offering were accepted, she was free (v. 11-31). The whole was a lesson of the jealous care with which God watched over any infraction of the marriage-vow, and would show that covenant-relations with him must be diligently kept, to escape the curse which will be inflicted on sin exposed and avenged.

JEALOUSY, IMAGE OF. (Ezek. viii. 3, 5) See IMAGE OF JEALOUSY.

JEAR'IM (forests). A mount so called was on the border of Judah (Josh. xv. 10). It is said to be Chesalon; perhaps Chesalon stood upon the mountain-ridge. The modern Kesla does so stand on doubtless what was mount Jearim. There are still woods in the vicinity; and Kirjath-jearim, Kuriet-el-Aineb, is not far off. See CHESALON.

JEAT'ERAI (whom the Lord shall cause to remain). A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 21). He is also called Ethni (41).

JEBERECHI'AH (whom Jehovah blesses). The father of the Zechariah taken as a witness by the prophet Isaiah (Isai. viii. 2).

JE'BUS (place trodden down, threshing-floor). One of the names of Jerusalem, the city of the Jebusites (Judges xix. 10, 11; 1 Chron. xi. 4, 5). See JERUSALEM.

JEBU'SI (Josh. xviii. 16, 28). See JERUSALEM.

JEBUSITES. One of the tribes of Canaan, whom the Israelites were commanded to exterminate. They were descended from Canaan, the youngest son of Ham (Gen. x. 16), and are mentioned last in the various catalogues, possibly because they were but a small clan, or occupied a circumscribed territory (xv. 21; Exod. iii. 8, 17). Their chief abodes were Jerusalem and the surrounding district, together with the mountain-country afterwards belonging to Judah, where they were in close proximity to the Amorites and the Hittites (Numb. xiii. 29). They joined the great confederacy against Joshua under Jabin (Josh. xi. 3), and were defeated, the king of Jerusalem, or Jebus (an Amorite), having been previously killed (x. 1, 5, 26). This city was subsequently burnt by the tribe of Judah (Judges i. 8). But it was not entirely destroyed, or else it was re-built and held by the Jebusites. For we are told that the Benjamites, to whom it was assigned (Josh. xviii. 28), could not clear it of the Jebusite occupants (Judges i. 21; comp. Josh. xv. 63); and indeed it appears afterwards to have had exclusively a Jebusite population (Judges xix. 10-12). It was not till the reign of David that these were altogether conquered and dispossessed of the strong-hold of Zion (2 Sam. v. 6-8; 1 Chron. xi. 4-6). And even still some of them remained (2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 18; 1 Chron. xxi. 15, 18, 28). Solomon made the remnant tributary (1 Kings ix. 20); and some seem to have been still recognizable after the captivity (Ezra ix. 1).

JECAMIAH (whom Jehovah gathers). A person of the royal line of David (1 Chron. iii. 18). This name is the same with Jekamiah (ii. 41).

JECHOLIAH (able through Jehovah). The name of the mother of king Azariah or Uzziah (2 Kings xv. 2). She is called also Jecoliah (2 Chron. xxvi. 3).

JECHONIAS (Matt. i. 11, 12). The Greek form of Jechoniah or Jehoiachin.

JECHONIAS.—1. (1 Esdr. viii. 92). Shechaniah (Ezra x. 2).—2. (Bar. i. 3, 9). Jehoiachin.

JECOLIAH (able through Jehovah) (2 Chron. xxvi. 3). See JECOLIAH.

JECONI'AH (whom Jehovah has appointed) (1 Chron. iii. 16, 17; Esth. ii. 6; Jer. xxiv. 1, xxvii. 20, xxviii. 4, xxix. 2). See JECOLIAH.

JECONIAS (1 Esdr. i. 9). Conaniah (2 Chron. xxxv. 9).

JEDAIAH (praise Jehovah).—1. A Simeonite chieftain (1 Chron. iv. 37).—2. One who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

JEDAIAH (Jehovah cares for him).—1. The head of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 7). Most probably this course, or the representative of it (divided afterwards into two branches), is intended in ix. 10; Ezra ii. 36; Neh. vii. 39, xi. 10, xii. 6, 7, 19, 21.—2. A person who came from Babylon, and to whom with others certain memorial crowns were given (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

JED'DU (1 Esdr. v. 24). Jedaiah (Ezra ii. 36).

JEE'DUS (1 Esdr. ix. 30). Adajah (Ezra x. 29).

JEDI'AEI (known of God).—1. A son or descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 6, 10, 11). He may possibly be the same with ASHBEL, which see.—2. One of David's warriors (xi. 45). This is perhaps the chieftain of Manasseh who joined David on his return to Ziklag (xii. 20).—3. A Levite porter (xxvii. 2).

JEDI'DAH (one beloved) The mother of king Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 1).

JEDIDIAH (beloved of Jehovah). A name given to Solomon through Nathan the prophet (2 Sam. xii. 25). There seems to have been a play of words in this. David's name was from the same root, beloved; and now his child is called beloved of Jehovah.

JEDU'THUN (praising). A Levite of the family of Merari, appointed as one of the great leaders of sacred music in David's reign. There is strong reason to believe that Jeduthun is identical with Ethan (1 Chron. vi. 44, xv. 17, 19). Asaph of the Gershonites and Heman of the Kohathites were the other two masters to whom with Jeduthun the musical service of the sanctuary was entrusted. Jeduthun first appears as taking part in the solemn procession when the ark of God was brought up to Jerusalem, and afterwards, as the tabernacle was at Gibeon, he with Heman was to serve under Zadok the priest there (xvi. 37-42, xxv. 1-6). We find subsequently his division officiating when the temple was completed (2 Chron. v. 12), in Hezekiah's reformation (xxix. 14), and also under Josiah (xxxv. 15); moreover, after the captivity, a descendant of his house is mentioned (1 Chron. ix. 16; Neh. xi. 17). Three psalms have Jeduthun in their titles (xxxix., lxii., lxxvii.); probably they were to be sung by his musical division.

JEE'LI (1 Esdr. v. 33). Jaalah (Ezra ii. 56).

JEE'LUS (1 Esdr. viii. 92). Jehiel (Ezra x. 2).

JEE'ZER (a shortened form of Abiezer, father of help). A descendant of Manasseh through Gilead (Numb. xxvi. 30). See ABIEZER, 1.

JEE'ZERITES. A family of Manasseh, descendants of Jeezer (Numb. xxvi. 30).

JEGAR-SAHADU'THA (the heap of witness). The Aramæan name given by Laban to the witness-heap which Jacob called Galeed. There appear to have been both a pillar and a pile—the pillar set up by Jacob, and the pile or heap gathered by Laban and his sons. There was then a solemn feast, and a sacrifice, and a covenant entered into that neither the one nor the other should pass that pillar and heap to his brother's harm (Gen. xxxi. 43-55).

JEHAL'ELEL (who praises God). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 16).

JEHAL'ELEL (id.). A Levite (2 Chron. xxix. 12).

JEHDEIAH (whom Jehovah makes joyful).—1. A Levite (1 Chron. xxiv. 20).—2. An officer who had charge of David's asses (xxvii. 30).

JEHEZ'EKEL (whom God makes strong). The chief of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 16). The name is the same as that of Ezekiel.

JEHEZ'KEL (Ezek. i. 3, marg.). Ezekiel.

JEHIAH (Jehovah lives). One of the door-keepers for the ark (1 Chron. xv. 24). This name is possibly for Jehiel or Jeiel: comp. 18.

JEHIEL (God lives).—1. A Levite porter, appointed for the musical service of the sanctuary (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).

—2. A Gershonite Levite, treasurer of the house of the Lord (xxiii. 8, xxix. 8): see JEHIEL.

—3. One of David's officers, probably governor of his sons (xxvii. 32).—4. A son of Jehoshaphat, put to death by his brother Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi. 2, 4).—5. A Levite of the family of Heman, employed in the reforms of Hezekiah (xxix. 14). He may be the one mentioned in xxxi. 13.—6. A ruler of the house of God in Josiah's time (xxxv. 8).—7. Father of one who returned to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra viii. 9).

—8. Father of a person who proposed to Ezra the putting away of foreign wives (x. 2).—9. 10. Two who had married foreign wives (21, 26).

JEHIEL (perhaps treasured of God).—1. A Benjaminite who dwelt at Gibeon, ancestor of king Saul (1 Chron. ix. 35: comp. viii. 29).

—2. One of David's warriors (xi. 44).

JEHIE'LI (a Jehielite). One of the Levites whose sons were over the treasures of the Lord's house (1 Chron. xxvi. 21, 22). In xxiii. 8, xxix. 8 the name is Jehiel, who was probably the head of a branch of the family.

JEHIZKIAH (Jehovah strengthens). One of the chiefs of Ephraim, who procured the liberation of the captives of Judah in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

JEHO'ADAH (whom Jehovah adorns). One of the descendants of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 36). He is elsewhere called Jarah (ix. 42).

JEHOAD'DAN (id. fem.). The mother of Amaziah king of Judah (2 Kings xiv. 2; 2 Chron. xxv. 1).

JEHO'AHAZ (whom Jehovah holds).—1. The son and successor of Jeroboam II. king of Israel. He reigned seventeen years, 856-840 B.C. His reign was ungodly and inglorious. Hazael oppressed and spoiled the country, till Jehoahaz in his extremity besought the Lord, who pitied his people, and raised up deliverers in the successors of Jehoahaz (2 Kings x. 35, xiii. 1-10, 22, 25, xiv. 8, 17; 2 Chron. xxv. 17, 25).—2. A son of Josiah, placed on the throne of Judah after his father's death, 609 B.C. He reigned but three months, and did evil in God's sight. He was deposed by Pharaoh-nechoh, who, having had him conveyed to Riblah, put him in bonds there, and afterwards carried him into Egypt, where he died (2 Kings xxiii. 30-34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1-4). He was called also Shallum (1 Chron. iii. 15; Jer. xxii. 10-12).—3. Another name of Ahaziah king of Judah (2 Chron. xxi. 17). See AHAZIAH, 2.

JEHO'ASH (whom Jehovah bestowed).—1. A king of Judah (2 Kings xi. 21, xii. 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 18, xiv. 13); see JOASH, 3.—2. A king of Israel (xiii. 10, 25, xiv. 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 16, 17); see JOASH, 4.

JEHOHA'NAN (whom Jehovah gave).—1. One of the Levite porters of the family of the Korhites (1 Chron. xxvi. 3).—2. A military chief in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 15). It was perhaps he that was father of the Ishmael whom Jehoiada associated with him for the purpose of making Joash king (xxiii. 1).—3. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 28).—4. A priest in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 13).—5. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (42).

JEHOI'ACHIN (whom Jehovah has appointed). The son and successor of Jehoiakim king of Judah, 598 B.C. He was eighteen years old when he ascended the throne, and he reigned in an ungodly way for three months and ten days (2 Kings xxiv. 6-9). As he was young, it may be supposed that he was under the influence of the queen-mother (Jer. xiii. 18). The army of Nebuchadnezzar was soon before Jerusalem; and Jehoiachin, his mother, and the principal chiefs surrendered, and were carried, with a great amount of plunder, to Babylon (10-16; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 8-10). In the last-cited passage it is said that Jehoiachin was but eight years old at his accession; but this is manifestly a copyist's error. A child of eight years, however ill-disposed, could not so have administered the affairs of a kingdom as to have drawn upon himself the fearful sentence recorded by Jeremiah (Jer. xxii. 24-30); and the supposition that his father had associated him with himself in the government for ten years has no basis of evidence. Jehoiachin was kept a captive for thirty-seven years through the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, but, on Evil-merodach's accession to the Chaldean throne, he was brought out of prison, placed at the head of the subdued kings in Babylon, with appointments and allowances befitting his rank (2 Kings xxv. 27-30; Jer.

lii. 31-34). Whether he survived Evil-merodach, who reigned but two years, we know not. There are few notices of him beside. Ezekiel dates some of his prophecies from the time of Jehoiachin's captivity; and occasional references are made to it (Esth. ii. 6; Ezek. i. 2, and elsewhere). Jehoiachin is also called Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 16, 17; Esth. ii. 6; Jer. xxiv. 1, xxvii. 20, xxviii. 4, xxix. 2), Coniah (xxii. 24, 28, xxxvii. 1), and Jechonias (Matt. i. 12). It is probable that agreeably to Jeremiah's denunciation Jehoiachin had no children, and that Salathiel, called his son, was the rightful heir to the crown after him, adopted from another branch of the family. See GENEALOGY.

JEHOI'ADA (whom Jehovah knows).—1. The father of Benaiah, a well-known officer of David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 18, and elsewhere). If he is to be supposed a priest (1 Chron. xxvii. 5: see BENAIAH, 1), it was probably he that joined David with the Aaronites at Hebron (xii. 27).—2. A very noted high priest. He had married Jehosheba, or Jehoshabeath, king Ahaziah's sister, who, when Athaliah destroyed the royal family, secreted Joash, and kept him for six years in a chamber of the temple. In the seventh year Jehoiada found himself able to produce the young prince. Accordingly the principal officers of the kingdom were informed, and their assistance obtained. And, when all proper dispositions had been made, Joash was produced and solemnly crowned; Athaliah being justly put to death for usurpation (2 Kings xi.; 2 Chron. xxii. 11, 12, xxiii.). Joash reigned well during Jehoiada's life; and the aged priest was buried when he died among the kings in the city of David (2 Kings xii. 1-16; 2 Chron. xxiv. 1-17). Jehoiada is said to have been one hundred and thirty years old at his death. Possibly this may be a transcriber's error. Else he must have been born in the reign of Rehoboam; and his marriage with Ahaziah's sister, a young girl at the time, would appear strange. Errors in numbers do sometimes occur; letters, from their similarity likely to be mistaken, being used to denote numerals.—3. One of David's counsellors after Ahithophel (1 Chron. xxvii. 34). But perhaps the names Jehoiada and Benaiah are here transposed.—4. A person who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6).—5. The second priest in the reign of Zedekiah, succeeded by Zephaniah (Jer. xxi. 25-29: comp. 2 Kings xxv. 18).

JEHOI'AKIM (whom Jehovah sets up). The eldest son of Josiah king of Judah, by one of his wives, Zebudah. On the death of Josiah the people placed his son Jehoahaz upon the throne; but he was speedily (in three months) removed by Pharaoh-nechoh king of Egypt, then by his victory over Josiah in military possession of the kingdom. Pharaoh carried Jehoahaz into Egypt, and made his elder brother Eliakim king, thenceforward better known by the name of Jehoiakim, whose reign lasted eleven years, 609-598 B.C. (2 Kings xxiii. 31-37). Jehoiakim had profited little by his father's instruction and example. He had to rule an impoverished people; for Pharaoh had imposed a fine of one hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold; and Jehoiakim raised this sum as he could by taxing the land. Probably discontents arose; more especially as Jehoiakim had not been the choice of his subjects. And, though we have no special record of his encouraging idolatry, we may see that he settled down into a hard, cruel, faithless, worldly man, careless alike of the honour of God and of the welfare of his kingdom (Jer. xxii. 13-17).

It was not for long that Jehoiakim was tributary to Pharaoh. Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptian king at Carchemish (xvi. 2), deprived him of all his Syrian possessions, and having marched against Jerusalem made Jehoiakim his vassal. It was in this invasion that Daniel was carried away captive (Dan. i. 1, 2), and very possibly at this time that Jehoiakim was made prisoner with the declared intention of carrying him away too (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7). The intention, however, was not fulfilled; and Jehoiakim was left at Jerusalem as a vassal of the king of Babylon. There is some difficulty in settling the chronology of this part of his reign; for Jeremiah places the battle of Carchemish in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jer. xvi. 2), while according to Daniel Jerusalem was taken in the third year. It may be that the march of Nebuchadnezzar commenced in one year, though the campaign was not ended till the next. Or one prophet may date from the death of Josiah, not reckoning the short and troubled reign of Jehoahaz. But it is more probable that the march on Jerusalem was prior to the victory of Carchemish: Nebuchadnezzar being then the lieutenant of his father, but known to the Jews as the terrible chief of the imperial armies, and naturally by them called king. It is absurd to object, as some have done, that no Chaldean invasion of Judea could have occurred before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, because God promised then that, if the Jews were obedient, he would do them no hurt (xxv. 6-9), threatening fresh judgment if they still rebelled, or before the fifth year, because then a fast was proclaimed (xxxvi. 9). The fast, it is most likely, was preparatory to the revolt from the Babylonish yoke; and hence the special rage of Jehoiakim at Jeremiah's minatory warnings, then publicly announced: see DANIEL, THE BOOK OF, p. 198.

We may therefore conclude that probably in his third year Jehoiakim became subject to Nebuchadnezzar, continued his vassal three years, and then rebelled. The king of Babylon was not at once able to chastise him; but various bands of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and others plundered his land; till at last the great conqueror appeared himself. Whether Jehoiakim was killed in battle, or had previously died, we cannot be certain; but his end was ignominious; and his son was permitted to reign but three months (2 Kings xxiv. 1-8; Jer. xxii. 18, 19). Josephus says that Jerusalem surrendered on conditions, which were ill-observed, and Jehoiakim slain (Antiq., lib.

x. 6, § 3); while some have believed that he came to a violent end, either by the hands of his own subjects, or in some previous engagement. The scripture gives no details, simply saying that he 'slept with his fathers', i.e. died. Jehoiakim's evil character is exemplified in his putting Urijah the prophet to death (Jer. xxvi. 20-23), as well as in his burning the roll of prophecy against him (xxxvi.), above referred to.

JEHOIARIB (whom Jehovah defends). The head of the first course of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 7), whose descendants appear to have returned from captivity (ix. 10): his representatives are mentioned (Neh. xi. 10, xii. 6, 19) in the contracted form Joiarib. To this course the Maccabean family belonged (1 Macc. ii. 1).

JEHON'ADAB (whom Jehovah impels). A son or descendant of Rechab the founder of the Rechabites. He met Jehu proceeding to Samaria, just after the slaughter of the princes, and, having declared his cordial concurrence with the new king, was taken by him into his chariot, and attended him to the treacherous slaughter of the worshippers of Baal (2 Kings x. 15-23). We again hear of Jehonadab as imposing on his children the rule of abstinence from wine, agriculture, and residence in cities (Jer. xxxv., where he is called Jonadab); which rule was exactly observed till in one respect at the Babylonian invasion it was necessarily relaxed. See RECHABITES.

JEHON'ATHAN (whom Jehovah gave).—1. The superintendent of David's store-houses (1 Chron. xxvii. 25).—2. A Levite sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (2 Chron. xvii. 8).—3. A priest, the representative of the family or course of Shemaiah (Neh. x. 18). He is probably the same with the Jonathan mentioned in 35; Jonathan being the contracted form of Jehonathan.

JEHORAM (whom Jehovah has exalted). A name very frequently found in its contracted form, Joram.

1. The eldest son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, who succeeded his father and reigned eight years, 892-885 B.C., perhaps the first two years in conjunction with his father (1 Kings xxii. 50; 2 Kings viii. 16, 17; 2 Chron. xxi. 1-3). He was a most abandoned prince: he had married the wicked Athaliah daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and in their sinful ways he walked. He destroyed his brothers, and, regardless of a warning from the prophet Elijah, persisted in crime. Judgments came thick and fast upon him. Edom revolted, and Lihnah; and the Philistines and Arabians attacked him, plundered his palace, and carried off or destroyed his wives and sons, save Ahaziah the youngest. And then God smote him with an incurable disease. Two years he lingered in misery, till his bowels fell out, and he expired, and was buried without the customary honours (2 Kings viii. 18-24; 2 Chron. xxi., xxii. 1). Jehosheba, the prudent wife of the priest Jehoiada, was his daughter (2 Kings xi. 2). There has been a difficulty felt in regard to the warning to Jehoram from the prophet Elijah; as it is usually supposed that Elijah had been translated previously. We may well therefore believe that by divine monition the great prophet was instructed to leave a writing to be conveyed at the proper juncture to the sinful king. But Lord A. C. Hervey supposes (see notice below), that Elijah's translation did not occur till Jehoram's second year: comp. ELIJAH, p. 256.

2. The son of Ahab king of Israel, by Jezebel. He succeeded his brother Ahaziah on the throne and reigned twelve years, 896-884 B.C. (i. 17, iii. 1). He discountenanced the worship of Baal, but maintained the idolatrous calves which Jeroboam had set up (2, 3). At an early period of his reign he marched, in conjunction with Jehoshaphat king of Judah and the vassal king of Edom, against the Moabites, who had rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab. The confederates were reduced to straits for want of water, and consulted the prophet Elisha, who uttered a severe rebuke against Jehoram, but, respecting the pious Jehoshaphat, gave the counsel which resulted in a victory. The war, however, ended abruptly with an atrocity committed by the king of Moab on (most probably) the king of Edom's son (4-27: comp. Amos ii. 1). Afterwards, perhaps in consequence of the putting down of Baal-worship, we find more intercourse between Elisha and Jehoram: there was the miraculous cure of Naaman; and the supernatural information given which enabled the king several times to elude the hostile designs of the Syrians (2 Kings iv. 13, v., vi. 8-23). But then, when Samaria was besieged, Jehoram seems to have imagined that the judgment was a consequence of Elisha's rebukes; and, irritated by a fearful crime perpetrated under the pressure of hunger, he hastily resolved to put Elisha to death. It was but a momentary outburst of passion; and he himself hurried after the executioner, to reverse (as we may suppose) the order. He had then the cheering assurance that in four-and-twenty hours there would be plenty in Samaria; which was accomplished by the unexpected flight of the panic-struck Syrians (24-33, vii.). In the course of Jehoram's reign there was a famine for seven years. It is not clear at what period we are to place this; the 'then' of viii. 1 being no note of time: possibly it is the same famine mentioned in iv. 38-44. At its close we find the king questioning Gehazi as to Elisha's wonderful works, and restoring her lands to the Shunammite lady, who was come at that very time to pray restitution of her property (viii. 1-6).

Then occurred the revolution in Syria; and Jehoram seized the opportunity, in conjunction with his nephew Ahaziah king of Judah, to attack Ramoth-gilead. He was wounded in the battle; and, having returned to Jezreel to be cured, his general Jehu, whom he had left to hold Ramoth-gilead, conspired against him. It is likely that Jehoram had again introduced or sanctioned Baal-worship, which Jehu found in full vigour (x. 18-28). And this may have provoked the awful judgment by which Jehoram fell. He could offer no resistance to Jehu: he was slain at once in his chariot; and his corpse was thrown ignominiously into the plot of ground which his father had unjustly wrested from Naboth (viii. 25-29, ix. 1-26; 2 Chron. xxii. 5-7). Thus was fulfilled the word spoken by the prophet Elijah (1 Kings xxi. 17-29).

There is some difficulty in adjusting the chronology of Jehoram's reign; and several events usually assigned to it may have happened under some other monarch; the king's name not being distinctly mentioned. Lord A. C. Hervey would remove the clause 'in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah' (2 Kings i. 17) to the head of chap. ii., and makes some other suggestions, for which his article in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 947-949, may be consulted: see also Browne's Ordo Stæclorum, part i. chap. iv. §§ 215-223, pp. 221-239.

3. A priest employed by Jehoshaphat to teach in Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

JEHOSHAB'EATH (Jehovah is her oath). The daughter of Jehoram king of Judah, and wife of the priest Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxii. 11). She is also (2 Kings xi. 2) called JEHOSEBEA, which see.

JEHO'SHAPHAT (whom Jehovah judges, i.e. whose cause he sustains).—1. A great officer, called 'recorder' or annalist, under David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 1 Kings iv. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 15). 2. The head of one of Solomon's commissariat departments in Issachar (1 Kings iv. 17).

3. The son of Asa, who succeeded his father on the throne of Judah, at the age of thirty-five, and reigned twenty-five years, 914-890 B.C. (xv. 24, xxii. 42).

He was a man of piety; and his reign was upon the whole prosperous. At first, the jealousy of Judah and Israel still subsisting, Jehoshaphat placed his kingdom in a posture of defence against that of the ten tribes, garrisoning the cities which Asa had conquered. He also took away the idolatrous high places and groves in Judah, and in the third year of his reign sent princes, priests, and Levites with the book of the law to teach the people. And the blessing of God was upon him; he had riches and honour in abundance; and neighbouring tribes respected him and brought him presents and tribute (2 Chron. xvii.). But then came the great error of his life and reign. He not only contracted friendship and alliance with the weak and wicked Ahab, possibly from mutual fear of Syria, but sanctioned, it would seem, the marriage of his son Jehoram with the atrocious daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, a marriage which inflicted evil for several generations upon Judah. Jehoshaphat after this frequently aided the kings of Israel. He was with Ahab in the disastrous battle of Ramoth-gilead, and, appearing in the field in royal state, nearly lost his life, being mistaken for the Israelitish king. His cry to the Lord who delivered him ought to be noticed (1 Kings xxii. 1-40; 2 Chron. xviii.). Jehoshaphat had shown, while at Samaria, his distrust and dislike of the idolatrous priests; but when he returned to Jerusalem he was rebuked by the prophet Jehu for having at all allied himself with the ungodly. He took the rebuke in good part, and set himself again, both personally and by delegated officers, to carry out religious reforms in his own kingdom, and to render the administration of justice pure (xix.). The fatal alliance, however, with Israel still hampered him. He joined in a commercial project with Ahaziah, and prepared a fleet at Ezion-geber. For this he was reproved by Eliezer, who predicted the loss of the fleet. Jehoshaphat then refused any further partnership with Ahaziah in such enterprises (1 Kings xxii. 48, 49; 2 Chron. xx. 35-37). Afterwards he was attacked by the Moabites, Ammonites, and other tribes. In the prospect of this great danger he proclaimed a fast, and humbly sought the Lord's help, which was promised through Jahaziel, a Levite. Accordingly God supernaturally interfered. The invaders set upon each other, and were destroyed; and Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem in triumph (1-29); this deliverance being supposed, not without probable reason, to be alluded to in Psalms xviii., lxxxiii. It was perhaps, subsequently to this event that Jehoshaphat, with his vassal the king of Edom, joined Jehoram, king of Israel, in that expedition against Moab which was terminated by the fearful deed of the Moabitish king (2 Kings iii.).

The last years of Jehoshaphat were peaceful. Probably he admitted his son Jehoram to partnership with him, whom also, when previously he joined Ahab, it is thought he had left in authority at home. He had many sons, to whom he gave gifts, and made them governors of cities; but to Jehoram, the eldest, he left the crown (2 Chron. xxi. 1-3). He is called Josaphat in Matt. i. 8.

4. The father of king Jehu (2 Kings ix. 2, 14).—5. A priest in the time of David (1 Chron. xv. 24).

JEHO'SHAPHAT, THE VALLEY OF. The name now given to the valley of the Kidron. It is broad and shallow where it commences to the north-west: passing eastward, it has the general platform of the city to the south. Then, when it meets the north-western corner of Olivet, it turns due south, pursuing this direction to Bir Eyub, or the well of Job, at the junction with the valley of Hinnom, where it bends again to the south-east. From the church of the Virgin it is a narrow ravine, sinking rapidly between Ophel and Olivet, till at the Bir Eyub it is more than 500 feet below the top of Zion. Into the depth of this melancholy glen, one could hardly look down from the roof of the temple above without dizziness. 'This rapid slope is grey and bare: some scanty tufts of herbage scarce find root in its loose ashy soil; and towards its base a few flat tombs are niched upon any practicable spot, hanging like the very image of oblivion just above the channel of the Kidron, loosened from their precarious hold by its wintry torrent' (Bartlett, Walks about Jerusalem, p. 111). Various sepulchres are found along the course of this ravine, among them the so-called tomb of Absalom, and close to it the reputed tomb of Jehoshaphat, from which possibly the valley may have taken its name.

But it is not so called either in scripture or by Josephus; nor can the use of this appellation be traced higher than the fourth century after Christ. Both Jews and Mohammedans believe that it is to be the scene of the last judgment; and the latter show a stone pillar, on which they say Mohammed is to sit. This notion is probably derived from Joel iii. 2, 12; but there is a strong objection against the identification of the valley, 'emek, there mentioned, with the ravine, nahhal, of the Kidron. It has otherwise been imagined that Joel alludes to 'the valley of Berachah' or 'blessing' (2 Chron. xx. 26); 'but, as neither of these localities,' says Henderson, 'at all comports with the magnitude of the subject treated of by the prophet, we have no alternative but that of considering the words, not as constituting a proper name, or the name of any specific locality, but as symbolical in their import, and designed to characterize the theatre of the bloody wars that took place after the Babylonish captivity, by which the hostile nations contiguous to Judea had signal vengeance inflicted upon them. They literally signify the valley where Jehovah judgeth, and mean the scene of divine judgments. The term valley appears to have been selected on account of such locality being mentioned in scripture as the usual theatre of military conflict' (Minor Proph., p. 118).

JEHO'SHEBA (Jehovah is her oath). The wife of Jehoiada the priest. She was the daughter of king Jehoram, but in all probability not by Athaliah. When the royal family were destroyed by that abandoned woman, Jehosheba saved and secured her infant nephew Joash, with his nurse, and, no doubt by means of her husband, kept him for six years in the house of the Lord, till the seasonable time came for Jehoiada to produce him, and place him on the throne (2 Kings xi. 2, 3). Her name is given as Jehoshabeath in 2 Chron. xxii. 11. No other princess is mentioned as being married to a high priest.

JEHO'SHUA (Jehovah his help). The full form of the name generally found as Joshua (Numb. xiii. 16). See JOSHUA, 1.

JEHO'SHUAH (id.). This form, identical in the Hebrew with the preceding, occurs in some copies of our version (1 Chron. vii. 27). See JOSHUA, 1.

JEHO'VAH (he will be, or become?). The special and significant name of the Deity as developing himself in a covenant-relationship with his people. It is derived from a Hebrew root which means 'to be.' The exact form of it however, is doubtful, because the Jews always attach to it the vowels of another word. But it is likely that it is a future form, Jahveh, in accordance with the declaration to Moses, 'I am that I am' (Exod. iii. 14), or 'I will be that I will be,' the coming one. The ground-notion, then, is that of manifestation, of God's becoming all that his purposes intend, and his promises foreshadow. Essentially he changes not, but he manifests himself with greater clearness to the perceptions of his creatures, as they see him developing his glorious attributes in the advancing steps of that redemption, that great victory over evil, which, announced just after the fall, had its successive illustrations in the choice of a peculiar people, in the deliverances wrought for them, in the types which their history furnished, in the prophecies entrusted to them, till the coming of that Great One, towards whose unrivalled sovereignty all things are still tending. And yet more and more is Jehovah, the Redeemer-God, accomplishing his will in the sight of men, till the crowns of the universe shall be placed together, symbol of his single authority, upon his brow. In Jehovah, then was to be understood the idea of development. The name was known before: Moriah (Gen. xxii. 2) was probably a compound of it; but in its full meaning, in the covenant-relationship signified by it, the early patriarchs knew it not (Exod. vi. 3).

A diversity of authorship has been supposed in the Pentateuch; and those portions in which Jehovah, rendered in our version 'the Lord,' is used, have been attributed to one writer; while those in which the Deity is termed Elohim, 'God,' are believed to proceed from another. Differences of style and tone have also been imagined to characterize the two. If it be understood merely that Moses used existing documents, no great objection need be made to such a theory. But, if, as some critics have endeavoured to show, the two writers—the Jehovist and the Elohist they have been termed—wrote not under divine guidance, or according to the exact truth of matters, but rather according to the peculiar bent of their own minds, the notion must be decidedly rejected. On a careful examination of the sacred text, it would seem that generally these two names are adopted according as each in its place best expresses that character in which in the recorded history God specially revealed himself. When speaking or acting as the great and powerful Creator and Ruler of the universe, he is properly called Elohim; when appearing as carrying out the provisions of his covenant with his people, developing his gracious purposes, he is rightly designated Jehovah. So that there is a propriety in the double use, just as there is in the use, according to circumstances, of 'Jesus' and 'Christ' in the New Testament, which now we are accustomed to employ indifferently. The topic cannot be further discussed here. It is investigated at some length in Horne's Introd., edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 549-561: see also, for a succinct notice, PENTATEUCH.

JEHO'VAH-JI'REH (Jehovah will see, or provide). The name given to the place where Abraham erected his altar for the sacrifice of his son, and the Lord provided a ram instead of Isaac; whence came the proverbial expression 'In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen' (Gen. xxii. 14). Kalisch would translate 'On the mount of the Lord one shall be seen' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 448), i. e. people appear: it is only, if sacrifices are offered as God selects and appoints them, that the presence of the offerer at the temple is acceptable to him. Other interpretations have been proposed; but the most obvious is probably the most satisfactory: God's interposition will be manifested: when human help is vain, and no way appears of extrication from difficulty, those who trust him shall find that, at the critical moment, the Lord will interfere for them. Man's extremity is God's opportunity: in the mount of the Lord he shall be seen. There is very likely a reference to the meaning of Moriah, manifestation of Jehovah.

JEHO'VAH-NIS'SI (Jehovah my banner). So the altar was called which Moses raised on occasion of the defeat of the Amalekites (Exod. xvii. 15). Perhaps the allusion is to the sacred rod which Moses held in his hand during the battle, as a kind of banner, and which, as it was raised or lowered, influenced the result of the fight.

JEHO'VAH-SHA'LOM (Jehovah is peace). The name given by Gideon to the altar he built at Ophrah after the angel of the Lord had appeared to him (Judges vi. 24).

JEHO'VAH-SHAM'MAH (Jehovah is there). The name to be given to the city prophetically described by Ezekiel (Ezek. xlviii. 35, marg.).

JEHO'VAH-TSID'KENU (Jehovah our righteousness). A name applied by the prophet Jeremiah to the King who should spring from David's line (Jer. xxiii. 6, marg.), thus describing Messiah's divine character. The same appellation is given to the church (xxxiii. 16, marg.), who, by her union with Christ, shares his titles. Some critics, however, propose a different translation: 'This is he who shall call to her, Jehovah our Righteousness.'

JEHO'ZABAD (whom Jehovah bestows).—1. One of the conspirators who slew Joash king of Judah (2 Kings xii. 21; 2 Chron. xxiv. 26).—2. One of the Levite porters (1 Chron. xxvi. 4).—3. A military commander in Jehoshaphat's reign (2 Chron. xvii. 18).

JEHO'ZADAK (whom Jehovah makes just). The son of the high priest Seraiah. He was carried into captivity to Babylon (1 Chron. vi. 14, 15), and was the father of Jeshua, or Joshua, who returned with Zerubbabel. He is more frequently called Jozadak and Josedech.

JE'HU (Jehovah is he).—1. A prophet, who pronounced the divine sentence against Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kings xvi. 1-4, 7, 12). He also rebuked Jehoshaphat king of Judah (2 Chron. xix. 1-3), and compiled some annals of the last-named monarch (xx. 34).

2. The son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi. He was designated as the future king of Israel to Elijah in the wilderness of Horeb (1 Kings xix. 16, 17); and his commission should be to extirpate the idolatrous house of Ahab, slaying those whom the sword of Hazael would not touch. Though so designated, the solemn anointing of Jehu to his office was to be not yet. Elijah passed first into the eternal world; and it was not till Ahab had ended his weak and godless career, and Ahaziah had committed his daring acts of impiety, and Joram had for some years swayed the sceptre with sinful hand, that Elisha, who had succeeded to Elijah's office, admonished it is likely by God that the time of repentance was past, and judgment must now be done, sent 2 messenger, one of the sons of the prophets, to Ramoth-gilead, which Jehu and the other Hebrew commanders were keeping, to anoint him king. Jehovah was sovereign paramount; and he had a right to choose who should reign under him (2 Kings ix. 1-10). When Jehu's companions were made aware of the real nature of the young prophet's message, they entered heartily into the conspiracy, and proclaimed Jehu king. With little delay he set out for Jezreel, where Joram had gone to be healed of his wounds. From the towers of the city he is espied hastening with his company across the plain; and, when two messengers brought back no answer, Joram and his nephew, Ahaziah of Judah, who had come to visit him, both went out to meet Jehu. Both were slain, and the prophecy against Ahab's house fulfilled literally when Joram's dead body was cast into the plot of ground which had been illegally wrested from Naboth, and when Jezebel, who had taunted the avenger as he entered Jezreel, was crushed beneath his chariot-wheels, and her carcase devoured by the hungry dogs that prowled about the city (11-37). Jehu accomplished God's command: he destroyed all the rest of Ahab's family (x. 1-17). And he gathered the worshippers of Baal by a stratagem, and slew them in Baal's temple (18-28). But his deeds were done from his own lust of reigning; and, though he boasted of his zeal for God, it was simply because that zeal he perceived was making him a king. And so, though God set his seal upon the judgment of Ahab's house by promising Jehu that for four generations his seed should reign, yet, because Jehu had gratified therein his own ambition, God declared also that judgment should come on his ungodly posterity (Hos. i. 4). Jehu reigned twenty-eight years, 884-856 B.C., still keeping up the calf-worship of Jeroboam. His kingdom was harassed by Hazael, king of Syria (2 Kings x. 29-36); and the Assyrian power was beginning also to make its pressure felt. Jehu's name, as the son, i.e. one of the successors, of Omri, has been read on the black obelisk in the British Museum.

3. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 38).

4. A Simeonite chief (iv. 35).—5. A Benjamite, one of those who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 3).

JEHUB'BAH (he will be hidden). A chief-tain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 34).

JEHU'CAL (potent). An eminent person in Jerusalem in the reign of Zedekiah (Jer. xxxvii. 3). He is also called Jucal (xxxviii. 1).

JE'HUD (praised). A city allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 45). It is probably el-Yehudiyeh, about seven miles east of Jaffa.

JEHU'DI (a Jew). A person who was sent for the roll of Jeremiah's prophecies, and read it to king Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxvi. 14, 21, 23).

JEHU'DI'JAH (the Jewess). This is perhaps not a proper name, but used to distinguish one wife of Mered from the other, who was an Egyptian (1 Chron. iv. 18). She is the same with Hodiah (19).

JEHU'SH (to whom God hastens, a collector?). A descendant of king Saul (1 Chron. viii. 39). The word is the same with that rendered Jeush.

JEI'EL (perhaps treasured of God).—1. A Reubenite chief (1 Chron. v. 7).—2. A Levite porter appointed for the musical service of the sanctuary (xv. 18, 21, xvi. 5).—3. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chron. xx. 14).—4. A scribe in the time of Uziah (xxvi. 11).—5. A Levite who took part in Hezekiah's reformation (xxix. 13).—6. A chief Levite in Josiah's time (xxxv. 9).—7. One who accompanied Ezra on his journey from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 13).—8. A person who had married a foreign wife (x. 43).

JEKAB'ZEEL (which God gathers). A city in the extreme south of Judah (Neh. xi. 25). It is the fuller form of Kabzeel (Josh. xv. 21; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20). See KAB-ZEEL.

JEKAM'EAM (who gathers the people). A Levite in David's time (1 Chron. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23).

JEKAMI'AH (whom Jehovah gathers). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 41), called also Jecamiah (iii. 18).

JEKU'THIEL (piety towards, or trust in, God). One of Judah's descendants (1 Chron. iv. 18).

JEMI'MA (dove, or perhaps beautiful as the day). The eldest of Job's daughters, born after his restoration to prosperity (Job xlii. 13, 14).

JEMI'NI (1 Sam. ix. 1, marg.). The textual rendering is no doubt right: see GEMINI.

JEM'NAAN (Judith ii. 28). Perhaps Jamnia or Jabneel.

JEMU'EL (day of God). The eldest son of Simeon (Gen. xli. 10; Exod. vi. 15). But in Numb. xxvi. 12; 1 Chron. iv. 24 the name is given as Nemuel.

JEPH'THAE (Heb. xi. 32). The Greek form of Jephthah.

JEPH'THAH (whom God sets free). An Israelitish hero and judge, the son of Gilead by a concubine. Discouraged and driven out by his brethren, he established himself in a district called Tob, and gathered round him a band, who, probably by marauding expeditions, acquired a formidable renown; so that, when the Ammonites had occupied some of the trans-Jordanic territory, and had even passed the Jordan and attacked the western tribes (Judges x. 8, 9), Jephthah was solicited to take the command against them. He reproached the Gileadites with their conduct towards him, but consented to lead them on condition of being appointed their governor. He then sent envoys to the Ammonitish king, maintaining Israel's right to the territory north of the Arnon, seeing that it had been conquered from the actual possessors and had been occupied for 300 years. The negotiation came to nothing; and then Jephthah, having collected troops from Manasseh and Gilead, utterly defeated the Ammonites. But prior to his march he had vowed to devote and sacrifice to the Lord whatever might first welcome him on his return in triumph to his residence at Mizpeh. It was his only daughter that first came forth, to Jephthah's after dismay; and he did with her according to his vow (xi.).

Scarcely any scripture topic has been more keenly discussed than the question, What did Jephthah do? Did he actually sacrifice his daughter? or did he merely devote her to perpetual celibacy? and learned men will never agree in the solution. It is clear that there are formidable difficulties in the way of believing that an Israelite instructed in the law and history of his country could offer human sacrifice; especially as Jephthah is mentioned with commendation among the worthies of the race (1 Sam. xii. 11; Heb. xi. 32). But yet he could not have expected that any animal would come out to meet him: he must therefore have contemplated human sacrifice. His daughter, it is evident, was not aware of his vow; but the intended sacrifice of an animal would no doubt have been at once proclaimed. There was perhaps little intercourse between the tribes east and west of the Jordan at the period. Besides, Jephthah, a kind of brigand-chief, though he knew much of the history of Israel, might know little of the law; and human sacrifices were practised by neighbouring nations. Further, we have no instance of females being devoted to celibacy; and, if this girl were so devoted, she needed not to ask delay in order to bewail her lot. All these reasons, briefly given, and more might be added, incline to the fearful alternative that Jephthah did sacrifice his daughter. But the opinion is expressed with diffidence; and many will dissent from it (see Kitto, Daily Bible Illustrations, twenty-fifth week, second day; Wiener, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Jephthah'; Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 963, 964). It may be added that there is no ground for imagining that the high priest sanctioned the act, as the Jews believe.

One more fact in Jephthah's history is to be noticed. The Ephraimites, angry that they had not been summoned, crossed the Jordan and threatened to destroy Jephthah and his property. He therefore gathered his army, attacked and entirely defeated them, detecting the fugitives by their dialect, as they tried to re-cross the river. Forty-two thousand Ephraimites fell. Jephthah retained his power in the trans-Jordanic region six years, till his death (Judges xii. 1-7).

JEPHUN'NE (Ecclus. xli. 7). Jephunneh.

JEPHUN'NEH (may he be regarded with favour, or a beholder).—1. The father of Caleb the spy (Numb. xiii. 6). He is called a Kenizite (Josh. xiv. 14, and elsewhere).—2. A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 38).

JERAH (the moon). A son of Joktan, or name of a tribe descended from him, in southern Arabia (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chron. i. 20). There is a difficulty in identifying the locality of this tribe; and various conjectures have been made respecting them. There is, it seems, a fortress still bearing the name Yerakh at the extremity of the Yemen. Or their settlements may have been in the neighbourhood of Hadramaut (Hazar-maveth); as there are there a 'moon-mountain,' and a 'moon-coast.' But nothing certain can be stated.

JERAH'MEEL (on whom God has mercy).—1. The son of Hezron, Judah's grandson (1 Chron. ii. 9, 25, 26, 27, 33, 42).—2. A Levite of the family of Merari (xxiv. 29).—3. A person, son of Hammelech (or of the king), who was with others commanded to arrest Baruch and Jeremiah (Jer. xxxv. 26).

JERAH'MEELITES. A tribe or clan descended from Jerahmeel, 1 (1 Sam. xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). They occupied the southern district of Judah.

JER'ECHUS (1 Esdr. v. 22). Jericho.

JER'ED (descent).—1. (1 Chron. i. 2). See JARED.—2. A descendant of Judah, and father or founder of Gedor. He appears to have been the son of Mered by his Jewish wife (iv. 18); but the text is not very clear.

JER'EMAI (dwelling in heights). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 33).

JEREMI'AH (whom Jehovah sets up).—1. The father of Hamutal, wife of Josiah. He is described as of Libnah (2 Kings xxiii. 31, xxiv. 18).—2. A chief of Manasseh (1 Chron. v. 24).—3. A Benjamite who joined David (xii. 4).—4, 5, Two Gadite chiefs (10, 13).

6. A celebrated prophet and priest (2 Chron. xxxv. 25), the son of Hilkiah of Anathoth, a Benjamite city allotted to the priests, about three miles from Jerusalem. It is not probable that this Hilkiah was the high priest in Josiah's reign, because we may conclude (1 Kings ii. 26; 1 Chron. xxiv. 3) that the priests at Anathoth were descendants of Ithamar; whereas Hilkiah the high priest was of the family of Eleazar (vi. 4-13).

Jeremiah's lot was cast in troublous times. The long wicked reign of Manasseh had thoroughly demoralized the people of Judah. And, though ere his death that monarch had repented and striven to repair the evil he had caused, yet Amon his son returned to idolatry. It was in a darkened sky, therefore, that the star of the youthful Josiah gleamed forth; and all his efforts at reformation when he grew towards man's estate were powerless to arrest the growing wickedness of the people, or to avert the judgments which were coming on them (2 Kings xxii. 16, 17, xiii. 26, 27). Amid the fierce struggles for empire then going on in Asia, the small kingdom of Judah could not hope to be independent; and the Lord had destined the rising Babylonian power to be the instrument of inflicting deserved punishment upon Judea. Had the Jews humbled themselves and meekly submitted to the chastisement, though they might not have escaped the Babylonian yoke, they would have found it light. But they resisted and rebelled against God's purposes, and looked round for some alliance which, as they thought, would protect them. It had often been a favourite policy to seek help from Egypt (Isai. xxx. 1, 2, xxxi. 1-3, xxxvi. 6); and accordingly it would seem that there was a powerful Egyptian party in Jerusalem, and a belief that thus they should be strong enough to resist the Chaldeans, and yet continue in the sins which had provoked the Lord to threaten the judgment of invasion. It is likely, too, that in resisting the Chaldeans the Jews were violating treaty engagements. Already the Assyrian power had overshadowed Israel; so that their kings were little more than vassals; and, as Babylon had now succeeded to the Assyrian supremacy, there was some kind of allegiance due from the princes of Judah to the sovereign of Babylon. It must have been on some such principles that Josiah acted when he resisted the march of Pharaoh against Carchemish.

Bearing in mind the facts which have just been adverted to, we shall easily see how perilous was the position to which Jeremiah was called. God would raise up a prophet who should announce the coming judgments—judgments which even repentance would only partially avert. Heretofore the divine messengers, when they called to humiliation for sin, were empowered to promise full deliverance. The Lord (Isaiah declared) would defend Jerusalem; and the hosts of the great king should melt away like snow before the sun from the impregnable walls of Zion. Heretofore the city of David towered in independent glory: the spoiler that touched it touched the apple of God's eye. But sin persisted in had destroyed that security: obstinate rebellion had ruined the hope of successful resistance. Those whose eyes God had opened saw that now all that could be done was to make the best terms possible with a foreign lord. The longing eye might still look forward to the distant splendour of Messiah's reign; but for the present there was only submission, vassalage. Former prophets had sounded the trumpet, and stirred up the Israelites: they had cheered them when desponding to fight valiantly for the cities of their God. Now there was a mournful change. The prophetic voice was sad. It was to discourage instead of to incite to resistance: its office was to counsel prostration before a heathen power. The awful words of Moses had indeed come to pass (Deut. xxviii.): the bitter cup must now be drained: the only hope was meekly and reverently to take it at the Lord's hand. We have here the clue to much that would otherwise surprise us in Jeremiah's history and Jeremiah's writings. We have here the key to the mournfulness of his tone, to the disappointments, persecutions, griefs, that weighed him down. We might have imagined that a hard, an iron man, would have been selected for the office he was to fill, that another Tishbite would be sent down from Gilead with the fatal message. But God's thoughts are higher than our thoughts. He chooses his instruments after no maxims of worldly wisdom. It was a youth, who was to bear the tidings, one of a tender spirit, one ready to shrink from the burden, and to have the bitter disappointment, so far as that evil generation was concerned, of prophesying in vain.

It was in the thirteenth year of Josiah (Jer. i. 2) that the word of the Lord first came to Jeremiah. He was then, it would seem, residing at Anathoth, and, as already said, very young. For, although the word used (6) is not determinate, yet, as we know that Jeremiah prophesied at least forty years, to the taking of Jerusalem, and possibly longer, it must have been in early life that the commission was entrusted to him. And this, with his residence at Anathoth, will explain why, when the book of the law was found five years after, counsel was sought of Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 14) rather than of him. The burden of the prophet's message was soon perceived. He was to testify that recourse to Egypt was sinful and in vain (comp. Ezek. xvii.), and that their own sins were bringing destruction upon the people (Jer. ii. 17). And he announced the coming woe: a mighty nation from the north was the destined avenger (i. 15, v. 15, vi. 22). This was openly declared in Jerusalem, and through the various cities of Judah (xi. 6). And the prophet's ordinary habits would show the fearful character of the crisis. He was, at least for a time, to enter neither the house of feasting nor that of mourning, to take no wife, but as a solitary man to be a sign to the thronged and busy city that she should ere long be lone and desolate (xvi. 2, 5, 8).

The message was most unwelcome. His townsmen conspired against his life (xi. 19, 21); and it is probable that after this he took up his residence in Jerusalem. The judgments were now beginning. Josiah fell in battle; and Jeremiah composed lamentations for him. Jehoahaz succeeded, and was soon removed by the Egyptian king, who placed Jehoiakim upon the throne. Jehoiachin, Zedekiah, reigned in turn; and again and again did the Chaldeans spoil Jerusalem, and carry away the chief of the nation captive; while in vain did Jeremiah urge submission. He was denounced as a traitor. The priests and the false prophets demanded his life (xxvi. 11); and it was only by the interference of Ahikam that he was delivered. Jehoiakim himself once endeavoured to apprehend him (xxxvi. 26); and, when under the last weak king, seeing the fruitlessness of his expostulations, he was taking an opportunity of leaving Jerusalem to go into the territory of Benjamin, probably to his ancient home, he was seized, accused of deserting to the enemy, cast into a dungeon, and his life again demanded, as weakening, they said, the hands of the men of war (xxxvii., xxxviii.). When the city was taken, Jeremiah received kind treatment from the Chaldean chiefs: he then joined Gedaliah, the son of his friend Ahikam, and, after his murder, was carried by the remaining captains, whom he warned in vain, into Egypt (xxxix.-xliii.), where, according to one tradition, he was stoned by his own people, while, according to another, he afterwards went to Babylon, and died there. Other legendary stories there are about him which need not be here repeated. We learn much of this prophet's own mind from his writings. He has recorded his communings with God, his grief at the ruin of his nation, and for the cruelty with which he was treated. He describes his misgivings lest he was misapprehending God's message, and the burning fire of the word within him (xx. 7-9), and sometimes he breaks forth into passionate exclamations, lamenting that ever he came out of his mother's womb 'to see labour and sorrow' (18). Intermingled with his predictions is his own experience, very instructive for the church in every age.

7. A priest, or representative of a course of priests, who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 2). The priest mentioned in xi. 2 was either the same, or the person who gave name to the course. At a later period Hananiah was the head of it (xii. 12).—8. One of the Rechabites (Jer. xxxv. 3).

JEREMI'AH, THE BOOK OF. 628-586 B.C. The arrangement of this book is on the face of it so chronologically inexact that some critics have imagined that the chapters have been altered from their original order.

Attempts have therefore been made to assign their proper historical place to the various portions. Thus, Jer. i. is evidently at the beginning of Jeremiah's ministry, in the thirteenth year of Josiah; the latter part of the inscription (3) being of course added afterwards. Then we may also consider ii. 1—iii. 5 as of early date. The Scythian invasion of Media, Asia Minor, &c., must have occurred in Josiah's reign: it was checked by Psammetichus, king of Egypt; and, though Jeremiah does not appear to refer to it, yet it must have created alarm in Judah; and Egypt would be looked to for protection. This section was evidently delivered while the eyes of the Jews were directed towards Egypt. The next portion, iii. 6—vi. 30, is expressly stated to belong to the days of Josiah. The nation from far (v. 15, vi. 22) is not the Scythians but the Chaldeans. Chaps. vii., viii., ix., are also generally assigned to Josiah's reign. There is some difficulty in deciding; for it seems unlikely that that pious king would have permitted the idol practices 'in the streets of Jerusalem' (vii. 17, 18). Some critics, as Hengstenberg and Keil, regard these chapters as a kind of resumé of Jeremiah's early ministry, in which he has collected the substance of what he said at different times. But they are not (as they would in that case be) a continuous whole; and the fresh titles and directions (iii. 6, vii. 1) are a great objection to such a theory. We may further suppose xi. 1-17 to have been uttered just when the book of the law was found in the temple, in the eighteenth year of Josiah.

The earlier ministry of the prophet had lasted twenty-three years, from the thirteenth of Josiah to the fourth of Jehoiakim; and the portions of the book above mentioned seem to be all that we can with any degree of certainty ascribe to this period. In the last-named year we find many oracles delivered. These are xxv., to which may be appended xvi. 2-12, also xxvi., xxxv., evidently when the Chaldeans were first approaching (comp. Dan. i. 1), xxxvi., xlv., and probably the sections xvi. 1—xvii. 18, and xvii. 19-27. We may perhaps refer xiv., xv., delivered in the time of famine, to this reign, and xviii. To this last chapter the account of the murderous purpose of the prophet's townsmen at Anathoth, together with the resulting complaint and predictions (xi. 18—xii. 17) may be supposed a supplement.

To the short reign of Jehoiachin, so soon deposed and carried with many other captives to Babylon, the section x. 17-25 may be assigned, and possibly xiii., relating a symbolical act, of which it is difficult to say whether it was literally performed.

Zedekiah was now placed upon the throne. To the beginning of his reign we may ascribe chap. xxiv.; and, as about the same time an embassy was sent to Babylon, the prophet directed to the captives there the letter which we find in chap. xxix. And we may not improbably suppose that the section x. 1-16 was addressed to the exiles at the same time. It was very suitable for those who were living among the heathen; and then the curious fact of verse 11 being written in Chaldee will be accounted for. Next in chronological order very possibly come xxvii., xxviii.; 'Jehoiakim' in xxvii. 1 being obviously a transcriber's mistake for 'Zedekiah.' And, according to li. 59, the prophecy against Babylon (l., li.) was delivered in the fourth of Zedekiah. We may place next xxii. 1—xxiii. 8, a reference to the fate of the king's three predecessors, and a warning to him, concluding with a remarkable prophecy of Messiah. The oracle against false prophets succeeds (xxiii. 9-40). Chaps. xix., xx. may be assigned to the time of Zedekiah's rebellion before the avenging Chaldean armies appeared; xxxiv. 1-7, when they had entered Judea, and reduced all the fortresses except Lachish and Azekah, which they were attacking; xxi., a little later, while yet the Jews were not cooped up within their walls. In their distress the people had agreed to grant liberty to their slaves; but, when the Chaldeans retired on the approach of the Egyptians (xxxvii. 5), they revoked the grant of freedom. To this juncture must be referred xxxiv. 8-22 and xxxvii. 3-10. Jeremiah wished to retire into Benjamin, but was stopped and placed in custody, first in Jonathan the scribe's house, and afterwards, with less rigour, in 'the court of the prison' (11-21). While here the transaction related in xxxii. took place; and in this dark time there were cheering utterances of future joy, in xxxiii., when several houses were demolished for purposes of the siege, and in xxx., xxxi., comprehending Israel as well as Judah. Chap. xxxviii. must be assigned to the closing scene: the bread in the city was well-nigh spent; and in desperation the princes cast Jeremiah into a foul pit, from which he was raised by Ebed-melech, to whom the message (xxxix. 15-18) was communicated, no doubt immediately after. The sections xxxix. 1-14, xl. 1—xliii. 7 narrate the capture of the city and other events till the going-down of the remnant into Egypt; where the prediction of xliii. 8-13 was delivered, and xlv. perhaps somewhat later: xvi. 13—xlix. 39 are oracles against various heathen nations, of which that against Elam (xlix. 34-39) is dated at the beginning of Zedekiah's reign: it is not improbable that the rest were delivered contemporaneously with that against Egypt (xlvi. 2-12), before noted as in the fourth of Jehoiakim, and the closing section; and lii. is an historical appendix, nearly identical with 2 Kings xxiv. 18-xxv. 30.

The chronological distribution which has here been followed is almost entirely that of Bleek (Einleitung in das A. T., pp. 469, &c.); and, though there must be some uncertainty in regard to several portions, yet it appears for the most part to be based (where the notes of time are not given in the text) on very probable grounds. But it must not be imagined, because these prophecies are not now ranged in chronological order, that they have been carelessly displaced, and thrown together at random. We can discover traces of a classification according to their subjects, and we can see reasons, from some incidental notices, why the collection was made as we have it. Keil (Einleitung, § 75) finds a general distribution into two parts; and Bleek's view, though he makes three parts, is not very different.

The two parts are:—I. Domestic prophecies and histories (i.—xlvi.), including 1. Longer discourses (i.—xxiv.); 2. Special predictions of the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity, placed together on account of the subject being the same, introduced by an announcement of the judgment of many nations (xxv.—xxix.); 3. Predictions of future blessing, united because of their similarity (xxx.—xxxiii.); 4. Shorter utterances on special occasions, with an account of the occasions (xxxiv.—xxxix.); 5. Historical narrative, with the special message to Baruch (xl.—xlv.). II. Prophecies against foreign nations (xlv.—li.); lii. being an appendix.

A writer in the Princeton (U.S.) Review (reprinted in Brit. and For. Evangelical Review, April 1860, pp. 396-413) proposes an ingenious plan of distribution. Leaving out the appendix, lii., he finds three parts:—

I. Prediction of the judgment on Judah, and the future restoration (i.—xxxiii.), comprising—

1. Denunciation of the people as a whole (i.—xx.).
2. Denunciation of their civil and spiritual leaders (xxi.—xxiii.).
3. The design and duration of the judgment (xxiv.—xxix.).
4. The blessings which would succeed it (xxx.—xxxiii.).

II. The history of the judgment (xxxiv.—xlv.), containing—

1. Evidences of ripeness for judgment (xxxiv.—xxxviii.).
2. The destruction of the city (xxxix.).
3. The fortunes of the surviving remnant (xl.—xlv.).

III. Predictions against foreign nations (xlv.—li.).

There is every reason to believe that the collection of these prophecies was made by Jeremiah himself, or at least by his amanuensis Baruch. According to what we read in xxvi., xlv., he was instructed to have written in a roll the threatenings against Israel and Judah and other nations. These were probably not dictated from memory, but read to Baruch from earlier memoranda. When the roll so produced was destroyed by Jehoiakim, it was re-written with additions, but containing of course only those which had been delivered down to that time. At a later period the prophet received another command (xxx. 2) to collect his utterances. And it is very probable that while in Egypt, with these two collections before him, he embodied them into the book we have. There is no trace (excepting the appendix, lii.) of a later date. And, though some critics have chosen to except against portions as being from a different hand, careful examination (a detail of which the size of the present volume forbids) shows that the arguments they have alleged are not of weight.

There is indeed one puzzling circumstance connected with the book of Jeremiah, respecting which a few words must be said. The Septuagint version is generally good and faithful; but there are extraordinary variations from the Hebrew text. Thus, many omissions occur in the LXX., e.g. x. 6-8, xxvii. 19-22, xxix. 16-20, xxxiii. 14-26, &c. There are also some additions, and numerous differences. There is, further, a remarkable transposition of chapters; as may be seen in the following table:—

xxvi. 1-11	xlvi. 2-12
12-26	13-28.
xxvii., xxviii.	l. ii.
xxix. 1-7	xlvii. 1-7.
7-22	xliv. 7-22.
xxx. 1-5	1-6.
6-11	28-33.
12-16	23-27.
xxxi.	xlviii.
xxxii.	xxv. 15-39.
xxxiii.-li.	xxvi.-xlv.
lii.	lii.

Several hypotheses have been devised to explain this diversity. Keil argues strongly in favour of the Masoretic text (Einleitung, § 77); while Bleek believes that the LXX. better represents the text as it came from the prophet, and that the book as placed in the Hebrew canon in the time of Nehemiah had various alterations and additions made (Einleitung, pp. 490, &c.). Perhaps, though in some cases the LXX. may present a better reading, Keil is substantially right. For the full discussion of the subject students must be directed to the works just named, and those to which they refer.

The style of this book is elegant, and the sentiments pathetic and tender. And, while for the most part it contains denunciations of judgment, there are consolatory promises, and predictions of the Messiah and the blessings of the new covenant. See Jer. xxiii. 5, 6, xxxi. 31-37.

Among the commentaries on Jeremiah may be named those of Blayney, 1784; Umbreit, 1842; Henderson, 1851.

JEREMIAS (Matt. xvi. 14). A Greek form of Jeremiah; used likewise in the Apocrypha, as in Eccles. xlix. 6.

JEREMIAS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Probably Jeremai (Ezra x. 33).

JER'EMOTH (heights).—1. A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. viii. 14).—2. A Levite of the family of Merari (xxiii. 23), called also (xxiv. 30) Jerimoth.—3. The head of one of the divisions of singers (xxv. 22); he also is named (4) Jerimoth.—4. 5. Two persons who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 26, 27).

JER'EMY (Matt. ii. 17, xxvii. 9). Another form of Jeremiah. This, too, is found in the Apocrypha, as in 1 Esdr. i. 28.

JERIAH (founded or constituted of Jehovah). A Kohathite Levite (1 Chron. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23). He is called Jerijah in xxvi. 31.

JER'IBAI (for whom Jehovah pleads). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 46).

JER'ICHO (place of fragrance). A city of Palestine first mentioned in the Pentateuch as defining the position of the Israelites, who, when encamped in the plains of Moab, were over-against it (Numb. xxii. 1, xxvi. 3). It was a rich and strongly-fortified place. The walls must have been thick, for Rahab's house was on the wall (Josh. ii. 15); and the spoil was large which was taken into the Lord's treasury (vi. 24); the abundance of it being further proved by the possibility of a single man like Achan being able to appropriate property of so much value (vii. 21). Some territory, too, belonged to this city; for its border is said to have reached to Gilgal (iv. 19).

Jericho, opposite to which the Israelites crossed the Jordan, was the first town they attacked; and orders were given utterly to destroy it; partly, perhaps, by this first terrible example to strike fear into the rest of the Canaanites, and partly because, if occupied by an enemy, it might have been dangerous to Israel. Accordingly, after it was taken and destroyed, the walls having supernaturally fallen down, Joshua pronounced a curse against any one who should subsequently re-build it. Rahab alone, who had sheltered the Hebrew spies previously despatched to view the place, was, with her family, spared (ii. vi). The site, just upon the border of Ephraim, was assigned to Benjamin (xvi. 7, xviii. 21). And possibly there might be an unvalled town there. For, if Jericho be the 'city of palm-trees' (Deut. xxxiv. 3; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15), then, as such a city is mentioned later (Judges i. 16, iii. 13), and as David appointed Jericho for the place of retirement to his ambassadors whom the Ammonites had maltreated (2 Sam. x. 5), it does not seem an unreasonable supposition that Joshua's curse was directed against the re-fortifying rather than the re-building of Jericho. Hiel's conduct is, if this be so, more easily understood. Still, whether he acted carelessly or defiantly, the curse was fulfilled in judgment on his family (1 Kings xvi. 34). The re-building or fortifying was in Ahab's reign; and Jericho must then have belonged to the northern kingdom. It flourished; a school of the prophets was established in it; and Elisha miraculously healed its waters—the only thing wanting for its prosperity (2 Kings ii). We hear little more of the place in the Old Testament history. It was to 'the plains of Jericho' (the sunken valley, the Ghor) that Zedekiah fled and was taken there (Jer. xxxix. 5, lii. 8); and some of the inhabitants returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 34; Neh. iii. 2, vii. 36). Jericho was again fortified in the Maccabean times (1 Macc. ix. 50). It was subsequently enlarged and adorned by Herod the Great, and again by Archelaus, who planted palm-trees in the plain; and it was rich and flourishing in our Lord's time, the country around it fertile, and its trade considerable, as may be gathered from a chief publican or tax-collector being stationed there (Luke xix. 2). Christ visited Jericho on his last journey to Jerusalem, and healed there two, perhaps three, blind men (Matt. xx. 29-34; Mark x. 46-52; Luke xviii. 35-43); see Davidson, Sacr. Herm., chap. xii. pp. 558, 559; Horne, Introduct., vol. ii. edit. Ayre, pp. 473, 474; there he tarried with and brought salvation to the house of Zaccheus (Luke xix. 2-10); and on the road between Jericho and Jerusalem he laid the scene of the parable of the good Samaritan (x. 30-37).

The history of Jericho in later times cannot be here given: it is enough to say that it was an almost-uninterrupted decline, till it is become a miserable village called Iiha, in which the sheikh's house, a square castle-like building, is the only one of any pretension. The palm-trees have entirely disappeared; and the plain is intensely hot, fig-trees, maize, and cucumbers still being cultivated there, and bright wild flowers growing luxuriantly. The original Jericho probably stood close by the fountain of Elisha, doubtless the present Ain es-Sultan: that city which our Lord visited was some distance away at the opening of the Wady Kelt. A graphic sketch of the present appearance is given by Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, pp. 613, 617).

JER'IEL (founded of God). A descendant of Issachar (1 Chron. vii. 2).

JER'IAH (founded or constituted of Jehovah) (1 Chron. xxvi. 31). See JERIAH.

JER'IMOTH (heights).—1. 2. Two Benjamites, one of the family of Bela, the other of that of Becher (1 Chron. vii. 7, 8).—3. A Benjamite, perhaps identical with one of the preceding, who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 5).—4. A Merarite Levite (xxiv. 30); see JEREMOTH, 2.—5. The head of one of the divisions of singers (xxv. 4); see JEREMOTH, 3.—6. Ruler of Naphtali in David's reign (xxvii. 19).—7. A son of David, whose daughter was one of Rehoboam's wives (2 Chron. xi. 18). His name does not appear in the lists of David's sons (2 Sam. iii. 2-5; 1 Chron. iii. 1-9, xiv. 4-7); but other sons by concubines are referred to.—8. One of the overseers of offerings and tithes in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

JER'IOTH (curtains). The wife of Caleb, the son of Hezron, Judah's grandson (1 Chron. ii. 18). According to the Vulgate she was his daughter.

JEROBO'AM (whose people is many).—1. The successful leader of the revolt against Rehoboam, and first king of the ten tribes (975-954 B.C.). He is called 'an Ephraimite' (see EPHRAHITE) of Zereda: his father's name was Nebat, who seems to have died early; for Jeroboam is said to have been the son of a widow called Zerah. The young man was capable and industrious; and Solomon employed him in his works, and made him superintendent of the duties which fell, in regard to those works, upon the house of Joseph. He was so employed when the prophet Ahijah gave him to understand, by a symbolical action, that for Solomon's sin the kingdom should be divided, and ten parts placed under Jeroboam's rule. And, if he would be faithful to the Lord's service, the kingly dignity should be made hereditary in his family, as in David's. A bright prospect thus opened before him: had he, like David, patiently waited the Lord's time, and obediently trod the path of holy service, his name, instead of being (as it is) a name of awful warning, might have survived of happy memory, enshrined among the worthies of Israel. Apparently Jeroboam, intoxicated with the greed of power, raised some insurrection, and, utterly unsuccessful, had to flee from Solomon's vengeance into Egypt. There he remained under Shishak's protection till Solomon's decease (1 Kings xi. 26-40).

Rehoboam succeeded to the throne, and was to go to Shechem for a solemn inauguration. But the tribes had groaned under the burdens of Solomon, and were determined to obtain remission of them from the new king. And there was doubtless the ancient jealousy fermenting between the two chief tribes of Judah and Ephraim. It was thought a politic measure to send for Jeroboam from Egypt, and place him at the head of the remonstrance to be made to Rehoboam. Rehoboam's folly alienated the people; and the schism was complete. Judah with Benjamin, in some degree afterwards augmented, remained to the house of David; while the ten tribes formed a new state, of which very naturally, especially when his bold conduct at Shechem was generally known, Jeroboam was made the sovereign (xii. 1-20). Again, then, was Jeroboam put upon his trial; the path of security and peace being opened before him. For the prophet Shemaiah forbade Jeroboam to attempt to subjugate the revolted tribes: they were left therefore quietly to pursue their course. Jeroboam's first step was not unwise. He fortified Shechem, his residence, and also Penuel, a town beyond the Jordan. But then his carnal reasoning suggested that, if he permitted the people to go up to Jerusalem to worship, they would return to Rehoboam's allegiance. Had he trusted the Lord's promise, all would have been well. But no: he must execute his own wicked device: he erected calves of gold at Dan and Beth-el, the two extremities of his dominions, as if they might lawfully be visible symbols of Jehovah: he prescribed festivals himself, and, as the priests and Levites abhorred the sacrilegious service, he made priests of his own, every one who desired the office, and would sacrifice certain victims by way of consecration (2 Chron. xiii. 9); and thus, introducing idolatrous worship, he acquired the frightful title, to cling to his name for ever, of the man 'that made Israel to sin' (1 Kings xii. 25-33).

Two solemn warnings were given to the wretched king. A prophet came from Judah, and denounced the worship at Beth-el. Jeroboam, who stood ready to burn incense on the altar, hastily stretched forth his hand and commanded the prophet to be seized. But instantly the sacrilegious hand was withered; and he was fain to entreat the prayers of the man he had tried to outrage, for the recovery of his hand. If the portent caused a temporary check, Jeroboam returned speedily to his evil course, till the sin grew great and foul enough to cut off his house, and destroy it from the face of the earth (xiii. 1-7, 33, 34). Once again, a son, dearly loved, was stricken with sickness; and sorrow filled the father's heart. Alas! it was but the 'sorrow of the world,' working only death. He bethought him then of his earlier and brighter days, and of the hopes that kindled in his heart when Ahijah had met him long ago in the field and told him he should be a king. He will consult that aged seer. Perchance some relief may be found, some gleam of better fortune. But he dares not go himself. His ill-omened name must not be announced at Shiloh: he will send his wife: 'Get thee to Shiloh; behold there is Ahijah the prophet, which told me that I should be king. . . he shall tell thee what shall become of the child.' Even she, however, must disguise herself. But what is whispered in corners will be proclaimed on the house-top. Ahijah was blind; the instant, however, he heard the sound of her footsteps while yet she was at the door, he cried, 'Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam: I am sent to thee with heavy tidings.' The child, he added, should die, and evil hunt the house of Jeroboam to destruction. The mother saw her son alive no more: as soon as she came to the threshold of the palace-door at Tirzah, he died, mercifully taken (for in him alone of the family was grace) from the evil to come. And Israel mourned for him (xiv. 1-18). Of course Rehoboam had always maintained a hostile attitude; but we do not read of any actual battle between Israel and Judah till Abijah or Abijam had succeeded to the throne in Jerusalem. Vast armies were then drawn out, Jeroboam's by far the largest; but he was utterly defeated; and various towns were taken from him, and he never recovered strength; 'and the Lord struck him; and he died.' He had worn for two-and-twenty years his uneasy crown. His son Nadab reigned after him for two years; and then Baasha executed judgment, and, according to the prophetic word, 'left not to Jeroboam any that breathed. . . because of the sins of Jeroboam which he sinned, and which he made Israel sin' (19, 20, xv. 25-30; 2 Chron. xiii. 1-20).

2. Jeroboam II., great-grandson of Jehu, succeeded his father Joash as king of Israel, and reigned forty-one years, 825-784 B.C. The records we have of his reign are very scanty, but they are very remarkable. Israel had suffered much from Syria; and perhaps the overshadowing influence of Assyria was already felt. It is true that Joash, Jeroboam's father, had gained some victories: still the nation was afflicted; and there seemed little prospect of the return to prosperity. But the prophet Jonah was instructed to promise better times. Jeroboam, indeed, was not a godly man: he retained the idolatrous worship which Jeroboam I. had introduced. Still the Lord pitied his people. He had not yet pronounced final sentence on them. And he gave wonderful success to the Israelitish arms. The full extent of ancient sovereignty was recovered, from the entering of Hamath in the north with all the possessions of the trans-Jordanic tribes, down to the eastern border of the Dead sea, and the river Arnon. The king did not indeed (as some have imagined) subdue Moab and Ammon; but he did take Hamath, which had belonged to Judah under Solomon, and occupy Damascus; no king of the northern state having ever been so victorious as he (2 Kings xiii. 13, xiv. 23-29). But the heart of Israel was lifted up. Pride, and luxury, and corruption, prevailed (Amos ii. 6-8, iii. 14, v. 11, 12, vi. 4-6, 13); and therefore the terrible destruction of the Assyrians was threatened (14, vii.). The fulfilment of the threatening was not far distant. Jeroboam died; and his son Zachariah succeeded, though not perhaps immediately: see ZACHARIAH. One usurper after another seized the crown for a short period; and then came Pul, and Tiglath-pileser, and afterwards Shalmaneser; and the land was desolate (2 Kings xv. 8-31, xvii.).

JERO'HAM (who finds mercy).—1. The father of Elkanah, and grandfather of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 27, 34).—2. A Benjamite chief (viii. 27).—3. Another Benjamite (ix. 8).—4. A priest (12); probably the same with the one mentioned in Neh. xi. 12.—5. The father of some warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 7).—6. The father of the ruler of Dan in David's time (xxvii. 22).—7. The father of one of the captains whom Jehoiada associated with himself for placing Joash on the throne of Judah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

JERUB'BAAL (with whom Baal contends, or, let Baal plead). A name given to Gideon on account of his having destroyed the altar of Baal (Judges vi. 32, vii. 1, viii. 29, 35, ix. 1, 2, 5, 16, 19, 24, 28, 57; 1 Sam. xii. 11). See GIDEON.

JERUB'BESHETH (with whom the idol contends). A name of Gideon, changed from Jerubbaal; Baal being an idol-god or shameful thing (2 Sam. xi. 21). The same change is observable in other names: comp. Esh-baal with Ish-bosheth.

JERU'EL (founded of God). The place where Jehoshaphat was forewarned that he should meet the hostile Moabites and Ammonites (2 Chron. xx. 16). It must have been near the southern extremity of the Dead sea.

JERU'SALEM (foundation of peace, or inheritance of peace, otherwise vision of peace). The earliest mention of this city by this name in scripture occurs in Josh. x. 1. But it is probably intended by the designation Salem, where Melchizedek reigned (Gen. xiv. 18). For we find Jerusalem expressly called Salem in Psal. lxxvi. 2; and Josephus asserts the identity (Antiq., lib. i. 10, § 2; lib.

vii. 3, § 2). Besides, the name of a later king very nearly resembled that of Melchizedek (Josh. x. 1); and this, though of no great weight, is still some presumption that the place where each ruled was the same. It may be added that Psal. cx. seems to connect Melchizedek with Zion. The city had also the appellation Jebus or Jebusi, as occupied by the Jebusites, one of the nations found in Canaan when the Israelites crossed the Jordan (comp. Ezek. xvi. 3). It is then mentioned as just upon the frontier-line of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16), being itself actually within the Benjamite border (28).

Little is told us of its early history. But we may well believe that close by, on one of the eminences, Moriah, subsequently included within the city, Abraham's offering was made, a place thus hallowed for all succeeding generations (Gen. xxii. 1-18). The king of Jerusalem, already referred to, Adoni-zedek, was slain by Joshua (Josh. x. 5, 16, 26); and the place was afterwards sacked by the tribe of Judah (Judges i. 8); but the original inhabitants retained possession of the citadel or strong-hold of Zion, which neither Judah nor Benjamin could wrest from them (Josh. xv. 63; Judges i. 21). And it would seem that, though some Israelites might locate themselves there, it was regarded as a 'city of a stranger,' where a Hebrew was not very willing to pass even a single night (xix. 10-13).

It is not till the establishment of the Israelitish monarchy that we hear of Jerusalem again. Saul, warrior as he was, and a Benjamite who might have been supposed eager to secure the full inheritance of his tribe, did not attack it. But, when David had united the whole nation, one of his first expeditions was against Jerusalem. The Jebusites, confiding in their hitherto-impregnable fortress, derided his attempts, and either placed literally the weakest of their population, the lame and the blind, upon their ramparts in bitter scorn, or, possibly, set in array the images of their gods, who had eyes but could not see, feet but could not walk, as a sufficient defence against the Israelitish king. David thereupon promised the chieftainship of his forces to the man who would storm the citadel. And accordingly his nephew Joab led the forlorn hope and gained the prize. Zion was taken; and David established himself there; so that it was subsequently distinguished as 'the city of David.' He built a wall, too, round the city, connecting the lower town (which Joab repaired) with the fortress, and constituted Jerusalem, we cannot doubt by divine intimation, the capital of his consolidated monarchy (2 Sam. v. 6-10; 1 Chron. xi. 4-9). This achievement produced a deep impression upon the neighbouring powers. The Philistines made two expeditions in the vain hope of wresting David's conquest from him. They were defeated under the walls of Jerusalem; while Hiram, king of Tyre, sent an embassy, and supplied artificers and materials for the works in which the Israelitish sovereign was engaged (2 Sam. v. 11, 17-25; 1 Chron. xiv. 8-17), cementing an alliance which lasted into Solomon's time. David now thought fit to assume more of the state of an oriental monarch. He increased his harem, and had several more children by his numerous wives and concubines, of whom many sons are expressly said to have been born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 13-16; 1 Chron. iii. 5-9). And then he resolved to remove the ark of God thither, which since its captivity among the Philistines had been separated from the tabernacle, and had had no fitting place of abode. The king's first attempt, was frustrated by an awful catastrophe; but afterwards, carried as it ought to be by the priests and Levites, the sacred ark was brought with great rejoicings into the city, where David prepared a tabernacle for it (2 Sam. vi. 1; 1 Chron. xiii., xv.). Thus Jerusalem or Zion became more peculiarly 'the city of the Great King.' 'Beautiful for situation' was it; and bright in happy anticipation was now its early promise.

In Zion appears to have been the sepulchre of the house of David; but we do not read of any other works constructed by this monarch in the city, except the king's gardens, which he is said by Josephus to have made on the slopes where the valleys of Hinnom and the Kidron meet (Antiq., lib. vii. 14, § 4; lib. ix. 10, § 4). Solomon it was who especially adorned and enriched his capital. Besides his works in the immediate neighbourhood we read of his fortifications—the wall of David was apparently rude and simple—his palace, which must have been of vast size to accommodate the women of his harem, his aqueduct for supplying the city with water, the palace he prepared for Pharaoh's daughter, which was not on Zion, his stables, and above all his magnificent temple (1 Kings iii. 1, vii. 1, 8, ix. 1, 10, 15, 24; 2 Chron. i. 14, viii. 11). The wealth thus accumulated in Jerusalem must have been enormous; and luxury must have reigned there. Gold was plentiful; and silver was hardly valued, so vast was its abundance (1 Kings x. 24-27; 2 Chron. ix. 11, 27). It would seem that Solomon had always something on hand, some addition of superb structures. He made large levies of workmen, over whom he placed Jeroboam in a post of trust (1 Kings xi. 27, 28), until his subjects grew weary of the requisitions made upon them (xii. 4, 14).

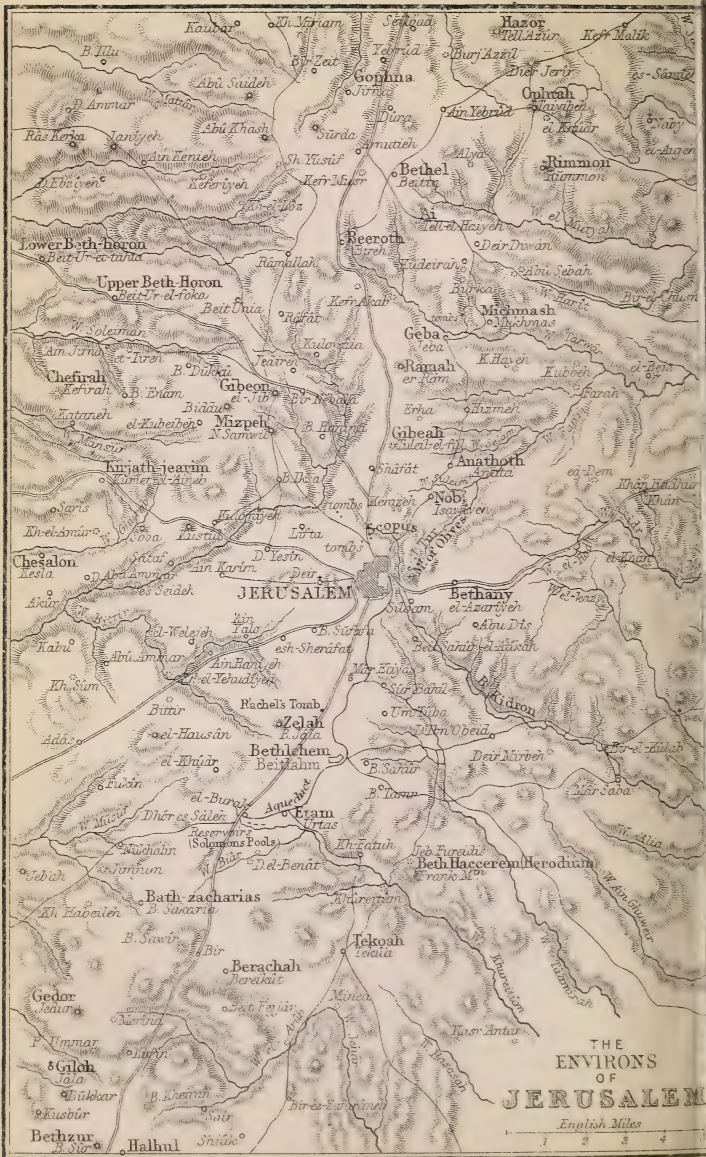

Jerusalem continued in its splendour but a few years. Rehoboam, who by his folly had caused the ten tribes to revolt, by his sin provoked the Lord's sorer judgments. In consequence Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded the land and entered Jerusalem apparently without resistance. He did not, so far as we read, injure the town, but he carried off an enormous mass of plunder (xiv. 22-28; 2 Chron. xii. 1-12), and reduced Rehoboam to a position of vassalage.

It would of course be very much out of place to interweave the history of the southern kingdom into this brief chronicle of the metropolis; only those events in the reigns of the various princes can be noted which specially concerned the city. Jehoshaphat established there a supreme court, empowered, we may conclude, to hear appeals from provincial cities (xix. 8-11). In the days of his wicked son Jehoram, Jerusalem was again plundered by the Philistines and Arabians (xxi. 16, 17); and in Amaziah's reign a still more serious disaster befel it. The king of Israel defeated and took prisoner the king of Judah at Beth-shemesh; he then marched to Jerusalem, broke down 400 cubits of the wall, from the gate of Ephraim to the corner-gate, and carried off a great deal of spoil (2 Kings xiv. 11-14; 2 Chron. xxv. 21-24). Uzziah, the next sovereign, repaired the breach; he erected towers and strengthened generally the fortifications, furnishing the place with warlike engines for defence (xxvi. 9, 15). Jotham his son built a gate to the temple, repaired the walls, and added to their strength (2 Kings xv. 35; 2 Chron. xxvii. 3). In Hezekiah's reign the city was again threatened with siege. The king, therefore, took care to divert the water-courses (2 Kings xx. 20; 2 Chron. xxxii. 4, 30); see CONDUIT; he strengthened the ramparts, and built additional towers, and a fresh wall; also he constructed works in the citadel, and provided abundance of weapons (5; Isai. xxii. 9-11). But the Lord was the effectual shield of his people; and under his protection the daughter of Jerusalem could afford to shake her head at the most formidable foe. The Assyrian invading host were supernaturally destroyed (2 Kings xix. 32-35). Manasseh in the beginning of his reign filled the city with idols and their shrines; but after his captivity he removed them, and added to the walls and fortifications (2 Chron. xxxiii. 1-16). But now the ruin of Zion, so favoured once, so dear still, the joy of the earth, the place of the Lord's abode—her sad ruin was approaching. The king of Egypt probably, the king of Babylon certainly, entered Jerusalem in the reigns of Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Jehoiachin, setting up and pulling down vassal kings, and carrying off much treasure and many captives (2 Kings xxiii. 31-xxiv. 16; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1-10). Then came the reign of the weak and unprincipled Zedekiah. He revolted against his liege-lord; and ere long the avenging armies of Nebuchadnezzar beleaguered the city. Fearful was the dissension and distress which soon reigned there. There was the hope at one time that help would come from Egypt; and indeed Pharaoh's army did march forward; and the siege was raised for a brief interval. Then those that despaired of their country endeavoured to escape (Jer. xxxvii. 5-15). But speedily the Chaldeans returned. In vain did Jeremiah mournfully entreat the king to yield; faction was strong; and an obstinate resistance was made. Famine soon prevailed; defence became hopeless; and at length a breach was made in the walls, and in the dead of night the besieging troops poured in, and their officers took post in the middle court of the temple. The awful news soon reached the wretched king, who fled with a few followers, but was pursued and captured near Jericho and carried to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah to suffer a cruel punishment. There was massacre and plunder in the city, and then a month of terrible suspense, till the Babylonian captain of the guard came with orders from his master:

and then the temple and the royal palace and all the considerable houses were burnt with fire, the walls were demolished, and Jerusalem was a desolation. The throes of this last agony had continued for eighteen months. It was in the ninth year of Zedekiah, on the tenth day of the tenth month, that the siege was first formed, and on the ninth day of the fourth month in Zedekiah's eleventh year that the city was taken. On the seventh of the fifth month the captain of the guard arrived; and on the tenth the city was destroyed (2 Kings xxv. 1-10; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11-19; Jer. xxxii. 24, xxxviii. xxxix. 1-8, lii. 1-14: comp. Joseph., Antiq., lib. x. 8, § 2). Vast numbers of the people were carried into captivity (Jer. lii. 15, 28-30); others went into Egypt (xliii. 4-7); and there was none to pity the fallen capital (Lam. i. 1-3, 7, 12-17).

It was not till Babylon had been itself humbled and taken by Cyrus that Jerusalem revived. The Persian conqueror gave leave (536 B.C.) for the Jews to return to their own country. A large caravan accordingly proceeded to Judea under Zerubbabel and the high priest Joshua, and on the first day of the seventh month they set up in a solemn assembly at Jerusalem the altar of burnt-offering. And in the second year after their return, on the first of the second month, they laid the foundation of a new temple. It was a day of gladness and yet of bitter sorrow—of glad hope that the presence of the Lord might again be there, of grief when the old men among them, who remembered Solomon's glorious structure, surveyed the ruins around, and thought how little their feeble means could do to raise a temple like the one destroyed (Ezra iii.). And soon there was the busy malice of adversaries at work; and it was not till the reign of Darius Hystaspis that the building was effectually carried on, nor till the twenty-first year after the decree of Cyrus that the new house was dedicated (vi.). All the while, and for much longer, Jerusalem lay without walls and gates, till, about 446 B.C., Nehemiah, the cup-bearer of Artaxerxes Longimanus, obtained leave to go to the city of his fathers. Sad was the spectacle as he viewed it—ramparts broken down, and the marks of fire yet upon the gates (Neh. ii.). By his exertions, however, under the king's commission, in spite of opposition, the walls were re-built, and there was a solemn day of rejoicing kept after the completion of the work (iii., iv., vi., xii. 27-43). Still there were many vacant spaces in the city, and the population was small: it was agreed, therefore, that one tenth part of the whole people should dwell in the capital (vii. 4, xi. 1, 2). Thus was the holy city re-established.

We here lose the guidance of scripture; and succeeding notices must be very brief. It is said to have been visited by Alexander the Great: see ALEXANDER, 1. It was taken by Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, called Soter, king of Egypt, about 320 B.C. Under the high priest Simon the Just, about 300 B.C., much was done for the repair and embellishment of the temple, and in strengthening the ramparts of the city (Eccles. i. 1-4). According to a description of Jerusalem in the name of Aristeas, in the third century before Christ, but to which generally little credit is to be given, the temple is said to be enclosed with three lofty walls seventy cubits high, and the city to have occupied the summit and eastern slopes of Zion. The streets were curved like those of a theatre, and had raised pavements; the shops or bazaars were furnished with abundant provisions and merchandise (De Leg. Div. Transl. Hist., ap. Joseph. Op., Havercamp, tom. ii., pp. 111-114). But, though thus flourishing, the city was subjected from time to time to various calamities. Ptolemy Philopator entered it, and would have penetrated into the holy place, but was withstood by the high priest. Antiochus the Great took it, 203 B.C.: it was re-taken by Scopas, the Alexandrian general, four years after, but soon re-occupied by Antiochus. For an account of Heliodorus's marauding visit see 2 Macc. iii. And then Jerusalem fell under the power of Antiochus Epiphanes; for a notice of whose excesses see ANTIOCHUS, 3: then it was besieged by Eupator: see ANTIOCHUS, 4. It was held with varied fortune by the Maccabean princes, by whom much was done to strengthen it. A fortress called the Baris was built contiguous to the north-west wall of the temple enclosure; and the palace of the Asmoneans was south-west of the temple on Zion. Ere long the Roman eagles appeared before Jerusalem. Pompey took it 63 B.C., entered the holy of holies, but did not plunder the temple. Nine years later, however, Crassus carried off vast treasure. Then, after the disputes between Antigonus, Hyrcanus, Phasaelus, and Herod, the Parthians got possession of the city 40 B.C. Herod, however, obtained the title of king of Judea from Rome, and with a Roman force besieged, and ultimately, in conjunction with Sosius, governor of Syria, stormed Jerusalem.

Herod did much during his reign to embellish the city. He built a new palace which he fortified strongly, and connected with three towers which he raised on the town-wall—Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne—with another called Psephinus as an outwork. The palace thus became the citadel of the upper city. Herod also erected a theatre, to the intense dissatisfaction of the orthodox Jews. But his greatest work was the re-building of the temple. He announced his purpose of doing this at the passover of 19 B.C. Two years were occupied in preparations; and, in a year and a half afterwards, the sanctuary and most holy place with the porch were completed amid great rejoicings. But it was long before all the courts and cloisters were finished.

Of the history of Jerusalem in our Lord's time nothing need be said. Herod Agrippa I. resided frequently there, and, as a suburb had grown up on the high ground north of the temple, called Bezetha, he enclosed this and the adjacent district with a new wall, stopped once by the emperor Claudius, but afterwards completed. But unquiet times were approaching. The Redeemer had wept over the doomed city, and had declared that not one stone would be left upon another. Instead of humbling themselves before God for their sins, faction was arrayed against faction, and tumults frequently occurred, till at length a direct defiance was offered to the Roman power, and the insurgents under Eleazar became masters of the city and temple. Cestius Gallus, the prefect, in consequence marched upon Jerusalem. He was unsuccessful in his attacks, and drew off, receiving a serious defeat in November, 66 A.D. Of course the Roman supremacy must be asserted. But there was delay: Vespasian, now in command, occupied himself in Galilee, and, on his reducing Giscala, John, a leader there, escaped thence to Jerusalem, to take a prominent part in the defence of the capital. Vespasian had become emperor; and his son Titus headed the forces which formed the siege of Jerusalem in the beginning of 70 A.D. The city was crowded with strangers who had gone up to the passover; and two hostile parties formed, if it may be so called, the garrison. Eleazar and John of Giscala held the temple and Antonia; while Simon Ben Gioras occupied Phasaelus, the upper and lower city, and Akra: there was also a body of Idumeans. The outer wall was first gained by the besiegers, and then the second wall. Both the city and the temple were next attacked; but the Romans made at first little way. Then, as the southern and western parts had not been invested, and the inhabitants could go out, and supplies be brought in, Titus determined to surround the whole of Jerusalem with a wall: it was thirty-nine furlongs (nearly five miles) in extent, and was completed in three days. Now the people were penned up, in awful fulfilment of Christ's words (Luke xix. 43, 44) as sheep for were delivered: at length, on the tenth day of the fifth month, the anniversary of the burning of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, contrary to Titus's command the temple was fired, and but the bare walls of the sanctuary remained. Still the upper city held out; and Titus, standing on the bridge that joined it to the temple, offered terms. It was in vain; and in other desperate assaults the last defences were overcome, and the leaders Simon and John ultimately taken; and all was demolished save the west wall of the upper city and Herod's three towers, left as memorials of what Jerusalem had been; and so thoroughly was the site levelled and dug up that Josephus declares none would have imagined that it had ever been inhabited (Bell. Jud., lib. vii. 1, § 1).

The number of persons who perished in this siege was enormous. Josephus reckons two millions and a half assembled at the passover when Cestius was governor, and declares that 1,200,000 were shut in the city by the army of Titus; of whom 1,100,000 were destroyed. Doubtless these numbers are exaggerated; and Mr. Fergusson, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 1025, 1026, denies that the city could ever have contained more than 50,000 ordinary inhabitants, and supposes that, at the festivals, these might be increased to 60,000 or 70,000. Dr. Thomson, well qualified to judge, deems this estimate far too low. He believes that 100,000 could find homes even now within the circuit of modern Jerusalem, and that, allowing for the greater extent of the ancient town, twice as many may have dwelt comfortably there. He also reminds us that, at their sacred solemnities, the Jews were able to camp out, and that doubtless multitudes located themselves in the gardens and on the slopes around. Vast, therefore, must have been, the slaughter. And there were dismal omens of coming ruin. A man traversed the streets, crying 'Woe, woe to Jerusalem!' and the priests in the temple are said to have heard a deep voice, 'Let us depart!'—as if the divine presence were quitting its hallowed abode. Fresh assaults after every allowance, the multitudes assembled at the fatal siege; and dreadful was the slaughter. It was a fearful retribution, when thus their accumulated sins, crowned by that worst deed, the slaughter of their King, were visited upon the nation. Proud, too, was the triumphal procession which swept through the streets of Rome, when the treasures of the temple and the sacred vessels were borne as trophies by the victor, the iron entering indeed now into the souls of the vanquished. The representation of these trophies may be seen on the yet-existing arch of Titus: and a medal is preserved which commemorates the subjugation of the sons of Jacob.

The cup of retribution was even yet not full. There was a Roman garrison on the spot; and some inhabitants returned; and a kind of town gradually gathered round. At length the emperor Adrian placed a military colony there. But the Jews rose in violent rebellion under Bar-chochebas, possessed themselves of the restored Jerusalem; and it required all the might of the empire again to subdue it, 135 A.D. Then Adrian carried out his design. The site was occupied by a colony of soldiers: foreigners alone might dwell in it; and Jews were forbidden to approach: temples to the heathen deities were erected; and the name was changed to Ælia Capitolina.

When the empire became Christian, the ancient designation revived; though the name Ælia was not obsolete for many centuries. Helena, mother of Constantine the Great, made a pilgrimage thither, and tried to identify the holy places. Churches were erected; and Jerusalem was a Christian city. Julian, in his hatred of the gospel, allowed the Jews to re-build the temple. But the design was frustrated. The work was, there can be no question, interrupted by fire, which was attributed to supernatural causes. For a long while afterwards Jerusalem appears to have been unmolested. But the Persian Chosroes II. took it in 614 A.D. It was re-occupied by the emperor Heraclius in 628; but surrendered to the khalif Omar in 637. Then it became one of the sacred cities of the Mohammedans. Little more remains to be said. It passed from one conqueror to another, till July 15, 1099, it was stormed by the crusaders under Godfrey of Bouillon, who was elected king. In 1187 it was taken by Saladin. Again and again assaulted and captured, it passed in 1517 into the possession of the Ottoman monarch Selim I.: his son Solyman built the present walls. Mohammed Ali of Egypt occupied it in 1832; but in 1840 it was restored to the Turkish sceptre. And so the holy city is still 'trodden down of the Gentiles;' for 'the times of the Gentiles' are not yet 'fulfilled' (Luke xxi. 24).

Jerusalem stands in a central position, but off the great road between Egypt and Syria. It is about thirty-six miles south of Samaria, and twenty north of Hebron, eighteen west of the Jordan, and thirty-two east of the Mediterranean. It is in latitude 31° 46' 35" N., in longitude 35° 18' 30" E. 'In several respects,' says Dr. Stanley, its situation is 'singular amongst the cities of Palestine. Its elevation is remarkable, occasioned, not from its being on the summit of one of the numerous hills of Judea, like most of the towns and villages, but because it is on the edge of one of the highest tablelands of the country. Hebron, indeed, is higher still by some hundred feet; and from the south accordingly (even from Beth-lehem) the approach to Jerusalem is by a slight descent. But from every other side the ascent is perpetual; and to the traveller, approaching Jerusalem from the west or east, it must always have presented the appearance beyond any other capital of the then-known world—I may add beyond any important city that has ever existed on the earth—a mountain-city, breathing, as compared with the sultry plains of the Jordan or of the coast, a mountain-air, enthroned, as compared with Jericho or Damascus, Gaza or Tyre, on a mountain-fastness' (Sinai and Palestine, pp. 170, 171).

From the plain of Esdraelon, southward, runs a broad mountain-ridge, forming a precipitous wall to the east, but sinking gradually towards the western sea-coast. This ridge is rocky and uneven, cut up by deep ravines, generally running east or west. Some distance south of the open plain round Gibeon two such valleys begin; and on the tongue of elevated land between them stands Jerusalem. One valley, to the north-east, runs nearly due south—it is the valley of the Kidron or Jehoshaphat, the other to the west—the valley of Hinnom, runs a while south, then bending to the east, it joins that of the Kidron, the further course of which is to the Dead sea. The city therefore is separated on the east, south, and western sides by deep and precipitous ravines, as it were the ditches which encircle some great natural fortress. There is another ravine running from the upper level, north and south, through the city itself, dividing it into two unequal portions. This, or part of it, was called the Tyropœon. On the west of this was the upper city, or mount Zion, on the east was mount Moriah, also Akra or the lower city, less elevated than the western part. From this central valley a branch about half-way up extended westward; and there was another depression, north of Moriah, between it and Bezetha the new city, enclosed (as above noted) after our Lord's time by Herod Agrippa. It was among the advantages of the position of Jerusalem that, defended as already noted to the east, south, and west, by deep ravines, it had room for enlargement on the north and north-west.

It may be desirable to give the heights of different points in and near the city above the level of the Mediterranean: they are those assigned by Van de Velde:

We may perhaps form some idea of the ancient city from the modern aspect of Jerusalem. Many of the great features of the scenery must be the same. Doubtless there was then life, stirring life; whereas now there is desolation and death. Heretofore there were round the city inviting gardens and orchards, especially to the north, and in the valley of Hinnom. And there were pleasant slopes instead of the huge mounds of rubbish from the demolition of buildings, of which travellers speak as having been shot over the precipices, and lying still soft and loose, giving a dull monotonous hue to the general view, while the houses look dingy and dilapidated. Still the houses of the ancient city were most probably of the same character as those at present existing, with flat roofs and few windows; and probably the streets were as narrow; and the shops or bazaars presented, it is likely, a similar appearance. And those of one trade may have congregated together. Thus we read of a 'bakers' street' (Jer. xxxviii. 21). The line of walls and towers must in some places occupy the former sites, though both to the north, and in the upper city to the south and south-east, the extent is very much contracted, much being now bare that once was covered with houses. There were anciently many gates. The following list of those mentioned in scripture and by Josephus, is taken from Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. 1. pp. 986, 987, some errors being corrected:

1. Gate of Ephraim (2 Chron. xxv. 23; Neh. viii. 16, xii. 39). This is probably the same as the
2. Gate of Benjamin (Jer. xx. 2, xxxvii. 13; Zech. xiv. 10). If so it was 400 cubits distant from the
3. Corner-gate (2 Chron. xxv. 23, xxvi. 9; Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10).
4. Gate of Joshua, governor of the city (2 Kings xxiii. 8).
5. Gate between the two walls (2 Kings xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4).
6. Horse-gate (2 Chron. xxxiii. 15; Neh. iii. 28; Jer. xxxi. 40).
7. Ravine-gate, i.e. opening on ravine of Hinnom (2 Chron. xxvi. 9; Neh. ii. 13, 15, iii. 13).
8. Fish-gate (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3; Zeph. i. 10).
9. Dung-gate (Neh. ii. 13, iii. 13).
10. Sheep-gate (Neh. iii. 1, 32, xii. 39).
11. East-gate (Neh. iii. 29).
12. Miphkad (Neh. iii. 31).
13. Fountain-gate—Siloam? (Neh. xii. 37).
14. Water-gate (Neh. xii. 37).
15. Old-gate (Neh. xii. 39).
16. Prison-gate (Neh. xii. 39).
17. Gate Harsith (perhaps the sun): A.V. east gate (Jer. xix. 2).
18. First-gate (Zech. xiv. 10).
19. Gate Gennath, gardens (Joseph., Bell. Jud., lib. v. 4, § 2).
20. Essenes'-gate (ibid.).

To these should be added the following gates of the temple:

- Gate Sur (2 Kings xi. 6). Called also
- Gate of foundation (2 Chron. xxiii. 5).
- Gate of the guard, or behind the guard (2 Kings xi. 6, 19). Called the
- High-gate (2 Kings xv. 35; 2 Chron. xxiii. 20, xxvii. 3).
- Gate-Shallecheth (1 Chron. xxvi. 16).

Of course with so many gates there must have been corresponding roads into the country. Solomon is said to have carefully paved them with black stone (Joseph., Antiq., lib. viii. 7, § 4). But probably even then there were not above two or three of what we may call principal roads to the capital. That from Beth-lehem to Gibeah did not, at least when the Jebusites occupied the fortress, pass through Jerusalem (Judges xix. 10-13). And, in later times, travellers from or to the north and east seem to have taken the road by Jericho (2 Chron. xxviii. 15; Luke xviii. 31, 35). There was, however, a great western road to the Philistine plain and sea-coast by Beth-horon. At the gates were open spaces, often called streets in our version (e.g. 2 Chron. xxix. 4, xxxii. 6; Ezra x. 9; Neh. viii. 1, 3, 16), where large assemblies could gather. For the supply of water there were pools, conduits, &c.: see POOL. We also find burial-places mentioned. Those of the kings were in the city of David (2 Chron. xii. 16, xiv. 1, and elsewhere). But some of the sovereigns were not buried in the royal sepulchre (e.g. xxviii. 27). Many tombs were in the valley of Hinnom, or that of the Kidron, hewn, as so many are still seen, in the rock.

Doubtless Jerusalem, as it stood in its entirety, with its hills around, with its cisterns and springs, with its gardens and its sumptuous buildings, was a noble city, and it might have continued the 'joy of the earth' had its people been faithful to the covenant of their God. From a hill-fortress it had grown into a metropolis. It was wealthy and populous (see above, p. 456): it was peaceful, for the God of Israel dwelt there; and splendid were the ceremonies with which his worship was celebrated by the multitudinous priests who ministered in the sanctuary. Well might all nations flow to the 'mountain of the Lord's house' 'established in the top of the mountains' (Isai. ii. 2).

It is no easy matter to identify modern remains with ancient sites. Very much has been written on the subject; and very widely do learned explorers differ. Of course only a brief notice can be given here of some of the more salient points.

The two to which the attention would naturally be most directed are the temple, and the place where our Lord suffered, nigh to which he was buried. With regard to the first-named, there can be no question that the ancient temple occupied a part at least of the ground now covered by the enclosure of the Haram, in which are twonoted Mohammedan mosques, those of Omar and el-Aksa. The admeasurement of this area, as given by Catherwood (Bartlett's Walks about Jerusalem, p. 161), is on the east 1,520 feet, on the south 940, on the west 1,617, and on the north 1,020. The mosque of Omar, standing on a platform which is raised 15 or 16 feet above the area, and is 450 feet from east to west, and 550 from north to south, is octagonal in form, each side measuring 67 feet. It has a double dome of elegant proportions, covered with lead, and surmounted by a gilt crescent. Corridors run round this building, which is highly decorated; the lower portion of the walls being composed of various-coloured marbles, and the windows, of which there are fifty-six, being filled with beautiful stained glass. Under the dome is a remarkable limestone rock of irregular shape: it fills a great part of the area, and is surrounded by a gilt iron railing. It is the natural summit of mount Moriah, and bears in a few places the marks of the chisel. At the south-east corner of this rock is an excavated chamber of considerable size, revered, according to tradition, as the praying-place of Abraham, David, Solomon, and Jesus. South of the mosque of Omar is el-Aksa, to which other mosques are attached. Besides these mosques, there are in the Haram various praying-places, fountains overshadowed with cypress and plane-trees, archways, lodgings for pilgrims, &c. Now Josephus describes the temple—that built by Herod—as an exact square, a stadium, or about 600 feet on each side (Antiq., lib. xv. 11, § 3). And it is remarkable that, at the south-western part of the Haram enclosure, there is such a square, measuring 602 feet, apparently marked out by special solidity, and just reaching from the southern wall to the platform on which the mosque of Omar stands. It is not an improbable conclusion that this square was the site of the temple; more especially as it is contiguous to the remains of the bridge which connected the temple with Zion; and in the western wall, the wailing-place of the Jews, the stones are peculiarly massive, seeming as if they had never been disturbed. This conclusion, however, which would place the temple where el-Aksa now stands, is by no means generally admitted. It is thought by some that it was farther north, where the mosque of Omar is; and some imagine that the altar of burnt-offering stood upon the rock already mentioned.

If the exact position of the glorious 'house' be uncertain, it is at least nearly ascertained: it must have stood somewhere in the Haram area. It is far more difficult to fix upon the spots where the Lord was crucified and buried. There are three principal theories, each of which has its devoted adherents—that the traditional sepulchre is really the place of burial; that this place was within the Haram area; that it is now impracticable with any degree of probability to identify the site.

It must be premised that it is impossible to describe here the church ordinarily called that of the Holy Sepulchre. Suffice it to say that the great feature of it is the dome, beneath which is the actual tomb, of which the upper part is masonry, the lower formed by the native rock. All around are spots said to be hallowed, by the appearance of the angel who rolled away the stone, by the unction of the body, by the rending of the rock at the earthquake, &c.

The whole question of the locality has been well examined by a writer in the Museum of Classical Antiquities, No. viii. and supplement, April and May 1853. From this paper shall be taken the following compendious view of the objections against the site commonly believed to be that of the holy sepulchre—'its being in the centre of the modern city, its requiring the position of the western wall of Akra to be such as to greatly restrict the area of the ancient city; its requiring such wall to be built on greatly-disadvantageous ground, across the lower slope of a hill; its being in such immediate neighbourhood of the pool of Hezekiah, which we know to have been within the city, that the wall could not have enclosed one without taking in the other; its being considerably to the east of the position which must have been occupied by the gate Gennath; its too great proximity to what its advocates show as the line of the second wall; its locating the place of crucifixion and the place of burial at too close vicinity to each other; the probability of mistake, owing to the acknowledged error of several traditional sites, the absence of proof of many others, and the certain falsehood of all the rest' (pp. 393, 394). There are also historical objections, taken from the fact that the place of the tomb was unknown for more than two centuries, and that there were such lying wonders at the pretended discovery of it by the empress Helena, as to make it most probable that she was deceived by Macarius, then bishop of Jerusalem. Doubtless the advocates of the received site produce many plausible arguments for their belief, and have their answers to the objections ready. And it is fair to say that some of the latest and most diligent investigators support this view. Pierotti, for example, in his Jerusalem Explored, 1864, maintains it (vol. i. chap. iv. pp. 102-134). But it must be allowed that there is much that is suspicious in the theory, and that some of its pretensions must be given up, as where the pillar of flagellation is shown almost close to the place of crucifixion and burial.

Another theory has been advocated by Mr. Fergusson. His arguments may be found succinctly stated in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 1028-1034. He maintains that the so-called mosque of Omar, termed otherwise the Dome of the Rock, is not really a mosque; that it was erected prior to the Mohammedan occupation of Jerusalem; that it is in fact of the age of Constantine, and was built over the then-identified place of the sepulchre. He also supposes that, when the Christians were deprived by Mohammedan conquerors of the possession of this spot, they built another church on the site now generally considered the true place of our Lord's death and burial. There is something certainly to be said for this theory; and its establishment would explain some difficulties. But it involves two questionable assumptions. Granting that it was here that the original church of the Sepulchre was built, it yet remains to be proved that the right spot was then fixed upon. And, further, evidence is produced by the writer before referred to (Mus. of Class. Antiq., pp. 387-390), that the church of the Sepulchre was seven times destroyed by fire, and that the Dome of the Rock was erected by Mohammedans. If this evidence be accepted, Mr. Fergusson's strongest argument for the identity of the present structure with that built in Constantine's days is untenable. There is certainly great antecedent improbability in the idea that our Lord suffered close under the walls of the temple. That the way from the place of judgment to the place of execution was somewhat long is evident from the fact that on the road it was necessary to find someone to help Jesus in carrying his cross. But the distance on Mr. Fergusson's supposition is under eighty yards. Besides it was just this district which ten or twelve years after the crucifixion formed part of the enclosure comprised within Agrippa's wall, Bezetha, or the new city. The wall was built round a place already inhabited. It is reasonable to believe, then, that, so far from the quarter just outside the temple northward being waste, it was at our Lord's death a populous suburb. Various other objections, which cannot be detailed here, are forcibly urged by a writer in the Imp. Bible Dict., vol. i. pp. 892, 893.

A remarkable theory has been propounded by the writer in the Mus. of Class. Antiq., pp. 450-464. He conceives that Golgotha was situate in the valley of Hinnom, and that the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea was among the neighbouring rocks. The southern valley doubtless was a place favourable for garden purposes; and even now it is described as 'a pleasant shaded valley' (Bonar and McCheyne, Narrative of Mission), and as 'planted with olive and other fruit-trees, and in some places tilled. . . . the southern hill steep, rocky, and full of tombs' (Robinson, Bibl. Res., vol. i. p. 274, 2nd edit.). In this neighbourhood might well be the place of public execution, a place become loathsome and accused as idolatrous rites had been celebrated in it. The writer further imagines that he discovers in the prophets certain intimations as if the great sacrifice would be consummated there (e.g. Isai. xxx. 33); and he adduces certain ancient testimonies connecting Golgotha with this spot, a 'spot of infamy' he says, which 'only made the cross more glorious.' 'What so probable,' he proceeds, 'as that such a quarter of the city, so abhorred by the good on account of its past idolatry, so hated by the evil on account of its typifying the place of future punishment, so desecrated by all men from its being made the receptacle of the filth and offal of the city, should be selected as the place of "outer darkness," as the place of punishment for capital offences? What so natural as that he, who took upon him the nature of man, who was born in a manger, who had not where to lay his head, who was made a curse for us, who was condemned to the death of a malefactor, who had his grave with the wicked, should complete the work he had taken upon him, by suffering in this place of infamy? What so consistent as that the spot so long polluted by the most horrible of idolatries should be "ordained" in the pre-determined counsel of God as the place most suited for divine satisfaction, that this "valley of dead bones," this valley of the grave, should become the place of victory?' (pp. 462, 463). If we compare the scriptural requirements of the spot as pointed out in the article on CALVARY, it will be seen that they very well correspond with the view here advocated.

But no definite conclusion can be yet ventured on. All that can be said is, that the traditional identification in the present church of the Holy Sepulchre is encumbered with difficulties, that the theory of the Dome of the Rock being the sacred spot has grave objections, that the view last mentioned, argued on plausible grounds, cannot claim to be established. Jerusalem has not yet been fully explored. Possibly future research may bring to light something which may go farther than we can yet advance in settling the position of that cross whereon the Lamb of God shed his blood, and of that tomb from which he rose triumphant. A survey, it may be here noted, has lately been undertaken by a body of the Royal Engineers under the direction of Capt. Wilson, with the sanction of home authorities; and much may be expected from it. Already it is reported that an arch of the causeway which led from the city to the temple has been discovered. It is in a good state of preservation, composed of large stones like those at the wailing-place, and its span is between forty and fifty feet. The area of the Haram, too, is ascertained to be perfectly honeycombed with passages and cisterns.

As to the identification of other localities but a cursory view of them can be here taken. Let us suppose ourselves traversing the walls of Jerusalem, and noting some objects which we pass or to which our attention may be pointed. These walls, be it said, rise from 30 to 40 feet, and are about 15 feet in breadth. Steps at intervals lead up to the breastwork. They are studded with battlements and pierced with gates—five is the present number, besides others walled up—and loop-holes. In some places there are enormous stones in the lower courses, the materials probably of the ancient defences. From the walls the interior of the city is seen, irregular and decayed, with narrow and uneven streets. Commencing with the north-east angle the eye ranges over Bethesda to the enclosure of the Haram, while on the left hand the valley of the Kidron runs gradually descending the whole length, and more, of the eastern wall. Across it is a dark plot of olives seen, Gethsemane, beyond which rise three peaks or rounded hill-tops: the centre is Olivet, the southernmost the mount of Corruption. Proceeding at the foot of the eastern wall, which also bounds the Haram, there is the rocky Jewish burial-ground, with Absalom's tomb in the deep valley below. Outside the south wall of the Haram is Ophel, and opposite, beyond the Kidron, is the village of Siloam. The wall then crosses the Tyropœon, supposed by some to be really Hinnom. Just where it joins the Kidron valley is the pool of Siloam, communicating with the fountain of the Virgin higher up, while some distance south is En-rogel. From the Tyropœon the wall climbs the hill of Zion, on the level top of which is a group of buildings, where the cemeteries of the Armenians are scattered round the traditional tomb of David. And here is the Cenaculum, said to be the large upper room where the last supper was eaten. Much of Zion is now outside the wall, which anciently ran no doubt close by the ravine of Hinnom, in which are the lower and upper pools of Gihon. From the upper pool 'started,' says Pierotti, 'the deep canal by which Hezekiah brought the waters of Gihon within the western part of the city, when he closed up the fountains on the approach of Sennacherib's army. The subterranean conduit still exists, though it is now exposed and devastated in places, and is used to convey the rain-water from the upper pool to that of Amygdalon within the city; for which reason the latter is still called the pool of Hezekiah' (ubi supr., chap. vii. p. 241). On the opposite side of the ravine of Hinnom rises the hill of Evil Counsel, where according to legend was a house of Caiaphas: there are some ruins on this hill. Some writers have doubted whether this south-western height be really Zion; and Mr. Fergusson would identify Zion with the site of the temple; but, besides other objections to this theory, there is the fact that Solomon removed the ark from the city of David, when he transferred it to the temple (1 Kings vii. 1, 6). Turning northwards the wall reaches the citadel near the Jaffa gate; and at the north-east extremity of this is a massive tower, its lower portion especially of antique character. This has been supposed the tower of Hippicus, one of those erected by Herod, and preserved at the destruction of the city. Near it is the English church, a cruciform Gothic building, and then northward the pool of Hezekiah, and close by the church of the Holy Sepulchre, with the Latin and Greek convents. The wall then sweeps north-westward to the point where we commenced; and beyond it northward is the camping-ground of invaders from Sennacherib to Titus. The whole circuit is computed at something under two-and-a-half English miles.

The positions of several remarkable spots have thus been roughly indicated. It has been already observed that several of them are questioned; and there are others about which critics are by no means agreed; as, for example, the tower of Hippicus, the pools of Gihon, and even that of Siloam; though it must be said with regard to the last-named that doubts are surely unreasonable. The identification, too, has been perplexed with legendary stories.

Of the great features of Jerusalem we can recognize enough for satisfaction. Here are the slopes and here the valleys of which scripture tells: here is the city, which sages, and monarchs, and prophets of old time inhabited. Within the small circuit on which you look, Jesus taught, and suffered, and rose again. But, when you want to fix exactly upon the spot where this or that great event occurred, you are at fault: you have the broad outlines of the picture, you cannot discern the minuter touches. To reconstruct the ancient city is perhaps impossible. But the overthrow and dislocation must be allowed to be no small corroboration of that sacred book from which Jerusalem and Zion derive all their interest. And, as Dr. Thomson reminds us, when contemplating the ruins of the city of David, 'there is another Zion, whose towers are still more glorious, and shall never be overthrown. "God is known in her palaces for a refuge" (Psal. xlviii. 3). And "this God is our God for ever and ever." How often is this name synonymous with the church of the living God; and no other spot but one can divide with it the affection of his people: no other name but one can awaken such joyful hopes in the Christian's heart. The temporal Zion is now in the dust; but the true Zion is rising and shaking herself from it, and putting on her beautiful garments to welcome her King when he comes to reign over the whole earth' (The Land and the Book, p. 631).

It may be well expected that Jerusalem shall literally become again a glorious city. Her children, it is to be believed, shall again people her; for the time of her long desolation shall be ended. It will be when they look with faith on him whom their fathers have here pierced. Into the secrets of futurity, however, we must not pry; but we may certainly say, 'Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee' (Psal. cxxxii. 6).

The present population of Jerusalem is variously estimated. Pierotti, the latest authority, supposes that there are 5,068 Christians, 7,556 Mohammedans, 7,706 Jews; in all 20,330. But, though there are so many of the children of Jacob, they are strangers in the city: they do not possess any of the soil. One privilege indeed they are said to have. When the sultan dies, they can demand the keys of the city. They then perform some ceremonies, and, after a few hours, restore the keys to the pacha.

There is little inviting in the present state of Jerusalem apart from its associations. The commerce is small; and progress through the streets dangerous. 'Heaps of ruins and filth are seen in the public places; and no one frequents them for business: beggars crave an alms: lepers exhibit their sores; vagrant curs snarl over their booty. Camels crouched down await their burdens, and fill the air with a disgusting odour, caused by the ointment with which they are smeared to cure skin-diseases. Disgust, fear, hypocrisy, slavishness, and distrust are the common expressions in the faces of the men, showing the different races of which they are composed, opposed to one another in religion and fortunes, victors and vanquished, jealous and distrustful one of the other. The women are generally covered with a white cloth, looking like ghosts, or, if uncovered, would look better veiled. If, wearied with the dulness within, we go outside the walls, we find a few olive-trees on the north-west, a few young plantations on the west, and the rest barren and desolate. Everywhere deep valleys or steep hills, stony and rocky roads, impracticable for carriages, difficult for horses, and painful for foot-travellers. Wherever we go, memorials of the dead are before our eyes; for the cemeteries are the places of general resort. Escaping, however, from the city, from its bad smells and loathsome and importunate beggars, we can ascend the hills and contemplate a panorama, where every stone is a witness of God's revelation, and every ruin a monument of his wrath' (Pierotti, ubi supr., chap. ix. p. 267).

The works which have been published on Jerusalem are very numerous. Several have been referred to in this article: those of Williams, Barclay, Lewin, Buchanan, &c., supply abundant information.

JERUSALEM, NEW. The term Jerusalem is sometimes used in a figurative or symbolical sense. St. Paul so employs it when he contrasts 'the Jerusalem which now is' with 'the Jerusalem which is above' (Gal. iv. 25, 26), the church of the covenant of bondage with that free and blessed church, the spiritual mother of all believers. And, similarly, we find 'the heavenly Jerusalem' noted elsewhere (Heb. xii. 22) as 'the city of the living God,' the happy home of ransomed multitudes. Further, the prophet Ezekiel had described a glorious and perfect city, when, according to his metaphorical language, the tribes should be re-distributed and re-settled in their own land. Twelve gates it was to have, being four-square; and the name of it should be 'The Lord is there' (Ezek. xlvi. 30-45). St. John borrows the imagery of Ezekiel, and describes the New Jerusalem, the name of which should be written on the Christian conqueror (Rev. iii. 12), as of unequalled magnificence, 'descending out of heaven from God,' with twelve foundations of precious stones, and twelve gates of pearl, her streets of rich gold, the whole glowing with clear light, resplendent, not with sun or moon, but with the glory of God and of the Lamb. Nothing that defiled must enter there; but the gates stand ever open; and ample are the large dimensions (xxi. 10-27). This city is called 'the bride, the Lamb's wife' (9), the abode of the gathered company of such as are redeemed from among men.

'They stand, those halls of Sion,
All jubilant with song,
And bright with many an angel
And all the martyr throng.
The Prince is ever in them:
The daylight is serene:
The pastures of the blessed
Are deck'd in glorious sheen.'

By some interpreters the New Jerusalem is regarded as a happy city to be founded upon earth in the days of millennial blessedness, by others it is deemed a representation of the glory of heaven. For a discussion of this question, commentaries and expositions of prophecy must be consulted.

JERUSA, or JERUSAH (possessed, i.e. by a husband). The mother of king Jotham (2 Kings xv. 33; 2 Chron. xxvii. 1).

JESAI'AH (saving, salutary).—1. A descendant of David (1 Chron. iii. 21).—2. A Benjamite (Neh. xi. 7).

JESHAI'AH (help of Jehovah): this name is identical with Isaiah.—1. A son of Jeduthun, chief of a division of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 3, 15).—2. A Kohathite Levite, descended from Moses (xxvi. 25): see ISSHIAH, 1.—3. One who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 7).—4. A Levite of the family of Merari (19).

JESHA'NAH (old). One of the places taken by Abijah from Jeroboam I. (1 Chron. xiii. 19).

JESHARE'LAH (right towards God). The head of one of the divisions of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 14). He is called also Asarelah (2).

JESHEB'EAB (seat of one's father). Chief of the fourteenth course of priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 13).

JESH'ER (uprightness). One of the sons of Caleb the son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 18).

JESHI'MON (the waste). Some tract of country which Pisgah and Peor are said to face (Numb. xxi. 20, xxiii. 28). Again, the hill of Hachilah is described as being to the south of (1 Sam. xxiii. 19) and before (xxvi. 1, 3) Jeshimon. Also when David and his men were in the wilderness of Maon they were in 'the plain,' i.e. the Ghor, the sunken district of the Dead sea, 'south of Jeshimon' (xxiii. 24). Probably it was some high waste land to the east of the Dead sea, in view of the hill-country on the west.

JESHI'SHAI (an old man). A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 14).

JESHOHAI'AH (whom Jehovah bows down). A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 36).

JE'SHUA (Jehovah the salvation).—1. The head of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 11, where he is called Jeshuah; Ezra ii. 36; Neh. vii. 39).—2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 15).—3. A high priest after the captivity. He returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem, and took a leading part in the restoration of the sacred rites, and the building of the second temple (Ezra ii. 2, iii. 2, 8, 9, iv. 3, v. 2, x. 18; Neh. vii. 7, xii. 1, 7, 10, 26). He is represented, especially by the prophet Zechariah, as an eminent type of Christ (Hagg. i. ii.; Zech. iii., vi. 9-15, where he is called Joshua).—4. A head of the family of Pahath-moab (Ezra ii. 6; Neh. vii. 11).—5. The progenitor of a Levitical house (Ezra ii. 40; Neh. vii. 43). It was perhaps the representative of this house that signed the covenant (x. 9).—6. A Levite (Ezra viii. 33).—7. The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 19).—8. A Levite who took part in the solemn reading of the law (viii. 7, ix. 4, 5, xii. 8, 24, where probably we should read Jeshua and Kadmiel). He may be the same with No. 6; and, indeed, it is not easy accurately to distinguish several so designated, or to know whether a family or an individual is meant.—9. The great Joshua (viii. 17).

JE'SHUA (id.). A town, as it would seem, in the south of Judah, inhabited after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 26).

JE'SHUAH (id.) (1 Chron. xxiv. 11). See JESHUA, 1.

JESHU'RUN (supremely happy, or dearly beloved). A symbolical name for Israel (Deut. xxxii. 15, xxxiii. 5, 26). It is Jesurun in Isai. xli. 2. The reference of Deut. xxxiii. 5 is not as sometimes supposed to Moses, but to the Lord, who was Israel's true and rightful King.

JERUSALEM.

JESI'AH (whom Jehovah lends).—1. A warrior, apparently a Korhite, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 6).—2. A Levite of the family of Kohath (xxiii. 20): he 's the same with Isshiah (xxiv. 25).

JESI'MIEL (whom God has set up). One of Simeon's descendants (1 Chron. iv. 36).

JES'SE (firm, strong). A descendant of the tribe of Judah, resident at Beth-lehem, most noted as the father of king David, and consequently an ancestor of Messiah (Ruth iv. 17-22; Matt. i. 5, 6; Luke iii. 31, 32). Jesse had eight sons, David being the youngest, the child it would seem of his declining age; for it is said that he was counted as an old man in the days of Saul (1 Sam. xvii. 12). The names, however, of only seven of his sons are recorded (1 Chron. ii. 13-16), unless it be supposed that Elihu (xxvii. 18) is not the same with Eliab. Jesse had also, it appears, two daughters. His wife's name is not mentioned. Some, however, imagine that Nahash (2 Sam. xvii. 25) was Jesse's wife; while others have amused themselves with fancying that Jesse had married the wife or concubine of Nahash king of the Ammonites, a conjecture which, if it has no decisive proof against it, may certainly be said to have no tolerable argument for it: see NAHASH. Of Jesse's personal character and history little is recorded. He was probably a man of some wealth. He received Samuel respectfully (1 Sam. xvi. 5-13). He sent a present to Saul by David (20). He was, as an affectionate father, anxious to know of his sons' welfare, who were with the army (xvii. 17, 18). And, when David was pursued by Saul, he and his wife were carefully placed with the king of Moab (xxii. 3, 4). We hear no more. But it is noteworthy that Jesse's name is repeatedly mentioned in reference to Messiah. Thus we have the 'rod from the stem of Jesse' (Isai. xi. 1), and 'the root of Jesse' (10).

JES'SUE (1 Esdr. v. 26). Jeshua (Ezra ii. 40).

JES'U (1 Esdr. viii. 63).

JES'UI (even, level). A son of Asher (Numb. xxvi. 44). He is also called Isui (Gen. xlvii. 17), and Ishuai (1 Chron. vii. 30).

JES'UITES. A family of Asher, descended from Jesu (Numb. xxvi. 44).

JESU'RUN (supremely happy) (Isai. xlv. 2.) See JESHURUN.

JES'US (Saviour).—1. The name by which, when the Son of God was born into the world, he was known among men. This name was given him according to a divine message to his mother before his conception, and also to Joseph her husband (Matt. i. 21, 25; Luke i. 31). It is proposed in the present article to give a compendious history of the life of the Lord Jesus. But it must be premised that, if the evangelistic narrative is accepted as credible, Jesus must be more than man; and for some proofs of its credibility see SCRIPTURE. It is only by supposing that the sacred historians have put a false colouring upon his words and actions, it is only by imputing pious fraud that modern sceptics have been able to represent Jesus as they are fond of representing him, a well-meaning and superior Jewish teacher, who found himself compelled sometimes to change his plans, and, after struggling vainly with the prejudices of his countrymen, failed and perished in his praiseworthy attempts at reformation. The simple majesty of the inspired narrative is in itself an answer to such speculations; and the exalted grandeur of the life and actions of Jesus stamp the divinity of his Person. We have no need of formal proof that the material sun is the central light of our system: we need as little to assure us that Jesus is the Divine Light of the world (John v. 12).

Mary the Virgin dwelt at Nazareth. She was of lowly position in society, and was betrothed to a carpenter named Joseph. One day, prior to the actual marriage, she was startled by the appearance of a strange visitor, who apprised her of the coming birth of the Holy Child. It was the angel Gabriel: the Holy Ghost, he said, should come upon her, and the power of the Highest overshadow her, so that the offspring of her womb should be called and be the Son of God. And, to assure her of the truth of his message, the angel added that her cousin Elisabeth, so long barren, had already conceived a son. Mary upon this meekly acquiesced in the privilege vouchsafed her, and hastened into the hill-country of Judah, to the town—variously supposed Hebron, Juttah, and a village not far from Jerusalem, now called 'Ain Karim—where Elisabeth and Zacharias her husband dwelt. Possibly she stayed there till after the birth of John, subsequently named the Baptist or Baptist (Luke i. 26-80).

Mary's marriage with Joseph took place; and while they were living at Nazareth a decree of the Roman emperor Augustus obliged them to repair to Beth-lehem—for Joseph, and we may conclude Mary also, were of David's lineage—there to be enrolled in the ancient seat of their family. Thus it was at Beth-lehem, in accordance with prophecy (Mic. v. 2), that Jesus was born. The town was crowded: the inn offered no accommodation to the humble pair; so, when Jesus entered this world as a babe, he was laid in a manger (Matt. i. 18-25, ii. 1; Luke ii. 1-7). No place upon earth was prepared to welcome earth's rightful Lord. The very spot of the birth is, according to tradition, still pointed out and hallowed: see BETH-LEHEM. Of course the miraculous conception is denied or explained away by modern enlightened philosophers, who discover no more in Jesus than the child of a Jewish artizan (See some good observations in Mill's Myth. Interp. of Gospels, part ii. chap. i. 1, pp. 91-96, chap. iii. 1, pp. 276-280). The date of the birth is variously placed. Wieseler gives a table of the conjectures of different learned men, assigning it from 7 B.C. to 1 B.C. (Chron. Synops. der vier Evang., pp. 485, 486). His own judgment would fix on February, 4 B.C.; and with this bp. Ellicott is disposed to coincide (Hist. Lect., lect. ii. p. 63, note). Mr. Browne prefers Dec. 8, 5 B.C., as an approximate date (Ordo Secl., part i. chap. i. sect. i. p. 36: comp. append. pp. 37-39). Be the exact time what it may, it was a day of special gladness to the universe, the dawning of a new creation, the source of life to a dead world, when the Godhead was mysteriously united to human flesh. The heavenly host rejoiced; and their song of praise was heard by mortal ears, not indeed of the powerful and wealthy, who were too much engrossed with the pursuit of things that perish in the using, but of humble shepherds, whose thoughts, peradventure, as those of David on those very hills long before, were rising by what they saw of the starry firmament to the Creator of it. Strains of wondrous sweetness floated round them; and a strange glory illuminated the scene. They were at first afraid, but were reassured by the words of the angelic message; and then they hurried to pay their homage to the infant King, whom they found lying in the manger. Doubtless the story of the shepherds must have awakened curiosity in the neighbourhood, but probably it did not pass far: it was a wonder soon forgotten; and few, it would seem, save Mary, pondered these things in their hearts. On the eighth day the child was circumcised; and the name Jesus was solemnly given him. And then when three-and-thirty days more had passed he was taken to Jerusalem to the temple, where the offerings must be made—and those made evinced the poverty of the family—for Mary's purification. Two aged saints were present, Simeon and Anna; and their hearts rejoiced; and they spoke prophetic words of Jesus being the Christ (Luke ii. 1-38).

We may certainly suppose that the holy family returned to Beth-lehem: it was but a moderate walk. They were there at the visit of the eastern sages, which must surely have been after (how long we cannot tell) the presentation in the temple. The enquiries of these excited the attention and anxiety of the king, Herod, and of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. And, after they had gone and offered their rich gifts, and were returning by divine monition to their own land without further communication with Herod, the king, urged by his guilty fears and jealous of a rival to his throne, ordered the slaughter of the young children who were at Beth-lehem. But Jesus was preserved. According to an angelic message he was taken into Egypt; so that there was a fulfilment of Hos. xi. 1—not that that utterance was, strictly speaking prophetic; but, as it recorded what occurred to Israel, God's son, and as Christ was the antitypical or true Israel, so what was done in the type must be done again in the antitype. How long the residence in Egypt continued we know not: it was till Herod's death; and we are not certain how long Herod survived the birth of Jesus, perhaps not many months: see Wieseler, Chron. Synops., part i. 3, pp. 150-159. When Herod was no more, Joseph returned with Mary and Jesus to Palestine, and was probably intending to settle at Beth-lehem; but he feared Archelaus, Herod's son, who succeeded him, and, still guided by divine command, went to Nazareth, a city despised; its inhabitants being subjects of ridicule and reproach even to the rest of the Galileans (John i. 46).

Hence 'Jesus the Nazarene' was a name of scorn; and the ancient prophecies were fulfilled which described Messiah as contemned and vilified (Matt. ii.): see Horne's Introd., edit. Ayre, vol. ii. p. 115, note. One more circumstance of the childhood of Jesus is recorded, perhaps, like some of the preceding, told by Mary herself to the evangelist. At twelve years of age he was taken by Joseph and Mary to the passover at Jerusalem. And when they returned he tarried behind and was found with the doctors in the temple. Hillel, and Shammai, and rabban Simeon, Hillel's son, and Jonathan (supposed to be the paraphrast), men highly venerated by the Jews, were then alive: perhaps they were among the doctors. The words of Jesus to his mother on the occasion had a deep significance, which she did not then fully understand, but which she carefully treasured in her mind. And Jesus grew, his human faculties gradually expanding, and becoming more conscious of the mystic union of God with man in his person (Luke ii. 40-52), and increasingly manifesting the divine wisdom with which he was ever fully endowed.

There was then an interval. It seems to have been passed in private life. Possibly Jesus laboured as Joseph did (Mark vi. 3): no doubt he was wise and loving in all the domestic relations of society. For he was holy and free from sin. And words of power must have been continually dropping from his lips; and his deeds were an unerring pattern to those around. But there is a veil over this portion of his history; and we cannot raise it: only we may conclude that this youth so pure, this man so faultless, was among his relatives and acquaintance a very man. They did not as yet suspect from what they saw in him that he was God incarnate.

At length the hour of his public career arrived. John his cousin, though perhaps not personally acquainted with him, had preached repentance and the approaching kingdom of God to the people, and had made by his stirring words a deep impression. Multitudes he baptized with the baptism of repentance. And among the crowds that resorted to him came Jesus, then about thirty years of age (it is thought the season was winter), and, after some hesitation on John's part, for that it seemed incongruous that the greater should receive such a rite at the hands of the lesser, was baptized too. He submitted to every ritual observance, fulfilling therein all righteousness; but it was not to repentance that he was baptized: repentance he needed not. At his baptism an awful sign was displayed, whether to others than to John we cannot tell. From the opened heaven the Spirit descended like a dove and lighted upon Jesus, while the Father's voice pronounced the words, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased' (Matt. iii.; Mark i. 4-11; Luke iii. 1-22; John i. 26-34). Then came the mysterious temptation. Jesus was led away by the Spirit into the wilderness, and there encountered and foiled the tempter, becoming by his own personal conflict the better able to sympathize with and succour his people in their temptations (Matt. iv. 1-11; Mark i. 12, 13; Luke iv. 1-11; Heb. ii. 17, 18, iv. 15, 16). Into the secrets of that solemn season we cannot pry: suffice it to say that the temptation was real, the victory complete: see TEMPTATION.

After the temptation Jesus returned into Galilee, for how long a time we know not: some, as Wieseler (ubi supr., p. 258), would extend it to months; others, as bishop Ellicott (lect. iii. p. 114), allow only a few days: perhaps the shorter space is the more probable. But, be the interval long or short, it was just, so to speak, the silent pause preparatory to the mighty struggle. For no more was Jesus to rest in private: he must now commence his public mission, now lift up his voice as the world's Teacher, till he laid down his life as the world's Victim. Meeting again his fore-runner, he received the noticeable testimony from him, 'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world' (John i. 29). The next day it was repeated; and two of the Baptist's disciples, Andrew, and perhaps John the son of Zebedee, at once attached themselves to Jesus. Andrew soon brought his brother Simon; and, Jesus having invited Philip, this last prevailed on Nathanael to accompany him to him whom he believed to be the Great One of whom Moses and the prophets had written (35-51).

Here, then, was the beginning of the kingdom of God: here was the small nucleus, five disciples, round which so many would cluster till the little band became an exceeding great multitude whom no man could number. With these five Jesus returned to Galilee. He had left that district a while before, probably alone: he returned the Teacher of whom his newly-attached followers would have much to tell,—how the celebrated Baptist had designated him, how he had shown himself acquainted with Nathanael's most secret acts. Doubtless they would speak of these things to the Virgin, who had left her home at Nazareth to attend a wedding at Cana, where Jesus and his company were gladly welcomed. It was what she heard, probably, that induced the Virgin to mention the want of wine to her Son. But his reply let her see, as Dr. Ellicott says, 'that earthly relations must now give place to heavenly, and that the times and seasons in which the Eternal Son is to display his true nature are not to be hastened even by the longings of maternal love' (pp. 120, 121). Yet he performed a miracle, revealing his glorious power, and confirming the faith of his disciples' (John ii. 1-11). Thence he went for a short time to Capernaum (12), and afterwards proceeded to Jerusalem to keep the passover-feast.

Of the early Judean ministry of Jesus St. John alone has given an account. He drove out the money-changers from the temple, a significant act, which he justified, when asked for his authority, by a prediction misunderstood at the time, and raked up afterwards by the Jews at his trial as a charge against him, but found by his disciples to be corroborative proof of his mission. He also wrought some miracles (12-25), and held his wonderful conversation with Nicodemus, and then, leaving the capital, he went into some part of the Judean country, possibly near the Jordan. John Baptist was still at large, and continued baptizing. Jesus also, or rather his disciples, baptized too; and his fame began to transcend that of John, to the discomfort of some of John's followers. But John solemnly bore again his witness to Jesus: 'He must increase; but I must decrease' (iii., iv. 1). This ministry in Judea lasted several months in all. For it began before the passover, in the spring, and, when it was ending, and Jesus was returning into Galilee, it was within four months of the following year's harvest (35), that is to say, in winter. At this season Jesus was crossing Samaria, where occurred his interesting conversation with the woman at Jacob's well, and a consequent two days' sojourn in the country (1-43). He then repaired to Cana, and cured the Capernaite nobleman's son, and was well received by the Galileans, who had seen what he did at Jerusalem during the last passover (45-54). Here he taught for some brief space in the synagogues (Matt. iv. 17; Mark i. 15; Luke iv. 15), preaching repentance.

Afterwards there was a feast of the Jews; and Jesus again visited the metropolis (v. 1). It is a matter of great difficulty to determine what feast this was: there are critics who have respectively supposed it nearly every Jewish festival. And yet the accurate decision is of importance; because the total length of our Lord's ministry is affected thereby. It is quite impossible to argue the question here: it must be enough to state one or two of the principal opinions, and to direct the reader to sources where he may obtain full information. It seems likely that this festival was in the spring, more especially if Robinson (Harmony of the Gospels, §§ 36, 37) be right in assigning the plucking of the ears of corn (Matt. xii. 1; Mark ii. 23; Luke vi. 1) to the return into Galilee soon after this feast. But, if in spring, it must have been the passover, or the feast of Purim. There are difficulties in the way of each supposition. The article is wanting; and it is hard to believe that St. John would have characterized the passover as 'a feast.' But then as to Purim, the Jews did not usually resort to Jerusalem at that time; and Jesus would by going then have chosen to celebrate the inferior feast with more observance than the greater. Bishop Ellicott, however, after carefully weighing all the arguments, decides for Purim (ubi supr., pp. 135-139). Dr. Alford enumerates the different opinions, and, though with some leaning to Purim, leaves the matter undecided (note on John v. 1). Dr. Robinson declares for the passover (Harmony, part iv., notes on §§ 36, 37). The reader may consult the works here mentioned; and he will find in them reference to many others. Whatever the feast might be, we are told that at that time Jesus healed the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda, on the sabbath-day, for which he was persecuted by the Jews as though he were guilty of profaning the sacred day (John v.). And with this the Judean ministry terminated.

It is well known that there is considerable difficulty in arranging chronologically the events recorded by the evangelists of the life of Jesus, because the order in which they occur in the four frequently varies. Accordingly expositors widely differ; and several of the circumstances yet to be alluded to are thought by some to be prior in time to some of those already noted. Bishop Ellicott's judgment will for the most part be followed here. And he arranges the remainder of the life of Jesus, prior to the last scenes, in three divisions—the ministry in eastern Galilee, the ministry in northern Galilee, the journeyings toward Jerusalem—occupying a period somewhat upwards of a twelvemonth. It is scarce necessary to repeat that the first three Gospels, after giving an account of the birth, baptism, and temptation, confine themselves almost exclusively to the transactions of this period.

Departing from Jerusalem after the cure of the impotent man, as above noted, Jesus proceeded to Nazareth, where his family still resided. On the sabbath after his arrival he attended the service at the synagogue, and as a member of that synagogue he stood up to read the lesson from the prophets. It was a prediction in regard to himself; and so he expounded it. At first his exposition was seriously listened to; but, when he intermingled warnings with it, the wretched congregation were madened at words they should have welcomed. They seized him, and were about to cast him from a precipitous height, which may still be probably identified, when by his divine power he extricated himself and passed away (Luke iv. 16-30). Alas for Nazareth! the Sun of Righteousness, in whose healing beams they might have had salvation, was gone from them to shine in other regions. Jesus found a temporary home at Capernaum, henceforth 'his city.' There he performed many miracles, teaching in their synagogue; and there his presence was welcome; multitudes flocking to him, and begging him, when about to visit other places, not to depart from them. The casting out of the devil in the synagogue, the healing of Peter's mother-in-law, and the curing of all the sick and possessed in the evening, are thought to have been the work of one eventful day (Mark i. 21-34; Luke iv. 31-41). At this time, too (prior, it may be thought, to the sabbath) he specially called Peter and Andrew, James and John, to be his constant attendants. And they left for ever (with perhaps one brief exception) their worldly calling: they were now to be exclusively 'fishers of men' (Mark i. 16-20). Then with his little company Jesus went from place to place in Galilee; and among other deeds he performed would seem to be the curing of a leper (Matt. viii. 2-4; Mark i. 40-45; Luke v. 12-15). Hitherto, so far as we know, no leper had been healed: human skill had ever been powerless against this frightful malady. Strong, therefore, must have been the faith of the leprous man that knelt before Jesus. He felt sure he could, but would he? there was the agonizing doubt: 'Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst'—would he not rather shrink from such a loathsome object? But it was with kind eye the great Teacher looked on him: Jesus was 'moved with compassion,' and did not disdain with his pure hand to touch the suppliant: 'I will: be thou clean.' O the unutterable joy of that moment! The corrupt disfigurement of the body passed away: the skin resumed its natural hue: the fresh blood coursed healthily through the veins: no wonder that, in spite of the charge he received, the man, as he went for his official cleansing to the priest, told out his marvellous story, and extolled the power of him that had relieved him: no wonder, too, that the country rose at the recital, and so thronged Jesus that he could not enter the towns, and had to retire into the waste. We may pause one moment to ask if such accounts could have been published as we have them a few years after in the life-time of multitudes who must have had perfect knowledge of what occurred, if they were not true?

The circuit lasted probably but a few days; and Jesus returned again to Capernaum, where his presence was soon known, and the people gathered round him. But enemies had now arrived. These were not only Galilean Pharisees, but men from Judea and Jerusalem. Captious objections were made against him, because he healed a man, telling him his sins were forgiven; and because he called Matthew from the receipt of custom, and accepted an invitation to his house where publicans were guests; and because his disciples did not fast like the Pharisees; and because they plucked the ears of corn on the sabbath, and a man was actually healed on the sabbath-day. And so were the people stirred up by these emissaries, that they began wickedly (Pharisees and Herodians in ill-omened alliance) to concert plans against his life (Mark ii., iii. 1-6; Luke v. 17-39, vi. 1-11). Jesus then withdrew to the sea. And he deemed it the fitting time to select twelve as his apostles and special friends and witnesses. Then, too, it would seem, he delivered his sermon on the mount, on the hill now called Hattin, a discourse given at fuller length by St. Matthew, and in shorter compendium by St. Luke (Matt. v., vi., vii.; Mark iii. 13-19; Luke vi. 12-49).

Other events must be briefly noted. There was the healing of the centurion's servant on his return to Capernaum, the raising of the widow's son at Nain, the anointing of Jesus' feet in the house of Simon, probably the message of enquiry by John Baptist's disciples, the crowded assemblage when he was again at Capernaum, when his relatives interfered to check him, the charge that his wondrous power was derived from Beelzebub, the series of parables, the crossing of the lake to the Gergesene district, with the healing of the demoniacs, and the desire of the frightened people there that he would leave them. Then came the return to the western side of the lake, the raising of Jairus' daughter, and perhaps once more a visit to the synagogue at Nazareth, where,

If there was not roused the same demoniac spirit as before, he was received with scorn: 'Is not this the carpenter?' Next there was the sending forth of the apostles; and after their return the account of the Baptist's murder arrived, and Jesus retired to the solitudes, soon peopled with immense crowds that followed him, five thousand of whom he fed near Bethsaida-Julias (Matt. viii. 5—xiv. 21; Mark iii. 20—vi. 44; Luke vii. 1—ix. 17; John vi. 1-14).

A series of other and more extended journeyings was about to succeed. Bishop Ellicott well notes 'the progressive nature . . . of our Lord's ministerial labours, and the prophetic indications, as it were, which it supplies of the future universal diffusion of the gospel. At first we have seen that our blessed Master was mercifully pleased to confine his teaching and his deeds of love and mercy mainly to that province which could now alone be reckoned as the land of the old theocracy. In Judea he was pleased to dwell continuously more than eight months; in Judea he gathered round him disciples more numerous than those of John; and from Judea he departed only when the malignity of scribe and Pharisee rendered that favoured land no longer a safe resting-place for its Redeemer and its God. Then, and not till then, followed the ministry in the eastern, and, as it would seem, more Judaized portion of Galilee. In due and mysterious order succeeded those missionary labours in frontier-lands, where the Gentile element was mainly, if not in some cases exclusively, prevalent. This gradual enlargement of the field of holy labour does indeed seem both striking and suggestive (ubi supr., lect. v. pp. 202, 203).

The ministry in eastern Galilee which has just been noticed occupied but a few weeks: that which succeeds, in the northern district, embracing a wider circuit, extends over several months. The incidents of it, however, are not related with so much particularity by the evangelists. Indeed the only portion of St. Luke which belongs to this period is but ix. 18-50, with perhaps the addition of a verse or two elsewhere. It is to St. Mark therefore, and more especially to St. Matthew, that we have to look for information. And it may be observed that the miracles performed do not appear so numerous. Jesus was rather employed in teaching, a difference in his mode of acting to be reasonably ascribed to the different character of the people amongst whom he walked. The incidents must be stated here with the utmost brevity.

Returning from the place where the five thousand had been fed, Jesus delivered a discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum which so offended many of the hearers, that some even of those who called themselves his disciples forsook him (Matt. xiv. 22-36; Mark vi. 45-56; John vi. 15-71). Some miracles of healing were performed; but the scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem were again there, besetting Jesus with heartless cavils, which were severely rebuked (Matt. xv. 1-20; Mark vii. 1-23). He then visited the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, and performed the ever-memorable miracle of healing the Syro-phenician woman's daughter (Matt. xv. 21-28; Mark vii. 24-30). His further journeyings may be thus noted. Returning from the Phœnician border (whether he had passed it is uncertain) he again traversed Decapolis, and came to the farther shore of the sea of Galilee. Here he healed many sick persons, and fed four thousand with seven loaves and a few fishes. Crossing the lake to Dalmanutha he was encountered by Sadducees with Pharisees. He soon left these cavillers and went to Bethsaida-Julias, and thence to the district of Cæsarea Philippi. In this neighbourhood was the solemn confession made by Peter, as the spokesman of the twelve, that Jesus was the Son of God: the Lord's warning them of his approaching rejection at Jerusalem and death there followed; and about a week later was the transfiguration, most probably on one of the spurs of Hermon. On his descent from the mountain Jesus healed a demoniac boy, and would seem afterwards to have soon returned to Capernaum, where he paid tribute, and probably remained a while in privacy (Matt. xv. 28—xviii. 35; Mark vii. 31—ix. 50).

It is observable that in these journeys Jesus passed through regions with a mixed population. And, as he carried his presence and teaching into half-heathen lands, so he gave blessed proof that his mission was not exclusively to his own countrymen, and that a time would come when the gospel would be proclaimed to every nation. But now the period was approaching when his work would be consummated. His missionary journeys over, he must labour again in Jerusalem and Judea, face afresh the malice of the rulers, and ultimately shed his blood. We have now, therefore, to consider the journeyings towards Jerusalem. St. Matthew and St. Mark supply little material for the part of the history we now approach. But St. Luke gives large account and the notices of St. John contribute to fix the particular times of various events.

The feast of tabernacles, in the autumn, was drawing on; and much curiosity was expressed as to whether Jesus would or would not attend at Jerusalem. His relatives exhorted him not to confine himself and his works to remote Galilee, but to announce himself before the assembled nation in the metropolis. Their censure proceeded from vanity and unbelief combined. They doubted his pretensions; but yet, if they were well-founded, they wished for the full credit of them. Jesus, however, seems to have delayed in setting out. And it was not perhaps till the feast was already begun that he reached Jerusalem, having passed through Samaria where, because of the evident purport of his journey, he was ill-received. At Jerusalem he did not at first show himself; and enquiries were made after him. It was about the middle of the festival that he appeared in the temple and taught publicly; and to this teaching we may perhaps ascribe those discourses which seem to have produced so deep an impression on the multitudes, on the officers, on the very hostile party themselves, made more by weight of words than by miraculous deeds; for the healing of the blind beggar is the only supernatural exercise of power recorded (Luke ix. 51-62; John vii. 2-x. 21). Perhaps after this festival Jesus, quitting Jerusalem, remained in Judea; perhaps it was at that time that he sent out his seventy disciples, and then that the other incidents occurred which are noted by St. Luke (Luke x. 1-xiii. 21). At the feast of the dedication he again repaired to Jerusalem, and while teaching in Solomon's porch openly asserted his divinity. His stay was probably not long. The enmity of the Jews was excited to the highest pitch; and Jesus retired from them to the secluded region beyond the Jordan where John had at first baptized; but even there many resorted to him (John x. 22-42).

He was in Perea, visiting and teaching in many towns and villages, advancing, however, gradually nearer to Jerusalem, when some Pharisees came with an alarm (as if greatly concerned for his safety) that Herod would kill him. He did not immediately quit that part of the country, though his stay was probably not many days longer; and we may not unreasonably believe that the events and parables recorded by St. Luke (Luke xiii. 22-xvii. 10) are to be placed in this time. It was while still beyond the Jordan that the message reached him of Lazarus's sickness. And then followed the journey to Bethany and the wondrous miracle there. This stung the rulers to madness: the council assembled; and from that time they were maturing their wicked purpose of putting him to death. But they found no immediate opportunity. Jesus, though so near as Bethany, probably did not then enter Jerusalem, but retired for a while to Ephraim, waiting for the now fast-approaching passover (John xi. 1-54).

Then commenced the last solemn journey to Jerusalem. Jesus first directed his course northward, passing through Samaria and some part of Galilee, across the Jordan through Perea, and then, re-crossing the river, he directed his course by Jericho. Various miracles were performed, and various parables spoken during the circuit; the incidents of which are narrated by all the synoptical Gospels (Matt. xix., xx.; Mark x.; Luke xvii. 11-xix. 28). Wonderful is the thought of that determined zeal with which he pressed forward to the place where, as he knew, the most grievous sufferings awaited him, heading the procession, and warning his disciples of what was about to be done; while they, still not able to conceive the reality of his words, were demanding place and pre-eminence in, as they thought, the worldly kingdom he was about to establish. And so six days before the passover Jesus reached the loving and beloved home of Bethany (John xii. 1).

In all the preceding history there is perfect harmony and the stamp of credibility. The same purpose is evident from the beginning, frequently announced, steadily pursued, carried out in the same temper, with neither mistake nor change. And observe how the different histories fit in. To a cursory reader the evangelists may seem all to be going over the same ground—one but the repetition of what the others had said. But on a more minute investigation we find that circumstances are given by one additional to what another had told in brief words. Incidents omitted here appear there in their places; and the narrative so made out of different threads is of a piece and consistent; or, if there be obscurity anywhere, it is because we know not all that might be told.

But the great drama hastens on; and the last scenes must be briefly presented. It was probably late on Friday when Jesus reached Bethany. The next day the family made him a feast. Lazarus was at the table: Martha served; and Mary with her loving heart anointed his feet with costly perfume. Matthew and Mark seem to place this feast later, 'after the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, not,' as bishop Ellicott says, 'as having happened then, but as standing in suitable connection with the mention of the betrayal of Judas; the workings of whose evil heart, as we know from St. John, were fully displayed on the occasion of this supper' (ubi supr., p. 284; comp. Horne's Introd., edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 474, 475). The news of his arrival was known; and that night many persons came from the neighbouring city, residents and those that were flocking up for the passover, to see both Jesus, and also Lazarus, who died a few weeks before and was now alive. On the morrow, Sunday, Jesus would enter Jerusalem. 'Prophecy,' says bishop Ellicott, 'must have its full and exact fulfilment: the King must approach the city of the King with some meek symbols of kingly majesty. With haste, it would seem, two disciples are dispatched to the village over-against them to bring to him who had need of it the colt "whereon yet never man sat": with haste the zealous followers cast upon it their garments, and, all unconscious of the significant nature of their act, place thereon their Master, the coming King. Strange it would have been, if feelings such as now were eagerly stirring in every heart had not found vent in words. Strange indeed, if, with the hill of Zion now breaking upon their view, the long prophetic past had not seemed to mingle with the present, and evoke those shouts of mysterious welcome and praise which, first beginning with the disciples and those immediately round our Lord, soon were heard from every mouth of that glorifying multitude. And not from them alone. Numberless others there were fast streaming up Olivet, a palm-branch in every hand, to greet the raiser of Lazarus, and the conqueror of death; and now all join. . . Garments are torn off and cast down before the Holy One: green boughs bestrew the way: Zion's King rides onward in meek majesty, a thousand voices before and a thousand voices behind rising up to heaven with hosannas and with mingled words of magnifying acclamation; some of which once had been sung to the psalmist's harp, and some heard even from angelic tongues' (pp. 286-288). And Jesus as he beheld it wept over the doomed city. He entered it; and the whole population was moved; so that the Pharisees bitterly acknowledged: 'The world is gone after him.' He proceeded, as was meet, to the temple and surveyed it. But hours had passed: it was now evening; and he returned with the twelve to Bethany (Matt. xxi. 1-11, xxvi. 6-13; Mark xi. 1-11, xiv. 3-9; Luke xix. 28-44; John xii. 1-19).

The next day, Monday, Jesus went probably at an early hour to Jerusalem. On his way he sought fruit on the fig-tree which, having a show of leaves, though it was not yet the ordinary time of figs, ought also to have had fruit. There were no figs; and he pronounced a curse upon it. He then entered the temple and cleansed it from the traffickers who profaned its courts. And it would seem that the children repeated the cries of gratulation which attended the triumphal entry of the preceding day, provoking the angry question of the Pharisees, Did he hear? could he approve such acclamations? Many sick, too, were healed before he again retired to Bethany (Matt. xxi. 12-22; Mark xi. 12-19). On Tuesday Jesus once more visited Jerusalem, and was teaching in the temple. But through the day repeated efforts were made to harass and ensnare him. A deputation came from the sanhedrim to demand his authority for what he did. Then appeared the Pharisees and Herodians to ask him if it was lawful to pay tribute to the Roman Cæsar; and next the Sadducees, to puzzle him if they could with a question about the resurrection; and then a Pharisee lawyer enquired which was the greatest commandment of the law. With consummate wisdom Jesus foiled every successive questioner, and uttered his solemn condemnation of the people and the city which rejected him. His disciples made him observe the great buildings of the temple; but he delivered the mournful prediction of its utter ruin, and, having spoken some warning parables, he again returned to Bethany. His public teaching was now finished: no more was Jerusalem to listen to that gracious voice which would have allured her children to his great salvation (Matt. xxi. 23-xxvi. 2; Mark xi. 20-xiii. 37; Luke xx., xxi; John xii. 20-50): the gracious opportunity was past. Wednesday would seem to have been spent in retirement. But the Jews were busy with their plottings, and concluded their treacherous bargain with Judas (Matt. xxvi. 3-5, 14-16; Mark xiv. 1, 2, 10, 11; Luke xxii. 1-6).

Of the events of Thursday and Friday only the briefest summary can be given here. There was the preparation, and the last supper, the humility of Jesus when his disciples had contended who should be greatest, the departure of the traitor, the institution of the eucharist, the heavenly discourses, the warning to Peter, the evening walk to Gethsemane, the agony there, the seizure, and examinations before Annas and Caiaphas, the appearance in the morning before Pilate, perplexing the worldly governor, who had never encountered such a prisoner, the mocking by Herod, the demand of the people for his crucifixion, the buffeting, the scourging, and the cross—no sorrow ever was there like unto his sorrow. Then there was the prayer for his murderers, the Roman soldiers that struck in the torturing nails, and the darkness, and the earthquake, and the royal pardon of the penitent thief, and those deeds and words of wonder till he gave up the ghost, amid the crash of rending rocks, which made even the Roman centurion exclaim: 'Truly this was the Son of God!' Then they took the body down; and it was buried; and a seal was set upon the sepulchre, and a watch planted there (Matt. xxvi. 17-xxvii. 66; Mark xiv. 12-xv. 47; Luke xxii. 7-xxiii. 56; John xiii. 1-xix. 42).

So lived and so died Jesus of Nazareth. The exact date of his death is as much disputed as that of his birth; and the space of time within which it is placed by various critics ranges from 29 to 35 A.D.: see table in Wieseler's Chron. Synops., pp. 485, 486. Wieseler himself decides for April 7, 30 A.D.; and bishop Ellicott acquiesces. Browne (Ord. Sæcl., p. 55) fixes on March 18, 29 A.D.; and with this date some of the most important elements of the calculation seem best to agree. The duration of the ministry of Jesus it is equally difficult to determine. Bishop Ellicott, who has been much followed in this article, allows two years and three months (ubi sup., p. 149): archbishop Thomson, understanding the passover by the 'feast' of John v. 1, extends it over three years (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. 1, p. 1051); while Browne, after an ingenious discussion, concludes that it was one single year (ubi sup., p. 91); but then he has to give up John vi. 4.

The death has been spoken of; but the life of Jesus is not ended. It was not possible that He should be holden the prisoner of death. So, on the third day, the Sunday morning, there was a great earthquake; and a mighty angel descended to unclose the sepulchre; and Jesus lived again; and he shall die no more. In truth that was a day of wonders; and very slowly, though he again and again showed himself to them, were the sorrowful disciples brought to believe that he was risen. The narratives of the evangelists, though particular, are brief (Matt. xxviii.; Mark xvi.; Luke xxiv.; John xx.); and, as no one relates all that happened, there is some difficulty in fitting in the different circumstances. Perhaps the order may have been nearly as follows. When the party of women were on their way, Mary Magdalene pressed on in advance, for she reached the tomb before the twilight ended, while the others came up just as the sun was rising. Mary saw the stone rolled away, and ran off to apprise Peter and John. Meanwhile the other women arrived, entered the tomb, and were desired by the angels to go tell the disciples. And, as they went, Jesus himself met them, and reiterated the command. There are differences noted as to the number and exact position of angels seen; but we are not to imagine these heavenly beings stationed motionless; and the women, too, were coming and going. Speedily Peter and John ran from the city, and perceived that the tomb was empty, and went amazed away. Mary, however, lingered weeping, and then occurred that touching incident, when, having first seen Jesus without knowing him, she was startled into recognition by the well-remembered voice, and she saw as in a moment the vastness of the victory gained over death. For full examination, see Robinson's Harmony, edit. Boston, 1853, part ix. pp. 228-235; Birks' Horæ Evangel., book iii. chap. iii. pp. 423-454.

Jesus took again his own body; and still the marks of suffering were on it. But it seems to have undergone some marvellous change, and to be possessed of properties it had not before. He repeatedly appeared to his disciples—abp. Thomson enumerates (ubi supr., p. 1671) ten such appearances—to the women, to Mary Magdalene, to Peter, to the two at Emmaus, to the apostles at Jerusalem on the resurrection-day, a week after to the apostles again, then in Galilee to seven (John xxi.), to the eleven, and possibly to five hundred with them (1 Cor. xv. 5, 6), to James, to all the apostles at the ascension—but he did not live with them as he had done; though by these frequent appearances he sufficiently proved the identity of his person and the truth of his resurrection. Forty days he still so lingered upon earth, and was then carried to the right hand of God (Acts i. 1-11), where afterwards Stephen and Paul beheld him in glory (vii. 56; 1 Cor. xv. 8). John, too, still later in vision saw his august appearance (Rev. i. 13-16).

And now was his career a failure? Was this wonderful being merely man? Surely to such questions there can be but one reply. It is this Jesus who is Lord and Christ; at whose name all creation bows (Phil. ii. 9, 10): precious is his blood-shedding, and dear his service for ever.

Several books have been referred to in the preceding brief sketch of the history of Jesus; and it would be easy to make out an extended list of works treating of him, his life and actions. Let it suffice here to point the reader to bishop Jeremy Taylor's excellent Life of Christ, to be found in his collected works, and also in a separate form.

JE'SUS.—2. The Greek form of Joshua (Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8: comp. marg.). This form is used in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. xlvi. 1, and elsewhere).—3. One whom St. Paul calls a fellow-worker that was a comfort to him. He was surnamed Justus (Col. iv. 11).

JE'SUS.—1. The high priest Joshua, son of Jozadak (1 Esdr. v. 5, 8, 24, 48, 56, 68, 70, vi. 2, ix. 19; Ecclus. xlix. 12).—2 (1 Esdr. v. 58, ix. 48). Possibly two persons. Jeshua (Ezra iii. 9; Neh. ix. 5).—3, 4. The author of the book of Ecclesiasticus and his grandson. See ECCLESIASTICUS.

JE'THER (excellence).—1 (Exod. iv. 18, marg.): see JETHRO.—2. The eldest son of Gideon (Judges viii. 20).—3. One who married Abigail, David's sister, and was the father of Amasa, whom Joab murdered (1 Kings ii. 5, 32; 1 Chron. ii. 17). In the last-named place Jether is called an Ishmeelite; but in 2 Sam. xvii. 25 he is called Ithra, an Israelite. Perhaps Ishmeelite is more likely to be correct.—4. One of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. ii. 32).—5. Another descendant of Judah (iv. 17). 6. A chief of Asher (vii. 33), perhaps the same as Ithran (37).

JE'THETH (a nail, or tent-pin). One of the 'dukes' of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Chron. i. 51).

JETH'LAH (high, may he exalt him). One of the cities allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 42).

JETH'RO (his excellence). A priest or prince of Midian, who received Moses when he fled from Egypt, and gave him one of his seven daughters, Zipporah, to wife. When Moses was commissioned to return to Egypt and demand the deliverance of Israel from Pharaoh, he took his wife and sons with him, but afterwards sent them back to Jethro. After the passage of the Red sea Jethro visited the Hebrew camp, bringing with him the family of Moses. He was most cordially received: he joined in offering sacrifice to Jehovah: he suggested to Moses some administrative regulations, which were approved; and he was invited to accompany Israel to Canaan. He or his descendants appear to have subsequently complied with the invitation (Exod. iii. 1, iv. 18, xviii.). Some difficulty has been felt, as if three different names were given to the same individual—Hobab, Jethro, and Reuel or Raguel. Hoabb and Jethro are indeed identical: see HOBAB. But the probability is that Hobab was a personal name, Jethro a title of dignity, and that Hobab or Jethro was the son of Reuel. It is only necessary to give the words 'father' and 'daughter' (ii. 16-22), as is frequently the case in the sacred writings, the more extended sense of 'grandfather' and 'grand-daughter.' See RAGUEL.

JE'TUR (an enclosure, nomadic camp). One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31, v. 19). The tribe descended from him settled in the province afterwards called ITUREA, which see.

JE'UEL (treasured of God). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ix. 6).

JE'UEL (1 Esdr. viii. 39). Jeiel (Ezra viii. 13).

JE'USH (to whom God hastens).—1. One of the sons of Esau by Aholibamah (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. i. 35).—2. A Benjamite chief (vii. 10).—3. A Gershonite Levite (xxiii. 10, 11).—4. One of the sons of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xxiii. 19).

JE'UZ (counselling). A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. viii. 10).

JE'W, JEWS. Properly the people of the southern state after the division of the kingdom. But we do not find the term generally so applied till after the captivity of the ten tribes: indeed there appears to be but a single previous example, and that in a book compiled after the destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings xvi. 6). When the northern kingdom was dissolved, the name was given more frequently to the remaining tribes of Judah and Benjamin, including the Levites (xxv. 25; Jer. xxxii. 12, xxxiv. 9, xxxviii. 19, xl. 12, xli. 3, xlii. 1, lii. 28). During the captivity and afterwards, the ten tribes having as a people faded out of sight, the whole remnant of the seed of Jacob, composed mainly of those belonging to the kingdom of Judah, augmented, however, by some few from other tribes (Luke ii. 36), bore the name of Jews (Ezra iv. 12, v. 1, 5, vi. 7, 8, 14; Neh. i. 2, ii. 16, iv. 1, v. 1, 8, 17; Esth. iii. 4, 6, 10, 13; Dan. iii. 8, 12, and elsewhere). In the first three Gospels the term rarely occurs (Matt. xxviii. 15; Mark vii. 3; Luke vii. 3, xxiii. 51), except in the derivative title 'king of the Jews' (e.g. Matt. xxvii. 11); but the use of it by St. John is peculiar. Of course he sometimes applies it with a national reference (e.g. John ii. 6, 13, iii. 1, iv. 9), but very frequently as 'designating the Jews in their peculiar aspect as a hostile community to our Lord, and as standing in marked contrast to the impressive multitude' (i. 19, ii. 18, and elsewhere): see Ellicott, Hist. Lect., pp. 115, 141, notes. In the epistles we sometimes find the word employed nationally (2 Cor. xi. 24), sometimes with reference to religion (Rom. i. 16, ii. 28, 29), sometimes distributively, Jews and Gentiles (Greeks) constituting the population of the world (iii. 9). And it is observable that it is more comprehensive than 'Hebrews' (Acts vi.); for Hellenists (Grecians) might be Jews; nor is it quite synonymous with 'Israelites,' which term seems, sometimes at least, to express more decidedly covenant-hopes, and relationship (John i. 47; 2 Cor. xi. 22). By foreigners the appellation Judeans or Jews was usually given to the nation; and so the classical authors speak: this, too, has subsisted to our own days. See JUDAH, JUDEA.

It may be proper to give here a brief sketch of the history of the Jews after the close of the Babylonish captivity, through the period in which the sacred history does not chronicle their deeds and fortunes.

The captivity had widely dispersed them. Besides those carried to Babylon, many went into Egypt and made themselves a home there. There subsequently, at Leontopolis, a temple was built; and, though their connection with their brethren in Palestine was not altogether broken, yet in this Egyptian temple the ritual of the law was observed. Throughout other countries bodies of the Jews were settled in the various provinces—perhaps even beyond the limits—of the Persian empire. The restored in Judea were of course vassals of the same crown. But this monarchy was subverted by Alexander the Great, who is said to have bestowed privileges on the Jews. On his early death 323 B.C., four kingdoms, Macedonia, Thrace, Syria, and Egypt were formed of his dominions. Between the two last-named Judea lay, and was for a long while under the power of one or other of them, and frequently the battle-field of their armies. It formed part of the kingdom of Egypt under Ptolemy Soter, and was favourably treated by Ptolemy Philadelphus, in whose reign most probably the Septuagint version of the Old Testament was commenced. Oppressed by Ptolemy Philopator the Jews revolted, and placed themselves under Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. By Antiochus Epiphanes they were cruelly persecuted: their religion was proscribed, and their temple profaned. Then that determined patriotic spirit was roused which, under the leadership of the Maccabean family, high priests as well as princes, achieved at last their independence. The regal title was taken by Aristobolus, of this family, son of Hyrcanus, 107 B.C., and transmitted to his successors: see MACCABEES. But the Roman power was now extending itself in the east Syria was made a Roman province by Pompey, who took Jerusalem 63 B.C.; and from that time the Jews were more or less directly dependent on the authority of Rome. The sovereignty was indeed granted to members of the Herodian family: see HEROD: of whom Herod the Great, and, after an interval, Herod Agrippa I. had the largest dominion. But ultimately the Jews were governed by Roman procurators, till the disastrous war in which their capital, their ritual, their polity were destroyed by Vespasian and Titus: see JERUSALEM. They still exist, a separate nation, the living evidence of prophecy; and though without a country they exercise no unimportant influence on the affairs of the world. And the time may come when they may again assume their place, and re-occupy their land, a faithful people under the renewed protection of the God of their fathers.

A notice of Jewish post-biblical history, exhibiting the preparation made therein for the promulgation of the gospel dispensation, and marking the progress of Jewish thought and organization, will be found in Westcott's Introd. to the Gospels, chap. i., in which the reader is directed to various works on Jewish history. There is also given in a note a synopsis of Jewish literature from the third century before Christ to the fifth century after Christ. In later times learned Jews have appeared, such as Abarbanel, Aben-ezra, Kimchi, and a host of others.

JEWEL. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

JEWESS (Acts xvi. 1, xxiv. 24). A woman of Hebrew birth.

JEWISH (Tit. i. 14). An epithet with an unfavourable meaning applied to rabbinical fables.

JEWRY (Dan. v. 13; Luke xxiii. 5; John vii. 1). A name of JUDEA, which see.

JEZANI'AH (whom Jehovah hears) (Jer xl. 8, xlii. 1). In xliii. 2 he is called Azariah. See JAAZANIAH, 1.

JEZEBEL (chaste, no habitation?). The daughter of Eth-baal, king of the Zidonians (1 Kings xvi. 31), who was priest of Astarte under his predecessor on the throne, whom he murdered. She was married to Ahab king of Israel, who, weak and irresolute, yielded himself entirely to the guidance of his unscrupulous wife. Jezebel, therefore, occupies a more prominent position than any other queen of an Israelitish king. The wives of the reigning monarch are usually in the shade: the king's mother is first in influence. But Jezebel had at once the reins of power in her hand. She cut off the prophets of the Lord (xviii. 13): she introduced the public worship of Baal (xvi. 32, 33), and maintained 450 prophets of Baal and 400 prophets of Astarte at her own table (xvii. 19). When on the great day of Carmel Ahab dared not resist the righteous vengeance which, according to the law, Elijah executed on these false prophets, Jezebel did not yield. Perhaps unable at the moment to seize Elijah, for the general voice of the people proclaimed that Jehovah was God, she sent him a defiant message, swearing by her gods that by the morrow she would take his life for the lives of her prophets (ix. 1, 2). The firmness of the Tishbite failed; and he fled from Israel through Judah into the far wilderness. The evil power of Jezebel was ere long evinced again. Ahab coveted the possession of Naboth, which lay hard by the royal domain. Naboth would not part with his inheritance; and Ahab dared not seize it; and so, like a spoiled child, he lay upon his bed and would not eat. Jezebel had no scruples. She upbraided her husband for his pusillanimity, wrote at once to the elders of Jezreel, ordered them by letters, which she sealed with the king's signet, to hold a mock court on Naboth and condemn him; and, when they reported to her that the deed was done, she roused her husband to go and take possession. But he met in Naboth's vineyard the awful form of Elijah, who pronounced the tremendous sentence of God on Ahab and on Jezebel (xxi.). Ahab humbled himself; but Jezebel did not. During the reigns of her sons, Jezebel, though queen-mother, sinks out of sight. In Jehoram's reign her influence was evidently gone. For he, careless and ungodly as he was, yet put away the image of Baal (2 Kings iii. 2). But, when Jehu was come to take vengeance on the house of Ahab, Jezebel was again the imperious queen of other days. She dressed herself with regal splendour; and, as the chariot of Jehu rolled up to the gate of Jezreel, she flung at him a bitter taunt. Retribution was instant. She was dashed by her own chamberlains from the window, crushed under the horses' feet; and the dogs ate Jezebel in the portion of Jezreel (ix. 30-37).

Her name was afterwards symbolically used (Rev. ii. 23); and it is to this day a word of ignominy.

JEZE'LUS.—1 (1 Esdr. viii. 32). Jahaziel (Ezra viii. 5).—2 (1 Esdr. viii. 35). Jehiel (Ezra viii. 9).

JEZER (frame, imagination). One of the sons of Naphtali (Gen. xli. 24; Numb. xxvi. 49; 1 Chron. vii. 13).

JEZERITES. A family of Naphtali descended from Jezer (Numb. xxvi. 49).

JEZ'IAH (whom Jehovah sprinkles). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 25).

JEZ'IEL (assembly of God). A Benjamite chief who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 3).

JEZLIAH (whom God draws out). A Benjamite, one of those who dwelt in Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii. 18).

JEZO'AR (whiteness?). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 7). Probably the name is really Zohar with the conjunction.

JEZRAHIAH (whom Jehovah brings forth). The overseer of the singers at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 42).

JEZ'REEL (God has planted or scattered).—1. A name in the genealogy of Judah, probably of a man (1 Chron. iv. 3); unless some words are omitted or to be understood.—2.

The symbolical name given to a child (Hos. i. 4; comp. ii. 23). Whish (Paraphr. on Minor Proph., pp. 2, 8) illustrates the prophet's meaning by translating 'Call his name God's Broad-cast; for yet a little while, and I will cast abroad the nation.' 'And I will for my own sake sow them broad-cast in the land, as seed is sown for a harvest.'

JEZ'REEL (id.).—1. A city in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 56). It was probably of this Jezreel that Ahinoam, one of David's wives, was a native (1 Sam. xxv. 43, xxvii. 3, xxx. 5; 2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 2; 1 Chron. iii. 1).

2. A border-city of Issachar (Josh. xix. 18), situated in the opening of the central arm which branches out of the great plain of Esdraelon, and runs east and south-east towards the Jordan.

Being seated on a hill it must have had a commanding position. According to Dr. Thomson, the road along which Jehu came, making a circuit, as it must have done to avoid the mill-ponds supplied by the great fountain (Judges vii. 1; 1 Sam. xxix. 1), is visible for full six miles from Jezreel (2 Kings ix. 17). In the earlier times the Canaanites retained possession of Jezreel; and the Manassites, to whom certain towns in that region, though locally in Issachar, were assigned, were unable to drive them out (Josh. xvi. 16). In subsequent history various important events occurred in the vicinity. Here Gideon encamped, and Saul also before his last fatal battle with the Philistines; and there can be little doubt that the fountain mentioned on each of those occasions was that still existing under the name of 'Ain Jalûd' (the fountain of Goliath). It was in Ahab's time that the city attained its greatest pre-eminence. That monarch had a palace here, which he and his son Joram generally inhabited. This palace was probably in the eastern quarter of the town; for it was just as Jehu entered the gate that Jezebel looked out upon him (2 Kings ix. 31). And the vineyard of Naboth must have been outside the walls to the east, near the fountain, since it was into that portion that Joram's body was cast before Jehu entered the city (24-26).

Dr. Thomson thus describes the modern aspect of this celebrated place, now known as Zer'in: 'East of it rises the high mountain called Jebel Jalûd, and also Jebel Nûris, from a village of that name. Below it the valley of Jezreel sweeps round southward to the Jordan. On the north Jebel ed-Dûhy (Little Hermon) swells up like another Tabor; and to the west and south is the magnificent Esdraelon, surrounded by the mountains of Galilee, "the excellency of Carmel," and the fat hills of Samaria. There is little to claim attention in the village itself. A few stones built here and there in the rude huts, seem to claim the honours of antiquity; and these large sarcophagi are certainly relics of old Jezreel. The city could never have been large or splendid. The greater part was probably mere mud hovels; and yet there must have been some well-built palaces. . . . This apology for a castle may now stand upon the spot of that watch-tower, from which the rebel Jehu was first seen driving furiously up the valley . . . The neighbourhood is celebrated for its wheat' (The Land and the Book, pp. 459-461).

JEZ'REEL, THE VALLEY OF (Josh. xvii. 16; Judges vi. 33; Hos. i. 5). Properly the central arm, stretching from the great plain between Little Hermon and Gilboa towards the east: see ESDRAELON. This valley is probably to be understood in several places where Jezreel alone is mentioned (e. g. 2 Sam. ii. 9, iv. 4; Hos. ii. 22).

JEZ'REELITE, JEZ'REELITISS. An inhabitant or native of Jezreel (1 Kings xxi. 1, 4, 6, 7, 15, 16; 2 Kings ix. 21, 25; also 1 Sam. xxvii. 3, xxx. 5; 2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 2; 1 Chron. iii. 1).

JIB'SAM (pleasant). A descendant of Issachar (1 Chron. vii. 2).

JID'LAPH (weeping). A son of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 22).

JIM'NA or JIM'NAH (good fortune). The eldest son of Asher (Gen. xlii. 17; Numb. xxvi. 44). He is also called Imna (1 Chron. vii. 30).

JIM'NITES. A family of Asher, descended from Jimna (Numb. xxvi. 44).

JIPH'TAH (whom Jehovah sets free). A city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 43).

JIPH'TAH-EL (which God opens). A valley, the boundary of the territories of Zebulun and Asher (Josh. xix. 14, 27). It is most probable that Jotapata, noted in the war with Vespasian, stood here, on the site of the modern Jefat.

JO'AB (whose father is Jehovah).—1. The eldest of the three sons of Zeruiah, David's sister. His father's name is not mentioned: we only know that his sepulchre was in Beth-lehem (2 Sam. ii. 32). It is not clear whether Joab was one of David's companions when in hiding through fear of Saul: his brother Abishai certainly was (1 Sam. xxvi. 6-9). But, after David's accession to the throne of Judah, the three brothers appear as heading the troops of Judah in an engagement with Abner, commander of Ish-bosheth's forces. Asahel, the youngest, was killed by Abner in self-defence; and this laid the foundation of that enmity in Joab's mind against Abner which could be satiated only with his blood (2 Sam. ii. 12-32). After a time the opportunity presented itself. Abner made overtures to David, which the king favourably received, and means were taken to bring the rest of the tribes of Israel under his sceptre. Joab, who had been absent while Abner was at Hebron, pretended on his return that the visit was made with a treacherous object, and, sending after Abner, he met and assassinated him; Abishai, it would seem, being privy to his purpose. Besides revenge for Asahel's death, Joab was actuated by ambition. If Abner brought over Israel to David, he would necessarily be captain of the host; and Joab could brook no superior. David denounced the murder, but thought himself too weak to punish it (iii. 6-39).

Joab's authority was confirmed by his bold success in the capture of Zion (v. 6-9; 1 Chron. xi. 4-8). He was now the undisputed commander-in-chief, in influence and power second to David only. Of course he had titles (2 Sam. xi. 11; 1 Chron. xxvii. 34), and of course, while in the field in the king's absence, he acted independently (2 Sam. ii. 28, xii. 26, xviii. 16; 1 Kings xi. 16, 21). He had a staff (2 Sam. xviii. 15, xxiii. 37), estates, perhaps near Baal-bazor (xiii. 23, xiv. 30), and a house in the wilderness (1 Kings ii. 34). Joab took a leading part in the great wars of David's reign, especially distinguishing himself against the Ammonites and Syrians (2 Sam. x. 6-14). Prof. Blunt (Undesigned Coincidences, part ii. 11), and after him Dr. Stanley (Smith, Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 1083), have imagined that Joab's chief power over David was acquired by his possession of the terrible secret of the monarch's adultery and murder of Uriah. But these able critics have forgotten that the most remarkable examples of Joab's unscrupulous boldness were either before that great sin or after it ceased to be a secret. From Uriah's death to Absalom's rebellion probably the matter was known to but few. And in that interval Joab was so little confident of his own influence with the king that he did not venture to propose Absalom's recall without having recourse to stratagem (2 Sam. xiv.). When David was dethroned, and his concubines dishonoured, in accordance with Nathan's sentence (xii. 7-12, xvi. 21, 22), we cannot believe that there was a man in Israel who did not know the worst. Joab was faithful to David in that rebellion, but disobeyed his command to spare Absalom (xviii.), and reproved his master in very uncourteous terms for his too great grief (xix. 1-7). David's feelings were, however, thoroughly aroused: he superseded Joab, and appointed another nephew, Amasa (who had been Absalom's general) commander-in-chief (13). This appointment was evidently unpopular; and Joab took advantage of the unwillingness of the soldiery to serve under Amasa, and assassinated him as he had done Abner. Having then been successful against Sheba, he resumed his former post (xx.). We afterwards find him remonstrating against the census, but compelled to carry out the king's commands (xxiv. 2-9). At the end of David's reign he supported Adonijah's claim to the throne (1 Kings i. 7): his evil deeds were rehearsed by David to Solomon (ii. 5, 6); and, on a fresh indication of Adonijah's discontent, he was put to death by Solomon (28-34). His character, ambitious, daring, unscrupulous, yet with an occasional show of piety (2 Sam. x. 12) is sufficiently exhibited by his career. Possibly it is from him that Ataroth Beth-Joab, or the house of Joab, had its name (1 Chron. ii. 55).

2. A name in the genealogies of Judah (iv. 14).—3. One whose descendants returned after the captivity (Ezra ii. 6, viii. 9; Neh. vii. 11). Perhaps the person mentioned in Ezra viii. 9 was not identical with the individual noted in the other texts.

JOA'CHAZ (1 Esdr. i. 34). Jehoiakim.

JO'ACHIM.—1 (Bar. i. 3). Jehoiakim.—2 (7). Probably Joiakim, the high priest (Neh. xii. 10). But, if so, there is an anachronism, and additional proof is afforded of the untrustworthiness of the apocryphal book of Baruch.

JO'ACIM.—1 (1 Esdr. i. 37-39). Jehoiakim.—2 (43). Jehoiachin.—3 (v. 5). Probably Joiakim the son of Jeshua : comp. Neh. xii. 10.—4 (Judith iv. 6, 8, 14, &c.). A high priest in whose time Judith is said to have lived.—5 (Hist. Sus.). The husband of Susanna.

JOADA'NUS (1 Esdr. ix. 19).

JO'AH (whose brother, i.e. helper, is Jehovah).—1. The son of Asaph, recorder or chronicler to Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 18, 26, 37; Isai. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22).—2. A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 21), probably the same with Ethan (42).—3. A Korhite, son of Obed-edom, one of the porters (xxvi. 4).—4. A Gershonite Levite, who, with his son, assisted in the reforms of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 12).—5. The son of Joahaz, recorder to Josiah (xxxiv. 8).

JOA'HAZ (whom Jehovah holds or sustains). The father of Joab, recorder to king Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 8).

JOA'NAN (1 Esdr. ix. 1). Johanan (Ezra x. 6).

JOAN'NA (whom Jehovah has graciously given).—1. One of our Lord's ancestors (Luke iii. 27). Lord A. Hervey would identify him with Hananiah (1 Chron. iii. 19).—2. The wife of Chuza, steward to Herod Antipas, one of the women who ministered to our Lord (Luke viii. 3, xxiv. 10).

JOAN'NAN (1 Macc. ii. 2). The eldest son of the Maccabean family, surnamed Caddis. He is elsewhere called John (ix. 36, 38), and Joseph (2 Macc. viii. 22).

JO'ARIB (1 Macc. ii. 1). Jehoiarib (1 Chron. xxiv. 7).

JO'ASH (whom Jehovah bestowed? the contracted form of Jehoash, the two being indifferently used).—1. The father of Gideon, of the tribe of Manasseh. He had an altar to Baal and a 'grove'; and some have thought that he was Baal's priest. If so, he was awakened to a sense of the false god's inability to defend himself, by his son's daring act, as he sarcastically called upon the idol to avenge his own quarrel (Judges vi. 11, 25-32, vii. 14, viii. 13, 29, 32). 2. Probably one of the sons of Ahab (1 Kings xxii. 26; 2 Chron. xviii. 25).

3. The son of Ahaziah, king of Judah, by Zibiah of Beer-sheba. He appears to have been the sole male descendant of the royal house, when he was rescued by Jehosheba, his aunt, from his grandmother Athaliah's murderous cruelty, and concealed six years (2 Kings xi. 1-3; 2 Chron. xxi. 4, 17, xxii. 1, 8, 10-12). In the seventh year he was produced by Jehoiada the priest, and solemnly inaugurated king in the temple; Athaliah being summarily put to death (2 Kings xi. 4-21; 2 Chron. xxiii.). Joash was seven years old when placed upon the throne and he reigned forty years, 878-838 B.C. So long as Jehoiada lived, beyond the twenty-third year of the king, Joash, who looked up to him with respect, reigned well. The high places were not, indeed, taken away; but the temple was repaired; and, generally speaking, the country was prosperous. But, when Jehoiada was no more, the king, easily influenced by counsellors for good or evil, was induced by the apostate nobles to restore the idol-worship of Baal and Ashtaroth. Prophets were sent to warn him; but he would not listen; and he even commanded Zechariah the priest, son of his ancient benefactor Jehoiada, to be stoned in the very court of the Lord's house, because he uttered a faithful warning against sins that were unblushingly committed. This filled up the measure of the unhappy king's misdeeds. Judgment was now to be executed on him. The Syrians invaded Judah: the large army of Joash was defeated by a much smaller force of Syrians; and Jerusalem itself would have fallen, had not Joash bought off the invaders by vast sums of money. But the state was thoroughly disorganized: the king was suffering under a severe disease; and his own servants, Jozachar or Zabab, and Jehozabad, conspired against him and slew him. Thus the blood of Zechariah was avenged (2 Kings xii.; 2 Chron. xxiv.).

4. The son of Jehoahaz, and grandson of Jehu. He succeeded his father on the throne of Israel, and reigned sixteen years, 840-825 B.C. (comp. Browne, Ordo Sacerdotum, § 228). The kingdom at his accession was brought very low; but, though Joash continued the sinful worship of the calves at Beth-el and Dan, God mercifully pitied his people, and gave them deliverance. Joash was successful against both Syria and Judah. He appears to have treated Elisha with great respect, and visited him upon his death-bed, deploring his removal as a national calamity. The dying prophet placed bow and arrows in the monarch's hand, and bade him shoot. Thrice he shot, and stayed. The action was symbolical; and Elisha was displeased that Joash stayed so soon. Three victories, however, he assured him he should gain. And, accordingly, Joash three times defeated Ben-hadad, who succeeded his father Hazael, and recovered the territory that belonged to Israel (2 Kings xiii. 10-19, 22-25). Again, a large body of Israelitish troops had been hired by Amaziah, king of Judah, but were dismissed by him. Discontented and angry, they fell upon some of the cities of Judah. Amaziah, having returned victorious from Edom, declared war against Joash in revenge for this outrage; and, in spite of Joash's contemptuous message, advising him to be quiet, persisted in fighting a battle. The king of Israel was victorious: he took Amaziah prisoner, entered Jerusalem and broke down the wall, and seized a large spoil. Yet he did not dethrone Amaziah, or try to annex Judah to his own kingdom, but upon his success returned to Samaria, and died perhaps not long after (xiv. 8-16; 2 Chron. xxv. 5-24).

5. A descendant of Judah of the family of Shelah (1 Chron. iv. 22).—6. A Benjaminite chief who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 3).

JO'ASH (to whom Jehovah hastens, i.e. with help).—1. A descendant of Benjamin, and son of Becher (1 Chron. vii. 8).—2. The superintendent of David's oil-cellars (xxvii. 28).

JO'ATHAM (Matt. i. 9). The Greek form of Jotham.

JOAZAB'DUS (1 Esdr. ix. 48). Jozabad (Neh. viii. 7).

JOB (desire? perhaps an error for Jashub) (Gen. xli. 13). See JASHUB.

JOB (one persecuted). An eminent patriarch, who resided in the land of Uz. See Uz. He was a prosperous man: his family consisted of seven sons and three daughters; and he possessed abundant wealth. He was a man, too, who feared God; and his reputation was high through the east. Satan obtained permission to try him; and first his substance was destroyed, and his children perished: afterwards he himself was afflicted with a grievous malady (Job i. ii.). But he held fast his integrity, rebutting the unkind accusations of his friends, though unable to comprehend why he was thus dealt with. And at length the Lord appeared, restored him to more than his original wealth, surrounded him again with friends, and raised him up another family, seven more sons and three fair daughters, Jemima, Kezia, and Keren-happuch, ladies far renowned for their beauty (xlii.).

Some critics have chosen to doubt Job's existence. Those, however, who are more reasonable, if they do not admit all that is recorded of him in the book bearing his name, are ready to believe that there was such a man, and that the outline at least of the history is true. Ewald has tried to separate what he supposes the real basis from embellishment and colouring; and he specifies four particulars as facts, that there was a man so called; that he had friends with the names which we find attributed to them; that Job and they lived in the region mentioned; and that Job was afflicted with elephantiasis (Das Buch Job erklärt, 1854, pp. 19-23). But, if this were the whole ground-work of fact, we could by no means explain the mention of Job by Ezekiel and St. James (Ezek. xiv. 14, 16, 18, 20; James v. 11). It had been far better, had this meagre sketch been all the truth, to select other men as patterns, men whose history was unquestionable and more largely developed. But it is just for what are called the embellishments that the prophet and the apostle place Job before their readers. It is not a man whose memory could be but a fancy portrait, that would be put forward as one whom God delighted to honour, and whose faith and patience believers in Christ were to follow. The reference would be nugatory, had not Job really held on through a long course of unexampled afflictions, maintaining, though with human infirmity, his hope in God, and ultimately commanded to intercede for those friends with whose arguings the Lord was provoked. The words of St. James's notice are very striking. It is 'the patience of Job' of which he speaks, and 'the end of the Lord' which he commemorates, that crowning result in which God doubled to his servant his original plenty. We must acknowledge in all this more than the bare fact of Job's existence; see Horne's Introd., vol. ii. edit. Ayre, pp. 669-672).

Little can be said of the time when Job lived, save that it must have been at a very early period. Superficial and fanciful arguments, however, need not be urged in proof of this. His not referring in his conversations to various important events is no certain evidence that they had not then occurred. But his great age—for he survived his trial one hundred and forty years (Job xlii. 16)—longer than that of any of the patriarchs after the date of Abraham's immediate posterity, and the general air of antiquity pervading the manners described or referred to, are strong proofs that Job lived in remote times. He was the priest of his family (i. 5): his riches are reckoned by his cattle (3, xlii. 12: comp. Gen. xii. 16, xxvi. 14, xxx. 43). Writing also is spoken of as by sculpture (Job xix. 24). Other similar particulars might be noted; but the conclusion must still be very vague, and no exact date can be assigned.

JOB, THE BOOK OF. This book derives its name from the patriarch whose prosperity, afflictions, and recovery, it delineates. It is a noble poem, complete in all its parts; as will be seen from the following brief analysis. It may be distributed into six sections.

I. The introduction (i., ii.), in which we have an account of the way in which his troubles came upon him, his deportment under them, with the arrival of his three friends Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, to condole with him.

II. The first discussion or controversy with them, in which, after Job had complained, each speaks once, and is answered by Job (iii.-xiv.). First Job passionately bewails his condition (iii.). Eliphaz then reproves his friend's impatience, and expresses his belief that, as misery implies guilt, Job's distress must have been occasioned by sin (iv., v.). Job next justifies his complaint, charges his friends with unkindness, and expostulates with the Deity for laying so heavy a hand upon him (vi., vii.). Hereupon Bildad with some harshness declares that certainly, if Job were blameless, God would vindicate him by restoring him to prosperity (viii.). Job retorts by denying that his affliction is any proof of guilt, and passionately desires death (ix., x.). Zophar then coarsely exhorts him to repent (xi.); and Job in reply sarcastically reflects on the pretensions of his three friends to wisdom, and appeals to the Deity in whom he still places his hope (xii.-xiv.).

III. The second discussion is similar in form (xv.-xxi.). Eliphaz, in admirable imagery, reiterates his censure on Job for his self-justification (xv.). Job again complains of the unkind treatment he has met with, afresh protests his innocence, and describes the grave as his last resource (xvi., xvii.). Bildad rejoins by a striking picture of the retribution of the wicked, which he applies to Job (xviii.). Job in his reply describes again his sufferings, appeals to his friends for pity, and, having professed his steady faith in God, assures them that if they persist in their invectives God will chastise them (xix.). Zophar then warns him that the triumphing of the wicked is short, and his destruction sure to come (xx.); and Job answers by showing the fallacy of Zophar's reasoning, which is not borne out by experience (xxi.).

IV. The third discussion has no speech of Zophar (xxii.-xxxii.). Eliphaz vindicates God's dealings, and urges Job afresh to repentance (xxii.). Job replies that he wishes he could plead his cause before God, and maintains that in this life the wicked frequently escape punishment (xxiii., xxiv.). Upon this Bildad says shortly that no man can be just before God (xxv.); while Job, as none of his friends had more to say, again reproves them, shows how hard it is to discover true wisdom, elaborately vindicates his course of life, and describes once more his miseries, with an appeal to God for a hearing (xxvi.-xxxii.).

V. The speech of Elihu succeeds, who blames all the disputants, censures Job for persistently declaring his innocence, shows how for wise ends God afflicts, and that man's duty is submission to that Glorious One whose power is uncontrolled (xxxiii.-xxxvii.).

VI. The awful interference of Jehovah himself is now described. The Lord here illustrates his own omnipotence and righteousness, and exposes the ignorance of man, and his inability to comprehend the Creator's ways (xxxviii.-xli.). Hereupon Job humbly submits: the friends are censured; and Job's restored prosperity is depicted (xli.). The conclusion, like the introduction, is in prose.

In all these discussions the character of each interlocutor is excellently brought out—Eliphaz discerning, grave, and dignified, reluctantly led to condemn his friend; Bildad, with less delicacy, swayed by Eliphaz's example, and repeating himself; Zophar rude and pertinacious; Elihu zealous for God's honour, which he thinks Job has impugned, but which yet his opponents have not known how properly to maintain. The whole is consistent and complete. The action, so to speak, of the poem is continually rising, till the climax of the divine speech of Jehovah. But certain critics, taking no account of the eastern mode of composition, so different from ours, have thought fit to represent some parts as additions or interpolations. Thus they object to the introduction and conclusion, mainly because they are in prose; and to the speech of Elihu, because he is not mentioned at either the beginning or the end of the book, because his appearance is said to break the connection, and because some shades of peculiarity are found or fancied in his diction. Other more trivial reasons are alleged; and other portions of the book are also said to be interpolated. It is impossible to enter here into any full discussion of these matters: it must be sufficient to say that there is an evident fitness in the historical introduction and conclusion being in prose, and that the appearance of Elihu, so far from breaking the connection between the parts, rather strengthens it. He corrects some of Job's assertions, but is unable to give a full explanation of the divine purposes. It was necessary to show how the highest intellect and the warmest zeal fall short before the majesty of the counsels of God. It is this conclusion to which the whole mind of scripture is directed: 'Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?' (1 Cor. i. 20). Proceeding after the fashion of the critics who attempt to dismember the book of Job, we might pull in pieces every composition that exists: see the subject satisfactorily argued by Kell, Einleitung, § 125: comp. Horne, ubi supr., pp. 677, 678).

Various conjectures have been propounded as to the authorship of this work. It must be fully understood that, though Job himself lived in a very early age, it by no means necessarily follows that the book was written by a contemporary. So the book of Genesis from Moses's pen narrates events that happened long before. The guesses that have been gravely produced and defended by scholars of name are instructive, as exposing the uncritical helplessness of those wise men who in these our times have undertaken to correct Moses, and to teach the world how prophets and apostles ought to have written. It is with comparative sobriety that some propose Job, Elihu, Moses, Solomon, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Ezra, as author; and Dr. Hengstenberg may properly fix its limits between the ages of Samuel and Isalah, within which he thinks the work must be dated. But, when others have no difficulty in coming to an exact conclusion, and require us to believe that the author was an Idumean, a Hebrew who lived in Idumea, an Egyptian, a Nahorite, and one sage, minutely informed of every particular, places him in the south of Judea, near a caravan-road, and says he was a citizen of Tekoah, it is difficult to refrain from wishing criticism a little more under the control of common sense: see Horne, ubi supr., pp. 681, 682; Bleek, Einleitung, pp. 658-661. On this point we must be content to remain in ignorance. The knowledge of the author affects not the place of the book in the sacred canon. Some well-meaning writers are eager to maintain that it was from a Hebrew pen; otherwise they suppose the Jews would never have acknowledged its inspiration. It is enough to ask, Do such writers imagine that it was left to Jewish prejudice to stamp this or that book as inspired or not? The guiding Spirit, assuredly, even if he had ceased to raise up prophets properly so called, yet continued to the ancient church that marvellous discernment by which they were able to separate between the mere works of men and those which God intended for the perpetual instruction and edification of his people. The book of Job was demonstrably in the canon sanctioned by our Lord's usage; and we may be content.

The question whether this book is altogether real history, or rather the elaboration of a great truth from historical materials, requires some notice. Several of the most conscientious scholars have held the last-named view. They consider the dialogue between God and Satan (Job i. 6-12, ii. 1-6) as evidently figurative: they do not suppose that the artificial and highly-finished speeches of Job and his friends could have been uttered at once in the course of ordinary conversation: they think the audible interposition of the Deity not accordant with his usual modes of dealing with his creatures. It must be confessed that, provided its composition under divine guidance be allowed, the literal truth of the narrative is a subordinate question. Our Lord himself has used parables, and introduced unreal persons into his discourses. There is nothing, therefore, to shock the reverent mind in the notion of fictitious narrative being adopted as the vehicle of momentous instruction. But the circumstances dwelt on in the preceding article go to show that Job really lived and acted as is here told. Moreover, the extreme circumstantiality of the details, the description of the patriarch himself, his family, his property, his country, his friends, with their names and special designations, the genealogy of Elihu, the exact account of the feasting of Job's sons, the particular mention of the plunderers—these and other similar points mark a history rather than a parable (see Dr. Lee's Book of Job transl., 1837. Introd. pp. 8, 9). No such minute details are found in any scripture parable; it seems, therefore, a necessary inference that these details are not the play of fancy, but all historically true. Doubtless we are not to believe that God holds court (if the expression may be used) on certain days, when evil angels as well as fallen spirits have access to him. But, in speaking of the Deity, words in their proper sense applicable only to men must be employed. We may not hence entertain gross notions of him; but it is hard to see how in any other way we could be taught the perfect control in which he holds all the beings and things of the universe. There are some sensible remarks on this topic in Caryl on Job, 1669, Annot. on i. 6, vol. i. pp. 78, 79. And objections of the kind made to the book of Job would apply equally to other parts of scripture. Compare, for example, the address of Micah to Ahab (1 Kings xxii. 19-23), in which he tells how a lying spirit proposed to deceive the false prophets. Then we have the still small voice, after the wind and the earthquake and the fire, sounding in Elijah's ear (ix. 11-18). We are not to limit the Holy One to place or time, or to prescribe how he should make his communications to men. Dr. Kitto, again, has very well observed in reference to the elaborate character of the speeches: 'Nothing is more remarkable among the Semitic nations of western Asia, even at this day, than the readiness of their resources, the prevalence of the poetical imagination and form of expression, and the facility with which the nature of this group of languages allows all high and animated discourse to fall into rhythmical forms of expression; while the language even of common life and thought is replete with poetical sentiments and ideas' (Daily Bible Illustr., sec. ser., first week, third day).

This book gives an interesting view of religious belief in patriarchal times. It is true that some critics imagine they detect signs of a knowledge more advanced than we have reason to suppose revelation had taught in very early ages. If this notion be well-founded, it may be some reason for considering the book, and perhaps the time when Job lived, not so very remote as other evidence would seem to show. Still it can hardly be denied that, while great truths are distinctly held, the interlocutors of this poem were not advanced beyond the elementary understanding of God's plans and purposes, and that one great object of the work is to show how man in his ignorance must wait for the fuller manifestation which only the gospel has effected. The chief principles of religion which we find recognized are that there is a God, and that he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him (Heb. xi. 6). These truths are variously illustrated: the creation of the world by God's power (Job x. 8, xxxviii.-xli.), the administration of it by his providence (v. 8-27, ix. 4-13), the existence of angels that do his will, though some of those mighty spirits are fallen (i. 6-12, ii. 1-6, iv. 18, xv. 14-16, xxxviii. 7), the polluted state of man (xiv. 4, xxv. 4-6, the need of a propitiation by sacrifice (i. 5, xlii. 8, 9), the future day of retribution (xx. 4-29, xxvii. 8)—all these doctrines are set forth with more or less clearness. And, if the passage (ix. 25-27) may be interpreted, as many critics believe it may, of the expected Redeemer, we have in it not only a Messianic promise, but also an anticipation of the resurrection of the flesh. It is fair, however, to say that some would refer this expression of hope merely to deliverance from temporal distress. Throughout the book, further, there is a high-toned morality, obedience to God regarded as an imperative duty (xxii. 15), and brotherly-kindness inculcated by example (xxix., xxxi.): see the dissertation on the theology of Job's days in Carey's Book of Job, pp. 21-30. And yet there is great dimness in the views exhibited. The afflictions that befel Job are a problem which neither he nor his friends can solve. And, when the Deity appears, he does not reveal clearly, as he does in later times, how his chastening was in wise love, a training for eternal life: he rather, by the exhibition of his majesty, enforces submission and humble acknowledgment. There was light enough to guide men in practical godliness, and promise enough to call out faith. But the promise was not fully realized (Heb. xi. 39, 40); and it was not till the glorious gospel appeared that life and immortality were actually brought to light (2 Tim. i. 10). It is very questionable whether Job, as distinctly as Abraham, saw and rejoiced in the prospect of Messiah's day (John viii. 56).

The exact design and object of this book has not always been clearly apprehended. Dr. Hengstenberg considers that the question is 'how the afflictions of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked can be consistent with God's justice. But it should be observed,' he proceeds, 'that the direct problem exclusively refers to the first point, the second being only incidentally discussed on occasion of the leading theme.

If this is overlooked, the author would appear to have solved only one half of his problem: the case from which the whole discussion proceeds has reference merely to the leading problem' (Cyclop. of Bibl. Lit., art. 'Job, the Book of'). But he regards it as an error to refer the whole solution to the doctrine of retribution after death. God's moral government is always in exercise; not inactive at present, to wake up hereafter. It is to be shown not merely that the ultimate result of a good man's afflictions is happy, but that, while these afflictions are needful, there is present consolation under them as they work their due effect. In the earlier dispensation, such consolations depended more on external circumstances: in the New Testament they have more of a spiritual cast. Dr. Kitto, in a sensible paper (Daily Bible Illust., sec. ser., first week, first day), takes substantially the same view, and observes that 'the book is, in fact, engaged with the great problem regarding the distribution of good and evil in the world, especially as viewed in connection with the doctrine of a righteous retribution in the present life. It sets forth the struggle between faith in the perfect government of God, and the various doubts excited by what it sees and knows of the prosperity of the many among those who are despisers of God. The subject thus appears to be one that comes home to men's business and bosoms. Even under the light of Christianity, there are perhaps few who have not at particular seasons felt the strife between faith in the perfect government of the world and the various feelings excited in the mind by what they have experienced of human suffering.' The event showed that Job's friends had judged him too soon: had he been a righteous man, his troubles, they thought, would end. They did end; and very consolatory must have been the story to those who in times immediately subsequent to its composition pondered this book. It has not lost its effect for us. We, as the apostle James admonishes, must see 'the end of the Lord,' and hold on in faith and patience accordingly.

Little need be said as to the nature of the poetry of this book. Some will have it an epic, some a dramatic poem; while others class it with lyric compositions. It matters not what name be given it: it is poetry of the highest order. There is a wonderful glow of fancy, and power of description; so that even if it had no higher merit it must be regarded as one of the most admirable productions of the pen. The language, it may be added, has much in it of an archaic cast.

Perhaps it may be worth while to advert to an argument sometimes taken from the book of Job against the doctrine of inspiration. It is alleged that the false assumptions of the interlocutors never could have been dictated by an infallible Intelligence. Of course not. There are many speeches of evil men and of the evil spirit in scripture. God never dictated them. But he did see it good in his wisdom that they should be chronicled in the holy book for warning and instruction; and it was under the guidance of his Spirit that they were so preserved. Rightly viewed, such speeches afford not the shadow of an argument against inspiration. See the matter well discussed in Lee's Inspiration of H. Script., lect. i. note, pp. 28, 29, 2nd edit.

The commentaries on Job are numerous: it must be sufficient here to specify that by the late Prof. S. Lee, and the very sensible one of Carey, frequently referred to in this work.

JO'BAB (a desert).—1. One of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 29; 1 Chron. i. 23). The locality of his descendants has not been satisfactorily ascertained.—2. One of the kings who reigned in Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 33, 34; 1 Chron. i. 34, 35). Attempts have been made to identify him with the patriarch Job.—3. A king of Madon, who joined in the northern confederacy against Joshua (Josh. xi. 1).—4, 5. Two Benjamite chiefs (1 Chron. viii. 9, 18).

JO'CHEBED (whose glory is Jehovah). The wife of Amram and mother of Moses (Exod. vi. 20; Numb. xxvi. 59). The exact relationship of Jochebed to Amram has been questioned, i.e. whether she was a daughter or more distant descendant of Levi. Certainly the wording of the text favours the supposition of her being daughter of Levi, and therefore sister of Kohath, Amram's father. But, as she was born in Egypt, she was probably by a different wife. All the particulars we have of her life are comprised in Exod. ii. 1-10.

JO'DA (1 Esdr. v. 58). Judah, or Hodaviah (Ezra iii. 9; comp. ii. 40).

JO'ED (his witness is Jehovah). A descendant of Benjamin (Neh. xi. 7).

JO'EL (Jehovah is his God).—1. The eldest son of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 33, xv. 17). In vi. 28 he is in our translation called Vashni; but this, as Dathe long ago noted, arises from an error of transcription. The word Joel has slipped out of the text, and Vashni, which signifies 'the second,' has been mistaken for a proper name. The passage, therefore, ought to stand: 'The first-born Joel, and the second Abiah.' The Syriac version, and some other authorities, give it rightly.—2. A chief of the Simeonites (iv. 35).—3. A descendant of Reuben (v. 4, 8).—4. A Gadite chief (12).—5. A Kohathite (vi. 36): he is possibly the same with Shaul (24).—6. A descendant of Issachar (vii. 3).—7. One of David's heroes (xi. 38). He seems to be the person elsewhere called Igal (2 Sam. xxiii. 36).—8. A chief of the Gershonites (1 Chron. xv. 7, 11).—9. A Gershonite, descended from Laadan; one of the officers appointed to the charge of the treasure of the house of the Lord (xxiii. 8, xxvi. 22). Perhaps he was identical with No. 8.—10. A chief of Manasseh west of Jordan (xxvii. 20).—11. A Kohathite in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 12).—12. A person who after the captivity had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 43).—13. A Benjamite overseer of some who dwelt at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 9).

14. The son of Pethuel, one of the so-called minor prophets (Joel i. 1). Nothing certain is known of the history of this inspired man: it may, however, be fairly supposed that he lived in Judah. Several expressions in his book confirm this; referring to the temple-worship; and his utterances are mainly directed to Judah, where the temple was (i. 9, 13, 14, 16, ii. 1, 15, 17, iii. 1, 5, 6, 16, 17, 20, 21). It is not easy to decide upon the time when Joel prophesied; and we can only follow the indications we find scattered through his writings. Now Tyre is threatened; and acts of hostility had actually been committed by the Tyrians (iii. 4-6). But such hostility would most likely occur after the death of Athaliah, the daughter of a Tyrian princess. Perhaps, then, Joel should not be placed earlier than the reign of Joash. Again, Edom is threatened (iii. 19-21); reference being possibly made to the revolt of the Edomites from Jehoram (2 Kings viii. 20). And it may be that Amaziah's conquest was the fulfilment of Joel's prediction (2 Kings xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12). If this be so, Joel prophesied not later than the first half of Amaziah's reign. It is admitted that Jeremiah uses nearly the same expressions with Joel against Edom (Jer. xlix. 17); but a later judgment must be there intended; and Jeremiah frequently adopts the language of the earlier prophets. Once more, as, after the death of Jehoiada, the temple-service was neglected (2 Chron. xxiv. 17, 18), while this prophet speaks of the regular observance of divine worship, it is not unlikely that he should be placed in the earlier and better part of the reign of Joash. Many critics, it must not be denied, think it more probable that he lived in the reign of Uzziah, and was contemporary with Amos.

JOEL, THE BOOK OF. 877-847 B.C. This book, in our ordinary bibles, stands in the second place of the minor prophets. It has been divided into two parts: I. (i.-ii 17) containing the description of a sore and fearful judgment desolating the land, with a call to humiliation and repentance on account of it. II. (ii. 18-iii. 21), exhibiting the gracious answer of the Lord, in which he not only promises deliverance from the present calamity, but announces the happy future, when in Messiah's days there should be an out-pouring of the Holy Spirit, when Judah and Jerusalem should have the supremacy over their foes, and the victorious church dwell in peace and prosperity for ever. The apostles notice the fulfilment of some of Joel's predictions: comp. Joel ii. 28-32 with Acts ii. 16-21; Rom. x. 13.

It has been questioned whether the description of the calamity (Joel i., ii.) is historical or prophetic, i. e. whether the land was really at the time suffering, or whether it was a future judgment that was denounced. Perhaps we may more reasonably believe that the land was then visited, and that Joel was commissioned on the occasion of this visitation to utter his message of warning and promise. But, if this be so, then another question on which critics are not agreed will be readily solved. If the judgment was then upon the people, it must have been of literal locusts, and not the storm of war described in figurative language. There is still, however, some difficulty; for (ii. 20) the plague is said to be from the north; and locusts, it seems, do not ordinarily come into Judea from the north. But why, locusts being literally meant, should not the description have also a symbolical and deeper meaning, to foreshadow those destroying hosts whom the sins of Judah would eventually provoke, and who would pour upon them from the north, the way by which the Chaldeans came, as well as any other quarter, and at least as effectually reduce the land that had been a garden into a desolate wilderness? Browne (Ordo Sæclorum, append. p. 692) sees in the four-fold 'palmer-worm' and 'locust' and 'canker-worm' and 'caterpillar' 'a quaternon of heathen foes sent to ravage the Lord's inheritance.'

The style of Joel is highly poetical: it is elegant and perspicuous, and at the same time nervous, animated, and sublime.

Commentaries on Joel are included in those embracing generally the minor prophets.

JOE'LAH (whom Jehovah helps). A Benjamite chief who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 7).

JO'EZER (whose help is Jehovah). A Benjamite apparently, but distinguished as a Korhite, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 6). Possibly he was a Korhite, dwelling in one of the Levitical cities of Benjamin?

JOG'BEHAH (elevated). A city belonging to the tribe of Gad, to the east of the Jordan (Numb. xxxii. 35). Gideon surprised Zeba and Zalmunna at Karkor near this place (Judges viii. 10, 11).

JOG'LI (exiled). The father of Bukki, a chief of Dan (Numb. xxxiv. 22).

JO'HA (whom Jehovah revives).—1. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 16).—2. One of David's warriors, called the Tizite (xi. 45).

JOHA'NAN (whom Jehovah bestows).—1. One of the captains who, after the taking of Jerusalem, joined Gedaliah, the governor Nebuchadnezzar had appointed. He warned that officer of the treacherous designs of Ishmael; but his warning was slighted, and Gedaliah murdered. He pursued the assassins, rescued those they had taken prisoners; but, fearing the anger of the Babylonish king, he with the rest went into Egypt, in spite of the divine prohibition conveyed to them by Jeremiah. We have no further account of him (2 Kings xxv. 23-26; Jer. xl. 7-16, xli., xlii., xliii.).—2. One of the sons of Josiah (1 Chron. iii. 15).—3. A descendant of the house of David (24).—4. One in the line of high priests (vi. 9, 10).—5. 6. Two warriors, one a Benjamite, the other a Gadite, who joined David when in hold (xii. 4, 12).—7. The father of a chief of Ephraim, in the reign of Pekah (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).—8. One of those who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 12).—9. The son of Eliashib (most probably the high priest) to whose chamber Ezra went to mourn for the transgression of the people (x. 6).—10. The son of Tobiah the Ammonite, who had married the daughter of Meshullam, the son of Berechiah (Neh. vi. 18).—11. The father of Jaddua, in the line of priests, called also Jonathan (xii. U. 23).—12. One termed the son of Eliashib (23); identical with either No. 9, or No. 10.

JOHANNES (1 Esdr. ix. 29). Jehohanan (Ezra x. 28).

JOHN (identical with Johanan).—1. The eminent forerunner of Messiah, usually denominated 'the Baptist,' more properly the Baptizer (Matt. iii. 1).

He was of a priestly family, the son of Zacharias, of the course of Abia or Abijah, his mother Elisabeth being also of the daughters of Aaron. This couple were of blameless deportment, and were well stricken in years before they had any child, though it was their prayer that they might be so blessed. At length, on occasion of Zacharias, according to the function of his priesthood, burning incense in the temple, he was startled by the appearance of the angel Gabriel, who announced to him that his supplication was heard, that he should have a son, who was to be a Nazarite from his birth, and who should, in the spirit and power of Elijah the prophet, prepare the way for the manifestation of the Lord. Zacharias was incredulous, and as a warning and a sign was thereupon rendered dumb. When his appointed time of ministrations was ended, he returned to his own residence in the hill-country of Judah—Hebron or Juttah it has been variously supposed to be—where his wife, having conceived, was visited six months afterwards by her cousin Mary, the Virgin. On the salutation of the two holy women, words of joy were uttered which have ever since been treasured among the glorious songs of the church. In due time Elisabeth's child was born; and, when he was to be named at the circumcision, and relatives would have called him after his father, his mother insisted that his name should be John, for so had the angel commanded. The father, appealed to, confirmed it in writing; and then, the accomplishment of the prediction being come, he was relieved from his dumbness, and he, too, uttered a noble song of praise. Such were the remarkable circumstances attending the birth of John Baptist: of his youth and early manhood we know no more than that he 'grew and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel' (Luke i. 5-80). Of course rationalistic interpreters object to this history. Their objections need not be canvassed here; they are sufficiently disposed of by Dr. Mill (Myth. Interp. of the Gospels, part ii. chap. i. pp. 91, &c.).

What the life of John was as spent in the deserts we have no means of knowing. It has been said that he was a hermit, practising the most rigorous asceticism. No doubt this is an exaggeration; for we find him when he commenced his ministry well acquainted with the general current of affairs, with the habits, the duties, the pursuits of various classes of men, nay, with what might be called the politics of the time. Such knowledge could not have been acquired by a perfect recluse. John was self-denying and temperate, observant of religious fasts, clothed in the garments probably of the ancient prophets, and satisfied with plain fare. More the scripture does not tell us.

At length the day of his public service came, for which his previous life had qualified him, and on which no doubt he had often meditated. It would seem that he was summoned by some special monition (John i. 33). He performed no miracles (x. 41); but his preaching was with a power and practical energy that stirred up the whole country to resort to him. He fearlessly rebuked vice: he proclaimed the necessity of repentance, and practised baptism as a symbol thereof: see BAPTISM: he proclaimed, too, the approach of a greater One, of whom he was but the humble servant, and who would baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Matt. iii. 1-12; Mark i. 4-8; Luke iii. 1-18). The fame of this stern preacher reached even the higher authorities of the nation; and they sent to question him. Was he the Messiah? was he Elijah? or who was he? In reply he told them that his office was preparatory: he was 'the voice,' as the prophet had expressed it, 'of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord,' and he pointed them to him (John i. 19-28). Had the enquirers been honest and conscientious, they would not only have yielded 'fruits meet for repentance,' but would have accepted his testimony of Messiah.

John, however, besides the general impression made upon the people, had attached to himself certain special disciples, who were trained in self-denial and fasting (Matt. ix. 14); but even this was made a ground of reproach by that evil generation (xi. 18). He did not continue always in one place. He seems to have journeyed up the Jordan, baptizing in places convenient for those who resorted to him. Two such places are mentioned, Bethabara, or more properly Bethany, and Enon near to Salim (John i. 28, iii. 23). To his astonishment Jesus presented himself for baptism. John could not understand why he, the sinless one, should desire the rite which in order to repentance was intended for sinners; but he was silenced by the reply, 'Suffer it to be so now; for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness.' And then a marvel was witnessed—the sensible descent of the Holy Spirit on him whom God the Father's voice audibly proclaimed to be his incarnate Son (Matt. iii. 13-17; Mark i. 9-11; Luke iii. 21, 22).

A difficulty has been felt, because John expressly declared that he did not know the great Personage whose coming he announced till he saw this sign (John i. 31-34). The cousins had rarely if ever met; their respective dwellings being at opposite extremities of Palestine. Perhaps when Jesus first presented himself John had some inward monition that he was the expected Great One; but till the supernatural event occurred he knew him not so as to feel authorized to bear a public testimony to him. Such is in substance the explanation given by Dr. Mill (ubi supr. pp. 139-146: comp. Ellicott, Hist. Lect., pp. 107-109.) But surely there is a higher sense. Even if John never met his kinsman, he must have known the circumstances of his own birth, and have been informed that the child born six months after was designated as the individual to whom he was to bear testimony. When previously to Jesus' approach he spoke of the Person so much greater than himself, he could not in reason be supposed ignorant of all that pointed out Jesus as the Holy One. But he was ignorant of Messiah's divine nature: he believed him but a man; and it was not till the marvellous sign appeared that he learned he was the Son of God. 'I saw,' he himself says, 'and bare record that this is the Son of God.' He then comprehended in the way Peter did when he made his famous confession (Matt. xvi. 16) that great mystery; and he began immediately to announce him as 'the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world,' and to direct his own disciples to him (John i. 29, 35-37). This was what he did not know before. And in accordance with the revelation made to him we find his remarkable testimony to the Christ as coming from heaven, and as being the object of faith to men, through whom they should obtain 'eternal life' (iv. 25-36). For those critics are not to be listened to who would attribute these closing words to the evangelist, not to the Baptist. And, as he saw so much, we can understand why our Lord pronounced John more favoured than all that had preceded him, though, as announcing the gospel kingdom and not actually within it witnessing its establishment, the least of those so blessed was more privileged than he (Matt. xi. 11). He was Elijah, not in that gross literal sense in which the Jews imagined Elijah would appear, but with the same spirit, and boldness, and faithful service for which the Tishbite was distinguished (14).

Little more remains to be said. For his righteous rebuke of Herod Antipas, who had married his brother Philip's wife, he was cast into prison, in the fortress of Machærus, to the east of the Dead sea. The fame of Jesus reached him in his confinement; and he sent some of his disciples to question him. This was not, as it has been thought, because his own mind wavered, but in order to direct those disciples as others before to Jesus. Our Lord wrought miracles before their eyes as the best mode of convincing them, and then took occasion to pronounce the high eulogium upon John before referred to. He was no reed shaken with the wind: he was no sycophant to flatter for luxury wicked princes: he was indeed the predicted messenger of the new covenant (2-10). Ere long we have the record of his death, the victim of a foul woman's vengeance. His disciples buried him, and—best of consolations—went and told Jesus (xiv. 3-12). The memory of his crime long haunted the tetrarch's guilty conscience; and hearing of Jesus he imagined in his terror that it was John risen from the dead (1, 2).

It is not needful to describe the Baptist's character: his words and deeds sufficiently declare what manner of man he was.

2. One of the sons of Zebedee and Salome

(iv. 21, xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40). Perhaps this family were residents of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter. Certainly they must have lived in the neighbourhood; for they pursued the occupation of fishermen, in partnership with the brothers just named, on the lake of Gennesaret. John had a brother James, whether older or younger the scripture does not state; it is usually imagined, however, that John was the younger. Zebedee must have been a man of some property; for we find that he had hired servants to carry on his business (i. 20), that Salome ministered to the Lord of her substance (xv. 40, 41), and that John (for it can hardly be doubted that he spoke of himself in John xviii. 15, 16) had some personal acquaintance with the high priest Caiaphas.

John was probably one of those disciples of the Baptist who, hearing his remarkable testimony to Jesus, followed the new teacher to his residence and abode with him the rest of the day (i. 35-39). Then was made on the mind of the susceptible son of Zebedee an impression never to be effaced. He doubtless accompanied Jesus to Galilee, and was one of the party present at the marriage at Cana (ii. 2). And, when Jesus again visited Judea, the little band who had attached themselves to him attended his steps, and passed with him on his return in the way from Jerusalem through Samaria (iv. 3, 4). It is difficult to trace chronologically the course of events; but most probably, when, after his Judean ministry, our Lord was again in Galilee, rejected at Nazareth and removing to Capernaum, John and his brother, like Peter and Andrew, resumed their ordinary occupation. And it was when so engaged that they received the special call (Matt. iv. 18-22; Mark i. 16-20; Luke v. 1-11) to be continually with Jesus, which was supplemented by their appointment as apostles (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 16, 17; Luke vi. 13, 14). Afterwards we find John one of the especially-favoured three who witnessed the Lord's shining glory and his agonizing grief, and before whom, apart from the rest, his most wonderful works were performed (Matt. xvii. 1-9, xxvi. 36-45; Mark v. 35-43, ix. 2-10, xiv. 32-42; Luke viii. 49-56, ix. 28-36). John it was who was sent with Peter to prepare the last supper (xxii. 8), and John, the disciple whom Jesus loved, reclined next him at the meal, and at Peter's hasty nod put the question, most likely in a whisper, 'Lord, who is it that shall betray thee?' (John xiii. 23-26).

We get from several incidental notices a clear perception of John's character. Tenderly attached to the person of his Master, he was of aspiring and impetuous temper. More refined perhaps in his conceptions than some of the other disciples, he yet did not fully apprehend the extent and grandeur of Messiah's kingdom. Anxious for the Lord's honour, he would have had it vindicated by supernatural judgments, and limited with formal restrictions. Christ had marked this temper when, at the call to the apostleship, he had designated James and John 'the sons of thunder,' and had sometimes to moderate their ambition by a rebuke, while their brethren occasionally resented their forwardness (Matt. xx. 20-24; Mark x. 35-41; Luke ix. 49, 54-56). Of Zebedee their father we hear nothing after they become apostles; but of their mother Salome that she encouraged their aspirations. A lesson is read us how the finest qualities in fallen man prompt many a worldly and sinful thought; and how on the other hand, directed and controlled by divine grace, they shine with increased lustre. John was an apt scholar: he drank in of his Master's spirit; and we see in his writings how his more ardent imaginations were softened and interpenetrated by divine love. He had a capacity for the lofty and the sublime; and he found food for his high-reaching desires in contemplating the majesty, the holiness, the unutterable mercy of the exalted Saviour.

A few more particulars are recorded of this apostle in scripture. He stood by the Lord's cross; and to him was committed the care of the Virgin: he was to be a son to her, and to comfort her in that bitter grief, in which, as she had long before been told, the sword would pierce her soul (Luke ii. 35). In all probability he removed her at once to his residence; but he must himself have returned to the awful scene, as he witnessed the piercing of the Redeemer's side after he had expired (John xix. 25-27, 32-35). On the news of the resurrection he ran with Peter to the tomb, outstripped him, looked in, but with reverent amazement did not enter till Peter had gone in. Then went John in too and believed (xx. 2-8). He was present on the memorable morning when Jesus appeared by the side of the lake Genesaret. His quick eye first recognized the Lord; though Peter, with characteristic vehemence, plunged into the water to reach him first. And then it was that the mysterious words were uttered which led so many of the disciples to believe that John should never die (xxi.). After the ascension he was frequently Peter's companion (Acts iii., iv. 1-23), with whom he was sent by the apostles to Samaria (viii. 14-17).

John probably did not quit Palestine so long as the Virgin mother lived. He did not, it seems, always reside in the capital: it is rather likely that he took her to his Galilean home. For he was not at Jerusalem when Saul was brought to the apostles (ix. 26-28; Gal. i. 18, 19); and when he was there subsequently it would seem to have been on occasion of the meeting of the council (Acts xv. 6; Gal. ii. 9).

That John subsequently went into Asia and dwelt at Ephesus (most likely not till after the death of Paul) we can hardly doubt; but many legendary stories are told of him which rest on very uncertain grounds. Admitting the genuineness of the epistles which bear his name, and that he was author of the Apocalypse, we are assured that he exercised pastoral superintendence over the Asiatic churches, that he was banished to Patmos, and that he had to contend against arrogant and erroneous teachers in the church. We may safely conclude, too, that he died, in extreme old age, a natural death, and that Ignatius and Polycarp were among his personal disciples. But the story of his being thrown into a cauldron of boiling oil at Rome at the Latin gate, from which he came forth unharmed, and others of a similar kind (see Gieseler, Kirchengesch., cap. iii. § 34, vol. i. p. 139) are worthy of little credit. Some of them, however, one could wish to believe; as that the apostle sought a robber chief, formerly his scholar, and melted him into repentance; and that, when through infirmity he could say nothing more, he used to reiterate in Christian assemblies the touching words, 'Little children, love one another.' There is a strange tradition also that he wore on his forehead a golden plate with the sacred name upon it. We may perhaps infer from scripture that John was not married; but no doubt the accounts of his ascetic mode of life are exaggerated.

3. One of the high priest's kindred (Acts iv. 6). Some have deemed him identical with a noted Jewish doctor, Johanan Ben Zaccal.—4. A name of the evangelist Mark (xii. 25, xiii. 5, 13, xv. 37). See MARK.

JOHN, THE GOSPEL OF. This, which occupies the fourth place among the Gospels in our bibles, was, we cannot doubt, chronologically the last of them.

Some attempts have been made by modern critics to prove that this work was not from the pen of the apostle John. They have chosen to suppose that there was an irreconcilable difference between the Gentile and the Jewish types of Christianity, represented by Paul and Peter respectively; and certain books of the New Testament they think were written to bridge over this difference. The fourth Gospel they consider one of them; and they have invented in their wisdom the hypothesis that, about the middle of the second century, a Gentile Christian composed it under the name of the apostle, to recommend love as higher than faith, and to show how the Jewish system was fulfilled in Christ, the true paschal lamb. The church, according to their notion, was easily deceived, and hailed the production as the genuine work of St. John. But surely most men will think that it is the critics who are credulous, and easily deceived. For, to glance at the external evidence, not only have we the testimony of Jerome and Eusebius in the fourth century after Christ, but in the beginning of the third and end of the second we find the leading writers in various parts of the Christian world recording their belief of the authenticity of St. John's Gospel. Of these Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Irenæus may be specified. The last-named writer, in whose life-time the forgery if real must have been committed, was acquainted with the state of the church in the east and the west: he had known Polycarp, St. John's disciple, and may therefore be taken as a most competent witness. Now he declares that in his time the fourth Gospel was universally received, and has an argument about the four Gospels—just so many and no more—being the necessary pillars of the truth. How is this compatible with the theory that the work had just been fraudulently concocted? There are yet earlier testimonies. Justin Martyr, born in St. John's life-time (about 89 A.D.) quotes this Gospel. Further, it is found in the Peshito Syriac version, and in the Muratorian canon; and additional proof may be obtained even from the early heretics. More it is impossible to say on this part of the question here; but it may fairly be asked 'if it was possible for a history of Christ, falsely pretending to be from the pen of the apostle John, to be brought forward twenty, thirty, or forty years after his death, be introduced into all the churches east and west, taking its place everywhere in the public services of Sunday? Was there no one to ask where this new Gospel came from, and where it had lain concealed? Was there no one of the many who had personally known John to expose the gigantic imposture, or even to raise a note of surprise at the unexpected appearance of so important a document of which they had never heard before? How was the populous church at Ephesus brought to accept this work on the very spot where John had lived and died?' (Prof. Fisher, in Biblioth. Sacr., April 1864, p. 250).

We may reasonably conclude from a consideration of the external evidence that fraud was a moral impossibility. This conclusion is strengthened by a view of the internal evidence. For there are repeatedly assertions made that John was the author (John xix. 35, xxi. 24); and, even if we admit, as has been imagined, that the last chapter is a later appendix, the testimony is not thereby weakened. There is also the graphic minuteness of detail, with the many touches clearly indicative of an eye-witness, of which xiii. 22 may be taken as an example. The structure of this Gospel, too, is far different from what we should suppose a forger would have devised. The variations from the other Gospels bespeak an independent witness: a forger would have servilely followed them; and the wonderful discourses recorded of our Lord, the loftiness of his character portrayed, the emphatic maintaining of his Deity, are all such as the beloved disciple, looking back under the light of Christ's glorification to the days and months of his familiar earthly converse with him, may well be supposed to have most diligently pondered, and to have been most anxious to record for the church's guidance and consolation; while a forger would have been utterly incompetent for such a delineation; and his attempt would have proved a glaring failure. Indeed, looking only at this book as a composition, and discovering the master's hand that penned it, we may well ask, if St. John was not the author, who was that greater than St. John who has produced such a marvelous work, and yet has left no name or trace of his existence? Besides, from its tone and character it is incredible that it should have been composed in the second century.

Let any one who doubts this read along with it the apostolic and immediately succeeding fathers, and see the mighty difference between them and this writer. It is indeed alleged that the very sublimity of this Gospel places it at a distance from the three preceding ones, so that, if they be accepted, it could not proceed from one of the same company of Christ's immediate followers. To argue this question at length would be impracticable here: it must suffice to say that it has been most satisfactorily handled, and the objection proved to be without weight. For full information the reader may be referred to Dr. Alford's Prolegomena to St. John's Gospel, sect. ii. vi., and the books there named; to Westcott's Introd. to Gospels, chap. v. pp. 262-286; and, further, to the very able article already cited on the Genuineness of the Fourth Gospel, in Biblioth. Sacr. pp. 225-284.

The date of this Gospel has been variously assigned; and it is questioned whether it was written at Ephesus or at Patmos. The former supposition is the more probable. Dr. Alford places its composition loosely between the years 70 and 85 A.D.: others bring it down as late as 96 or 97.

The Gospel of St. John may be considered in some measure supplementary to the other three. Some critics, indeed, are disposed to deny that this evangelist was acquainted with the works of the rest. But there is a great antecedent improbability in this. Surely we must suppose them welcomed by the church. They would soon circulate through Palestine and Asia Minor. It would be strange indeed if, after the lapse of several years, they never reached the hands of St. John, resident in one of these countries. And, though some of the events narrated by the other evangelists are given also by John, yet there are omissions in his work—a notice of the transfiguration for instance—for which it is hard to account if he was not aware that this had been already chronicled (comp. Roberts, Discussions on the Gospels, part ii. chap. iii. pp. 375-380.) But his Gospel is not a mere supplement. It was called forth on sufficient occasion. It had a great object, the revealing to the church of the Lord Jesus Christ, in his most deep and solemn teaching, and in the mystery of his person. Errors, too, were creeping in, and found encouragement among the motley population of Ephesus, where doctrinal truth had to contend with Jewish prejudice and heathen philosophy and luxurious idolatry. Cerinthus was one of the heretics who was corrupting the faith. He was a Jew, imbued with Alexandrian philosophy, and he devised a monstrous combination of Christianity with Jewish and Gnostic ideas. He taught that the Most High God dwelt in a remote heaven with certain spirits or æons, and that he was unknown before our Lord's appearance; that he generated an Only-begotten, who begat an inferior, the Word; that there were two high æons, Life and Light, to whom Christ was inferior; that from the invisible æons lower orders of spirits proceeded; that one of these, Demiurgus, ignorant of the true God, created the visible world out of eternal matter, and was the God of the Israelites; his laws being intended to be of perpetual obligation; that Jesus was but a man on whom the æon Christ descended at his baptism, endowing him with supernatural powers; that the æon Light had similarly entered John the Baptist; that it was Jesus who at the instigation of the Jewish Deity, whom he opposed, alone died; the æon Christ ascending up on high; but that he will return, be re-united to Jesus, and reign in Palestine a thousand years, bestowing on his disciples exquisite sensual delights. Some have imagined that Cerinthus borrowed his terms from this Gospel. Whether this were so, or whether John intended to refute the heretic, he manifestly has refuted the errors of Cerinthus and of Gnosticism in its widest sense, 'in its Ebionitish form, as denying the divinity and pre-existence of Christ, and in its Docetic, as denying the reality of his assumption of the human nature' (Alford, Proleg., sect. iii.).

This Gospel was written in Greek of considerable purity; its style is characterized by unadorned simplicity and tenderness: the peculiarities of its composition are well pointed out by Westcott (ubi supra, pp. 241-252). It exhibits a regular plan, so that Westcott says that 'the treatment of the subject satisfies the conditions of variety, progress, and completeness, which, when combined with the essential nature of the subject itself, make up the notion of a true epic' (p. 253).

Various distributions of the matter have been proposed. Mr. Westcott gives an elaborate plan (pp. 258-260). Bengel has a very good one. Dr. Alford adopts that of Luthardt; while a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. 1. p. 1113, prefers that of Lampe; of which the following is a very condensed sketch:

- A. The prologue (i. 1-18).
- B. The history (i. 19-xx. 29), including
  - (a). Various events in connection with various journeys.
    1. (i. 19-ii. 12).
    2. (ii. 13-iv.).
    3. (v.).
    4. (vi.).
    5. (vii.-x. 21).
    6. (x. 22-42).
    7. (xi. 1-54).
    8. (xi. 55-xii.).
  - (b). History of Christ's death (xiii.-xx. 29), comprising
    1. Preparation for the passion (xiii.-xvii.).
    2. The circumstances of the passion and death (xviii., xix.).
    3. The resurrection, and the proofs of it (xx. 1-29).
- C. The conclusion (xx. 30-xxi.).
  1. Scope of foregoing history (xx. 30, 31).
  2. Confirmation by additional facts, and the testimony of the elders of the church (xxi. 1-24).
  3. Reason of the termination of the history (xxi. 25).

It must be added that the closing chapter was probably added as a kind of appendix at a later date, and we may well believe by the apostle himself. Also there is a section (vii. 53-viii. 11) which has occasioned much discussion. It is not easy to decide on it. It is found, but not in exactly the same words, in some good manuscripts and important early versions. Bishop Ellicott expresses his belief that it is not from St. John's pen: he would rather ascribe it to St. Luke, and observes that it cannot be too strongly impressed on the general reader that no reasonable critic throws doubt on the incident, but only on its present place in the sacred narrative' (Hist. Lect., pp. 253, 310).

Among the commentaries on St. John may be named the Commentarius exegetico-analyticus in Joan., 1735, of Lampe, and that in the Kritisch-exeget. Commentar über das N.T., 1844-1852, 2nd edit., of Mayer.

JOHN, THE EPISTLES OF. There are three epistles ascribed to St. John.

There can be no reasonable doubt that the first epistle proceeded from the beloved disciple. There is abundant external evidence. Thus, a passage in it (1 John iv. 3) is cited by Polycarp, St. John's disciple; and, indeed, the universal voice of antiquity agrees in maintaining its canonicity. The internal evidence is equally conclusive; so that in confidently ascribing this work to the author of the fourth Gospel, Dr. Alford says, 'To maintain a diversity of authorship would betray the very perverseness and exaggeration of that school of criticism which refuses to believe, be the evidence never so strong' (Proleg., sect. i.).

Some have imagined this not properly an epistle, but rather a treatise supplementary to the Gospel; the answer to which is that the Gospel is obviously complete, and needed no such appendix. There has also been a notion that it was directed to the Parthians. This, however, is groundless: it is a letter addressed generally to a cycle of churches mainly consisting of Gentile converts, among whom the apostle had laboured, and with whose spiritual condition he was intimately acquainted. It was designed to certify them of the reality of the things they believed, to guard them against erroneous and licentious tenets, and to animate them to communion with God and to a holy life. It is characterized by artless and loving simplicity, blended with singular modesty and candour, together with a wonderful sublimity of thought. It is the production of an aged man, and, as pre-supposing an acquaintance with Christian doctrine, was probably written after the Gospel. Nothing more precise can be said as to the date.

Various arrangements of the subject-matter have been proposed. Thus the epistle has been distributed into six sections. I. An assertion of the true divinity and humanity of Christ, 'urging the union of faith and holiness of life as necessary to the enjoyment of communion with God (i. 1-7). II. The announcement that all have sinned, with an explanation of Christ's propitiation for sin. Hence the marks of true faith are exhibited, obedience to God's commandments, and love to the brethren; the love of the world being inconsistent with the love of God (8—ii. 17). III. Assertion, in opposition to false teachers, that Jesus is the same with Christ (18-29). IV. The privileges of true believers, their consequent happiness and duties, and the marks by which they are known to be the sons of God (iii.). V. Criteria by which to distinguish antichrist and false Christians (iv.). VI. Exhibition of the connection between faith in Christ, regeneration, love to God and his children, obedience to his commandments, and victory over the world; with a declaration that Jesus Christ is truly the Son of God, able to save, and to hear and answer prayer (v. 1-16). The concluding summary shows how inconsistent a sinful life is with true Christianity, asserting the divinity of Christ, and cautioning against idolatry (17-21).

Another division has been made by Dusterdieck, which is substantially adopted by Dr. Alford. Besides the introduction (i. 1-4) he distinguishes into two great parts, each pervaded by a master-thought, and both tending to illustrate the leading subject of the whole, viz. fellowship with God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, I. (i. 5-ii. 28); the theme being 'God is light'; II. (29-v. 5); the theme being 'God is righteous.' The conclusion begins with v. 6. It is in two portions (6-12, 13-21), both serving to bring the whole to its full completion, and (so to speak) to set it at rest. 'Jesus is the Son of God.'

It is necessary to add a brief notice of the disputed clause, 'in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one. And there are three that bear witness in earth' (v. 7, 8). The proofs relied on in favour of it are that it has (1) external evidence; for it is found in the old Latin version, and in most MSS. of the Vulgate, in the confession of faith and liturgy of the Greek church, in the primitive liturgy of the Latin church, and in citations by Latin fathers; also (2) internal evidence, for the connection requires it, also the grammatical structure of the Greek, especially the right doctrine of the Greek article; it is said, further, that the mode of thinking it exhibits is peculiar to St. John, and that its omission, if genuine, could be more easily accounted for than its insertion, if spurious. On the other hand (1) it is not found in a single genuine Greek manuscript earlier than the fifteenth century, nor is it admitted into the best critical editions of the New Testament: it occurs in no other ancient version than the Latin, and not in the best MSS. of that: it is cited by no Greek father, even when it would have seemed most natural to cite it; and, as to the Latin fathers, the earliest real citation (though this is not without suspicion) is that by Vigilantius in the fifth century; and, where it appears in the liturgies, it is a late interpolation. (2) Again, it is argued that the words are alien from the context, and in themselves incoherent, betraying therefore another hand. Internal evidence, even if it were thought favourable to the clause, must here give way. Internal evidence may show that a passage is spurious, when external evidence is in its favour, but no amount of internal evidence can prove a passage genuine when external evidence is plain against it. That is the case here; and, accordingly, scholars have with almost one consent pronounced against the clause in question. But it is well to mark that its rejection neither does nor can diminish the force of evidence which other undisputed passages of holy writ afford for the doctrine of the Trinity.

The second and third epistles of St. John may be considered together. They are clearly from the same pen. Eusebius classed them among the disputed books; he, however, himself received them. They were probably not included in the Peshito Syriac version. Yet many of the very early Christian writers cite or allude to them: we may therefore say that there is evidence sufficient to prove their authority, and that the reason of their being at first questioned was the fact that they were addressed to private individuals—less likely, therefore, to attract notice than if they had been sent to a community or church. There is no force in the argument, that the writer, by calling himself 'the elder,' meant to show that he was not the apostle John (comp. Philem. 9; 1 Pet. v. 1).

As to the date or place of writing, it is useless to say more than that probably they were composed when St. John was residing at Ephesus, towards the close of his life.

The second epistle is addressed to a lady, 'the elect lady' in our translation. Possibly one or other of the words used may be a proper name, and the lady in question be either 'the elect Kyria' or 'the lady Electa.' She is commended for her piety, and warned against the delusions of false teachers; the commandment of Christian love being also pressed upon her.

The third epistle is directed to Gaius, or Caius. The name was a very common one; and it is impossible to say whether the person here intended was one of those mentioned elsewhere (Acts xix. 29, xx. 4; Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14). The scope of the letter is to commend his stedfastness in the faith, and his hospitality, to caution him against Diotrephes, and to recommend Demetrius to him, reserving other matters to a personal interview.

For an account of St. John's other work which has a place in the sacred canon, see REVELATION, THE BOOK OF.

JOHN.—1. The father of Mattathias, founder of the Maccabean family (1 Macc. ii. 1).—2. (viii. 17; 2 Macc. iv. 11).—3. One of the sons of Mattathias (1 Macc. ix. 35, 36, 38); he is elsewhere called Joannan (ii. 2), and Joseph (2 Macc. viii. 22).—4. The son of Simon, brother of Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc. xiii. 53, xvi. 1, 2, 9, 19, 21, 23). He was a celebrated man, known as John Hyrcanus.—5. (2 Macc. xi. 17).

JOI'ADA (whom Jehovah favours). One in the line of high priests (Neh. xii. 10, 11, 22). One of his sons was son-in-law to Sanballat (xiii. 28).

JOI'AKIM (whom Jehovah has set up). A high priest, son and successor of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 10, 12, 26).

JOI'ARIB (whom Jehovah defends).—1. One whom Ezra sent to persuade some of the priests to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 16).—2. A descendant of Judah (Neh. xi. 5).—3. A priest (10). But perhaps the name is only mentioned here to indicate the head of a course, as in xii. 6, 19. See 2 Chron. xxiv. 7, where it is given in full, JEHOIARIB, which see.

JOK'DEAM (possessed by the people). A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 56).

JO'KIM (whom Jehovah has set up). A son or descendant of Shelah, son of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 22).

JOK'MEAM (gathered by the people). A city of the tribe of Ephraim given to the Levites (1 Chron. vi. 68). But in Josh. xxi. 22 we find Kibzaim for Jokmeam. It was on the border of one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 12), where in our translation erroneously Jokneam: some other English versions, e.g. the Geneva edit. 1597, read rightly Jokmeam.

JOK'NEAM (possessed by the people). A city on the border of the territory of Zebulun, whose king was one of those that Joshua destroyed (Josh. xii. 22, xix. 11). It was allotted to the Merarite Levites (xxi. 34). Its site is marked by Tell Kaimon, a hill below the eastern end of Carmel, with the Kishon a mile away. Jokneam is an error in 1 Kings iv. 12.

JOK'SHAN (a fowler, snarer). One of the sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2, 3; 1 Chron. i. 32). There is little certainty as to the settlement of his descendants. Kalisch is inclined from the name to suppose them generally of predatory habits. A portion, however, may have engaged in commerce, joining the older tribes of Sheba and Dedan, settling within their territories, and adopting their mode of life. Hence Sheba and Dedan are called sons of Jokshan (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 475).

JOK'TAN (who is made small). One of the descendants of Shem, whose posterity peopled the whole of the south of the Arabian peninsula (Gen. x. 25-30; 1 Chron. i. 19-23). His sons were the progenitors of various tribes; and he himself appears to be identical with the Kaptan of the Arabs. See ARABIA, p. 44; EARTH, p. 232.

JOK'THEEL (subdued of God).—1. A city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 38).

—2. The name which Amziab, king of Judah, imposed on Selah, the Edomite strong-hold, after his victory and capture of it (2 Kings xiv. 7).

JO'NA (whom Jehovah bestows). The father of the apostle Peter (John i. 42). See JONAS, 2.

JON'ADAB (whom Jehovah impels).—1. One of the sons of Shimeah, David's brother. He was the friend of Amnon, and is described as a subtle man; and his conduct makes good the description (2 Sam. xiii.). 2. (Jer. xxxv. 6, 8, 10, 14, 16, 18, 19). See JEHONADAB.

JO'NAH (dove). 820-784 B.C. Of the personal history of Jonah we have few particulars. He was the son of Amittai, of Gath-hepher, a town of Zebulun, and he predicted the successes of Jeroboam II.

(2 Kings xiv. 25). The legend that he was the widow's son whom Elijah restored to life (1 Kings xvii. 17-24) is baseless. We may approximate with tolerable certainty to the time when Jonah delivered his cheering prophecy to Israel. It must have been at a period of distress. Now certainly in the reigns of Jehu and his son Jehoahaz calamities fell upon the nation (2 Kings x. 32, 33, xiii. 3-7); yet there was some return of prosperity under the last-named king (4, 5), and still more under his successor Joash, who gained three battles over Syria, and plundered Jerusalem (25, xiv. 12-14). But these battles were not decisive (xiii. 19); and we may therefore suppose that the Syrians recovered their strength after the death of Joash, and that in the earlier years of Jeroboam's reign Israel was again brought very low. Jonah's prophecy of deliverance, then, must have been given in Jeroboam's reign, predicting that king's success (who sat on the throne forty-one years, and whose victories were probably in his later administration), for it obviously would not overleap the victories of Joash, if announced before them. Whether Jonah's mission to Nineveh was after or prior to his predictions in regard to Israel, we can but conjecture. His reluctance to undertake that mission, his flight, under the belief apparently that, if he quitted the land of Israel, the scene of the theocratic manifestation, God's word would not follow him, with his subsequent preaching and its result, are to be read in the book which bears his name. Of the time and place of his death we have no information.

JONAH, THE BOOK OF. Many critics have thought fit to argue that this book is either altogether fictitious, or, if with some fact at the bottom, yet dressed out according to the writer's fancy, in order to teach more vividly a moral lesson. The reason no doubt is that we have here the record of supernatural occurrences: there would else have been no difficulty in allowing it to be literal truth. The narrative is plain and straight-forward like that of any other book of scripture. It is in accordance with the historical relations of the time, when the first communications of Israel with Assyria are noted (Hos. v. 13, x. 6; comp. 2 Kings xv. 19). The description of Nineveh (Jonah iii. 3) accords with history: the corruption of the people is mentioned in Nah. iii. 1; Zeph. ii. 15; and the mourning of men and beasts (Jonah iii. 5-8) appears to have been an Asiatic custom (Herod., lib. ix. 24).

Bleek has drawn out at length the reasons for denying the truthfulness of this book (Einleitung in das A. T., pp. 571-577). They amount to no more than that the critic supposes it unlikely that a great city would be so stirred at the preaching of a stranger, and with so little lasting effect. On similar grounds he might disbelieve the account of Paul's preaching, e.g. at the Pisidian Antioch (Acts xiii. 44), and more especially at Lystra, where the apostle was first of all regarded as a god by the multitude, and shortly afterwards stoned (xiv

8-19). Objection is also taken to the account of the fish (probably a kind of shark, which, as Bochart shows, swallows a man entire), and to Jonah's prayer or psalm, which is perversely represented as being composed and finished in the fish's belly, instead of, as common sense might teach, the embodiment after the deliverance (like Hezekiah's ode, Isai. xxxviii. 9-20) of his previous thoughts and feelings.

There is remarkable positive evidence for the literal truthfulness of the book of Jonah. Ezekiel has been thought to allude to it (Ezek. iii. 5, 6) : the apocryphal book of Tobit mentions Jonah's preaching at Nineveh (Tob. xiv. 4, 8). And our Lord himself gives a distinct authorization of the narrative (Matt. xii. 39-41). He affirms the two things, that the prophet was three days and three nights in the fish, typical of his own resurrection; and that the Ninevites repented at his preaching. He affirms, still further, his own superiority to Jonah. Would he, it may well be asked, have compared or contrasted himself with a man in a fable, a mere parable, a myth? It is well worth remark that the three facts connected with the Old Testament against which modern critics have specially objected—the Mosaic origin of the Pentateuch, the genuineness of Daniel, the literal truth of Jonah's story—are distinctly authenticated by Christ. See WHALE; and comp. Dr. Pusey's excellent vindication of the truthfulness of the narrative in his Minor Prophets, pp. 247-264. Whether Jonah himself wrote the book is a matter of inferior importance: most probably he did; and the use of the third person throughout is no proof to the contrary. Some alleged Aramaisms may be without difficulty accounted for. The book consists of two parts: I. Jonah's first commission, and attending circumstances (i., ii.). II. His second mission and its results (iii., iv.). For some good remarks on the typical character of Jonah, see Davison, Discourses on Prophecy, disc. vi. part ii.

Bp. King's Lectures upon Jonah, delivered 1594, and re-printed Edinb. 1865, are full of valuable matter.

JO'NAN (whom Jehovah bestows). A person named among the ancestors of Christ (Luke iii. 30).

JO'NAS.—1. The Greek form of Jonah (Matt. xii. 39, 40, 41, xvi. 4).—2. The father of the apostles Peter and Andrew (John xxi. 15-17), also called Jona (i. 42).

JO'NAS.—1. (1 Esdr. ix. 23).—2. The prophet Jonah (2 Esdr. i. 39; Tob. xiv. 4, 8).

JON'ATHAN (whom Jehovah gave).—1. A Levite, son of Gershom, son of Manasseh, which last name is supposed to be put for Moses in the Masoretic copies of the Hebrew bible, out of reverence to the great lawgiver (Judges xviii. 30). This young man, wandering from Beth-lehem-judah in search of employment, was engaged by Micah to be the priest of his house of gods. He afterwards accompanied the Danites in their expedition against Laish, and he and his posterity continued priests in that city, called by the conquerors Dan, 'until the day of the captivity of the land' (xvii. 7-13, xviii.). See JUDGES, THE BOOK OF.

2. The son (probably the eldest) of king Saul. He must have been grown up to man's estate when his father was called to the throne. For we find him early in Saul's reign at the head of a body of troops (1 Sam. xiii. 2). The country was still held in military possession by the Philistines; and Jonathan resolved boldly to strike a blow for freedom. He accordingly smote 'a garrison' of the Philistines (3), probably some pillar or monument, the badge of Hebrew subjection: see GARRISON. This had the effect of rousing the Philistines, who prepared to take signal vengeance for the affront. Miserably were the Israelites furnished for war; for their masters had succeeded in disarming them; neither were there artisans in the land who could manufacture weapons for the crisis (4-7, 19-23). Jonathan was not dismayed. Without consulting his father, and accompanied only by his armour-bearer, he attacked a Philistine post. Encouraged by an omen, he was successful in the first onset; and, an earthquake occurring at the time, a panic terror seized the enemy; which Saul from his position, observing, and being joined by many of his people, who now took heart, set upon the Philistines and entirely defeated them. But in his thoughtless zeal the king had forbidden, with a terrible imprecation, any of his troops from tasting food till he had completed the victory. Jonathan being absent did not know of this prohibition, and refreshed himself with some honey. On the discovery of the fact by lot, Saul would have put him to death, had not the people interposed (xiv.).

We hear no more of Jonathan till after David's exploit of killing Goliath. Generous and affectionate, he immediately formed a friendship with the young hero, and gave significant proof of it according to eastern usage (xviii. 1-4). When Saul in his insane jealousy was purposing to put David to death, Jonathan interfered, and convinced his father of the wickedness of his purpose, so that a reconciliation was the result (xix. 1-7). But again the king's violence broke out; and David had to flee. He obtained an interview with Jonathan, who could hardly believe that Saul was really in earnest. He consequently planned a test, and, being terribly convinced by what followed, and himself in consequence having suffered indignity from his father, he apprised David that he could not safely return to the court. The two renewed their covenant of friendship; Jonathan charging David to show kindness to his family and descendants (xx.). Once more the friends met; and Jonathan's disinterestedness was beautifully exemplified. He was persuaded that David would be king; but no thought of rivalry entered his mind. He was content to be next after David; and he encouraged him with the assurance that God—as Saul himself could not but know—would fulfil his purpose of placing him at the head of his people. It was in the wood of Ziph, when Saul was hunting David to destroy him, that this secret interview took place; and then they parted to meet no more on earth (xxiii. 16-18).

Jonathan fell with his father at the battle in Gilboa; and his corpse was treated with the same indignity. His bones were afterwards buried at Jabesh-gilead (xxx. 2, 8-13) and subsequently in Zelah (2 Sam. xxi. 12-14). David's lamentation for his friend, a touching effusion, celebrates his love, 'passing the love of women,' and notes his bravery and skill in the use of the bow (i. 11-27). Jonathan left a son, Merib-baal, or Mephibosheth, who was five years old at his father's death (iv. 4); and his line continued for many generations of descent (1 Chron. viii. 33-40, ix. 39-44).

3. The son of Abiathar the high priest (2 Sam. xv. 27, 36, xvii. 17, 20; 1 Kings i. 42, 43).—4. The son of David's brother Shimeah. He slew a giant in Gath (2 Sam. xxi. 20, 21; 1 Chron. xx. 6, 7).—5. One of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 32; 1 Chron. xi. 34).—6. A descendant of Jerahmeel (ii. 32, 33).—7. An uncle of David (xxvii. 32).—8. The father of a person who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 6).—9. One who with Ezra investigated the cases of those who had married foreign wives (x. 15).—10. One in the line of the high priests (Neh. xii. 11); also called Johanan (22, 23). He held his

JONATHAN.—1. A son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas Maccabeus. He was surnamed Apphus (1 Macc. ii. 5). He succeeded his brother Judas in the leadership of the Jews (ix. 31), and was made high priest by Alexander Balas (x. 15-21, 59-66, 87-89). After some vicissitudes of fortune (xi.) he renewed the league his brother had formed with the Romans, and was at last treacherously slain by Tryphon (xii., xiii. 12, 15, 19, 23-26).—2. An officer sent by Simon Maccabeus to Joppa (xiii. 11). 3. A priest (2 Macc. i. 23).

JONATHAS (Tob. v. 13). A person said to be of Tobit's acquaintance.

JONATH-EM-LEM-RECHO'KIM (the dumb dove of distant places). A variety of symbolical meanings have been given to this phrase, which is found in the title to Psal. lvi. It has most likely a musical meaning, indicating that the psalm was to be sung or chanted to the melody so called. This melody, no doubt well-known, belonged to an ode or poem bearing the name Jonath-elem-rechokim.

JOP'PA (beauty). An ancient sea-port of Palestine, respecting which there are in profane history some legendary stories office thirty-two years. His brother Jeshua attempted to dispossess him of it, but was slain by Johanan in the inner court of the temple (Prideaux, Connection, vol. i. pp. 394, 396).—11. A priest in the line of Joakim, representative of the family of Melicuz (Neh. xii. 14).—12. A priest whose son took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (35), perhaps identical with Jehonathan (18).—13. A scribe in whose house was the prison in which Jeremiah was confined (Jer. xxxvii. 15, 20; xxxviii. 26).—14. A son of Kareah, one of those who joined Gedaliah after the capture of Jerusalem (xi. 8).

These need not be noticed here. JOPPA, called also Japho, was in the territory of Dan (Josh. xix. 46). It was the port to which the wood cut in Lebanon that Solomon required was brought in floats (2 Chron. ii. 16). The materials of the second temple also were landed here (Ezra iii. 7); and here Jonah embarked for Tarshish (Jonah i. 3). At Joppa Peter resided for some time, performing the miracle of raising Tabitha (Acts ix. 36-43), and seeing here the vision which foreshadowed the calling of the Gentiles (x. 1-23, xi. 5-18).

suffered in the Maccabean wars: it was won from the king of Syria, fortified and made again a haven by the Jewish chiefs (1 Macc. x. 74, 76, xiv. 5, 34; comp. 2 Macc. xii. 3-7). It was afterwards incorporated by Pompey with the province of Syria, but was restored to Hyrcanus II. by Julius Cæsar. Later it was possessed by Herod, and then by Archelaus. Again united to Syria, it was destroyed by Cestius Gallus, and subsequently by Vespasian as having become a nest of pirates. This emperor erected on its site a castle, about which habitations clustered; and a town was again in existence (See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Joppe.')

It had its history in the time of the crusaders; it is said to have been the see of a Christian bishop; and it is now, under the name of Jaffa, the port, as it was in Solomon's time, of Jerusalem, from which it is about forty miles distant.

'Scarcely any other town,' says Dr Thomson, 'has been so often overthrown, sacked, pillaged, burned, and re-built.' In the last century it was almost deserted; now, however, it is growing and prospering, and has probably 15,000 inhabitants. The harbour is very insecure, and the landing most inconvenient. But the streets are crowded and busy; though the population is motley, and their appearance dirty. Blindness and leprosy are common; and the place is sometimes visited with the plague. But the gardens and orchards are well-watered and productive. 'In March and April,' Dr Thomson tells us, 'these Jaffa gardens are indeed enchanting. The air is overloaded with the mingled spicery of orange, lemon, apple, apricot, quince, plum, and china-trees in bloom. The people then frequent the groves, sit on mats beneath their grateful shade, sip coffee, smoke the argela, sing, converse, or sleep, as best suits their individual idiosyncracies, till evening, when they slowly return to their homes in the city' (The Land and the Book, pp. 515, 519). There are still tanneries on the sea-shore; and the house of Simon is shown; as also the grave of Tabitha.

JOP'PE (1 Esdr. v. 55, and elsewhere). Joppa.

JO'RAH (watering, the former rain). One whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 18). In Neh. vii. 24 the name is Hariph, Jora, in some copies, being in the margin.

JO'RAI (whom Jehovah teaches). A chief-tain of Gad (1 Chron. v. 13).

JO'RAM (whom Jehovah has exalted).—1. Son of Toi, king of Hamath sent to salute David (2 Sam. viii. 10), called also Hadoram (1 Chron. xviii. 10).—2. A king of Israel (1 Kings viii. 16, 25, 28, 29, ix. 14, 15, 16, 17, 21, 22, 23, 29; 2 Chron. xxii. 5, 7). See JEHO-
RAM, 1.—3. A king of Judah (2 Kings viii. 21, 23, 24, xi. 2; 1 Chron. iii. 11; Matt. i. 8). See JEHO-
RAM, 2.—4. A Levite (1 Chron. xxvi. 25).

JO'RAM (1 Esdr. i. 9). Jozabad (2 Chron. xxxv. 9).

JOR'DAN (flowing down). The name of the great—it may almost be said the only—river of Palestine, the boundary between Canaan, properly so called, and that eastern region, the dominions of Sihon and Og, which was occupied by Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh.

One source of the Jordan, according to ancient story, was in the lake Phiala (generally thought to be the modern Birket er-Ram; though a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 1130, is inclined rather to identify it with the lake Merjel-Man), out of which it flowed in a subterranean channel to Paneas (Baniás), where it was joined by another stream; and, as one was called Dan and the other Jor, from the junction the united river was the Jordan. It is almost needless to say that this derivation is groundless. The researches of late travellers have proved that there are a multitude of gushing streams on the slopes of Antilibanus. Some of these may be dry in the summer; but there are others which flow in a perennial current. Four of them have been particularly noticed. One rises near Hashbeiya, in the great fountain of Fuarr, and has the name Hasbány. Receiving some smaller streams, it is joined, at a point not half-a-mile north of Tell Sheikh Yusúf, by the Leddán from Tell el-Kady, the ancient Dan, and by the Baniásy, which bursts just outside a cave at Baniás. A fourth stream has been traced up to the springs called esh-Shar; and these may be considered as, together with smaller affluents, forming the river Jordan. 'Of these main branches,' says Dr. Thomson, 'the Hasbány is the longest by forty miles, the Leddán is much the largest, and the Baniásy the most beautiful' (The Land and the Book, pp. 213, 214; comp. 620). A marsh lies above the lake Haleh (the ancient Merom), which lake the river enters through a single channel, and, quitting it at its southern extremity, descends to the lake of Gennesaret, a distance of about nine miles. Within this space the fall of the river is about 600 feet: at first the banks are lower and the current not very hasty; but then it passes rapidly from Isir Benát Yákób through a narrow winding ravine with precipitous banks. At its entrance into the lake, two miles below the ruins of Julius, the ancient Bethsaida of Gaulanitis, it is a lazy turbid stream seventy feet wide (Porter's Hand-book, part ii. pp. 426, 427). Through this lake it has been said to glide without any commingling of the waters. Be this however as it may, it quits the lake at its southern extremity, and down, down, with ceaseless speed, it flows along, winding in its course with many a precipitous fall, dangerous to the few craft that ever navigate its waters, through that strange lonely valley, the Ghor, hot and desolate, where no city ever crowned its bank, joined here and there by a few mountain torrents, the only tributaries of any importance being the Hieromax (now Yarmák) and the Jabbok, now the Zerka. Full 200 miles it runs—60 being probably the direct distance, sinking lower and lower till at length it empties itself into that mysterious basin the Dead sea; the surface of which may be said to lie in the bowels of the earth, being 1316 feet below the Mediterranean sea-level.

From the lake of Galilee to that of Sodom the Jordan descends 663 feet: its width according to lieut. Lynch varies: he found it sometimes 70 and sometimes 80 yards, while at its mouth it was 180, and but three feet deep. Two sets of banks there seem to be, 'two terraces,' says lieut. Lynch, 'and through the lowest one the river runs its labyrinthine course. From the stream, above the immediate banks, there is on each side a singular terrace of low hills, like truncated cones, which is the bluff terminus of an extended table-land reaching quite to the base of the mountains of Hauran on the east, and the high hills on the western side' (Narrative of Exped. to the Jordan, &c., April 13, p. 123, edit. 1855).

The Jordan is intimately connected with the whole course of Hebrew history; and there is scarcely a character of note named, or event of importance related, into the narrative of which some reference to this river does not enter. It was the fair and fruitful valley of the Jordan on which Abraham and Lot looked as they stood on the hill by Beth-el, and there Lot through worldly greed unhappily chose his residence (Gen. xiii. 8-13). It was the Jordan that Jacob solitary and afraid passed over with his staff, and once again with two hands (xxxii. 10). It was the Jordan which Moses for his sin at Kadesh-meribah was forbidden to cross, but over which from the top of Pisgah he surveyed the promised inheritance of his people (Deut. xxxi. 2, xxxiv. 1-4). Soon afterwards, though it was the time of flood, the waters of the Jordan were miraculously parted to let the tribes go forward into Canaan (Josh. iii. 14-17)—an event from which the language of theology has often borrowed an illustration, seeing that between the earthly pilgrimage and the believer's eternal home there is a barrier to be passed, a dark cold flood, through which the Lord can graciously lead his people dryshod. 'Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest.' Some unnecessary objections have been raised to this statement, which the researches of travellers entirely dissipate. The fountains which supply the Jordan are fed by the melting snows of Hermon and Lebanon; so that just when winter torrents are drying up its stream is most abundant. Ordinarily it is the lower bank which is overflowed; the water rising to the level of the upper. 'Thus,' says Dr. Thomson, who speaks as an eye-witness, 'it comes to pass that it does actually "overflow all its banks during all the time of harvest," nor does it soon subside, as other short rivers do, when the rains cease. These fountains continue to pour forth their contributions for months with undiminished volume; and the river keeps full and strong all through March into April; and the proper banks of the river are still full to overflowing in the time of harvest' (p. 620). The flat which borders the stream when it is low is a thick jungle. Just therefore as of ancient times the swellings of Jordan roused the lion from his lair (Jer. xlix. 19, l. 44), so now on the rise of the river the wild boar, the jackal, and the wolf have to seek other covert. The point where the Israelites crossed could not have been far from the traditional position over-against Jericho, where, it seems, there is a ford.

Possibly at the same locality might have been the altar of memorial, erected by the two tribes and a half when they returned to their own settlements, to prevent the Jordan, confessedly a boundary, from limiting their descendants from sharing the blessings of the covenant-people (Josh. xxii. 10-29). Other events connecting themselves with the river can but be briefly noted. Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Judges viii. 4), Jephthah's chastisement of Ephraim (xii. 5, 6), the raid of the men of Jabesh-gilead to recover the bodies of Saul and his sons at Beth-shan (1 Sam. xxxi. 11-13), Abner's march along the valley or Ghor (2 Sam. ii. 29), David's hurried and mournful passage through fear of Absalom (xvii. 22), and his victorious return and parting with the aged Barzillai (xix. 15, 18, 31-39), the dividing of the waters before Elijah and Elisha (2 Kings ii. 7-14), the washing of Naaman therein (v. 14)—these and other circumstances must be hastily passed over.

But there are events narrated in the New Testament which require a little detail. It was in the Jordan that John baptized (Matt. iii. 6). He seems to have stationed himself at different times in different localities. For the place whither our Lord retired from Judea was 'where John at first baptized' (John x. 40). Again he was at 'Enon near to Salim' (iii. 23); and also at Bethabara (more probably Bethany), where, it is likely, he baptized Jesus (i. 28). It has been thought that John advanced up the river, baptizing first at the lower fords, then at a point where, the water being low, some deeper place than the shallow fords was sought for, afterwards at the upper fords, advancing towards Galilee, and that our Lord coming from Galilee met him halfway (Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. pp. 1127, 1128). This is but conjecture: still it is not an improbable conjecture. We have, however, no authority for fixing on any particular spot as that where our Lord thus fulfilled all righteousness (Matt. iii. 15); and it is quite gratuitous to regard it, as modern tradition does, as identical with the point where Joshua led the Israelites over.

After all the events which have been alluded to in connection with this river, it is, of course, deeply revered by those who delight to trace the footsteps of holy men of old, and to linger upon the memories of great events, and to adore the condescension of One who stooped to such abasement for the love of a perishing world. The name has become, and ever will be, a household word, supplying topics of interesting and instructive thought.

It may be added that the Arabs now call it esh-Sheriah, i.e. 'the watering-place,' with the distinctive addition, el-Kebir, 'the great.'

JO'RIBAS (1 Esdr. viii. 44). Jarib (Ezra viii. 16).

JO'RIBUS (1 Esdr. ix. 19). Jarib (Ezra x. 18).

THE JORDAN ON THE ROAD FROM NABLUS TO ES-SALT.

JO'RIM (Jehovah exalts?). A person named in the ancestry of Christ (Luke iii. 29).

JOR'KOAM (paleness, or, perhaps, extension of the people). Possibly a place in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 44).

JO'SABAD (whom Jehovah bestows). A Benjamite (called in some copies Jozabad) who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4).

JO'SABAD.—1 (1 Esdr. viii. 63). Jozabad (Ezra viii. 33).—2 (1 Esdr. ix. 29). Zabbai (Ezra x. 28).

JO'SAPHAT (Matt. i. 8). A Greek form of Jehoshaphat.

JOSAPHIAS (1 Esdr. viii. 36). Josiphiah (Ezra viii. 10).

JO'SEDEK (1 Esdr. v. 5, 48, 56, vi. 2, ix. 19; Eccles. xlix. 12). Jehozadak, father of the high priest Joshua.

JO'SEDECH (whom Jehovah makes just) (Hagg. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 2, 4; Zech. vi. 11). See JEHOZADAK, JOZADAK.

JO'SE (whom Jehovah helps). One in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 29).

JO'SEPH (he will add).—1. The first-born of Jacob's two sons by Rachel. He was born in Padan-aram, after his mother had been for some years barren. She then exclaimed, 'God hath taken away my reproach!' and, naming the child, said 'The Lord shall add to me another son' (Gen. xxx. 23, 24). The Hebrew terms for 'to take away' and 'to add' are nearly similar in sound, asaph and yasaph; and the use of one may have suggested the other. Plays upon words are very common in eastern literature; so that there is no ground, as some critics pretend, for dismembering the text here on this account.

Joseph was specially dear to his father, who distinguished him by a rich dress, probably the long tunic with sleeves worn by young men and maidens of the wealthier class (xxxvii. 3). But he was disliked by his jealous brothers, because he had reported their bad conduct (2), and because two remarkable dreams seemed to show that he would have pre-eminence among them (5-11). These dreams must have been after Rachel's death, as till then Joseph had not eleven brethren: the mother spoken of was doubtless Leah. When Joseph was seventeen, his father, then residing at Hebron with Isaac, sent him to enquire after his ten brothers, who were tending their flocks, he thought, in Shechem. He had to go on, however, to Dothan, where he found them. They deemed it a good opportunity to get rid of him, and would no doubt have murdered him but for the interference of Reuben and Judah, who alone showed any touch of humanity. They sold him, however, to a caravan of Midianites (called also Ishmeelites, because these last, the leading tribe of Arabia, had most of the trade in their hands), and made up a tale to their father that Joseph was devoured by a wild beast (18-35).

Joseph was carried by the Midianites into Egypt, and there sold to Potiphar, captain of the king's guard, or chief of the executioners. He soon by his probity obtained his master's favour, and had the management of his house and property. But Potiphar afterwards, deceived by his wife's false charge, put Joseph into confinement, where, by God's providence, he was so useful to the keeper of the prison (most likely Potiphar's subordinate) as to be entrusted with the oversight of the rest of the prisoners (xxxix.). And then an event occurred which ultimately led to his deliverance and advancement. The chief of the cup-bearers and the chief of the bakers had incurred the displeasure of the king, and were placed in the custody of the captain of the guard, Potiphar, or his successor. In the prison they had each a dream, which Joseph interpreted; and, as his interpretation proved true, he was subsequently recommended to Pharaoh himself, who had been disquieted by two remarkable dreams. These pre-figured, he said, seven years of plenty and then seven years of famine; and Pharaoh, satisfied that he who could so foretell the future must be the favourite of heaven, made him his prime-minister, ordered special honours to be paid him, gave him the name of ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH (which see), and married him to Asenath, the daughter of Potiphar, priest or prince of On, by whom he had two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh. In his new dignity he behaved himself wisely. In the years of plenty he gathered large quantities of corn into public granaries. The fertility of Egypt is dependent on the risings of the Nile; and it is a remarkable fact that there is monumental evidence that the river rose to a great height about the time of Joseph's administration. Lepsius discovered a series of inscriptions on a rock at Samneh, purporting to be a register of the risings of the Nile in the reign of Amenemha III., whom Bunsen makes contemporary with Joseph. These risings are considerably above the modern limit. And Wilkinson found in Nubia and farther south vast tracts of Nile deposit, evidently formed by such inundations (see Foulkes Jones, Egypt in its Biblical Relations and its Moral Aspect, pp. 85, 86, 90). After the years of plenty came the predicted years of famine; when Joseph supplied the Egyptians from the stores he had collected, purchasing, as their wants increased, their lands (those of the priests excepted) for Pharaoh, but so that they afterwards held them from the crown on payment of a fifth of the produce. We may believe that this was no impolitic or inequitable arrangement; for the Egyptians regarded Joseph as their great benefactor (xli., xlvi. 13-26).

The famine extended to Canaan; and Joseph's brethren were sent down to Egypt to buy corn. The manner in which Joseph received his brethren, how he proved them before he discovered himself to them, how he sent for his father and placed him with his family in Goshen, there to multiply till the time of return to possess Canaan was come, must be read in the pages of the sacred historian (xlii.—xlvi.). It is a touching story, true to nature, and exhibiting remarkably the manners of the age. Herein was God's wonderful working: in all this was the providential link that connected his promise to Abraham with its glorious fulfilment. Joseph's blessing was a large one from his father on his death-bed, who had given him in his sons two tribes in Israel. He dutifully closed Jacob's eyes, and buried him according to his charge in the cave of Machpelah; and having long lived in honour he died at the age of one hundred and ten, and his bones were carried when the Israelites left Egypt into Canaan, and buried in Shechem (xlviii.—1.; Exod. xiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32).

Joseph's character is developed in his history. A man of faith and patience, of determined resolution, of tender heart and forgiving temper, he may be taken as in some degree foreshadowing that meek One who, like him, was treacherously sold and raised at last to more than regal power.

Sometimes the name Joseph includes the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, as in Deut. xxxiii. 13-17, sometimes the kingdom of Israel, as in Ezek. xxxvii. 16, 19; Amos v. 6, and sometimes, poetically, the whole covenant-people, as in Psal. lxxx. 4. For an account of the two tribes of his posterity, see EPHRAIM, MANASSEH, 1.

2. A descendant of Issachar (Numb. xiii. 7).—3. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 42).—4. A priest (Neh. xii. 14).—5. The reputed father of our Lord, husband of the Virgin. Little is told of him in scripture, save that he was of the seed of David, and a just man, who carried on the trade of a carpenter at Nazareth. He was several times favoured with divine communications, to complete his marriage with Mary, to carry her and the child Jesus into Egypt, to return into Palestine, and settle at his ancient home of Nazareth (Matt. i. 16, 18-25, ii. 13-15, 19-23, xiii. 55; Luke i. 27, ii. 4, 5, 16, 27, 33). He was still alive when Jesus at twelve years went up to Jerusalem (41-51); but there is reason to believe that he died before our Lord commenced his public ministry. Certainly, had she then had a husband, Mary would not at the crucifixion have been entrusted to the care of John (John xix. 26, 27). Probably Joseph was older than Mary. There are some legendary stories of him extant which are not worth detailing.—6. A rich and honourable Israelite, one of the great council, or sanhedrim, called from his birth-place or residence 'of Arimathea.' He was a disciple of Jesus, but did not venture openly to avow his belief: he dissented, however, from the judgment of his colleagues. And, when the dreadful deed of the Lord's murder was done, Joseph, perhaps emboldened by the portents which accompanied it and the evident consternation of the rulers, went at once to Pilate, begged the sacred body, prepared it with Nicodemus for burying, and laid it in his own new tomb (Matt. xxvii. 57-60; Mark xv. 42-46; Luke xxiii. 50-53; John xix. 38-42). More of this Joseph we do not certainly know: there is a tradition that he came into Britain and settled at Glastonbury.—7, 8, 9. Three persons in the ancestry of Christ (Luke iii. 24, 26, 30).—10. A disciple named Barsabas. He must have been a distinguished person, possibly one of the seventy, for he was nominated with Matthias for the apostleship (Acts i. 23). We hear no more of him.

JOSEPH.—1. An ancestor of Judith (Judith viii. 1).—2. A Jewish captain in the Maccabean wars (1 Macc. v. 8).—3. John, the brother of Judas Maccabeus, appears to have been sometimes called Joseph (2 Macc. viii. 22, x. 19).

JOSEPHUS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Joseph (Ezra x. 42).

JO'SES (whom Jehovah helps).—1. One of those called our Lord's brethren (Matt. xiii. 55, xxvii. 56; Mark vi. 3, xv. 40, 47). See JAMES, 2.—2 (Acts iv. 36). See BARNABAS.

JO'SHAH (whom Jehovah lets dwell). A chief of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 24).

JO'SHAPHAT (whom Jehovah judges). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 43).

JOSHAVIAH (whom Jehovah lets dwell). Also one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 46).

JOSHBEKA'SHAH (seat in hardness). A head of one of the divisions of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 24).

JO'SHEB-BAS'SEBET (he who sits in the seat) (2 Sam. xxiii. 8, marg.) See JASHOBEAM.

JOSH'UA (whose help is Jehovah, or Jehovah the salvation).—1. This eminent leader was the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, grandson of that Elishama who was prince of the tribe (Numb. ii. 18; 1 Chron. vii. 26), and probably seven descents from Joseph: see EPHRAIM, p. 269. He was originally called Oseha; but his name was changed to Jehoshua or Joshua (Numb. xiii. 16; 1 Chron. vii. 27), rendered in Greek 'Jesus' (Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8).

Joshua was born in Egypt, and was of mature age at the time of the exodus. We first hear of him as appointed to command the troops selected for resisting the attack of Amalek in Rephidim: he was completely successful; and Moses was directed to write an account of the victory (Exod. xvii. 8-16). He is afterwards repeatedly mentioned as attending Moses (xxiv. 13, xxxii. 17, xxxiii. 11; Numb. xi. 28), and was appointed one of the spies to search Canaan (xiii. 8). He alone with Caleb brought a true account, and expressed his firm persuasion that, according to God's promise, Israel was well able to dispossess the Canaanites. To the faithful two it was declared that, while the people were condemned to wander forty years in the wilderness, and the rest of the spies died almost immediately, they both should survive to inherit their portion of the good land (xiii. 26—xiv. 45, xxvi. 65). Moses, for his sin at Meribah, was not to lead the people over the Jordan; and Joshua was then solemnly designated as his successor (xxvii. 18-23, xxxiv. 17; Deut. i. 38); and earnest charges were given him to be faithful in his high leadership (iii. 21, 22, 28, xxxi. 7-23). In this he may be considered as a type of Christ, bearing, to note no other particulars, the same name; and, as the one led the Israelites into a place of earthly rest, so the other brings his chosen into the heavenly Canaan, the glorious eternal 'rest' which 'remaineth for the people of God' (Heb. iv. 9): comp. Pearson On the Creed, art. ii. pp. 75-77, edit. 1683.

Joshua, having assumed the command after Moses' death (at about eighty-three or eighty-four years of age), received a promise of continued support from God (Josh. i. 1-9); he then sent spies to Jericho, soon after crossed the Jordan with the host, the waters being miraculously cut off, and, encamping at Gilgal, he renewed the divine covenant by circumcising the people, and afterwards solemnly kept the passover; the manna now ceasing (10-v. 12). He had then a vision of the Captain of the Lord's host, most probably no created being, but the Son himself (13-15); and according to God's command he attacked and destroyed Jericho, the walls of which fell suddenly down, when Israel had for seven days compassed the city (vi.). But, on a repulse before Ai, Joshua seems for the time to have lost heart: the cause, however, the crime of Achan, was soon discovered, the culprit punished, Ai taken; and Joshua, penetrating into the heart of the country, solemnly read the blessings and curses of the law on Gerizim and Ebal, as Moses had commanded (vii., viii.). The submission of the Gibeonites, who obtained terms from Israel by fraud, and the consequent league of several southern chiefs, led to the conquest of a large part of the south (ix., x.); and another confederacy of northern kings drew on a battle and complete victory near the lake of Merom: the north was then occupied; and, after various campaigns, one of which is particularly specified against the gigantic Anakim, Joshua may be said to have had, in about six or seven years, military possession of the whole of the country (xi., xii.) It is true that many of the Canaanites still held fastnesses, and maintained themselves in different strong places, and probably, as Israel grew remiss, afterwards recovered several cities that had at first been taken. But Joshua was now in a position to allot the land to the various tribes. This was done in conjunction with Eleazar; and Timnath-serah, in mount Ephraim, was given to the leader himself (xix. 49-51). Here doubtless he enjoyed a rest; but we find him at the close of his life again publicly charging the people, in two addresses, with some foreboding of the evil into which they would run after his decease. Then he died in peace, aged one hundred and ten years, and was buried in his own inheritance (xxiii., xxiv.).

Joshua's character is a very noble one; and few blemishes are found in it. The favoured disciple of Moses, he learned to be faithful to the Lord God. Once indeed he was too jealous for what he conceived Moses' honour (Numb. xi. 28, 29). He was generally bold and fearless, though an unexpected check, as already noted, at one time dispirited him. But, with these small exceptions, an able commander, a wise ruler, a faithful servant of the Lord, Joshua shines as a bright star among the noble luminaries with which God has decorated his church; and his resolution may well be taken as the humble decision of all who bear the name of Christ: 'as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord' (xiv. 15).

2. A man of Beth-shemesh, in whose field the cart stopped which brought back the ark from the Philistines (1 Sam. vi. 14, 18).

—3. A governor of Jerusalem (2 Kings xxiii. 8).—4. A high priest after the captivity (Hagg. i. 1, and elsewhere). In the books of Ezra and Nehemiah he is called Jeshua: see JESHUA.

JOSH'UA, THE BOOK OF. This book receives its name from its recording the conquest and appropriation of the land of Canaan by the Israelites under the leadership of Joshua. It may be considered as comprising three parts: I. The conquest and occupation of Canaan (i.-xii.). II. The division of the conquered land (xiii.-xxii.). III. The addresses and dying counsels of Joshua, his death and burial (xxiii., xxiv.).

Attempts are made by several modern critics to dismember this book; as if it were compiled by some comparatively-late writer, from various materials, which he has not succeeded, they say, in reducing to a consistent whole. Discrepancies are alleged and interpolations supposed; but when examined they amount to little more than that, whereas Joshua is represented as having subdued the entire country, yet portions are still said to be unconquered; that he is declared to have rooted out the Anakim, who appear afterwards in force, and to have captured and destroyed many cities which subsequently were held against the Israelites. Some observations have been made in the preceding article which tend to explain these alleged contradictions: it is enough to say that generally, after campaigns are decided by great victories, there are sure to remain petty wars of detail, and that it was not possible for the Israelites at once to disseminate themselves through every corner of the country. It is natural, therefore, to suppose that places might be lost and won, occupied and re-occupied, by both contending parties. And we must remember that it by no means follows that the limitation of a general statement is a contradiction of it.

Neither is the alleged diversity of style and diction an argument of much force. The proofs brought to support it are insufficient. Besides, a portion of the book is historical, another portion geographical. If we find the style more complete and round in the one, more loose and feeble in the other, it is only what we might naturally expect. It is not denied that documents were used in the composition: the territorial descriptions of the districts allotted to the various tribes were most probably taken from the surveys made by the appointed officers; and so accurately have they been copied that, whereas too much land was at first allotted to Judah, and afterwards Simeon's inheritance was taken out of it, both the first and second apportionments are preserved. Documents were used, then, but faithfully, judiciously, and harmoniously. And, after all, so well is the book compacted, that Bleek (Einleitung in das A. T., pp. 312, 326, 327) acknowledges that it is not possible with any certainty to separate it into what he thinks its discordant parts.

Taking then the book of Joshua as a whole, we may enquire who was the author, and to what date it is to be assigned. Conjectures as to the author range over a vast extent, from Joshua himself down to Jeremiah. Bleek, who places the book of Deuteronomy late, believes that the final editor of that was also the compiler of Joshua. In opposition to such a notion must be set the proofs (see DEUTERONOMY) that of Deuteronomy Moses was the author. Perhaps we may arrive by careful research at a more satisfactory result. The compilation was later than Joshua. He is said, indeed (Josh. xxiv. 26), to have committed several things to writing; but this record of his, though added, it would seem, to some book of authority previously existing, can hardly be supposed to include more than the renewal of the covenant, the circumstances and substance of the address he had just made to Israel. And there are indications that the composition must be placed later than the time of Joshua. For, to refer to but one of these, the expedition of the Danites to Leshem or Laish is mentioned (xix. 47); a fuller account of which is given in Judges xviii. And, from that account, it appears that a system of image-worship was established immediately on the settlement of Laish, ever after called Dan. We find also that (xvii.) the same system had previously existed in mount Ephraim, probably for a few years. Now, though there are indications in Joshua's last address that he thought declension into idolatry not unlikely, and though there might be individual instances of sin, yet, looking at the declarations of Josh. xxiii. 8, xxiv. 31, we can hardly imagine that such flagrant examples of open image-worship could have occurred in that great captain's lifetime. Yet the date could not have been late. There are some expressions tending to prove this which must be noticed. We cannot indeed lay stress on v. 1, 6; where the use of the first person is not decisive. But we may observe that Rahab is spoken of as still alive (vi. 25). We have no knowledge how long she lived; yet, as in all probability young at the taking of Jericho (she had then parents), she might very well have survived it sixty or seventy years. The expression, 'She dwelleth in Israel even unto this day,' would not have been used by one writing immediately; it points rather to a time when few who had taken part in the stirring scenes of the conquest still remained. The words 'unto this day' occur not less than seventeen times in the whole book, viz. iv. 9, v. 9, vi. 25, vii. 26 (twice), viii. 28, 29, ix. 27, x. 27, xiii. 13, xiv. 14, xv. 63, xvi. 10, xxii. 3, 17, xxiii. 8, 9. The last four instances are found in Joshua's own addresses: that in vi. 25 is, as just observed, an argument for an early date; and the rest may very well come within, if not Joshua's lifetime, at least the next generation. But xv. 63 fixes a lower limit, later than which the composition of the book cannot be dated. In the seventh or eighth year of David's reign the Jebusites were expelled from Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 6-9). Perhaps then we may not unreasonably believe that this history was compiled in the days when judges ruled, it may be when some who witnessed the conquest were yet alive, or, if all had passed away, with such a scrupulous adherence to authorities as to embody some of the expressions in which eyewitnesses had chronicled the events as they occurred. There are indications, too, in the style, faint no doubt, but still pointing to the same period of time. It slightly differs from that of the Pentateuch, but yet is not quite assimilated to that of later books. To take a single instance: the expression 'Lord of Hosts' is nowhere found in Joshua. It first occurs in 1 Sam. i. 3, 11, and thenceforth is sufficiently common.

It has been already said that this book has a historical and a geographical part. Some have believed that the last-named was a subsequent addition. But there seems to be one leading idea, according to which the whole was arranged. Thus, in Josh. i. 2-9 a command and a promise are conjoined. Verses 5-8 are a kind of table of contents; 5 showing how, by God's help, Canaan should be entirely subdued (comp. i. 10-xii.); 6 pointing to its distribution among the tribes (comp. xiii.-xxii.); 7, 8 corresponding with the narrative of xxiii., xxiv. All the parts are closely linked together; the end of the first portion (xii.) clearly preparing for an account of the division of the country, and the conclusion of the geographical sections referring back not only to xi. 23, but also to i. 2-6; while the remaining chapters both are necessary to narrate the return of the trans-Jordanic tribes to their own settlements and the close of Joshua's administration, and have also various references to what had preceded. The independent character of the book, moreover, is evidenced by the mention of the assignment of their lands to those eastern tribes, and of the appointment of the refugees; all of which had been narrated in the Pentateuch (see Kell, Einleitung, § 43: comp. his Comm. on Joshua, transl., Introd., pp. 29, 30).

The canonical authority of this book has never been disputed: there are references to it (besides allusions in the Old Testament) in Acts vii. 45; Heb. iii. 5, iv. 8, xi. 30, 31; James ii. 25.

But objection has been made to the credibility of the narrative, because it records miraculous events. Thus, various expedients have been devised, by men who seem to have a nervous fear of God's working a miracle, to account for the statement that the walls of Jericho fell down. And great perplexity has been felt in regard to the assertion that the sun and moon stood still. The main argument against the literal truth of this wonder is that it must be of a character so stupendous that all other miracles sink in comparison into the shade. The plain meaning of which is that God may work an easy (?) miracle, but not a hard (?) one. As if hard and easy could have any place in respect to the power of him at whose word creation started forth! Man is unable to perform the so-called least miracle: God is mighty enough to perform the so-called greatest. The only question for the reverent enquirer is whether the statement is so distinctly made that it must be received without violence to the text. Mr. Hopkins, in an elaborate examination (Amer. Bibl. Repository, Jan. 1845, pp. 97-130) endeavours to show that the historian is merely extracting from the poetical book of Jasher, which he cites by name, to apprise the reader that he by no means himself asserts the reality of the miracle. But, if the statement were not literally true, why did the sacred writer introduce and so far endorse it? It is passing strange that an author, gravely recording history, should suddenly incorporate poetry with his prose, and intend it to be understood that the poetry was but a flourish, a fictitious exaggeration of plain fact. The student is recommended to consult Greswell's Fasti Temporis Catholici and Origines Kalendarie, Oxford, 1852, diss. v. chapp. ii. iii. iv. vol. i. pp. 251-383. Mr. Greswell considers an ordinary day far too short for all the events said to have happened in it. He analyzes fully the narrative, and investigates the extraneous evidence which can be produced for the occurrence of the miracle. His conclusions are very weighty. It is not intended to decide dogmatically how the wonder was accomplished. It might be by a powerful refraction of the solar light. This we must be content to leave. See MIRACLE.

It may be added that, in corroboration of the general history of this book, a Phœnician inscription is cited (Procopius, Vandal., lib. ii. 10), as written by Canaanites fleeing from Joshua. Some writers, however, doubt the authenticity of this account.

Two other books bear the name of Joshua. One, printed 1848, is an Arabic chronicle, written most likely in the thirteenth century: it contains a legendary history of Joshua, with later stories, and comes down to the time of Theodosius the Great. The other (a part of the preceding) is in the Samaritan dialect, a free translation of the genuine book, modified according to the Samaritan dogmas. It was probably the work of a Samaritan who resided in Egypt.

Keil's commentary on Joshua (Erlang. 1847) has been already referred to. There is an English translation of it.

JOSHUA, THE GATE OF. One of the gates of Jerusalem, called after a person of the name who was governor of the city (2 Kings xxiii. 8). We have no means of identifying the position of this gate.

JOSIAH (whom Jehovah heals).—1. The son and successor of Amon king of Judah. He was but eight years old at his accession, and he reigned thirty-one years, 639-609 B.C. (2 Kings xxii. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 1, 2). When but a youth, in the eighth year of his reign, he began to seek the Lord, and in his twelfth year he carried out a reformation, visiting and cleansing not only Judah, but the country of Israel also, from idolatrous pollutions (3-7). This work, it would seem, went on for several years; further steps, according to opportunity, being from time to time taken. In the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign, the temple having been repaired, a copy of the law was found there, and brought to the king (2 Kings xxii. 3-20; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8-33). Whether this was the actual book put originally by Moses by the side of the ark (Deut. xxxi. 26), or a transcript, we know not. It is evident that the sacred volume had been grievously neglected; and probably the king had never seen it. But the hypothesis of some that Jeremiah and Hilkiah forged a book, and palmed it upon the king, is, apart from its profanity, one of the most unreasonable that could have been devised. 'The deep and fundamental knowledge of the law,' says Keil, 'which all the prophets display, necessarily pre-supposes the dissemination of copies of the Pentateuch among them' (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. p. 138). Some have said that the book produced was Deuteronomy, then first composed; but even De Wette does not countenance this supposition (Einleit., § 162 a). See HILKIAH, 2. For a very sensible discussion of the whole subject consult Hävernick, Einleit., § 159, vol. i. 2, pp. 534-540. A most solemn passover was held in this eighteenth year of Josiah's reign; and further purifications of the land were carried out (2 Kings xxiii. 1-27; 2 Chron. xxxv. 1-19). This sovereign appears to have exercised authority over districts formerly comprehended in the kingdom of Israel. Thus at Beth-el, the place where Jeroboam I. had set up one of his calves, Josiah, according to a remarkable prophecy (1 Kings xiii. 2), burnt the high-place and polluted the altar. It has been thought that, as the Scythian incursion occurred in his time (Herodotus, lib. i. 104-106), he had less to fear from the Assyrian power. Indeed the Assyrians might have entrusted the king of Judah with the defence of those districts; for it was most likely as an ally or vassal of the Assyrian monarch that Josiah met the king of Egypt, and fell at Megiddo (2 Kings xxiii. 28-30; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20-27). He was greatly lamented, and buried with the highest honours. And this, we are told, was the fulfilment of Huldah's prophecy (xxxiv. 28 comp. Jer. xxxiv. 5). The lament said to be made by Jeremiah for Josiah must not be supposed the book of Lamentations.

2. A person at whose house the symbolical crowning of Joshua the high priest was to take place (Zech. vi. 10).

JOSIAS. The Greek form of Josiah (Matt. i. 10, 11).

JOSIAH (1 Esdr. viii. 33). Jeshatah (Ezra viii. 7).

JOSIBAH (whom Jehovah lets dwell). A chief among the Simeonites (1 Chron. iv. 35).

JOSIPHIAH (whom may Jehovah increase). One whose son returned from Babylon with Ezra, at the head of 160 males (Ezra viii. 10).

JOT (Matt. v. 18). The Hebrew letter yod appears to be referred to, as the smallest in size of the alphabet. We have reason to conclude from this that the present characters were in use in our Lord's time. In the older, now called the Samaritan, alphabets the yod was as large as any of the other letters.

JOT'BAH (goodness, pleasantness). The place where the father of Meshullemeth, king Amon's mother, resided (2 Kings xxi. 19). It may be identical with

JOT'BATH, JOT'BATHAH (id.). One of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 33; Deut. x. 7).

JO'THAM (Jehovah is upright).—1. The youngest son of Gideon, who alone escaped when Abimelech his half-brother murdered his other brethren. He uttered from Gerizim a warning parable, then fled and lived at Beer (Judges ix. 5-21).—2. The son of Uzziah, king of Judah. He was regent while his father was a leper, and then, succeeding to his throne when twenty-five, he reigned sixteen years, 758-741 B.C. He did right in the sight of God; though the high places were not removed; and his reign was prosperous (2 Kings xv. 5, 7, 30, 32-38, xvi. 1; 1 Chron. iii. 12, v. 17; 2 Chron. xxvi. 21, 23, xxvii.; Isai. i. 1, vii. 1; Hos. i. 1; Mic. i. 1).—3. One of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. ii. 47).

JOURNEY. It is customary in the east to journey in the morning or evening, and to rest in the heat of the day. So the three strangers were naturally expected by Abraham to pause, as he saw them coming towards his tent-door, where he sat for coolness (Gen. xviii. 1-5). A day's journey was probably ten to twenty miles (Numb. xi. 21; Deut. i. 2). Kitto, however, estimates it at twenty-three miles (Pict. Bible, note on Gen. xxx. 36). A sabbath-day's journey was 2000 cubits, or paces, about six furlongs, or three-quarters of a mile (Acts i. 12). The measure is supposed to have been borrowed from the space left between the people and the ark when they passed the Jordan (Josh. iii. 4).

JOY. That happy state of mind which is the privilege and duty of God's servants, resulting from reconciliation with him through faith in Christ (Rom. v. 11). It is reckoned as one of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22). It is to remain with those that keep Christ's commandments (John xv. 11). Future happiness is illustrated by the expression 'joy of the Lord' (Matt. xxv. 21, 23). Believers, therefore, are commanded to rejoice (Phil. iii. 1, iv. 4).

But all joy is not of this blessed kind. There is a worldly, foolish, or hypocritical joy (Job xx. 5; Prov. xv. 21). That, which has no better source than in vanity or sin, will, in the end, be turned to bitterness.

JO'ZABAD (whom Jehovah bestows).—1. 2. Two chiefs of Manasseh, who joined David as he went to Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 20).—

3. One, probably a Levite, who took part in the reforms of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).—

4. A Levite chief in Josiah's reign (xxxv. 9).—5. A Levite who helped to weigh the vessels brought to Jerusalem by Ezra (Ezra viii. 33).—6. A priest who had married a foreign wife (x. 22).—7. One who assisted in expounding the law when Ezra read (Neh. viii. 7): he may possibly be the same with No. 5.—8. A chief of the Levites (xi. 16), perhaps also the same person. See JOSABAD.

JO'ZACHAR (whom Jehovah remembers). One of the murderers of Joash king of Judah (2 Kings xii. 21). He is called Zabab in 2 Chron. xxiv. 26.

JO'ZADAK (whom Jehovah makes just) (Ezra iii. 2, 8, v. 2, x. 18; Neh. xii. 26). See JEHOZADAK.

JU'BAL (music). One of the sons of Lamech, of the line of Cain (Gen. iv. 21). He was the inventor of the harp and organ, i.e. of stringed and wind instruments.

JUBILEE, or JUBILEE. A festal year prescribed by the Hebrew law, and so called as implying the flowing forth of loud sound, because it was ushered in by the clangour of trumpets. It recurred every fiftieth year, after seven sabbaths of years (not being, as some have supposed, the seventh sabbatical year), marking off a great cycle of time, so that at each half century the Israelitish polity began as it were afresh; a new morning of holy gratulation and recovered strength dawning on the land.

The account of this institution, which had its type in the weekly sabbath, is carefully given in the law (Lev. xxv. 8-16, 23-55), whence we learn that the jubilee commenced on the tenth day of the seventh month, and was proclaimed through the whole country. It was to be a year when, as in the sabbatical year, the land lay un-tilled; nor was there any formal gathering of its spontaneous produce, which was to be absolutely free to all comers.

In the jubilee year every man was to 'return unto his possession;' that is, all alienated landed property was to revert to the original owner. There were two exceptions: houses in walled towns, if not redeemed within a year, become the purchaser's for ever; the jubilee release not touching them. But this provision did not apply to house-property belonging to Levites, which was the only property they could so mortgage, for they were forbidden to part at all with the field of the suburbs of their cities. The other exception related to lands dedicated to God. These, if not redeemed, or if so sold as to make redemption impossible by the original owner, did not return to him at the jubilee: they became the priests' for ever. But, if the mortgagee or person who had purchased such lands dedicated them, in that case, as his right over them extended only for the time till the next jubilee, they returned then to the first proprietor (xxvii. 14-25). It was therefore a general principle that landed property could be alienated only for a term of years. The nearer to the jubilee, the shorter was the term, and the less that which could be raised upon the property. The owner, too, or his next representative, could, subject to the provisions above noticed, redeem his lands at any time; only, if they were sanctified to the Lord, he must add one-fifth of the estimated value to the redemption money.

Hebrew bondmen also became free in the year of jubilee, whether in servitude to their own countrymen, or to resident foreigners (in which last case the right of redemption might at any time be exercised). Generally they were to serve their brethren but seven years (Exod. xxi. 1, 2); but, if the jubilee occurred before the seven years expired, they obtained their liberty, even if all probability those who had declined leaving their master at the ordinary term (5, 6).

Josephus adds that debts were remitted at the jubilee (Antiq., lib. iii. 12, § 3). It is not, however, easy to see what practical operation such a provision could have had, as the jubilee immediately succeeded a sabbatical year, in which there was such a remission (Deut. xv. 1, 2); and the scripture says nothing on the subject.

It has been disputed whether the law of the jubilee ever came into full operation. Little is directly recorded; but there are several allusions to it (Numb. xxxvi. 4; Isai. lxi. 1, 2; Ezek. vii. 12, 13, xli. 16-18). No doubt, like other commandments of the law, it was neglected in days of declension and apostasy. Its operation would have been very beneficial: more touching upon general economics perhaps than of a religious cast, for there were no special services appointed for it, it must have kept the people in general prosperity, checking the agrandisement of a few to the impoverishing of the many. And it was a standing testimony to the theocracy, that the land was the Lord's, apportioned by him to Israel as his tenants. It must have pointed forward also to that future state of glorious spiritual freedom, where the inheritance of each redeemed one is his for ever, no forfeiture of his high privileges to be dreaded in God's eternal kingdom.

JU'CAL (potent) (Jer. xxxviii. 1). See JE-HUCAL.

JU'DA.—1. One of those called our Lord's brethren (Mark vi. 3). See JAMES, 2. He is termed Judas in Matt. xiii. 55.—2. One in the list of our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 26). Lord A. Hervey identifies him with Abiud (Matt. i. 13), and thinks that both names may indicate Hodalah (1 Chron. iii. 24; comp. Ezra ii. 40, iii. 9).—3. Another in the same list (Luke iii. 30).—4. The patriarch Judah (Luke iii. 33; Heb. vii. 14; Rev. v. 5, vii. 5). He is called Judas in Matt. i. 2, 3.—5. Used for the land (ii. 6): so also in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. ii. 6, 18).

JUDE'A, or JUDE'A. The name by which now in popular language the whole of Palestine is understood.

We find 'Judea,' or 'the province of Judea,' mentioned after the captivity (Ezra v. 8; Dan. v. 13, where 'Jewry'). It derived its name from the imperial tribe of Judah; and it seems to have comprised the territory occupied by those who returned from Babylon; the mass of these exiles having been of the tribe, or of the kingdom of Judah, as distinguished from that of Israel. It is true that the remnants of many other tribes returned also. Thus the sacrifices were for the twelve (Ezra vi. 17, viii. 35); and we have special mention of Ephraim and Manasseh (1 Chron. ix. 3), of Benjamin and the Levites (Ezra i. 5), and of others whose pedigrees were lost (ii. 59, 60). We know also that so multifarious were those that came back, that it is said, 'all Israel dwelt in their cities' (70), and that later in the sacred history the descent of individuals not of Judah is specified (Luke ii. 36); yet, as Jerusalem was now again the general metropolis, it was natural that the name of the great tribe which settled round it should prevail above the rest. And indeed, before the captivity, the kings of Judah seem to have recovered in a measure their authority over the rest of the land (2 Kings xxiii. 19, 20; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 6, 7, 9). In the Apocrypha, 'Judea,' or 'the country of Judea,' frequently occurs (e.g. 1 Esdr. iv. 45, vi. 8; Tob. i. 18; Judith iv. 1; 1 Macc. vi. 48), though the distinctive name of Israel is by no means abandoned (1, 20, 25, vi. 18, 21). In New Testament times Judea was held to include even the trans-Jordanic provinces (Matt. xix. 1; Mark x. 1; Luke xxiii. 5). This was a popular mode of speaking; for we find the word elsewhere more precisely used (John iv. 3, xi. 7, 8). Properly the province of Judea comprised the territories of Judah, Benjamin, Simeon, and parts of Dan, from the Jordan to the Mediterranean, and from a place called Anath in the north, to Jarda in the south (Joseph., Bell. Jud., lib. iii. 3, § 5), corresponding nearly with the ancient kingdom of Judah. After the disgrace of Archelaus, Judea was attached to the Roman province of Syria; the procurator, subordinate to the governor of Syria, residing at Cæsarea.

JU'DAH (praised).—1. The fourth son of Jacob and Leah, so called from the joyful gratitude expressed by his mother at his birth (Gen. xxix. 35). After the return of Jacob with his family to Canaan, Judah took a woman of the country to wife. Her death and the disgraceful circumstances which followed may be read in xxxviii. Judah's character improves as we follow out the circumstances of the history. He had joined with his brothers in their evil purpose against Joseph; but he had some relentings, and therefore he proposed to sell the youth to the merchants of a caravan that passed by rather than put him to death; a proposal which was accepted (xxxvii. 26-28). Afterwards, when it was necessary to go a second time into Egypt for corn, and Jacob had steadily refused, in spite of Reuben's remonstrance, to part with Benjamin, Judah undertook to be responsible for his safe return; and the father was prevailed on (xlii. 3-14). Judah's conduct in Egypt was beyond all praise. When Joseph's cup was discovered in Benjamin's sack, he nobly offered to become a slave himself for life, if only Benjamin might be spared to return to his father. His address on the occasion is peculiarly touching (xliv. 14-34). At the descent into Egypt, Judah had three sons living: the two grandsons, afterwards distinguished as heads of families in the tribe, were probably not then born (xlv. 12).

The prophetic blessing pronounced by Jacob augured a splendid destiny to the descendants of this son. Though he was not the eldest, and though the birth-right which Reuben forfeited was conferred on Joseph, yet the royalty of Israel was to be with Judah. His strength, then, his imperial power, and the productiveness of his territory, in wine and as pasturage, were foretold (xlix. 8-12; 1 Chron. v. 2). See SHILOH.

In reviewing the history of Israel we may see how soon Judah had the pre-eminence. At the first census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 74,600; and, though the early leaders of Israel, Moses, Aaron, Joshua were of other families, yet Judah, as a tribe, took always the foremost place, marched at the head, and mustered under their standard the largest host (Numb. i. 26, 27, ii. 3-9, vii. 12). In the second census Judah had multiplied to 76,500 (xxvi. 19-22). The inspired benediction of Moses was short, yet it nevertheless indicated the increasing strength of this tribe. Accordingly we find a noble inheritance provided for Judah; and it was one of the first assigned after the entrance of Israel into Canaan. The boundary is described as running on the north from the Dead sea where the Jordan enters it, westward by Beth-hogla, to En-shemesh, and probably over the mount of Olives to En-rogel, thence along the valley of Hinnom, to the water of Nephtoah (Lifta?), and by Beth-shemesh, and Ekron to the coast. The Mediterranean was the western boundary. The southern frontier was the river of Egypt (Wady el-Arish), by Azmon, sweeping southward to Karkaa, perhaps touching Wady el-Kurdaizeh, thence by Kadesh-barnea, the wilderness of Zin, and Maaleh-acrabbim to the southern extremity of the Dead sea; that lake being the eastern border (Josh. xv. 1-12). This territory was in average length about forty-five miles, with a breadth of fifty, and comprehended four regions, the south, 'toward the coast of Edom,' a district which has been excellently illustrated by Mr. Wilton, The Negeb, or South Country of Scripture, 1863; the 'valley,' plain, or Shefelah, the tract lying between the central hill-country and the Mediterranean (Josh. xv. 33-47); the mountains (48-60); and the wilderness, the slopes and sunken region adjoining the Dead sea (61, 62). A portion of this territory was afterwards deducted for Simeon, perhaps not a compact district, but certain cities with their villages 'within the inheritance' of Judah (xix. 1-9). Dan, too, had some places previously allotted to Judah (comp. 40-48).

Among the towns of chief note in the possessions of this tribe may be enumerated Beth-lehem, Hebron, Kirjath-jearim, Lachish, and Libnah. It cannot fail to strike the reader of xv. 21-32 that, whereas the cities of the south region of Judah are stated to be twenty-nine, near forty names are given in the list. By a careful examination of this list, aided by the researches of various travellers, Mr. Wilton has ascertained that the enumeration and the names exactly correspond; several compound names of places being given in our version as if they were separate towns. For the right appellation of each, reference may be made to the articles under their respective headings; and for fuller information Mr. Wilton's book must be consulted. But it may be well to give a catalogue here of the twenty-nine cities as he believes them to stand:—1. Kabzeel. 2. Arad. 3. Hazar-kinah. 4. Dimonah, or Dibon. 5. Ararah, or Aroer. 6. Kadesh. 7. Hazar-lithnan. 8. Telem, or Telaim. 9. Bealoth, or Baalath. 10. Hazor-hadattah. 11. Kerioth-hebron, which is Hazar-amam. 12. Shema or Shalma. 13. Moladah. 14. Hazar-gaddah. 15. Heshmon. 16. Beth-pelet. 17. Hazar-shual. 18. Beer-sheba. 19. Bizjoth-jah-baalath. 20. Ije-azim. 21. El-tolah. 22. Chesil, or Bethel. 23. Hormah, or Zephath. 24. Ziklag. 25. Madmannah. 26. Sansannah. 27. Lebaoth. 28. Shilhim or Shaaraim. 29. En-rimmon (The Negeb, p. 234).

The region of Judah was much diversified. The low plain along the sea-coast was emphatically a corn-producing country: the hills were admirably adapted for the culture of the vine; and the wilder districts supplied abundant pasture for the flocks and herds. But, powerful as the tribe was, it did not subdue and occupy the whole of its territory. At first, portions of the Shefelah were conquered by Joshua, and certain towns in the hill-country were taken (Josh. x. 28-35, 38-40, xi. 21); and, after Joshua's death, Judah and Simeon together destroyed the chief Philistine cities and sacked Jerusalem (Judges i. 1-20). But some of these conquests were not retained. The Canaanites, who had chariots of iron, were too strong to be exterminated; and the tribe would seem to have settled mainly in the central mountains, holding for the most part the south and the wilderness, and, according to circumstances, gaining or losing the tracts adjacent to the Philistines.

During the period of the judges we hear little of Judah. Only one judge, Othniel, is known certainly to have been of this tribe (ii. 9-11). Like the rest of Israel, they submitted to the Philistine yoke; and their pusillanimous conduct is strongly marked in their behaviour towards Sampson (xv. 9-13). They preserved, however, an independent spirit in regard to the other tribes, and, while they acquiesced in the Benjamite Saul's appointment as king, it could hardly have been with a very good grace; as may be inferred from the very small contingent they supplied to that monarch's army when proceeding against Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 4). Gladly, therefore, did they embrace the opportunity of Saul's death to anoint their own tribesman, David, king in Hebron; and for some years they maintained a separate monarchy (2 Sam. ii. 1-11). When the nation was re-united under David's sceptre, the haughty men of Judah thought little of and cared little for the rest of the tribes (xix. 40-48, xx. 2, 4), an omen of the entire separation which occurred after Solomon's death.

The breaking of the Hebrew monarchy into two kingdoms, though the special judgment of God on sin, was nevertheless the natural consequence of tribal jealousy. Imperial Judah in the south, first in power and importance, had always maintained, as observed above, a kind of contemptuous independence of the rest; while turbulent Ephraim, occupying the centre of the land, was little disposed to settle in a secondary position. Besides, the sanctuary so long at Ephraimite Shiloh was now transferred to Jerusalem, locally Benjamite, but actually appropriated by the house of Judah. Both the civil and religious authority of the people had thus passed from Ephraim. The smouldering embers of discontent, therefore, temporarily stifled by the power of David and the splendour of Solomon, were quite prepared to blaze out so soon as the sceptre fell into weaker hands. Rehoboam was not only weak, he was contemptibly foolish; and therefore an Israelitish monarchy speedily arose, at the head of which was a king of the house of Joseph. To Judah adhered the single tribe of Benjamin; and it was but the fragment of an empire which ever after was ruled by the house of David (1 Kings xii. 16, 17). Had Rehoboam possessed common sense, he might still after the rupture have been a powerful king. He did indeed try to adopt some salutary measures. He fortified a good many of his towns (2 Chron. xi. 5-12); and, as the priests and Levites generally resorted to him, and various of the better-minded of the other tribes (13-16), and as Simeon seems to have been incorporated with Judah, and some of the Danite cities were possessed (though Beth-el and perhaps a few other portions of Benjamin were for a while held by Israel), and, moreover, as the southern state was more compact and defensible, less exposed to hostile neighbours, Rehoboam might have reigned in peace and security. But by his foolish disobedience he provoked the Lord's anger; and so Shishak, king of Egypt, swept like a storm from the desert over his dominions, plundered Jerusalem, carried off the wealth of the temple, and left the king of Judah humiliated and impoverished (xii. 1-10).

For the first three reigns Judah was generally in an attitude of hostility to Israel. Rehoboam, indeed, had been checked at a time when perhaps he might have succeeded in subjecting the northern kingdom (xi. 1-4); but a great battle was fought between Abijah and Jeroboam, in which the latter was signally defeated (xiii.). Asa was successful against an Ethiopian host—the only time in which a Hebrew king fought face to face with one of the then-great powers of the world, and prevailed (xiv.); and, though he was disturbed by the Israelites, and sought against them the dangerous help of Syria, yet on the whole the power of Judah was consolidated: there was a drain of the better class from the northern kingdom, various outlying cities and districts were occupied (xiii. 19, xv., xvi.), Edom subdued by David had continued faithful to his house, and, with the temple-service as a central influence, the regular ministrations of the priests, no violent change of dynasty, practical reforms carried out, and on the whole God nationally honoured, Judah was prosperous, very populous, and, by the possession of the Red sea ports, able to carry on a lucrative commerce. The extent of its territory may be estimated at about 3,435 square miles.

Such was Judah when the pious Jehoshaphat succeeded to the crown. His reign was happy and successful (xvii., xix., xx.); but he took a false step which entailed disgrace and disaster on his family for several generations. The Israelitish royal family personally obnoxious to the kings of Judah had long ago disappeared; and a new dynasty swayed the northern sceptre. Jehoshaphat was prevailed on to make alliance with one of their princes, Ahab, against Syria, and in evil hour he took Ahab's daughter for a wife to his son (1 Kings xxii.; 2 Chron. xviii.). A series of calamities followed. The worldly leaven worked. Weak and wicked princes sat on the throne. Edom revolted: the royal family were almost extirpated; Athaliah (Ahab's daughter) usurped the crown; and, when the right heir was restored, he ruled justly only so long as the priest Jehoiada lived, and then saw his kingdom desolated, and was slain by conspirators (xxi.-xxiv.). The early gleam of prosperity in Amaziah's reign was soon quenched: Jerusalem was taken and plundered by the king of Israel; and Amaziah, like his father, was the victim of a conspiracy among his own subjects (xxv.). The process of declension was now rapid. If stayed for a while by the early prudence of Uzziah, by the efforts of the godly Hezekiah, by the reforms of the lamented Josiah, he went on with accelerated pace under the rule of headstrong Ahab, ferocious Manasseh, and Josiah's miserable children (xxvi.—xxxvi.). Heavy clouds darkened the sky. Syria was confederate with Israel to destroy Judah. And then a mightier power stepped forward: Assyria was gradually absorbing all the neighbouring states. The kingdom of Israel fell. And, though Judah seems to have had some authority afterwards over the country of the ten tribes, it could have been only delegated. Her king was but a vassal to a foreign power. Through the last sad years of her existence she was dependent now on Egypt, now on Babylon. And then came the catastrophe, precipitated by the wicked folly of the reigning prince. The country was ravaged: Jerusalem was burnt with fire; that holy and beautiful house where Jehovah's glory had dwelt was laid in ashes. One brief throb of existence there was afterwards; and then Judah was no more (2 Kings xxiv., xxv.; Jer. xxxix.—xli.).

The restoration of the city and temple, and the re-construction of the commonwealth are noted elsewhere. See JERUSALEM, TEMPLE.

So was the word of the Lord fulfilled. He preserved a lamp to his servant David; but, when warnings, expostulations, mercies, and chastisements produced no effect, Zion was 'ploughed as a field, and Jerusalem' became 'heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of the forest' (Mic. iii. 12).

The sovereignty of Judah was hereditary in the family of David (with the brief exception of Athaliah's usurped rule); but it did not always devolve upon the eldest son. A separate list of the kings is unnecessary here: one will be found combined with that of the monarchs of Israel in another article: see KING.

The history of Judah during and after the captivity is briefly sketched elsewhere: see ALEXANDRIA, CAPTIVITY, DISPERSION, HERODIAN FAMILY, JERUSALEM, JEWS, MACCABEES.

For the explanation of a somewhat-puzzling mention of Judah in Josh. xix. 34, see NAPHTALI; but it may be that there is some transcriber's error in the place.

2. One, apparently a Levite, whose sons took part in setting forward the workmen at the re-building of the temple (Ezra iii. 9). Possibly he is the same with Hodaviah (ii. 40).—3. A Levite who had married a foreign wife (x. 23).—4. A Benjamite (Neh. xi. 9).—5. A Levite who had returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (xii. 8).—6, 7. Persons who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (34, 36). Some of these may have been identical.

JU'DAS (id.).—1 (Matt. i. 2, 3). The patriarch Judah.—2. The faithless apostle who betrayed his Master (x. 4; Mark iii. 19; Luke vi. 16). He was Simon's son (John vi. 71), and is called Iscariot; but critics are not agreed as to the interpretation of this name. The most probable conjecture is that Judas had it from his birth-place, perhaps from Kerioth in Judah (Josh. xv. 25), or from Kartan, or Kartah, in Galilee (xxi. 32, 34).

Of this man's earlier life we know nothing, nor for what reason he was induced to follow Jesus. It might be the mere curious admiration of the great Teacher, or there might have been (who shall say?) some better aspirations at one time in his heart, some gracious drawings from above, which to his own condemnation he resisted and ultimately quenched. Of the motives of our Lord in appointing Judas an apostle little need be said. His divine eye read the traitor's heart from the beginning; and it was some time before the final catastrophe that Jesus expressed his knowledge of Iscariot's character (John vi. 64, 70, 71). But, in the calling of this evil one to so high a place of privilege, our Lord acted only in accordance with the general administration of his kingdom. This is illustrated by one of his parables (Matt. xiii. 24-30); and it is no more than we continually see, ungodly men in place and power, both in the world and in the church, with gifts which they abuse and responsibilities which increase their condemnation. It has often been a puzzle to those who did not understand the moral government of God (comp. Psal. lxxiii.); but he will eventually vindicate his wisdom and his justice; and, meanwhile, the most valuable lessons of warning and circumspection are taught by the fate of such as have perverted their privileges to their own most fatal ruin.

Judas maintained a fair character among his fellow-apostles, and was entrusted with the custody of their money (John xii. 6, xiii. 29); nor do they seem to have suspected him even when our Lord was distinctly apprising them that one of their number would betray him (Matt. xxvi. 21-24; John xiii. 22). As to Judas himself, he had probably no very definite plans formed. He was selfish and greedy, dishonest in regard to the money under his control. His affected concern for the poor was merely that he might have greater opportunity of speculation. Some have imagined that, disappointed that his Master did not assume the kingly authority of Messiah, he resolved on taking a step which should drive matters to a crisis, and force Jesus to act for his own preservation, and that the traitor perhaps believed that his Lord would thank him afterwards for what he had done. But this view is not in accordance with his fraudulent character, or with his eager question to the priests, 'What will ye give me?' (Matt. xxvi. 15). More likely he was tired of following Jesus, and, feeling sure that He must some day fall under the powerful malice of the rulers, he resolved to make something of it, and get off with a worldly advantage. Satan espied his opportunity and took it (Luke xxii. 3). Probably Judas began to see that he was suspected, and, when the Lord, in answer to his hypocritical question, had distinctly told him of his treason, full of additional passion, he went recklessly about his work (Matt. xxvi. 25; John xiii. 26-30). He was fulfilling prophecy, but was unconscious of it. His own evil heart it was that prompted him; and therefore the guilt of his deed was upon himself.

It has been much questioned whether Judas was present at the institution of the eucharist. From the giving of the sop, the supper seems still to have been going on when he quitted the apartment (30). But it was not till 'after supper' that our Lord took the cup (Luke xxii. 20). And, if we suppose Matt. xxvi. 25 to correspond to John xiii. 26, just after which Judas went out, then his departure was before the eating was finished (Matt. xxvi. 26): see the point well stated by bishop Ellicott, Hist. Lect., lect. vii., p. 325, note 2.

The catastrophe soon followed. Judas got his pay, and conducted the officers to Jesus, marking him out to them by a treacherous kiss (Matt. xxvi. 47-50; Mark xiv. 43-46; Luke xxii. 47, 48; John xviii. 1-5). Doubtless he followed the divine prisoner to see the result, and had free access into the court; yet it is but a wild notion which some have entertained that he was the disciple who introduced Peter (15, 16).

When Jesus was condemned, then the pangs of remorse began to seize the miserable traitor. Now he knew what he had done; and the horror of eternal death was on him. He had intended with his money to buy some land, and had perhaps already bargained for it (see ACELDAMA); but now he rushed to the priests, threw down the accursed money, and in despair went and committed suicide (Matt. xxvii. 3-5; Acts i. 18). A discrepancy has been imagined between the two accounts of this; but they may without much difficulty be reconciled. It has been well said, 'The revolting details recorded are perfectly consistent with facts. In our own day, where executions are effected with comparative skill, criminals of large stature and bulk have, on the removal of the drop, suffered precisely what is here recorded of Judas; the internal viscera being suddenly shattered and ejected with great violence . . . without any external trace of injury but in the immediate region of the passage (see Journ. of Sac. Lit., Oct. 1853, pp. 160-162; Horne's Introduction, edit. Ayre, vol. ii. p. 479).

Little more can be said. In the prayer of the apostles, while appointing a successor, the traitor is said to have gone 'to his own place' (Acts i. 25). And our Lord yet more emphatically declared, 'It had been good for that man if he had not been born' (Matt. xxvi. 24).

3. One described as one of the Lord's brethren (xiii. 55), called also Juda (Mark vi. 3). An interesting story is related of his family, by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., lib. iii. capp. xix. xx.), out of Hegeippus. The emperor Domitian was alarmed by what he had heard of Messiah's kingdom, and ordered some of the descendants of the house of David to be sought out and brought to him. Those so presented to the emperor were the grandsons of Judas; but the hardness of their hands, proving that they were but ordinary peasants, and their description of the spiritual nature of the new sovereignty, removed all apprehensions. They were let go, and lived on, honoured as the Lord's relatives, into the reign of Trajan.—4. A brother of James, and one of the apostles, called also Thaddeus and Lebbeus (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 16; John xiv. 22; Acts i. 13). He was probably identical with No. 3, being Jude, the author of the epistle: see JAMES 2, JUDE. According to tradition he preached in Syria and Arabia, and was martyred in Persia.

5. Judas of Galilee, a leader of insurrection (Acts v. 37). According to Josephus (Antiq., lib. xviii. 1, §§ 1, 6), this man was a native of Gamala in Gaulanitis. He boldly declared it unlawful to acknowledge any foreign authority, and drew after him vast multitudes of followers; the insurrection beginning in Galilee, about 6 A.D. When he perished, though his adherents were dispersed, yet it seems that from them sprang the Zealots and Sicarii of later times.

6. A person dwelling in Straight-street in Damascus, to whose house Saul of Tarsus was conducted after the divine manifestation to him, and where he was visited by Ananias (Acts ix. 11, 17). Straight-street is supposed to be that now called the street of the bazaars: a house popularly said to be that of Judas is still shown.—7. A disciple, surnamed Barsabas, eminent in the early church, endued with the gift of prophecy. He was deputed by the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, with Silas, to accompany Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, carrying the decree of the council just held (xv. 22-33).

JUDAS—1. (1 Esdr. ix. 23). Judah (Ezra x. 23).

2. The third son of Mattathias, surnamed Maccabeus (1 Macc. ii. 4). After his father's death he was at the head of the Jewish patriots. He obtained several victories, and at length, 164 B.C., he reached Jerusalem, cleansed the sanctuary from the pollutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, and on the twenty-fifth of the month Casleu dedicated the new altar, built instead of the defiled one; the feast being kept eight days (iii., iv.). He afterwards punished the Idumeans and Ammonites, and conducted a successful campaign in the country of Gilead, and in Philistia (v.). Other exploits followed; but, perceiving that the Jews could not cope with the power of the Syrian kings, he sent ambassadors to Rome to negotiate an alliance with the great republic (vi., vii., viii.). Before the answer arrived, Judas was slain, 161 B.C. Bacchides and Alcimus had advanced into Judea with a large Syrian army: the troops of Judas were few, and many of them through fear deserted him; so that he fell, and the remnant thereupon dispersed. His brothers Jonathan and Simon buried him in their father's sepulchre at Modin, amid great and continued lamentation (ix. 1-22). See MACCABEES.

3. The son of Calphi, a Jewish captain (xi. 70).—4. A brother of John Hyrcanus, murdered by Ptolemeus (xvi. 2, 9, 14, 16).—5. (2 Macc. i. 10). It is doubtful who this person here intended was. Some have supposed him Judas Maccabeus.

JUDE. The writer of one of the epistles is so called in our translation. He designates himself 'the brother of James' (Jude 1), and must therefore be either that Judas the apostle who was brother of James the son of Alphaeus, or Judas brother of James the Lord's brother. But if, as there is reason to believe, the Lord's brother was James the apostle (see JAMES, 2), then Jude was both an apostle and also brother, i.e. cousin, to Jesus. One argument against this is taken from Jude's epistle (17), where he seems not to include himself among the apostles. This, however, cannot be deemed decisive. Little is recorded of Jude in scripture. See JUDAS, 3, 4.

JUDE, THE EPISTLE OF. That this epistle was penned by Jude, or Judas, who was one of the apostles, is here adopted as, on the whole, the more probable opinion. It is peculiarly a catholic epistle, for no special community is specifically addressed in it; it is, therefore, vain to conjecture who were meant. We can only say that there is a Jewish cast of thought; so that perhaps Jewish believers rather than Gentiles were in the author's mind. The place and time of writing are equally uncertain. But, as there is a remarkable similarity between this and Peter's second epistle (see PETER, THE EPISTLES OF), and this may be concluded the earlier of the two, we may perhaps imagine that it was composed 63 or 64 A.D.

The design of it is to warn against unbelieving men, licentious, and mockers, who had crept into the church, though it is doubtful whether any as yet occupied the place of teachers. The vile character of such is shown, as well as their impending destruction, by a reference to the fallen angels, to the people of Sodom and Gomorrah, and to other presumptuous sinners of old time. The faithful were not to be alarmed at such an out-break of evil: they had been apprised of its approach; but they must themselves persevere in faith and godliness, and seek to rescue others from the snares of the ungodly. The authority of this, as of several others of the catholic epistles, was not at first acknowledged; nor was Judé in the old Syriac translation. It is, however, cited by Tertullian as the work of Judas the apostle (De Hab. Mul., cap. 3), and by many other of the early fathers. There is now little question in regard to it.

The alleged references to apocryphal writings in this letter have caused some perplexity. Passing over the notice of the contention of Michael with the devil about the body of Moses (9), of which the most probable explanation is that there were facts well known in the church which yet no earlier inspired writer had chronicled (comp. Acts. xx. 35; 2 Tim. iii. 8), it must be admitted that there is an apocryphal book extant which contains the words of Jude 14, 15. This is called the book of Enoch; and if it were published before Jude wrote it would be hard to prove that he did not cite it. But the probability is that this apocryphal work was written at a later period; and therefore the author might draw his statements from tradition, or, it is not unlikely, from the epistle of Jude itself. See ENOCH, THE BOOK OF.

JUDGES. A certain judicial authority appears in very early times to have been exercised by the heads of families. The first recorded instance is when Judah sentenced his daughter-in-law Tamar to death for 'playing the harlot' (Gen. xxxviii. 24). We have no notice of any such jurisdiction during the residence of Israel in Egypt. The hand of their taskmasters was in all probability too heavy upon them. Had there been such, we should hardly find the whole burden of judging upon Moses in the wilderness. 'Elders,' it is true, there were (Exod. iv. 29); but these were, perhaps, rather the representatives than the magistrates of the people. And the 'officers' (v. 14), were simply to enforce the compelled labour. At length, at Jethro's suggestion, to relieve Moses, subordinates were appointed, perhaps the chiefs of families and tribes, to hear inferior matters, while those of special difficulty were reserved for the decision of Moses himself (xviii. 13-26; Deut. i. 9-18). Provision was made in the law for the continuance of such functionaries, with a charge to them to perform their duties conscientiously (xvi. 18-20). And it would seem that the priests and Levites exercised a concurrent, in some respects a superior, authority to the judges so appointed, as they were the expounders of the statutes according to which judgment must be given (xvii. 8-13, xxi. 5). Yet the priests are carefully distinguished from the 'judges' (xix. 17); and also, though the elders of a city are represented as judging (xxi. 18-21), yet the 'judges' are mentioned distinctly (2). We do not know how these magistrates were appointed, possibly selected from the general body of elders or heads of families; and to these Levites might perhaps be added; while occasionally the elders generally of a place might be appealed to and take part in the decision of a cause. Thus, Boaz would seem to have called on the first ten elders of Beth-lehem that passed the gate to settle the civil question of the inheritance of Elimelech and the marriage of Ruth (Ruth iv. 1-12). Sometimes the magistracy of a city is distinguished into 'princes' and 'elders' (Judges viii. 14); but whether they had really separate functions cannot be precisely determined.

Some of the 'judges,' of whom mention will afterwards be made, who were specially raised up to deliver Israel from servitude to neighbouring nations, would seem to have also administered civil and criminal justice, though inferior judges were still continued (Judges v. 10). And, when a king was appointed, doubtless he was the supreme judicial authority, consulting very probably on occasion the high priest as to the interpretation of the law; the right of asking counsel of God through the priest being claimed as a royal prerogative (Numb. xxvii. 24; Josh. xvii. 4; 1 Sam. xiv. 18, xxii. 10, 13, 15, xxiii. 6). In David's days the appeals to the king were numerous, and the decision of them slow, of which Absalom took advantage (2 Sam. xv. 2-6). It must not be supposed that there were no local or inferior judges at this period. They are referred to in a psalm attributed to David (Psal. lxxix. 12), as 'they that sit in the gate'; and judicial offices were specially assigned in his reign to certain Levites, perhaps the oldest of the body (1 Chron. xxiii. 4; comp. xxvi. 29, 30, 32). In later times we find a notice of provincial courts in Judah, and apparently a central tribunal in Jerusalem (2 Chron. xix. 5-11); while in Israel there were the elders of a city (see CITIES, COUNCIL)—the Levites had retreated into Judah—exercising capital jurisdiction (1 Kings xxi. 9-14). Instances of the administration of supreme judicial power by the sovereign personally, with or without assessors, are very numerous (e. g. 1 Sam. xxii. 16-18; 2 Sam. i. 13-16, iv. 9-12; 1 Kings ii. 23-34, 42-46, iii. 16-28, xxii. 26, 27; 2 Kings vi. 31, xiv. 5, 6; Jer. xxxviii. 4, 5).

After the captivity, various courts were by degrees established: see SANHEDRIM; and the synagogues exercised a judicial power: see SYNAGOGUE. Before such tribunals a more formal kind of procedure was used: advocates were employed, and customs adopted from the nations to whom the Jews had been or were subject.

The incorruptibility of judges is strongly enforced in various parts of scripture. They were to receive no bribes: they were to be no respecters of persons. They were neither to disregard the cry of the needy and oppressed, nor to court popularity by a vain pretence of being the friends of the people (Lev. xix. 15, 35; Deut. xvi. 19; Psal. lxxxiii. 11; Prov. xxiv. 23). Thus Samuel, on the appointment of a king, could fearlessly appeal to the nation that his administration had been pure (1 Sam. xii. 3-5); while his sons are stigmatized as having turned aside after lucre and perverted judgment (viii. 3). Repeated were the denunciations of the prophets against such corruption, and terrible the threats of deserved vengeance on such unrighteous rulers (Isai. i. 17, 23, 26, v. 7, x. 2, lvi. 1, lix. 4; Jer. v. 1, vii. 5-7, xxi. 12, xxii. 3, 4, 15-17; Ezek. xlv. 8, 9; Zech. vii. 9-14). See TRIAL.

The judges especially so called, who generally administered the affairs of Israel, from the settlement in Palestine till the erection of the monarchy, were magistrates, for the most part military leaders, to break the yoke of foreign oppressors, commissioned in some emergency, without any regular transmission of their authority. They were many of them men of faith and piety. Of some, however, little is recorded; and one, at least, Abimelech, raised himself to the office he held by violence and crime. To Eli alone the power seems to have come with no special divine call. His authority was exercised because he was the high priest. Several of these judges were acknowledged by only a portion of the people. They gained some victory in some particular district; and there alone they had jurisdiction. It is possible, indeed, that more than one were in office at the same time in different parts of the land. Some, as Gideon (Judges viii. 23), resigned their authority when the emergency was past; and scarcely any except Samuel governed all the tribes (1 Sam. iii. 20, iv. 1). And even he, in his judicial circuits, did not visit the distant northern or the trans-Jordanic provinces (vii. 15-17).

The number of these judges is differently reckoned, according as the wicked Abimelech is or is not included, and according as the list is confined to those mentioned in the book of Judges, or stretches on to those who judged Israel downwards to the monarchy. The last seems the best mode of reckoning. We may therefore number fifteen:—1. Othniel. 2. Ehud. 3. Shamgar. 4. Deborah (with Barak). 5. Gideon. 6. Abimelech. 7. Tola. 8. Jair. 9. Jephthah. 10. Ibzan. 11. Elon. 12. Abdon. 13. Samson. 14. Eli. 15. Samuel. Notices of each will be found under their respective names.

But then it is most difficult to fix the chronology of these magistrates. Some of the dates are left undetermined in the book of Judges; and the chronological notices which are found there and elsewhere (Judges xi. 26; 1 Kings vi. 1; Acts xiii. 20) are not easy to reconcile. Various theories have been propounded, which it is impossible to examine here: the reader must be referred to detailed systems of chronology. In order, however, to give some notion of the modes adopted of settling the succession, the following table is appended from Browne's Ordo Sæclorum, part 1. chap. v. sect. 3, pp. 280, 281; it being premised that Mr. Browne considers the true date of the exodus to have been 1586 B.C., and does not reckon in Abimelech. Allowing then 30 years from the death of Joshua, he proceeds—

- B.C.
- *1486. The first servitude; Cushan-rishathaim, of Mesopotamia, 8 years (Judges iii. 8).
1478. The first judge, Othniel, son of Kenaz (9). The land had rest 40 years (11).
1438. The second servitude; Eglon, of Moab, 18 years (14).
1420. The second judge, Ehud (16). Rest 80 years; during which time, after the death of Ehud, the third judge was Shamgar (30, 31).

- B.C.
1340. The third servitude; Jabin, of Canaan, 20 years (iv. 3).
1320. The fourth judge, Barak, 40 years (v. 31).
1280. The fourth servitude; the Midianites, 7 years (vi. 1).
1273. The fifth judge, Gideon, 40 years (viii. 28).
1233. Abimelech reigns 3 years (ix. 22).
1230. The sixth judge, Tola, 23 years (x. 1, 2).
1207. The seventh judge, Jair, 22 years (3).
1185. The fifth servitude; Philistines and Ammonites, 18 years (7, 8).
1167. The eighth judge, Jephthah, 6 years (xii. 7).
1161. The ninth judge Ibzan, 7 years (8, 9).
- (1157. Eli, high priest, 40 years).
1154. The tenth judge, Elon, 10 years (11).
1144. The eleventh judge, Abdon, 8 years (13, 14).
1136. The sixth servitude; Philistines, 40 years (xiii. 1).
- The twelfth judge, Samson, 20 years (xv. 20). The birth of Samson was announced during a time of Philistine oppression (xiii. 5), that is, while the Philistines were oppressing the south and west, and the Ammonites the east (x. 7). At the beginning of the sixth servitude he might be between 20 and 30 years old.
1117. Autumn. The ark is taken: Eli dies. Somewhat earlier Samson is taken: the ark is in captivity 7 months, restored in the days of wheat-harvest (1 Sam. vi. 1, 13); hence the time of capture is defined. The return of the ark must have preceded Samson's death and the great overthrow of the lords of the Philistines. Perhaps the great sacrifice to Dagon, in Gaza, besides its connection with the rejoicing on account of the capture of Samson (Judges xvi. 23), may have been intended as a celebration of the deliverance from the plagues (1 Sam. v., vi.)

JUDGES, THE BOOK OF. This book has its name because it contains an account of the Israelites, from the death of Joshua, under the administration of various persons raised up from time to time to deliver them from foreign oppression, or to regulate their internal affairs, and generally called judges, till the time of the high priest Eli. It is not a connected history relating everything that happened: long periods (see iii. 30, v. 31 and other places) are often passed over without notice. But, as we find elsewhere in scripture narrative, individual persons are brought forward as the central figures around which the events of their times may be grouped. The scope and intention of these records is indicated in Judges ii. 6-23: it was to depict theocracy, to exhibit the relation of God to his people, and of the people towards him and with each other, during the first term of their enjoyment of the promised land, to show how the covenant Lord dealt in judgment and in mercy for the warning and instruction of future ages. It may be read as a living commentary upon the inspired maxim: 'Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people' (Prov. xiv. 34).

The book of Judges consists of two principal parts; I. i.—xvi., II. xvii.—xxi. In the first we have, after an introduction, i. 1—iii. 4, an account of the oppressions of the Israelites, and their deliverances; in the second, the story of two particular disgraceful internal events.

Modern critics have been zealous in their attempts to dismember this book. The parts, they say, do not agree: thus in Judges i. 18 we find Judah seizing Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron, while in iii. 3 five lords of the Philistines (those of the three cities just named being included) are said to be left unsubdued. Again, it is urged that i. 1 begins very naturally 'after the death of Joshua,' but that a single writer was never likely to commence again (ii. 6-10), with what the people did when Joshua, the war being ended, let them go to their several possessions (Bleek, Einleitung in das A. T., pp. 344, &c.). But these are not very formidable objections. In all campaigns, especially under circumstances similar to those of the Israelites occupying Canaan, towns and districts are taken and ravaged by one party, and afterwards recovered and held by the other. There is no improbability, therefore, in the statement that the Philistine cities were at one time in the hands of Judah, or that Jerusalem was burnt (Judges i. 8), and yet that somewhat later the lords of the Philistines again made head, and that the Jebusites were in possession of Jerusalem. For surely, if for their sins foreign nations, Moab, Ammon, Midian, were permitted to enslave the Israelites, the remnant of the original inhabitants of Canaan would have ample opportunity of regaining at least some of their fortresses. And, as to the alleged two beginnings, the critics have failed to see that the historian describes, very naturally, two different relations of the people, i. 1—ii. 5, that to the Canaanites, ii. 6—iii. 4, that to their own theocratic King. Both these views were necessary for the full understanding of what was to follow. With regard to xvii.—xxi., it certainly does seem that these chapters stand apart from the preceding narrative, in which, generally speaking, chronological sequence is observed, while the two stories found here are not in the order of time in relation to what had been before chronicled. Much stress cannot, indeed, be laid on this, because the events are of internal history, not the strifes of the nation with external foes, and a writer might very well think it best to place them by themselves. But, further, there is some difference of diction; and, if that could be accounted for, yet the date of the composition can hardly be the same in both parts. In xiii. 1 the length of Israel's subjection to the Philistines is stated. It was terminated by Samuel's victory (1 Sam. vii. 1-14), until after which of course the history was not written. But it must have been written (see Judges i. 21) before the seventh year of David, when (2 Sam. v. 6-9) that king occupied Jerusalem. The Jews ascribe the composition to Samuel, and, as it would seem to fall in the life-time of that prophet, there is no improbability in supposing him the author; who used, no doubt (see Deborah's song, Judges v.), written documents.

But the appendix, so to call it, must be placed later. It is repeatedly said (xviii. 1, xix. 1, xxi. 25) that there was then 'no king in Israel.' The natural inference is that the writer lived in the time of the kingdom. But it was probably not far on; for there is no hint of the separation into two states: it might therefore be in the reign of Solomon, perhaps a century later than the composition of the first part. And it may be observed that this second part is simply an appendix to the first: there is no indication that the later writer touched the work of the earlier: the two are just put together. It must in fairness be said that the expression (xviii. 30) argues to many a later date for the appendix. If 'the captivity of the land' means the Assyrian deportation, doubtless the history could not have been written earlier than 721 B.C.; but it is possible that the carrying off of the ark by the Philistines may be intended (comp. Psal. lxxviii. 61). And it is not very likely that David and Solomon would have left the unhallowed worship at Dan without interference. The explanation (Judges xxi. 12), 'Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan,' does not prove that the section was written by a foreigner, or out of Palestine: it is only to mark the situation of Shiloh as distinguished from Jabesh-gilead, which was to the east of the Jordan. It is very difficult to settle the chronology of the book of Judges. See the last article.

There is a valuable old commentary on this book by Peter Martyr, English translation, 1564.

JUDGMENT, JUDGMENTS. Properly the decision of a judge (Deut. xvii. 9). And, as this ought to be a just decision, judgment is put for equity, or justice (Psal. lxxii. 2, cxix. 66): judgments signify also the right ways or statutes of the Lord (102). Very frequently the term implies the punishment inflicted by sentence (2 Chron. xxii. 8; Ezra vii. 26; Prov. xix. 29); God's final condemnation of sinners (Rom. ii. 5; Jude 15); the plagues which he brings upon the wicked in this world (Exod. vi. 6); or the moderation in which he afflicts his people (Jer. x. 24). Some other shades of meaning occur, easily explained by the context.

JUDGMENT, THE DAY OF. God is called 'the Judge of all the earth' (Gen. xviii. 25); and it is reasonable to suppose from the very notion we are taught to form of him that he will righteously administer his dominions. In the world, however, the ungodly are often seen to prosper, and the righteous to be oppressed. And this has sometimes grievously perplexed God's servants, who have not known how to reconcile the fact with his holy justice (Psal. lxxiii.). Scripture, therefore, points onward to a time when all these apparent anomalies will be explained, when a great assize will sit, and a just recompense of reward will be meted out to men (Eccles. xi. 9, xii. 14; Acts xxiv. 25). This judgment, we are told, shall be exercised by Christ (x. 42, xvii. 31; Rom. xiv. 10). Men might be judged either individually, each on his departure from the world, or collectively. Scripture gives us reason to believe that the latter will be the course of God's procedure (Matt. xxv. 31-46; Rev. xx. 12, 13); and a day is spoken of, sometimes called the 'last day' (John xi. 24), sometimes the 'great day' (Jude 6), when this shall be. The space of time to be so occupied it is impossible for us to calculate: about the nearness or distance of that day it is useless to speculate (Matt. xxiv. 36): it will be a strict and searching judgment (xii. 36); so that the practical lesson we have to learn is, to be prepared, to judge ourselves, that we be not judged and condemned of the Lord (1 John ii. 28, iv. 17).

JUDGMENT-HALL (John xviii. 28, 33, xix. 9). Pilate's residence at Jerusalem, the 'pavement' where his tribunal was erected being without. That mentioned in Acts xxiii. 35 was a part of the palace erected by Herod at Cæsarea. See PRÆTORIUM.

JUDITH (Jewess). One of the wives of Esau (Gen. xxvi. 34). See AEOLIBAMAH.

JUDITH (id.). The heroine of the apocryphal book noticed in the next article. She is painted as a beautiful, bold, unscrupulous character, her piety ritualistic, her courage cruel (Judith viii.—xvi.). It is needless further to describe a person, of whose very existence there is little probability.

JUDITH, THE BOOK OF. This apocryphal work professes to relate the history of a great deliverance of the Jews from the Assyrians by the instrumentality of Judith. The narrative is agreeably written; but, though some critics have imagined that it carries with it an air of truth, yet when examined there are difficulties chronological, historical, and geographical so great that its authority is now all-but universally given up. It does not, however, by any means follow that it was written without a purpose. It may have been intended by an allegorical representation to stir up the Jews to a bold resistance against the enemies that then threatened them. Perhaps the names introduced, Judith, a Jewess, the daughter of Judah, Bethulia, the virgin of Jehovah, &c., may be taken to strengthen this view. Too much stress, however, Hebrew names being generally significant, must not be laid on this. The original language of the book was probably the vernacular Syro-Chaldee of Palestine at the time of its composition. And from it the existing Greek text seems to have been translated. Of this Greek there is a Syriac version extant. The Latin text is of a different cast, with various additions, transpositions, and omissions. Jerome in making his translation would seem to have taken the old Latin as the basis of his work, though he used a copy of the book in Chaldee. It is from the Greek, it may be added, that the English version was made: Luther's version follows the Latin text. As to the date of this book, it may be assigned to the first, or with yet greater probability to the second, century before Christ. The author was, no doubt, a Palestinian Jew. It is referred to by Clement of Rome (Epist. i. 55), and by several subsequent early writers. There is a sensible paper on the book of Judith in the Journal of Sac. Literature, July 1856, pp. 342-363.

JU'EL.—1 (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Uel (Ezra x. 34). —2 (1 Esdr. ix. 35). Joel (Ezra x. 43).

JU'LIA (feminine of Julius). A Christian female at Rome whom St. Paul salutes (Rom. xvi. 15). She was perhaps the wife or sister of Philologus. Some believe the name that of a man, Julias.

JU'LIUS. A centurion of AUGUSTUS' BAND (which see), under whose charge St. Paul was conveyed to Rome (Acts xxvii., xxviii.). He was courteous to the apostle, and may be the same with Julius Priscus, subsequently prefect of the Prætorian guards (Tacitus, Hist., lib. iv. 11). See Wieseler, Chronol. des Apost. Zeitalt., note, pp. 389-393.

JU'NIA (for Junillus or Junianus). A Christian at Rome, whom St. Paul speaks of with Andronicus as his kinsmen, i.e. of the same tribe, of note among the apostles, and in Christ before himself (Rom. xvi. 7). Some have imagined the name that of a female; but this is less likely.

JUNIPER. The word so translated (1 Kings xix. 4, 5; Job xxx. 4; Psal. cxx. 4) is generally understood to be a species of broom, Genista monosperma. It is a leguminous plant, and bears a white flower. It grows in Spain, Portugal, and Palestine, and is abundant in the desert of Sinai, where it affords shade and protection to travellers. The roots are bitter, and could be eaten only in extreme hunger: they are much valued by the Arabs for charcoal. Dr. Thomson imagines that the roots were used only to cook the mallows which are described as cut in the same place (Job xxx. 4). 'This,' he says, 'would give a sense in accordance with the known use of these roots, and still preserve the connection with the food of the poor' (The Land and the Book, p. 611).

JU'PITER. The heathen god worshipped by the Greeks under the name of Zeus. He was supposed to exercise supreme power; but the actions attributed to him were frequently in the highest degree sensual and abominable. Antiochus Epiphanes dedicated the temple at Jerusalem to this deity as Zeus Olympius, that on Gerizim to him as Zeus Xenius, the 'defender of strangers' (2 Macc. vi. 2). He is two or three times mentioned in the New Testament (Acts xiv. 12, 13, xix. 35).

JU'SHAB-HE'SED (whose love is returned). A descendant of the line of David (1 Chron. iii. 20).

JUSTICE. A high divine attribute (Psal. lxxxix. 14); according to which God acts in the government of the universe (Gen. xix. 25). His justice is seen in his holding to his covenant himself (1 John i. 9), and in his punishing those that disobey his commands (Exod. xxiii. 7). Some have regarded the divine justice in two lights, as legislative, laying down just and righteous laws, and distributive, dealing with creatures according to those laws; while justice, as applied to men, is administrative, as exercised by those in authority (Deut. i. 16, 17), and commutative, as governing men's dealings one with another (Mic. vi. 8).

JUSTIFICATION. A forensic term used to imply the declaring or accounting of a person just or righteous before God. If any one were free from sin, if he perfectly obeyed God's commandments, he would naturally be pronounced, for he would really be, just, not exposed to the penalty of transgression (Rom. ii. 13). But mankind, as sinful, are not just in this sense, and cannot be so treated (Psal. cxliii. 2; Rom. iii. 19, 20, 23; 1 John i. 8). If, then, they are to be freed from the condemnation of sin, if they are to be dealt with as those not amenable to God's law, it must be not by the establishment of their innocence, but by the remission of their guilt. And it was for this that the Lord Jesus Christ came into the world, and offered himself a sacrifice for sin, that men might be delivered from the condemnation into which their sins had cast them (Rom. iii. 24, 25; 2 Cor. v. 21; 1 John i. 7, ii. 2). The scripture therefore teaches that we are justified by faith in Christ (Rom. iii. 28; Gal. ii. 16). This doctrine is thus expressed in the eleventh article of the Anglican church: 'We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort.' The originating cause of justification is God's free grace and loving pity for a fallen world (John iii. 16; Rom. v. 8; Eph. ii. 4-8). The meritorious cause is the sinless life and sacrificial death of Christ (Rom. iv. 25), for the virtue of which God could without moral fault, or detriment to justice, remit sin. The instrumental cause is faith, whereby we receive the atonement, accepting God's mercy on the terms on which he offers it (iii. 30, v. 11). Those who are so justified are at peace with God, and have all the advantages of such a state of reconciliation (1, 2). Justified men desire and endeavour to walk in holiness of life (viii. 1). Gratitude for the mercy received will incline them to do that which is well-pleasing in God's sight. They feel that they have been purchased to be his, and must glorify him in their body and their spirit (2 Cor. vi. 20). This will be their mark, the token, the proof that they are no longer enemies, but friends, not sentenced culprits, but beloved children. Should any not so walk and act, they cannot be God's children. And, if they profess to have faith in Christ, it is a mere pretence. Such a faith as theirs, a faith which worketh not by love, is empty and useless (James i. 17, 26). Abraham's obedience was the proof that he possessed that faith which was counted to him for righteousness (21-23): comp. art. 12.

Of justification, then, it may be briefly said that (1) its source is the grace of God, (2) its ground the mediatorial work of Christ, (3) faith the way by which we receive it, and (4) the holy life of a believer the evidence of its possession; or, yet more briefly, it is originally by grace, meritoriously by Christ, instrumentally by faith, evidentially by good works: comp. Homily on Salvation.

JUS'TUS (just).—1. A surname of Joseph, called Barsabas (Acts i. 23). See JOSEPH, 10.—2. A Christian at Corinth with whom Paul lodged (xviii. 7). Some versions here read Titus.—3. A surname of Jesus, one of St. Paul's fellow-labourers (Col. iv. 11). See JESUS, 3.

JUT'TAH (extended). A city in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 55), afterwards allotted to the priests (xxi. 16). It is now a village called Yutta. Conjectures have been hazarded that this was the birth-place of John the Baptist (Luke i. 39).

K

KAB'ZEEL (which God gathers). A city of Judah (Josh. xv. 21; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20), called also Jekabzeel. Wilton would place it at Ain el-Arūs, at the confluence of the Wady el-Kuseib and other streams in the Sabkha (The Negeb, pp. 69-72).

KA'DES (Judith i. 9).

KA'DESH (sacred) or KA'DESH-BAR'NEA (sacred desert of wandering?). A place, town, or district, in the south of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 4; Josh. x. 41), in the desert of Zin (Numb. xx. 1, xxvii. 14; xxxiii. 36; Deut. xxxii. 51) on the border of Edom (Numb. xx. 16), not far from Gerar (Gen. xx. 1). There was a fountain here called En mishpat (fountain of judgment) (xiv. 7); and some have imagined a shrine or an oracle at the place. Abraham sojourned in the neighbourhood; and it was from Kadesh that Moses sent the spies to traverse the land of Canaan; and thither they returned, bringing an evil report of it (Numb. xiii. 3, 26, xxxii. 8). There, too, it was that the waters of Meribah flowed when the children of Israel, towards the end of their wanderings, strove with the Lord, and Moses and Aaron did not sanctify him and were consequently excluded from the promised land (xx. 1, 13). Kadesh is also marked as the southern border of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 3); it is most probably the Kedesh of 23.

Some difficulty has been found in identifying the site of Kadesh. Dr. Stanley, strangely enough, places it at Petra. A more reasonable supposition is that of Dr. Robinson, who considers that it must have been in the western part of the Arabah south of the Dead sea, perhaps not far from the fountain 'Ain el-Weibeh, the most frequented watering-place in that region (Bibl. Res., vol. ii. pp. 173-176, 194, 2nd edit.). But the discovery of Mr. Rowlands would seem to set the question at rest. He finds Kadesh at 'Ain el-Kadeis, about twelve miles east-south-east of Moilahi, the ancient Beer-lahai-roi (William's Holy City, vol. i. pp. 466-468). This supposition, though disputed by Dr. Robinson (ubi supr., note), is adopted by Mr. Wilton (The Negeb, pp. 6, 7). See also Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Kadesch.' The wilderness of Kadesh or Zin is the modern Wady Murreh.

KAD'MIEL (one before God, i.e. minister of God).—1. A Levite whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 40; Neh. vii. 43, xii. 8). His family was represented in the days of Joiakim (24).—2. A Levite, perhaps the representative of the same family, who took part in a solemn service of humiliation, and afterwards sealed the covenant (ix. 4, x. 9).

KAD'MONITES (orientals). A people, dwelling, it may be supposed, in the east (Gen. xv. 19). Perhaps they comprise the nations generally, 'children of the east,' who extended from Canaan to the Euphrates. Dr. Thomson says that the name is still preserved among the Nusairiyeh north of Tripoli, and that there is a tradition among them that their ancestors were expelled by Joshua. Their physiognomy and manners impressed him with the idea that they were a remnant of the ancient inhabitants of the country (The Land and the Book, p. 164).

KAL'LAI (swift messenger of Jehovah). One of the priests in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 20).

KANAH (place of reeds).—1. A town in the territory of Asher (Josh. xix. 28). It is said to be now a village not far from Tyre, bearing its original name, with about 2,000 inhabitants, though there is a doubt as to the identification. In a ravine near are some curious sculptures on the face of the rocks, figures of men, women, and children, rudely carved, which Dr. Thomson supposes the work of early Phœnician artists. Ancient oil-presses abound here, giving proof that the olive was once largely cultivated.—2. A river or stream at the border of Ephraim and Manasseh (xvi. 8, xvii. 9); it is probably now the Akhdar, falling into the sea near Cæsarea.

KARE'AH (balā). The father of Johanan and Jonathan, two of the chiefs with Gedaliah after the taking of Jerusalem (Jer. xl. 8, 13, 15, 16, xii. 11, 13, 14, 16, xlii. 1, 8, xliii. 2, 4, 5). In 2 Kings xxv. 23 it is Careah.

KARKA'A (a foundation, bottom). A place in the southern border of Judah (Josh. xv. 3). Wilton would place it in the Wady el-Khuridizeh (The Negeb, pp. 162-168).

KAR'KOR (foundation). A place east of the Jordan, in the regions occupied by nomad tribes, where the remnant of the Midianitish army, under Zebah and Zalmunna encamped, believing themselves safe, when Gideon fell upon them, routed them, and succeeded in capturing the chiefs (Judges viii. 10).

KARNA'IM (two horns). See ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

KAR'TAH (city). A town locally in Zebulun, allotted to the Levites of the family of Merari (Josh. xxi. 34).

KAR'TAN (double city). A city of Naphtali, allotted to the Levites of the family of Gershon (Josh. xxi. 32). It is probably the same with Kirjathaim (1 Chron. vi. 76).

KAT'TATH (small). A town in the territory of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15).

KE'DAR (dark-skinned). One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13), from whom an Arabian tribe descended. Various hints are supposed to be given in scripture of the locality and habits of this tribe, as to their dwellings, tents, and also villages or towns (Sol. Song i. 5; Isai. xlii. 11), their being a pastoral people, and supplying Tyre with sheep (ix. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 21), their prosperity (Isai. xxi. 16), their skill in archery (17), &c. It is thought that they must have lived at a distance from Palestine (Jer. ii. 10), and in the south as being contrasted with Mesech in the north (Psal. cxx. 5). But perhaps some of the inferences from these passages can hardly be sustained; especially as it is acknowledged that in process of time Kedar was put for Arabia generally. It would seem that the Kedarites suffered much at the hand of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xlix. 28-33). They have been identified in modern times with the nation of Harb in the northern part of the Hedjaz, where there is a town called Kedeyve (see Kalisch, Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., note, pp. 482, 483; Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Kedarener.')

KE'DEMAH (eastward). One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31).

KE'DEMOTH (antiquities). A city in the territory of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), assigned to the Levites (xxi. 37; 1 Chron. vi. 79). It gave name to the neighbouring wilderness (Deut. ii. 26).

KE'DESH (sanctuary).—1. A Canaanitish city, whose king Joshua smote (Josh. xii. 22). It was assigned to the tribe of Naphtali, hence was sometimes called Kedesh-naphtali, and was subsequently given to the Levites and made a city of refuge (xix. 37, xx. 7, xxi. 32; 1 Chron. vi. 76). Barak was a native of Kedesh (Judges iv. 6-11), and thither he summoned the northern tribes. In later times it was seized with the neighbouring district by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xv. 29). The modern village Küdes is four miles from the lake Merom, and stands upon a hill, where are many ruins, fragments of pillars, sarcophagi, and huge door-posts. Also in the mountain-cliffs to the southwest are many rock-tombs.—2. A place in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 23). See KADESH.—3. A Levitical city in Issachar (1 Chron. vi. 72). See KISHION.

KE'DRON. See KIDRON.

KEHE'LATHAH (convocation). One of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 22, 23).

KEI'LAH (fortress). A city in the plain country of Judah near the Philistine border (Josh. xv. 44). The inhabitants are disgracefully distinguished for endeavouring to betray David to Saul just after he had protected them from a Philistine invasion (1 Sam. xxiii. 1-13). The rulers of Keilah took part in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 17, 18). It is said to have been about eight miles east of Eleutheropolis towards Hebron. The name also occurs among the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 19), where it is not clear whether a place or a person is meant.

KELAI'AH (swift messenger of Jehovah). A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 23). He is also called KELI'TA (dwarf) (Ezra x. 23; Neh. viii. 7, x. 10).

KEM'UEL (assembly of God?).—1. One of the sons of Nabor Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 21).—2. A chief of Ephraim appointed one of those who were to superintend the division of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 24).—3. A Levite, whose son Hashabiah was ruler of the Levites in David's time (1 Chron. xxvii. 17).

KE'NAN (smith, perhaps lancer) (1 Chron. i. 2). See CAINAN, 1.

KENA'TH (possession). A town and district of Bashan, which Nobah took and called by his own name (Numb. xxxii. 42; Judges viii. 11); though this new appellation does not seem to have lasted. He possibly acted in conjunction with Jair. But the passage in 1 Chron. ii. 22, 23 may be more accurately translated, 'Geshur and Aram took the towns of Jair with Kenath,' and the notice refer to a later period. Kenath has been identified with Kumawât, where splendid ruins adorn the slopes of the Jebel Hauran.

KE'NAZ (a hunt).—1. A son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, 42; 1 Chron. i. 36, 53): he probably gave name to a region.—2. The father of Othniel (Josh. xv. 17; Judges i. 13, iii. 9, 11; 1 Chron. iv. 13). Some, taking the word 'son' in a general sense, would identify this Kenaz with no. 1.—3. A grandson of Caleb (15), called Uknaz in the margin.

KEN'EZITE. A designation given to Jephunneh the father of Caleb (Numb. xxxii. 12; Josh. xiv. 6, 14). Some have imagined this to be derived from an Edomitic ancestor, probably Kenaz, 1.

KE'NITE, KENITES (smiths, or dwellers in a nest). A nomadic tribe, first mentioned with those whose territories were promised to the seed of Abraham (Gen. xv. 19). Their principal seat seems to have been the rocky tracts on the south and south-west of Palestine, near the Amalekites (Numb. xxiv. 21, 22). Kalisch supposes that 'they may have spread in a western direction, to the land of Egypt; so that by their expulsion the frontiers of the promised land would have nearly touched the valley of the Nile' (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., pp. 371, 372). Probably those who lived near the Amalekites shared their sentiments of hostility to Israel. But it is clear that many of the tribe were accounted friendly, and were treated with marked favour by the Hebrews. Jethro was a Kenite; which indicates some connection between them and Midian, and his descendants were afterwards to be found in the north of Palestine (Judges i. 16, iv. 11, 17, v. 24). And even those that were dwelling in the south were carefully separated by Saul when he marched against the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 6). David maintained the same friendly relation with the Kenites (xxx. 29). Possibly they had embraced the Israelitish religion, or at least were not idolaters. The house of the Rechabites were of this tribe (1 Chron. ii. 55), traced to an original ancestor Hemath.

Miss Corboux considers the Kenites a branch of the Emim, and supposes Sela, or Petra, the chief city of the principal division of the tribe (Journ. of Sac. Lit., Apr. 1852, pp. 80-89).

KEN'IZZITES (hunters). A Canaanitish tribe of which nothing is known (Gen. xv. 19). It cannot be supposed to have any connection with the Edomitish chief Kenaz.

KERCHIEF (Ezek. xiii. 18, 21). See HANDKERCHIEF. Kitto supposes that the kerchiefs placed on the head of every stature were a rich or peculiar veil or head-dress, with which females of every age who were brought to join the evil society of the women mentioned were decked. He connects the practice with the worship of Asarte, in whose figures there is always something remarkable about the head-dress (Pict. Bible, note on Ezek. xiii. 18).

KE'REN-HAP'PUCH (the pain-horn). Job's third daughter born after his restoration to prosperity (Job xlii. 14). See JEMIMA.

KER'IOTH (cities).—1. A city in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 25). Some have supposed this the birth-place of Judas Iscariot. It is probably the modern el-Kuryetein, to the south of Hebron. Most likely Kerioth-hezron is one name: see HEZRON.—2. A city of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 24, 41), called also Kiriath (Amos ii. 2). Perhaps the word is not a proper name, and should be translated 'the cities.'

KE'ROS (a weaver's comb). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 44; Neh. vii. 47).

KESI'TAH (weighed out). This Hebrew word occurs in three places, viz. Gen. xxxiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32, where it is rendered 'pieces of money,' or 'of silver,' 'lambs' marg., and Job xlii. 11, where we find simply 'piece of money.' The ancient versions generally translate 'sheep,' or 'lamb.' But the word does not occur elsewhere for sheep. And, besides, this would imply the practice of barter, whereas certainly purchases were made in those times by money, weighed out though not coined (see Gen. xxiii. 16, xlii. 35, xliii. 12, 15, 18, 21-23; comp. Acts vii. 16). It is possible indeed that, after the precious metals came into use as a medium of exchange, commodities might still be a measure of value. So that, as David purchased his wife Michal from Saul for two hundred Philistine foreskins, twice the number demanded (1 Sam. xviii. 25), a hunter might rate a possession at one hundred skins, an agriculturalist at one hundred lambs. Hence the word perhaps signified not a literal lamb, but the value of a lamb. It has been suggested indeed that Job's friends might, out of delicacy, instead of offering him money, present him with flocks and herds. But this supposition is negated by what follows: 'they gave each an ear-ring of gold,' possibly the ring-money which is known to have been anciently in use. Taking the kesitah, then, for money, the question is, What kind of money was it? and what connection had it with a lamb? Various replies have been given. Some have imagined that it was the standard value of a lamb. But that value would vary under different circumstances. Others therefore have believed that a lamb was stamped upon it; and coins have certainly been discovered bearing such an impress. But it cannot be proved that coined money was in use in Jacob's and Job's times; and the coins so stamped were those of Cyprus, of a far later date. Perhaps the most satisfactory solution is that the kesitah was a weight cast in the form of a lamb. Among the Egyptian monuments such weights are pictured, in the act of being used for weighing; weights also like bulls' heads; moreover, weights of lions have been found at Nineveh. See Carey, The Book of Job, notes on xlii. 11, pp. 420, 421, 486.

KETTLE (1 Sam. ii. 14). A boiler. In 2 Chron. xxxv. 13 the same word is rendered 'caldron;' in Job xli. 20; Psal. lxxxi. 6 a 'pot,' and in 2 Kings x. 7; Jer. xxiv. 2 a 'basket.'

KETU'RAH (incense). A 'wife' of Abraham, by whom he had six sons. These he sent away eastward into the east country (Gen. xxv. 1-6; 1 Chron. i. 32, 33), where probably the descendants of some of them were intermingled with elder clans. Notice of them will be found under their respective names. Keturah may have been a secondary wife or concubine, whom Abraham had taken prior to Sarah's death, as after that event there was hardly time, during the patriarch's life, for so many sons to be born, to grow up to manhood, and to be settled in their respective abodes. Besides, Abraham's vigour is said to have failed long before (Rom. iv. 9; Heb. xi. 12): see Bush, Notes on Genesis, pp. 260, 261).

KEY. Keys and locks in Palestine are very frequently now, and were doubtless in old time, large, and both of them made of wood. But the handle is sometimes of brass or silver, ornamented with filagree work. Ancient keys are described as crooked, bent into the shape of a sickle, and like it borne on the shoulder. If there is a bunch to be carried, they hang down, some before, others behind. A single key is suspended by a handkerchief tied to the ring: it is then placed on the shoulder, while the handkerchief is in front. And there is a kind of proverbial expression in use to designate a man's consequence when it is said that he carries the key. Hence we see how a key in scripture is a symbol of authority, and a bestowal of keys is equivalent to the entrusting any one with a weighty charge (Isai. xxii. 22; Matt. xvi. 19; Rev. i. 18, iii. 7, ix. 1, xx. 1). There is a somewhat-similar custom among ourselves, certain officers of state receiving on appointment a golden key. A censure is recorded against taking away 'the key of knowledge' (Luke xi. 52), the right understanding of the law and the prophets, which Jewish expounders perverted, shutting, so to speak, the door of the kingdom of heaven against themselves and others who would enter.

KEZI'A (cassia). Job's second daughter, born after his restoration to prosperity (Job xlii. 14). See JEMIMA.

KEZIZ (cut off). The valley of Keziz is mentioned among the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 21).

KIB'ROTH-HATTA'AVAH (graves of longing). One of the stations of Israel in the wilderness, where they murmured for flesh-meat, and where quails were sent them; but while the flesh was between their teeth a great plague destroyed them, and many were buried there (Numb. xi. 31-35, xxxiii. 16, 17; Deut. ix. 22).

KIBZA'IM (two heaps). A Levitical city, locally in the territory of Ephraim (Josh. xxi. 22). In the corresponding list we find Jokmeam (1 Chron. vi. 68).

KID. The young of the GOAT, which see KID'RON (the turbid). A stream, called also Kedron and Cedron (2 Sam. xv. 23; 1 Kings ii. 37, xv. 13; 2 Kings xxxiii. 4, 6, 12; 2 Chron. xx. 16, xxix. 16, xxx. 14; Jer. xxxi. 40; John xviii. 1), running in the valley of Jehoshaphat, eastward of Jerusalem, between the city and the mount of Olives. Its channel is generally dry, except sometimes during the winter, or after heavy rains; but, when swollen by torrents, it flows with great impetuosity. The ravine of the Kidron, after passing the village of Siloam, branches off in the direction of the Dead sea. It is of the wildest character; and in it the celebrated monastery of Santa Saba is situated. Dr. Robinson thus traces it to its outlet at the Dead sea: 'The deep and almost-impassable ravine of the Kidron, running down by Mar Saba, and thence called Wady er-Rahib, "monks' valley," but here also bearing the name of Wady en-Nar, "fire valley." At this place (on the western border of the lake) it was running ESE. in a deep narrow channel, between perpendicular walls of rock, as if worn away by the rushing waters between these desolate chalky hills. There was, however, no water in it now; nor had there apparently been any for a long time' (Bibl. Res., vol. i. pp. 268, &c.).

Mr. Grove is disposed to believe that the Kidron was 'the brook that ran through the midst of the land,' the spring-head of which Hezekiah stopped so effectually (2 Chron. xxxii. 4) that the ancient bed has since been generally dry' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 14).

KIKA'JON (Jonah iv. 6, marg.). See GOULD.

KI'NAH (a song of mourning, lamentation). One of the cities in the extreme south of remove and put to death his immediate officers and courtiers; but even of these some will be too powerful to be touched, as David, for example, found that he could not punish Joab. Neither must he, without some colourable pretext, invade the property or take the life of private citizens. So Ahab did not venture to seize Naboth's vineyard till a corrupt tribunal had condemned him (xxi.). No one in fact could retain authority if there was a general sense of insecurity under his reign (see Juvenal, Sat. iv. 153, 154). It would seem that there were great officers of state, besides the commander-in-chief, enumerations of whom are frequently given, such as the recorder, the steward of the house, the scribe, the king's friend, the tax-gatherer, the counsellors, the captain of the body guard, &c. (2 Sam. viii. 16-18, xv. 12, 37, xx. 23-26; 1 Kings iv. 3-6; 1 Chron. xxvii. 32-34); and there were princes, either these officers or other men of rank, whose influence the king felt he could not withstand (Jer. xxxviii. 4, 5). Yet with all these deductions the authority of an Israelitish king was very great. He was the vicegerent of the Deity, specially anointed and enthroned, his person being on that account deemed sacred (1 Sam. x. 1, xvi. 13, xxiv. 6, 10, xxvi. 9; 1 Kings i. 39; Lam. iv. 20). He had also much ecclesiastical power, arranging the services of the sanctuary, and sometimes deposing the high priest (1 Kings ii. 26, 27; 1 Chron. xxiii.-xxvi.). The most effectual check to misgovernment seems to have been in the free expostulations of the prophets, who did not hesitate to rebuke the most powerful sovereigns, and who were dreaded by the worst (2 Sam. xii. 1-14; 1 Kings i. 11-14, xiii. 1-3, xiv. 5-16, xvi. 1-4, xvii. 1, xviii., xxi. 17-26; 2 Chron. xvi. 7-9, xix. 2, 3, xx. 37, and elsewhere). Sometimes, however, these bold monitors suffered for their faithful testimony (1 Kings xxii. 26, 27; Jer. xxvi. 20-23).

The magnificence of the Hebrew monarchs was great. That of Solomon is particularly described in 1 Kings x.; and the royal robes, and crown, and sceptre, &c., are elsewhere mentioned (xxii. 10; 2 Kings xi. 12; Psal. xiv. 6). They were approached with the deepest reverence; the most powerful subjects, and even prophets, bowing before them to the ground (2 Sam. xiv. 22; 1 Kings i. 23). Their wives also did obeisance (16); they, however, bowed themselves to their mothers (ii. 19).

The sovereigns had several sources of revenue which must have sufficed for the maintenance of their state. These were presents, or voluntary offerings, without which no man must approach them (1 Sam. x. 27, xvi. 20; 1 Kings x. 25); the produce of the royal demesnes over which certain officers were appointed, and the royal flocks (1 Sam. xxi. 7; 1 Chron. xxvii. 25-31; 2 Chron. xxxii. 28, 29); the tenth part of the produce of the fields and vineyards (1 Sam. viii. 15, 17); from which source it might be that victuals were provided for the royal household (1 Kings iv. 7-19). Perhaps there was a direct money-tax (x. 14: comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 35). There was, moreover, a portion of the spoil of conquered nations (2 Sam. viii. 1-14), on whom also tributes were imposed (1 Kings iv. 21; Psal. lxxii. 10). And then there were the customs levied on foreign merchants (1 Kings x. 15); with perhaps other powers of obtaining revenue or raising levies for public works (1 Sam. viii. 11-17; 1 Kings v. 13-16). The weight of all these imposts may be judged of by the popular discontent which led to the revolution under Jeroboam (xii. 1-19).

It may be added that the duties of a king were prescribed in the law (Deut. xvii. 14-20) (see KINGDOM), and that loyal obedience is inculcated in Rom. xiii. 1-7; 1 Pet. ii. 13-17).

KINGDOM. A state ruled by a single person. The commonwealth of Israel was a kingdom under the special government of the Deity, who is often called their King (Deut. xxxiii. 5; Judges viii. 23; 1 Sam. xii. 12); all human authorities being merely his lieutenants. When, therefore, the Hebrews demanded that the administration of their state should be assimilated to that of neighbouring nations, and God acceded to the request, he as paramount sovereign appointed conditions and limitations according to which men were to reign. There was, so to speak, a constitution prescribed, and this was written down and kept in sacred custody (x. 25). The king was to be a native Israelite: he was to be designated by God himself, who changed the dynasty at his will, enforcing by temporal success or disgrace the responsibility of the monarchs to himself. And the history evidently shows that he was most prosperous who had the truest conception of the relation in which he stood to Jehovah, as his vice-gerent ruling theocratically. These provisions were revealed to Moses to be the rule in times when a single man should be entrusted with the government of Israel as king (Deut. xvii. 14-20). Generally speaking, unless some sin provoked the Lord, the kingdom was hereditary, but not necessarily to be claimed by a deceased monarch's eldest son. The sovereignty of a female does not seem to have been contemplated. There is a sensible account of 'the law of the kingdom' given by Dr. Kitto, Daily Bible Illustrations, thirty-first week second day, in which, too, various disqualifications are enumerated, said by the Talmudists to preclude a man from being king in Israel.

The term 'kingdom' is often applied to the sovereign rule of God (see HEAVEN, KINGDOM OF); and Messiah pre-eminently was to have a kingdom that should not be moved.

KINGS, THE BOOKS OF. The two books of Kings follow and are closely connected with those of Samuel, carrying on the history of the chosen people from the point where the preceding record leaves it. They are not separate compositions—in fact, in the Hebrew canon they formed but a single book, in which the author has exhibited the progressive development of the theocracy, according to the principle of God's promise to David (2 Sam. vii. 12-16). This promise is the connecting thread; and its fulfilment is illustrated in the way in which God preserved an inheritance to David's family.

In the kingdom of the ten tribes the sceptre is seen passing from one to another, seized by bold usurpers, whose descendants retained it rarely above two or three generations; but David wanted not a man to sit upon his throne continually—a pregnant fact—a gracious assurance being therein conveyed of that everlasting kingdom which should be fully established in the person of David's greater Son, who was to have the heathen for his inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession (Psal. ii. 8).

It is to the illustration of this great principle that the books of Kings are dedicated. And they evince a sufficient unity to show that they were composed by a single author. They are compiled, no doubt, from various sources; yet they are not a bald compilation, but a perfect history, worked up on a definite plan, in method and in style giving ample proof of their independent completeness. The writer refers to his sources in the same terms, marks carefully the chronology of the most important events, estimates the character and administration of the kings by the rules of the Mosaic law, describes the commencement, tenor, and close of each reign, and the death and burial of the sovereigns in the same phraseology. These points have been fully illustrated, as by Keil (Einführung, § 58; Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. 1. Intro., pp. 9, 10), who shows that the same usages in point of language are found throughout. There are critics, however, who, while they admit the substantial unity of Kings, believe that they see instances of discrepancy and repetition which tend to prove that the author did little more than bring his materials into juxtaposition. Thus, there are direct contradictions alleged. It is said that 1 Kings ix. 22 is inconsistent with v. 13 and xl. 28; for that in the last-named place Solomon is said to have imposed tasks on Israel, and laid a burden on the house of Joseph, while in the former he is stated to have made none of the Israelites bondmen. But the objection confounds two things, actual bondage, and labour, possibly remunerated, which was performed only in courses (v. 14). Then, again, the threatening that the dogs should lick Ahab's blood in the portion of Naboth at Jezreel (xxi. 19) is said to be contradicted by the result; for Ahab's blood was merely licked up by dogs when the chariot in which he had received his mortal wound was washed in the pool of Samaria (xxii. 38). But it is a sufficient answer that the Lord, who often, when men repent, restrains his anger (comp. Jonah iii. 10), so far regarded Ahab's humiliation, hollow as it was, as to declare that not to him but to his posterity the full measure of judgment should be meted out (1 Kings xxi. 29; 2 Kings ix. 25, 26). Indirect discrepancies have also been gathered by industrious men. But they are too trifling to require more than a passing notice. Thus, things are described as subsisting 'to this day' (1 Kings viii. 8, ix. 21, xii. 19; 2 Kings viii. 22); whereas the Jewish polity had ceased to exist before the work was compiled, and such relations were consequently at an end. The answer is that the author retained the expressions from the sources he used. Again, 1 Kings xxi. 13 and 2 Kings ix. 26 are said to be scarcely in harmony; as in the first the death of Naboth alone is described, while the blood of his sons is mentioned in the last. It has been well rejoined that the death of Naboth's natural heirs is at least implied in 1 Kings xxi.; else how could his inheritance have fallen to the king? But in truth such objections are, as before said, unworthy of notice. The credit and consistency of every history that was ever written might be impugned with equal justice.

The sources from which the author drew his materials are exactly indicated. Thus at the close of Solomon's history he refers to the Book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 41); for every king of Judah to the Book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah (xiv. 29, xv. 7, 23, xxii. 45; 2 Kings viii. 23, xii. 19, and elsewhere); and for every king of Israel to the Book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel (1 Kings xiv. 19, xv. 31, xvi. 5, 14, 20, 27, xxii. 39; 2 Kings i. 18, x. 34, and elsewhere). The book of the acts of Solomon has been thought identical with the Book of Nathan the prophet (2 Chron. ix. 29): it was more probably a comprehensive history compiled from, or at all events comprehending all that was recorded in, the three books named in the same place. The book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel is cited for the last time in 2 Kings xv. 31, that of the kings of Judah last in xxxiv. 5: possibly these chronicles did not come down to a later point than the reigns of Pekah and Jehoiachim respectively. We can only conjecture that these works may have been part of a complete history cited as the Book of the kings of Judah and Israel, in 2 Chron. xxxii. 32, and with slight variations of title in xx. 34, xxiv. 27, xxxv. 27. Some have imagined that these were annals duly kept by the 'recorders,' of whom we frequently hear as officers of state; but the unlikelihood of this is well shown by Bleek (Einführung in das A. T., pp. 370, 371). It is more probable that prophetic men from time to time wrote the leading events of their own days (hence, may be, the full account of the acts of Elijah and Elisha), not perhaps in a regular succession, but still so as to furnish a number of memoirs from which the history of the nation might be compiled before the exile. It is some corroboration of this conjecture that 'the book of Jehu the son of Hanani' is said to be incorporated (such is the meaning of the text) with 'the book of the kings of Israel' (2 Chron. xx. 34).

The time when the books of Kings were compiled may be pretty nearly fixed on. It was in the time of the exile; the last event related being the kindness shown to Jehoiachim by Evil-merodach; and some have believed that it was while Jehoiachim yet lived; the expression, however, of 2 Kings xxv. 29: 'he did eat bread continually before him all the days of his life,' would rather imply that that life was ended. But the exile was not over: there is no indication of that: most probably, then, the composition may be dated between the death of Jehoiachin (the exact time of which we do not know) and the return from captivity. The author cannot be identified. Many have believed that it was Jeremiah; but that prophet, whose ministry began in the thirteenth year of Josiah, must have been in extreme old age at the liberation of Jehoiachin 66 years later; and therefore those who hold to Jeremiah's authorship suppose the notice of Jehoiachin a subsequent addition. Bleek imagines it was Baruch (ubi supr., p. 369), who he supposes arranged the prophecies of Jeremiah, and attached the last chapter to them, a historical appendix nearly identical with the close of Kings. This is but a conjecture; and it does not very well account for the slight variations between Jer. lii. and 2 Kings xxiv. 18—xxv. 30). Certainty cannot be arrived at on this point.

The books of Kings have always had a place in the Jewish canon; and the history they contain is authenticated by the references we find in the New Testament (Luke iv. 25-27; Acts vii. 47; Rom. xi. 2-4; James v. 17, 18). Modern research is also continually adding fresh evidence to the truth of the narrative.

These books may properly be distributed into three different parts. I. The narrative of Solomon's reign (1 Kings i.—xi.). II. The contemporary history of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah from the division of the nation (xii.—2 Kings xvii.). III. The account of the kingdom of Judah while it stood alone to the period of the Babylonish captivity (xviii.—xxv.). The length of time embraced is about 453 years. It may be observed that the first book would end better at xxii. 50 than at 53; vv. 51-53 more properly belonging to 2 Kings i.

Keil's valuable commentary on the two books of Kings has often been referred to in these pages. It has been translated into English: 2 vols. Edinb. 1857.

KIR (a wall, a walled place).—1. A city or district to which the king of Assyria carried away the people of Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 9; Amos i. 5). Kir is also named with Elam (Isai. xxii. 6); and the Syrians are said to have been brought from Kir (Amos ix. 7). A difference of opinion exists in regard to the position of Kir. Very probably it was in Media, the present Kerend. Rawlinson suggests the eastern Ethiopia, Cush.—2 (Isai. xv. 1). See next article.

KIR-HARA'SETH (brick fortress). A city and important fortress of Moab, known also as Kir-hareseth, Kir-harash, Kir-heres, and Kir of Moab (2 Kings iii. 25). It is now called Kerak, seated on a high calcareous rock, rising from a deep and narrow glen, which thence descends westward under the name of Wady Kerak to the Dead sea. It was a place of importance in the time of the crusaders.

KIR-HARE'SETH, KIR-HA'RESH, KIR-HE'RES (id.) (Isai. xvi. 7, 11; Jer. xlviii. 31, 36). See KIR-HARASETH.

KIRIATHA'IM (double city) (Jer. xlvi. 1, 23; Ezek. xxv. 9). See KIRJATHAIM.

KIRIATHA'RIOUS (1 Esdr. v. 19). Kirjath-arim (Ezra ii. 25), i.e. Kirjath-jearim.

KIR'IOTH (cities) (Amos ii. 2). See KE-RIOTH, 2.

KIR'JATH (city). A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28). Some have identified it with Kirjath-jearim.

KIRJATHA'IM (double city).—1. A city east of the Jordan, built or fortified by the Reubenites, and allotted to them (Numb. xxxii. 37; Josh. xiii. 19). In later times it was in the possession of the Moabites (Jer. xlviii. 1, 23; Ezek. xxv. 9), in which places it is called Kiriathaim. According to Porter, with whom, however, Grove disagrees, it is the modern Kureiyat, under the southern side of Jebel Attarus.—2. (1 Chron. vi. 76). See KARTAN.

KIR'JATH-AR'BA (city of Arba, or, according to the Jews, city of four, because Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were buried there) (Gen. xxiii. 2, xxxv. 27; Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, 54, xx. 7, xxi. 11; Judges i. 10; Neh. xi. 25). See HEBRON.

KIR'JATH-A'RIM. A contract form of Kirjath-jearim (Ezra ii. 25).

KIR'JATH-BA'AL (city of Baal). The same with Kirjath-jearim (Josh. xv. 60, xviii. 14).

KIR'JATH-HU'ZOTH (city of streets). A city of Moab (Numb. xxii. 39), perhaps regarded as a place of sanctity.

KIR'JATH-JEA'RIM (city of woods). One of the cities of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17). On the allotment of Canaan it was on the border of Judah and Benjamin (xv. 9, xviii. 14, 15), but yet belonging to Judah (xv. 60; Judges xviii. 12). It was variously called Baalah (xv. 9, 10), Baale of Judah (2 Sam. vi. 2), Kirjath-baal (xviii. 14), Kirjath-arim (Ezra ii. 25). It was to this place that the ark was brought after the catastrophe at Bethshemesh (1 Sam. vi. 21, vii. 1, 2), and from thence carried by David to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xiii. 5, 6; 2 Chron. i. 4). Some of the families who settled in it are mentioned in 1 Chron. ii. 50, 52, 53; and a number of its inhabitants returned from Babylon after the captivity (Neh. vii. 29). Urijah, the prophet put to death by Jehoiakim, was of Kirjath-jearim (Jer. xxvi. 20-23). The modern Kuriet el'Aineb is satisfactorily identified with Kirjath-jearim. It is but a poor village, with a ruined Latin church. On the hill to the north-west probably stood the house of Abinadab (1 Sam. vii. 1). Dr. Thomson believes it identical with EMMAUS, which see.

KIR'JATH-SAN'NAH (palm-city). The same with Debir (Josh. xv. 49), or KIR'JATH-SE'PHER (book-city). A city, perhaps originally a seat of learning, taken by Othniel, for which he obtained Achsah, Caleb's daughter, in marriage (Josh. xv. 15-17; Judges i. 11-13). It was also called Debir (Josh. x. 38, 39, xi. 21, xii. 13, xxi. 15; 1 Chron. vi. 58), and Kirjath-sannah (Josh. xv. 49).

KIR-MO'AB (fortress of Moab) (Isai. xv. 1). See KIR-HARASETH.

KISH (a bow).—1. The father of king Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1, 3, x. 11, 21, xiv. 51; 2 Sam. xxi. 14; 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39, xii. 1, xxvi. 28).—2. Another Benjamite of the same family (viii. 30, ix. 36).—3. A Levite of the family of Merari (xxiii. 21, 22, xxiv. 29).—4. A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 12). But the name may stand for the family instead of an individual, and may be identical with Kishl.—5. An ancestor of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).

KISH'I (bow of Jehovah). A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 44), called also Kushaiah (xv. 17).

KISH'ION (hardness). A city of Issachar (Josh. xix. 20), allotted to the Gershonite Levites; but in 1 Chron. vi. 72 Kedesh is substituted. It is also called

KISH'ON (id.) (Josh. xxi. 28).

KI'SHON (curved, winding). A stream which issues from the mountains of Carmel, and discharges itself after a very short course into the bay of Acre. It is described as sluggish, with brackish water, passing through a marsh. But there is, besides, a more remote source near En-gannim (the fountain of Jenin). The water, however, which flows hence, though augmented by winter torrents still farther to the east, falls during the summer and autumn. It is only therefore in certain seasons of the year that the Kishon is full. But what it becomes when swollen with rains may be imagined from the resistless force with which it swept away the flying troops of Sisera (Judges iv. 7, v. 21). See BARAK. This stream is noted for another great event in scripture history. It was to its banks that Elijah on the day of Carmel brought down the idol priests for execution (1 Kings xviii. 40). The Kishon is now the Mukutta.

KIV'ON (id.) (Psal. lxxxiii. 9). A form of Kishon.

KISS. A token of respectful and affectionate salutation (Gen. xxvii. 26, 27, xxix. 13), of reconciliation (xxxiii. 4; 2 Sam. xiv. 33), of leave-taking (Gen. xxxi. 28, 55; Ruth i. 14; 2 Sam. xix. 39), of homage (1 Sam. x. 1; Psal. ii. 12). Besides kissing on the mouth, hand, or cheek, sometimes the beard was kissed (2 Sam. xx. 9), sometimes the feet (Luke vii. 45). Idolatrous worship was paid by a kiss (1 Kings xix. 18; Hos. xiii. 2), as also by raising the hand to the mouth (Job xxxi. 27); see Henderson, Minor Prophets, pp. 78, 79; Carey, Job, p. 347. To kiss the foot-print of a prince, or lick the dust before him, evinced the deepest reverence and subjection (Psal. lxxii. 9; Isai. xlix. 23). In the New Testament we find the kiss of peace or holy kiss a mark of affectionate brotherhood: it seems to have accompanied social worship (Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26; 1 Pet. v. 14). The ceremony was long continued in the church. Thus the newly-baptized received the kiss of peace (Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xii. chap. iv. 5). It was given in the eucharist (ibid., book xv. chap. iii. 3), and on various other occasions. And even the altar, the doors, threshold, pillars, &c., of the church were kissed in token of affection (ibid., book viii. chap. x. 9).

KITE. An unclean bird (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13). The word, which signifies a cry, occurs again in Job xxviii. 7, where it is rendered 'vulture.' It may possibly be used as a generic name for various species of hawk, falcon, &c. Or it may be supposed identical with the Falco cesalon of Linnæus, merlin. It must evidently be a bird noted for its cry and keen-sighted. The Milvus regalis, or common kite, is well known in Europe; and the Milvus Ægyptiacus, Arabian kite, is one of the most abundant of birds of prey in Egypt: see Duns, Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 362.

KITH'LISH (a man's wall?). A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 40).

KIT'RON (knotty). A town of Zebulun (Judges i. 30): it has been thought the same with Kattath (Josh. xix. 15).

KITTIM (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chron. i. 7). See CHITIM.

KNEADING-TROUGH (Exod. viii. 3, xii. 34; Deut. xxviii. 5, 17, marg.). See BREAD.

KNIFE (Gen. xxii. 6, and elsewhere). Knives were made variously of flint, bone, copper, iron, and steel. At first perhaps a single knife, worn in the girdle (a practice still almost universal in the east) was sufficient for all general purposes. But in the course of time knives of various shapes and purposes were multiplied. In sacrificing, one was used to kill the victim: there was another, rounded at the top to the fourth of a circle, for flaying it; and a third, for dissecting the carcase. Specimens of different kinds of ancient Egyptian knives, to which no doubt the Hebrew were similar, may be seen in the British Museum. Knives were little used at meals; and still meat is usually divided with the fingers.

KNOP. An ornament of the golden candlestick (Exod. xxv. 31, xxxvii. 17, and elsewhere), probably formed like a pomegranate. Also a carved ornament of the cedar-work of the temple, and the molten sea (1 Kings vi. 18, vii. 24), perhaps like wild gourds or cucumbers.

KNOWLEDGE, THE TREE OF. A tree placed in the midst of the garden of Eden, possibly in some conspicuous spot, of which man was not to eat and not to touch it, under the penalty of death (Gen. ii. 9, 17, iii. 3). It must have been a literal tree; the prohibition against the use of which is not so unreasonable as some are pleased to consider it. For many commandments, afterwards given to the world when replenished with inhabitants, were quite inapplicable to the circumstances of a single pair in possession of all their eyes beheld. And it may be added that, if the Deity had devised any other kind of test of the obedience of his creatures, certain critics would equally have found some ground of objection. We need not try to discover the species of this tree. Naturally the fruit was wholesome, and the aspect of it pleasant; and it had, according to the tempter, marvellous virtue (5); more than this we cannot know. It was called 'the tree of knowledge of good and evil,' not because God would know by the result of the trial whether man would cleave to good or make choice of evil, but rather because Adam, if he ate, would know, that is, have a practical and experimental acquaintance with, good and evil (22). Bush is of opinion that the term 'tree' is used as a noun of multitude, so that trees of life and of knowledge were interspersed throughout the garden, that Adam might be 'constantly reminded of the terms on which he held his happiness' (Notes on Genesis, p. 44). See LIFE, THE TREE OF.

KO'A (stallion, he-camel, hence prince). This word is found only in Ezek. xxiii. 23; where it is used with Shoa, wealthy, in paronomasia.

KO'HATH (assembly). One of the sons of Levi, from whom the great Kohathite branch of that tribe was descended (Gen. xvi. 11; Exod. vi. 16, 18; Numb. iii. 17, 19, 27, and elsewhere).

KO'HATHITES. One of the three great families of the tribe of Levi, descended from Kohath, Levi's son, distinguished into four branches, Amramites, Izharites, Hebronites, and Uzzielites, after Kohath's four sons, and comprising at the first census 8,600 males from a month old, 2,750 between the ages of thirty and fifty. They were to encamp in the wilderness on the south side of the tabernacle, and were to have charge of the ark, and the table, and the candlestick, and the altars, and the vessels of the sanctuary, and the service thereof (Numb. iii. 27-31, iv. 2-15, 34-37). These, when they were covered by the priests, the Kohathites carried on their shoulders, on a march; and therefore not any of the wagons given by the princes were apportioned to them (vii. 9). When the Israelites entered Canaan, the priests, who were sons of Kohath, had thirteen cities allotted them in Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon; and the rest of the Kohathites, ranking from their closer connection with the priests as first of the Levites, ten cities from the territories of Ephraim, Dan, and western Manasseh (Josh. xxi. 4, 5, 20-26; 1 Chron. vi. 61, 66-70). Their service was afterwards arranged with that of the other Levitical families by David, when the whole were divided into courses, and had special offices assigned (1 Chron. xxv., xxvi.).

KOLAI'AH (voice of Jehovah).—1. A Benjamite (Neh. xi. 7).—2. The father of the false prophet Ahab (Jer. xxix. 21).

KO'RAH (ice, hail, or baldness).—1. One of the sons of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. i. 35). It might seem (16) as if he were the son of Eliphaz, or as if there were two of the name; but Kalisch suggests that some branches of the family of Korah intermarried with a portion of the family of Eliphaz, and gradually rose to sufficient power and influence to form an independent clan; while the other part remained under the original division (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 598, note).—2. A Levite, son of Izhar, and grandson of Kohath (Exod. vi. 18, 21, 24). His descendants were called Korahites (1 Chron. ix. 19, 31), Korathites (Numb. xxvi. 58), and Korhites (Exod. vi. 24; 1 Chron. xii. 6, xxvi. 1; 2 Chron. xx. 19); and to them are attributed several of the Psalms (viz. xlii., xliii., xlix., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii.). Korah is notable as a ringleader of a rebellion excited, in conjunction with Dathan and Abiram, against Moses and Aaron. These conspirators were fearfully punished. The earth opened and swallowed Dathan and Abiram, with their immediate adherents; while two hundred and fifty who offered incense, together with (it seems most probable) Korah, perished by fire. Korah's children, however, survived, not being partakers in his guilt (Numb. xvi., xxvi. 9-11, xxvii. 3; 1 Chron. vi. 22, 37, ix. 19). Some discrepancy has been imagined in the history given of Korah's rebellion; but the charge cannot be sustained (see Horne's Introduction, edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 573, 574). Indeed, Professor Blunt has shown that there are minute coincidences which go to prove the exact accuracy of the sacred writer (Undesigned Coincidences, part i. 20, pp. 79-84). Korah is called 'Core' in Jude ii. 3. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 43).

KO'RAHITES. A Levitical family, descended from Korah (1 Chron. ix. 19, 31). They were appointed to conduct the service of sacred song, some of them being also porters or door-keepers in the sanctuary.

KO'RATHITES. Another designation of the same family (Numb. xxvi. 58).

KO'RE (a partridge).—1. A Levite of the family of Korah (1 Chron. ix. 19). Probably the same person is intended in 1 Chron. xxvi. 1, where Asaph is for Ebiasaph; see marg. In 19 the translation should be 'the Korhite'.—2. A Levite porter, who had charge of the offerings and oblations in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 14).

KOR'HITES. A Levitical family, descendants of Korah (Exod. vi. 24; 1 Chron. xii. 6, xxvi. 1; 2 Chron. xx. 19).

KOZ (thorn). A priest, head of one of the courses (1 Chron. xxiv. 10). The article is prefixed; and here our translators have given it as part of the name, Hakkoz. But, in other places where descendants of this person are mentioned (Ezra ii. 61; Neh. iii. 4, 21, vii. 63), our version has rightly Koz. It appears that the pedigree of the family was not accurately preserved.

KUSHAI'AH (bow of Jehovah, i.e. rain-bow) (1 Chron. xv. 17). See KISHI.

L.

LA'ADAH (order). One of Judah's descendants (1 Chron. iv. 21).

LA'ADAN (put in order).—1. An Ephraimite, ancestor of Joshua (1 Chron. vii. 26).—2. A Gershonite Levite (xxiii. 7, 8, 9, xxvi. 21); he seems to have been identical with Libni (Exod. vi. 17).

LA'BAN (white). The son of Bethuel, and brother of Rebekah. When first introduced in the sacred story, he appears to great advantage. He runs to welcome Abraham's servant, addresses him in the language of piety, receives him hospitably, and, quite taking the lead in the negotiation of his sister's marriage, acts with justice and propriety, referring the matter to the Lord (Gen. xxiv. 29-60). He must have been then very young, perhaps but just grown to man's estate. After Rebekah's marriage we do not read of any communication with his sister; but there probably was; for she expressed her anticipation that he would receive her son Jacob kindly when he fled from the apprehended revenge of Esau (xxvii. 43-45). He did receive him kindly; and, when Jacob had been with him a little while, taking part in his occupation without reward, Laban honourably, as we may call it, desired him to name his wages, as it would be unfair that because he was a relative he should labour for nothing. Jacob asked the hand of his cousin Rachel, and consented to serve seven years for love of her. We may suppose that something occurred in these years to sour Laban's mind. He was now advanced in life: eighty or ninety years had passed since Rebekah's marriage: perhaps his sons, as we afterwards find them interfering, might influence him. He first deceived Jacob by substituting Leah for Rachel (xxix. 1-30), and afterwards exacted toilsome service from him, unwilling to part with one through whom his worldly circumstances had prospered. We cannot approve the mode in which Jacob acted; but Laban, hard and selfish, acted more unjustifiably still, changing continually the manner in which his nephew was to be remunerated (xxx. 25-43). At length, when Jacob had become the richer of the two, all family harmony was at an end: Laban's sons aggravated their father's ill-feeling; his daughters were estranged from him; and Jacob, expecting to be plundered, took an opportunity of departing secretly. Laban in wrath pursued: his property had dwindled: his gods, too, were gone. But the Lord interfered to protect Jacob; and, after mutual recriminations, uncle and nephew ratified a covenant proposed by Laban; and then they separated (xxxii. 4, xlvi. 18, 25). He had evinced early promise; but the cares of the world had corrupted him.

LA'BAN (id.). A place in the Arabian wilderness (Deut. i. 1), possibly the same with Libnah (Numb. xxxiii. 21, 22).

LAB'ANA (1 Esdr. v. 29). Lebanah (Ezra ii. 45).

LABOUR. It is observable that man was not upon his creation to live in indolence. When placed in the garden of Eden he was 'to dress it and to keep it' (Gen. ii. 15). This labour would have been delightful had Adam continued in his state of innocence; the garden that he kept repaying by its fruitfulness and beauty the care bestowed upon it. It was upon the fall that labour became toil, inducing weariness and sorrow (iii. 17-19, 23). But labour is wholesome, mentally and bodily. No persons are more to be pitied than those who have nothing to do, no employment, no worthy pursuit. The Jews were accustomed to instruct their children in some kind of labour which might afterwards be a means of support. Thus St. Paul, with a liberal education, was yet taught a manual art (Acts xviii. 3, xx. 34; 2 Thess. iii. 8); and he ordered that if any refused to labour he should not be allowed to eat (10-12). For the modes of labour in use among the Hebrews see AGRICULTURE, HANDICRAFT. All labour was to be undertaken from a right motive, and the fruit of it put to a right use (Rom. xii. 11; 1 Cor. x. 31; Eph. iv. 28). And the greatest pains and labour were to be not for earthly sustenance, but for the meat that 'endureth unto everlasting life' (John vi. 27).

LABOURER (Luke x. 7). See HIRELING.

LACE (Exod. xxviii. 28, 37, xxxix. 31). The word so rendered is translated 'bracelets' in Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25, but it means there the cord or string by which the signet-ring was suspended. It signifies twisted, and must be in the places where it is called 'lace' a thread or cord.

LACEDÆMONIANS (1 Macc. xii. 2, 5, 6, 20, 21, xiv. 20, 23, xv. 23; 2 Macc. v. 9). See SPARTA.

LA'CHISH (the smitten, captured, or the tenacious, i.e. impregnable). A city of Canaan captured by Joshua (Josh. x. 3, 5, 23, 31-35, xii. 11): it was situated in the plain country of Judah (xv. 39), and was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 9). King Amaziah was killed here (2 Kings xiv. 19; 2 Chron. xxv. 27). Lachish was besieged and probably taken by Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii. 13-17, xix. 8; 2 Chron. xxxii. 9; Isai. xxxvi. 2, xxxvii. 8). A description has been deciphered at Kouyunjik to this effect: 'Sennacherib, the mighty king, king of the country of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment, before the city of Lachish; I give permission for its slaughter. There is also sculptured a representation of the siege. This city is mentioned in Jer. xxxiv. 7; Mic. i. 13, and was inhabited after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 30). The site of Lachish has not been identified:

there is indeed still a village on a knoll between Gaza and Beit Jibrin, called Um La-kis; but the city was probably farther to the south. According to Eusebius it lay seven Roman miles south of Eleuthero-polis.

LACU'NUS (1 Esdr. ix. 31).

LA'DAN (1 Esdr. v. 37). Probably a corruption of Delaiah (Ezra ii. 60).

LADDER OF TYRUS (1 Macc. xi. 59). A mountain north of Acre rising immediately from the sea, a natural barrier between Palestine and Phœnicia. It is the modern Ras-en-Nakhurah, and is crossed by a zigzag path.

LA'EL (of God, i. e. created). A Gershonite Levite (Numb. iii. 24).

LA'HAD (oppression). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 2).

LAHAI-ROI (the living one that sees me) (Gen. xxiv. 62, xxv. 11). See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

LAH'MAM (provisions). A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 40). Some copies have 'Lahmas.'

LA'HMI (warrior). The brother of Goliath, slain by Elhanan (1 Chron. xx. 5). See ELHANAN.

LA'ISH (lion). A person to whose son Michal, David's wife, was given (1 Sam. xxv. 44; 2 Sam. iii. 15).

LA'ISH (id.)—1 (Judges xviii. 7, 14, 27, 29). See DAN.—2. A place near Jerusalem (Isai. x. 30), which passage would be more properly rendered 'Listen, O Laish:' nothing more is known of this Laish.

LAKE. There are several noticeable lakes in Palestine, as that of Sodom or the Dead sea, known by several other names; that of Gennesaret, which also had other appellations; and the waters of Merom. These are described under their own names. See GENNESARET, MEROM, SEA.

LA'KUM (way-stopper, i. e. a fortified place). A town on the border of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33).

LAMB. This word according to our usage signifies the young of the sheep. More than one Hebrew word is so rendered, some including also a kid, the young of the goat. A lamb or a kid without blemish was to be the paschal offering, to be killed and eaten at the passover (Exod. xii. 3-10). See PASS-OVER. Lambs also were continually offered in the various sacrifices of the law, daily (xxix. 38, 39), weekly (Numb. xxviii. 9), monthly (11), at the great yearly festivals (Lev. xxiii. 13-20; Numb. xxix. 2, 13-40), and on various special occasions.

LAMB OF GOD. A title repeatedly given to the Lord Jesus Christ (John i. 29, 36). It had been predicted that Messiah should be like a lamb patient under suffering (Isai. liii. 7); and the passage in which this was declared was distinctly applied to Jesus by the early Christian teachers (Acts viii. 32-35; 1 Pet. ii. 24). But the special idea with its peculiar application is taken not from a lamb generally, its gentleness and harmlessness, but from the fact of a lamb's being selected, without blemish, as a sacrificial offering. Thus for the passover a male of the first year was to be set apart and slain (Exod. xii. 3, 5-7). And so Christ is called the 'passover' 'sacrificed for us' (1 Cor. v. 7). Lambs of the first year without spot were also to be offered day by day, in the morning and at even for a continual burnt-offering, and on various other occasions (Numb. xxviii. 3, and elsewhere); see last article. And thus redemption was made 'with the precious blood of Christ without blemish and without spot' (1 Pet. i. 18, 19). Further, when St. John beheld the Lamb in heavenly glory, it was 'as it had been slain' (Rev. v. 6). Christ, therefore, is the Lamb of God, in that he was offered a sacrifice and propitiation for the sins of the world (1 John ii. 2).

LAMECH (powerful). An ante-diluvian of the line of Cain. He had two wives and was the father of distinguished sons: one, Jubal, was a musician; another, Tubal-cain, a worker of metals. Lamech had, it does not appear how, slain some one; and some verses are preserved, the oldest snatch of poetry known, in which he addresses his wives, expressing his conviction that, if Cain was to be avenged seven-fold on any who slew him, vengeance seventy-and-seven-fold would be exacted for Lamech himself. This may intimate that the homicide he was chargeable with was accidental or in self-defence (Gen. iv. 18-24).—2. An antediluvian patriarch, son of Methuselah and father of Noah (25-31; 1 Chron. i. 3; Luke iii. 36).

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH, THE. This book has generally among the Jews for an appellation its first word, signifying how. It is also called by a name implying, as that we use does, the nature of its contents. In the Hebrew canon it is one of the five megilloth, usually placed between Ruth and Ecclesiastes.

The Lamentations are expressly ascribed to Jeremiah in a verse prefixed to the Septuagint translation. This has been adopted in some other versions; but there is no reason to suppose that it was ever in the Hebrew original. It may be taken, however, as a valuable witness to the early belief of the Jeremian authorship. And this authorship there is no valid reason for doubting. It is true that Thenius (Die Klaglieder erklärt) and others have imagined that there is a perceptible difference between the different elegies which the book contains, so that they could not have proceeded from the same hand. Thus, stress is laid upon the alleged incompatibility of Lam. ii., iv. with iii. 1-20; and it has been said that the last-named passage has images more varied, expressions stronger than could be expected from the prophetic Jeremiah, whose style and cast of thought are different. But these objections have no great weight. The writer is evidently an eye-witness (see ii. 11, iv. 17-20, v.): the diction is very similar; characteristic words and expressions being found in Jeremiah's prophecies and also in this book. And it is the deliberate judgment of Bleek (Einleitung, pp. 502, 503) that there is an observable relationship between the Lamentations and the prophetic book, not only in style but in entire character and spirit, in contents and in tone of thought. And he points out how exactly Lam. iii. 52, &c. answers to Jer. xxxviii. 6, &c.

The book comprises five separate poems, each distinct and complete in itself, but yet connected by the same leading idea. The third describes the personal sufferings of the writer; the others the fate of the city. It is a nice point to determine with exactness the time of the composition. But, as we learn from the history (comp. Jer. xxxix. 2, and lii. 12, 13) that an interval of about a month elapsed between the capture of the city and its actual destruction by fire, some have imagined that they see indications in i., ii., iv., v. pointing to that interval: the king and the nobles were in captivity (ii. 9, iv. 20): the temple was profaned and the observance of the ritual service at an end (i. 4, 10, ii. 6, 7, 20); but yet it is not distinctly said that the temple was burned or the city quite destroyed. Still it cannot be denied that there are expressions which can hardly be fully understood except as intending that final catastrophe (as ii. 2, 3, iv. 11, v. 18). Perhaps, therefore, the date may be more justly fixed to that time when Jeremiah appears to have been carried with the rest of the captives to Ramah, where Nebuzar-adan released him and sent him to Gedaliah (Jer. xl.). And no time would seem to suit better with the personal lamentation of chap. iii.

The composition of these elegies is remarkable. Each consists of twenty-two periods or stanzas; and in the first four every one of these periods begins with words the initials of which are letters of the Hebrew alphabet in order. In chap. iii. the three verses of each period commence with the same letter. In ii., iii., iv. the verses beginning with the letter pe precede those beginning with ain. In the Vulgate and some other versions chap. v. is entitled the Prayer of Jeremiah. It is only necessary to add that these elegies must not be considered the lament which (2 Chron. xxxv. 25) Jeremiah is said to have made for Josiah.

The commentaries of Blayney, 1784, 1810, Henderson 1851, and others on Jeremiah, include Lamentations.

LAMP. We have frequent mention of lamps in scripture, but little or no indication of their shape or of the material of which they were made. But, as Egyptian and Assyrian lamps have been found of terra cotta, baked clay, bronze, &c., we may very well suppose that those used by the Hebrews were of similar materials, and very probably of similar shapes. The 'lamps' which were carried by Gideon's soldiers in pitchers (Judges vii. 16, 20) must have had handles, and have been so formed as that the oil could not easily be spilled. Not improbably, however, these were torches or flambeaux, which, when the pitchers were broken, would make a stronger glare. Animal fat is now very frequently burnt in lamps in western Asia: it is likely that it was also used by the ancient Hebrews; though for the lamps of the candlestick in the tabernacle pure olive was specially prescribed (Exod. xxvii. 20; Lev. xxiv. 2). Cotton wicks are at present in common use; but it is supposed that the Hebrews, like the Egyptians, employed the outer coarse fibre of flax. According to rabbinical tradition the priests' linen garments were unravelled when old to furnish wicks for the sacred lamps. Lamps are now often supported on stands of brass or wood, or they are placed upon brackets. This was probably an ancient custom; and, if we may further suppose that anciently as now lamps were kept burning through the night, we shall find many scriptural expressions illustrated. The keeping up of the light is thus a symbol of unbroken succession (1 Kings xi. 36, xv. 4; Psal. cxxii. 17); while the extinguishing of the lamp betokens change and decay (1 Sam. xxi. 17; Prov. xiii. 9, xx. 20). The illustration may, however, have been borrowed from the perpetual light of the sanctuary. Again, our Lord speaks of 'outer darkness' into which the wicked should be cast (Matt. viii. 12, xxii. 13): lamps of course were used at festivals and marriage-feasts; and the contrast is the more striking when one is expelled at once from a well-lighted apartment into the dark night.

The Jewish feast of dedication is, from the illuminations then made, sometimes called the Feast of Lamps. The origin and mode of observing it may be noted here. When Judas Maccabeus had recovered Jerusalem and purified the temple after its desecration by Antiochus Epiphanes, he instituted a feast in which it is said that he 'set forth incense and lights' (2 Macc. x. 3). Some legendary stories are added to this account by the Jews. The ceremonies now practised are described by Mills (The British Jews, pp. 186, 187): 'On the evening of the 24th of Kislev, a light called the Chanukah light is prepared. Properly this light ought to be a lamp supplied with oil of olives; but wax candles are generally used. One candle is placed in the candlestick near the ark, when the following blessing is said: "Blessed art thou, O Lord, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and commanded us to light the lights of dedication. Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, King of the universe, who wrought miracles for our fathers in those days and in this season. Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, King of the universe, who hast maintained us and preserved us to enjoy this season." The last blessing is said only on the first night of the feast. The candle being thus lit, the following is then repeated: "These lights we light to praise thee for the miracles, wonders, salvation, and victories, which thou didst perform for our fathers, in those days and in this season, by the hands of thy holy priests. Wherefore, by command, these lights are holy all the eight days of dedication; neither are we permitted to make any other use of them save to view them, that we may return thanks to thy name, for thy miracles, wonderful works, and salvation." On the second evening two candles are lighted, on the third three, adding one every evening until the eighth, the conclusion of the feast, and repeating the above blessings, as on the first evening. A few additions are made to the public service. See DEDICATION, FEAST OF.

LANCET (Jer. l. 42). See ARMS.

LANCET (1 Kings xviii. 28). Probably a light spear.

LAND. See EARTH.

LAND-MARK. The removing of a landmark was specially prohibited by the Mosaic law (Deut. xix. 14, xxvii. 17; Prov. xxii. 28, xxiii. 10). See also Job xxiv. 2. As this was so flagrant an offence, the expression seems to have become proverbial to designate unprincipled conduct: see Hos. v. 10.

LANGUAGE. We read in scripture of communications by means of speech at the very beginning of the human history. Thus, even before the creation of woman, the man is said to have given names to the various creatures which surrounded him in the happy garden (Gen. ii. 19, 20). It is a natural inference—one very agreeable to the just conclusions of reason, that the Deity, who endowed Adam when he made him with high and excellent faculties, taught him at least the first uses of those faculties, and gave him that almost-instinctive perception of the qualities and natures of the different animals he saw, which is implied in his calling them by appropriate names. Some exercise of language, then, he must have had—elementary, doubtless, and confined to what his wants required, but capable of development, and soon actually developed, in the growth of society, and according to the amenities and necessities of social intercourse, and the interchange of thought between individuals. What the primitive language was, whether identical with or allied to any of those which exist, either in common speech or in writing, can be only conjectured.

In the lapse of years, when men multiplied before the deluge, it is natural to suppose, the same causes operating then as have operated since, that diversities of speech would begin to manifest themselves. Whether this were so or not, a single language would survive in Noah's family. And this, the sacred historian tells us, was the condition for some time of the post-diluvian world (xi. 1). Diversities would of course, after a while, have appeared, as the families of men settled in different regions far apart. But such diversity was not left to its own natural growth. There was a supernatural interference, in order to check the overweening pride of those, the mass of existing men probably, who were assembled in the plains of Shinar. See TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

We are not told into how many branches the original speech was thus divided. But philologists have, in the course of their investigations, observed that the mass of known languages, those now spoken or that have been spoken over those wide regions of the earth that form generally the field of history, may be arranged in three great families. The dialects of Africa and America, and perhaps of China, may be set apart; and the other numerous tongues will fall under the Shemitic or Semitic, the Arian or Indo-European, and the Turanian classes.

A Semitic language has this distinctive characteristic. Its roots must comprise three letters; while the Arian and Turanian roots consist of one or two, rarely of three. The Semitic family is distributed into three principal branches, Aramaic, Hebrew, and Arabic. The Aramaic prevailed in the north, including Syria, Mesopotamia, and part of Babylonia. It was divided into two leading dialects, Syriac and Chaldee, which still exist under certain modifications, the former in the Syrian churches, the latter among the Nestorians. The Hebrew was the language of Palestine: its golden age is regarded as lasting from Moses to the Babylonish captivity; its silver age from the captivity downwards. All the sacred books of the Old Testament were written in Hebrew, save Ezra iv. 8—vi. 18, vii. 12-26; Jer. x. 11; and Dan. ii. 4—vii. 28; which are Chaldee. Hebrew was encroached upon by Aramaic dialects, which became vernacular in Palestine in our Lord's time, and it degenerated ultimately into the rabbinical language of the Talmud, and various Jewish writers. The speech of the Phœnicians and Carthaginians was nearly allied to Hebrew; and certain differences of phrase and pronunciation showed themselves among different Israelitish tribes (Judges xii. 5, 6). In the countries where Aramaic and Hebrew were anciently spoken, Arabic has come to prevail. This, the most developed of Semitic languages, was originally confined to the Arabian peninsula; but it spread and maintained itself in many regions of Asia and Africa, and even of Europe. One of its dialects, the Koreishite, prevailed above the rest, and became emphatically the Arabic language, in which all its classical literature is found. It flourished till the fourteenth century, degenerating at last into the vulgar Arabic still so widely spoken. The Ethiopic tongue had its origin in an Arabic dialect, the Himyaric; and from this, mixed up with other speech, proceeded the modern Amharic. Besides the great Semitic branches just noticed, there were other dialects, probably derived from the same source, but with greater or less difference. Of these may be named the Egyptian, the Berber prevailing along the northern coast of Africa to the Atlantic, and the Babylonian. Through many fair regions of the earth, then, languages and dialects of Semitic or half-Semitic character established themselves.

The Arian, or Iranian, or, as it used to be called, the Indo-European, family (between which and the Semitic a relationship is to be perceived), has occupied likewise a vast domain. It includes two great divisions. In the southern may be ranked the classical Sanscrit and other Indian tongues; while the northern, embracing also many great classes and subordinate branches, reckons in its lists both the ancient Greek and Latin, and the tongues generally of modern Europe, including our own. In one of these Arian languages, the Greek, the New Testament was written. It was in apostolic times most widely diffused, known and employed throughout the Roman empire. And we cannot help acknowledging the wise providence of God, which had prepared such an admirable vehicle for the expression of religious truth. It was of high cultivation and flexibility, in which the nicest shades of thought could be most accurately defined, and it was a language which, from its character and from the literature contained in it, would always engage the close attention of civilized and refined nations. The Greek of the New Testament, however, is not classical Greek. For some account of the way in which it received its peculiar character see HELLENIST, p. 371. Both in the words employed, in the forms and constructions used, and in the phraseology and modes of expression, this character is to be distinguished. The language was adopted by men who were accustomed to an Aramaic cast of thought, and who, besides, had to convey new ideas. Conversant with the Hebrew scriptures, though mainly perhaps through the Greek translation, the New Testament writers would often employ in Greek Hebrew idioms. Indeed religious expressions must appear in a Jewish dress; for Christianity was built upon a Jewish basis. The Alexandrian or Septuagint translation of the Old Testament, of course, exercised much influence over the phraseology of the New; and the careful study of it is of high importance towards the understanding and elucidation of the productions of the apostles and evangelists.

Of the Turanian family of language little need be said. These do not contribute, like the Semitic and the Arian, to the illustration of the holy book. These languages are less definitely related or bound together than those of the other two families. They are rude and primitive, the grammatical modifications constructed by what has been called 'agglutination,' the words affixed to the roots not coalescing, or being incorporated as in the other families, but so added by mechanical junction, that they can be easily dissected. But these languages sweep over yet vaster portions of the world. They have prevailed among the Mongolian and Tartar and other nomadic peoples. The representative of the Turanian family in Europe is the Turkish language (see Max Müller's Survey of Languages, pp. 23, &c.).

LANTERN (John xviii. 3). The lantern still in use in western Asia consists of a round top and bottom of tinned copper, the first having a handle, the last a stand for a candle. The two are united by a cylinder of waxed cloth, or sometimes paper, extended over wire rings. When set down, the cloth or paper cylinder folds between the bottom and the top, so that the candle rises through a hole left in the cover, and seems placed in a broad-bottomed candlestick. When taken by the handle the cylinder extends itself; and the candle is thus shaded, the light shining through the paper or cloth. Such lanterns are generally two or three feet in length, and nine inches in diameter. See Pict. Bible, note on John xviii. 3.

LAODICE'A. This city was originally called Diospolis, afterwards Rhoas. It was re-built and beautified by Antiochus II., king of Syria, and named after his wife Laodice, by whom he was subsequently poisoned. In Roman times it was a very principal city among those of the second rank in Asia Minor. It suffered in the Mithridatic war, but ere long recovered: it was also well-nigh destroyed by a great earthquake 62 A.D., but was repaired by the efforts of its own citizens, who asked no help of the Roman senate. Laodicea was in southern Phrygia, called Phrygia Pacatiana, not far from Colossæ and about six miles south of Hierapolis. It was distinguished from other cities of the same name by being termed Laodicea on the Lycus. Its commerce was considerable, being principally in the wools grown in the neighbouring district, which were celebrated for their fine texture and rich hue (see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Laodicea'). It is repeatedly referred to in the New Testament (Col. ii. 1, iv. 13-16; Rev. i. 11, iii. 14-22). St. Paul did not visit this city before his imprisonment at Rome; but he wrote a letter to the church there, or to some individual of it; respecting which various conjectures have been formed. Wieseler (Chronol. des Apost. Zeitalt., pp. 450-454) has an ingenious argument to prove that it was the epistle to Philemon, and adds in corroboration that Archippus there mentioned is said on ancient authority to have been bishop of Laodicea. A village called Eski-nissar stands amid its ruins.

LAODICE'ANS (Col. iv. 16; Rev. iii. 14). Inhabitants of Laodicea.

LAP'IDOTH (torches). The husband of the prophetess Deborah (Judges iv. 4).

LAP, LAPPING. The custom of lapping still prevails in the east. A person will sit on his heels with his head close over a river and so dexterously throw the water into his mouth with his hand, putting out his tongue to meet it, as scarcely to spill a drop. It was to this test that the men of Gideon's army were subjected, in order, it would seem, to prove the alertness of those who so drank (Judges vii. 5-7).

LAPWING. An unclean bird forbidden to the Hebrews as an article of food (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18). Various opinions have been entertained as to the identification of this bird; but it is most generally believed to be the hoopoe, Upupa epops. Hoopoes are numerous in Egypt, where they are said to form two species—one stationary, which is considered inedible; the other migratory, which wades in the mud when the Nile has subsided, and feeds on worms and insects. This, however, is questionable: more likely there is but a single species. Its flesh is sometimes eaten, and has been pronounced very good. The hoopoe visits several parts of Europe, and is often met with in Palestine, where the Arabs have a superstitious reverence for it, believing it to possess medicinal qualities. They call it therefore 'The doctor.' See Duns, Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii., pp. 91-93.

LASE'A. A city of Crete, described as 'nigh' to the Fair Havens (Acts xxvii. 8).

The ruins of this place, which had not been previously identified, were discovered a few years ago. There are the remains of two temples; and marble shafts and capitals lie scattered around. The ancient name still survives. Lasea is near to cape Leonda, which lies about five miles east of the Fair Havens. See Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, app. no. iii. 262, 263.

LA'SHA (fissure). The extreme point to which the boundary of Canaan extended (Gen. x. 19). It must consequently have been beyond the Dead sea to the east. It is likely that it derives its name from the breaking forth of the hot springs which are believed to identify the place. These springs are of a sulphureous character. The largest is about an hour and a half east from the sea. And, though it is not known that a town was ever seated here, yet there are remains of pottery, &c., which show that there must have been some habitations, perhaps for the accommodation of invalids resorting thither. We may believe the place identical with the Callirrhœ of Jerome and several ancient translators. There is a river formed, to which the sulphur deposited in it imparts a brilliant yellow hue: this precipitates itself from lofty rocks into the plain. Its water is hot, and, after receiving some tributary streams within a short distance, it pours with considerable velocity into the Dead sea. An oppressive temperature prevails in the valley in summer; and canes, aspens, and palm-trees, are abundant on the banks.

LASHA'RON (the plain). The king of Lasharon is enumerated among those whom Joshua destroyed (Josh. xii. 18). Lasharon has been supposed identical with the district of Sharon; but this is doubtful.

LASTHENES (1 Macc. xi. 31, 32). A person of rank, to whom Demetrius II. Nicator, king of Syria, gave the titles of 'cousin' and 'father.'

LATCHET (Isai. v. 27; Mark i. 7; Luke iii. 16). See SANDAL.

LATIN (Luke xxiii. 38; John xix. 20). The language of the ancient Romans.

LATTICE. A latticed window (Judges v. 28): so also in Sol. Song ii. 9; but in 2 Kings i. 2 it is probably the lattice-work or balustrade before a window or round a balcony. See HOUSE, p. 397.

LAUGH, LAUGHTER. Laughter sometimes implies incredulity (Gen. xviii. 12-15, Matt. ix. 24), sometimes derision (Neh. ii. 19), sometimes joy (Gen. xxi. 6; Psal. cxxvi. 2; Luke vi. 21), and sometimes the consciousness of security (Job v. 22). When God is said to laugh, the phrase is to express scornful indignation (Psal. ii. 4, xxxvii. 13; Prov. i. 26).

LAYER. One of the utensils of the tabernacle, to contain the water necessary for the ablutions of the priests during their ministrations. It was made of the metal mirrors of the women, and consisted of a large basin and a foot or pedestal (Exod. xxx. 18-21, xxxviii. 8). It was to stand in the court of the tabernacle, between the sacred tent and the altar (xl. 30-32). Possibly the sacrifices were also washed in this laver. When the temple was built, a much larger basin, called the molten sea, was constructed for the priests; while, for the washing of the things offered, ten lavers were made, each holding forty baths, about three hundred gallons. Five of them were placed on the right hand, and five on the left (2 Chron. iv. 6). These lavers stood upon square bases mounted on wheels, and were ornamented with figures of cherubim, lions, and palm-trees. Possibly the bases or stands received the water drawn from the lavers (1 Kings vii. 27-40). But it is very difficult to understand from the description, minute as it is, exactly how the lavers and bases were constructed. See Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. pp. 129-134.

LAW. A definite commandment imposed on intelligent beings by competent authority. But the term is also extended to inanimate things, and then it implies a property or particular mode of sequence. Thus the motions of the heavenly bodies are said to be in obedience to certain laws, often called laws of nature. No law can enforce itself. Compliance with it, and penalties in case of its infraction, depend upon the power of the law-giver. We must therefore be careful not to regard a law as something apart from him who originally established it. The laws of nature just referred to are but the result of the Creator's will, the forms of his government, which could not hold a single moment except through the continuing influence of his authority.

According to our notion of law, it is visible everywhere, for the sustentation and well-being of the whole frame-work of creation. It is thus that from causes flow corresponding effects. If we could imagine it otherwise, if, the causes being the same, the effects were different, from machinery so disorganized destruction must ensue. Hence we may appreciate the fault of disobedience to moral laws: it disappoints the whole purpose of the creature's being, and must be followed by rectification or punishment. It is not without ample ground, then, that Hooker has said, 'Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world: all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power; but angels, and men, and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy' (Eccles. Pol., book i. 16).

Of physical laws our knowledge is gathered from observation of their effects: results are laid together; and from the comparison the operation of the regulating law which governs them is deduced. From some natural effects, too, certain higher conclusions may be sometimes drawn; as when St. Paul shows that 'by the things that are made' 'the eternal power and Godhead' of the Deity might be seen (Rom. i. 20). But generally moral laws must be known from God himself, either by some principle which he implants in the mind, as the natural conscience, or 'by the actual revelations which he makes. The word 'law' is occasionally used in scripture in a large sense, but more frequently, with the article prefixed, or other limitation, to express God's revealed will, specially that which was made known in the earlier dispensation, or that written in the Pentateuch. Hence 'the law' occurs sometimes in a kind of opposition to that fuller display of the divine purpose manifested in Christ: e.g. 'The law was given by Moses; but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (John i. 17: comp. Gal. iii. 2, 5, 18).

By the deeds of the law it is repeatedly said no one is justified in God's sight (Rom. iii. 20, 28), because they are imperfect, and do not reach that exact conformity with the divine will which is necessarily required: in men's sight, however, they do justify, as evidencing the principle which is working in the heart, without which evidence we cannot suppose that the principle exists (James ii. 14-26). This topic, however, need not be pursued here. See JUSTIFICATION.

The law, as noted above, sometimes comprehensively signifies the whole of the Old Testament revelation, as where, in John x. 34, a psalm (lxxxii. 6) is referred to under the name. But the code delivered by Moses is that more properly so termed, and it will be now examined. It is usual to distribute its provisions into moral, ceremonial, and political. This distinction indeed is not perfectly accurate: a ceremonial observance, for example, might have also a moral and a political aspect. But similar objections would lie to every other mode of classification: it will therefore be adhered to here.

The moral law includes those precepts which regulate a man's conduct towards his Creator, and towards his fellow-creatures. It is embodied in the ten commandments or words (so they are called in the original) delivered on Sinai (Exod. xx. 1-17), and repeated with no substantial difference by Moses (Deut. v. 6-21); and it has been condensed by our Lord into two emphatic sentences, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind': 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself' (Matt. xxii. 37-40). These are perfect laws: if really fulfilled they would constitute a sufficient righteousness before God: their end and object is complete holiness of heart and life.

The ceremonial law prescribed the mode of Hebrew worship, and was, besides, constructed with an elaborate reference to the great gospel doctrines which should be at last fully revealed to mankind. In the performance of its rites intelligent devotion would be called forth, and men's minds prepared for future development. Suited for a present purpose, these rites were also shadows, with a definite relation to the substance which was to supersede them. They were types and figures of better things to come (Gal. iv. 3-5). They were connected with the moral law because, while that demanded undivided reverence to God, they showed how that reverence might be paid; and when the moral law was broken they held out the hope of reparation for the fault. They were connected with the political law; for they separated Israel from other nations, and with their sanctions were, so to speak, the frame-work of the theocracy.

The political law regulated the relations of man to man in society, exhibited God in his theocratical aspect as the legislator and monarch of Israel, and constituted the statutes of his kingdom. These statutes were excellent; but in the nature of things they were not perfect. Their excellence consisted in their adaptation to the people to whom they were given. Human legislators are perfectly aware that it is necessary to educate men up to a good system. That political constitution, which is the pride and blessing of those who know how to use and enjoy it, might inflict the most fatal evils on a nation which did not understand and was not prepared for it. Laws therefore are made suited to the growth of those for whom they are intended. They should be a little in advance of the age, to lead men gradually forward: were they more than that little, they would be as useless as a musical instrument in the hands of one who had never learned to touch it, and whose rude handling would produce not harmony but discord; they would be as dangerous as a sword in the grasp of a savage, which he would use for mischief, not for legitimate defence. God's wisdom, then, is seen in fitting the system of law he promulgated to the more rude and untutored state of the Hebrew people. It mitigated many evils: it contributed to refine and ameliorate their habits; and it is no impeachment of its merit to say that there might and would come a state of society which had outgrown it. Our Lord distinctly announced this principle when he said that Moses, for the hardness of their hearts, suffered the Israelites to put away their wives (Matt. xix. 8). The concession was made to bar greater enormities. So slavery was regulated, not prohibited. It is for want of perceiving this that some have fallen into serious error, and have dared to charge God foolishly. They have forgotten that it was a corrupt world for which the legislation was to be.

There is no ground for attributing inhumanity to the Mosaic code. A few of its provisions may be noted. It embodies, first of all, the principle that crime must be regarded not merely as a breach of human law, but as sin against God. No other code has taught this high doctrine. Hence the stringency of its enactments, because disobedience was a fault against the heavenly King. Besides, stringency is no defect. It is for the welfare of the governed. In barbarous countries laws are not stringent, except when some special interest is involved. They are often evaded: they may be tampered with. And the uncertainty of their application encourages crime. It has been said that the penalties of the Mosaic code were severe. They were less so than in many civilized countries in modern times. The punishment of death was inflicted for but four or five classes of crimes, murder, treason (which in the theocracy included witchcraft, idolatry, &c.), man-stealing, foul sensuality, and perverse filial disobedience. Less severe penalties would have altogether failed in checking the peculiar tendencies of Israel to crime. And the actual punishment was not cruel: there was neither torture nor prolonged suffering inflicted. But look at the positive side of Hebrew legislation. Observe its care for human life (Deut. xxi. 1-9, xxii. 8), its consideration for the poor (Lev. xix. 9, 10), its inculcation of charity (Deut. xv. 11), its injunctions that no servant should go forth from his master empty (12-14), its provisions for general release (Lev. xxv.), its regulation of pledges (Deut. xxiv. 6, 10-12), its enactment that wages should be punctually paid (15), its protection of an escaped slave (xxiii. 15, 16), its setting apart seasons of rejoicing in which all were to share (xvi. 11), its exemptions from military service (xx. 5-7, xxiv. 5), its humane care of animals (Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Deut. xxii. 1-7, xxv. 4)—surely, in these and many other particulars which might be named, the Mosaic code gives unmistakeable proof that it was no barbarous head that devised, no rash hand that penned it (see Sewell on Humaneness of Mosaic Code in Biblioth. Sacr., Apr. 1862, pp. 368-384; Bp. Browne, The Pentateuch, pp. 81-86).

The law of Moses had its peculiar and most suitable position in that it was preparatory to a better covenant. In no sense did it contradict the coming dispensation: it was the seed of the future tree: it was the elementary introduction to a more developed system. And thus our Lord declared that he came not to destroy but to fulfil it (Matt. v. 17), to reveal that which it pre-signified, to give all its types their perfect realization, to establish that spiritual kingdom which carried to its highest glory the theocratic principle of the earlier polity, to inspire the only effectual motive which could ensure obedience to its moral precepts, and thus to be 'the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth' (Rom. x. 4). The law was imperfect only when it was stretched beyond its measure. It was 'weak through the flesh' (viii. 3); and the fault of the Jews was that they did not recognize its true character as introductory, as leading to, and completed by Christ. It was when it was thus perverted from its real signification that the apostles had to correct the error, denouncing, not the law itself, but the miserable use that was made of the law. Even under the Mosaic dispensation, righteousness was not obtained by legal observance. Hence the necessity of a constant repetition of the sacrifices prescribed (Heb. x. 1-4). So that from the elder testament St. Paul argues for the righteousness of faith (Rom. iv.). But it is not to be concluded that the law is in no respect now binding upon believers in Christ. So far as it was political, indeed, it came to an end when the Jews were no longer a state, and settled people. So far as it was ceremonial, its shadows disappeared before the substantive things which they betokened. But, in so far as its precepts exhibit the pure character of God the law-giver, they are a moral obligation upon his servants. His holy commandments become their delight. So that for any to profess to belong to him, and yet to disregard his revealed will, would be a monstrous contradiction.

Crimes against the Mosaic law were visited with specified punishments. Some acts, indeed, were reserved to the peculiar vengeance of God; but for most of them the penalty was named, sometimes capital, sometimes of a secondary nature. Distinctions were made between those committed presumptuously, or 'with a high hand,' and those which flowed rather from human infirmity. But more on this topic need not be said here. See PUNISHMENTS.

LAWYER. A person skilled in the law (Tit. iii. 13). The lawyers mentioned in the Gospels were Mosaic jurists, whose special province was the interpretation of the law (Matt. xxii. 35; Luke x. 25). The person who is in these passages said to have interrogated our Lord is elsewhere called (Mark xii. 28) 'one of the scribes.' It has been inferred, therefore, that lawyers and scribes were identical, and that they differed only in that the scribes were the public, the lawyers the private, expounders of the law. The term 'scribe,' however, is of more general application: it was an official title, and might include lawyers.

LAYING ON OF HANDS. A significant ordinance used as an outward means for the transference of responsibility, and the communication of spiritual gifts, whether in the exercise of supernatural power or as designating or qualifying for some office in the church (Lev. iii. 2, 13, xvi. 21; Numb. xxvii. 23; Matt. xix. 15; Mark v. 23, vi. 5, xvi. 18; Acts vi. 6, viii. 17, 19, xiii. 3, xix. 6, xxviii. 8; 1 Tim. v. 22; Heb. vi. 2). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF. For the laying on of hands after baptism, whence has descended the rite of confirmation, which is practised through the larger part of the Christian church, see Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xii. chaps. 1, 2, 3.

LAZARUS (God his help, or, as some suggest, there is no help).—1. A name introduced by our Lord into that remarkable parable, in which he exposes the carnal and luxurious selfishness of the worldly man placed in sharp contrast with the poorest, exhibits the change in the world of spirits, and delivers an impressive warning, partaking of the character of prophecy, of the rejection of himself and his kingdom by those whom the law and the prophets failed to humble and convince (Luke xvi. 19-31).—2. One, perhaps the youngest, of a family at Bethany whom Jesus loved. He died, and was buried, and was restored to life by Christ's almighty power, after being in the grave four days. This wonderful miracle enraged the Jews and incited them to seek our Lord's destruction: Lazarus, too, they wished to destroy; as his life was a standing evidence for Christ, inclining many to believe in him (John xi., xii. 1-11). We hear nothing more of Lazarus in scripture: perhaps it was felt that one who had seen the eternal world and was restored to this must not be spoken of as a common man: there would be an awe regarding him which would make his history one to be pondered over, not talked about. And this may be a reason why the narrative is given in but one of the Gospels, that written after Lazarus had died again. Of none of those raised by Christ or his apostles from the dead have we any later account. For the rest of their life on earth they must have been wonders to themselves, and must naturally have dwelt in privacy. About Lazarus tradition has been busy; but the stories that are told are not trustworthy.

LEAD. A well-known metal: ancient workings of it have been discovered in the mountains between the Red sea and the Nile; it is said to exist also near mount Sinai. But it is not extensively used in the east; nor do we find many notices of it in scripture. Its weight is alluded to, to illustrate the sinking of the Egyptians in the sea (Exod. xv. 10). Generally, however, it is mentioned in connection with the refining or purifying of more precious metals, for which purpose it was employed (Jer. vi. 29; Ezek. xxii. 18, 20). There is a difference of opinion in regard to Job xix. 23, 24: it might be that engraving on a leaden tablet was meant; but Carey, after some other critics, believes that lead was 'poured into the cavities of the letters after they had been cut in the rock, for the purpose of preserving the sharpness of their edges' (The Book of Job, note on xix. 23, 24, p. 264). Lead is also mentioned in Numb. xxxi. 22; Zech. v. 7, 8, being probably used for weights, and it may be supposed to have been the material of which a plummet was made (Amos vii. 7; Acts xxvii. 28): see Napier's Ancient Workers and Artificers in Metal, pp. 123-131.

LEAF. The leaves of trees, which are organs of respiration, and which, from being first green and flourishing, afterwards fade and fall off, to be succeeded by another generation of the same kind, are frequently applied to illustrate prosperity (Psal. i. 3; Jer. xvii. 8; Ezek. xvii. 12), or decay (Job xiii. 25; Isai. i. 30, lxiv. 6; Jer. viii. 13; Ezek. xvii. 9). Other illustrations are also taken from leaves (Lev. xxvi. 36; Isai. xxxiv. 4; Dan. iv. 12, 14, 21; Mark xiii. 28; Rev. xxii. 2).

The 'leaves' of folding doors are mentioned in 1 Kings vi. 32, marg., 34; Isai. xlv. 1; Ezek. xli. 24.

The 'leaves' of the roll (Jer. xxxvi. 23) were the columns in which the roll was written.

LEAGUE. See ALLIANCE.

LE'AH (weariéd). The elder daughter of Laban. Her eyes were delicate and weak (Gen. xxix. 16, 17). By her father Laban's deceit she was married to Jacob: she bore him six sons and a daughter, but seems to have been ever painfully sensible that her husband's affections were given mainly to her sister Rachel (21-25, 31-35, xxx. 1-21). She willingly accompanied Jacob into Canaan (xxxii.); and there she died, before the house of Israel went down into Egypt, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (xlix. 31). In after-times the fruitfulness of Leah and Rachel was implored for a new-married woman (Ruth iv. 11).

LEATHER. Existing specimens prove that the Egyptians were well acquainted with the art of tanning. Pieces of leather dyed various colours have been discovered in their tombs; and they applied this article to a vast many different uses. The Israelites must have learned from them. There could be no lack of the skins of animals in Israel, so numerous were their sacrifices; and we find these skins, more or less dressed and prepared, used sometimes for clothing (Job xxxi. 20; Heb. xi. 37), sometimes for coverings (Exod. xxvi. 14), for girdles (2 Kings i. 8; Matt. iii. 4), and for other purposes (Lev. xiii. 48, 49). Leather, too, was employed for writing upon. The trade of a tanner was in very low esteem among the Jews, and on account of the unpleasant smell was usually carried on outside a city, near rivers or by the sea-side (Acts ix. 43, x. 6, 32).

LEAVEN. Any substance that promotes fermentation. Sour dough is generally used in the east for this purpose: lees of wine are also employed. The fermentation produced is a kind of putrefaction: indeed it is distributed into three kinds, the vinous, the acetous, the putrefactive. All leaven was prohibited in meat-offerings (Lev. ii. 11, vii. 12, viii. 2; Numb. vi. 15), and specially in the paschal feast of the Hebrews (Exod. xii. 3, 19, 20); whence this was often called 'the feast of unleavened bread' (Matt. xxvi. 17). The nature of leaven, affecting the whole lump of the substance to which it is added, furnishes some striking illustrations in scripture (xiii. 33; 1 Cor. v. 6); as also does the corruption it had undergone: thus we have warnings in Luke xii. 1; 1 Cor. v. 7, 8, where the word is symbolically used for corruptness of life, or doctrine.

LEBA'NA or LEBA'NAH (the white, the moon). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 45; Neh. vii. 48).

LEB'ANON (white, sc. the white mountain). A very celebrated mountain-chain to the north of Palestine. The name occurs first in the Pentateuch, where it is said that the inheritance of Israel should reach to its base (Deut. i. 7, iii. 25, xi. 24).

Lebanon may be considered as comprehending two distinct parallel ranges, which commence about 33° 20' N. lat., run upwards of 100 miles from SW. to NE., and enclose a long valley called Cœle-syria, from five to eight miles in width. This is the 'valley of Lebanon' (Josh. xi. 17); and it retains now an exactly-corresponding name, el-Buka'a, 'the valley.' It is a kind of prolongation of the Jordan valley, and joins on northward to that of the Orontes. Of these two parallel ranges the westernmost is Lebanon proper, Jebel esh-Sharki; while the other was distinguished as 'Lebanon toward the sun-rising' (xiii. 5), and is commonly known as Anti-libanus, now Jebel el-Gharbi; the southern part of which is separated by the fertile Wady et-Teim from Lebanon and the Galilean hills. The Lebanon mountains are mainly of white limestone; but there are sandstone belts on the western slopes. Fossils abound in the limestone rocks; and iron has been obtained in considerable quantities from the sandstone (comp. Deut. viii. 9, xxxiii. 25). Coal also has been found.

Lebanon, the western range, commencing at the deep gorge of the Leontes, now the Litany, a stream which empties itself into the Mediterranean a little to the north of Tyre, stretches north-eastward parallel to the coast, and enclosing the narrow Phœnician plain as far as the river Eleutherus, the Nahr el-Kebir. Here the plain of Emesa opens out, so repeatedly referred to in scripture as 'the entering of Hamath' (Numb. xxxiv. 8; 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xiv. 25). The upper part of the range is bare and barren, with grey rounded summits, and here and there some stunted trees. But at a lower elevation the western slopes are of glorious beauty. There are towering rocks and wild ravines, bold promontories jutting out into the Mediterranean, evergreen oaks and pines clothing the mountain's side, while fig-trees, vines, mulberry and olive-trees, abound on terraced heights or in picturesque glens. Corn is cultivated in every possible nook: villages nestle amid the cliffs; and convents crown the summits of well-nigh perpendicular rocks; while ever and anon the eye of the traveller rests on the sunny waters of the 'great sea,' into which many streams of historic note descend, having cut their way through deep and rugged gorges.

All who have visited these scenes speak with rapture of them. 'Never shall I forget,' says Dr. Buchanan, 'the magnificence of the view which burst upon us when we suddenly turned the narrow ridge of the mountain. Before gaining this point we had many times turned round to gaze . . . on the scene we were leaving'—he was journeying from Damascus and Baalbek—'. . . But, grand as this view was, it seemed almost tame and common-place in comparison with the wonderful . . . sight that opened upon us when we at length reached the summit of this gigantic mountain-wall, and looked over to the other side . . . Light fleecy clouds were sailing across our line of vision from one mountain-side to another. The glorious blue heaven was above our heads. Far down beneath us, at the bottom of the gorge, the plain, gleaming in bright sunshine, seemed almost at our feet . . . There was Tripoli . . . shining brightly above the dark foliage of the groves and gardens around it; and there was the sea as blue as the sky' (Notes of a Clerical Furlough, pp. 432, 433). Doubtless Lebanon was a 'goodly mountain'; and the breezes that blew from the heights came charged with aromatic fragrance (Sol. Song iv. 11; Hos. xiv. 6, 7). Well might the inspired Hebrew poets borrow their similes from its grandeur and its beauty, its cool streams, its noble forests (Psal. lxxvii. 16; Sol. Song iv. 15, v. 15; Isai. ii. 13; Jer. xviii. 14; Hos. xiv. 5). And far renowned were the cedars of Lebanon, the chosen material of royal palace and holy temple (1 Kings v. 6, 8-10, 13-15, vii. 2-12; Ezra iii. 7) clustered in a vast recess (on, it is said, the moral of a glacier), round the head of which high summits rise; but for a description of these see CEDARS. Besides the well-known grove, Mr. Tristram has recently found a forest of cedars at the roots of Lebanon and near the sea (Quart. Review, Oct. 1864, p. 402, note).

The height of the mountains of Lebanon is generally from 6000 to 8000 feet: the loftiest peaks, however, rise considerably higher. The Summit is above 9000, and Jebel Mukhmel about 10,200 feet above the sea-level; while the Jebel Arnêto is very little lower: some of these summits are generally clothed with snow. Wild beasts as of old, hyænas, wolves, bears, and panthers, are numerous in the recesses of the range (2 Kings xiv. 9; Sol. Song iv. 8).

The ancient inhabitants are described as the Gibletes and Hivites (Josh. xiii. 5; Judges iii. 3). The modern Jebail is perhaps identical with Gebal (Ezek. xxvii. 9), a city of the first-named tribe. Now the northern parts of the mountain are peopled by the industrious Maronite Christians, amounting, it has been estimated, to 150,000. Their principal occupation is rearing the silk-worm: hence their villages are surrounded with gardens of mulberry-trees. An interesting account of these is given by Risk Allah Effendi (Thistle and Cedar of Lebanon, chap. xx. pp. 352, &c.). In the southern parts there are the Druses or Druzes; and the aspect of many of the Lebanon villages has been of late sorely changed by the out-break between these tribes.

On the east Lebanon descends abruptly to the Cœle-syrian plain, on the opposite side of which runs Anti-libanus. This range extends from the plateau of Bashan, not far from Baniyas, north to the conspicuous Hermon, Jebel es-Sheikh (see HERMON), and then, having thrown out three radiating spurs, the main ridge stretches north-east to the plain of Emesa. The height of this range is generally about 5000 feet. It is bleaker and more barren than Lebanon, more thinly peopled, and abounds more in wild beasts. Yet there are some beautiful glens; and from these heights descend the Abana and the Pharpar. Anti-libanus, as before noted, is just mentioned as a chain in scripture; but Hermon frequently occurs. It is Hermon, doubtless, that is described as 'the tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus' (Sol. Song vii. 4).

LEBA'OTH (lionesses) (Josh. xv. 32). See BETH-BIREI, BETH-LEBAOTH.

LEBBE'US (possibly hearty, courageous). One of the names of the apostle Jude (Matt. x. 3). See JUDE.

LEBO'NAH (frankincense). A place not far from Shiloh (Judges xxi. 19). It has been identified with el-Lubban, about four hours south of Nablous.

LE'CAH (a going, journey). A name found in the genealogy of Judah: it is probably that of a town (1 Chron. iv. 21).

LEECH. See HORSE-LEECH.

LEEK. A species of vegetable food, after which the Israelites longed in the wilderness (Numb. xi. 5). The same word is elsewhere rendered 'grass' (1 Kings xviii. 5;

2 Kings xix. 26; Job xl. 15; Psal. xxxvii. 2), 'herb' (Job viii. 12), 'hay' (Prov. xxvii. 25; Isai. xv. 6). The specific translation 'leek' is questionable. The fenu-grec, Trigonella fœnum-græcum, may be meant, an annual plant, resembling clover, known in Egypt by the name of helbeh, the food both of cattle and of men. Sonnini describes it as 'tied up in large bunches, which the inhabitants eagerly purchase at a low price, and which they eat with incredible greediness, without any kind of seasoning. They pretend that this singular diet is an excellent stomachic, a specific against worms and dysentery, in fine, a preservative against a great number of maladies. They in fact regard it as endowed with so many good qualities, that it is in their estimation a true panacea.' The Allium porrum, or common leek, is sufficiently well known.

LEES. Wine was preserved in strength and colour by standing upon the dregs or lees. In Isai. xxv. 6 the meaning is generous old wine, racked off or purified from the lees. Some, however, have suggested that rich preserves made from grapes may be intended in the place. There is a proverbial expression occasionally used, 'to settle upon the lees' (Jer. xlviii. 11; Zeph. i. 12), that is, to live a life of quiet indifference and sloth; while 'to drink the lees' or 'dregs' (Psal. lxxv. 8) was to endure the extremity of suffering.

LEGION. A division of the Roman army: the number of men in it differed at various times. Originally a legion consisted of about 3000; but in the time of Augustus it contained about 6000: there were also cavalry attached, to the amount of one-tenth of the infantry. Each legion was divided into ten cohorts, each cohort into three maniples, and each maniple into two centuries, which, according to the name, should comprise one hundred men. The word 'legion' came in the course of time to express indefinitely a large number: so it is used in Matt. xxvi. 53; Mark v. 9, 15; Luke viii. 30; and so we frequently now use it.

LEHA'BIM (flames, inhabitants of a dry and scorched land?). Descendants of Mizraim (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chron. xi. 11). They are certainly the Libyans, being generally coupled with Ethiopia and Egypt. Lybia was bounded by the Nile on the east, the Atlantic on the west, by the Mediterranean on the north, the southern limits being variable. Lehabim is often found in a contracted form, Lubim (2 Chron. xii. 3, xvi. 8; Dan. xi. 43, Hebr.; Nah. iii. 9).

LE'HI (jaw-bone). The name of a place or district on the borders of Philistia, where Samson slew a thousand Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass. The name fully was Ramath-Lebi, 'the hill of Lehi,' so called perhaps from a ridge of craggy serrated rocks, or from Samson's casting away—such would be the meaning with a slight change of vowels—of the jaw-bone. Athirst and weary with the slaughter he had made, he cried to the Lord; and thereupon a stream gushed forth, not from the jaw-bone, but from the place Lehi (Judges xv. 14-19).

LEMECH (Gen. v. 25, marg.). See LAMECH.

LEM'UEL (of God, sc. created, or, possibly, devoted to God). A king to whom instructions were given by his mother (Prov. xxxi. 2-9). Various conjectures have been hazarded respecting Lemuel; but nothing can be said of him with certainty.

LEND. See PLEDGE.

LENTILES. A leguminous plant, Ervum lens, producing a kind of pulse resembling small beans. They are chiefly used for pottage, which is of a red or chocolate colour. Such was that for which Esau sold his birth-right (Gen. xxv. 29-34). An illustration of this is furnished in the tomb-paintings of Egypt, where there is a representation of a man cooking lentiles for soup or porridge. Among the provisions brought to David while he lay at Mahanaim in Absalom's rebellion, we find lentiles (2 Sam. xvii. 28); and it was in a field of lentiles that an exploit of one of his warriors was performed (xxiii. 11). Sometimes lentiles, in seasons of scarcity, and by the poor, were employed for making bread (Ezek. iv. 9). Mixed with barley they are said to be frequently so used in the southern parts of Egypt.

LEOPARD. The original word thus rendered implies spotted or speckled, and probably includes various feline species, which are distinguished by us as leopards, panthers, &c. The animal meant would seem to be the panther, now not uncommon in the Lebanon, and occasionally to be found elsewhere in Syria. It is much smaller than a lioness, but heavy in proportion to its bulk. It prowls about by night, is cat-like in its habits, and is mischievous to domestic cattle, sometimes even to men. There is a larger variety in Asia Minor. The leopard is noticed in scripture as infesting Lebanon and Anti-libanus (Sol. Song iv. 8): its fierceness is indicated (Isai. xl. 6); its mode of watching for its prey (Jer. v. 6; Hos. xiii. 7); the spottings of its hide (Jer. xiii. 23); its fleetness (Hab. i. 8); and it is also symbolically introduced (Dan. vii. 6; Rev. xiii. 2).

LEPER, LEPROSY. The leprosy was a fearful disease, commonly occurring in Palestine, and repeatedly mentioned in both the Old and the New Testaments. According to a strange perversion of the sacred narrative, the Israelites are said to have been expelled from Egypt because they were leprous (Tacitus, Hist., lib. v. 3; Joseph., Contr. Apion., lib. i. 26). Exaggerated and falsified as this account is, there may possibly be some ground-work of fact. Skin-diseases are prevalent in hot climates; and, if we consider the condition of the Israelites while in slavery, forced to grinding toil, working in the furnaces, and with small means very likely of attending to health and personal cleanliness, we may very well conceive that such maladies would spread, and manifest a more virulent type than under other circumstances. Certain it is that reference is occasionally made in the law to the evil diseases of Egypt, which it is said shall afflict the Israelites if they disregard the divine commandments (Exod.

xv. 26; Deut. xxviii. 27, 35). There were also lepers among the people in the wilderness, whom Moses was directed to remove from the camp (Numb. v. 1-4).

Leprosy rendered the person afflicted with it unclean. It was therefore necessary to have some precise marks by which it might be distinguished. And the decision was appropriately left to the priests: from the directions given to them we may gather information of the nature and symptoms of the disease. The first symptom was a swelling, a bald scab, a bright spot in the flesh. It might, however, be but a scab, or a boil, a mere temporary ailment of the skin, which, after a week or two, would pass away. But, if it spread, if it seemed deeper than the skin, if the hair of the part affected turned white or yellow, if there was the appearance of raw flesh, these were fatal omens: it was evidently the plague of leprosy: the man was unclean. But it is remarkable that, if the whole of a person's body was covered, if all his flesh was white, he was to be pronounced ceremonially clean. Either the disease, then, by its extension, must have assumed a milder type, or else the spreading eating character of it must have been that which essentially polluted, so that, when it could spread no more, the pollution had ceased. Baldness of the head was by no means symptomatic of leprosy; but, if in a bald head a white reddish sore appeared, the priest had not to look further, whether it spread or not: it was the plague in its worst form: the man was utterly unclean. And he that was a leper was to be separated from society: he was to manifest all the tokens of calamitous mourning: his clothes were to be rent and his head made bare, while the lower part of his face was muffled; and, in order to prevent clean persons from coming near and contracting defilement from him, he was to cry out with his wailing voice, 'Unclean, unclean!' (Lev. xiii. 1-46).

There were doubtless various kinds of leprosy; and some of the rabbinical writers have multiplied them. Attempts there have been to classify these, and to make the different forms of Hebrew leprosy, as expressed by different words, correspond with those of the Greek physicians. Any purely-medical disquisition would be out of place here. But it is an interesting question whether the Syrian leprosy as at present existing (which seems to have been carried by the crusaders over Europe, though now, in most places, providentially extinct) is identical with the disease so repeatedly mentioned in scripture. The accounts given by modern travellers of what they have witnessed are positively frightful. Dr. Thomson describes his horror when suddenly coming upon a crowd of beggars, who, he says, 'held up toward me their handless arms,' while 'unearthly sounds gurgled through throats without palates.' The disease, he adds, 'is feared as contagious: it is certainly and inevitably hereditary: it is loathsome and polluting: its victim is shunned by all as unclean: it is most deceitful in its action. New-born children of leprous parents are often as pretty and as healthy in appearance as any ; but, by and by, its presence and working become visible in some of the signs described in Lev. xiii. The "scab" comes on by degrees in different parts of the body : the hair falls from the head and eye-brows ; the nails loosen, decay, and drop off : joint after joint of the fingers and toes shrink up, and slowly fall away. The gums are absorbed ; and the teeth disappear. The nose, the eyes, the tongue, and the palate, are slowly consumed ; and, finally, the wretched victim sinks into the earth and disappears, while medicine has no power to stay the ravages of the fell disease, or even to mitigate sensibly its tortures' (The Land and the Book, pp. 651, 653, 654). It is argued that some of the worst results of the disease, elephantiasis, as now witnessed, are not adverted to in Lev. xiii. But it is forgotten that the Mosaic record naturally describes only the initiatory stages of the malady—how to distinguish it on its first appearance, in order to immediate separation. There was no need to touch upon its later development. And there is a remarkable passage in the Pentateuch, which seems in no uncertain language to point to what the leprosy running its awful course then (as well as now) became. When Miriam was struck with it, and Aaron, the partner of her presumptuous sin, had, as priest, to look on her and pronounce her leprous, he exclaimed, in his agony of entreaty that Moses would intercede for her, 'Let her not be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb' (Numb. xii. 10-12). Words could hardly depict more vividly the modern wasting of the leper's body. It is very possible that all leprosy might not be of this extreme type: different kinds, as above noted, are described in scripture ; and we are told that diseases vary according to climate, and by lapse of time, so as to assume distinct forms, and run in different courses. It may be so here. But, upon the whole, the conclusion seems a necessary one, that the Syrian leprosy now (of which, too, fresh types frequently occur) corresponds in essential characteristics with that of which we read in scripture.

Dr. Tilbury Fox has lately investigated the subject. He thinks the reference in the Mosaic law is specially to early stages of elephantiasis: the two forms of berat corresponding to the melas and leukē of Celsus, the morphæa alba and nigra of our times ; while the boak of Moses is the alpos of Celsus, and the lepra vulgaris of our times—the three (melas, leukē, alpos) constituting the vittiligo of Celsus. In the Lebanon range there are two forms of eruption known, designated by the generic term baras: one, that of the Arabs, is an early condition of the elephantiasis Græcorum: the other (unconnected with the former) is called baras el Israïly, and is Willan's lepra vulgaris: the disease, therefore, supposed peculiar to the Hebrews, still exists as lepra vulgaris: see paper read at the Medical Society of London, noticed in The Lancet, Jan. 20, 1866, pp. 76, 77.

The sacred history shows us that leprosy, fearful as in its lightest form it was, did not always incapacitate from active life. Naaman, though a leper, still seems to have retained his position as captain of the Syrian hosts. The leprosy of which he was so wonderfully cured was in judgment inflicted on the wretched Gehazi (2 Kings v. 1, 27). A difficulty has sometimes been felt as to Gehazi's admission afterwards to the presence of the king of Israel (viii. 4, 5). But we do not know whether the events of Elisha's history are placed exactly in chronological order: the conversation might have been before Gehazi's punishment. Moreover, it does not appear that lepers were rigidly excluded from converse with other persons: they were to dwell apart, and not to be touched ; but surely they might be spoken with. Still further, when leprosy had covered the whole body, the man was, as we have seen, ceremonially clean. Possibly—the expressions used make it probable—Gehazi's body was so entirely covered. No rank exempted a man from the ceremonial defilement, and consequent disabilities. When king Uzziah was smitten, and the leprosy rose in his forehead, he was thrust out at once from the temple, and had to dwell in a separate house till his dying-day (2 Chron. xxvi. 19-21).

The power and compassion of Christ were wonderfully displayed in that he healed the lepers. No disease was too virulent for him to cure ; no victim too loathsome for him to pity. There is inexpressible tenderness in his treatment of a sufferer, as narrated in Matt. viii. 2, 3 ; Mark i. 40-42.

Admirably does this act of our Saviour depict his gracious dealing in the cure of sin, that leprosy of the soul. There is a deep moral lesson taught in the history of Hebrew leprosy. The judgment of God—extraordinarily so in many cases—it was a symbol of sin. And hence lepers were proverbially called 'the smitten,' i.e. the smitten of God ; so that, from Messiah being termed smitten (Isai. liii. 4) it was strangely supposed by some Jewish writers that he was to be a leper. But, just as the fatal taint, not visible at first in the child of leprous parents, gradually develops itself, becomes a malady which human skill cannot cure or check (2 Kings v. 7), and which masters at last every faculty and disables every limb, ending in a doleful death, so does sin, the taint inherited from Adam, by degrees appear, and, unless checked and conquered and eradicated by divine grace, run its wretched course to death, the penalty of sin. 'If left unchecked by power divine,' says Dr. Thomson, 'the leprosy of sin will eat into the very texture of the soul, and consume everything lovely and pure in human character. . . . There is only one Physician in the universe who can cleanse the soul. . . . he says to many a moral leper, 'Go in peace: thy sins be forgiven thee'; and it happens unto them according to their faith. To my mind there is no conceivable manifestation of divine power more triumphantly confirmatory of Christ's divinity than the cleansing of a leper with a word. When looking at these handless, eyeless, tongueless wrecks of humanity, the unbelieving question starts unbidden, "Is it possible that they can be restored?" Yes, it is more than possible. It has been accomplished again and again by the mere volition of Him who spake and it was done. And He who can cleanse the leper can raise the dead, and can also forgive sins, and save the soul. I ask no other evidence of the fact' (p. 654).

When a leper was healed, he was to appear before the priest, that being examined he might be pronounced clean. And he was to undergo a process of purification, which also taught important lessons. It 'had three distinctly-marked stages,' says Dr. Fairbairn. 'The first of these bore respect to his reception into the visible community of Israel, the next to his participation in their sacred character, and the last to his full re-establishment in the favour and fellowship of God.' There were to be two living birds, one to be killed, with the blood of which the restored man was to be sprinkled, while the other was let go. Still seven days must pass; and then, after shaving the hair and washing the clothes, on the eighth day there were to be offerings. With the blood of the trespass-offering, and with oil the man was to be anointed, and as it were consecrated. And then last of all the full atonement was made and the perfect restoration signified (Lev. xiv. 2-32). On this last prescribed rite Dr. Fairbairn remarks, 'When . . . thus far restored—his feet standing within the sacred community of God's people, his head and members anointed with the holy oil of divine refreshment and gladness, he was now permitted and required to consummate the process by bringing a sin-offering, a burnt-offering, and a meat-offering, that his access to God's sanctuary, and his fellowship with God himself, might be properly established. What could more impressively bespeak the arduous and solemn nature of the work, by which the outcast, polluted, and doomed sinner regains an interest in the kingdom and blessing of God? The blood and Spirit of Christ, appropriated by a sincere repentance and a living faith, this . . . alone can accomplish the restoration. Till that is done, there is only exclusion from the family of God, and alienation from the life that is in him. But, that truly done, the child of death lives again, he that was lost is again found' (Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. sect. 8, vol. ii. pp. 383-386).

Of leprosy in garments and houses (Lev. xiii. 47-59, xiv. 33-53) little can be said. It might be propagated by animalculæ or fungus; and the regulations concerning it must have been of a sanitary as well as moral character. It is well known that the disease is now frequently conveyed by clothes.

LETTUS (1 Esdr. viii. 29). Probably Hattush (Ezra viii. 2).

LETU'SHIM (the hammered, sharpened) An Arabian tribe descended from Dedan (Gen. xxv. 3).

LEUM'MIM (peoples, nations). Also an Arabian tribe descended from Dedan (Gen. xxv. 3); possibly those called by Ptolemy Allumcoiti, in the central part of Yemen.

LE'VI (a joining).—1. The third son of Jacob by Leah, who gave him his name as trusting that her husband would, now that she had born him three sons, be joined in affection with her (Gen. xxix. 34). Levi, with his brother Simeon, took the lead in the dreadful vengeance inflicted upon the Shechemites for the defilement of their sister Dinah (xxxiv. 25-31). Jacob viewed their conduct with abhorrence, and, before his death, while prophetically describing the future fortunes of his sons and their posterity, uttered a solemn denunciation upon Simeon and Levi (xlix. 5-7). This appears to have had its full effect in regard to Simeon; but the holy zeal of the Levites on occasion of the golden calf procured them a remarkable blessing and distinction (Exod. xxxii. 26-29). Levi had three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, the heads of the families of the tribe. He died in Egypt at the age of one hundred and thirty seven (Exod. vi. 16). See LEVITES.—2. (Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27). See MATTHEW.—3, 4. Two of our Lord's ancestors (Luke iii. 24, 29).

LEVI'ATHAN. This word, according to its derivation, properly denotes an animal wreathed, gathering itself in folds. Hence, according to Gesenius, it signified sometimes a serpent (Job iii. 8, marg.), sometimes a sea-monster (Psal. civ. 26), and was used in a figurative way of a hostile kingdom (Isai. xxvii. 1), or a cruel enemy (Psal. lxxiv. 14). In the passage last named the allusion would seem to be to Egypt: probably it is so in the denunciation of Isaiah, though there it may be to the Assyrian or Babylonian power. Job iii. 8 is confessedly obscure. It is rendered by Carey, 'Let executors of days note it infamous, who are prepared to provoke the crocodile'; and he illustrates his version by the fact that, though Egyptians generally venerated this reptile, there were those who hunted and destroyed it. The sense of the entire verse he thinks is, 'Let that night be stigmatized with names the most odious, by that particular class of men whose practice it is solemnly to devote certain days to the object of waging war with the evil demon in the person of the crocodile' (The Book of Job, p. 189). Implying, then, generally a monster, the word seems to have sometimes a more precise signification. Such it must have in Job xii.; where it clearly intends a particular creature remarkable for its size, and its power of resisting attack. The conjectures which have been hazarded as to what it was are many, and need not be enumerated here. But an indication has been already given of the quarter to which we are to look; and it may be said that biblical critics are now pretty well agreed that the sacred writer is describing the crocodile. Indeed Dr. Kitto has observed: 'This is so evident, that no one could ever have attempted to show that it was any other creature, but from the necessity supposed . . . by other texts . . . of showing that the leviathan must be something else than a crocodile' (Daily Bible Illustrations, Sec. Ser., eighth week, third day). See CROCODILE. A Jewish legend in regard to Leviathan is found in 2 Esdr. vi. 49, 52.

LE'VIS (1 Esdr. ix. 14). A corruption for 'the Levite' (Ezra x. 15).

LE'VITE, LE'VITES. The descendants of the patriarch Levi, in whose history we have a remarkable example of a prophetic curse (Gen. xlix. 7) literally fulfilled and yet made into a blessing. The sins of the fathers may be visited upon the children (Exod. xx. 5), but penally upon those children alone that partake their fathers' sins (Ezek. xviii. 5-20).

Distinguished persons were early born of this tribe. Moses and Aaron, the great leaders of the movement from Egypt, were Levites (Exod. ii. 1, vi. 16-25). But the Levites did not multiply rapidly. At the first census there were only 22,000 of them, though all the males from a month old were numbered (Numb. iii. 39), fewer than those of any other tribe reckoned above the age of twenty years.

Aaron and his family were soon designated for the priesthood (Exod. xxviii. 1); but nothing was as yet said of the rest of the tribe. It may be supposed, however, that from a feeling of clanship they would be employed by Moses, and would specially adhere to their great tribesman. And an opportunity occurred, while the Israelites were encamped about Sinai, when they evinced a higher principle and stood by Moses, not merely because he was of kin to them, but because his was the cause of God. It was when Moses came down hastily from the mount and espied the golden calf. Anxious to avenge the foul idolatry, he cried, 'Who is on the Lord's side? let him come unto me.' The Levites, we are told, responded to the call, and, at the divine command, slew three thousand of the guilty people (xxxii. 25-29). It was for this, done from the high motive of vindicating God's honour without regard to earthly ties, that the tribe was selected to be Jehovah's peculiar inheritance, his ministers, the privileged servants of his sanctuary (Deut. x. 8, 9, xviii. 1, 2, xxxiii. 8-11). When the first-born of the Egyptians were slain, and those of Israel preserved, God declared—and it was to be a standing ordinance—that whatsoever opened the womb, were it of man or of beast, should be his (Exod. xiii. 2). The first-born of animals fit for sacrifice were to be so offered: others were to be redeemed in a specified way: the first-born of man also were to be redeemed (13). Now at the census there were found 22,273 first-born of Israel: for these, then, the Levites, nearly equal in number, were to be taken in redemption, five shekels a-piece being paid to the priests as redemption-money for the overplus (Numb. iii. 44-51). Some have professed to wonder why the first-born of Israel were so few: for a satisfactory answer to such cavils the reader may consult Birks' Exodus of Israel, chap. vi. pp. 64-77.

The tribe of Levi was composed of three great families, the Kohathites, the Gershonites, and the Merarites. The whole of them were generally to do the service of the tabernacle, and were cleansed and sanctified in a solemn manner (Numb. viii. 5-22); but a special distribution of their work was made among the three families. The Kohathites were to have charge of the sacred vessels, the Gershonites of the hangings and curtains of the tabernacle, while to the Merarites was assigned the care and custody of the boards and pillars thereof. And exact directions were given how each were to perform their office when the Hebrew host was on march through the wilderness (iii. 21-37, iv., vii. 4-9). Their service was to last from twenty-five years of age to fifty (viii. 23-26). Much of this was but a temporary arrangement. It suited a moveable camp; it would not suit a settled nation. Accordingly we find that Moses assigned judicial duties to the Levites, and made them keepers of the book of the law (Deut. xvii. 8-12; comp. xxvii. 14, xxxi. 9, 26). Besides, their numbers would multiply, and they would become far more than would be needful for the actual service of the tabernacle or the temple. Hence, though the great principle was ever to be kept in view, that the tribe was specially the Lord's for his service, we find in later times Levites engaged in various pursuits, holding secular offices, and living very much as the rest of Israel, save that the tenure of their property distributed them through the whole land, instead of their being located as others were in a defined territory of their own.

Moses had, before his death, commanded that forty-eight cities should be allotted to the tribe of Levi, with the suburban districts a thousand cubits from the wall on each side, in order to supply pasture-land for cattle (Numb. xxxv. 1-8). Accordingly, when Canaan was divided among the Israelites, forty-eight cities were selected by lot from the inheritance of the various tribes, thirteen of them being appropriated to the priests, and six being also refuge-cities. The following table exhibits these Levitical cities (Josh. xxi. 1-42; 1 Chron. vi. 54-81). The refuge-cities are marked (R.):—

Thus, it will be observed, the Levites were scattered in Israel. But they had a large inheritance—so many goodly cities in every district of the land. And it must have been a blessed provision for these colonies of sanctified men to be located everywhere, always ready for God's service, the nurseries of holy literature, the models of just and righteous conduct. It was a blessed provision; but, as with the rest of the law, its benefits were but partially reaped. There may be a doubt whether the Levites ever occupied all the cities reserved for them; and, though there are some noble examples which they gave of godly sincerity and self-denial, yet the subsequent history shows us that they were not the working leaven they were intended to be through the masses of Israel.

In addition to their cities, the Levites were to have tithes of all produce; and from these they were to set apart a tithe for the priests (Numb. xviii. 21, 24, 26-31; Neh.

x. 37-39). And it would seem that every third year they were to have an additional tithe shared with the poor; and the rest of the people were charged never to forsake them, but to let them share their abundance and participate in their feasts (Deut. xiv. 27-29, xxvi. 12, 13). Also, if any Levite, not bound to attend on the tabernacle, came up of his own devout mind to take part in the sacred service, his zeal was not to go unrewarded (xviii. 6-8).

It has been observed that it was because of their readiness to avenge the Lord's quarrel that the Levites were selected as his ministers. Once in the wilderness we find them—a considerable body of the tribe at least—ambitiously desiring further pre-eminence, and envying the family of Aaron, who had exclusively the priesthood. This movement was repressed and punished by the destruction of Korah and his company; and, by the sign of Aaron's rod blossoming and yielding fruit, God's immutable purpose was sufficiently declared (Numb. xvi. xvii.). The Levites seem ever after to have acquiesced in their position; and they were relieved of the most onerous duties when, on entering Canaan, the Gibeonites were made hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation and the house of God (Josh. ix. 21, 23, 27).

Nevertheless, as hinted above, the Levites did not in Canaan fill the place which properly belonged to them; and the accounts we gather during the times of the judges are somewhat perplexing, as compared with the ordinances delivered in the Pentateuch. Dr. Kalisch has drawn out a long list of events tending to show that the sacred rites were not performed exclusively or even generally by the priestly tribe, that sacrifices were offered in many places beside the sanctuary, that judges and princes assumed sacerdotal functions, and that the Levites themselves did not seem aware of their religious prerogatives, and even sometimes contributed to set up a kind of worship incompatible with the law to which they owed their standing, and by which they were separated as God's ministers from the rest of the people (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 736-740). Too much stress is unquestionably laid upon some of the examples produced. Occasionally it was by special divine command that sacrifices were offered elsewhere than in the sanctuary (e. g. 1 Chron. xxi. 18, 26). And it by no means follows, when a chief or a private person is said to have offered sacrifice, that he individually and personally exercised the sacerdotal function. In the law itself repeatedly a man is said to offer, when immediately after his part as a layman is expressly distinguished from that which belonged to the priest (e. g. Lev. i. 2, 3, xiv. 30, 31, xxii. 18-21). It is almost superfluous to produce instances of a common figure of speech, as when one is described as doing that which he does really by the ministry of another: let a single case from each Testament suffice. Abaz is said to have 'burnt his burnt-offering'; and yet it is clear that the priest burnt 'the king's burnt-sacrifice' (2 Kings xvi. 12, 13, 15). Our Lord, again, is spoken of as baptizing; and yet we know that personally he did not perform the rite: it was by the hands of his disciples (John iv. 1, 2). Yet, after making full allowance of this kind, we cannot evade to a certain extent the conclusion that the Levites for a long time did not secure hierarchical power, were little regarded as the religious teachers of the nation, and were indeed in a state of dependence and helplessness.

The reason must be sought in the failure of the people generally to realize their high destiny. If the Levites did not obtain possession of the cities allotted to them, the other tribes shrunk equally from occupying their territories (Judges i. 21-36). If the Levites failed in carrying out their peculiar organization, other tribes were alike remiss, every one, from the want of some central authority, doing that which was right in his own eyes (xvii. 6). Besides, the sacerdotal tribe was small in point of numbers: they were not able, from the paucity of men, to supply the demand. For we find a wandering Levite eagerly caught up, first by a household, and afterwards by a section of a tribe, and his presence and ministrations, though above those he had a right to perform, regarded as a pledge of the divine blessing (xvii., xviii.). Under such circumstances the original system of household-priesthood, the eldest-born or chief of a family acting as the priest of it, no doubt largely prevailed. But in this condition of the Levites we may see how remarkably the prediction of Jacob had its accomplishment.

Progress, however, was made. Samuel was a Levite; and his administration must have reflected honour on the tribe and contributed to its importance. And, though anomalies still occurred—the holy ark, for example, being left long in the charge, apparently, of laymen (1 Sam. vii. 1, 2), and even David, when intending to bring it to Jerusalem, not at first understanding that none ought to carry it but the Levites (1 Chron. xv.)—yet, in the reign of that monarch, by whom so many other excellent arrangements were made, the Levites were recognized and set in their proper position, 'to wait on the sons of Aaron, for the service of the house of the Lord, in the courts, and in the chambers, and in the purifying of all holy things, and the work of the service of the house of God, both for the shew-bread, and for the fine flour for meat-offering, and for the unleavened cakes, and for that which is baked in the pan, and for that which is fried, and for all manner of measure and size; and to stand every morning to thank and praise the Lord, and likewise at even; and to offer all burnt-sacrifices unto the Lord in the sabbaths, in the new moons, and on the set feasts, by number, according to the order commanded unto them, continually before the Lord; and that they should keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the charge of the holy place, and the charge of the sons of Aaron their brethren, in the service of the house of the Lord' (1 Chron. xxiii. 28-32). The tribe was now very numerous: the males, from thirty years upwards, amounted to 38,000. Of these, 24,000 were selected 'to set forward the work of the house of the Lord,' that is, to do the ordinary ministerial service: 6,000 were officers and judges; 4,000 were porters; and 4,000 were musicians (3-5). These were properly arranged, divided into courses; their term of service beginning now at twenty, instead of twenty-five or thirty, when their work was more laborious (Numb. iv. 47, viii. 24, 25); and it would seem probable that they discharged their duties in rotation, coming up from their cities to the sanctuary according to their turn (1 Chron. xxiii., xxiv. 20-31, xxv., xxvi.). In illustration of their political and judicial functions, we find special mention of a family supplying judges and officers, some for the kingdom west of the Jordan, others for the trans-Jordanic tribes (29-32).

This full organization did not last very long. At the revolt of the ten tribes, the Levites, nobly refusing to participate in Jeroboam's unhallowed doings, left their cities and repaired to the southern kingdom (2 Chron. xi. 13-15). Judah was, of course, strengthened by this migration; but the worldly wealth of the tribe must have been materially diminished. Doubtless the Lord's favourable presence was more to them than perishable treasure; and in the subsequent history we often find them honourably mentioned. Various prophets were of the sacerdotal tribe; and Levites took their part in the occasional revivals of religion. Abijah referred with pride to their presence in his kingdom (xii. 9, 10); they were put in places of trust by Jehoshaphat (xix. 8-11): they led his host with holy songs (xx. 14-19, 21, 22, 26-28): they had a great part in establishing Joash on the throne after the usurpation of Athaliah (xxiii. 1-8, 18): they were more zealous than their brethren the priests at Hezekiah's reformation (xxix. 3-36, xxx. 21, 22): their courses were re-organized, and the tithes again brought to them (xxx. 2-4), and their genealogies were revised (11-19); and later they were employed in promoting the reformation under Josiah (xxxiv. 12, 13, xxxv. 3-18).

After the captivity, some Levites and priests returned with Zerubbabel and Ezra (Ezra ii. 36-42, viii. 15-19). Those that thus came back resumed their proper functions (iii. 8-12; Neh. viii. 7, ix. 4-38): they subscribed the national covenant (x. 2-13), and dwelt around Jerusalem (xi. 36, xii. 27-30): they also aided Ezra and Nehemiah in their pious works (Ezra x. 15; Neh. xiii. 13, 22).

In later times, many of the scribes and elders, we may well suppose, were Levites; but in the New Testament they have little prominence: they are coupled with the priests as formalists and opposers of truth (Luke x. 31, 32). Nevertheless there were Levites, such as Barnabas (Acts iv. 36, 37), who gladly embraced and preached the gospel.

Since the destruction of Jerusalem, all trace of the separate existence of the tribe has been lost. Some Jews, indeed, have a traditional notion that they are of Levitical families; but it is needless to say that the assumption is incapable of actual proof.

LEVITICUS, THE BOOK OF. The third book of Moses has its name (derived from the Septuagint), because it contains almost exclusively those ritual laws respecting sacrifices, purifications, &c., the administration of which was the charge of the priests, the sons of Levi. The first Hebrew word in it (signifying 'And he called') is its title among the Jews. It is also termed 'The law of the priests.'

In Hebrew bibles Leviticus is distributed into ten perashioth, and by ourselves divided into twenty-seven chapters. But its contents may very properly be classed in five sections:—I. The laws concerning sacrifices (i.—vii.), comprising (i.) burnt-offerings, (ii.) meat-offerings, (iii.) peace-offerings, (iv.—v. 13) sin-offerings (14—vi. 7) trespass-offerings, (8—vii. 38) attendant rites, with the assignment of portions of the sacrifices to the priests. II. The account of the consecration of the priests, with various ordinances appertaining, and the punishment of Nadab and Abihu (viii.—x.). III. Laws concerning clean and unclean animals, the purity and impurity of men, with the annual purification of the sanctuary on the great day of atonement (xi.—xvi.). IV. Laws against various offences, for which no atonement was provided (xvii.—xx.). V. Laws relating to the spotlessness of the priests and the sacrifices, also to the great festivals, with promises and threatenings (xxi.—xxvi.), and an appendix, with regulations about vows, things devoted, and tithes (xxvii.).

The Mosaic authorship of this book is evident on the face of it. It is, moreover, specially referred to as Moses' law in Neh. viii. 14, 15. And, though some modern critics have thought fit to represent it as a collection of statutes gradually formed by various compilers, some of them at least (De Wette is an instance) have felt themselves obliged, on more mature consideration, to retreat from such an untenable position. Bleek acknowledges everywhere the hand of Moses, though still he maintains that the book was not put exactly into its present shape by the great legislator (Einleitung in das A.T., pp. 279-282). Thus, he says that Moses would never have placed chaps. xviii. and xx., containing similar precepts, so near together, and fancies that he detects traces of a later hand in xviii. 3, 24, &c., 27, &c. He objects to the collection of diverse laws given without orderly arrangement in xix., and also to the regulations concerning festivals in xxiii., which yet are there arranged and summed up in order. These objections are of very little weight; for every book in existence might be dismembered on some such pretexts. In fact, the simple artlessness of the way in which various statutes are here recorded is no slight proof that we have the whole as Moses wrote it. A later compiler and interpolator would have gone more systematically to work.

By comparing Exod. xi. 17 with Numb. i. 1, we may infer that the time comprised in this book is about a month, from the erection of the tabernacle to the numbering of the people; the commands in it being delivered in the first month of the second year after leaving Egypt, 1490 B.C., according to the common computation.

Leviticus is altogether of a prophetic character. The typical nature of its ordinances is illustrated by the epistle to the Hebrews; and in xxv., xxvi. the whole future of the nation is delineated. The spiritual purport of the law is thus most clearly displayed.

Bishop Babington's Comfortable Notes upon Exodus and Leviticus, 1604, printed also in his collected works, are well worth reading.

LIBANUS (1 Esdr. iv. 48; Judith i. 7) Lebanon. In the last-named place Antilibanus occurs.

LIBERTINES. The descendants of Jewish freedmen at Rome, who had been expelled, 19 A.D., by Tiberius (Acts vi. 9). They might very well have a synagogue of their own at Jerusalem; as they were numerous, and as there are said to have been not fewer than 460 or 480 synagogues in that city.

LIB'NAH (whiteness, transparency).—1. One of the stations of Israel in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 20, 21).—2. A city of Canaan which Joshua took (Josh. x. 29-32, 39, xii. 15): it was in the plain country of Judah, and was afterwards assigned to the priests (xv. 42, xxi. 13; 1 Chron. vi. 57). Libnah revolted in the disastrous reign of Joram king of Judah (2 Kings viii. 22; 2 Chron. xxi. 10): it seems, however, to have been afterwards recovered. In Hezekiah's reign it was besieged by Sennacherib (2 Kings xix. 8; Isai. xxxvii. 8). After this we hear nothing more of Libnah, save that Hamutal, a wife of Josiah, and mother of two of his sons, Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, was a native of the place (2 Kings xxiii. 31, xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1). Its site has not been certainly identified; but conjecture finds it variously at Arak el-Mensht-yeh and Tell es-Safieh.

LIB'NI (white).—1. A Levite, one of the sons of Gershon (Exod. vi. 17; Numb. iii. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 17, 20).—2. Another Levite of the family of Merari (29).

LIB'NITES. A Levitical family descended from Libni (Numb. iii. 21, xxvi. 58).

LIB'YA. A region of northern Africa. The Greeks understood by this name all that vast tract which, lying west of Egypt, extended along the Mediterranean, and was unexplored towards the south and far west. It was peopled by a swarthy race, who had in two points been driven back into the interior—at Carthage by a Phœnician colony, and by a Greek colony at Cyrene. These inhabitants were the Lehabim (Gen. x. 13) or Lubim, a Hamite race. See LEHABIM. There must have been relations between the Lybians and the dynasties of Egypt; for we find them, 'Lubims,' in the army which Shishak led against Rehoboam (2 Chron. xii. 3), and in that with which Zerah attacked Asa (xvi. 8); and by Nahum they are described as the auxiliaries of 'populous No,' No Amon, i.e. Thebes (Nah. iii. 8, 9). They are, later, coupled with the Egyptians and Ethiopians (Dan. xi. 43); and we know that, after the Persian conquest of Egypt, they served in the Persian armies (Herod., lib. vii. 71, 86). This region came ultimately into the possession of the Romans; though the name was not used geographically by them. The country from the borders of Egypt to those of Carthage was generally distributed into three districts, Marmarica, Cyrenaica, and Africa proper: hence the propriety of the expression in Acts ii. 10. Many Jews had settled in these parts. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Libyen.

LIB'YANS (Jer. xlv. 9; Dan. xi. 43). Inhabitants of Libya. See PHUT.

LICE (Exod. viii. 16-18; Psal. cv. 31). One of the plagues inflicted on the Egyptians. There is some reason to suppose that the mosquito gnat is intended. These insects are an intolerable pest. They breed in marshy soils, and particularly in moist rice-grounds. The annual overflowing of the Nile therefore renders Egypt peculiarly liable to them. They appear there in immense swarms; and travellers concur in saying that nowhere are they so multitudinous and voracious, nowhere are the pain and consequent itching and smart of their bite more acute. Still these gnats could hardly be said to be 'in man and in beast;' besides, the 'lice' were produced from the 'dust,' and not from watery ground. And lice are said still to abound in Egypt, and to be a yet greater nuisance than mosquitos. Perhaps, therefore, the authorized version is right: (see Duns' Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. pp. 16-19). Sir S. W. Baker suggests a kind of tick, plentiful, he says, in dust and sand.

LIE. See LYING.

LIEUTENANTS (Ezra viii. 36; Esth. iii. 12, viii. 9, ix. 3). The satraps (warriors of the host) or viceroys of the large provinces among the ancient Persians, possessing civil and military authority, and representing the person of the sovereign.

LIFE. This word is frequently used in its ordinary acceptation as opposed to natural death (Gen. xxv. 7; Acts xvii. 25, and elsewhere). It is, besides, employed in a moral sense to denote the course of conduct (xxvi. 4). Also it signifies the active principle imparted by the Spirit of God to the soul, whereby he that was 'dead in trespasses and sins' is 'quickened' to a new existence (Eph. ii. 1, 5), and 'is passed from death unto life' (John v. 24), that spiritual life which has its workings in holy conformity to Christ's image (xi. 26; Rom. v. 18; Gal. ii. 19, 20; Col. iii. 3), and which emphatically is salvation (John vi. 47, 51, 54). Further, it denotes the life of glory in God's eternal kingdom, everlasting life and blessedness (Matt. xix. 16, 17; John iii. 15; Rom. v. 17, 21; 1 Tim. iv. 8). Life is also used to indicate the Living One, the Deity, who lives by his own inherent power, and is the source of life, bestowing it in its various forms upon his creatures: it is applied to the different Persons in the Godhead (John i. 4, v. 26, vi. 57; Rom. viii. 2; Col. iii. 4; 1 John i. 2). Still further, the term is connected with various things as possessing life, tending to it, or supporting it; e.g. 'tree of life' (Gen. ii. 9), 'path of life' (Psal. xvi. 11), 'bread of life' (John vi. 35), 'word of life' (Phil. ii. 16), 'crown of life' (James i. 12), 'water of life' (Rev. xxii. 1), &c.

LIFE, THE TREE OF. That wonderful tree planted in the garden of Eden, which must have been gifted with special natural qualities, and which had also a symbolical character (Gen. ii. 9). Its fruit was intended for man's gratification and support; and it was probably endowed with so much virtue that by feeding upon it, as a means, the strength and vitality of the human body would be preserved for ever. The language used after the fall, that Adam must not be allowed to taste this excellent tree (iii. 22, 24), seems to warrant this conclusion. Not merely was the blessing which the tree symbolized now forfeited, but the tree itself, it is declared, was no longer free for use; else a result would follow, incongruous and unendurable in the new condition of man's fallen nature. And therefore the use of the tree was barred, for it still retained its life-sustaining power; but yet a hope was held out that one day the barrier would be removed, the fruit and leaves be tasted again, and man be restored to a glorious immortality (Ezek. xlvi. 12; Rev. ii. 7, xxii. 2).

Much would seem to be taught us in what is recorded of this tree. And there are allusions to it in different parts of scripture, which both show its high estimation, and give countenance to the opinion expressed by the Jewish rabbis that the men of the resurrection should eat thereof (Prov. iii. 18, xi. 30, xiii. 12, xv. 4). Access to it, forfeited by sin, the wages of which was death, should again be opened, if, sin being atoned for, life were restored. And this, the gospel reveals to us, the wisdom of God has devised; and the fruit of the righteousness fulfilled and perfected in the work of Jesus Christ is the restoration to all the privileges which man while yet unfallen had enjoyed in paradise. Paradise then would be won back; and all that was lost in Adam would be recovered in Christ. The tree of life retaining its virtue, not destroyed but only fenced off from sinful men, must have cherished from the earliest times the hope of immortality; so that the faithful would learn to anticipate and long for that restored communion with him who is the Fountain of Life; the full blessedness of which far exceeds the liveliest symbolical representation (see Fairbairn, Typology of Scripture, book ii. chap. ii. vol. i. pp. 214-220).

LIGHT. It was heretofore believed that the light of day was produced by the emission of luminous particles from the sun: it was, therefore, a difficulty to conceive how light could exist before the formation of that great luminary. Now, however, philosophers generally hold that light is the result of the pulsations of some subtle ethereal medium. There is nothing, therefore, antagonistic to modern science in the statement that God, at an early period of his creative work, commanded, 'Light, be,' a command immediately obeyed, 'And light was' (Gen. i. 3). Afterwards he formed light-bearers, that is, made heavenly bodies the great means of exciting the undulations of the ethereal fluid by which we see (14-18). It was important to teach the world that light had a divine origin; the more as its brilliancy, specially in and towards tropical regions, made it regarded as the symbol of all that was beautiful, joyous, and most excellent. 'The sun when it shined, and the moon walking in brightness,' to many became objects of idolatrous worship (Job xxxi. 26, 27); but he who possessed the oracles of God was taught therein that the heavens were the work of Jehovah's fingers, the moon and the stars what he had ordained (Psal. viii. 3, xix. 1-6).

'Light' is often figuratively used in scripture. The term is applied to the Deity (James i. 17; 1 John i. 5); and so to Christ (Luke ii. 32; John i. 7-9, viii. 12, xii. 35, 36). Angels are said to be 'light' (2 Cor. xi. 14). And the term is also referred to men, God's servants (Matt. v. 14; John v. 35; Eph. v. 8; Phil. ii. 15); and it represents posterity, knowledge, joy, perpetuity, and happiness, in a multitude of places (1 Kings xi. 36; Esth. viii. 16; Psal. iv. 6, cxix. 105; Prov. iv. 18; Isai. viii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 9), and in fine the bliss of that kingdom which is the glorious inheritance of the Lord's redeemed (Col. i. 12; Rev. xxi. 23-25, xxii. 5).

LIGHTNING. The visible flash of electricity from the clouds. Thunder is called in Hebrew 'the voice of God' (Exod. ix. 28, marg.). And lightnings and thunders symbolize the divine presence, and the terrors of his wrath (Exod. xix. 16, xx. 18; Psal. xviii. 14; Rev. iv. 5, xvi. 18).

LIGN-ALOEES (Numb. xxiv. 6). See ALOE.
FIGURE. One of the gems in the high priest's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12). It was probably identical with JACINTH, which see. Or it may be tourmaline or the red variety of it called rubellite. There is no stone now termed figure, but there is ligurite—so named from Liguria, a district of ancient Italy, where it was found—a crystalline mineral of which the primary form is an oblique rhombic prism. This is hard, translucent, yellowish-green, or apple-green.

LIK'HI (learned). One of the descendants of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 19).

LILY. This flower is repeatedly mentioned in scripture in both the Old and the New Testaments; but it is extremely difficult to decide which species of the genus Lilium is intended. Various travellers mention flowers which they have seen, and conjecture that they are the lilies of the bible; but their descriptions are generally too vague for identification. Dr. Stanley says, 'The only "lilies" which I saw in Palestine in the months of March and April were large yellow water-lilies, in the clear spring of 'Ain Mellahah, near the lake of Merom,' and he thinks that the name 'may include the numerous flowers of the tulip or amaryllis kind, which appear in the early summer or the autumn of Palestine' (Sinai and Palestine, pp. 429, 430).

But some of the notices we may collect point to a particular kind of lily. It was of gorgeous beauty (Matt. vi. 28), growing near the place where the Sermon on the Mount was delivered, luxuriant and probably rapid in its growth (Hos. xiv. 5): it was found in the valleys among thorns, and on pasture-land (Sol. Song ii. 1, 2, 16, iv. 5, vi. 3); still whether it was scarlet, or emitted a fragrant odour, we cannot gather with certainty from v. 13, as critics differ in their interpretation of this verse. If the former idea be preferred, the flower may be supposed to be the Lilium Chalcedonicum, or scarlet martagon, which is said to be found plentifully in Galilee in spring-time. But this flower has little fragrance; so that, if the lily was fragrant, it was probably the Lilium candidum, or common white lily, which also grows in Palestine. On the whole the balance of probability would seem to be in favour of that first-named. Dr. Thomson describes a lily which seems exactly to correspond to the postulates of scripture; but unfortunately he does not know the botanical species of the plant: 'It is very large; and the three inner petals meet above, and form a gorgeous canopy, such as art never approached, and king never sat under, even in his utmost glory. And, when I met this incomparable flower, in all its loveliness, among the oak-woods around the northern base of Tabor, and on the hills of Nazareth, where our Lord spent his youth, I felt assured that it was to this he referred. We call it Hühel lily, because it was here that it was first discovered. Its botanical name, if it has one, I am unacquainted with. I suppose also that it is this identical flower to which Solomon refers in the Song of Songs (ii. 1, 2, 16). . . . Our flower delights most in the valleys, but is also found on the mountains. It grows among thorns; and I have sadly lacerated my hands in extricating it from them. Nothing can be in higher contrast than the luxuriant velvety softness of this lily and the crabbed tangled hedge of thorns about it. Gazelles still delight to feed among them; and you can scarcely ride through the woods north of Tabor, where these lilies abound, without frightening them from their flowery pasture' (The Land and the Book, p. 256).

Lily-work is mentioned in relation to the temple and some of its utensils (1 Kings vii. 19, 22, 26): ornaments resembling lilies are probably meant.

LIME. The Hebrew word std is twice so rendered (Isai. xxxiii. 12; Amos ii. 1): it is also used for plaster (Deut. xxvii. 2, 4). Lime combined with carbonic acid, carbonate of lime, is the abundant material of rocks in almost every part of the world. Many of the Syrian mountains are limestone; and from this, marble, chalk, &c., lime is obtained by a process of burning or calcining. The earthy matter of bones is phosphate of lime: from them, therefore, also lime may be procured. The various uses of this substance for mortar, plaster, &c., were as well known in ancient as in modern times.

LINE. A line or cord was used for measuring land (Amos vii. 17; Zech. i. 16, ii. 1, 2). 'To cast a cord,' therefore, is to measure or allot (Mic. ii. 5). Hence line comes to signify an inheritance, a defined possession (Psal. xvi. 6). See CORD.

LINEN. There are several Hebrew words which are thus rendered; and it is hardly possible to distinguish the fabrics which they respectively intended. But two of these, shēsh and bad, we may consider either as synonymous, or else that the kinds of linen they designated were so nearly equal that it signified not which was used in any specified work. For the linen drawers of the Hebrew priests, which were made of shēsh, (Exod. xxxix. 28) are described as of bad (xxviii. 42). Or it is possible that the one might be the material, the other the fabric manufactured from it. Of the shēsh offerings were made for the tabernacle (xxv. 4, xxxv. 6, 23): it was spun and woven (25, 35, xxxviii. 23): it was then used for the hangings and curtains of the tabernacle (xxvi. 1, 31, 36, xxvii. 9, 16, 18, xxxvi. 8, 35, 37, xxxviii. 9, 16, 18), and for the sacred vestments (xxviii. 5, 6, 8, 15, 39, xxxix. 2, 5, 8, 27-29); the phrase 'twined linen' perhaps implying that it was made of twisted threads. Of the same material were the robes of Joseph (Gen. xli. 42), and of ladies (Prov. xxxi. 22, in our version 'silk'). Of bad we find repeated mention also (Exod. xxviii. 42, xxxix. 28; Lev. vi. 10; 2 Sam. vi. 14; Ezek. ix. 2; Dan. x. 5).

In the later books of the bible we have mention of bätz, worn by kings (1 Chron. xv. 27), by priests (2 Chron. v. 12), and other persons of rank and distinction (Esth. i. 6, viii. 15). This linen was probably identical with that called previously shēsh; and the word corresponded with the Greek byssos. If bätz differed from shēsh, it must have been that the former was the product of Syria (Ezek. xxvii. 16), the latter of Egypt (7).

There are some other words which appear also to denote linen, or something made of linen; as etān, 'fine linen of Egypt' (Prov. vii. 16), perhaps tapestry of Egyptian yarn; sādān, a linen under-garment (Judges xiv. 12, 13; Isai. iii. 23): this is said to be made by the notable housewife (Prov. xxxi. 24); pāsheth, which implies both the raw material, flax (even the plant in Josh. ii. 6), and the manufactured article (Lev. xiii. 47, 59). The Greek terms linon and byssos are identical; though some have imagined the latter finer and more delicate than the former.

Egypt was celebrated from very early times for its flax and fine linen, which was put to a variety of uses; and of which specimens remain to the present day. For the cloth in which mummies were swathed, often supposed to be of cotton, has on better examination proved to be linen. Linen yarn was imported by Solomon (1 Kings x. 28); though it must be acknowledged that scholars are not agreed in the interpretation of the passage (see Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. pp. 180, 181).

Mention is sometimes made of 'fine linen' as a mark of luxury (Luke xvi. 19), and sometimes as indicative of purity. Thus it is 'in fine linen, clean and white,' the perfect righteousness of her Lord, that the bride, the Lamb's wife, the redeemed church, is said to be arrayed (Rev. xix. 8).

LI'NUS. A Christian who is joined in St. Paul's salutation to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21).

He is said to have been afterwards bishop of Rome.

LION. A well-known carnivorous animal, frequently mentioned in scripture. There are several Hebrew words, implying certain qualities of the lion, which are used to designate this creature. Ari or aryeh is perhaps the most common name, 'a puller' or 'render' (Judges xiv. 8, and elsewhere). Gör, or gär is a cub or lion's whelp, from a word implying 'to suck' (Ezek. xix. 2, 3, 5). This word is sometimes joined with the preceding (Gen. xlix. 9; Deut. xxxiii. 22). Khéphir, 'shaggy,' is a young lion already weaned, able to seek prey for itself. The force of this term is seen in Ezek. xix. 3, where a gör is said to become a khéphir. Shahhal, 'the roarer,' is poetically used (Job x. 16; Prov. xxvi. 13; Hos. xiii. 7). Laiash is a fierce lion, the word signifying 'strength' (Prov. xxx. 30). Lēbl or läbl, from a root which implies 'to roar,' denotes a lion, or specifically a lioness, found in poetry (Deut. xxxiii. 20; Psal. lvii. 4). Other expressions are sometimes employed, as 'sons of pride' (Job xxviii. 8), in our version 'lion's whelps.'

Lions are not now found in Palestine; but it is very evident both from scripture narrative (Judges xiv. 5; 1 Kings xiii. 24, xx. 36, and elsewhere), and allusion (Jer. xlix. 19, l. 44, li. 38, and elsewhere), and from the names given to various places, Bethleboth, Laish, &c., that they must anciently have been common in the country. Their fierceness and ravages are often depicted (2 Kings xvii. 25, 26), effectually disposing of the fancy that they were of the Persian variety, a timorous kind of animal. The single-handed encounters of men with them (Judges xiv. 6; 1 Sam. xvii. 34-37) are no proof of the inferior character of the lions: similar single-handed encounters, with the fiercest kind, are not uncommon even to the present day.

Figuratively the lion denotes a ferocious man (Psal. xxxv. 17): so it is sometimes introduced as a symbol into a prophetic vision (Dan. vii. 4). It was the emblem of royal power (2 Sam. i. 23), and was specially used to indicate the imperial dignity of the tribe of Judah (Gen. xlix. 9); and hence our Lord, a descendant of Judah, is styled 'the Lion of the tribe of Judah' (Rev. v. 5). In an evil sense the devil is represented as 'a roaring lion' (1 Pet. v. 8). The Roman emperor is possibly alluded to in 2 Tim. iv. 17; and the allusion is the more apposite, because the being thrown to the lions was a punishment inflicted on the Christians: comp. Dan. vi.

LIP. This word is often used in a tropical sense; but the phrases in which it occurs are easily intelligible. Thus, it is put for the organ of speech. To 'open the lips' of any one (Psal. li. 15) is to cause him to speak: to be 'of uncircumcised lips' (Exod. vi. 12) is to be not ready of speech. Sometimes it expresses the manner of speech: thus, 'one lip' (Gen. xi. 1, marg.) signifies one language or dialect; then, as the manner of speech indicates the disposition of an individual, 'lying lips' (Prov. x. 18) intend falsehood; 'the lip of truth' (xii. 19), veracity; 'burning lips' (xxvi. 23), ardent professions. So again, 'the word of thy lips' (Psal. xvii. 4) is God's precept; 'the talk of the lips' (Prov. xiv. 23), mere empty discourse; 'a fool of lips' (x. 8, marg.), a talkative fool. Again, 'the calves of the lips' (Hos. xiv. 2) are the sacrifices (calves being offered in sacrifice) of praise. Lip also signifies a boundary, as of the sea (Gen. xxii. 17, marg.), i. e. the shore, or of a country (Judges vii. 22, marg.), i. e. its frontier, or, perhaps, rather the bank of the river, the Jordan, at the place mentioned. To cover the upper lip (Lev. xiii. 45; Ezek. xxiv. 17) was a sign of mourning.

LITTER. A conveyance resembling a cradle, covered handsomely with cloth, so as to protect a person carried in it from sun and rain (Isai. lxvi. 20). Such litters are borne sometimes by men, sometimes on camels, one on each side the animal, and have openings for the admission of light.

(Ezek. xxi. 21). The liver was always considered the most important organ in such divination. See DIVINATION.

LIZARD. Under this term are included all the cold-blooded animals that have the conformation of serpents, with the addition of four feet. Hence this great family would comprise the Saurians, the Lacertinae, and the Lacertidae; some of the species being of vast size and formidable strength. 'Lizard' occurs but once in our version of the bible (Lev. xi. 30): it is probable that the Lacerta stellio, so termed from the bundles of star-like spines upon the body, is the animal meant, or possibly the Ptyodactylus gecko, or fan-foot lizard, from the toes of which a poisonous matter exudes, raising pustules on the skin which it touches. There are others of the lizard kind designated in scripture, such as those called in our translation the 'tortoise,' the 'ferret,' the 'chameleon,' the 'snail,' the 'mole' (29, 30), and the 'spider' (Prov. xxx. 28). For some Litter or palanquin. From ancient Egyptian painting. Champollion.

See Henderson, Isaiah, note on lxvi. 20. The same word is found (joined with another) in Numb. vii. 3, 'litter-waggons,' i. e. covered and commodious like litters. These litters are common in the east at the present day.

LIVER. The Hebrew term so rendered implies heaviness; the liver being the heaviest of the viscera, in both weight and importance. The expression 'the caul above the liver' occurs frequently in the Pentateuch (Exod. xxix. 13, 22; Lev. iii. 4, 10, 15, iv. 9, vii. 4, viii. 16, 25, ix. 10, 19). By this Gesenius understands the great lobe of the liver itself; while Jahn suggests that the smaller lobe is meant (Bibl. Antiq., part iii. chap. v. 378). Whichever it was, it was not to be eaten as sacrificial food, but burned upon the altar. Sometimes the word is introduced to indicate severe suffering; bodily, as a mortal wound (Prov. vii. 23), or mental (Lam. ii. 11). We also find a reference to the ancient mode of divination by inspection of the viscera of a slain animal notice of these reference must be made to the articles under their respective names. Lizards of various species abound in different parts of Syria and Palestine. They are especially plentiful among ruined buildings.

LOAF, LOAVES. See BREAD.

LO-AM'MI (not my people). A symbolical name given to a child by God's command, in order to show that he no longer considered rebellious Israel his people (Hos. i. 9).

LOAN. Brotherly-kindness, in lending to the needy, was enjoined, both in the Old Testament and by our Lord (Lev. xxv. 35; Deut. xv. 7-10; Matt. vi. 42; Luke vi. 35). These loans were not to be usurious. Of a foreigner interest might be exacted, but not of a Hebrew (Exod. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36, 37; Deut. xxiii. 19, 20). This regulation, however, like so many of the other statutes, was often disobeyed (Neh. v. 1-13). Security might be taken for the due discharge of the loan; but only under certain restrictions. An outer garment, which was the covering by night, must be returned before sunset: a widow's garment was not to be taken at all; nor a mill-stone, since without that the family could not provide their daily bread. Moreover, the lender must not enter the debtor's house, but wait outside for the pledge (Exod. xxii. 26, 27; Deut. xxiv. 6, 10-13, 17): see PLEDGE. Persons in poverty might serve as bondmen, but they would be released at the seventh year, or at the jubilee (Lev. xxv. 39-41); and in the sabbatical year there was a general remission of debts (Deut. xv. 1-3, 7-10): this provision did not apply to a foreigner. In later times we read of sons being seized for their father's debts (2 Kings iv. 1). But it does not appear that this was allowed by the law.

LOCK. Locks, as well as keys, are often made of wood in Palestine. Dr. Thomson describes one in an old castle, which he says was almost a load to carry. Its construction was such that it would have been difficult to fit it with a false key. 'These locks are placed on the inside of the doors of gardens and outer courts, and even of those of inner rooms in some places. To enable the owner to unlock them, a hole is cut in the door, through which he thrusts his arm, and inserts the key. All the garden-doors about Sidon are thus arranged; and such must have been the custom in the days of Solomon. In Sol. Song v. 4 he makes the bride say, "My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door," that is, she saw him thrust in his hand to unlock the door that he might enter' (The Land and the Book, p. 317). See KEY.

LOCUST. A most destructive insect, the ravages of which are very frequently described or referred to in scripture. A variety of Hebrew words are used to designate either different species or different forms, as the larva, or the winged state, of this destructive creature. These are arbeh, from a root implying 'to be numerous,' the word in most frequent use, and well it describes the swarming host; gāzam, signifying 'the devourer,' rendered in our version 'palmer-worm' (Joel i. 4, ii. 25; Amos iv. 9); gōb, perhaps 'creeper,' rendered 'grasshoppers' or 'green-worms' (Amos vii. 1, marg.; Nah. iii. 17); hāgāb, implying 'to hide or veil,' for the clouds of them hide the sun (Joel ii. 2, 10), in our version once 'locust' (2 Chron. vii. 13), elsewhere 'grasshoppers' (Lev. xi. 22; Numb. xiii. 33; Eccles. xii. 5; Isai. xl. 22); hhargōl, 'a leaper,' rendered 'beetle' (Lev. xi. 22); hāsīl, 'devourer,' in our translation 'caterpillar' (1 Kings viii. 37; 2 Chron. vi. 28; Psal. lxxviii. 46; Isai. xxxiii. 4; Joel i. 4, ii. 25); yelek, 'the feeder,' translated 'caterpillar' (Psal. cv. 34; Jer. li. 14, 27), and 'canker-worm' (Joel i. 4, ii. 25; Nah. iii. 15, 16); sāfām, 'the consumer,' 'bald locust' (Lev. xi. 22); and tzēlātāl, which implies 'whizzing' (Deut. xxviii. 42).

We may well conclude that, as above noted, these different terms indicated different species or different states of the locust; and such passages as Joel i. 4 are best interpreted on such a supposition. We are told that there are some locusts which, in their larva state, are quite as destructive as when they have expanded their wings. But naturalists have hitherto found it impossible to interpret with full precision the various Hebrew terms. We have to be content, therefore, with knowing that some of them must designate the Edipoda migratoria and the Acridium peregrinum, two species at this day very common in Syria and Arabia, and most formidable for the devastations they commit.

Almost all eastern travellers describe the appalling consequences of a visitation of locusts in the most vivid language. Thus Dr. Thomson tells us that, riding up a hill, he found the whole surface as it were animated and rolling down the declivity. There were millions of young locusts, not yet able to jump, looking like a mass of semi-fluid mortar. On another occasion a flight of locusts did considerable injury and disappeared. But they had laid their eggs; and after a while the news arrived that these were hatched and the young ones on their march. They were without wings and about the size of full-grown grasshoppers. 'The whole face of the mountain was black with them. On they came like a living deluge. We dug trenches, and kindled fires, and beat and burned to death "heaps upon heaps;" but the effort was utterly useless. Wave after wave rolled up the mountain-side, and poured over rocks, walls, ditches, and hedges; those behind covering up and bridging over the masses already killed. . . For four days they continued to pass on toward the east; and finally only a few stragglers of the mighty host were left behind. In every stage of their existence, these locusts give a most impressive view of the power of God to punish a wicked world. Look at the pioneers of the host—those flying squadrons that appear in early spring. Watch the furious impulse for the propagation of their devouring progeny. No power of man can interrupt it. Millions upon millions, with most fatal industry, deposit their innumerable eggs in the field, the plain, and the desert. This done, they vanish like morning mist. But in six or eight weeks the very dust seems to waken into life, and, moulded into maggots, begins to creep. Soon this animated earth becomes minute grasshoppers; and, creeping and jumping, all in the same general direction, they begin their destructive march. After a few days their voracious appetite palls: they become sluggish, and fast, like the silkworms, for a short time. Like the silkworms, too, they repeat this fasting four times before they have completed their transmutations and are accommodated with wings. . . In their march they devour every green thing, and with wonderful expedition. A large vineyard and garden adjoining mine was green as a meadow in the morning, but long before night it was naked and bare as a newly-ploughed field or dusty road. The noise made in marching and foraging was like that of a heavy shower on a distant forest.' The scripture allusions to the habits of locusts are remarkably accurate. Moses, when announcing their approach in Egypt, said that they would 'cover the face of the earth, that one cannot be able to see the earth' (Exod. x. 5). And Dr. Thomson says, 'I have this dreadful picture indelibly fixed on my mind. For several nights after they came to Abeih, as soon as I closed my eyes, the whole earth seemed to be creeping and jumping; nor could I banish the ugly image from my brain.' In Nahum we read that they 'camp in the hedges in the cold day, but, when the sun ariseth, they flee away' (Nah. iii. 17). And so Dr. Thomson tells us: 'In the evenings, as soon as the air became cool at Abeih, they literally camped in the hedges and loose stone walls, covering them over like a swarm of bees settled on a bush. There they remained until the next day's sun waxed warm, when they again commenced their march.' And he adds that on one cold day they scarcely moved at all. We also read, 'They shall run like mighty men: they shall climb the wall like men of war; and they shall march every one on his ways; and they shall not break their ranks' (Joel ii. 7). So we are told, 'When the head of the mighty column came in contact with the palace of the emir Asaad in Abeih, they did not take the trouble to wheel round the corners, but climbed the wall like men of war, and marched over the top of it' (The Land and the Book, pp. 416-419).

Locusts (four species are enumerated, arbeh, hhägab, hhargöl, säläm), were used for food (Lev. xi. 22), the so-called 'beetle' being unquestionably a species of locust. So John the Baptist is said to have fed on locusts (Matt. iii. 4). They are at present boiled, sometimes in salt-water, and sometimes in butter, by the Bedouin Arabs; and, according to Europeans who have tasted them, they resemble shrimps in flavour. Three names are used to describe the locusts that devastated Egypt, arbeh, hhästil, yelek. And it must be repeated that the terms applied in scripture to the insect itself, to its sound, its appearance, its destructive effects, are admirably illustrative of the habits and effects of locusts as observed in the present day. See a variety of particulars, well drawn out by Mr. Wilton, in Good Words, Dec. 1863, pp. 844-852.

LOD (perhaps strife). A small town or village in Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 12; Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, xi. 35). It was afterwards called LYDDA, which see.

LO'-DEBAR (no pasture). A town in Gilead, to the east of the Jordan, not far from Mahanaim (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5, xvii. 27).

LODGE (Isai. i. 8). A hut made of boughs interwoven. Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 362) says, 'The true point of the comparison will not appear until the crop is over, and the lodge forsaken by the keeper. Then the poles fall down, or lean every way; and those green boughs with which it is shaded will have been scattered by the wind, leaving only a ragged sprawling wreck, a most affecting type of utter desolation, "as Sodom and like unto Gomorrah."' "

LODGING-PLACE (Josh. iv. 3). See INN.

LOFT (Acts xx. 9). See HOUSE.

LOG (a deep cavity, basin). See MEASURES.

LOG'OS. The Greek term for 'word.' See WORD.

LOINS. See GIRDLE.

LO'IS. A Christian female, grandmother of Timothy (2 Tim. i. 5).

LOOKING-GLASS. This word occurs in Exod. xxxviii. 8; Job xxxvii. 18; also in Isai. iii. 23, where simply 'glasses.' The articles intended were mirrors, tablets or plates of polished metal, mostly of a round form, and furnished with handles. Those carried by the Hebrew women at the time of the construction of the vessels of the tabernacle were used for making 'the laver of brass and the foot of it of brass.' Many of these have been discovered in Egypt, and are to be seen in museums. They are of mixed metal, chiefly copper, very carefully wrought and highly polished.

LORD. Several Hebrew words are so rendered. Adön is sometimes applied to God (Josh. iii. 13), usually to human beings. Adönäi is everywhere spoken of God, and is generally substituted by the Jews in reading for Jehovah, the peculiarly-sacred name of God. The Greek Kurios, is used both of the Deity, as the translation of the Hebrew names, and also of men. 'Lord' in our version represents these various words. It is printed in small capitals when Jehovah occurs in the original. Similarly, when the letters of Jehovah have the vowels of Elohäm, 'God' is in small capitals (e.g. Gen. xv. 2). There are a few unimportant exceptions.

LORD'S DAY (Rev. i. 10). See SABBATH.

LORD'S SUPPER. This holy feast, one of the Christian sacraments, was instituted by Christ on the evening of his passion, at or after the passover meal. He intended to point out the typical reference which the passover had to himself, to give it a higher signification, and leave a memorial with his church of his death, in which the union of his people with himself and with each other might be testified, and which might be the means to them of blessing derived from him, and a mode of participating therein.

The account of the institution is given by several of the sacred writers (Matt. xxvi. 26-29; Mark xiv. 22-25; Luke xxii. 17-20; 1 Cor. xi. 23-25). By a reference to the mode of eating the paschal feast (see PASSOVER) our Lord's actions will be more clearly illustrated. It was probably of one of the earlier cups that he first declined to partake; the sop that was given to Judas was a piece of the bread dipped in the bitter sauce, after which the traitor retired; the bread broken and distributed to the disciples was the unleavened cake; and the cup after supper was one of those cups, the third or fourth, with which the ceremony concluded. It would hence seem most probable that Judas did not partake the newly-instituted ordinance.

The passover was celebrated annually. Our Lord did not specify the frequency with which the holy supper was to be received; but the expression, 'This do, as oft as ye shall drink it,' may be taken to imply a frequent commemoration. Accordingly we soon find traces of its observance. It has been, indeed, supposed that Christ himself repeated the celebration at Emmaus on the evening of his resurrection, and that it was this which occasioned the immediate recognition of him (Luke xxiv. 30, 31). More probably it was the Lord's supper which is referred to in the accounts of the growing church, when the baptized 'continued stedfastly in the apostles' fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers' (Acts ii. 42, 46, xx. 7, 11: comp. xxvii. 35). Very generally combined with the Lord's supper (which from the nature of the case was at first celebrated in private houses) were those feasts of charity, which grew ere long to such a pitch of disorder as to call forth the grave censure of the apostle Paul upon the church which allowed it (1 Cor. xi. 20-22); and subsequently, it may be added, these feasts of charity were generally discontinued: see FEAST OF CHARITY. But the occasion led St. Paul more fully to explain the institution and meaning of the Lord's supper, and to enforce that careful self-examination with which professing Christians should approach the Lord's table (x. 16, 17, xi. 26-34).

It is not necessary to trace here the further history of this sacred rite, how, according to early Christian writers (e.g. Justin Martyr, Apolog. i., 65-67, edit. Bened., pp. 82-84), it was the high act of worship; still less to detail the corruptions and controversies which arose upon it, and which to this day divide one part of Christendom from another. The student will find large particulars of ancient practice in Bingham's Orig. Eccles., chap. xv. And the general reader may well be reminded of the doctrine of the Anglican church as expressed in her twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth articles: 'The supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another; but rather it is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death; insomuch that, to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ, and likewise the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ. . . . The wicked, and such as be void of a lively faith, although they do carnally and visibly press with their teeth (as St. Augustine saith) the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, yet in no wise are they partakers of Christ, but rather, to their condemnation, do eat and drink the sign or sacrament of so great a thing.' To this the direction of the catechism may be subjoined, in answer to the question: 'What is required of those who come to the Lord's supper?' 'To examine themselves, whether they repent them truly of their former sins, stedfastly purposing to lead a new life; have a lively faith in God's mercy through Christ, with a thankful remembrance of his death; and be in charity with all men.'

LO-RUHA'MAH (not compassionate). The symbolical name of a child, to indicate that God's mercy towards rebellious Israel was exhausted (Hos. i. 5, 8).

LOT (covering, veil). The son of Haran, and nephew of Abram. He was born, it appears, in Ur of the Chaldees, where his father died, and whence he accompanied his grandfather Terah and his uncle to Haran (Gen. xi. 27, 28, 31). Afterwards he went with Abram into Canaan (xii. 4, 5), and also, it would seem, into Egypt, when there was a famine in Canaan.

Returning from Egypt, the family established themselves for a while near to Beth-el; and their property increased. They had each of them flocks and herds in abundance. And then the burden of wealth began to be felt. There was strife between the herdmen of the uncle and the nephew, each pushing the other; for the land could not suffice for them. It was not an unsettled country, where any one might extend himself as far as he would. There were Canaanites and Perizzites around, compressing them, so as to render it necessary that, for peace' sake and for room's sake, they must part. Abram gave Lot his choice. And Lot seemed to look only for worldly advantages; so he fixed upon the fruitful plain of the Jordan, and did not take into account the wickedness of the inhabitants of the cities in that neighbourhood (xiii.). But after a while a notable calamity befel him. Chedor-laomer, an eastern king, came to revenge himself on the king of Sodom and other cities for throwing off his yoke. He conquered them, and carried off captives and vast spoil; and Lot was involved in the overthrow. He, too, with all his possessions, was captured. Delivered by the active valour of his uncle Abram, one might have thought that Lot would be glad to leave the dangerous vicinity of Sodom. But he settled there again, even in the city (xiv. 12-16). He was a man of piety: he was vexed at the filthy conversation of the wicked (2 Pet. ii. 7, 8); but he could not tear himself away. It was a place for worldly prosperity; and, besides, Lot had daughters, and he sought alliance for them, and was even matching them with men of Sodom. But the eye of the Holiest was on the wickedness of Sodom; and the day of her judgment was at hand. Two strangers came one evening to the city; and Lot hospitably received them to his house. And then there was a frightful tumult, which Lot attempted to appease by a proposal almost as frightful, and would himself have fallen a sacrifice had not his guests—angels they were—miraculously interfered. They told him the impending doom of Sodom, and desired him to escape immediately with all his family. He tried in vain to persuade his sons-in-law, whether persons who had married other daughters, or those who were to marry the daughters who fled with him, we know not. But they ridiculed his warning; and Lot, leaving all his property, was hastened away, with only his wife and two daughters, towards Zoar, a little city, spared, at his request, by the angels, of mercy to him, of vengeance to the wicked inhabitants of Sodom. And then came the catastrophe, crushing and most fatal, some traces of which we, perhaps, still behold; and Lot's wife, disobediently looking back, perished also. Lot, not thinking he was safe in Zoar, soon betook himself to the mountains, where deeds of shame were done (Gen. xix.); and Lot is mentioned no more, save as the father of two nations, Moab and Ammon, seated to the east and south-east of Palestine (Psal. lxxxiii. 8). It is a disastrous record; and men may well take warning from it, and learn the danger of associating with the evil, lest they be involved in their ruin.

Josephus (Antiq., lib. i. 11, § 4) and others speak of a pillar of salt existing in their day, which they identified with Lot's wife, encrusted with saline deposit. That such a pillar may still be seen at the south-west extremity of the Dead sea is attested by modern travellers. But it is of enormous height, probably 40 feet, and is doubtless a natural production, formed into its present shape by the action of the winter rains. Some curious eastern traditions respecting Lot may be found in D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., art. 'Loth.'

LOT, LOTS. The casting of lots was a common mode of deciding a disputed question, or dividing a property, practised among heathens (Jonah i. 7; Matt. xxvii. 35). The decision by lot was resorted to by the Hebrews, with special appeal to God (Prov. xvi. 33). And God sanctioned this mode of appeal to him, and in some cases prescribed it (Lev. xvi. 8, 9; Numb. xxxvi. 55, 56; Josh. vii. 14, xiv. 2, xviii. 6; 1 Sam. xiv. 40-42; Acts i. 26). Hence the word 'lot' has come to signify in scripture, as it does in common speech amongst us, a portion, or the destiny assigned to any one in God's providence.

LO'TAN (covering). One of the sons of Seir, the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 22, 29; 1 Chron. i. 33, 39).

LOTHASUBUS (1 Esdr. ix. 44). A corruption of Hashum (Neh. viii. 4).

LOTS, FEAST OF. See PURIM.

LOVE. One of the most blessed attributes of God: 'God is love' (1 John iv. 16).

When the great Father had formed the world, he beheld it with loving eye as he pronounced the work of his fingers 'very good' (Gen. i. 31). And, even when his creatures had provoked him by disobedience, his love was not exhausted: he was still 'kind unto the unthankful and to the evil' (Luke vi. 35). He proved this in a marvellous manner: 'God so loved the world—the sinful world—that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life' (John. iii. 16). Out of his love he gave a priceless boon to win their love, and to free them from everything which could incapacitate them from tasting his love. Those who avail themselves of his offers enjoy the fulness of his love: they are his dear and cherished children; the love of God being shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto them (Rom. v. 5). The Christian revelation thus shows God in the most attractive character: it announces a loving message—'good-will toward men' (Luke ii. 14). And this is one of the broad stamps upon it by which we see that it comes from God.

Love will beget love. No one can really know the excellent perfections of God, and the love he has shown to sinful men, without responsive love to him. 'We love him because he first loved us' (1 John iv. 19). These are 'the cords of a man, the bands of love' (Hos. xi. 4) by which he draws us; and 'he that loveth not knoweth not God' (1 John iv. 8). And love to God is evidenced by love to our brethren (iii. 14). The injunction of the gospel is that we love one another as he hath loved us (16, iv. 11). This is the great commandment of the divine law (Rom. xiii. 10). Even faith is but an empty notion, if it does not work by love (1 Cor. xiii. 2; Gal. v. 6). Were this great principle of the gospel carried out as it ought to be, it would establish the harmony and happiness of the world. A religion with such a tendency is worthy of the Deity: it is, it must be, divine.

LOVE-FEAST. See FEAST OF CHARITY. LU'ZON (1 Esdr. v. 33). Darkon (Ezr. ii. 56).

LU'BIM (dwellers in a scorched land) (2 Chron. xii. 3, xvi. 8; Dan. xi. 43, Hebr.; Nah. iii. 9). See LEHABIM.

LU'CAS (Philem. 24). This is LUKE, which see.

LU'CIFER (light-bringer). The original word signifies 'brilliant star,' i.e. the morning-star. The title is applied to the king of Babylon in Isai. xiv. 12: he had outshone other kings, as the bright star of the morning surpasses other stars. Falling from heaven denotes a sudden political overthrow or catastrophe. In popular language Lucifer is regarded as an appellation of Satan.

LU'CIUS. A Cyrenian, a Christian teacher at Antioch (Acts xiii. 1). It is probably the same person whom St. Paul calls his kinsman, i.e. of his own tribe, and whose salutation he conveys to the Roman church (Rom. xvi. 2).

LUD (strife? inhabitant of the desert?) A son of Shem (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chron. i. 17), ancestor of a people in Asia Minor, called Ludi, or Lydians. Their original settlements were probably in Armenia; but they seem to have migrated westward, and driven out the Mæonians, who inhabited the tract between the rivers Hermus and Mæander; which was from this eastern race denominated Lydia. See LYDIA. They were a brave people, whose warlike service was sought by the Tyrians (Isai. lxvi. 19; Ezek. xxvii. 10).

LUD (Judith ii. 23). The Lydians probably are meant, though the word is coupled with 'Phud,' i.e. Phut.

LU'DIM. A people descended of the family of Ham, through Mizraim (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chron. i. 11). It is clear that they must have been an African nation, and not the Lydians of Asia Minor. And as coupled with Ethiopia and Lybia (Cush and Phut or Put) they must be intended in Jer. xli. 9; Ezek. xxx. 5, where our translation wrongly gives 'Lydians' and 'Lydia.' They were celebrated as archers, and were probably settled in Lower Egypt, north of Memphis, where was a town called Letopolis, or Letus.

LU'HITH (made of boards, probably having boarded houses). A town or place of Moab (Isai. xv. 5; Jer. xlvi. 5).

LUKE. A distinguished companion of St. Paul. We can gather but little of his history from the sacred volume. Indeed, it is only by inference that we can judge whether he was a Jew or a Gentile. The diction of those books in the New Testament, the Gospel and the Acts, which are commonly ascribed to him, is such as to persuade some that he must have been a Jew. But St. Paul, writing to the Colossians, after mentioning all 'of the circumcision' who had been a comfort unto him, adds the salutation of 'Luke, the beloved physician' (Col. iv. 10-14). The plain conclusion is that Luke was not a Jew. It has, indeed, been doubted whether the person here named was the evangelist, on the ground that he would not have needed any additional designation; but this is no sufficient reason against the identity.

Luke is traditionally said to be a native of Antioch: this, however, has perhaps no better foundation than the confounding of him with that Lucius who is reckoned among the teachers at Antioch (Acts xiii. 1); from whom he must certainly be distinguished. He has also been said to be one of Christ's seventy disciples; but, if (as we have seen) not a Jew, he would hardly have been taken into that company. Besides (Luke i. 2) he expressly disclaims the having himself been an eye-witness of what he records of our Lord's history. When and where he became a Christian we have no means of deciding; whether, too, he was first a Jewish proselyte is equally unknown. That he accompanied St. Paul in some of his journeys is gathered from the use of the pronoun plural is used: Luke, therefore, proceeded to Philippi; and there he seems to have stayed, as the third person is resumed in xvi. 40, xvii. 1. In xx. 5, 6 he again includes himself in the narrative, as leaving Philippi with Paul. Whether he had continued in that city during the whole interval, which was probably seven years, we must be uncertain. He went with Paul to Jerusalem, possibly was with him at Cæsarea, and certainly accompanied him to Rome, as the later chapters of the Acts prove. It may, however, be noted that some critics have imagined that various narratives have been used in compiling the Acts, and that Luke might have left the pronouns as he found them (Bleek, Einleitung in das N. T. pp. 120, 121, 338-340); but this supposition has little proof; and cannot be admitted to modify the preceding conclusion. We find Luke at Rome with Paul during his first imprisonment (Col. iv. 14, Philem. 24), and even later (2 Tim. iv. 11). Nothing is certainly known of his death; some traditions making him suffer martyrdom, others asserting that he died a natural death. The story of his being a painter is of late origin.

LUKE, THE GOSPEL OF. This is the third in order of the Gospels, attributed by universal consent to the evangelist whose name it bears.

It commences with an inscription to Theophilus, which states the object of writing, viz. to put on record an authentic orderly account of our Lord's history from his birth to his ascension (i. 1-4). There is then a narrative of Christ's birth with attendant circumstances, and particulars of his infancy and youth (5—ii. 52). Afterwards we have a notice of John's ministry, to his imprisonment (iii. 1-20). And then commences the history of Christ's public ministry, headed with a mention of his baptism (21, 22), his genealogy (23-38), his temptation (iv. 1-13), his discourses, miracles, and transactions in Galilee (14—ix. 50). We have then his last journeyings towards Jerusalem, including the narrative of his passion, death, resurrection, and ascension, (51—xxiv. 53).

St. Luke wrote his Gospel in Greek. His writings prove him to have been a man of education and attainment. His style is pure, copious, and flowing, more classical than that of the other evangelists: the preface, indeed, is altogether classical Greek. Still there are many Hebraisms, and certain peculiarities of diction apparent. The writer, moreover, evinces a thorough acquaintance with Jewish customs. This is not surprising in so clear-sighted an observer, especially as he certainly visited and perhaps more than once resided in Palestine. He had, too, the close intimacy of the apostle Paul, and was possibly, but, as already remarked, not certainly a Jewish proselyte. A singular propriety has been observed in the way in which he names and describes the various diseases he has occasion to mention. The thoughtful comments, too, which he frequently makes upon the circumstances he records, with the notice of the causes which led to particular events, admirably correspond with what we might expect from a well-informed professional man.

St. Luke refers to the narratives which others had previously drawn up (Luke i. 1): it has been questioned whether the Gospels of Matthew and Mark were among those narratives. Some critics, arguing on the false principle that a writer necessarily must relate all he knows, have insisted that, if St. Luke had been acquainted with the other Gospels, he would not have omitted events which they mention. This argument is worthless. A judicious author selects his materials; and, besides, there was here the higher influence of the Divine Spirit, not indeed superseding the exercise of the natural faculties, but yet directing to that which it seemed good to him that his servant should record. Still, looking at all the circumstances of the case, that those who are said to have written do not appear to be mentioned as eye-witnesses any more than Luke himself, whereas Matthew at least was an eye-witness of much he relates; and further that Luke does not say that he had consulted these narratives, whatever they were, but points to separate and independent sources of information, it is most safe to conclude that he had not the Gospels of Matthew and Mark in his hands. It has been thought by some that he derived assistance from St. Paul; who is even supposed to allude to this Gospel and as it were claim it (Rom. ii. 16). But Paul was not one of the eye-witnesses whom Luke describes; and there is little or no trace of Pauline diction. It is worthy of note, however, that the account of the institution of the Lord's supper in Luke xxii. 19, 20 is remarkably similar to that in 1 Cor. xi. 23-25, and further that St. Paul appears to cite Luke's Gospel as scripture (Luke x. 7, compared with 1 Tim. v. 18). Though not deriving his book from Paul, yet the close companionship he had with the apostle may have exercised a certain influence upon the evangelist.

The time when this Gospel was composed must have been prior to the composition of the Acts (Acts i. 1), possibly two or three years earlier; and it is not unlikely that it was written at Cæsarea. Dr. Alford places it earlier, at Philippi. Though addressed to an individual, it was not intended for him alone, more likely for Gentiles, or indeed with an universal aspect. And so it is characteristically a history, the most complete in itself of any of the Gospels. Some attempts have been made to impugn the authenticity of certain portions, especially chaps. i., ii.; but they are futile. Some valuable observations on this topic will be found in Dr. Mill's Mythical Interp. of the Gospels, part ii. pp. 91-122.

LUKEWARM (Rev. iii. 16). The state intended by this word is not a transitional but a final state. The 'cold' are those apart from gospel influence; the 'hot' are earnest believers. But the 'lukewarm' are men to whom the gracious call had come and made no impression, to whom the privileges vouchsafed had been useless. From the cold, when the voice of mercy reached them, converts might be hoped. The 'lukewarm,' gospel-hardened, were well-nigh hopeless. See Trench, Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, 2nd edit., pp. 194-198.

LUZ (almond-tree, or hazel).—1. A town near to which Jacob rested and had a prophetic vision; on this sacred spot was afterwards Beth-el (Gen. xxviii. 19, xxxv. 6, xlvi. 3; Josh. xvi. 2, xviii. 13; Judges i. 23). See BETH-EL, 1.—2. A city in the land of the Hittites, which a man, spared from the sacking of the first Luz, went and built (Judges i. 26). There are various conjectures as to its locality: see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Luz.'

LYCAONIA. An inland region of Asia Minor, bordering on Galatia in the north, on Cappadocia in the east, and on Phrygia in the west; on the south it was separated by the Taurus mountains from Cilicia. But the boundaries were variable; and politically Lycaonia belonged sometimes to Cappadocia, sometimes to Galatia. The whole district was a kind of hilly plain, impregnated with salt, very ill watered, but adapted for sheep-pasture, and the growth of wool. The principal cities of Lycaonia were Lystra, and Derbe. Iconium, though sometimes reckoned to other provinces, and made a separate government, might be called the capital of Lycaonia. The nature of the Lyconian language is uncertain. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Lycaonia.' Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel in this region, at Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe (Acts xiv. 1-23), and Paul visited it again on his other journeys (xvi. 1-6, xviii. 23, xix. 1).

LYCIA. A maritime province of Asia Minor. On the west it bordered on Caria, on the north and north-east on Phrygia and Pamphylia, on the east on Pamphylia, and it was washed on the south by the Mediterranean. It was not unfruitful, in climate and soil resembling Cilicia. Its cities Patara and Myra are mentioned in the New Testament (Acts xxi. 1, xxvii. 5). Lycia was subject to the Persian power: it then formed part of the Syrian kingdom; afterwards, having been for a while under the dominion of Rhodes, it became independent (1 Macc. xv. 23), but was at length subjected to the Roman sceptre by the emperor Claudius. It was at first combined with Pamphylia, but was afterwards a distinct province. Offsets from the Taurus mountains penetrated Lycia, between which ridges, called Cragus and Anticragus, the river Xanthus flowed (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Lycia'). Many noble remains of antiquity in this province have been discovered and described by Sir C. Fellows and other travellers.

LYDDA. The Greek name of the town known in Old Testament history as Lod, by the Romans called Diospolis. Here Peter preached, and healed Eneas of his palsy; after which multitudes, both in Lydda and the neighbourhood, were converted to the faith (Acts ix. 32-38). Lydd (for that is its modern name) is now a flourishing village, with about 2,000 inhabitants, embosomed in rich orchards of olive, fig, pomegranate, mulberry, sycamore, and other trees, and surrounded by a very fertile country. Here it is said St. George was born and buried, and here are the remains of a noble church dedicated to him.

Lydda, the district doubtless, is mentioned (1 Macc. xi. 34), as one of the three governments added to Judea.

LYDIA. A woman of Thyatira, a seller of purple—the purple dying of Thyatira and its neighbourhood being celebrated, and inscriptions of the guild of dyers there still existing—who heard Paul preach when at Philippi, believed, and was baptized with her family. She then offered her house to those through whom she had received the heavenly message (Acts xvi. 14, 15, 40).

LYDIA (Ezek. xxx. 5). An African nation. See LUDIM.

LYDIA. A region of Asia Minor (1 Macc. viii. 8), the centre of that dominion of which Croesus was the last king. In later times, Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, was compelled by the Romans to yield it to Eumenes, king of Pergamos; and after the death of Attalus III. it came under the immediate authority of Rome, and was made part of the province of Asia. Lydia extended, excluding the Ionian coast towns, from the promontory of Mycale to the mouth of the river Hermus. The northern boundary was formed by one chain of mountains striking out from Taurus, while another chain on the right bank of the Maeander separated Lydia on the east and south from Phrygia and Caria. Mount Tmolus runs through the country; in which, however, there are considerable plains: the climate is agreeable, and the land fertile. Sardis, the ancient capital, Thyatira, and Philadelphia were in Lydia, which in the Old Testament is called Lud.

LYD' IANS (Jer. xlv. 9). See LUDIM.

LYING. The precepts of scripture pointedly forbid lying and deception (Lev. xix. 11; Eph. iv. 25; Col. iii. 9; Rev. xxi. 8, 27). A fearful judgment was inflicted on Gehazi (2 Kings v. 25-27), and on Ananias and Sapphira for their false dealing (Acts v. 1-11). But it is remarkable that many even of the holier persons mentioned in scripture fell into this sin. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, are familiar examples (Gen. xii. 11-13, xx. 2, xxvi. 7, xxvii. 18, 24; 1 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 8). Falseness is a besetting vice of oriental nations; but it is abominable, whether spoken or acted, in the eyes of him who will not admit a liar into his pure kingdom.

LYSA'NIAS. There appear to have been two persons of this name rulers of Abilene. The first was put to death by Mark Antony at Cleopatra's instigation, 34 B.C. Most of his territories were subsequently given to Herod the Great, but not Abilene. The fair inference is that it was reserved to the family of the Lysanias that was slain. And it is probable that the second of that name (Luke iii. 1) was a descendant of the first. As an additional reason for believing that there was an earlier and a later Lysanias, we find that Abilene is called 'of Lysanias' when given by Claudius to Herod Agrippa the younger. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Abilene.'

LYS'IAS, CLAU'DIUS. A military officer, probably a Greek, as he obtained his Roman citizenship by purchase. He was in command at Jerusalem as tribune when Paul was seized by the Jews: he rescued him, and afterwards sent him with a strong guard to the procurator Felix at Cæsarea (Acts xxi. 31-40, xxii., xxiii.).

LYS'IAS (1 Macc. iii. 32, 33; 2 Macc. x. 11, xi. 1, and elsewhere). A nobleman of the Syrian blood royal, entrusted with important offices by Antiochus Epiphanes.

LYSIM'ACHUS.—1 (Rest of Esth. xi. 1).—2, Brother of Menelaus the high priest (2 Macc. iv. 29, 39).

LYS'TRA. A city of Lycaonia, though by some reckoned to other provinces. Here was performed the miraculous cure which induced the people to believe that Paul was Mercury, and Barnabas Jupiter. Timothy was probably a native of Lystra (Acts xiv. 6, 8-11, 21, xvi. 1, 2; 2 Tim. iii. 11). Lystra seems to have been situated at the foot of the mountain-mass Karadagh, to the south of Iconium. There are some ruins of churches north of this mountain, at a place called Bin-bir-Kilisseh: perhaps this was Lystra.

M

MA'ACAH (oppression). The daughter of Talmal, king of Geshur: she was one of David's wives, the mother of Absalom (2 Sam. iii. 3), and was called also Maachah (1 Chron. iii. 2).

MA'ACAH (id.). A district or kingdom of Syria, to the north-east of Palestine, bordering on the territories of the trans-Jordanic tribes, perhaps eastward of Argob, the modern Lejah (2 Sam. x. 6, where our version erroneously leaves out 'of,' 8), termed also Maachah and Syria-maachah (1 Chron. xix. 6, 7). It is not clear whether any connection subsisted between it and Abelbeth-maachah.

MA'ACHAH (id.).—1. One of the children, we know not whether male or female, of Nahor, Abraham's brother, by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii. 24).—2. The father of Achish, king of Gath (1 Kings ii. 39), called also Maach (1 Sam. xxvii. 2).—3. A daughter, perhaps granddaughter, of Absalom, who is sometimes called Abshalom: she was one of Rehoboam's wives, mother of Abijam, and grandmother of Asa. It has been thought that Asa's own mother was dead: Maachah therefore still held the dignity of queen-mother (1 Kings xv. 2, 10, 13; 2 Chron. xi. 20, 21, 22, xv. 16). She is called also Michajah (xiii. 2).—4. A concubine of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 48).—5 (iii. 2). See MAACH.—6. A descendant of Benjamin, wife of Machir (vii. 15, 16).—7. The wife of Jehiel, father or colonizer of Gibeon (viii. 29, ix. 35).—8. The father of one of David's warriors (xi. 43).—9. The father of the ruler of the Simeonites in David's time (xxvii. 16).

MA'ACHAH (id.) (1 Chron. xix. 7). A Syrian kingdom. See MAACHAH.

MAA'CHATHI (id.). The inhabitants of Maachah, or Maachah (Deut. iii. 14).

MAA'CHATHITES. Also inhabitants of Maachah or Maachah (Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 11, 13; 2 Sam. xxiii. 34; 2 Kings xxv. 23; 1 Chron. iv. 19; Jer. xl. 8). In some of these places the name may possibly be derived from a person.

MAADAI' (ornament of Jehovah). One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 34).

MAADI'AH (id.). A priest who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 5), called also Moadiah (17).

MAAI' (compassionate?). A Levite who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 36).

MA'ALEH-ACRAB'BIM (the ascent of scorpions, scorpion-pass) (Josh. xv. 3). See AKRABBIM.

MA'ANI (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Bani (Ezra x. 29).

MA'ARATH (a naked, or open, place). A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 59).

MAASEI'AH (work of Jehovah).—1. A Levite porter appointed to play on the psaltery (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20).—2. An officer who joined with Jehoiada in placing Joash on the throne of Judah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).—3. A ruler under king Uziah (xxvi. 11).—4. A son of king Ahaz (xxviii. 7).—5. The governor of Jerusalem under Josiah (xxxiv. 8).—6, 7, 8. Three priests who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 18, 21, 22).—9. Another person who had transgressed in like manner (30).—10. The father of one who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 23).—11. One who, when Ezra read the law, assisted in explaining it (viii. 4, 7).—12. A person who sealed the covenant (x. 25).—13. A descendant of Judah (xi. 5). Possibly identical with Asafah (1 Chron. ix. 5).—14. A Benjamite (Neh. xi. 7).—15, 16. Two priests that took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (xii. 41, 42).—17. The father of Zephaniah, a priest in king Zedekiah's reign (Jer. xxi. 1, xxix. 25, xxxvii. 3).—18. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah (xxix. 21).—19. A door-keeper of the temple (xxxv. 4).

MAASEI'AH (his refuge is Jehovah). The father of Neriah and grandfather of Baruch and Seraiah (Jer. xxxiii. 12, li. 59).

MA'ASIAI (work of Jehovah). A priest (1 Chron. ix. 12; comp. Neh. xi. 13).

MAASIAS (Bar. i. 1). A name in the genealogy of Baruch.

MA'ATH (small). One of the persons named in our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 26).

MA'AZ (anger). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 27).

MAAZI'AH (consolation of Jehovah).—1. The chief of the twenty-fourth course of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 18).—2. A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 8), probably the representative of the course No. 1.

MAB'DAI (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Benaiah (Ezra x. 35).

MABNAD'EBAI (Ezra x. 40, marg.). This appears in some copies for Machnadebai in the text.

MAC'ALON (1 Esdr. v. 21). A corrupt form of Michmas or Michash (Ezra ii. 27).

MACCABEES, THE BOOKS OF. The two historical books so designated have their name as containing the history of the gallant exploits of the Maccabean family in behalf of their countrymen the Jews.

The first book is a valuable document, comprising a history of events from the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes to the death of the high priest Simon, 175-135 B.C. After an introduction and account of the Maccabean family to the death of the father Mattathias (1 Macc. i, ii.), the narrative relates first the achievements of Judas (iii. 1-ix. 22); next the events under the administration of his brother Jonathan (23-xii. 53); and thirdly, the establishment of Jewish freedom under Simon (xiii.-xvi.): this part closes with a notice that, though Simon had fallen by treachery, his son succeeded to his power, and maintained the position he had won.

It would seem that the author drew from written sources (ix. 22, xvi. 24): he has also inserted many documents (viii. 22-28, x. 18-20, 25-45, and elsewhere). Some of the documents are expressly called copies, and may therefore be supposed transcripts of the originals: of others it is said that they were 'to this effect'; the writer has given therefore only the substance of them. We can hardly suppose that he was himself engaged in the events he records; but he may very well have had intelligence from those who were. He has used his materials fairly and truthfully; and his geographical details are minute and accurate, exhibiting the pains which have been taken with the work. Still there are many errors arising from imperfect information; and the brevity of some parts of the narrative renders it occasionally obscure. Examples of inaccuracy are the statements that Antiochus the Great was taken prisoner by the Romans (viii. 7), that a single annual magistrate governed the Roman commonwealth (16); and many others might be added. The tone of the book is simple and natural: the style is easy and unaffected. In a religious point of view it differs widely from such Hebrew annals as the books of Samuel and Kings. The author did not feel himself empowered to describe the divine purposes and interpositions; and in one note-worthy passage (ix. 27) he acknowledges that the prophetic spirit had ceased among the chosen people.

There is every probability that the first book of Maccabees was originally written in Hebrew; and it must have been the work of a Palestinian Jew. From the closing sentences we may place the date of it either towards the end of the administration of John Hyrcanus or shortly after his death. We may therefore venture to assign it to some point between 110 and 90 B.C. The author of the Greek translation is not known. There are Syriac and old Latin versions, closely rendered from the Greek.

The second book of Maccabees is very inferior to the first; it is far less simple and trustworthy.

It commences with two letters purporting to be written by the Jews in Palestine to their Alexandrine brethren (2 Macc. i. 1-ii. 18). Then follows an abridgment of a work of Maccabean history, in five books, by one Jason of Cyrene, prefaced by an introduction (19-32), and closed with a brief epilogue (xv. 38, 39). The intervening part (iii. 1-xv. 37) begins with the narrative of an attempt to plunder the temple by Heliodorus, under King Seleucus Nicator, and terminates with the death of Nicanor, made governor of Judea. The period comprised may be reckoned as extending from 176-161 B.C. Nothing certain is known of Jason, the author of the larger work; but it has been conjectured that he lived between 120 and 100 B.C. As little is known of the epitomizer, who may have lived between 100 and 50 B.C. The two letters at the beginning were probably prefixed by him to his compilation from another source. The original language must have been Greek of an Alexandrine cast.

The history of this second book is a more full account of a part of the time comprised in the first; but the statements do not always agree. Moreover, there are demonstrable inaccuracies and contradictions in the book itself. Thus the account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (i. 13-16) is quite different from that in ix. This book, too, is peculiar in its religious tone. It contains legends, and records of supernatural events. The style is embellished and exaggerated; and the narrative is interspersed with moralizing observations. There are Syriac and old Latin translations. It may be added that neither Philo nor Josephus allude to the book.

These two books of Maccabees were acknowledged as canonical by the council of Trent: the proofs of their inaccuracy are sufficient to show the impropriety of that decision. See APOCRYPHA.

transmitted his power and the pontifical dignity to his son Hyrcanus, whose son and successor, Aristobulus, assumed the title of king. His brother Alexander Jannæus succeeded; after whose death a civil war was waged between his sons Hyrcanus and Aristobulus; the last-named of whom was defeated by Pompey, and with Antigonus, his son, the dynasty ended. The two last members of the family were Aristobulus and Mariamne, grandchildren of Aristobulus II.; and with the death of Mariamne the Maccabean race may be said to be extinguished. See MATTATHIAS, 2, JUDAS, 2, JOHN, 4, HEROD.

The following table of the Maccabean or Asmonean family may be found convenient for reference:—

Chasmon (a priest of the course of Jehoiarib or Joiarib), from whom some derive the name Asmonean.

There are other three books, bearing the titles respectively of the third, the fourth, and the fifth books of Maccabees. As these were never received even into the Romish canon, it is unnecessary to give any account of them here. The reader who desires to know something about them may consult Dr. Cotton's Five Books of the Maccabees.

MACCABEES, THE FAMILY OF MACCABEUS. Maccabeus was a surname of Judas the son of Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 4), probably derived from makkabi, a hammer. Hence the line of Maccabean princes; who, after freeing their country from the Syrian tyranny, governed it for about 126 years. They were also called the Asmoneans, perhaps from a Hebrew word signifying fat, i.e. nobles or princes (Psal. lxxviii. 31). Mattathias commenced his patriotic course 167 B.C. His sons, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, carried out their father's purpose. Simon

The line of succession in the government is as follows:—

- B.C.
- 166 Judas Maccabeus.
- 161 Jonathan.
- 143 Simon. The first year of Jewish freedom was 142 B.C.
- 135 John Hyrcanus.
- 107 Aristobulus.
- 105 Alexander Jannæus.
- 79 Alexandra.
- 70 Hyrcanus II.
- 69 Aristobulus II.
- 63 Hyrcanus II. restored.
- 40 Antigonus.

From Jonathan downwards the pontifical as well as the civil dignity was held by all these princes, of course with the exception of queen Alexandra. The kingly title Aristobulus I. assumed was borne by his successors. The last male of the family was Aristobulus son of Alexander. He was high priest, and was drowned when bathing by Herod's procurement, 35 B.C.

MACEDO'NIA. A country to the north of Greece proper: its boundaries varied at different times. After the time of Philip it reached on the east to the Ægean sea and the frontiers of Thrace: on the north it was separated from Mœsia by a mountain-chain, and similarly from Illyricum on the north-west and west: on the south it bordered on Thessaly and the Ægean. It was perhaps originally peopled by the Chittim or Kittim (Gen. x. 4: see 1 Macc. i. 1). It rose to great power under Philip, whose son, Alexander the Great, subdued the chief part of the then-known world. His empire is described by Daniel under the emblem of a one-horned goat (Dan. viii. 5-8, 21); and coins still exist representing Macedonia under this symbol. Its king Perseus was conquered 167 B.C. by the Romans under Paulus Æmilius, and the country was at first declared free; but, after being divided into four districts, of which Amphipolis, Thessalonica, Pella, and Pelagonia were the chief towns, it subsequently, 142 B.C., became a single Roman proconsular province till the reign of Tiberius. A change was afterwards made; and, from the time of Claudius, Macedonia and Achaia comprehended the whole of Greece (Rom. xv. 26; 2 Cor. ix. 2; 1 Thess. i. 8). St. Paul (summoned by a remarkable vision, in which a man of the country prayed for help) preached the gospel in Macedonia in his second and third missionary journeys; Silas and Timothy being his companions (Acts xvi. 9, &c., xx. 1-3). Other Macedonian cities besides those above noted are mentioned in the New Testament—Philippi, Neapolis, Apollonia, Berea (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Macedonia'). By 'Macedonians' (2 Macc. viii. 20) Syrians are meant; Syria being a part of Alexander's empire.

MACEDO'NIAN (Acts xxvii. 2). An inhabitant of Macedonia.

MACHBAN'AI (what like my sons? according to some, bond of the Lord). A Gadite chief who joined David (1 Chron. xii. 13).

MACBE'NAH (a cloak). A name found among the genealogies of Judah, probably that of a town of which Sheva was the 'father,' i. e. the founder (1 Chron. ii. 49).

MA'CHI (decrease?). The father of the spy selected from the tribe of Gad (Numb. xiii. 15).

MA'CHIR (sold).—1. The son of Manasseh and grandson of Joseph, who became the distinguished head of a family in his tribe (Gen. i. 23; Numb. xxvi. 29, xxvii. 1, xxxii. 39, 40, xxxvi. 1; Deut. iii. 15; Josh. xiii. 31, xvii. 1, 3; Judges v. 14; 1 Chron. ii. 21, 23, vii. 14, 15, 16, 17).—2. A person in whose house Mephibosheth was preserved (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5, xvii. 27).

MACHIRITES. A family of Manasseh, descendants of Machir (Numb. xxvi. 29).

MACH'MES (1 Macc. ix. 73). Michmash.

MACHNAD'EBAI (what like the liberal?) One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 40).

MACH'PELAH (portion, lot, or, it may be, double cave). A field in Hebron with a cave, which Abraham bought of Ephron the Hittite, to be a burial-place for his family. There Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, Jacob and Leah, were buried (Gen. xxiii., xxv. 9, 10, xlix. 29-32, l. 12, 13). The ceremonious manner in which the purchase was made is exactly conformable with modern Syrian customs. See Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 577-579; and thus we have a remarkable corroboration of the truth of the narrative. This cave still exists, and is guarded with jealous care; very few indeed but Mohammedans being permitted to visit it. It is enclosed by a structure called El Haram, very ancient, perhaps of Jewish workmanship. It stands on the declivity of a hill, the town of Hebron lying for the most part below to the south and west. Pilasters surround it, square, without capitals. Sixteen of these are on each side and eight at the ends. The whole building is, according to Dr. Robinson, 200 feet long, 150 broad, and 60 high. Within the exterior edifice is a large mosque, once perhaps a Christian church, and beneath the dome is the cave. In this mosque are the six tombs, possibly over the places where the actual sarcophagi lie in the cave below.

The Mohammedans have always jealously refused admission into the interior of the mosque. But on occasion of the prince of Wales's visit to Palestine in 1862 the rigid prohibition was to some degree relaxed. An account of what was seen has been given by Dr. Stanley, Lectures on the Jewish Church, append. ii. part 1. The building, he observes, is on the upper slope of the hill, 'and therefore above the level, where, if anywhere, the sacred cave would be found.' He adds that it is clear that the mosque was originally a Byzantine church, and had been at a later period converted to its present purpose, and proceeds to describe the tombs of the patriarchs, 'premising always that these tombs, like all those in Mussulman mosques, and indeed like most tombs in Christian churches, do not profess to be the actual places of sepulture, but are merely monuments or cenotaphs in honour of the dead who lie beneath. Each is inclosed within a separate chapel or shrine, closed with gates or railings similar to those which surround or inclose the special chapels or royal tombs in Westminster Abbey. The two first of these shrines or chapels are contained in the inner portico or narther, before the entrance into the actual building of the mosque. In the recess on the right is the shrine of Abraham, in the recess on the left that of Sarah, each guarded by silver gates. The shrine of Sarah we were requested not to enter as being that of a woman. A pall lay over it. The shrine of Abraham, after a momentary hesitation, was thrown open. The chamber is cased in marble. The so-called tomb consists of a coffin-like structure, about six feet high, built up of plastered stone or marble, and hung with three carpets—green embroidered with gold. Within the area of the mosque were shown the tombs of Isaac and Rebekah. They are placed under separate chapels, in the walls of which are windows, and of which the gates are grated, not with silver, but iron bars. Their situation in the body of the mosque may indicate their Christian origin. In almost all Mussulman sanctuaries the tombs of distinguished persons are placed, not in the centre of the building, but in the corners. To Rebekah's tomb the same decorous rule of the exclusion of male visitors naturally applied as in the case of Sarah's. But on requesting to see the tomb of Isaac we were entreated not to enter. . . . "Abraham was full of loving-kindness: he had withstood even the resolution of God against Sodom and Gomorrah: he was goodness itself, and would overlook any affront. But Isaac was proverbially jealous; and it was exceedingly dangerous to exasperate him. . . ." The shrines of Jacob and Leah were shown in recesses, corresponding to those of Abraham and Sarah, but in a separate cloister opposite the entrance of the mosque. . . . Up to this point no mention has been made of the subject of the greatest interest; namely, the sacred cave itself, in which one at least of the patriarchal family may possibly still repose intact—the embalmed body of Jacob. . . . One indication alone of the cavern beneath was visible. In the interior of the mosque, at the corner of the shrine of Abraham, was a small circular hole, about eight inches across, of which one foot above the pavement was built of strong masonry, but of which the lower part, as far as we could see and feel, was of the living rock. This cavity appeared to open into a dark space beneath, and that space (which the guardians of the mosque believed to extend under the whole platform) can hardly be anything else than the ancient cavern of Machpelah. This was the only aperture which the guardians recognized. Once they said, 2,500 years ago, a servant of a great king had penetrated through some other entrance. He descended in full possession of his faculties and of remarkable corpulence: he returned blind, deaf, withered, and crippled. Since then the entrance was closed; and this aperture alone was left, partly for the sake of suffering the holy air of the cave to escape into the mosque and be scented by the faithful; partly for the sake of allowing a lamp to be let down by a chain, which we saw suspended at the mouth, to burn upon the sacred cave. We asked whether it could not be lighted now. "No," they said "the saint likes to have a lamp at night, but not in the full day-light." With that glimpse into the dark void we and the world without must for the present be satisfied. Whether any other entrance is known to the Mussulmans themselves must be a matter of doubt.' Comp. Bible. Dict. vol. i. pp. 724-726.

MA'CRON (2 Macc. x. 12). The surname of Ptolemee or Ptolemeus, an officer of Antiochus Epiphanes.

MAD, MADNESS. Various words occur in the original which are so rendered in our version. Occasionally excitement, ungodly frenzied, or fierce wrath is implied (Deut. xxviii. 28, 34; 2 Kings ix. 11; Luke vi. 11; Acts xxvi. 11). But sometimes actual insanity is meant (1 Sam. xxi. 13-15; 1 Cor. xiv. 23). And once it is connected with demoniacal possession (John x. 20); but see

DEMONIAC. Madness is supposed in the east to open the mind, which loses its right estimation of ordinary things, to supernatural influence. Hence the insane are looked on with a kind of reverence. Perhaps this belief has been fostered by the practice of violently and madly gesticulating in idolatrous worship (see 1 Kings xix. 26-28). It might tend to secure to David when simulating madness an escape from Philistia.

MA'DAI (middle land). One of the sons of Japheth (Gen. x. 2; 1 Chron. i. 5). He was the progenitor of the Medes; Media probably signifying the empire of the middle, because it was believed to be in the centre of Asia. See MEDIA.

MAD'ABUN (1 Esdr. v. 58).

MA'DIAN (Acts vii. 29). The Greek form of Midian.

MAD'MANNAH (a dung-hill). A town in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 31; 1 Chron. ii. 49). It is probably the modern el-Minyay, about fifteen miles south-south-west of Gaza (Wilton, The Negeb, pp. 209-211).

MAD'MEN (id.). A town in the country of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 2). But it may be doubted whether the word here is a proper name: in a somewhat-similar passage (Isai. xxv. 10) our translators have rendered it as an appellative.

MADME'NAH (id.)—1. A place to the north of Jerusalem, and at no great distance (Isai. x. 31).—2 (xxv. 10, marg.): see preceding article.

MA'DON (contention). A city, apparently in the north of Palestine, which, with its king, was conquered by Joshua (Josh. xi. 1, xii. 19).

MAE'LUS (1 Esdr. ix. 26). Miamin (Ezra x. 25).

MAG'BISH (a gathering). The children of Magbish returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 30). Probably it was the name of a place. It is omitted in the corresponding list of Neh. vii.

MAG'DALA (tower). A town in Galilee, in all probability identical with Migdal-el (Josh. xix. 38). It stood close upon the western shore of the lake at the southern end of the plain of Gennesaret, about an hour and a quarter north of Tiberias (Matt. xv. 39). It was the birth-place of Mary, hence called Magdalen (Mark xvi. 9). The modern village el-Mejdel is described as 'a wretched hamlet of a dozen low huts, huddled into one, and the whole ready to tumble into a dismal heap of black basaltic rubbish' (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 420). 'The town,' says Dr. Buchanan, 'must have been eminently picturesque, built on its little flat of level ground, with steep rocky heights folding round it behind, and the broad lake spreading out before it. While the overhanging hills would intercept the view from it to the south and west, the prospect on the other two sides must have been extensive and fine. Northwards its own little plateau breaks out almost immediately into the broad and luxuriant plain of Gennesaret, whose gracefully-curving shore and silver strand, fringed with its grey garland of magnificent oleanders, is laved by the crystal waters of the lake. Beyond this noble plain, the mountains of Gallilee swell away up in successive ranges to a height of from three to four thousand feet above the level of the lake: and, in the midst of their highest peaks, Safed, the supposed "city set on an hill," lifts its conspicuous head. Along the shores of the lake, which from Gennesaret trend away in a north-easterly direction, the eye, looking from the ancient Magdala, would light first on Capernaum, stretching from the summit of the rock on which it was "exalted to heaven," down to the very brink of the lake, next on Bethsaida, then on Chorazin, and a little way farther on would meet the mouth of the Jordan, where it rushes into the lake; beyond which it would rest finally on those rugged mountains—that "desert place"—where Christ fed the multitudes with a few loaves of bread. Such was the country from which Mary of Magdala followed Jesus to Jerusalem, with those other pious women who "ministered unto him of their substance" (Notes of Cler. Furlough, p. 375).

MAGDALE'NE. An inhabitant (female) of Magdala. See MARY, 2.

MAG'DIEL (praise of God). One of the dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 43; 1 Chron. i. 54).

MA'GED (1 Macc. v. 36). See MAKED.

MA'GI. The original term designating the eastern sages who paid their homage to the infant Jesus at Beth-lehem (Matt. ii. 1-12). These magi must be carefully distinguished from the sorcerers or magicians to whom the same appellation was sometimes given (Acts xiii. 8). We find this term used in the Old Testament (Jer. xxxix. 3), where Rab-mag is the prince-magus, the chief of the sacerdotal caste among the Chaldeans. Originally one of the Median tribes to whom the sacred ministrations belonged, the magi held a high position in the Medo-Persian empire. They were the priests, the prophets, the scholars of the nation, indicating the holiness of their functions by an exact cleanliness of body. They were held in high respect by the sovereigns, and frequently took part in political business and revolutions. Their religious system, which had become debased, is said to have been reformed by Zerdasht or Zoroaster. Respecting this sage the most contradictory opinions have prevailed. Winer (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Magier') is inclined to place him in the latter part of the seventh century before Christ. Some give him an undefined antiquity; and others bring him down to a comparatively-late period. See D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., arts. 'Magius,' 'Zerdascht'; Prideaux, Connect., vol. i. pp. 176-207; Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, chap. viii. vol. i. pp. 333, 334, note, edit. 1838. The magi were divided into three orders: herbeds, or disciples; mobeds, or masters; and destur-mobeds, or complete masters. They had also three classes of temples, the lowest, in which the sacred fire was maintained only in a lamp, the next where it burned upon an altar, and the highest where the chief of the magians resided. They were distinguished by a peculiar dress or insignia—a girdle, called costi; a sacred cup, havan, used for libations; and a bundle of twigs, denominated barsom, held together by a band. It would seem that after the example of the Medes, a similar sacerdotal caste existed among other oriental nations. Thus we find them in Babylon (Dan. i. 20, ii. 2). Possibly these might have had a Median origin. Be this, however, as it may, such orders of men were to be found in various countries, degenerating often, it is likely, into mere astrologers and soothsayers, such as are stigmatized by Greek and Roman writers.

Of the actual place of residence of the sages to whom the sign of Messiah's birth was vouchsafed we know nothing: it has been said that they were from Persia, from Arabia, from Assyria. But they must certainly be supposed of that class which, as above remarked, was originally Medo-Persian. And the Persians were 'distinguished,' says Dr. Mill, 'from all the other great ruling nations of antiquity, as well by the comparative purity of their religion, as by their uniform gentleness, and often distinguished favour, to the people of God under their sway. To that nation's general abhorrence of idolatry, in all its grosser aspects, the magian order mainly contributed; an order whose study of the powers and principles of nature was fitted to attain the best knowledge of God within the reach of the Gentiles of old; whose worshipful invocation of fire, air, and the rest, ever carefully distinguished those elementary powers from the supreme Deity; and whose error respecting the origination of evil beings from Ahriman, and his share with Ormuzd in the formation of the world, was unaccompanied, in their most ancient authorized books, with any of that ascription of independence to the evil principle which imparts the chief malignity to that error' (Observ. on Appl. of Pantheist. Princ. part ii. chap. iii. sect. i. pp. 308, 309). We may therefore acknowledge the divine wisdom in making choice of these sages, comparatively free from heathen pollution, as the representatives of the Gentile world to whom to announce the expected Messiah: see STAR IN THE EAST. At a later period, the Persian magi, fearful of losing their privileges, violently persecuted the Christians (Sozom., Hist. Eccl., lib. ii. cap. viii., &c.).

MAGIC, MAGICAL ARTS, MAGICIANS. Magic was an art of deeper significance and power than astrology or divination, from which it must be carefully distinguished. They were exercised in discovering future events: by magic it was supposed that future events might be influenced.

It was practised among various nations of antiquity. There was a magic element in the Persian religion of Zoroaster (Döllinger's Gentile and Jew in the Courts of the Temple of Christ, transl., book vi. 2, vol. i. pp. 280, &c.). So with the Egyptian religion, where the gods were not only worshipped, but threatened, in order to compel them to a certain course of action. In the Egyptian system of therapeutics, too, there was a magical character (ibid. 5, p. 481). The same principle may be traced in Chaldea, where the object was not merely to forecast the destiny by observing the heavens, but to fix it by sacrifice and incantation, so as to re-act upon the stars.

The Greeks and Romans similarly had sacrifices and rites of secret observance, to which the special power was attributed of making the gods subservient to the will of men. Such were the Roman rites of the dead, formulæ of prayer, and evocation of the gods. According to the Pythagorean notion, all beings with souls are homogeneous. Hence the spirit of man can act directly on higher natures, and attract them into the circle of its existence and requirements. And then, as it was supposed that men possessed a double soul, the nobler emanating from the Deity, and a natural one, in affinity with other natural beings, a magic power could, it was conceived, be exercised on nature.

It was not generally the supreme gods that might be thus acted on. There were demons, inhabitants of the air, having passions in common with men; and to these it was that magical rites applied. And the art was denominated white or black, according as good or malicious demons were addressed. In Greece magic was connected with the worship partly of deities of foreign origination, and partly of those subterranean ones to whom the demons were subject as ministering spirits. The practice of magic might be publicly avowed, if persons did not intend thereby to injure others. But usually it was attended with dark and mysterious usages. Then there were human sacrifices, magical rites being connected therewith. And the object was evil. Thus persons were to be struck with disease, or madness, or loss of memory; of which Cicero gives an instance (Brutus, 60). Love-potions were of this kind. And what were called Ephesian and Milesian words had the highest reputation for efficacy. The former were characters engraved on the pedestal, girdle, and crown of the Ephesian Artemis, or Venus, meaning 'darkness, light, earth, year, sun, true sounds.' They were graven also on stones or rings worn as amulets. Similar to these probably were the 'books,' or written formulæ, brought together and burnt at Ephesus (Acts xix. 19), the value being calculated at 1,770*l.* Comp. Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, chap. xxv. vol. iv. pp. 238-242.

Necromancy was connected with the magical worship of demons, invoking and appeasing the manes of those who had died a natural death. Theurgy was magic of the highest character. It professed to communicate not with lower and mediate beings, but with the most exalted gods, to make them subservient to the desires of those who practised it (Döllinger, ubi sup., book viii. 2, § 7, vol. ii. pp. 210-216).

The Egyptian magicians do not appear to have practised magic in the sense in which it has been explained. They were interpreters of dreams (Gen. xli. 8), diviners, and professed by their incantations to secure happiness to the soul in another life. Little need be said on their opposition to Moses and Aaron. They were successful in deceiv-ing Pharaoh on three occasions (Exod. vii. 11, 12, 22, viii. 7), and then, trying again, they failed (18). We can hardly suppose that they effected more than a clever juggle.

MAGID'DO (1 Esdr. i. 29). Megiddo.

MAGISTRATE. The word is sometimes used in our translation in a general sense for those possessing legal authority (Tit. iii. 1). The 'magistrate' in Judges xviii. 7 is, literally, possessor of dominion, or possessor of wealth, according to Gesenius, referring not to a ruler but to a people. The word thus translated in Ezra vii. 25 is frequently elsewhere rendered 'judges,' as in Deut. i. 16; Judges ii. 18. The magistrates of Luke xii. 11, 58 are properly rulers. We find again the term in our version of Acts xvi. 20, 22, 35, 36, 38, a place which seems to require some explanation. First, the general name 'rulers,' or authorities, is employed (19); and then these are afterwards more particularly specified as being 'magistrates,' stratēgoi. They were the Roman colonial officers, properly called duumviri, analogous to and sometimes claiming the more venerable title of pretors.

MAGOG (region of Gog). A tribe of the sons of Japheth (Gen. x. 2; 1 Chron. i. 5). Nothing more is said of Magog in the historical books of scripture, but we can gather some notion of the greatness of the people intended from the magnificent descriptions of Ezekiel (Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.). That prophet, predicting events which perhaps have not yet been accomplished, describes Gog of the land of Magog as sovereign over vast regions. Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal are his subjects; Persia, Ethiopia, and Lybia attend him; Gomer and Togarmah are at his beck. And with mighty will this ruler of Magog comes down upon the land of Israel; but there his innumerable legions shall perish. St. John uses the same language. The nations of the earth, who, deceived by Satan, are to gather as the sand of the sea against the beloved city, and be destroyed by the last awful fire that shall flash down from God's eternal throne, are denominated Gog and Magog (Rev. xx. 8, 9). Without attempting to interpret these prophecies, we may see in them sufficient grounds for determining the quarter to which we must look for Magog. There can scarcely be a doubt that the Scythians are intended, those wild and almost-numberless tribes which peopled Asia from the Caucasus and the sea of Asoph to the Caspian on towards India. Ancient writers speak of their extended conquests. They defeated Cyaxares king of Media; and Asia was at their feet. They flowed like a torrent through Palestine towards Egypt; but were bribed by the Egyptian king Psammetichus to proceed no farther. For twenty-eight years their sway continued, till at length Cyaxares, about 600 B.C., drove them back. Such are the accounts which historians record (Herodotus, lib. i. 103-106). It must have been God's peculiar mercy which protected the Jews. For we find no notice of any damage to Judea. The king of Magog would seem to have been ordinarily called Gog; but in later times Gog and Magog are coupled as nations.

MA'GOR-MISS'ABIB (fear round-about). A symbolical name given to Pashur for his conduct to Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. xx. 3, 4). See PASHUR, 1.

MAG'PIASH (moth-killer). One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 20).

MAH'ALAH (disease). A descendant (female?) of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 18).

MAHALAL'EEL (praise of God).—1. One of the ante-diluvian patriarchs (Gen. v. 12, 13, 15, 16, 17; 1 Chron. i. 2).—2. A descendant of Judah (Neh. xi. 4).

MA'HALATH (a stringed instrument, a lyre).—1. A daughter of Ishmael whom Esau married (Gen. xxviii. 9). She is called also (xxxvi. 3) BASHMATH, which see.—2. One of the wives of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 18), a grandchild of David.

MA'HALATH, MA'HALATH-LEAN'NOTH (a stringed instrument for singing). Words found in the inscription or title of Psal. lxxxviii. Mahalath occurs alone in the title of Psal. liii. Different interpretations are given; but it is probably a direction to the chief musician that the psalm was to be played on an instrument, for singing, that is, with a vocal accompaniment.

MAH'ALI (sickly) (Exod. vi. 19). See MAHLI, 1.

MAHANAIM (camps). A place so named because there the angels (or camp) of God met Jacob and his camp or caravan when he was returning from Padan-aram (Gen. xxxii. 2). It was on the east of the Jordan, to the north of the Jabbok, and lay on the frontier of Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh, being in the territory of the former, but afterwards assigned to the Levites (Josh. xiii. 26, 30, xxi. 38; 1 Chron. vi. 80). It was at Mahanaim that Abner established Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. ii. 8, 12, 29): here were David's head-quarters during Absalom's rebellion (xvii. 24, 27, xix. 39; 1 Kings ii. 8); and this was the seat of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (iv. 14). There are some ruins existing called Mahnah, in the Jebel Ajlun, near the banks of the Jabbok, which probably mark the site of Mahanaim.

MA'HANEH-DAN (camp of Dan). A place behind Kirjath-jearim, just within the border of Judah, so called because the Danites pitched there when on their march to surprise Laish (Judges xviii. 10). Probably the same place is meant in xiii. 25: see marg.

MAHARA'I (impetuous). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 28; 1 Chron. xi. 30, xxvii. 13). He was a descendant of Zerah, or Zarah, son of Judah.

MA'HATH (grasping).—1. A Levite of the family of Kohath (1 Chron. vi. 35).—2. Another Levite of same family, or perhaps the representative of no. 1, in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 12, xxxi. 13).

MA'HAVITE. The designation of Eliel, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 46): it is not known whence he derived it.

MAHAZ'OTH (visions). A Levite of the sons of Heman, a chief of one of the divisions of the singers (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 30).

MA'HER-SHA'LAL-HASH'-BAZ (hasting to the spoil he speeds to the prey). The symbolical name given to the son of the prophet Isaiah, to indicate the rapid march of the king of Assyria upon Samaria and Damascus (Isai. viii. 1, 3).

MAH'LAH (disease). One of the five daughters of Zelophehad, who had their father's inheritance, but were to be married only within their own tribe (Numb. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3).

MAH'LI (sickly).—1. A Levite, son of Merari (Numb. iii. 20; 1 Chron. vi. 19, 29, xxiii. 21, xxiv. 26, 28; Ezra viii. 18). He is called Mahali in Exod. vi. 19.—2. A grandson of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 47, xxiii. 23).

MAH'LITES. A family of Levites, descendants of Mahli, 1 (Numb. iii. 33, xxvi. 58).

MAH'LON (sickly). One of the sons of Elimelech. He was the first husband of Ruth, and died in the land of Moab (Ruth i. 2, 5, iv. 9, 10).

MA'HOL (dancing). A man whose sons were exceeded by Solomon in wisdom (1 Kings iv. 31). Some consider the word an appellative, and would translate 'sons of the dance,' or choir.

MAIA'NEAS (1 Esdr. ix. 48). Maaseiah (Neh. viii. 7).

MAID-SERVANT. See SERVANT.

MAIN-SAIL (Acts xxvii. 40). The word translated main-sail is that which in ancient vessels was attached to the fore-mast: it should therefore be rendered fore-sail. See Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, diss. iii. pp. 184, &c. See also SHIP.

MA'KAZ (end). A place mentioned as forming, with some towns on the borders of Dan and Judah, one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 9).

MAKE-BATES (2 Tim. iii. 3, marg.; Tit. ii. 3, marg.). An old word signifying stirrers of strife.

MA'KED (1 Macc. v. 26). A strong city of Gilead, called also Maged (86). It has not been identified.

MAK'HELOTH (assemblies, choirs). A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 25, 26).

MAK'KEDAH (place of shepherds). A city in the low country of Judah, to which Joshua pursued the Amorites after the victory before Gibeon (Josh. x. 10, 16, 17, 21, 28, 29, xii. 16, xv. 41). There is a graphic account of the discovery of the five Canaanitish chiefs in the cave close by, their execution, and the storming of the town, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 20, 21.

MAK'TESH (a mortar). It is questionable whether this is a proper name, especially as it occurs with the article (Zeph. i. 11). It seems to have been applied to one of the valleys in or near Jerusalem, from its resemblance to a mortar. Some think it the valley of Jehoshaphat: others, as Henderson, believe it with more probability (Minor Prophets, pp. 331, 332) the Tyropæon, which was the locality of the bazaars, where the merchants carried on their business: comp. latter part of Zeph. i. 11.

MAL'ACHI (messenger of Jehovah). A prophet of whose history we know nothing. Some have doubted whether Malachi was really a proper name, or merely used to designate an unnamed person commissioned by God to deliver his message. And hence various strange conjectures have followed, as that he was an angel, or that he was Ezra. Such speculations do not deserve serious notice.

The time when this prophet lived may be approached with tolerable certainty. The temple-service was performed (Mal. i. 10, iii. 1-10). The people had married strange wives (ii. 10, 11); and this was what Nehemiah complained of (Neh. xiii. 23-29). There was a backwardness in bringing in the appointed tithes and offerings (Mal. iii. 8-10); and this Nehemiah, on his second visit to Jerusalem, remedied (Neh. xiii. 10-12). We may from all this fairly conclude that Malachi was contemporary with Nehemiah; and it has been generally believed that his prophecy must have been delivered while that eminent person was a second time governor of the Jews. Bleek, however, after some other critics, contrasting the mention of offering to the governor (Mal. i. 8) with Nehemiah's declaration that he had taken no such offerings (Neh. v. 14-19), would place Malachi somewhat earlier (Einleitung in das A. T., pp. 566, 567), while a Persian administered the government.

MAL'ACHI, THE BOOK OF (B.C. 436-420). This book is rightly placed last of the productions of the minor prophets. Both chronologically considered and also from its contents, it appropriately closes the Old Testament canon, and is the last solemn utterance of the prophetic Spirit under the earlier covenant. Thenceforward the voice of prophecy was heard no more till the forerunner of Messiah here predicted opened the second volume of revelation.

After the return from Babylon, when the Jews had re-peopled their city and re-built their temple, abuses crept in. The priests were negligent: the people were worldly and complaining. Accordingly Malachi was commissioned to reprove both priests and people, and to invite them to reformation by promises of blessing and warnings of awful judgment. His book is not marked out into distinct messages or sections. It has been supposed, therefore, that the prophet has collected and compressed in it the substance of his various utterances. Be this as it may, we can properly separate it into three parts, in the first of which, as Kell says (Einleitung, § 107), there is set forth the loving, fatherly, forbearing, and pitiful mind of God towards the covenant-people; the character of Jehovah in the second as the only God and Father; in the third as the just and final Judge of his people. More particularly in I. (i. 2—ii. 9) the prophet, contrasting the state of Judah with that of Edom, which then lay waste, shows how groundless were the murmurings of the Jews against the Lord, as though he loved them not. He next reproveth them, priests and people, for their neglect of God's service, and for the blemished offerings they brought, and then, reminding the priests of the grace of their original appointment, he threatens them with shame and punishment. In II. (ii. 10-16) he censures intermarriage with strangers, and divorce of lawful, i.e. Hebrew wives. In III. (ii. 17—iv. 6), against complaints as if God did not regard men's conduct, and would never arise to judgment, the prophet foretells the coming of Messiah and his forerunner, to purify the sons of Levi, and inflict a curse unless they repented. Reproofs and consolatory promises are interspersed; for the day of the Lord would separate between the righteous and the wicked. He concludes with enjoining the strict observance of the law, since no fresh prophet should arise till the forerunner already spoken of, who should go before Messiah in the spirit and power of Elijah, to introduce a new dispensation.

This book is prosaic in style, but by no means destitute of force and elegance. Reference is made to it in the New Testament (Matt. xi. 10, xvii. 11, 12; Mark i. 2, ix. 12, 13; Luke i. 17, vii. 27; Rom. ix. 13).

Besides the commentaries on this prophet included in those on the minor prophets generally, Dr. Moore's Prophecies of the Restoration, New York, 1856, may be mentioned.

MAL'ACHY (2 Esdr. i. 40). Malachi the prophet.

MAL'CHAM (their king).—1. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 9).—2. (Zeph. i. 5). The word is perhaps here used for an idol generally, worshipped by idolaters as 'their king.' Or it may refer to Moloch or Molech specially: see MOLOCH.

MALCHIAH (Jehovah's king).—1. A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 40).—2. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 25).—3. Another who had similarly transgressed (31); apparently the same with the Malchijah of Neh. iii. 11.—4, 5. Two who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (14, 31).—6. One who stood with Ezra at the solemn reading of the law (viii. 4); perhaps the same with Malchijah (xii. 42).—7. A priest (xi. 12); most probably the person mentioned in Jer. xxi. 1, where Melchiah, xxxviii. 1: see MALCHIAH, 1.—8. An officer into whose dungeon Jeremiah was cast (6).

MAL'CHIEL (God's king). A descendant of Asher (Gen. xlv. 17; Numb. xxvi. 45; 1 Chron. vii. 31).

MAL'CHIELITES. A family of Asher descended from Malchiel (Numb. xxvi. 45).

MALCHIJAH (Jehovah's king).—1. A priest (1 Chron. ix. 12). It is probably he that was the head of one of the courses (xxiv. 9), and his representative that sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 3), also called Malchiah (xi. 12): see MALCHIAH, 7.—2. One who took a foreign wife (Ezra x. 25).—3. A person who aided in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 11). He is also called Malchiah (Ezra x. 31): see MALCHIAH, 3.—4. One who took part in the solemn dedication of the wall (Neh. xii. 42).

MALCHIRAM (king of altitude). One of David's descendants (1 Chron. iii. 18).

MALCHI-SHUA (king of help). One of the sons of king Saul (1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39, x. 2). He is also called Melchi-shua (1 Sam. xiv. 49, xxxi. 2).

MAL'CHUS (reigning). The high priest's servant, whose ear Peter cut off (Matt. xxvi. 51; Mark xiv. 47; Luke xxii. 50; John xviii. 10).

MALE'EEL (Luke iii. 37). The Greek form of Mahalaleel, the ante-diluvian patriarch.

MALLOTHI (perhaps my fulness). A Levite, head of a course of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 26).

MALLOWS. The word so translated (Job xxx. 4) appears to be the sea-purslain, Atriplex halimus; it is likened to the rhamnus (a white bramble) but has no thorns; its leaf is similar to that of the olive, but wider; it grows near the sea-coast, and about hedges; and the tops of it are eaten when young. It is, however, collected for food only by the poor. Carey (The Book of Job) translates, 'cropping purslain on the shrub.' 'These mallows,' says Dr. Thomson, who takes a somewhat-different view, 'are a coarse kind of greens, which the poor boil as a relish for their dry bread. I have often seen the children of the poor cutting them up under the hedges and by the bushes in early spring; so that this rendering seems natural and appropriate to us who reside in the country; and therefore I accept the rendering without noticing the arguments of learned critics against it' (The Land and the Book, pp. 610, 611).

MAL'LUCH (reigning).—1. A Merarite Levite (1 Chron. vi. 4).—2, 3. Two who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 29, 32).—4. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. His representative in the days of Joiakim was Jonathan, and he or the head of his family or course sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 4, xii. 2, 14, where he is called Melicu).—5. One of the people who sealed the covenant (27): he may be identical with No. 2, or 3.

MAMAT'AS (1 Esdr. viii. 44).

MAM'MON (wealth). A Chaldee or Syriac word used by our Lord in uttering two several admonitions. In the one (Matt. vi. 24) he would intend the embodiment of a carnal worldly possession-loving spirit, which necessarily unfits a man for the high service of God, and for the noble inheritance of his kingdom. No one can serve, entirely belong to, two such opposite masters: he must take his choice, one or the other. In the second place (Luke xvi. 9, 11) mammon is more explicitly wealth, called 'mammon of unrighteousness' because it is the substance of a system, the money-getting system, which never could have existed had original righteousness not been lost. Wealth is not evil in itself, but it is the occasion of much evil. It may, however, be used for a good purpose, and with a happy result. It may procure friends. It may bring the blessing of those that were ready to perish upon him who rightly employs it. Whereas he who misuses it, wastes it, turns it to evil, can never expect to have the true riches confided to him. He has failed in the preparatory trial: he has lost the prize.

MAMNITANAT'MUS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Apparently corrupted from the two names Mattaniah, Mattanal (Ezra x. 37).

MAM'RE (fattening, fat). An Amoritic chieftain, who, with his brothers, Aner and Eshcol, was in alliance with Abraham (Gen. xiv. 13, 24). His name appears to have attached to some of his possessions. Thus we have the plain, or rather oak-grove, of Mamre (xiii. 18, xviii. 1); and simply Mamre, which comes to be a mere local appellation, and is said to be Hebron (xxiii. 17, 19, xxv. 9, xxxv. 27, xlix. 30, i. 13).

The oaks of Mamre are distinguished from Mamre itself: according to old tradition they were at some distance from Hebron, in the direction of Jerusalem, at a place where there are said to be some vestiges of antiquity. A fine evergreen oak still remains, called the oak of Abraham; but it has no pretension to be of the age of that patriarch.

MAM'UCHUS (1 Esdr. ix. 30). Malluch (Ezra x. 29).

MAN. There are at least four Hebrew words which are in our version translated 'man': ādām, implying reddish-brown, the man whom God first created: it signifies also man generically male and female, and collectively the race; ish, with its feminine ishah, including perhaps the idea of existence, and connected with ēnōsh, which, however, some suppose a different word; geber, meaning strong; and mēihām, used only in the plural, mortals.

When God originally formed man, it was after his own image and in his likeness (Gen. i. 26, 27, v. 1); bodily shape being not thereby intended but moral qualification. A very excellent creature was man, invested with extensive dominion, placed in a fitting habitation, and supplied with sources of enjoyment, which, had he kept the law of his being, would have ensured his happiness (i. 28, ii. 8). Doubtless there would have been intimate union between him and his Creator. He was not at once complete in knowledge, and he would have learned more and more of Him whom to know is life eternal, whose works and providence would have sufficiently illustrated his great character. And this advancement, and the obedience he rendered, would have been delightful. Whether this earth would have been always man's habitation, or whether he would have been removed, prepared by his residence and behaviour here, to a higher sphere, we cannot tell. His condition had a short and sad termination: he transgressed God's command; and suffering and death were the consequence of sin. 'God made man upright; but they have sought out many inventions' (Eccles. vii. 29). Into the theological questions of the fall of man, and the means of recovery mercifully provided by Jesus Christ, it is not intended to enter here: these topics have been somewhat touched in other articles: see ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION.

But there are matters which have called forth much discussion—the antiquity of man upon the earth, and the problem whether the nations have all descended from a single pair, of which something must be said. It can be but brief: the full discussion would demand a volume.

According to the systems of chronology generally adopted, even in their more lengthened form, the creation of man was not by the Mosaic account more than six or seven thousand years ago; see CHRONOLOGY. But this period, it is alleged, is not long enough to explain the phenomena of the present state of the world, more especially if we are to imagine mankind sprung from one pair. The differences of type between different races must have required immense duration to establish them as we see them established; and we find them on ancient monuments two or three thousand years old depicted pretty nearly as they now are. Again, the languages in use, which can be traced up to very few, possibly even to one, could not, it is said, have reached their present divergence, except in the course of almost-innumerable ages. Moreover, relics have been found, implements the work of men's hands, and human bones, in localities and embedded in strata where they must have lain from a date long prior to that to which our chronology reaches. Startling conclusions have hence been drawn; the more so because some investigators have left the bible testimony entirely out of their calculation: they have reasoned on the principles and from the data above referred to, and have not confronted these with the sacred record—a proceeding about as sensible as if in a judicial enquiry probabilities alone were weighed and obscure hints relied on, whilst living evidence with much to say for illustration were not even allowed to speak. There are others, indeed, who have acted in a more becoming manner; and some of these, interpreting scripture passages differently from the ordinarily-received mode of exposition, declare that the vast antiquity of man and the distinct varieties of human species are not in their view opposed to the great doctrines of revelation: see McCausland, Adam and the Adamite, 1864.

Now it must be observed, first of all, that differences of type are assumed to proceed at the same rate through the long chapter of the world's history. Laying out of sight for a moment the scripture narrative of the three branches into which mankind were divided after the flood, different regions being in God's providence assigned for their habitations, and also the presumable conclusion that he would speedily fit each for its respective condition of life, we may well ask whether all analogy is not against a uniform rate of change. Take man, take animals generally, in their ordinary life. How rapid and strange are the changes and developments of infancy and youth, how slow the alteration in maturer years. Subject an individual to the influence of a strange climate: its effects are considerable at first; but let him live through these, let his body be brought, so to speak, into unison with what surrounds him, let him become acclimatized—and how trifling in effect comes to be the previously-disturbing influence even through long years. The vegetable world will furnish other illustrations. Under the guiding hand of the husbandman changes are readily produced, which the unassisted powers of nature, to adopt common phraseology, would perhaps never accomplish. Are we to deny, then, that the finger of God is at all upon his works? It is as unphilosophical as it is dangerous to reason from progress under conditions which we can understand to progress under conditions of which we know literally nothing. And well might the Creator ask such a reasoner as he did the less presumptuous Job, when puzzled only about the anomalies of providence, 'Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare, if thou hast understanding . . . have the gates of death been opened unto thee? or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death?' (Job xxxviii. 4, 17). The influences of climate, soil, and temperature, taken in connection with the reasonably-greater effects they would produce, when the tribes of the earth were only taking those positions, which with comparatively-little change they have now occupied for many centuries, are not insufficient to account for the divergence we now witness. This is corroborated by the contrasts often now seen in the same family.

The argument from the variety of languages is not much more forcible. Languages are now in a state of flux, of rapid flux. And yet in the civilized parts of the world where there is a standard literature change seems almost precluded. If, for example, our own tongue has so altered that the English of four hundred years ago is now well-nigh unintelligible, with how much greater ease, with what accelerated swiftness, must an unwritten tongue, floating in the rude conversation of wild tribes, be modified, enlarged, contracted, give birth to fresh and strange dialects. Modern examples are not wanting to illustrate this. In Burmah, it is said, people that have migrated to a distance have lost their own language in two or three generations. And we are assured that a dictionary of a central American tongue, carefully compiled, became nearly useless in ten years. In the face of such facts, who can reason from the variations of language to the vast antiquity of man, more especially when the finger of God was, as the sacred testimony assures us, in this matter also put forth; he who made man's mouth for adequate cause disposing that mouth rapidly to modify its utterance, changing, very possibly, not merely the words and syllables, but the very type of language itself? See LANGUAGE, TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

The argument, taken from the discovery of implements or human remains in positions which seem to indicate an immense antiquity, is at first sight very formidable. But there are many considerations which show that it is necessary to receive conclusions deduced from such discoveries with extreme caution. For instance, something has been found deeply imbedded in alluvial soil, the accretion of which is proved to be now advancing at a certain rate. Considering the rate as uniform, it is calculated that so many thousand years must have elapsed since the deposits began to form over the substance in question. But who is to assure us that this rate is uniform? And cases have occurred in which the antiquity claimed has been clearly demonstrated to be erroneous. Thus, some pottery in the Nile deposits was at first imagined by the explorers to be 13,000 years old: it has since been proved of modern date. The bones, again, of extinct animals, have been found in connection with the traces of men: it is assumed that men must have existed at an earlier date to be contemporaneous with the animals. But why should not the conclusion rather be that the animals existed at a later era to be contemporaneous with men? And, after all, does the juxtaposition prove that the men and the animals were contemporaneous? Dr. Duns pertinently observes that, 'where traces of man are met with, many of the bones are broken. The use of bones in the chase, and in the manufacture of flint implements, is illustrated by the habits of some of the Esquimaux tribes even in our day. Sir Edward Belcher informs us that they use pieces of horn in the preparation of their flint weapons. Is it not in the highest degree probable that these bones of huge mammals would be eagerly sought for by the tribes who have left traces of their presence in gravel heaps and in caves? Instead, then, of holding that the animals lived at the same time as the men, it would be much more in keeping with the facts before us to hold that the men had found these bones, and had taken them to the places to which they resorted' (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. i. pp. 527, 528). Other remains which are supposed to testify to the great antiquity of man furnish but the same uncertain kinds of proof. When stone implements are found, it is concluded that they were used by races more ancient than those who had metallic implements. But we know that metallic and flint utensils have been used together. Certainly the children of Israel in the wilderness were acquainted with metals; and yet their knives for the solemn circumcision, when they had crossed the Jordan, were of flint (Josh. v. 2). The conclusions deduced, then, are conjectural; and it is observable, as a proof of uncertainty in the evidence relied on, that different philosophers compute differently from the same premises; nay, that the same philosophers draw at different times different conclusions from the same data. See for illustrations a thoughtful article on Sir C. Lyell's 'Antiquity of Man,' in the Quarterly Review, Oct. 1863, pp. 368-417; also Wood's Letter on Theory of Devel., and Antiq. of Man, 1865, pp. 18, 19.

In opposition to arguments such as those which have been noticed, we have, besides the scripture record, to place the fact that history ascends but a very few thousand years. Some nations, indeed, claim a vast antiquity; but, when their annals are sifted, the result is—and it is very remarkable that in different lands and among different nations there should be such agreement—that their chronicles and traditions begin at a period not greater than four or five thousand years ago! It is not likely that men existed for fifteen or twenty thousand years leaving no trace but a few bones or some weapons, and that then they made a sudden start, and filled the earth with monuments of their intelligence and histories of their deeds, to which we can with confidence ascend, while all beyond is but the blackness of darkness which may be felt. 'When we are asked,' says Mr. Birks, 'in the total absence of all historical evidence, in direct opposition to the teaching of the scriptures, and on the strength of conjectures on the date of two or three skulls, or some hundreds of rudely-shaped flint-heads in the valley of the Somme, to add ten or twenty thousand years to these ages of moral gloom and darkness, our heart and understanding, if not perverted and ossified by false science, recoil instinctively from the monstrous demand. . . . The licence is still bolder and more intolerable, when two or three skulls and skeletons, and some scores of rude implements, found in districts still uncivilized only two thousand years ago, become the pretext for interpolating the world's history with three or four hundred generations of utter barbarism and heathenish darkness, of which all trace and memory has long since passed away. Such speculators degrade the course of Providence into a moral chaos, deeper and more melancholy than the natural confusion out of which the present world arose' (Scientific Theories on the Origin of Man, p. 86).

It is just possible, by supposing omissions in scripture pedigrees, that the great antiquity of man upon the earth may be allowed without absolutely contradicting the sacred record. But there is another branch of enquiry which comes, if some modern theories be adopted, into more direct collision with what inspired men have told us. The plain teaching of the scripture is that our race, now so multitudinous, sprung from a single pair; that there is therefore a bond of brotherhood between all nations; that in consequence of the transgression of the original parents all have shared the same degradation, and can obtain recovery only through the mediation of that divine Person, who, taking flesh, allied himself to the whole human race, and became thereby a fit and adequate Mediator between God and man (Acts xvii. 26; Rom. v. 12-19). It is true that great ingenuity has been exercised in putting a different meaning upon the passages just referred to, and those of similar import, and in picking out expressions from the bible which are said to intimate that races besides the children of Adam exist upon the earth. Among those who have so argued are in past times Peyrere, a French Calvinist, in his Præ-Adamitæ, 1655, and of late years R. S. Poole, in the Genesis of the Earth and of Man, and McCausland, in his work already noticed. But such ingenious expositions are, to say the least, very dubious; and it will therefore be controverted by very few that scripture declares against plurality of races. Now it has been maintained that men vary so much in habit, constitution, intellectual power, colour, bodily conformation, that they cannot have all descended from the same parents. There are other theories, indeed, which have found some favour, and which might be placed in contrast with this, such as the theory of development, which supposes being to have advanced in the course of ages through gradually-ascending types, so that the most glorious specimen of humanity, endowed with vast physical power and rare qualities of mind, is but the far-descended child of some scarcely-sensitive and soulless thing—or that other hypothesis which finds in what is called the principle of natural selection an influence which tends to diversify species to such an extent, that creatures far apart in all that constitutes variety are imagined to proceed from the same source. These theories can be only noted here: discussion of their merits must be sought elsewhere (e.g. see Duns, ubi supr., pp. 539-568).

It may be well, however, cursorily to notice the grounds on which believers in scripture, like McCausland, rest their hypothesis. He receives strictly the bible chronology. But he dwells on the arguments from geology, archæology, history, language, and ethnology, as showing a great antiquity of men upon the earth. The creation of Adam then, which was at no far-distant era, he regards as the creation of the Caucasian stock, the highest type of man. And the history of this stock he supposes, to the exclusion of the rest, to be treated of in scripture. Rejecting, in short, the antiquity of the Adamic family, he maintains its diversity from other families. It is by no means intended here to treat the evidence which is adduced as mere phantasy. Doubtless much deserves serious consideration. The strongest part of it, perhaps, is that based on the phenomena of language. Dr. McCausland argues that the inartificial Turanian tongues must be much older than the more highly-finished Semitic dialects. He concludes therefore that the peoples who use these Turanian tongues have existed far longer than the Semitic race, and he confines the confusion at Babel within the Semitic and Japhetic circle, believing that those who have spoken other languages were not affected by it. Now his conclusion is diametrically opposed to that of Max Müller, whose high authority is in favour of the common origin of languages. But then Max Müller demands a longer period for the present diversity to grow than the usually-received chronology will allow. The observations previously made of the proved rapid changes in language may well tell upon this part of the question. And it has been already noted that varieties are known to flow from the influence of climate and other causes upon descendants from the same stock. Well and thoroughly should facts of this kind be weighed; and the different conclusions arrived at by competent enquirers must, it is right to say again, teach us the greatest caution against hastily embracing any plausible hypothesis.

But there are, certainly, very plain and weighty reasons for the descent of all men from the same stock, which have been thus summed up by Dr. Dana in his valuable Manual of Geology, Philad. 1863:—‘The oneness of species is sustained by the following considerations: 1. The fact of an essential identity among men of all races in physical and mental characteristics. 2. The capability of an intermixture of races with continued fertile progeny. The inferior race, in case of mixture with a superior, may dwindle, the people becoming from their position discouraged, debased, and in their poverty and superstition an easy prey to disease; and it may possibly die out, as the weaker weeds disappear among the strong-growing grass: such decay is hence no evidence that there is a natural limit to the fertility of “mixed breeds,” as some have urged. 3. Among mammals the higher genera have few species, and the highest group next to man, that of the orang-outang, contains only eight; and these eight belong to two genera—five of them to the genus Pithecus of the East Indies, and three to the higher genus Troglodytes of Africa. Analogy requires that man should here have pre-eminence. If more than one species be admitted, there is scarcely a limit to the number that may be made’ (part iii. 5, p. 584).

The capability of man to spread himself and live in all the regions of the earth is very noteworthy. Some have been disposed to doubt the fact, and to imagine that men of one clime could not permanently establish themselves in another. There is a complete answer to this. The Jewish race, a standing illustration of the truth of prophecy, are a standing proof also of the capability mentioned. Demonstrably of old seated in one extremity of Asia they are now spread over every continent, accustomed to every climate, suited to every varying mode of life.

The reader must be reminded that philosophical theories are frequently changing. Let him never be allured by any of them, however specious, to doubt the bible revelation. That stands upon proof so large and satisfactory that we may well be sure that, even if discoveries we cannot at present comprehend are made, they will ultimately be found not discordant with God’s voice in his word. The humble student of that word will wait for fuller light in patience and in faith.

It was a crowning work when man proceeded from the creative hand. ‘Man,’ says Dr. Dana (pp. 573, 574), ‘was the first being that was not finished on reaching adult growth, but was provided with powers for indefinite expansion, a will for a life of work, and boundless aspirations to lead to endless improvement. He was the first being capable of an intelligent survey of nature and comprehension of her laws; the first capable of augmenting his strength by bending nature to his service, rendering thereby a weak body stronger than all possible animal force; the first capable of deriving happiness from beauty, truth, and goodness, of apprehending eternal right, of looking from the finite towards the infinite, and communing with God his Maker. Made in the image of God, surely he is immeasurably beyond the brute. . . . The supremacy of the animal in nature, which had continued until now, here yields, therefore to the supremacy of the spiritual . . . And the earth subserves her chief purpose in nurturing this new creation for a still more exalted stage, that of spiritual existence.'

It is revelation which discloses the last noble destiny of men. Redeemed from the degradation of the fall by the condescension of the Son of God, they shall partake his glory. The mind cannot now, indeed, conceive its splendour, nor can human tongue adventure to describe it. Even inspiration falters here. 'It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when HE shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is' (1 John iii. 2). How fatal the ruin of those who miss by unbelief and sin this excellent consummation.

It may be well here to notice a few of the scripture phrases into which the word 'man' enters. A 'man of God' is some holy servant of God (Deut. xxxiii. 1; Judges xiii. 6, 8; 1 Sam. ii. 27; 1 Kings xiii. 1, 4-8, 11, 12, 14, 21, 26, 29, 31; 2 Chron. xviii. 14; 1 Tim. vi. 11). The 'old man' is the un-renewed heart; the 'new man' the holy nature imparted by the working of the divine Spirit (Rom. vi. 6; Eph. ii. 15, iv. 22, 24; Col. iii. 9, 10). In the 'man of sin' (2 Thess. ii. 3) sin is personified. For 'son of man' see the article under that title.

MAN'AEN (consoler). A Christian teacher in the church at Antioch, foster-brother of Herod Antipas the tetrarch (Acts xiii. 1).

MANA'HATH (rest). A descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23; 1 Chron. i. 40).

MANA'HATH (id.). A place mentioned only in 1 Chron. viii. 6, probably in Benjamin.

MANA'HETHITES (1 Chron. ii. 52, 54). These may be the inhabitants of the place above mentioned; but there is an uncertainty about the meaning: see HATSII-HAM-MENUCHOTH.

MANASS'EAS (1 Esdr. ix. 31). Manasseh (Ezra x. 30).

MANASS'EH (who makes forget). 1. The elder son of Joseph born in Egypt of his wife Asnath before the predicted years of famine came (Gen. xli. 50, 51). Very little is recorded of the personal history of Manasseh. When Jacob's death drew near, Joseph carried his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, then young men upwards of twenty, to receive the blessing of their grandsire. Jacob's eye-sight was well-nigh gone; but he guided his hands in such a way as to lay the right on Ephraim's, the left upon Manasseh's head, and, in spite of Joseph's remonstrance, while declaring that the seed of the two should multiply as the abundant fishes of the Nile (xlviii. 16, marg.), and that as his sons they should be the heads of two distinct tribes in Israel, he foretold that Ephraim should be greater than his elder brother Manasseh (xlviii.). The same prophecy is reiterated in the last words of Moses: 'They are the ten thousands of Ephraim; and they are the thousands of Manasseh' (Deut. xxxiii. 17).

It is not very clear how many sons were born to Manasseh. By a concubine he had Machir, the head of several families of the tribe, whose children 'were brought up on Joseph's knees' (Gen. i. 23; 1 Chron. vii.

14). In the enumeration in Numb. xxvi. 29-33: comp. Josh. xvii. 2, eight families are mentioned, besides one afterwards absorbed among the rest because it consisted only of females; but of the heads of these families some are evidently grandsons or great-grandsons of the patriarch. In the first census the tribe had multiplied to 32,200: its place in the encampment was to the west of the tabernacle, and it followed on march the standard of Ephraim, next to that tribe and before the kindred one of Benjamin (Numb. i. 34, 35, ii. 18-24). In the later census just previous to entering Canaan, the Manassites were 52,700, considerably exceeding the Ephraimites (xxvi. 34, 37). Kalisch (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 711) reasonably accounts for this by the supposition that the younger branches of the house of Joseph attached themselves sometimes to one and sometimes to another of the two great divisions of their father's posterity (Gen. xlviii. 6).

As the Israelites drew near the end of their wanderings, and when the districts west of the Jordan ruled over by Sihon and Og were being subdued, the tribes of Reuben and Gad, who possessed much cattle and saw that the land of Gilead was a place for cattle, desired that Moses would assign them their inheritance there, engaging to aid by a large auxiliary force the conquest of western Canaan (Numb. xxxii. 1-32). Part of the tribe of Manasseh were joined with them. They seem to have been bold warlike men, delighting in adventure, who attacked and conquered the difficult country to the north, with the singular region of Argob (33, 39-42; Deut. iii. 13-15; Josh. xvii. 1). This, then was the territory of trans-Jordanic Manasseh: it extended from Mahanaim northward, including half Gilead, and the kingdom of Bashan (xiii. 29-31), a country described by travellers as for the most part beautiful in its aspect, diversified by mountains, hills, and valleys, and fertile for the subsistence of those who were settled in it. Of the cities belonging to it Golan, Ashtaroth, and Edrei are particularly mentioned, of which the two former were made Levitical cities, Golan being also a city of refuge (xx. 8, xxi. 27; 1 Chron. vi. 71).

The other half of the tribe crossed the Jordan, and had their inheritance (ten parts) in close proximity to that of Ephraim. It stretched across from the Jordan to the Mediterranean, the southern frontier running from Asher, which some suppose not the territory of the tribe so called, but a town by Michmethath facing Shechem, to Entappuah, and so on by the river Kanah to the great sea. South of this line the country was Ephraim's, north it was Manasseh's (Josh. xvii. 2-10). The northern frontier is not so well defined. It appears to have been intermixed with Issachar and Asher, as if Manasseh had been pushed out beyond its proper limits; for the cities mentioned as belonging to Manasseh, Beth-shean, Ibleam, Dor, En-dor, and Megiddo are specially said to have been territorially situate in Issachar and Asher. Perhaps the solution of the difficulty is to be found in the complaint that the descendants of Joseph made to Joshua that they had not sufficient room, and his charge to them to extend themselves into the woodland and mountain-country (11-18: comp. 1 Chron. vii. 29). Of the cities of the half-tribe Taanach and Gath-rimmon (xxi. 25) or Aner and Bileam (1 Chron. vi. 70) are said to have been assigned to the Levites.

Several eminent men arose out of Manasseh; and there are many notable events recorded in which the tribe took part. Thus we have a reference to the 'governors' 'out of Machir' in Deborah's triumphal ode (Judges v. 14). Gideon was a native of western Manasseh; but on occasion of his victory the jealousy manifested itself which was conceived by Ephraim against the kindred tribe. It was allayed for the time by Gideon's prudence (vi.-viii.); but perhaps this contributed to the slaughter of his family after his death, and favoured the erection of the kingship in Shechem, an Ephraimitish city, in the person of Abimelech, whose mother was of Ephraim. Great stress, we find, was laid on Abimelech's being of kin to the men of Shechem (ix. 1-6). Jair and Jephthah were eastern Manassites; and, when the old grudge of Ephraim revived, the latter judge signally punished that haughty tribe (x. 3-5, xi., xii.). A considerable body of Manasseh, apparently discontented with Saul, joined David when he appeared in the ranks of the Philistine army shortly before the fatal field of Gilboa; and he was soon reinforced by more as he marched to Ziklag, an opportune aid against the roving bands who had assaulted and plundered Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 20, 21). Manasseh submitted to Ish-bosheth; but, when that ill-fated prince had perished, and Abner, the pillar of his kingdom, was no more, then, with all Israel, multitudes of both the eastern and western Manassites repaired to Hebron to make David king over the whole nation (31, 37). In the happier times of the Hebrew monarchy, the trans-Jordanic Manassites, who were valiant men, 'increased,' we are told, 'from Bashan unto Baal-hermon and Senir, and unto mount Hermon' (v. 23, 24: comp. 18-21). David had officers there as well as in the western territory (xxvi. 32, xxvii. 20, 21); and Solomon placed his commissaries in this eastern region (1 Kings iv. 13, 19). But they transgressed against the God of their fathers, and were carried away captive by the kings of Assyria (1 Chron. v. 25, 26). It is more pleasing to see some of the notices of the western Manassites. Many of them left idolatrous Israel, and joined Asa of Judah in his efforts at reformation (2 Chron. xv. 9): many of them also humbled themselves, and accepted Hezekiah's invitation to the passover (xxx. 1, 11, 18); they broke down the images also in their own territory (xxx. 1), and showed themselves, a remnant of them, obedient in the days of Josiah (xxxiv. 6, 9). Men of other tribes were joined with them; but in all the revivals we find the name of Manasseh. Still there was no thorough and entire repentance; and the bulk of this tribe, as well as the rest of Israel, were carried captive into Assyria (2 Kings xviii.

11, 12). After the captivity it would seem that some of them settled in Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix. 3).

2. The ancestor of that Jonathan the Levite, whom Micah consecrated as priest for his house of images, and who afterwards was priest to the northern Danites (Judges xviii. 30). The word Manasseh is peculiarly written in the original; and it is supposed, with much probability, that Moses was really meant.

3. One of the kings of Judah, son of Hezekiah, who succeeded his father at twelve years of age (being born after Hezekiah's recovery from his great sickness), and reigned fifty-five years, 696-641 B.C. It is evident that in the earlier years of his reign this prince must have been under the guidance of the nobles of Judah; and we may well suppose it an evil guidance. When therefore he took the reins of government into his own hands he reversed as far as possible his father's righteous policy: he built up again the high places, reared shrines to Baal, worshipped the host of heaven, and placed altars to them in the temple courts: he passed his son through the fire, and used enchantments, and, in short, committed every possible abomination, making his people worse than the very heathen. He also shed much innocent blood, and caused, if the Jewish tradition may be believed, the prophet Isaiah to be sawn asunder.

The record of this miserable reign in the book of Kings is very short: general statements are made, but no details are given; and it is one of the darkest records in the page of history (2 Kings xxi. 1-16). But in the corresponding narrative in Chronicles a bright feature is introduced. Manasseh's guilt is, as before, fully exposed; but it is added that, when he refused to listen to the voice of admonition, the Lord brought upon him the Assyrian captains, who carried him a prisoner to Babylon. This must have occurred in the reign of Esar-haddon, who held his court for some time at Babylon. The statement therefore that Manasseh was taken by the Assyrians to Babylon, though at first sight it seems to present a difficulty, yet turns out on examination in full accordance with the truth of history; and we have in it a corroboration of the accuracy and credibility of the sacred writer. At Babylon, in his affliction Manasseh humbled himself, and sought mercy from the Lord. His prayer was heard; and he was restored to his kingdom. He was now of a different mind. He redressed many of the evils of which he had been the author. But alas! evil is very tenacious. The people seem to have been indifferent to the exertions of their king; and, as he was succeeded by an ungodly son, and Josiah his grandson was but a child when he came to the throne, matters were till the twelfth year of Josiah's reign almost in the same condition as during Manasseh's wicked course. Manasseh, after his return from Babylon, added to the fortifications of Jerusalem and garrisoned the fenced cities of Judah (2 Chron. xxxiii. 1-19). Some have imagined that these warlike preparations were made with the view of an alliance with the Egyptian Pharaoh. This is but conjecture. The annals, however, of this reign being short, critics have specially indulged themselves in speculation concerning the events of it. But, where scripture is silent, and authentic secular history adds little, there is no good ground for conjecture. Manasseh died, and was buried in a private family sepulchre in 'the garden of Uzza' (2 Kings xxi. 17, 18; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 20). It is difficult to account for this: it is clear that it could not be, as some have imagined, because the king's evil courses were disapproved by his people: they were only too ready to follow them.

4, 5. Two persons who married foreign wives (Ezra x. 30, 33).

MANAS'SES.—1 (Matt. i. 10). Manasseh the king.—2 (Rev. vii. 6). The patriarch.

MANAS'SES.—1 (1 Esdr. ix. 33). Manasseh (Ezra x. 33).—2 (Judith viii. 2, 3). The husband of Judith.

MANAS'SES, THE PRAYER OF. This is a short apocryphal piece intended to express the penitent feelings which the king might have while justly suffering for his sins. That he did so humble himself, and pray, and that his prayer was preserved among the ancient records of the kingdom we know (2 Chron. xxxiii. 18, 19). But the composition now in existence is certainly not genuine. For it was written originally not in Hebrew but in Greek: it is not certainly mentioned by any writer prior to the so-called Apostolical Constitutions in the fourth century after Christ, and it never was accounted canonical by the church. Yet it embodies pious thoughts: it is found in the Codex Alexandrinus, and, though allowed to be spurious by the church of Rome, is in the Vulgate. It is, however, not known by whom the Latin translation was made; nor can the date of the original be determined with any exactness.

MANAS'SITES. The descendants of Manasseh (Deut. iv. 43; Judges xii. 4; 2 Kings x. 33).

MANDRAKE. A plant which was supposed to promote fecundity. Reuben had found mandrakes in a field, and brought them to his mother Leah. Rachel, seeing them, and anxious for children, requested them of her sister, and obtained them on a certain condition (Gen. xxx. 14-16). Various legendary stories are told of the mandrake, for which see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. arts. 'Abrousanam,' 'Asterenk'; Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 537-539. It is clear that the plant intended blossomed in spring, that the flowers had a strong scent, that the fruit ripened in May, the time of wheat-harvest in Padan-aram, that these mandrakes were not common, else Rachel would have had no reason for bargaining with Leah, and, further, that they were found in Palestine (Sol. Song vii. 13). Now the Atropa mandragora, called also Mandragora vernalis, appears to answer these conditions. 'The root,' says Kalisch, 'is white, mostly forked, but straight and thick, having some resemblance to the human form, about four feet long, unwholesome, and of repulsive smell: the leaves are of a lively green, oval, about one foot long, four to five inches broad, with an undulating border: the flowers are small, whitish-green (purple, according to Ginsburg, The Song of Songs, pp. 183, 184), bell-shaped, blossoming in spring, and exhaling a strong but fragrant odour: the fruit is yellow, of the size of a small egg, pleasant both to sight and smell, filled with seeds, and ripens in the month of May. . . . It is freely eaten by the natives as wholesome, genial, and exhilarating, is believed to strengthen affection, and employed for the preparation of love-philtres.' Mandrakes still grow near Jerusalem, and in various parts of Syria. Dr. Thomson saw them near Hebron, and on the lower ranges of Lebanon and Hermon (The Land and the Book, pp. 576, 577). The mandrake is nearly allied to the Atropa belladonna, deadly nightshade. There is an interesting account of it in Duns' Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. i. pp. 430-436.

MA'NEH (part, portion). See MONEY, WEIGHTS.

MANGER (Luke ii. 7, 12, 16). By this word is probably to be understood one of those recesses described in the article INN, which see.

MA'NI (1 Esdr. ix. 30). Bani (Ezra x. 29).

MAN'LIOUS (2 Macc. xi. 34). The name of a Roman ambassador, said to have written a letter to the Jews. This letter is with reason considered a fabrication.

MAN'NA (portion, or what?). The name given to the food supernaturally supplied to the Israelites during their abode in the wilderness. Many writers have endeavoured to account for the production of this substance, and have believed that they recognized it in the exudations of certain plants, still collected and known as articles of commerce. But, if we are to take the scripture narrative as recording real events, we must admit that the manna provided for the Israelites was something entirely different from natural products. Their surprise when they first saw it, the regularity and immense quantity of the supply, the preservation of some of it for the inspection of future generations, are facts which the theory of the ordinary exudations from trees or bushes fails to interpret. It is useless, therefore, to give a description of substances which certainly could not be the manna of Israel. Let the following extract from Dr. Robinson suffice. When he was at the convent on Sinai in 1839, the superior, he says, 'put into our hands a small quantity of the manna of the peninsula, famous at least as being the successor of the Israelitish manna, though not to be regarded as the same substance. . . . It is found in the form of shining drops on the twigs and branches. . . . of the "turfa," Tamarix gallica mannifera, . . . from which it exudes in consequence of the puncture of an insect, . . . the Coccus manniparus. . . . It has the appearance of gum, is of a sweetish taste, and melts when exposed to the sun or to a fire.' 'Chemical analysis. . . showed that the manna of the tamarisk of Sinai contains no mannin susceptible of crystallization, but is merely an inspissated sugar. The manna of the Hebrews was essentially different from this. 'And, even could it be shown to be the same, still a supply of it in sufficient abundance for the daily consumption of two millions of people would have been no less a miracle' (Bibl. Res., vol. i. pp 115, 116, 590).

God, indeed, in his miraculous working, seems often to intensify some natural power, so that nature is the ground as it were of miracle. Thus the food supplied by our Lord to the 4,000 and the 5,000 was not some strange aliment, but fish and bread just like those of which there was already a small provision. Still this by no means detracts from the supernatural character of what was done. And so, whether or no the manna given to the Hebrews resembled what is now called manna, it was not the result of ordinary laws: the finger of God was manifest in its production.

Manna is mentioned as first given when the Israelites were in the wilderness of Sin. It was found in the morning after the dew evaporated: it lay like the hoar-frost on the ground, the size of coriander-seed, and the colour of bdellium: it was to be gathered at once before the sun melted it. Each person was to collect for his household at the rate of an omer (about three quarts) a head; so that, according to the size of a family, more or less was taken. It was used as meal and made into cakes; the taste of it being like oil, or wafer-cakes made with honey. All was to be consumed the day it was gathered, else it corrupted; but the day before the sabbath a double quantity was to be brought in, and then it lasted without corrupting for two days. An omer of it was long preserved as a memorial in the sanctuary, testifying God's power and willingness to give food for the subsistence of his people in the most apparently destitute circumstances. The supply of manna lasted till after the Israelites at Gilgal had eaten of the old corn of Canaan (Exod. xvi.; Numb. xi. 4-9; Josh. v. 10-12: see also Deut. viii. 3; Neh. ix. 20; Psal. lxxviii. 24, 25; Heb. ix. 4).

Our Lord, referring to the manna, declares himself the true bread from heaven (John vi. 31-35, 48-51, 58). With regard to the 'hidden manna' (Rev. ii. 17), abp. Trench considers this as pointing to Christ after his ascension. He is hidden from his people's sight, but shall not remain hidden for ever, and even now he gives them prelibations of that feast they shall hereafter partake of (Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, pp. 124, 125).

MANO'AH (rest). A Danite, the father of the famous Samson (Judges xiii., xvi. 31). Little is told of him save in connection with Samson's birth. He most probably died before his son, whose 'brethren' and the 'house of his father' are said to have buried him.

MAN-SLAYER (Numb. xxxv. 6, 12; 1 Tim. i. 9). See CITIES OF REFUGE, MURDER.

MANTLE. See DRESS. That mentioned in Judges iv. 18 was probably a kind of thick coverlid, such as is ordinarily used now by the Arabs for a bed, one doubled to lie on, another thrown over the sleeper.

MANUSCRIPTS. It is proposed in the present article to give a brief notice of biblical manuscripts generally, with a more particular description of a few of the most valuable now in existence.

Before the invention of printing, copies of the scriptures, as of other books, were multiplied in writing: see WRITING; and volumes so written are called manuscripts, and these are either autographs, by the original penman, or apographs, copies made from those originals. All the manuscripts at present existing are apographs; the originals having perished. Many, however, of those we possess of the scriptures are of very great antiquity.

The manuscripts to be here described are 1. Hebrew and 2. Greek.

1. Hebrew manuscripts are synagogue rolls and private copies. The first are those used in the synagogue worship. They are written with great exactness on the skins of clean animals, specially prepared, and fastened together with strings also taken from clean animals. They are in the square Chaldee letters, without vowels or accents; and as they are of a considerable length they are rolled round cylinders, so as to afford facility in displaying any portion required. The writing is in columns, presenting, so to speak, separate pages to the eye of the reader as he unrolls the manuscript. Some of these synagogue rolls contain the Pentateuch. The haphthoroth or prophetic sections read in the service, and the megilloth or five books, viz., Solomon's Song, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther (read, the Song at the passover, Ruth at the feast of weeks, Lamentations on the 9th of Ab when the temple was both times burnt, Ecclesiastes at the feast of tabernacles, and Esther the 14th and 15th of Adar at the feast of Purim) are on separate rolls. The private manuscripts are in books, folio, quarto, octavo, or duodecimo, written on vellum, parchment, or paper. Some of these are in the square Chaldee, and some in the rabbinical character. They have vowels and accents.

Classifications have been made of Hebrew manuscripts. There are the Spanish, to which oriental manuscripts are nearly allied, the German, and the French and Italian intermediate between Spanish and German. The Spanish copies are said to follow the Masoretic order in the arrangement of the books; the letters are regular, square, and well-proportioned: in German copies the Talmudic arrangement is observed; and the characters are ruder and more inclined, with pointed corners. In French and Italian manuscripts the character is somewhat smaller, more round than pointed. The Jews distinguish between what they call the Tam, and the Welshe character: the first has sharp-pointed corners and perpendicular coronule (little ornaments called taggin) on certain consonants, and is said to be used in German and Polish manuscripts; the second, not so ancient, has rounder strokes in the letters; the coronule ending in a thick point: this mode of writing was in use in Spain and the east. The Spanish manuscripts are most highly valued by the Jews. The classification just described is somewhat uncertain: the characteristics that have been noted are but general, and a vast variety of exceptions and particular marks have been given by critics, for which their works must be consulted. It is, further, difficult to determine the age of Hebrew manuscripts. Sometimes, indeed, a date is inscribed; or external circumstances may afford some testimony. But, where internal marks alone present themselves, the utmost caution is required in judging of the antiquity and goodness of a manuscript. It may, however, be said that existing manuscripts are all, more or less fully, of a Masoretic cast; and consequently they exhibit substantially the same text. Even those obtained from the east are of this class. Thus the celebrated roll of the Pentateuch, procured by Dr. Buchanan from the black Jews in Malabar, was probably transcribed from a Spanish manuscript; and those brought to England from the Jewish settlement at K'ae-fung-foo in China appear to have the Masoretic text.

Kennicott, and De Rossi, and of late Pinner, are the critics who have laboured chiefly in collating Hebrew manuscripts. Two or three of the older ones which they examined shall be briefly described. The Codex Laudianus in the Bodleian library (No. 1 in Dr. Kennicott's list) is on vellum: it consists of two folio parts. The letters are moderately large, plain, simple, elegant, and unadorned: the points, it would seem from the colour of the ink, were added at a later date. Some of the letters, obliterated by the lapse of ages, have been written over a second time; and yet some of these are becoming a second time invisible. Dr. Kennicott assigns this to the tenth century, De Rossi to the eleventh. A very ancient codex in quarto was examined by De Rossi (numbered by him 634). It is but a fragment, containing Lev. xxi. 19 to Num. i. 50. The vellum on which it is written is decayed by age: the character is intermediate or Italic, approaching to that of the German manuscripts. De Rossi assigns it to the eighth century. In the collation made by Dr. Pinner at Odessa, of manuscripts which are now deposited in the imperial library at St. Petersburg, there is mention of a Pentateuch roll on leather (which he marks No. 1). It is complete. It has neither vowels, nor accents, nor Masorah; but the rules of the Masorah are complied with; and the words are separated. The form of the letters differs much from that now in use. It has a subscription stating that it was corrected in the year 580 A.D.; and Pinner believes that this statement is accurate. If so, it is the oldest Hebrew manuscript known to exist. It was brought from Derbend in Daghestan. Among the manuscripts examined by Dr. Pinner are some with vowels shaped differently from those to which we are accustomed. It has been thought that the system they present had its origin in Babylonia. It may be added that seventeen manuscripts are known to exist of the Samaritan Pentateuch; six of which are in the Bodleian, and one in the British Museum. This last, procured by archbishop Usher, is complete on 254 pages of vellum. It is in a good state of preservation, a leaf of fine paper having been placed between every two leaves of vellum. It was written 1362 A.D.

2. Greek manuscripts of scripture are either of the whole bible or of the New Testament. The form of the letters varies. Sometimes they are all capitals; and manuscripts so written are called uncial. These, generally speaking, are the oldest; while cursive writing, in which the letters run on, being often joined, with no capitals except as initials, belongs to a later age. This appears to have come into use in sacred documents in the tenth century. Greek manuscripts are in the square form; and, though doubtless rolls like the Hebrew existed in very early times, none of these have been preserved. The most ancient manuscripts are without accents, spirits or breathings, or any separation of words; though by the beginning of the fifth century; and probably earlier, a dot was used to divide sentences. The older manuscripts are generally imperfect: a few have originally contained the whole bible; others the New Testament; and others only particular books or portions of it. Sometimes the original writing has been almost or altogether obliterated, and fresh matter has been introduced: these manuscripts are called codices palimpsesti or rescripti, that is, re-written. And, when the text is accompanied by a version, the manuscripts are termed codices bilingues, or double-tongued. These are generally Greek and Latin; and in a very old manuscript the Latin translation is likely to be that in use before the time of Jerome.

The Codex Alexandrinus, or Alexandrian manuscript, is one of the oldest and most celebrated. It was presented by Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I., in 1628, and has been preserved since 1753 in the British Museum. It has its name from its having been brought (it is said) by Cyrillus from Alexandria. It is on thin vellum, and consists of four folio volumes, the first three containing the Old Testament and apocryphal books, with certain odes or hymns, while the fourth comprised the New Testament, the epistles of Clement to the Corinthians, and the psalms ascribed to Solomon. But these psalms are gone; and only a few lines remain of the 2nd epistle of Clement. The writing on each page is in two columns; and there are about fifty lines in a column. The Old Testament is defective in part of the Psalms. In the New Testament there are the following chasms, Matt. i. 1—xxv. 6; John vi. 50—viii. 52; 2 Cor. iv. 13—xii. 6. This manuscript was designated by Walton as Codex A for shortness: it was afterwards called A by critics; and other uncial manuscripts have consequently been noted as B, C, &c.; while small letters are used for cursive manuscripts. The Alexandrian MS. was probably written in Egypt: this is to a certain extent corroborated by an Arabic note upon it, which, though comparatively modern, is by no means recent, and which seems to attribute it to one Thecla a martyr. But this may mean no more than that the part of the New Testament with which the manuscript begins, is the lesson for Thecla's day. The date may reasonably be supposed the later part of the fifth century. The New Testament was published from this manuscript in fac-simile by Dr. Woide in 1786, folio, and in ordinary Greek characters by Mr. B. H. Cowper in 1860, 8vo. A fac-simile of the Old Testament was completed in 1828 by the Rev. H. H. Baber. In order to give the general reader a notion of the way in which this manuscript is written, the following very literal translation of John 1. 1-7 is subjoined:—

IN THE BEGINNING WAS THE WORD AND THE WORD WAS WITH GOD AND GOD WAS THE WORD
HE WAS IN THE BEGINNING WITH GOD
ALL WERE MADE BY HIM AND WITH OUT HIM WAS MADE NOT ONE THING THAT WAS MADE IN HIM LIFE WAS
AND THE LIFE WAS THE LIGHT OF MANKIND
AND THE LIGHT IN DARKNESS SHINETH AND THE DARKNESS DID NOT IT COMPRE-HEND THERE WAS A MAN SENT FROM GOD WHOSE NAME WAS JOHN THIS PERSONS NAME
AS A WITNESS THAT HE MIGHT TESTIFY CONCERNING THE LIGHT THAT ALL MIGHT BELIEVE THROUGH HIM

The Codex Vaticanus, or Vatican manuscript, is another most precious relic of antiquity. It also is written on vellum in uncial characters, in quarto, with three columns on each page, and is preserved in the Vatican library at Rome. It contains the Old and New Testaments, but is imperfect, wanting Gen. i. xlvi., and Psal. cv. cxxxvii., and Heb. ix. 15 to the end of that epistle, also the pastoral epistles, and the entire book of Revelation. This last book, however, has been added, as well as the latter part of the epistle to the Hebrews, in a recent cursive hand, which has also filled up the chasms in the Old Testament. The faded letters, too, have generally been retouched by a careful modern penman. There are reasons for believing that the Vatican manuscript was written in Egypt, most probably before the middle of the fourth century. It has been repeatedly but imperfectly collated by various critics; but no fac-simile of it has ever been produced. Cardinal Mai's edition, printed some years before, was published in 1857; the New Testament again in 1859; but his text is rather grounded on the Vatican than an accurate representation of the manuscript itself.

A third most precious uncial manuscript has been but lately brought to light. It was procured by Dr. Tischendorf in 1859, from the convent of mount Sinai, and has been purchased for the imperial library at St. Petersburg. It originally contained the Old and New Testaments. A fragment, now in the university library at Leipzig, was obtained by Tischendorf in 1844, and edited by him in 1846. This fragment—forty-three leaves—included part of Chronicles, and other historical books, also part of Jeremiah. The Codex Sinaiticus, it is so called, is of special value as containing the New Testament entire: it contains also the so-called epistle of Barnabas, and part of the Shepherd of Hermas; and considered as belonging to the fourth (if not the third) century. A noble edition of it has been published by Dr. Tischendorf at the expense of the emperor of Russia.

One more celebrated manuscript may be mentioned, the Codex Cantabrigiensis, or

Codex Bezae, presented to the university of Cambridge in 1581 by Theodore Beza. It is a Greek-Latin manuscript, containing the four Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles. It must also once have had at least the catholic epistles, there being now belonging to it a fragment of 3 John. There are several imperfections; and, besides, sixty-six leaves are torn or mutilated. The Greek portions entirely wanting are Matt. i. 1-20, vi. 20—ix. 2, xxvii. 2-12; John i. 16—iii. 26; Acts viii. 29—x. 14, xxi. 2-10, 16-18, xxii. 10-20, 29 to the end. And a later hand has added Matt. iii. 7-16; Mark xvi. 15-20; John xviii. 13—xx. 13. There are also in the Latin chasms and portions supplied. This manuscript was probably written in the sixth century; but it is not considered of great critical value; as the Greek text appears to have been altered, and readings perhaps introduced from some Latin version. A fac-simile edition of this manuscript was published in 1793, under the editorial care of the Rev. Dr. Kipling, and at the expense of the university, in two volumes folio.

Of course the account of manuscripts above given is of the briefest character; but it may afford the general reader some notion of the precious remains from which the printed text of the scripture is derived, and by means of which scholars are continually endeavouring to re-produce still more faithfully, by careful examination and correction, the holy books as they came forth from the hands of their respective authors. For fuller accounts of manuscripts, and the principles of textual criticism, reference must be made to other works. Such are Horne's Introduction, vols. ii., iv.; Davidson's Biblical Criticism; Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, 1861.

MA'OCH (breast-band? oppressor?) The father of Achish king of Gath (1 Sam. xxvii. 2), called also Maachah (1 Kings ii. 39).

MA'ON (habitation). A name found in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 45), described as the 'father,' i.e. settler of Beth-zur.

MA'ON (id.). A town in the mountains of Judah, south-east of Hebron (Josh. xv. 55; 1 Sam. xxv. 2): in its neighbourhood was the wilderness of Maon (xxiii. 24, 25). The ruins now called Ma'in are on the summit of a hill, about seven miles from Hebron.

MA'ONITES. An Arabian tribe mentioned (Judges x. 12) in conjunction with the Amalekites. They were probably the Mehunims whom Uzziah conquered (2 Chron. xxvi. 7), and perhaps they are meant in 1 Chron. iv. 41, where our version has 'habitations!' They might be the inhabitants of a place now called Ma'an in Arabia Petraea, to the south of the Dead sea, on the route from Damascus to Mecca.

MA'RA (sad). The name which Naomi considered more suitable to her than her own (signifying my pleasantness) after her bereavements and return in sorrow to Beth-lehem (Ruth i. 20). See NAOMI.

MA'RAH (bitterness). A station in the wilderness to which the Israelites came after three days' journey when they had passed the Red sea. There they found a bitter or brackish fountain of which they could not drink. But, when they murmured, Moses, at God's command, cast a tree into the waters; and they were supernaturally made sweet (Exod. xv. 22-26; Numb. xxxiii. 8, 9). Marah is supposed to be the same with the modern 'Ain Hawārah; where there is still a salt and bitter fountain. The basin of it lies in a kind of rocky mound, composed of the deposits of the water during the lapse of ages: it is six or eight feet in diameter, and the water two feet deep. There are stunted palm-trees and bushes of the shrub Ghūrūkūd about; but no tree now can cure the bitterness. It was not the virtue of the wood but the divine power that effected the change. Opinions, however, differ as to the identification of Marah; and perhaps travellers have been mistaken in looking out for a place where the waters continue still bitter. The supernatural healing of them might, it is likely, be permanent.

MAR'ALAH (trembling, perhaps earthquake). A place on the border of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 11).

MARAN'-ATHA (the Lord cometh). An Aramaic expression which St. Paul added to the censure on those that loved not the Lord Jesus Christ, to enforce the duty of being ready for his coming (1 Cor. xvi. 22).

MARBLE. Marble is a limestone rock, of a constitution so fine as readily to take a good polish. It was early known to the Hebrews. We find it several times mentioned (1 Chron. xxix. 2; Sol. Song v. 15); and the word used in these places signifies a white stone, and may be a generic term including fine and shining stones, as well as that which we understand by the term 'marble.' It would seem, as marble is not found in Palestine, that David imported it. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Marmor.' Marble is also mentioned in Esth. i. 6; Rev. xviii. 12. The variegated marbles of Shushan were doubtless procured in Persia itself. Remains of marble columns still exist at Jerusalem.

MARCHESH'VAN (possibly ebullition). See MONTHS.

MAR'CUR (Col. iv. 10; Phil. 24; 1 Pet. v. 13). See MARK.

MARDOCH'E'US.—1 (1 Esdr. v. 8). Mordecai (Ezra ii. 2).—2 (Rest. of Esth. x. 4, xi. 2, and elsewhere). Mordecai, the relative of Esther.

MARE'SHAH (place at the head, or, possibly, possession, inheritance). A name found among the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 42). Mareshah (perhaps identical with Mesha) of the family of Caleb appears to have been one of the settlers in Hebron.

MARE'SHAH (id.). A city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 44). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 8), and was the scene of the defeat of Zerah the Ethiopian by king Asa (xiv. 9, 10; see also 1 Chron. iv. 21; where probably this town, rather than a person, is meant; 2 Chron. xx. 37; Mic. i. 15). Josephus speaks of it as being possessed by the Idumeans, and says it was plundered by Judas Maccabeus. After several vicissitudes it was re-built and fortified by Gabinius, but was again destroyed by the Parthians in their irruption against Herod (Antiq., lib. xii. 8, § 6, lib. xiv. 4, § 4, 5, § 3, 13, § 9).

It is said to have been two miles from Eleutheropolis; and at that distance from Beit Jibrin Robinson believes he saw its ruins on a remarkable Tell (Bibl. Res., vol. ii. pp. 67, 68).

MAR'IMOTH (2 Esdr. i. 2). Meraioth (Ezra vii. 3).

MAR'ISA (2 Macc. xii. 35). Mareshah.

MARISHES (Ezek. xvii. 11). Marshes.

MARK. 'John whose surname was Mark' (Acts xii. 12) was the son of Mary, a woman of piety who lived at Jerusalem, where the disciples occasionally assembled at her house for prayer, and was sister to Barnabas (Col. iv. 10). He is also called Marcus.

St. Peter styles Mark his son (1 Pet. v. 13); which is generally taken to mean that he was converted by that apostle. Mark left Jerusalem for Antioch with Paul and Barnabas (Acts xii. 25), and afterwards accompanied them on their first missionary journey (xiii. 5). He did not, however, attend them long, but, for some reason not fully explained, left them at Perga and returned to Jerusalem (13). This subsequently gave occasion to a dispute between the two apostles; for, when they were planning a second journey, Barnabas wished for Mark as a companion, and Paul objected: they therefore separated; Mark sailing with his uncle to Cyprus (xv. 36-39). At a later period he was again with Paul during his first imprisonment at Rome (Col. iv. 10); and a communication had been made respecting him to the Colossian church, perhaps to say that he had fully recovered that apostle's confidence. And this was more plainly expressed when St. Paul again desired his presence at Rome (2 Tim. iv. 11). We find him also with Peter (1 Pet. v. 13), with whom he is said to have travelled, and to have been his amanuensis.

Nothing further of him is recorded in the scripture; but we may identify him with the author of the second Gospel, and may readily believe ecclesiastical history which tells us that he was the first bishop of the church in Alexandria. Whether he died a natural death or by martyrdom is uncertain.

MARK, THE GOSPEL OF. The universal consent of the ancient church ascribed the second Gospel to John Mark; so that no reasonable doubt can be entertained in regard to the authorship. It has also been said that he wrote under the superintendence of St. Peter. What, however, we are exactly to understand by this may admit of question, especially as the testimonies of ancient writers on the point are not altogether consistent. If Mark was, as there is good reason to believe, Peter's companion, and, as he has been called by Irenæus (Adv. Hæc., lib. iii. 1), his 'interpreter,' it is likely that he would derive from him the account of events at which that apostle was present. His selection, too, from the materials might be in some measure guided by his habits of intercourse with Peter. Hence possibly the minuteness of detail of various occurrences which Peter witnessed, and hence, too, it has been supposed, the way in which, without any gloss or palliation, Peter's faults are chronicled. We can hardly go farther: we can hardly suppose that Mark only wrote (as Baruch did from Jeremiah's mouth) what Peter dictated.

The arrangement of this Gospel appears to be: I. A short introduction noticing the mission of John Baptist (i. 1-8). II. The public ministry of Christ, his discourses and actions in Galilee, prefaced by an account of his baptism (9—ix. 50). III. Our Lord's last journeyings towards Jerusalem, with the narrative of his passion, death, resurrection, and ascension (x.—xvi. 20).

There can be no doubt that the original language of this Gospel was Greek; though there are several Latinisms, and some writers of the Romish church have vainly attempted to maintain the theory of a Latin original. Simplicity and conciseness, with almost-picturesque vividness of detail, are the characteristics of St. Mark's pen. This is evident if we compare the parallel accounts of the same events, e.g. Mark ix. 14-29 with Matt. xvii. 14-21; Luke ix. 37-42. But this Gospel is by no means, as some have imagined, a mere epitome of that by St. Matthew. The relation, indeed, which the three termed Synoptic Gospels bear to one another it is not easy exactly to decide. Some notice of this topic will be found in the article GOSPELS; and it is sufficient to say here that the materials of our Lord's history, known as they must have been to the apostles, and the companions of apostles, would naturally form the similar groundwork of every narrative, which each evangelist would use according to his main purpose. The intention of St. Mark was to write for Gentile readers. Thus there are frequently interpretations of Hebrew or Aramaic words, as in Mark v. 41, vii. 11, 34, and explanations of Jewish customs, as in 3, 4, which would have been unnecessary for Jews. With this purpose he selected and modelled, under divine guidance, and probably, as has been said, under Peter's eye, the work he has produced. As to the time and place of composition nothing can be affirmed with certainty. It is most frequently assigned to 63 or 64 A.D., and may perhaps have been written at Rome.

It must be added that there is some reason to doubt whether the closing part of chap. xvi. (vv. 9-20) is from the evangelist's pen. Some important manuscripts do not contain it; and the diction is thought to present an appreciable difference from that of St. Mark. Hence several eminent critics believe it to have been added subsequently. Bp. Ellicott, however, is of opinion that, though written at a later period, it was from St. Mark himself (Hist. Lect., pp. 26, 27, note). And Bleek, looking at the extreme improbability that the work would be left incomplete by ending at Mark xvi. 8, and the fact that the piece in question is in the most ancient versions, and is cited by early writers, as Irenæus and Hippolytus, expresses his belief that it is a genuine portion of the Gospel (Einleitung in das N.T., p. 292). But, even if we decide that these verses were added subsequently and by another hand, it by no means follows that they are without authority or uninspired, any more than the verses annexed to Deuteronomy, which record the death of Moses.

As to commentators upon this Gospel, the reader will naturally consult those who have written on the New Testament generally.

MARKET. According to the ordinary acceptance of the term, a market is a public place and fixed time for the meeting of buyers and sellers. To be legal it must have been founded by charter, or existed by immemorial usage. It is usually kept one, two, or more days, a week: when held occasionally a few times in a year it is a fair. Markets and market-places are mentioned in scripture, though not exactly in our technical sense of the word. In the Old Testament the 'markets' of Tyre are spoken of (Ezek. xxvii. 13, and elsewhere); but it may be questioned whether the word so rendered should not be translated 'merchandise' (marg.). See FAIRS. In the New Testament we have frequent mention of markets. For the purposes of trade dealers must naturally resort to some specified place; and this among the Jews seems to have been at the gates of cities. Here those who were in want of employment would be found. Hence the labourers of our Lord's parable are said to have stood 'idle in the market-place' (Matt. xx. 3). It was at points of public concourse that the Pharisees were most likely to receive the salutations which they loved (xxiii. 7; Mark xii. 38; Luke xi. 43, xx. 46). We are not, therefore, to understand the coming 'from the market' (Mark vii. 4) as necessarily from the place of commerce, but from any place, the streets, or elsewhere, which might be deemed in public. It was natural that the traders in the same commodities would be found in the same locality: hence the notion of a 'sheep-market' (John v. 2); though more probably 'the sheep-gate' is intended (Neh. iii. 1, 32, xii. 39), through which the sheep passed for the temple-service. The 'market-place' must sometimes be understood of the forum, where the Roman magistrates administered justice (Acts xvi. 19). The 'market,' or agora, where St. Paul disputed at Athens, was between the Areopagus and the Museum hill. In modern eastern cities the places of trade are the bazaars, or streets of shops, generally covered walks.

MA' MOTH (1 Esdr. viii. 62), Meremoth (Ezra viii. 33).

MA' ROTH (bitterness, bitter fountains). A place mentioned in the west of Judah. It was probably in the western part of Judah.

MARRIAGE. 'An honourable estate instituted of God in the time of man's innocency. . . . It was ordained for the procreation of children, to be brought up in the fear and nurture of the Lord, and to the praise of his holy name. . . . It was ordained for a remedy against sin, and to avoid fornication; that such persons as have not the gift of continency might marry, and keep themselves undefiled members of Christ's body. . . . It was ordained for the mutual society, help, and comfort, that the one ought to have of the other, both in prosperity and adversity' (Marriage Service).

Unquestionably it was God's original purpose that one man should have one wife (Gen. ii. 24). This, if it were doubtful before, our Lord sufficiently explains (Matt. xix. 4, 5, 8; Mark x. 6-8); and it is illustrated by the nearly-equal proportion of the sexes in the population of countries in which enumeration has been made. In the early history of the world we find comparatively few cases of polygamy. That of Lamech in the line of Cain is mentioned before the flood (Gen. iv. 19); and possibly it may have been one feature of the disorganization occasioned by the intercourse of 'the sons of God' with 'the daughters of men' (vi. 2, 4). Noah and his three sons who were with him in the ark had each but one wife (vii. 13; 1 Pet. iii. 20; 2 Pet. ii. 5). But afterwards we find a plurality of wives; at first it would seem one or more concubines being taken in addition to the wife (Gen. xvi. 3, xxii. 24); see CONCUBINE; and by degrees wives were multiplied (xxix. 23, 28, xxxvi. 2, 3; Judges viii. 30; 1 Sam. i. 2; 2 Sam. iii. 2-5, v. 13), till polygamy reached, so far as scripture history informs us, its worst development in Solomon, who was imitated, though with somewhat-greater moderation, by his descendants, other princes of the house of David (1 Kings xi. 3; 2 Chron. xi. 21, xiii. 21). It was the fall of man which directly led to this great evil. At first woman was the help-meet and equal of man, bone of his bones, flesh of his flesh (Gen. ii. 23), subordinate indeed (1 Cor. xi. 7-9; 1 Tim. ii. 12, 13), but not in subjection. The sentence, however, passed upon Eve intimated what would be the lot of her daughters in a fallen world (Gen. iii. 16); and certainly in the east, and in heathen and Mohammedan countries generally, we see how this prediction has been fulfilled, females being regarded as slaves. Such a notion leads naturally to the possession of as many so-called wives as the inclination or means of a man may incite and enable him to procure. The woman is thus not the companion and the counsellor of the man, but a mere chattel to be dealt with according to his pleasure; and domestic comfort is under such circumstances unknown. The gospel has restored woman to her proper place: it has defined her due relation to the man, and it has admirably drawn out the respective obligations of the sexes, showing how marriage signifies a nobler union (Eph. v. 22-33); so that, had Christianity no other claims upon us, for this alone it must be regarded as a blessing to the world.

We find the contracting and the dissolution of marriage regulated by certain laws. When man was first created, while population was scanty, there must have been intermarriage with the very nearest relatives. And this was in later times sanctioned, in order to preserve the families of God's servants free from idolatrous mixture (Gen. xxiv. 3-6, xxvi. 34, 35). There was not, so far as we read, any distinct regulations on this matter till the giving of the law to the Israelites. The old principle was of course embodied in the statutes then delivered, that God's chosen people should not contract marriages with goddess nations (Exod. xxxiv. 15, 16; Deut. vii. 2-4); and, besides, certain degrees of affinity and consanguinity (put upon the same footing) were named, within which it was not lawful to marry (Lev. xviii. 6-18, xx. 11, 12, 14-21). It is not necessary to dwell on these prohibitions: there is but one of them on which men are now disagreed among us; it being questioned whether the marriage with two sisters is altogether forbidden, or whether (polygamy being allowed) marriage with the second sister was unlawful only while the first was yet alive. Certainly the plain construction of the Hebrew text favours the latter alternative; and so the Jews interpret it. The Christian church, however, which has based its list of prohibited degrees on the Mosaic law, has generally declared against the marrying under any circumstances of two sisters by one man. There were various other Mosaic regulations, such as those which secured the rights of a slave married to her master (Exod. xxi. 7-11), of a captive (Deut. xxi. 10-14), of the offspring of a wife less loved than another (15-17), &c. Heir esses were to marry within their own tribe (Numb. xxxvi. 8, 9). Priests were not to take wives divorced or of bad character; and the high priest must marry only 'a virgin of his own people' (Lev. xxi. 7, 14). A warning, too, was given, too little (as we have seen) regarded, that, when a king should reign in Israel, he was not to multiply his wives, lest by them his heart should be turned away from God (Deut. xxvii. 17).

The tendency of the Mosaic legislation was, while it did not forbid, to check polygamy, to encourage humane and considerate treatment of women, and to promote purity of life. And, though the spirit of the law was not always acted up to, and men availed themselves of its literal permissions, yet doubtless there were in Palestine many happy and godly households, in which a single wife, knitted in love to her husband, held her due place, while a dutiful progeny cheered their parents' hearts. We have a glimpse of such a home at Shunem, where Elisha was welcomed (2 Kings iv. 8-37): we have it described by the Psalmist (Psal. cxxviii.); and by none more vividly than by Solomon, who so little exemplified it in his own case (Prov. v. 15-19, xxxi. 10-31). Some have imagined that inter-marriage with foreigners was more objected to in later than in earlier times of the Hebrew commonwealth. But the law, as we have seen, was always the same, prohibiting marriage with nations like the Canaanites altogether, and restricting it with other peoples, such as the Moabites and Egyptians, more or less, according to the longer or shorter time in which their children could enter into the congregation of the Lord (Deut. xxiii. 3, 7, 8). Few Israelitish women would match with such; but there was comparatively no objection to an Israelite marrying a woman of those tribes, who would very possibly be at once a proselyte. And the early instances we have of both these are few, and seem to be exceptional, as the union of Ruth with Mahlon first and with Boaz afterwards (Ruth iv. 9-12), and of the man of Tyre with the Hebrew woman from whom sprang Hiram (1 Kings vii. 13, 14). Whereas after the captivity the marriages with ungodly nations were so numerous as to have debased the whole Jewish stock, and deprived their very language. Hence the stringent measures adopted by Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra ix., x.; Neh. xiii. 23-29).

Ordinarily, by one of the laws already referred to, a man was forbidden to marry his brother's wife. But there was a remarkable exception. If any one died childless, his brother was to take his wife; and the seed thence born was to be reckoned as belonging to the dead man. This, called the levirate law (the Latin word levir meaning a brother-in-law), was in force before the time of Moses (Gen. xxxviii. 8, 11); it was probably restricted in the Mosaic code to the case of two brothers dwelling together. If the obligation was refused, a certain disgrace seemed to attach to the brother (Deut. xxv. 5-10). A more distant relative might then redeem the inheritance and marry the widow. Thus Boaz and the kinsman nearer to Elimelech and Mahlon were neither of them the dead man's brother; and, though Boaz complied with the custom in its more extended operation, no stigma would have attached to him had he declined it. Neither does it appear that the son born of his marriage was reckoned to Mahlon, but in his own line (Ruth iv.). The levirate law has been found to prevail among various eastern nations, modified, however, occasionally. It was on a somewhat-similar principle that the harem of a deceased monarch was held to fall to his successor (2 Sam. iii. 7, xii. 8; 1 Kings ii. 22).

Such is a brief view of the contracting of marriage among the Hebrews; for its dissolution see DIVORCE.

In regard to the customs and ceremonies of marriage, it would appear that parents generally selected wives for their children, not, however, necessarily without their consent; and sometimes they made proposals at their sons' suggestion (Gen. xxiv., xxviii. 1, 2, xxxiv. 4, xxxviii. 6; Judges xiv. 1, 2). When the proposal was made, the woman's family deliberated upon it, and it might be that her consent was asked; but it was of course expected that she would acquiesce in the determination of the seniors (Gen. xxiv. 50-58, xxxiv. 6-18). If the advantages of rank or position were on the woman's side, the first motion might come from her parents (Exod. ii. 21; 1 Sam. xviii. 17-21). Sometimes, too, we find a king providing a wife for a favourite or minister (Gen. xli. 45). When a marriage was settled, presents were made in order to the espousals. Thus Abraham's servant gave 'jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment' to Rebekah, and also 'precious things' to her mother and her brother (xxiv. 53). And so Shechem offered, if he might but have Dinah for his wife, any dowry that should be demanded for her, and any gift to her relatives (xxxiv. 12). This custom is alluded to in Exod. xxii. 16, 17; Deut. xxii. 29; the female who was married under the circumstances there mentioned being still entitled to dowry. In certain cases when the intended husband was unable to give the customary presents, service of some kind was substituted (Gen. xxix. 18-20, 27; 1 Sam. xviii. 25-27). But occasionally a father endowed his daughter (Josh. xv. 16-19; Judges i. 12-15; 1 Kings ix. 16). The espousal or betrothing was a formal agreement made with oaths by duly-empowered parties on each side (Ezek. xvi. 8), the bridegroom, however, not being necessarily present, but represented by his friend. A woman after betrothing was considered actually a wife; so that her incontinence was punished as adultery (Deut. xxii. 23, 24); though it would seem, in later times, the full penalty of the law was not always exacted; for Joseph, who had been led to suspect Mary, intended merely to divorce her in a quiet way (Matt. i. 18, 19). The woman still continued in her father's house (Judges xiv. 8) before she was taken to her husband. This, so far as we read, was for no specified length of time; though in later days it is said to have been a year for virgins, and a month for widows. During the interval the organ of communication was the bridegroom's friend (John iii. 29).

The actual marriage, though probably accompanied with blessings pronounced (Ruth iv. 11, 12), and some ratification of the betrothal oaths, consisted mainly in the taking of the wife to her husband's house, with the accompanying feast. Both were sumptuously arrayed. The bridegroom placed a kind of tiara on his head (Isai. lxi. 10), on which was a nuptial wreath or crown (Sol. Song iii. 11), and used delicate perfumes (6). The bride bathed and anointed herself (Ruth iii. 3; Ezek. xvi. 9, xxiii. 40), and was attired with a veil (Gen. xxiv. 65), the symbol of her subordination, probably a large light robe enveloping the person; also with some article of dress which was never forgotten (Jer. ii. 32), most likely a girde. She also had a nuptial chaplet: her robes were white and fine (Rev. xix. 8); brocaded and curiously wrought (Psal. xlv. 13, 14); and she was decked with gems and jewelry (Isai. xlix. 18, lxi. 10). And thus with her maiden companions she expected the bridegroom (Matt. xxv. 1). He on his part had 'companions,' or 'children of the bride-chamber' (Judges xiv. 10, 11; Matt. ix. 15). And at a fixed hour, often in the evening, they set out in procession to fetch the bride, either to the bridegroom's house, or some place where he had prepared the feast. Music, lights, and every demonstration of joy accompanied the train (Psal. xlv. 15; Jer. vii. 34, xvi. 9; Matt. xxv. 1, 3, 4, 7): friends joined them; and they sat down with gladness to the banquet, at which dresses of ceremony were sometimes presented to the guests (Gen. xxix. 22; Judges xiv. 10; Matt. xxii. 2-11; John ii. 2). The festival lasted seven days, occasionally longer, and was enlivened by various amusements (Judges xiv. 12-18). Now the bridegroom had free access to his wife; and the joy of his friend was 'fulfilled' (John iii. 29). And then there was the conducting of the newly-married pair to the chamber; which Samson, disgusted at the betrayal of his riddle, had at first declined (Judges xv. 1): in this chamber a canopy, in our version 'closet,' was set up (Joel ii. 16); and all the while the bride was veiled; so that Jacob did not discover the substitution of Leah for Rachel till the morning (Gen. xxix. 25).

It was the duty of a husband to cheer up his wife he had taken; for the first year, therefore, after marriage, or, if after betrothal he had not received her into his house, he was excused from military service (Deut. xx. 7, xxiv. 5). The punishment of adultery was death; and there were means of ascertaining incontinence before or after marriage; but a husband bringing a false charge against his wife in the first case was amerced and forbidden ever to divorce her (Numb. v. 12-31; Deut. xxii. 13-21). See

WIFE.

In the New Testament we find marriage placed upon the highest grounds. Our Lord corrects some of the mistaken notions which were prevalent (Matt. xxii. 23-30); and the apostles have delivered precepts on the reciprocal duties of husbands and wives (Eph. v. 22-33; Col. iii. 18, 19; 1 Pet. iii. 1-7). St. Paul, while commending matrimony, advises for prudential reasons to abstain from it in time of persecution (1 Cor. vii.). But there is nothing in the Christian scriptures to indicate that it is an unholy or polluted state for any class of persons. Rather it is pronounced 'honourable in all' (Heb. xiii. 4); and the prohibition of it is described as one of the dark signs of the last perilous times (1 Tim. iv. 3). The regulation that a bishop and a deacon must be the husband of one wife (iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6), has been variously interpreted, as meaning not a polygamist, not married after divorce, not contracting under any circumstance a second marriage. It is needless to attempt here to decide the question; but it may in passing be said that the corresponding rule in regard to widows who were to be taken into the ecclesiastical society (1 Tim. v. 9) seems to point to the last-named interpretation. For an account of the marriage rites observed in the ancient Christian church, the reader must be referred to Bingham (Orig. Eccles., book xxii.).

The Jewish writers multiplied and refined upon the scriptural precepts and customs in regard to marriage. No particular notice can be taken here of the regulations to be found in the Talmud. But a brief description may properly be given of the marriages of modern Jews.

Betrothment is formally made in presence of the friends of both parties. A contract is then read, by which a certain sum is to be forfeited should either of the betrothed fail to complete the marriage. A cup is next broken as a symbol of the covenant entered into; and there is usually a feast. This betrothment may be six or twelve months, more or less, prior to the actual wedding. For the marriage notice must be given to the proper functionaries; and on the Friday evening before the ceremony the chazan, or reader, chants a suitable composition; while the next day, the sabbath, the intending bridegroom is called up to the reading-desk, where a portion of the law is read to him. On the wedding-day the parties remain at home in the morning; those who are most religious fasting, and reading a part of the service for the day of atonement. In the afternoon the bridegroom, with two male friends, and the bride, veiled, with two female friends—these being the parents or other very near relatives—meet in the synagogue, where ten adult persons must be present. The respective friends then lead the bride and bridegroom under a canopy of silk or velvet, two yards square, which is supported by four poles. The rabbi next takes a glass of wine in his hand and says, 'Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, King of the universe, the Creator of the fruit of the vine. Blessed art thou, O Lord, our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and hast forbidden to us fornication, and hast prohibited to us the betrothed, but hast allowed to us those who are married to us by means of the canopy and the wedding ring. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the sanctifier of thy people Israel, by the means of the canopy and wedding.' The bride and bridegroom taste the wine; then the latter places the ring on the bride's finger, and repeats after the rabbi in Hebrew: 'Behold, thou art betrothed unto me with this ring, according to the rites of Moses and Israel.' The rabbi afterwards reads the marriage-contract, which is in Chaldee, aloud. The chazan then takes another glass of wine, and pronounces a longer benediction. When this is ended, the bride and bridegroom taste the wine; and an empty glass is laid on the floor, which the bridegroom breaks by stamping on it. The ceremony is concluded by all present crying mazal tov, 'good luck' (Mills' British Jews, part i. chap. i. pp. 24-28).

The rite of marriage is beautifully applied in scripture to indicate the blessed union betwixt God and his people; and illustrations are hence furnished of the wonderful forbearance he exercises towards them (Isai. liv. 5; Jer. iii. 1, 14; Hos. ii. 19, 20). In the New Testament we have the same idea, magnifying the love of the Redeemer to his saints (Eph. v. 25-27; Rev. xix. 7-9). And the highest strain is reached when, man and wife being as it is said one flesh, the Lord and his chosen are 'one spirit.' But the union here is not the whole. The glory of that future blessedness, when Christ receives his ransomed and purified church into his eternal kingdom, is portrayed by the image of a bridal feast. Then there is joy unutterable; and the bond of that conjunction shall not be broken (xxi. 2).

MAR'SENA (worthy). One of the seven princes in the Persian court (Esth. i. 14).

MARS-HILL (Acts xvii. 19, marg., 22). See AREOPAGUS.

MART (Isai. xxiii. 3). See MARKET.

MARTHA (bitterness? lady?). One of the blessed family at Bethany whom Jesus loved, and with whom he deigned to hold familiar intercourse. Martha has been supposed the elder sister, as the house is called hers, and she undertook the special charge of entertaining the Lord (Luke x. 38-42). Some have imagined that she was the wife or widow of Simon the leper; which would account for the place where Mary anointed Christ being termed his house (Matt. xxvi. 6, 7; Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 1-3). Martha was of more stirring mind and active habits than her sister Mary: she was cumbered about much serving, when Mary, in her deep still love, sat humbly listening at Jesus' feet; but her faith was strong, and she made a noble confession of it when she met the Saviour on his way to raise her brother Lazarus; though even her expectation reached not to the mighty work he was about to do (xi. 1-6). Nothing certain is known of her later history.

MARTYR. This is a Greek word occurring frequently in the New Testament, and generally rendered 'witness.' Thus it is found signifying a witness in a judicial sense (Matt. xviii. 16, xxvi. 65). It hence denotes generally one who witnesses, and who therefore does or can testify to the truth of what he knows or has seen (Rom. i. 9; 1 Thess. ii. 10; Heb. xii. 1), and is specially used of those who witnessed what Jesus did (Luke xxiv. 48). In this sense, as knowing the truth of the gospel, and teaching or confirming it, Jesus Christ himself is called 'the faithful witness' (Rev. i. 5). But such witnesses in the face of opposition might have to seal their testimony with their blood, that is, to be martyrs in our sense of the word (Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13, xvii. 6).

MARY (rebellion). A name which appears to be identical with Miriam in the Old Testament. It was borne by many distinguished persons.

1. Mary the mother of Jesus (Matt. i. 16). Of the Virgin's personal history we know little. By some it is supposed that she was the daughter of Heli, descended from David according to the genealogy given by St. Luke (iii. 23-31): see, however, GENEALOGY. A notion was entertained by some of the fathers that Mary, cousin to Elisabeth the wife of the priest Zacharias, was of the tribe of Levi (August., De Consens. Evang., lib. ii. 4, tom. iii. pars ii. col. 23, edit. Bened.): it is more probable that she was near of kin to Joseph, to whom, when no doubt young, she was espoused. Her residence was at Nazareth; and before the marriage was completed she was visited by the angel Gabriel, who announced that she should be the mother of that exalted Being, the Son of the Highest, whose kingdom should be set up in the world to have no end. This—to be the parent of Messiah—was the honour for which every Hebrew female longed. Joy, then, there must have been in Mary's breast; but yet the news came in a shape incomprehensible. She, like her country-people, did not imagine that Messiah would be more than a man. The angelic messenger inspired her with awe; and she could not tell how, ere her marriage, she was to become a mother. It was not the hesitation of unbelief, but rather of devout amazement; and, when she was reminded of the infinite power of God, she meekly accepted the message. Her hasty journey to the hill-country of Judah followed; and, on the salutation of the cousins, Mary poured forth that rich strain which has ever since been one of the joyful chants in which the church celebrates the deeds of her Lord; Mary also, be it remarked, rejoicing in him as her Saviour (Luke i. 26-56). We must suppose that it was after her return to Nazareth that her pregnancy was known to Joseph, a matter of sad cogitation to him, till he too was warned from heaven that God was now fulfilling his ancient promise (Matt. i. 18-25).

Messiah was to be born at Beth-lehem (Mic. v. 2). And now mark the wonderful providence of God. By a series of events—the decree of Augustus, the enrolment throughout Palestine of persons according to their lineage, the journey taken at a critical time—the prophecy was accomplished; and at Beth-lehem, in a humble stable, Mary gave birth to the Redeemer of the world. And there was joy in heaven, though earth was not ready to welcome her

King (Luke ii. 1-20). Mary was of thoughtful mind. She did not at once grasp all the glorious things which the birth implied; but, as events followed, such as the presentation in the temple, when she was warned of the bitter pang which she would feel (21-40), the visit of the eastern sages with their gifts, the flight into Egypt and return to Nazareth (Matt. ii.), and, later, the wondrous conversation with the doctors, when, in reply to her anxious enquiry, Jesus told her that he must be about his Father's business (Luke ii. 41-52), deep cogitations would naturally arise; and she 'pondered,' we are told with regard to several of these incidents, she 'pondered' them 'in her heart.' The scripture does not gratify curiosity: we, therefore, know not how the Holy Child grew up, what were his infantine, what his youthful, occupations. But all were passing before Mary's eyes; and to a thoughtful and devout nature like hers lessons of astonishing import must have been presented, and the day must have been indeed longed for when he should be manifested to Israel.

That time came; and Mary was in all probability a widow; for we do not again read of Joseph. The husband of her youth no more, she must have clung with yet-intenser love and expectation to her Son. Of her behaviour in respect to his baptism we hear nothing; but, when he had returned to Galilee, and a little body of disciples were attending him, and there was a marriage at Cana, she, who had doubtless heard of the public testimony borne by John, thought herself authorized in appealing to him when the wine for the guests fell short. Surely he will be ready to exert, if I ask him, his extraordinary power. The reply was deeply suggestive. 'He did not,' as Dr. Alford on the place says, 'perform his miracles from regard to human affinity, but solely from love and his object of manifesting his glory. . . . but first among those to be taught this was she herself, who had tempted him to work a miracle from that regard. It has perhaps not been enough noticed that in this answer the Lord declares his period of subjection to her as his earthly parent to be at an end. Henceforth his thoughts are not her thoughts. At twelve years of age, he answers "thy father and I" by "my Father:" now he is to be no longer before the world as Mary's Son, but as sanctified by the Father and sent into the world' (comp. Ellicott's Hist. Lect., lect. iii. p. 121, note 1). But, though there was a tone of reproof in the Lord's reply, it did not extinguish Mary's expectation. Her charge to the servants showed that she still believed—and the event corroborated her belief—that some word of power would be spoken (John ii. 1-11). And there was no lack of filial love evinced. He kindly accompanied afterwards his mother and his brethren—cousins, most likely, for Mary bore no other children: see JAMES, 2—to Capernaum (12).

It is but rarely that Mary is subsequently mentioned. She, with some other of his relatives, tried once to interrupt his incessant labours. She thought he spared himself too little: he had not time to take necessary sustenance: his mind would be over-balanced. But in his answer there was a re-proof again conveyed. Pointing to his disciples, he declared that every humble servant of his Father had honour equal to that of her who bare him in her womb. It was not carnal relationship, it was spiritual union that was the closest tie (Matt. xii. 46-50; Mark iii. 20, 21, 31-35; Luke viii. 19-21). To the same purport was his answer to a certain woman on another occasion (xi. 27, 28). With the exception of a reference to her by his own Galilean countrymen (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3) we hear nothing more of Mary till the crucifixion.

How far she shared the joy which rang through Jerusalem on his triumphal entry we know not. Where she was the last fatal night of his passion and apprehension we know not. Whether she was among the listeners at his trial and condemnation we cannot tell; or whether she was with affectionate friends trying to cheer her during those hours of agonizing suspense when the sword was indeed piercing her soul. But she could not be kept from his cross. She stood by—who can conceive with what emotion?—while the life-blood dripped from his limbs, and the wild execrations of the maddened priests and people howled around. The beloved disciple was there too. And then passed that unutterable touch of tenderness, when the Lord solemnly committed his mother to that disciple's care, to be ever after a son to her. Immediately, it appears, John withdrew her from the awful scene (John xix. 25-27). We are not told whether she saw Jesus when he was risen; and only once more does her name occur: she was with the body of disciples after the ascension waiting for the fulfilment of promise in the out-pouring of the Holy Spirit (Acts i. 14).

Such is all the authentic history we have of the 'blessed among women'—a very woman in every trait of her character, but taught, as no other woman was, the hard lessons which were to guide her to her Son's eternal kingdom. Some of them were joyful; and some were very grievous; but she learned them thoroughly, till she loved the Lord Jesus as her Saviour far more than as her Son.

The legendary tales which have been told of Mary (Jewish, Mohammedan, medieval) need not be repeated here; nor the sad steps traced by which she has been exalted by many to an almost-equal mediatorship with Christ. 'Blessed' she was, but not sinless or divine. Yet fond superstition soon began to deck her with undue attributes; and the honour paid her increased till the monstrous doctrine was broached of her immaculate conception, a doctrine which, censured by Bernard (who maintained one equally corrupt, Ad Canon. Lugd. Epist. clxiv., tom. i. cols. 169-172. edit. Bened. 1690) only because it had not then the sanction of the Romish see, has in our day (Dec. 8, 1854), been solemnly promulgated as to be henceforth an article of faith to the Romish church.

2. Mary Magdalene was also one of the women who stood by the Saviour's cross (Matt. xxvii. 56). There can be little reasonable doubt that this Mary was so called from the place of her birth or residence, Magdala, by the lake of Galilee. Grievously had she once been afflicted, possessed with seven devils; but the Lord had healed her (Mark xvi. 9; Luke viii. 2); and she with grateful love afterwards attended on him, and—for she seems to have been a person of property—ministered to him of her substance. It is an old notion to identify her with the woman who was a sinner who anointed Christ's feet in Simon the Pharisee's house, bathing them with tears and wiping them with her hair (vii. 37-50). But there is positively no real evidence of the identity; and probability is decided against it.

Mary Magdalene stood, as above noted, by the cross. And after the Lord's death her care was not ended. She watched where they laid the body (Mark xv. 47): she sat prostrated with sorrow over-against the sepulchre when the funeral was over (Matt. xxvii. 61). She also bought sweet spices that on the morrow after the sabbath she might anoint him (Mark xvi. 1). And very early in the morning she went to the garden. There were other women with her; but she outstripped her companions, and arrived ere the twilight ended (John xx. 1). Finding that the stone was removed, she ran back to the city and told Peter and John what had happened; and they hastened to the tomb to satisfy themselves and then returned to their home (2-10). Mary, however, who had followed them back, lingered weeping at the spot. She looked into the sepulchre, and saw a vision of angels, to whose enquiry she sobbed out her complaint, 'They have taken away my Lord.' Helpless and dead as she believed him to be, he was her Lord still. In her grief she turned away; and there was Jesus standing. But she did not recognize him. Perhaps she was well-nigh blinded with her tears; and to his question she replied, thinking him to be the gardener, that she would take away the body if she were but told where it was. 'Jesus saith unto her, Mary.' O the ecstatic joy of that moment! 'Rabboni,' she exclaimed: it is, it is my Lord, not dead but alive again; the glory of his resurrection flashing at once in all its wondrous reality into her mind. With bewildered love she tries to clasp him. 'But it must not be: relations now are solemnly changed. . . . With mysterious words, full of holy dignity and majesty, yet at the same time of most tenderly-implied consolation, the Lord bids her refrain. The time, indeed, will come when, under higher relations, love eager and demonstrative as that now shown to the risen, may hereafter unforbidably direct itself to the ascended Lord. But that time is not now' (Ellicott, Hist. Lect., lect. viii. pp. 386, 387). She may go, he further tells her, and announce the happy tidings to those whom he graciously called his brethren (John xx. 2-18). It would seem that this appearance of Christ to Mary Magdalene was the first (Mark xvi. 9): see Ellicott, ibid. pp. 389-392; and comp. Horne's Introd., vol. ii. edit. Ayre, pp. 482, 483.

We read no more of this Mary. But she was doubtless one of the women mentioned in Acts ii. 14. Her story, too, has been augmented by baseless legends.

3. Mary the mother of James and Joseph (Matt. xxvii. 56, 61, xxviii. 1; Mark xv. 40, 47, xvi. 1) must have been identical with Mary the wife of Cleophas or Clopas (John xix. 25), and the sister—elder no doubt—of Mary the Virgin. It is not extraordinary that two sisters should bear the same name: examples of this occur now; and when, as in the east, mothers were distinguished by the name of their sons (e.g. 'Mary the mother of Jesus') there was little danger of confusion. Besides, most frequently the two sisters Mary are differently called in the original; the Virgin Mariam, the other Maria. It is likely that after Joseph's death the two families formed one household. This will account for the mode of speaking in Matt. xiii. 55, 56. This Mary showed her love to Jesus by her attendance at his cross and at his tomb.

4. Mary of Bethany, the loving and beloved one—very pleasant are the records we have of her. Preposterous attempts, indeed, have been made to identify her with the sinner of Luke vii. 37; but it is useless to refute notions which common sense repudiates. And some have imagined her not the Mary of x. 38-42. But surely it is one character, the meek and quiet woman, easily distinguished from the Virgin, so thoughtful but somewhat presuming on her maternity, from the impulsive lady of Magdala, from the active mother of James and Joseph. Mary of Bethany is ever still, sitting with listening ear at Jesus' feet, to the annoyance of her notable sister Martha, overwhelmed with grief when her brother Lazarus died, and not stirring from her place till Martha had whispered that Jesus was come, then rising only to go and fall down before him with the touching plaint, 'Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died' (John xi. 1-46). She evinced her deep love for Christ by pouring very precious ointment over both his head and his feet (Matt. xxvi. 6-13; Mark xiv. 3-9; John xii. 1-8). And then we hear of her no more. She is not enumerated among the company that stood by the cross. She was, no doubt, weeping at home.

5. Mary the mother of John Mark, in whose house at Jerusalem the disciples were assembled praying when Peter was supernaturally rescued from Herod's prison (Acts xii. 12). She must have been sister to Barnabas (Col. iv. 10).

6. Mary, a Christian at Rome to whom St. Paul sends affectionate greeting (Rom. xvi. 6).

MAS'ALOTH (1 Macc. ix. 2). A place near Arbela in Galilee. There has been no certain identification of it.

MAS'CHIL. A word found in the titles of Psalms xxxii., xlii., xlv., xlv., lii., liii., liv., lv., lxxiv., lxxviii., lxxxviii., lxxxix., cxlii. The same word occurs in xlvi. 7, where our version renders it 'with understanding.' It means a didactic poem, or perhaps sometimes merely a poem, or song. Some, however, would take it to imply a melody requiring skill for the proper execution of it.

MASH (drawn out?). A people descended from Aram of the line of Shem (Gen. x. 23). Their original seat was probably near mount Masius, now Karja Baghlar, which separates Mesopotamia from Armenia. Thence it has been supposed that they emigrated into Asia Minor, and settled in the country called, with a slight variation of name, Mysia. But this must be regarded as in a degree conjectural. In 1 Chron. i. 17 the name is given less accurately Meshech.

M'ASHAL (entreaty). A town in the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 26, where Misheal), afterwards assigned to the Levites (xxi. 30, where Mishal; 1 Chron. vi. 74). It was not far from mount Carmel.

MAS'AS (1 Esdr. v. 34).

MAS'MAN (1 Esdr. viii. 43). Shemaiah (Ezra viii. 16).

MASON (2 Sam. v. 11; 2 Kings xii. 12, xxii. 6; 1 Chron. xiv. 1, xxii. 2; 2 Chron. xxiv. 12; Ezra iii. 7). See ARCHITECTURE, HANDICRAFT.

MASO'RAH, MAS'ORETES. The word Masorah signifies tradition, and designates a collection of notes made upon the Old Testament, supposed to have been derived from very ancient times. The Masoretes were those who collected these notes; and the Hebrew text settled according to them is called the Masoretic text.

After the destruction of Jerusalem, and the wide dispersion of the Jews, various schools of literature were established by them, in which the holy books were carefully preserved, studied, and taught. One of the most noted of these schools was that of Tiberias, which Jerome mentions as existing in his time (Præf. ad Comm. in libr. Paralip.). The doctors of it busied themselves from the sixth century in gathering all the critical and grammatical observations they could find, which might contribute to fix the reading and the interpretation of scripture. These observations were handed on through successive ages, whence the name Masorah; and by some an incredible antiquity was ascribed to them, from at least the time of Ezra. They comprised traditional definitions, precepts, corrections of the text; and, when these were committed to writing, it was felt necessary also to settle the pronunciation by vowel-points and accents. The pronunciation itself was not new: it was simply a new mode of expressing it which was then introduced, and which was developed into the elaborate vowel-system at present adopted in Hebrew reading. The Masoretic notes were mainly critical, bearing upon the orthography, the grammar, and the explanation of the text which they were to accompany. The Masoretic doctors marked the number of the sections and verses of different books, with the middle verse in each. They further noted the verses in which something was supposed to be forgotten, the words which they thought changed, the letters which they deemed superfluous, the different readings of words redundant or defective, the letters that were out of their place, or inverted, with a vast variety of such minute particulars; and they professed to give the number of times each Hebrew letter occurs in the bible. These Masoretic notes were written both separately and also on the margin of manuscripts of the sacred books. They were sometimes in full, and sometimes abridged, with more added at the end of the text; and, according to their length and position they were differently characterized as the 'great,' the 'little,' the 'textual,' and the 'final' Masorah. The great Masorah was first printed in Bomberg's rabbinical bibles: the little is included in most Hebrew bibles.

The Masorah is of value for textual criticism. We can judge from it of the state of the text in the early centuries after Christ: we see also with what care the Jews preserved the sacred oracles entrusted to them; for when these doctors supposed a reading was false they did not venture to alter it, but simply added in the margin that which they considered preferable. And many of these marginal suggestions deserve great respect. For example, in Psal. c. 3, for 'not we ourselves,' the Masoretes propose 'his we are;' by the change of but a single Hebrew letter, with no difference of pronunciation. Our translators have introduced many of these Masoretic notes into the margin of our version, as in the example just given.

A great deal of information in regard to the Masorah may be found in Walton's Prolegom. in Bibl. Polygl., viii. pp. 261, &c. edit. Dathæ, 1777.

MAS'PHA. —1 (1 Macc. iii. 46). Mizpeh in Benjamin.—2 (v. 35). Probably Mizpeh in Gilead.

MASRE'KAH (vineyard of noble vines). The seat of one of the early kings of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 36; 1 Chron. i. 47).

MAS'SA (a lifting up, a gift? patience?). One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chron. i. 30). His descendants may have been the Masani in Arabia Deserta.

MAS'SAH (temptation). A place where the Israelites murmured for want of water. It would seem to be identical with Rephidim, and that the name was imposed because there the people tempted God by questioning his power and presence (Exod. xvii. 7). See MERIBAH, 1. The events at Massah are frequently afterwards referred to (Deut. vi. 16, ix. 22, xxxiii. 8).

MASS'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 22). Maaseiah (Ezra x. 22).

MASTER. The head of a household (Gen. xxxix. 20; Psal. cxxiii. 2; Mal. i. 6; Eph. vi. 5, 9; Col. iii. 22, iv. 1). A chief man or public instructor (Luke vi. 40; John iii. 10; comp. Matt. xxiii. 8, 10). Hence our Lord was frequently addressed by this title (xxii. 16, 24, 36).

MASTICK-TREE (Hist. Sus. 54). The tree intended is the Pistacia lentiscus, mastich-tree, producing a fragrant resin. There is in the original Greek a play on the words schinos and schisei, the first signifying the tree, the latter (55) the cutting.

MATHAN'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 31). Mattaniah (Ezra x. 30).

MATHU'SALA (Luke iii. 37). The Greek form of Methuselah.

MAT'RED (propelling). The mother of Mehetabel, wife of Hadar, a king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 39; 1 Chron. i. 50).

MAT'RI (rain of Jehovah). A Benjamite to whose family Saul belonged (1 Sam. x. 21).

MAT'TAN (a gift).—1. A priest of Baal, slain at the deposition and death of Athaliah (2 Kings xi. 18; 2 Chron. xxiii. 17).—2. One whose son in Jeremiah's time is reckoned among the princes (Jer. xxxviii. 1).

MATTANAH (id.). A place through which the Israelites passed between the wilderness and the borders of Moab (Numb. xxi. 18, 19), to the south-east of the Dead sea.

MATTANI'AH (gift of Jehovah).—1. A son of Josiah, made king by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxiv. 17) by the name of Zedekiah: see ZEDEKIAH, 2.—2. A Levite (1 Chron. ix. 15; Neh. xi. 17, 22): he may be the same with the person mentioned in xii. 8, 25, 35.—3. The head of one of the divisions of the singers (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 16).—4. A Levite, whose descendant Jahaziel prophesied in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 14).—5. Another Levite in the reign of Hezekiah (xxix. 13).—6, 7, 8, 9. Four persons who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 26, 27, 30, 37).—10. A Levite (Neh. xiii. 13).

MAT'TATHA (id.). A grandson of David, one of our Lord's ancestors (Luke iii. 31).

MAT'TATHAH (id.). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 33).

MATTATHIAS (id.).—1, 2. Two persons in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 25, 26).

MATTATHIAS.—1 (1 Esdr. ix. 43). Mattithiah (Neh. viii. 4).—2. The head of the Maccabean family (1 Macc. ii. 1, and elsewhere). From him began that determined resistance to Syrian tyranny, which issued in the establishment of the independence of the Jews under a dynasty of princes of his family. See MACCABEES, THE FAMILY OF MACCABEUS.—3. A Jewish captain (xi. 70).—4. The son of Simon Maccabeus (xvi. 14).—5. An envoy to Judas Maccabeus from Nicanor (2 Macc. xiv. 19).

MATTENAI (gift of Jehovah).—1, 2. Two persons who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 33, 37).—3. A priest in the time of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 19).

MAT'THAN (gift). One of our Lord's ancestry (Matt. i. 15). He is probably the same with Matthat, 1. See GENEALOGY.

MATTHANIAS (1 Esdr. ix. 27). Mattaniah (Ezra x. 26).

MAT'THAT (gift of Jehovah).—1, 2. Two persons in the list of our Lord's ancestors (Luke iii. 24, 29).

MATTHELAS (1 Esdr. ix. 19). Maaseiah (Ezra x. 18).

MAT'THEW (probably a contracted form of Mattathiah, gift of Jehovah, or, as some think, identical with Amittai, true, faithful). One of the twelve apostles of our Lord. He was called also Levi, and was the son of Alphaeus (Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27), whether of the same who was father of James (Matt. x. 3) is quite uncertain. He appears to have resided at Capernaum, where he was a revenue-officer or publican (see PUBLICAN). He was occupied with his duties when Jesus first called him. He immediately obeyed, and prepared a feast in his house, certainly to do honour to the Lord, but perhaps also by way of farewell to his old associates, who thus were brought, not without murmuring of the Pharisees, to hear the gracious words of the great Master (ix. 9-13). Some have professed to doubt whether Matthew and Levi were the same: to such bishop Ellicott's note (Hist. Lect., pp. 171, 172) is a sufficient reply. Matthew's name appears in every list of the apostles, in the second group; and it is worth notice that in his own Gospel he retains the name of his despised calling, 'Matthew the publican' (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13).

Of his personal history nothing further is recorded in the sacred volume; and the accounts of his later life given by various ecclesiastical writers, as they are contradictory, are entitled to very little credit. For some notice of them see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Matthäus.'

MAT'THEW, THE GOSPEL OF. This has always occupied the first place in the order of the Gospels, and consequently of the books of the New Testament.

It has been keenly disputed in what language this Gospel was originally composed; this question, therefore, one of the most important in regard to the origin of the book we possess, shall be first examined. There are three hypotheses, that St. Matthew wrote in Hebrew, or rather the Aramaic dialect, believed to have been at the time the common tongue of the inhabitants of Judea; that he wrote in Greek, so that we have his veritable composition; and that he published two equally-authoritative works, perhaps at or nearly at the same time, the one in Hebrew, the other its counterpart in Greek. Of this last theory, avowedly a compromise between the two former, by men who felt themselves unable to reach a real decision, little need be said. It has literally no evidence in its favour: it is but a conjecture, and as a conjecture it may be dismissed.

There are eminent critics, who have taken vast pains with the investigation, ranked on either side; some maintaining the Hebrew original, others as strenuously arguing for the Greek. Any determination, therefore, which may here be made must be stated with modesty.

If we adopt the first-named opinion, it necessarily follows that the present Greek Gospel is but a version, by whom or when made we have no means of knowing; neither, as the original has perished (for no Hebrew Gospel is extant), have we the advantage of testing its faithfulness. The proofs alleged are the overwhelming—so it is thought—testimony of the early fathers. These are enumerated as Papias, Irenaeus, Origen, Eusebius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom, and others; whose words it is not necessary to cite in a work like the present. Their testimonies have long ago been sufficiently sifted by Dr. Whitby in his Preface to the Gospels, sects. v. vi. vii. It may be said of them that they are uncertain and confused, and, besides, that they are grounded only upon hearsay. For none of these writers pretend that they had seen the Hebrew Gospel, till the time of Jerome; and the volume he describes differed widely, as will presently be shown, from the Greek composition we possess. How, then, can we rely upon such testimonies, which would go to prove that a book of sacred scripture was written in a language so unsuited to its purpose that it had speedily to be re-placed by a translation, while it, the inspired work, fell at once into oblivion? the Peshito Syriac version, made probably but about a century after Christ, being, it is acknowledged on all hands, from the Greek. There is no parallel to this. The original of every other sacred composition has been carefully preserved. Why this extraordinary exception?

But let us look a little farther. Is the Greek Gospel a translation? Does it present those noticeable features which so generally convince a reader at once that he has not the original before him? On the contrary, the flow of the language of this Gospel, with Hebrew idioms certainly, but in a style far unlike the Hebraized Greek palpable in the Septuagint version of books of the Old Testament; the Hebrew words, such as Raca (Matt. v. 22), which certainly would not have been left in an unknown tongue, when the very object of translating, if the composition be translated, was to render it intelligible to Greek readers; above all, the use of the Septuagint in quotations from the Old Testament—these are but some of the formidable objections which those who consider the Greek Gospel a version must have to meet. It is well known that the citations in the New Testament generally follow the Septuagint, occasionally only deserting it, when faulty, for the original, and varying sometimes from both the original and the Septuagint, when it seemed good to the inspiring Spirit to give a fuller development to the ancient word. This is perfectly intelligible if the apostles wrote in Greek: they would naturally adopt for the most part the version in the hands of those they wrote for, and understood by them. But can any reasonable man imagine that Matthew writing in Hebrew would not (more especially when reporting our Lord's speeches) use the original, but would in preference translate back from the Septuagint? Or can any man imagine that, if Matthew used the original, his translator would so far depart from the model before him as to introduce the Septuagint renderings? It cannot, therefore, be admitted that our Greek Gospel is merely a version. Besides, all ancient authorities refer to it, and use it as the divine word. How could they so have used it, had it been but a translation? And, moreover, why should Matthew write in Hebrew? For Jewish readers especially, it is replied. Why, then, was not the epistle to the Hebrews composed in Hebrew? The fact is, and weighty proofs of it have been brought, that Greek was as well understood in Palestine in our Lord's time as Hebrew, and that there are strong reasons for believing that Christ and his apostles, and the Jews in general, more especially in public speeches and religious addresses, were in the habit of using Greek. This has been elsewhere argued: see GOSPELS (pp. 341, 342); and what is there maintained may be corroborated by the opinion of bishop Thirlwall, that 'Greek was the medium of intercourse between the Romans and the Jews . . . and that, on the whole, the number of those who knew no other language was greater than that of those who understood only the vernacular tongue of Palestine' (Introd. to Schleiermacher's Essay on Luke, p. ci.).

And as to the Hebrew so-called St. Matthew's Gospel of which Jerome speaks, it is evident by what he says that it differed widely from the genuine Greek. It had additions, alterations, omissions: it was used by the Ebionites and Nazarenes, degenerate Christian sects, and was in all probability the untrustworthy document known, besides other names, as the 'Gospel according to the Hebrews.'

If the reader feels that the observations here offered have any weight, and that the evidence tends to prove the authority of St. Matthew's Greek Gospel, he may be reminded that it is only a sketch of the discussion which can be given in this place, and that the arguments might be made abundantly more conclusive.

The references already given to early writers prove that the Gospel of St. Matthew was received very anciently in the Christian church. And authors earlier than any yet mentioned have given us their testimony. Though Polycarp and Clement of Rome do not distinctly name it, they yet have left in their writings allusions to St. Matthew's Gospel, and sentences taken from it. It has indeed been asserted by some, who admit generally its authority, that the first two chapters are a spurious addition. 'But,' says bishop Ellicott, 'when we remember (1) that they are contained in every manuscript, uncial or cursive, and in every version, eastern or western, that most of the early fathers cite them, and that early enemies to Christianity appealed to them (Orig., Cels., i. 38, ii. 32); when we observe (2) the obvious connection between the beginning of chap. iii. and the end of chap. ii., and between iv. 13 and ii. 23; and when we remark (3) the exact accordance of diction with that of the remaining chapters of the Gospel, it becomes almost astonishing that even à priori prejudice should not have abstained at any rate from so hopeless a course as that of impugning the genuineness of these chapters. To urge that these chapters were wanting in the mutilated and falsified Gospel of the Ebionites (Epiph., Hær., xxx. 13), or that they were cut away by the heretical Tatian (Theodoret, Hær. Fab., i. 20), is really to concede their genuineness, and to bewray the reason why it was impugned' (Hist. Lect., p. 57, note 1): see also Mill (Myth. Interp. of the Gospels, part ii. chap. ii. sect. i. pp. 147-171).

The time when St. Matthew wrote his Gospel is uncertain: some critics place it as early as 37 A.D.; and some carry it down as late as 64. Looking at all the probabilities of the case we may, without fixing an exact year, assign it to a time between 40 and 50. There can be little doubt that the apostle wrote in Palestine. His object was to place before his countrymen a narrative of the words and actions of Jesus, whom he exhibits specially as the Messiah for whom the nation looked. The diction is Hebraistic; the style plain and perspicuous. The teaching of our Lord is made very prominent in this Gospel; so much so that the record of Christ's actions is commonly subservient to the fuller exhibition of his instructions; but through the whole we observe the development of the two-fold title of the first verse, 'Son of David,' 'Son of Abraham.'

It is no mere fancy to discover a certain relationship between St. Matthew's original occupation and his mode of arranging his materials. He had been a man of business, engaged in accounts; and from such a one we might expect careful grouping and orderly combination. Hence he appears sometimes to disregard exact chronological sequence: at least the order of events differs much in St. Matthew from the order of St. Mark and of St. Luke. He has gathered into groups the discourses of our Lord and the attending circumstances (Matt. v., vi., vii.). He has put together a collection of miracles (viii., ix.), and has arranged the parables with such consummate wisdom that each in the place in which it is set adds force and clearness to the rest (xiii.). There are many particulars, too, untouched by the other evangelists, which are delivered with special effectiveness by St. Matthew—the consolatory promise, for example, with which he concludes (xxviii. 18-20).

Mr. Westcott, in his useful Introduct. to the Study of the Gospels, pp. 327-329, has constructed an elaborate scheme or analysis of the contents of this Gospel. It may be consulted with advantage by the student; but perhaps a more simple and brief distribution will be better suited to the general reader. We may, therefore, note four parts—I. The descent, birth and infancy of Jesus (i., ii.). II. The events preparatory to our Lord's public ministry, including the preaching of the Baptist, and the baptism and temptation of Jesus (iii. 1—iv. 11). III. The discourses and actions of Jesus in Galilee, by which his Messiahship was demonstrated (iv. 12—xx. 16). IV. The transactions relative to Christ's passion, death, and resurrection (xx. 17—xxviii.).

Commentaries on St. Matthew's Gospel are found in those on the New Testament, or the Gospels collectively; but the valuable exposition of Dr. J. A. Alexander, 1861 (unfortunately not finished), may be here recommended to the reader's notice.

MATTHIAS (gift of Jehovah). One of our Lord's disciples, possibly of the number of the seventy, who was chosen by lot to be an apostle in the place of Judas Iscariot (Acts i. 23-26). No other particulars of his history are certainly known. Various traditions describe him as preaching in Ethiopia, or in Colchis, and being there martyred; or, according to yet another account, as preaching in Judea and being stoned by the Jews. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Matthias.'

MATTHIAS (1 Esdr. ix. 33). Mattathah (Esra x. 33).

MATTITHI'AH (id.).—1. A Levite of the family of the Korahites, who had charge of things made (for the offerings) in pans (1 Chron. ix. 31).—2. A Levite porter appointed to play the harp (xv. 18, 21, xvi. 5).—3. A son of Jeduthun, chief of one of the courses of singers (xxv. 3, 21): he may have been identical with No. 2.—4. One who had taken a foreign wife (Esra x. 43).—5. Perhaps a Levite, who stood by the side of Esra when he read the law (Neh. viii. 4).

MATTOCK. There are two Hebrew words nearly allied which are rendered 'share' and 'mattock' in our version of 1 Sam. iii. 20. These are two agricultural cutting instruments, of which one is thought to denote the plough-share, and the other the coulter. The plural, occurring in 21, 'mattocks,' of both words is alike. In Isai. vii. 25 the word translated 'mattock' is probably a weeding-hook, or hoe.

MAUL. A mace or war-club (Prov. xxv. 18). But in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 6, marg., where the word appears in our version, 'mattocks' being in the text, it is questionable whether any implement is meant. It might be better to translate 'with' or 'in their ruins.' The cities of the northern kingdom had been desolated; but the altars still subsisting in these wasted places Josiah destroyed.

MAUZ'ZIM (fortresses) (Dan. xi. 38, marg.). In the text of the place referred to we have 'the god of forces.' There have been many conjectures as to the meaning, and the deity intended. Several are enumerated in Barnes' Notes on Daniel, vol. ii. pp. 268, 269, edit. 1853. The suggestion of Gesenius that it was a Syrian god obtained upon the Jews, perhaps Jupiter Capitolinus, for whom Antiochus built a temple at Antioch (Livy, Hist., lib. xli. 20), is as feasible as any.

MAZITH'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 35). Mattithiah (Esra x. 43).

MAZ'ZAROTH (prognostications, presagers?). This word is most likely another form of Mazzaloth (influences), which occurs in 2 Kings xxiii. 5, rendered 'the planets' in the text, 'twelve signs or constellations' in the margin. Mazzaroth is found in Job xxxviii. 32 ('the twelve signs,' marg.). The name may have been given from the popular belief in the influence of the constellations over the destiny of men, thus prefiguring future events. That by Mazzaroth or Mazzaloth are meant the signs of the zodiac there can be little doubt. The authority of the Targums and of later Jewish writers fully confirm this supposition.

MEADOW (Gen. xli. 2, 18). The original word so translated in this place is Egyptian. It must mean some kind of water-plant, any green thing growing in marshy ground. In Judges xx. 33 our version, 'meadows,' must be incorrect. There are said to be no meadows about Gibeah. Some waste place may be intended; or, by a slight change of punctuation, the word would denote a cave.

ME'AH (a hundred). A tower of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 1, xii. 39). It is supposed to have stood somewhere to the north-east of the city.

MEAL, MEALS. The meals of the Hebrews were not so exactly distinguished by special names as ours are. The principal meal was possibly the evening one (Luke xiv. 16-24; John xii. 2; Rev. xix. 17). Winer doubts this, and contends that in an agricultural population the chief meal would more likely be that in the earlier part of the day (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Mahlzeit'). Joseph certainly invited his brethren to eat with him at noon (Gen. xliii. 16, 25); but this might be according to the Egyptian custom. The behaviour of Abraham and Lot to the angels proves little. Abraham entertained them in the heat of the day, Lot in the evening (xviii. 1-5, xix. 1-3). Unquestionably there was a meal ordinarily eaten before noon (often called dinner). This we find in the harvest-field of Boaz, of which the master himself partook, and after which the labour was resumed (Ruth ii. 14, 15). But then the harvest-feast was in the evening (iii. 2, 3, 7). The feast made for Jethro was obviously in the evening; for Moses is said to have sat through the whole day judging the people (Exod. xviii. 12-14). The promise of a miraculous supply of food for Israel in the wilderness makes a remarkable distinction, 'At even ye shall eat flesh, and in the morning ye shall be filled with bread,' referring to the quails and the manna, as if in the evening the meal would be more substantial (xvi. 12). The time, also, when the first passover was eaten, and at which it was ever after to be celebrated (xii. 6, 8; Lev. xxiii. 5), points to the same conclusion; as, still further, do the commencing and close of the fast of the seventh month at even (32). Moreover, as families are separated through the day when occupied in their ordinary business (Psal. civ. 23), it is only in the evening that they are all likely to be gathered for their chief meal (cxxxviii. 3). The morning feastings (1 Kings xx. 16; Isai. v. 11), may be considered as exceptional cases. These are the principal notices on which Saalschütz relies as tending to prove that the most substantial meal among the Hebrews was that eaten in the evening (Arch. der Heb., cap. 54, vol. ii. pp. 136, 137). They are not quite decisive; and we may well suppose that, while generally there were two meals (Luke xiv. 12), their relative importance, as with ourselves, varied according to the time, and the circumstances of individuals.

It is also uncertain whether it was customary for the female part of the household to eat with the males. Several passages may be produced in favour of the practice (e.g. Ruth ii. 14; 1 Sam. i. 8; Job i. 4); also the command of the law pre-supposes it (Deut. xvi. 11, 14). Yet the Levite's concubine does not seem to have joined her husband and father at their meal (Judges xix. 6); Absalom invited only his brothers (2 Sam. xiii. 23); and, while the sons are spoken of as around the table (Psal. cxxviii. 3), the wife is not included. Martha also did not sit at the table at the supper of Bethany (John xii. 2). The case of Ahasuerus's feast (Esth. i. 9), occurring in Persia, proves nothing in regard to the custom of Jews. Perhaps, as wine was drunk at the later part of or after a meal, females if present might soon retire. And indisputably the care of preparation seems to have belonged especially to the women (Gen. xviii. 6, 9; Luke x. 40).

For the nature of the viands see FOOD. It appears to have been customary to place separate portions before such person; and those who were most honoured had the choicest and largest portions (Gen. xliii. 34; 1 Sam. i. 4, 5, ix. 23, 24). This is a modern oriental practice. See BANQUET.

In earlier times the Hebrews sat at meals (Gen. xxvii. 19; Judges xix. 6; 1 Sam. xx. 24, 25, 27), but subsequently they reclined (Amos vi. 4, 7), and the custom of the Greeks and Romans in this respect prevailed. From this custom some of the incidents related in the gospel history are readily explained (Luke vii. 37, 38). And as several lay on a single couch (generally three) the head of one rested on the breast of another (John xiii. 23, 25). It was usual to wash the hands before and after meals (water being poured from an ewer upon them (2 Kings iii. 11), sometimes also in the interval of changing the dishes. This, which was necessary for cleanliness, as the food was taken with the fingers, seems to have been insisted on by the Pharisees as a ritual observance; and hence our Lord's discountenance of it on more than one occasion (Matt. xv. 2, 20; Mark vii. 2-4; Luke xi. 38). A blessing was asked upon the meal (1 Sam. ix. 13; Luke ix. 16; John vi. 11), and thanks were returned at the close; Jewish writers grounding this on Deut. viii. 10. On the sabbath the first meal would seem to have been not till after the synagogue service at mid-day (see Josephus, De Vita sua, § 54).

The modern eastern customs at meals illustrate many of the circumstances recorded in scripture. Thus it is common to double up bits of thin bread into a kind of spoon and dip them in the dish: comp. John xiii. 26, and see Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 126-128. The Jews now consider the table at meal-time as representing the altar of the temple, and the dishes as the offerings. Hence the table must be spread with a clean cloth, and salt laid upon it (Lev. ii. 13). Bread must be eaten with every regular meal; and certain graces and washings are prescribed (Mills' British Jews, part i. chap. iii. pp. 58, 59).

ME'ANI (1 Esdr. v. 31). Mehumim (Ezra ii. 50).

MEA'RAH (a cave). A place 'beside the Sidonians' (Job. xliii. 3). It may not, however, be a proper name, but may denote some well-known cave. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Meara.'

MEASURE, MEASURES. There are measures of length and measures of capacity. Measures of length have generally been taken from the proportions of the human body. Thus we have the digit or finger's breadth; the palm or hand-breadth, or breadth of four fingers; the span or space reached between the thumb and the little finger extended; the cubit or length from the elbow to the point of the middle finger; also the foot.

There is great uncertainty in reducing Hebrew measures to English. The following tables of measures of length and capacity, from Horne's Introd., vol. iii. pp. 573, 574, must be taken therefore more as an approximation than as an exact determination:—

1. Hebrew Measures of Length reduced to English Measure.

		Eng. feet.	inches.	inches.

2. Long Measures.

		Eng. miles.	paces.	feet.
A cubit		0	0	1'824
400   A stadium or furlong		0	145	4'6
2000   5   A sabbath-day's journey		0	729	3'0
4000   10   2   An eastern mile		1	403	1'0
12000   30   6   3   A parasang		4	153	3'0
96000   240   48   24   8   A day's journey (uncertain)		33	172	4'0

1056 paces are reckoned to the mile, five feet to the pace. The Roman mile was 1618 yards

3. Measures of Capacity for Liquids, reduced to English Wine Measure.

		gal.	pints.
A caph		0	0.625
1'3   A log		0	0'833
5'3   4   A cab		0	3'333
16   12   3   A hin		1	2
32   24   6   2   A seah		2	4
96   72   18   6   3   A bath or ephah		7	4
960   720   180   60   30   10   A cor, or coros, chomer, or homer		75	0

In Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1742, two tables of these measures are given, between which the writer professes himself unable to decide. In one the homer is rated at 86'696 gallons in the other 44'286.

4. Measures of Capacity for Things Dry, reduced to English Corn Measure.

		pecks.	gal.	pints.
A gacnal		0	0	0'1416
20   A cab		0	0	2'8333
36   1'8   An omer or gomer		0	0	5'1
120   6   3'3   A seah		1	0	1
360   18   10   3   An ephah		3	0	3
1800   90   50   15   5   A lethech		16	0	0
3600   180   100   30   10   2   A chomer, homer, cor, or coros		32	0	1

The batus (Luke xvi. 6, marg.) was equivalent to the bath or ephah: the bushel (Matt. v. 15; Mark iv. 21; Luke xi. 33) was about a peck: the choenix (Rev. vi. 6, marg.) was nearly one quart; the firkin (John ii. 6) 8 galls. 7'4 pts.; the sextarius (Mark vii. 4, marg.) or restes, was probably equivalent to the log, but in the place referred is not taken for any particular measure.

For other tables see MONEY, WEIGHTS.

MEASURING REED (Ezek. xl. 3, xlii. 16-19). See tables above.

MEAT, MEATS. This word as it occurs in our version is frequently used for food in general (Lev. xxii. 11, 13; 1 Sam. xx. 5, 34; 2 Sam. iii. 35, and elsewhere), or for what is allowed to be eaten, proper for sustenance (Gen. i. 29, 30, ix. 3). More specially, though perhaps sometimes indicating, as in our ordinary employment of the term, flesh-meat (xxvii. 4, 7, 31), it is almost exclusively applied to vegetables or vegetable products. Thus a meat-offering was a kind of cake made of flour and oil (Lev. ii.).

A controversy arose in the early church respecting meats, the flesh of victims, which had been offered to idols; whether this might lawfully be eaten by Christians. It was evidently a matter of expediency. The flesh itself was not polluted; and much that had been so offered was exposed for sale in the ordinary market, and was found generally on men's tables at their meals. Hence St. Paul lays down the rule that Christians might lawfully buy what was for public sale, or placed before them by their acquaintances, without asking questions, but, if they were specially told that the meat had been offered to an idol, or if the conscience of a brother (even though he might be weak) was likely to be offended, they should abstain, and not give cause for scandal. The same principle was laid down in the council of Jerusalem. Christians in the sight of Jews, who would be sure to take exception, should not eat meats offered to idols (Acts xv. 20, 21, 29; Rom. xiv. 20, 21; 1 Cor. viii. 4, 7-10, x. 19, 25-33). See FOOD.

The word 'meat' is sometimes used figuratively (John iv. 32, 34).

MEAT-OFFERING. See OFFERINGS.

MEBUN'NAI (building of Jehovah). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 27). See SIBBECHAI.

MECHER'ATHITE. The designation of one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 36): it is not known whence derived.

ME'DABA (1 Macc. ix. 36). Medeba.

ME'DAD (love). One of the men on whom God bestowed the Spirit in the wilderness, and who with Eldad prophesied in the camp (Numb. xi. 26, 27).

ME'DAN (contention). One of the sons of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chron. i. 32). The district which his descendants occupied has not been ascertained.

MEDE, MEDES, MEDIAN. The inhabitants of Media (2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11; Ezra vi. 2; Esth. i. 19; Isai. xiii. 17; Jer. xxv. 11, 12, 28; Dan. v. 28, 31, vi. 8, 12, 15, ix. 1, xi. 1; Acts ii. 9). See MEDIA.

ME'DEBA (waters of quiet). A place or district east of the Jordan, the frontier of the territory of Reuben. It would seem that it originally belonged to Moab, but was afterwards held by the Amorites (Numb. xxi. 30; Josh. xiii. 9, 16; 1 Chron. xix. 7). In later times it was recovered by the Moabites (Isai. xv. 2; comp. 1 Macc. ix. 36). Ruins of it exist, still called Madeba, on a rocky hill near Heshbon.

ME'DIA. A large region in Asia lying between Persia, Armenia, and Assyria. It was separated from Persia on the south by a desert: on the west the boundary was the mountains of Zagros, and the chain proceeding thence to Ararat; the Araxes limited it northwards; while on the east it reached to the desert, the Caspian gates, and the mountains south of the sea. In length it might be from north to south 550 miles, and in breadth from 250 to 300. It comprised, according to Rawlinson, the modern provinces of Irak Ajemi, Persian Kurdistan, part of Luristan, Azerbaijan, and perhaps Talish and Ghilan. Anciently Media was divided into Media Magna and Media Atropatene. The former was mountainous and fertile in the west, rocky and bare towards the east. It included the Nisæan plains, famous for a breed of horses, and corresponded to Irak Ajemi, with parts of Kurdistan and Luristan. Media Atropatene, which had its name from a satrap, Atropates, who established himself as monarch there when Alexander overthrew the Persian empire, corresponded to Azerbaijan, and perhaps Talish and Ghilan. It is a high tract, fertile and well-watered. Tabriz, the summer residence of the kings of Persia, is its capital. In each of the two divisions of Media was a chief city called ECBATANA, which see. Another principal town was Rhages or Raga.

The Medes must be supposed descended from Madai, of the sons of Japheth (Gen. x. 2). Over their early history much obscurity hangs. Perhaps in very ancient times they were powerful, and they are said to have conquered Babylon. Later, however, they appear in a subordinate position, though not perhaps actually incorporated with the Assyrian empire, yet oppressed and plundered by the Assyrians, who planted military colonies among them. Herodotus represents them as revolting early, and ultimately taking Nineveh, and establishing an extensive monarchy. But his story cannot be implicitly credited (see Rawlinson's Herod., vol. i. pp. 408, 421, 422). In its main outline it may be true; for indisputably the Medes took Nineveh, perhaps about 625 B.C.; and Cyaxares their king reigned over a vast expanse of country, Assyria, Persia, Media, Armenia, and other countries, from the Halys to the Caspian gates, and from the Caspian and Black seas to the Persian gulf. But this dominion did not last. The Persians under Cyrus defeated them; and he is said to have captured their king Astyages. Thenceforward the Medes made a part of the Persian empire; not as subjected to a yoke, but rather as a kindred race with the Persians. Sometimes indeed they struggled for independence: revolts occurred, but these were suppressed by Darius Hystaspis and Darius Nothus.

The earliest notice we find of them in scripture is when, after the conquest of Samaria, the Assyrian king removed some of the Israelites into Median cities (2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11). This was probably in pursuance of the policy elsewhere noted see ASSYRIA. It was afterwards predicted that the Medes would take part in the destruction of Babylon (Isai. xiii. 17, 18, xxi. 2; Jer. li. 11, 28); a prediction exactly accomplished, as we read in Daniel (Dan. v. 28, 31).

Possibly the Medes had suffered at the hand of the Babylonian kings, and were therefore actuated by a spirit of revenge (Jer. xxv. 25). The Medo-Persian kingdom is alluded to in Dan. viii. 3, 4, 20, and continually the two nations are spoken of as in union (Esth. i. 3, 14, 18, 19, x. 2; Dan. vi. 8, 12). The palace or royal residence, Achmetha or Ecbatana, in Media, is also mentioned (Ezra vi. 2); it had been the seat of government under Cyrus.

The Medes were brave and excelled in the use of the bow. Their dress was flowing and of rich colours; and they were fond of decorating themselves with ornaments. In their religion they admitted the existence of two opposing powers of good and evil. But in later times their creed was modified, and changed into Magianism or worship of fire and the other elements. Among their customs it may be noted that they left their dead to be devoured by birds and beasts of prey (Herod., lib. i. 140).

MEDIA (Dan. v. 31). The designation of Darius, also called the Mede (xi. 1).

MEDIATOR. One who interposes between two parties in order to bring them to agreement, or to a common purpose (Gal. iii. 20). Moses so interposed between God and Israel (Exod. xx. 19; Deut. v. 5; Gal. iii. 19). But the Lord Jesus Christ is the only mediator in the highest sense between God and man; so that we find this special designation given him (1 Tim. ii. 5; Heb. viii. 6, ix. 15, xii. 24). See ATONEMENT, PROPIATION, SALVATION.

MEDICINE (Prov. xvii. 22; Jer. xxx. 13; Ezek. xlvii. 12). See PHYSICIAN. The word is sometimes used figuratively. Sin is spoken of as a disease (Isai. i. 5, 6); the remedy for it is therefore called a medicine.

MEHEDA (1 Esdr. v. 32). Mehida (Ezra ii. 52).

MEGID'DO, MEGID'DON (place of troops). A city (Megiddon, in Zech. xii. 11, the surrounding district, called 'the valley' being alluded to), anciently the seat of a king conquered by Joshua (Josh. xii. 21). It was locally in the territory of Issachar, but was assigned to Manasseh (xvii. 11; 1 Chron. vii. 29), though not at once subdued by that tribe (Judges i. 27). Megiddo lay on the south-western border of the great plain of Esdrael, just where it begins to rise towards the low range of wooded hills which connect Carmel with the mountains of Samaria. The neighbourhood has always been a noted battle-field. Here fought the kings, 'by the waters of Megiddo' (Judges v. 19), the Kishon being probably meant. It was one of the places which Solomon fortified (1 Kings ix. 15); and the region round was one of his commissariat districts (iv. 12). Hither Abaziah king of Judah fled (2 Kings ix. 27); and it was here that Josiah was mortally wounded by Pharaoh-nechoh (xxiii. 29, 30; 2 Chron. xxxv. 22-24). The modern name of Megiddo is el-Lejjân, derived, it would seem, from Legio; so the Romans called the place on the site of the ancient city. It is well situated, with an abundant supply of water, amid rich pastures.

MEHETABEL (whom God does good to).

A person whose grandson attempted to alarm Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 10).

MEHETABEL (id.). The wife of Hadar, one of the kings of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 39; 1 Chron. i. 50).

MEH'DA (junction?). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54).

MEH'IR (price). A man of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. iv. 11).

MEHO'LATHITE (1 Sam. xviii. 19; 2 Sam. xxi. 8). A native or resident of Abel-meholah.

MEHU'JAEI (smitten of God). A descendant of Cain (Gen. iv. 18).

MEHU'MAN (faiihful). One of the eunuchs or chamberlains at the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

MEHU'NIM (habitations). Certain persons, Nethinim, who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 50), are designated 'children of Mehunim.' They were probably not Israelites. The word is written Meunim in Neh. vii. 52.

MEHU'NIMS (id.) (2 Chron. xxvi. 7). See MAONITES.

ME-JAR'KON (waters of yellowness). A town in the territory of Dan (Josh. xix. 46).

MEKON'AH (base, i.e. foundation). A place in the south of Judah, inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 28).

MELAT'AH (whom Jehovah delivers). A Gibeonite, who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 7).

MEL'CHI (Jehovah's king).—1, 2. Two persons among our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 24, 28).

MELCH'IAH (id.) (Jer. xxi. 1). See MALCHIAH, 7.

MELCH'IAS.—1 (1 Esdr. ix. 26). Malchiah (Ezra x. 25).—2 (1 Esdr. ix. 32). Malchiah (Ezra x. 31).—3 (1 Esdr. ix. 44). Malchiah (Neh. viii. 4).

MELCH'IEL (Judith vi. 15).

MELCH'ISEDEC (Heb. v. 6, 10, vi. 20, vii. 1, 10, 11, 15, 17, 21). The Greek form of Melchizedek.

MELCH'ISHUA (king of help). One of the sons of king Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 49, xxxi. 2). See MALCH'ISHUA.

MELCH'IZEDEK (king of righteousness). The priest-king of Salem who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the eastern kings and blessed him (Gen. xiv. 18-20).

Ingenious men have endeavoured to discover that Melchizedek was somebody else; their conjectures, if they were not (some of them especially) irreverent, might be amusing. There has been a doubt as to the place where this personage reigned. Salem, however, is generally supposed to be Jerusalem, which lay in Abraham's line of march. See SALEM. It may be safely concluded that, though reigning in Canaan, Melchizedek was not of one of the depraved and idolatrous Canaanitish tribes. Miss Corboux, in her interesting disquisition on the Rephaim, a distinct race, supposes that Salem was the central seat of their authority, and that the king who reigned there was the supreme head of their nation, to whom the different tribes were subordinate. If Melchizedek were a mere local chief, it is difficult to see why the king of Sodom, an Emim prince, and why Abraham should pay him the deference they did. 'But the moment the important fact comes in by way of explanation, supported by sufficient extrinsic evidence, that the king of Salem was the supreme chief of the entire nation, and the local chiefs of tribes were his subordinates, the whole transaction becomes perfectly intelligible, because we understand the mutual relation of all the parties concerned in it. As feudal lord of the land, in which Abraham had settled, Abraham paid him this tribute. As head of the national body to which the Emim belonged, the chief of the Emim sanctioned it. As head of the state in religious as well as in temporal concerns, according to the primitive patriarchal order, Melchizedek received the tribute, both as a votive offering of gratitude from the givers for the rescue of the goods, and as an acknowledgment of his lordship over the goods rescued' (Journ. of Sac. Lit., July 1852, p. 314).

Melchizedek is propounded by the Psalmist as a type after which Messiah was to hold his priesthood (Psal. cx. 4). The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, taking up this ancient utterance, amplifies it and applies it to Jesus (Heb. v. 10, vi. 20, vii.). He declares the dignity of Melchizedek greater than that of Abraham, from whom he received tithes and whom he blessed. And, as the king of Salem, whose name is significant, as well as that of the city where he reigned, appears just once in sacred story, no genealogy being given of him, no record of his death, so herein is that yet nobler King pre-signified, who had 'neither beginning of days nor end of life.' By the Aaronic priesthood the official character of Christ was specially typified, in that he was to make an atonement for the sins of men, and with his own blood, as they with the blood of slain animals, enter into that holiest place of which the sanctuary was a figure, to perform his work of intercession in his Father's presence. But by the character of Melchizedek rather Christ's person was represented, his supreme dignity, his priestly kingship; just as we find it predicted that he, the 'Branch,' should be 'a priest upon his throne' (Zech. vi. 12, 13). Some have believed that in the bread and wine brought forth by Melchizedek the eucharistic symbols were prefigured. But great care must be taken not to press such interpretations too far. For some remarks on the relation of Abraham to Melchizedek, see Fairbairn's Typol. of Script., book ii. chap. vi. 5, vol. i. pp. 312-314.

MEL'COM (their king) (Jer. xlix. 1, 3, marg.). See MILCOM, MOLOCH.

MEL'EA (full, fulness?). One of our Lord's ancestors (Luke iii. 31).

ME'LECH (king). A descendant of king Saul (1 Chron. viii. 35, ix. 41).

MELI'CU (probably a corruption of Maluch, reigning) (Neh. xii. 14). See MALUCH, 4.

MEL'ITA. An island in the Mediterranean sea, on which the vessel in which St. Paul was being carried prisoner to Rome was wrecked (Acts xxviii. 1).

It is questioned whether this island is the present well-known Malta, or whether it is not rather Meleda in the gulf of Venice, which also bore anciently the name Melita. Many respectable writers have advocated the last-named opinion. Their principal reasons are these. The Melita of the Acts was in the sea called Adria. But this the sacred historian does not affirm. He simply says that the ship was 'driven up and down in [more properly driven through] Adria' (xxvii. 27); and, as it is admitted that the middle basin of the Mediterranean was called the sea of Adria, and that by authors hardly posterior to St. Luke, the argument is of little weight. They urge, further, that the islanders are called 'a barbarous people' (xxviii. 2); which appellation they think never would have been given, especially by a Jew, to the civilized inhabitants of Malta. But the word was used just as St. Paul uses it in Rom. i. 14: those who were not Greeks were barbarians. Besides, when people did not understand each other's speech, each would be a barbarian to the other (1 Cor. xiv. 11). It is also said that there are now no vipers in Malta, whereas in Meleda, a damp and wooded island (Acts xxviii. 3), they abound. The answer is that there is proof that Malta was anciently wooded, so that we cannot conclude from its present state that it did not anciently harbour vipers. Again the disorder, it is said, of the father of Publius (8) was not likely to be prevalent in a dry and rocky island like Malta. But it has just been observed that Malta was anciently well wooded: it was not, therefore, so dry a locality then. Once more, it is urged that the sailors could hardly have been ignorant where they were (xxvii. 39), if they were upon the coast of an island so well-known, so much in the way of navigators, as Malta. It may be rejoined that it is not surprising that they did not recognize a part of the coast some distance from the great harbour.

The reasons then against Malta are not sufficient. But there is what may be called positive proof in favour of it. Being off the south coast of Crete, at 'the Fair Havens,' a south wind would have carried the vessel to the harbour of Phenice (12, 13). But suddenly the wind Euroclydon, blowing nearly E.N.E., burst forth, driving them close to the island Clauda. Here they took up their boat, lowered their gear, and, fearing they should be driven to the Syrtis on the African coast (14-17), they brought up the ship to the starboard; and thus their course would be direct for Malta. Now from Clauda to the Maltese shore is 476 miles. Experienced naval men believe that a vessel under the circumstances described would drift about 36½ miles in 24 hours. In about 13 days and one hour the 476 miles would be run over. And St. Luke says it was the fourteenth night when they neared the coast (27). Further, there is a bay in the island of Malta, called St. Paul's bay, the traditional scene of the wreck, which exactly answers the description given by St. Luke. The soundings are the same, first 20 and then 15 fathoms (28) to a vessel coming in the direction supposed. Then there is a rocky shore on which they would have been driven, had they not anchored (29), which they could well do, there being good holding-ground there. There is, besides, a creek with a sandy beach (39) and a place of two seas (41). We can hardly imagine demonstration more complete. The whole matter has been carefully investigated by Mr. Smith of Jordanhill, from whose satisfactory volume, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 2nd edit. pp. 94, &c., 160, &c., the preceding observations have been condensed. The apostle performed some miraculous cures, experienced great kindness from the inhabitants, and left the island after a sojourn of three months (Acts xxviii. 7-11).

Malta lies to the south of Sicily, from the nearest point of which it is 58 miles distant. Its greatest length is 17½ miles; its greatest breadth, 9½. There are some other small islands in the group, of which Gozo is the largest. Valetta is the seat of government. Malta was colonized by the Phœnicians and afterwards by the Greeks. The Carthaginians obtained possession of it 402, and the Romans 242 B.C. In modern times it passed to the emperor Charles V., who in 1530 A.D. granted it in full sovereignty to the knights of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, lately expelled from Rhodes. They kept it till 1798, when it was surrendered to the French. The English obtained possession of it in 1800, and held it in military possession till 1814, when it was formally acknowledged a British dependency. The population is about 120,000.

MELON. The Israelites are said to have murmured for the melons which they had been used to eat in Egypt (Numb. xi. 5). These were most likely the water-melons, Cucurbita citrullus, called by the Arabs, with but a slight variation from the original Hebrew, bütteekh. Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 508) says that they abound in the neighbourhood of Em Khâlid to the north of Jaffa, whence vast quantities are taken by boat to Beirût, and other towns along the coast. The soil is dry and sandy, into which the plant thrusts its short root, water apparently being absorbed by the leaves at night; and the fruit is large and full of a most delicious juice.

It 'grows,' says Kitto (Pict. Bible, note on Numb. xi. 5), 'abundantly in the Levant and in Egypt. The fruit is about the size of the common pumpkin, which it very much resembles in appearance. The interior is a pulp of a blooming red, abounding with a copious irrigation of pellucid juice; and thus it becomes both meat and drink at the same time. A traveller in the east, who recollects the intense gratitude which the gift of a slice of melon inspired, while journeying over the hot and dry plains, or one who remembers the consciousness of wealth and security which he derived from the possession of a melon, while prepared for a day's journey over the same plains—he will readily comprehend the regret with which the Hebrews in the Arabian desert looked back upon the melons of Egypt.'

MEL'ZAR (master of wine, chief butler). An officer in the court of Babylon, specially charged with the care of Daniel and his three companions (Dan i. 11, 16). But the word is rather a title of office than a proper name.

MEMMIUS (2 Macc. xi. 34). A person called a Roman ambassador, who is said, with Manlius, to have written a letter to the Jews: see MANLIUS.

MEMPHIS (the place of Phtah, the place of the good god, i.e. Osiris). A very ancient and celebrated city of Egypt, called in Hebrew Moph (Hos. ix. 6, where in our version 'Memphis') and Noph (Isai. xix. 13; Jer. ii. 16; Ezek. xxx. 13, 16). It lay just at the northern end of the narrow Nile valley, on the left, i.e. the western, bank of the river. According to the tradition, Menes the founder obtained a site for his city by damming up a branch of the Nile and restraining the water to a new channel which he dug. Memphis was surrounded with mounds and embankments to protect it against the inundations of the river; and these served also for security against hostile attacks. It would seem to have been the capital of those Pharaohs who reigned in Lower Egypt in the times of the patriarchs; and it was their territory in which Abraham, Jacob, and the Israelitish tribes sojourned. Under Psammetichus this city became the metropolis of the whole of Egypt, and it grew and flourished as the southern Thebes declined. Under Persian rule, and the government of the Ptolemies, Memphis (the centre of the Memphitic nome or province) continued the chief city; but the foundation of Alexandria was fatal to its prosperity. Even in Strabo's time, though still large and populous, many of its great buildings were falling into decay. And, when at length Cairo rose in its neighbourhood, Memphis rapidly declined, and its site is now only marked by ruins near the village of Minyet Rahineh or Mitraheny.

In the time of its prosperity Memphis must have been a noble city, 150 stadia in circuit. Among its noticeable buildings was a famous temple of Phtah (corresponding to the classical Vulcan); and Apis is said to have been specially honoured here. His temple also was one of the most noted structures of the city. There was besides a Serapeion or temple of Serapis, in which the sacred cubit and other symbols used for measuring the inundations of the river were kept.

Interior of tomb. Sarcophagus, containing mummy of sacred bull.

Memphis was a busy city. Various manufactures were successfully carried on here.

That of glass was particularly celebrated; and its products highly valued at Rome. From the acacia trees in the neighbourhood planks, and masts of boats, handles of weapons, and various articles of furniture were constructed.

MEMU'CAN (dignified? reducer?). One of the princes at the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 14, 16, 21).

MEN'AHM (consoler). The son of Gadi, who, having slain Shallum king of Israel, reigned in his stead ten years, 771-760 B.C. He was an ungodly and cruel king. In his reign Pul king of Assyria came against the land; but Menahem obtained his protection by the payment of a thousand talents of silver (2 Kings xv. 14-22).

MEN'AN. One of our Lord's ancestors (Luke iii. 31).

MENE', MENE', TE'KEL, UPHAR'SIN (numbered, numbered, weighed, and dividing). The inscription which the awful hand traced upon the wall in Belshazzar's sight, whilst he was carousing with his nobles. None of his wise men could interpret the words. They might indeed see what was written, but they could not attach a meaning thereto, or understand the prognostication. But, when Daniel was brought in, divinely instructed he read the mystic characters, assigned the prophetic meaning to every word, and showed the impious prince that his doom was pronounced. And 'on that night was Belshazzar king of the Chaldeans slain' (Dan. v.). See BELSHAZZAR. Peres, it may be added, is the same with Upharsin; the last word being the participle active plural with the copulative conjunction, the former the participle passive.

MENELA'US (2 Macc. iv. 23-50, v. 5, 15, 23, xiii. 3, 4). An usurping high priest, who purchased the dignity from Antiochus Epiphanes 172 B.C., but was ultimately put to death by Antiochus Eupator about 163 B.C.

MENES'THEUS (2 Macc. iv. 21). MENI' (fate, fortune, possibly the planet Venus). This has been supposed to be the name of an idol, worshipped together with Gad (see GAD, 3) by the Jews in Babylonia (Isai. lxxv. 11, marg.). And it would seem that there was an idol of nearly the same name which the Arabian tribes between Mecca and Medina adored under the figure of a stone: see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Meni.' But Henderson believes that the reference is rather to the worldly Jews of the restoration than to the time of the captivity. Such persons acknowledged no god but riches, and regarded human affairs as governed by chance. The prophet, therefore, having denounced those who made a libation (as Jerome says the Egyptians did on the last day of the year, viz. a table of provision and a cup of sweet wine with water) to destiny, declares by an elegant paronomasia, 'I will even destine you to the sword.' See Henderson, Isaiah, p. 462. So Ewald translates, '... und der Bestimmung Mischtrank einschenkt, euch bestimme ich dem Schwerte' (Die Proph. des A. B., vol. ii. p. 481).

MEN-STEALER. Kidnapping or reducing men to slavery was strictly forbidden by the Mosaic law (Exod. xxi. 16 Deut. xxiv. 7: comp. 1 Tim. i. 10). See SERVANT.

MENU'CHA (Jer. ii. 59, marg.). See SERAIAH.

MENU'CHAH (rest, ease) (Judges xx. 43, marg.). The meaning is substantially that given in the text, quietly, without tumult.

MENU'CHITES (1 Chron. ii. 52, marg.). See HATSI-HAMMENCHOTH, MANAHE-THITES.

MEO'NENIM. This word occurs as a proper name in our version of Judges ix. 37: in the margin, however, it is translated. It might be more justly rendered 'the oak of the diviners'; probably some tree, under or in connection with which divination had been practised.

MEO'NOTHAI (my dwellings). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 14).

MEPHA'ATH (splendour, perhaps lofty place). A city in the territory of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), afterwards assigned to the Levites (xxi. 37; 1 Chron. vi. 79). It was at a later period in the possession of the Moabites (Jer. xlvi. 21).

MEPHIBO'SHETH (extermination of idols).—1. A son of Jonathan, called also Merib-baal (1 Chron. viii. 34, ix. 40). He was five years old at the time of the catastrophe of Gilboa, when his nurse fled away with him, but stumbled and caused him thereby an incurable lameness. After some years, David, finding that Jonathan's son yet lived, restored to him the family possessions, and granted Mephibosheth a constant place at the royal table. On Absalom's rebellion, Mephibosheth remained at Jerusalem, and, according to his servant Ziba's statement, hoped that the convulsions of the time might pave the way for his accession to the throne. David, therefore, instantly confiscated his estates. But, on the king's return to Jerusalem, Mephibosheth met him with marks of mourning, which he declared he had shown throughout the rebellion, and said that Ziba's accusation was untrue. It is evident, however, that David was not altogether satisfied; for, though he revoked the decree of confiscation, he made Mephibosheth and Ziba equal shareholders in the estates (2 Sam. iv. 4, ix., xvi. 1-4, xix. 24-30, xxi. 7).—2. One of the sons of Saul by his concubine Rizpah, delivered by David into the hands of the Gibeonites, and hanged by them (3, 9).

ME'RAB (increase). The eldest daughter of Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 49), promised to David, but given to Adriel in marriage (xviii. 17, 19).

MERAI'AH (rebellion against Jehovah). A priest in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 12).

MERAI'OTH (rebellions).—1. A priest in the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. vi. 6, 7, 52; Ezra vii. 3).—2. Another priest of the same line (1 Chron. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11).—3. One of those priests who went to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (xii. 15): he is called also Meremoth (3).

ME'ERAN (Bar. iii. 23). Some country, it is uncertain what, through or from which caravans of merchants passed.

MERA'RI (bitter, unhappy). One of the sons of Levi, and head of a great family of the tribe (Gen. xlv. 11; Exod. vi. 16, 19; 1 Chron. vi. 1, 16).

MERA'RI (Judith viii. 1, xvi. 7). The father of Judith.

MERA'RITES. A family of Levi, descendants of Merari (Numb. xxvi. 57). When the census was taken in the wilderness, the number of their males above a month old was 6,200, of those between thirty and fifty 3,200 (iii. 34, iv. 44). They were divided into two great families, the Mahlites and the Mushites (iii. 33), and they were to pitch on the north side of the tabernacle. Ethan or Jeduthun was an eminent Merarite. To this family was entrusted the care of the boards, bars, pillars of the tabernacle, and their appurtenances, with the pillars, sockets, pins, and cords of the surrounding court (iii. 33-37, iv. 29-33, vii. 8). When Israel entered Canaan, twelve cities in the territories of Reuben, Gad, and Zebulun were allotted to the sons of Merari (Josh. xxi. 7, 34-39; 1 Chron. vi. 63, 77-81; there being, however, some variation in the accounts). There are notices of them in later times in 44-47, xxiv. 26-30, xxv. 3, xxvi. 10, 11; 2 Chron. xxix. 12, xxxiv. 12; Ezra viii. 18, 19.

MERATHA'IM (double rebellion). The 'land of Merathaim' is a symbolic name for Babylonia (Jer. l. 21); or, possibly it is to be taken literally, land of double rebellion, that in which first the Assyrians and then the Babylonians oppressed God's people.

MERCHANT. The word very generally used for merchants signifies those who travel about for the purpose of trading (Gen. xxiii. 16, xxxvii. 28; Ezek. xxvii. 21, 36). So we have 'the king's merchants' (1 Kings x. 28; 2 Chron. i. 16), those who made journeys in order to purchase merchandise for the king. The term is also used of voyagers, traders by sea (Prov. xxxi. 14; Isai. xlvi. 2; Ezek. xxxviii. 13). Trade was generally carried on in early times by travelling caravans. See COMMERCE.

MERCURIUS, identical with the Greek Hermes (the speaker). One of the heathen deities fabled to be the son of Jupiter and Maia. He was supposed to preside over eloquence and merchandise, and to be the messenger of the gods. Barnabas and Paul were taken by the people at Lystra for Jupiter and Mercury (Acts xv. 11-13). Ovid has a story of these two deities wandering in the adjacent country of Phrygia (Metam., lib. viii. 626, 627).

MERCY. A blessed attribute of God, which he wonderfully showed in not permitting man's fall to be irrevocably fatal, but devising a means whereby, without violence to his justice, sinners might be forgiven (Exod. xx. 6, xxxiv. 6, 7). To accomplish this the great work of redemption was effected by the Lord Jesus Christ (Gen. iii. 15; John iii. 16). It is in Christ that mercy and truth meet together, righteousness and peace embrace each other (Psal. lxxxv. 10); and mercy is now extended to guilty men who approach God through faith in Jesus. There is no limitation. The blood of Jesus Christ can cleanse from all sin (1 John i. 7). Mercy also is a Christian grace, which Christ's followers must cultivate (Matt. v. 7; Eph. iv. 32).

MERCY-SEAT. The cover or lid of the ark of the covenant; it was to be made of gold, two cubits and a-half in length and a cubit and a half broad. At the two ends were to be cherubim of beaten gold, their faces looking towards each other, and their wings stretching forth to cover the lid over which rested the visible glory of God, who was thus said to dwell between the cherubim (Exod. xxv. 17-22, xxx. 6, xxxi. 7, xxxvii. 6-9; 1 Chron. xxviii. 11; 2 Chron. v. 7, 8; Psal. lxxx. 1, xcix. 1). Upon the mercy-seat and before the mercy-seat the high-priest was to sprinkle the blood of the sin-offerings on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 11-16). The Hebrew word for mercy-seat is derived from a verb signifying to 'cover' sin, i.e. do it away by some expiatory act, the idea implied being that of atonement. And the Septuagint translators have rendered it by a Greek word denoting 'propitiatory,' the propitiation taking place upon it. The author of the epistle to the Hebrews adopts this word (Heb. ix. 5); and the same is used in Rom. iii. 25; a kindred word being found in 1 John ii. 2, iv. 10. The blood of Christ is of propitiatory virtue, so that through faith in him men may come boldly to the throne of grace, the mercy-seat of heaven (Heb. iv. 16).

ME'RED (rebellion). A descendant of Judah, who married (at what date we know not) Bithiah, Pharaoh's daughter (1 Chron. iv. 17, 18).

MERE'MOTH (heights).—1. A priest after the captivity (Ezra viii. 33), who helped in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4, 21).—2. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 36).—3. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel, whose descendant or representative sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 5, xii. 3): he is called Meraioth in 15.

MERE'MOTH (1 Esdr. viii. 2). Meraioth (Ezra vii. 3).

ME'RES (worthy). One of the seven princes at the Persian court (Esth. i. 14).

MER'IBAH (strife).—1. One of the names given by Moses to the place where a fountain of water issued from the rock. This was in the desert of Sin; and the place was called Massah because the people tempted the Lord, and Meribah because they strove with Moses (Exod. xvii. 1-7).—2. Another place near Kadesh where, many years after, water was also miraculously produced, named for a similar reason. This was in the desert of Zin (Numb. xx. 13, 24). It was on this last occasion that Moses and Aaron were guilty of the fault for which they were excluded from Canaan. In order to distinguish the two, the last-named place is generally called the 'water' or 'waters of Meribah' (xxvii. 14; Deut. xxxii. 51, xxxiii. 8; Psal. lxxxi. 7, cvl. 32; Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28, where Meribah-kadesh, marg.). In Psal. xcv. 8 the word is translated 'provocation,' and Massah 'temptation.'

MERIB'-BAAL (contender against Baal). (1 Chron. viii. 34, ix. 40). See MEPHIBOSHETH.

MER'ODACH (death, slaughter, according to some, little man, in endearment). A Babylonian idol (Jer. l. 2), sometimes identified with the planet Mars, to which, as being the god of blood and slaughter, human sacrifices were offered. The honour in which this deity was held is illustrated by the fact that the names of several Assyrian and Babylonian monarchs were compounded with Merodach; as Merodach-baladan, Evil-merodach, mentioned in scripture. The names Bel or Bil and Merodach are sometimes coupled as denoting a single god, who appears to have been worshipped sometimes under one title, sometimes, with perhaps a difference of attributes, under the other. Rawlinson believes that Bel-merodach corresponds to the Greek Zeus or Jupiter, the great source of power and blessing, and also identifies him astronomically with the planet Jupiter.

MER'ODACH-BAL'ADAN (Merodach, worshipper of Bel?). A king of Babylon who sent ambassadors to Hezekiah after his sickness, to enquire of the wonder (the shadow receding on the dial) that had been done (2 Chron. xxxii. 31; Isai. xxxix. 1). In 2 Kings xx. 12 the name is Berodach-baladan. This king appears to have been the Mardocempalus of Ptolemy. He reigned from 721 B.C. for twelve years, and then was dethroned and banished by Sargon. In about seven years, however, he obtained power again, and reigned for six months, but was dethroned a second time by Sennacherib: his sons and grandsons made head against the Assyrian supremacy down to the time of Esar-haddon.

ME'ROM (height). The name of a lake through which the Jordan runs in the higher part of its course. It was by 'the waters of Merom' that Joshua encountered and crushed the confederacy of the northern tribes of Canaan (Josh. xi. 5, 7). The lake is not again mentioned in scripture; but we know that many events of importance—the victory of Abraham, the seizing of Laish by the Danites, the death of Sheba at Joab's demand—must have occurred in its neighbourhood. By Josephus it is called Samechonitis (Bell. Jud., lib. iv. 1, § 1): it is now the Hüleh. To the north of it is a marshy plain, through which various tributary streams which form the Jordan permeate. The lake itself is, according to Porter (Handbook for Syria, vol. ii. p. 435), about  $4\frac{1}{2}$  miles long, and  $3\frac{1}{2}$  broad across the north end, but it runs to a point southward, where the Jordan leaves it. The plain and marsh above are about 10 miles square. Dr. Thomson describes the Hüleh, both plain and lake, as of unrivalled beauty, but solitary, and the access to the water somewhat difficult: 'It is quite impossible to get to the lake except on the east side and along the south-western shore. From the utter desertion of this region it has become the favourite resort of water-fowl; and they have it all to themselves. No boat is ever seen on the tranquil bosom of the Hüleh: no hunter disturbs them here. The plain down to the exit of the Jordan is level as a floor; and much of it is carpeted with the softest richest sward in all the east. One feels tempted to leap from the saddle, and gambol and roll about on it like a little child. The lake ends in a triangular marsh, the largest part of which is on the eastern bank of the river. It is an impenetrable jungle of ordinary cane, mingled with that peculiar kind called dabeer, from whose stems the Arabs make coarse mats for the walls and roofs of their huts. This cane is the prominent and distinctive production of these marshes, both at the north and south end of the lake. . . It imparts a singular appearance to the whole marsh, as if ten thousand thousand brooms were waving over it. Through this jungle the Jordan creeps sluggishly for half a mile, and then glides tranquilly between green sloping banks for another mile to Isir Benât Yâkôb. . . The Hûleh, plain, marsh, lake, and surrounding mountains, is the finest hunting-ground in Syria. . . Panthers and leopards, bears and wolves, jackals, hyænas, and foxes, and many other animals are found, great and small, while it is the very paradise of the wild boar, and the fleet gazelle. As to water-fowl, it is scarcely an exaggeration to affirm that the lower end of the lake is absolutely covered with them in the winter and spring. Here only have I seen the pelican of the wilderness' (The Land and the Book, pp. 259, 260).

MERONOTHITE. A designation given to Jehdeiah and Jadon (1 Chron. xxvii. 30; Neh. iii. 7): it is not known whence derived.

ME'ROZ (refuge?). A place in the north of Palestine, whose inhabitants refused to join Barak against the host of Sisera (Judges v. 23). It has not been identified.

MERUTH (1 Esdr. v. 24). Immer (Ezra ii. 37).

ME'SECH (Psal. cxx. 5). See MESHECH, 1.

ME'SHA (deliverance).—1. A king of Moab, who, having been tributary to Israel, rebelled after the death of Ahab. He was attacked and besieged by Jehoram in alliance with Jehoshaphat (2 Kings iii. 4-27). The account of the sacrifice he offered has been variously interpreted. According to Keil, the king of Moab offered his own son; and the besiegers, fearing the anger of God which they had incurred by giving occasion to a human sacrifice, retreated to their own country (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 363, 364).—2. A son of Caleb the brother of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 42). See MARESHAH.

ME'SHA (retreat). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 9).

ME'SHA (id., or middle district). A place mentioned as the boundary of the settlements of Joktan's descendants, 'from Mesha unto Sephar (and beyond to), the mountains of Arabia' (Gen. x. 30). Before the Tigris reaches the Persian gulf, it divides at the confluence of the Karun (Pasatigris) and the Shat-al-Arab, into two branches, enclosing the island Mesene. This is Mesha; and the boundary extends from the north-western point of the Persian gulf towards Sephar (see SEPHAR) to the south-west till it reaches that range of peaks, 'the mountain of the east,' which is known as the mountains of Nejd, intersecting central Arabia, from the vicinity of Mecca and Medina to the Persian gulf (Kalisch, Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., p. 283). Or Mesha may be the western limit of the tribes of Joktan, the modern Moosa.

ME'SHACH (guest of the king, or, as some suppose, ram). The Chaldee name of Mishaël, one of the young Jews captive with Daniel in Babylon (Dan. i. 7, ii. 49, iii. 12-30).

ME'SHECH (a drawing out, possession). 1. A son of Japheth (Gen. x. 2; 1 Chron. i. 5). His descendants were the Moschi, a Colchian people, whose territory extended along the south-eastern shores of the Black sea, between the sources of the Phasis and those of the Cyrus, and was bounded on the south by the wooded chain of high Armenian mountains now called Tehildir. Meshech and Tubal are frequently mentioned together, forming a part of the great Scythian dominion: they may be considered as representing the whole region of northern Armenia, from the sources of the Tigris and the Euphrates to the Black sea (Ezek. xxxii. 26, xxxviii. 2, 3, xxxix. 1). They are described as trading in the Tyrian markets with copper and slaves (xxvii. 13). See TUBAL. In Psal. cxx. 5 Meshech or Mesech appears to be used figuratively for a heathen or ungodly people.—2 (1 Chron. i. 17). See MASH.

MESHELEMI'AH (whom Jehovah repays, or treats as his friend). One of the Levite porters (1 Chron. ix. 21, xxvi. 1, 2, 9): in xxvi. 14 he is called Shelemiah.

MESHEZAB'EEL (delivered of God).—1. The grandfather of one (Meshullam) who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4).—2. A person who sealed the covenant (x. 21).—3. A descendant of Judah (xi. 24); perhaps identical with No. 2.

MESHIL'LEMITH (those who repay) (1 Chron. ix. 12), called also Meshillemoth (Neh. xi. 13).

MESHIL'LEMOTH (id.).—1. An Ephraimite (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).—2. A priest of the course of Immer (Neh. xi. 13) called also (1 Chron. ix. 12) Meshillemith.

MESHO'BAB (returned): A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 34).

MESHUL'LAM (friend, i. e. of God).—1. The grandfather of Shaphan the scribe in Josiah's reign (2 Kings xxii. 3).—2. One of the sons of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 19).—3. A descendant of Gad (v. 13).—4. A Benjamite chief (viii. 17).—5. Another Benjamite (ix. 7), probably identical with the one mentioned in Neh. xi. 7.—6. Another, also a Benjamite (1 Chron. ix. 8).—7. One in the line of the high priests (11; Neh. xi. 11) called also Shallum (1 Chron. vi. 12, 13; Ezra vii. 2).—8. A priest (1 Chron. ix. 12).—9. A Kohathite Levite in the time of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12).—10. A chief man whom Ezra sent to prevail on Levites to join his caravan (Ezra viii. 16).—11. One who helped Ezra in the enquiry as to unlawful marriages (x. 15): he may be identical with No. 10.—12. A person who had married a foreign wife (29).—13. One who joined in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4, 30, vi. 18).—14. Another who so helped (iii. 6).—15. One who assisted Ezra in the reading of the law (viii. 4).—16. A priest who sealed the covenant (x. 7).—17. A chief of the people who also sealed (20).—18, 19. Two priests in the days of Joiakim (xii. 13, 16).—20. A Levite porter (25).—21. One who took a part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (33).

MESHUL'LEMETH (id. fem.). The mother of king Amon (2 Kings xxi. 19).

MESO'BAITE. A designation given to Jasiel, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 47); its origin is unknown.

MESOPOTAMIA (in the midst of rivers). A country deriving its name from its position between the great rivers Euphrates and Tigris.

In its largest extent it must be considered as comprehending the region from 31° to 38° 20' north latitude, and from 39° 20' to 47° 30' east longitude, about 700 miles in length, but of a very variable breadth from 20 to 240 or 250. From its being so nearly surrounded by rivers it is now called by the Arabs Al-Jezirah, the island. In the upper part it is mountainous; but the rest of the country is a great plain intersected about the centre by the Sinjar hills, a chain running east and west. Above this range the plain is elevated, and in spring is covered with verdure, though parched in summer; while among the hills the land is cultivated and fertile, and supports a considerable population. The southern plain is alluvial, little above the level of the rivers, by which it is frequently overflowed. It might, however, be easily drained and made again by human labour the garden it once was. The ruins of great cities scattered over the surface testify to the vastness of the ancient population. The Greek name Mesopotamia does not appear to have been given to this country till after the Macedonian conquest.

It is the north-western part of the region just described which is supposed to be the Mesopotamia of scripture, a rich and pleasant country, extending as far southward as the river Khabour; the land where Abraham's kindred dwelt (Gen. xxiv. 10), a district of which was called Padan-aram, whither Jacob fled to the city of Haran (xxviii. 5, 7, xxix. 4); the country from which Balaam came (Deut. xxiii. 4); whose king, Chushan-rishathaim, oppressed Israel (Judges iii. 8-10); and from whence troops were hired to oppose David (1 Chron. xix. 6: comp. Psal. lx. title). This country became afterwards part of the Assyrian and then of the Babylonian empire. It was subject to the Persian kings: conquered by Alexander, it was subsequently ruled by the Syrian monarchs, and in later times was alternately under Roman and Parthian sway, till ultimately relinquished to the Parthian or Persian rule. Of the most noted cities in Mesopotamia there may be mentioned Orfa, Harran, Nisibin, and Diar-beker, believed to be the ancient Ur, Haran, Nisibis, and Amida.

But it must be said that it is very questionable whether this Mesopotamia is the land so called in our version of the Old Testament. The Hebrew name is Aram-naharaim, 'Syria of the two rivers.' And there are reasons which make it probable that this region lay not far from Damascus, between the rivers which watered that country. Stephen appears to distinguish Charran or Haran from Mesopotamia, the country described above (Acts vii. 2, 4); and it is simply impossible that Jacob, obliged to travel slowly with his great caravan (Gen. xxiii. 13, 14), could have hurried from beyond the Euphrates to Gilead, a distance of not much less than 400 miles, in ten days (xxxi. 20-23). Either there is an error in the number of days mentioned, or Haran was nearer to Gilead. It may be further said that it is more reasonable to suppose Chushan-rishathaim a neighbouring chief than a sovereign far away beyond the Euphrates. The conclusion, therefore, of Dr. Beke, who believes that he has found Haran close to Damascus, is not unreasonable. See HARAN.

MESSENGER. See FOOTMAN, FORE-RUNNER.

MESSIAH. A Hebrew word signifying 'anointed,' identical in meaning with the Greek Christos, used as the peculiar designation of that Great One, for whom the world was long taught to look, and who in the fulness of the time appeared, God's Son made of a woman (Gal. iv. 4). In the Old Testament the word is with scarcely an exception translated in our version. And it is needless to say that used in its literal sense it is frequently applied to persons set apart by unction for some official duty—kings, for example, who are called the Lord's anointed (e.g. 1 Sam. xxiv. 6; Lam. iv. 20). It was also extended sometimes to those who metaphorically were anointed, that is, peculiarly honoured and regarded as God's own chosen ones, as the patriarchs (Psal. cv. 15).

But there is evidently a series of predictions running through almost the whole of the Old Testament, specially referring to one individual person—not styled indeed at first the anointed or Messiah, but who gradually came to have this attribute assigned him, till the expectation of the Jews based upon these old prophecies agreed so to call the coming Deliverer. It was consequently the great object of the gospel to vindicate the claim of Jesus to the Messiahship, by affording proof that he was the One to whom the finger of prophecy pointed. Of course he was not termed ordinarily Christ, while yet there were questionings as to his right to be so considered (John i. 20, 25, 41, iv. 29, 42, vi. 69, vii. 26, 41, 42, and elsewhere). But, when this truth was fully established, and the disciples continually asserted it (Acts ix. 22, xviii. 28), then the name was applied, as it still is, to the Lord Jesus almost as a surname.

Jesus repeatedly declared that Moses and the prophets wrote of him (Luke xxiv. 44; John v. 46). And so we find that just after the fall a cheering assurance was given of a Seed of the woman who should bruise the serpent's head (Gen. iii. 15). This promise was taken up and made more particular by the declaration that in Abraham and his seed all the families of the earth should be blessed (xii. 3, xxii. 18). Afterwards it became yet more defined in Jacob's prophetic blessing upon Judah (xlix. 10): it is embodied in Balaam's remarkable prediction (Numb. xxiv. 17), and is repeated as the coming of a prophet by Moses to the Israelites in the wilderness (Deut. xviii. 15, 18), and by Nathan to David as the establishing of his throne for ever (2 Sam. vii. 16). It is impossible to give here even an outline of similar predictions scattered thickly through the sacred books, some in special terms speaking of the coming One's being anointed: a few references only can be noted. See Psal. ii., xvi., xxii., xl., xlv., cx.; Isai. vii. 10-16, ix. 1-7, xi., xliii., liiii., lxi.; Jer. xxiii. 5, 6; Mic. v. 2; Mal. iii. 1-4. These and similar predictions had raised in the Jewish mind a firm persuasion that One should come, to be of the lineage of David, and to be born in Beth-lehem. The people generally looked for him: the more devoted humbly waited for the consolation of Israel. And it may be well to remark, as bearing upon the date of a prophecy to be almost immediately referred to, that the most eager and general expectation of his speedy appearance was not in Maccabean times, but in a later age—just, in fact at the time when Jesus was born. Modern writers have chosen to deny the applicability of some of the passages referred to, and have described the expectation of the Jews as based upon mere vague longings after a time of restoration. But, if we are to believe our Lord himself and the first expounders of his religion, they were definite prophecies (Matt. xxvi. 54; Mark ix. 12; Luke xviii. 31, xxii. 37; John v. 39; Acts ii. 16-31, xxvi. 22, 23; Eph. iv. 8; 1 Pet. i. 11). And, seeing that there is such a particularity in many of these predictions, as to the place of Messiah's birth, the family from which he should descend, the treatment he should meet with, &c., it is for objectors to explain how, if there were no real prophecy, but merely general anticipations, all these should converge to a special point and a definite time, awakening not merely the firm hopes of the Jewish nation, but spreading from them into the Gentile world (see Auberlen, Der Proph. Daniel und die Offenb. Johann's, pp. 147, 148), and should have had such a marked correspondence with the history of Jesus. The theory broached by some, that Jesus persuaded himself that the scriptures testified of him, and skilfully appropriated some particular expressions and descriptions, involves when fairly investigated far greater difficulties than the orthodox faith of the church that he 'was made man, and was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate: he suffered and was buried, and the third day he rose again according to the scriptures.'

There is one remarkable prediction not hitherto referred to, of which some notice must be here taken—the seventy weeks of the prophet Daniel (Dan. ix. 24-27). Certain critics dispute the authority of the book of Daniel, and believe it the production of a later age. Of this nothing more shall now be said, than that it is highly improbable that a Maccabean writer (for to that date, the composition, if not genuine, is to be attributed) would have introduced such a prophecy, not in accordance with the expectation of his times—the matter has been already discussed: see DANIEL, THE BOOK OF. And very discordant are the interpretations assigned to the passage. Of course those who discredit the authority of the book are obliged to deny the application to Jesus; and consequently some have reckoned backwards and some forwards, every way, any way but that which, to say nothing of sound criticism, common sense could approve.

Now it is obviously impossible to attempt a sketch of these different interpretations, and to discuss their respective merits, for which a considerable book would scarcely afford room. It must be enough to point out what the plain reading of the prophecy demands, and then to state briefly what facts appear adequately to fulfil it.

A period of seventy weeks—weeks of years—is named. They are to commence from a commandment or permission to restore and re-edify Jerusalem. They are divided into three parts, seven weeks, sixty-two weeks, and one week. At the close of the sixty-two weeks Messiah is to appear in the middle of the succeeding one week the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; and that week is to end with the establishment of everlasting righteousness. Dr. Goode, in his lately-published Warburtonian lectures, Fulfilled Prophecy, has elaborately investigated the question (note, pp. 276-316). Adopting substantially the same view with Auberlen (ubi supr. pp. 125, &c.), he takes as the starting-point the decree of Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ezra vii.), issued in the fifth month and seventh year of his reign. This was a decree just according with the description in Daniel. It may be supposed to have been issued January 457 B.C. Jerusalem was restored: the walls were rebuilt; and the state re-established in troublous times; and about forty-nine years (seven weeks) elapsed while under Ezra and Nehemiah the affairs of the Jews were administered and settled. If 434 years (sixty-two weeks) be added, we are brought to January 27 A.D., which Dr. Goode, placing the birth of our Lord about the end of the year 5 B.C., supposes would be the epoch of his baptism, that is his entrance on his public ministry, his appearance in an official capacity to Israel. In the middle of the week, somewhat upwards of three years more, we arrive at his crucifixion, when, by the offering of the true sacrifice, the figurative oblation had its real end. And at the close of the week, on the martyrdom of Stephen, December 33, or January 34 A.D., the gospel fully established was set forth in its glorious power of having made an end of iniquity, not to Jews only, but to those who had been aliens from the commonwealth of Israel (Acts viii. 1, 4). For the proofs of these positions the reader must be referred to Dr. Goode's book: only the outline, as before said, can be here given.

MESSIAS (John i. 41, iv. 25). The Greek form of Messiah.

METALS, METALLURGY. The procuring and use and working of metals must have been known in the very early ages of the world (Gen. iv. 22). Some account of these arts have already been given: see HANDICRAFT, pp. 352, 353. And notices will be found of the metals mentioned in scripture under their respective headings. But it may be well to offer here a compendious general view of the metallurgy of the Hebrews, mentioning the metals with which they were acquainted, and the sources from which these were obtained. Such a view there is in the Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Jan. 1862, pp. 257, 258, to which the reader may be referred.

Gold is the most precious of the metals. The first mention of it is in the description of Eden (Gen. ii. 11, 12), where it is said that the land of Havilah yields 'good' gold; the purity and plentifulness of the metal varying in the different localities from which it was obtained, viz. Ophir (Job xxii. 24, xxviii. 16; Psal. xlv. 9, and elsewhere), Parvaim (2 Chron. iii. 6), Sheba and Raamah (1 Kings x. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 22). These countries were doubtless South Africa, Arabia, and India. And it is very possible that, as Spain produced gold, some of the production of that land might be had at Tarshish. Gold was used for sacred utensils, furniture, in gilding and overlaying, in the manufacture of ornaments, &c. But, though it is early reckoned among the riches of a wealthy man (Gen. xiii. 2), it does not appear to have been till much later times employed as we now employ it, for money.

Silver is first spoken of in Abraham's days, in the place just noted, and elsewhere (e.g. xx. 16). Though not made into coin, it was used in commerce, apparently by weight, for bargain and sale (xxiii. 15, 16). It was also employed for furniture, sacred utensils, and ornaments (Exod. xii. 35, xxv. 3, xxvi. 19, 21, 25; Numb. vii. 84, 85, x. 2). In Solomon's days, so great was the wealth that poured into Israel, silver was little valued (1 Kings x. 21). This metal was obtained generally from the same countries which supplied gold, also from Lydia, Thrace, perhaps Egypt and Lebanon. It is mentioned as an article of commerce between Tarshish and Phœnicia (Ezek. xxvii. 12).

Iron was known to the antediluvians (Gen. iv. 22). This metal does not appear to have been so extensively used by the Hebrews as copper; and indeed doubts have been entertained whether it was really known in very early times; the word so translated being supposed to intend some other metal. But such doubts have been set at rest by modern discoveries; as iron articles have been found at Nineveh, and Egyptian paintings unmistakably prove its use in Egypt. It is mentioned in Lev. xxvi. 19; Job xx. 24, and elsewhere. Steel is also spoken of, e.g. in 2 Sam. xxii. 35; Jer. xv. 12. But the word so rendered is that elsewhere translated brass, signifying probably copper. The Tyrians had iron from Spain and Arabia (Ezek. xxvii. 12, 19). It has also been procured in Lebanon round Hashbeiya, in the Hauran, in Arabia: an ancient iron-working has been discovered in Egypt; also there was an 'iron mountain' west of the Jordan (Joseph., Bell. Jud., lib. iv. 8, § 2); and Kurdistan, Pontus, Cappadocia, &c., would supply it.

Copper was early discovered. The word ordinarily translated 'brass' in our version, though sometimes denoting bronze; certainly often means copper (Gen. iv. 22-Deut. viii. 9, and elsewhere). It was extensively diffused through Greece, Asia Minor, Syria near Aleppo, the Arabian desert, the peninsula of Sinai, and other countries (Ezek. xxvii. 13), and, as a means was known of hardening it, doubtless by some alloy, it was in very common use for utensils, weapons, &c.

Lead is first mentioned in Exod. xv. 10. It was probably used in solder, for refining, for inscriptions, by pouring the molten metal into the cavities made by graving letters on stone (Job xix. 24), and no doubt for weights (see Zech. v. 7, 8). The Tyrians had it from Tarshish (Ezek. xxvii. 12); and it might also be procured in Lebanon, Sinai, the country between the Nile and the Red sea, Kurdistan, &c.

Tin is spoken of in Numb. xxxi. 22; Isai. i. 25; Ezek. xxvii. 12. It is very possible that the supply at Tyre from Tarshish might be obtained originally from Britain.

Of mercury the scriptures do not say anything. Cinnabar is said to exist near Hashbeiya. The knowledge of antimony has been inferred from 2 Kings ix. 30.

Thus it will appear that the Hebrews were acquainted with the principal metals; but that they drew their supplies mainly from other countries, specially by means of Phœnician commerce. The mineral wealth of Syria and Palestine seems to have been less developed than that of districts so near as the Sinaitic peninsula. Yet mining operations are alluded to (Job xxviii. 1-11); and there must have been considerable knowledge of the processes of smelting the ore, calcining, refining, founding, graving, &c. (Exod. xx. 5, xxxii. 2-4, 20; Isai. i. 25, xl. 19, 20, xlv. 12; Mal. iii. 3). See for further information Napier's Ancient Workers and Artificers in Metal, 1856.

METHERUS (1 Esdr. v. 17).

METH'EG-AM'MAH (bride of the metropolis). Gesenius does not consider this a proper name. There is an Arabic proverb, 'I give thee not my bride,' i.e. I do not subject myself to thee. Hence the meaning of the sacred writer may be, David took the bride of the mother-city (probably Gath) out of the hand of the Philistines (2 Sam. viii. 1); i.e. he subdued the metropolis of the Philistines. The parallel passage (1 Chron. xviii. 1) would seem to confirm this view: David 'took Gath and her towns out of the hand of the Philistines.'

METHU'SAEL (man of God). One of the descendants of Cain (Gen. iv. 18).

METHU'SELAH (man of the dart). One of the antediluvian patriarchs: he was the son of Enoch and grandfather of Noah, and died, according to the ordinary computation, in the year of the deluge, aged 969 (Gen. v. 21-27; 1 Chron. i. 3).

MEU'NIM (habitations) (Neh. vii. 52). See MEHUNIM.

MEU'ZAL (Ezek. xxvii. 19, marg.). It is questionable whether or no this is a proper name. Gesenius would translate it 'something spun,' i.e. thread, yarn; and De Wette agrees. But most critics, altering a vowel of the Hebrew word (for which there is some authority), translate 'from Uzal,' which is the ancient name of Sanaa, the metropolis of Yemen. See UZAL.

ME'ZAHAB (waters, i.e. lustre, of gold). The grandfather of Mehetabel wife of Hadar, a king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 39; 1 Chron. i. 50).

MI'AMIN (from the right hand).—1. One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 25).—2. A priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 5). He is also called Mijamin (x. 70), and Miniamin (xii. 17, 41).

MIB'HAR (choicest). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 38).

MIB'SAM (sweet odour).—1. One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13; 1 Chron. i. 29).—2. A descendant of Simeon (v. 25).

MIB'ZAR (a fortress). One of the dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 42; 1 Chron. i. 53).

MICAH (who like Jehovah?).—1. A man of mount Ephraim who set up images in his house, and hired a wandering Levite to be his priest. All were stolen from him by a troop of lawless Danites (Judges xvii., xviii.). This transaction must have occurred in early times, as there is reason to believe that the Levite was the grandson, at least no distant descendant, of Moses.—2. One of Reuben's posterity (1 Chron. v. 5).—3. The son of Mephibosheth (viii. 34, 35, ix. 40, 41): he is called Micha in 2 Sam. ix. 12.—4. A Levite of the family of Asaph (1 Chron. ix. 15), called Micha in Neh. xi. 17, 22, and Michaiah in xii. 35.—5. A Levite, the son of Uzziel a Kohathite (1 Chron. xxiii. 20): his name appears as Michah in xxiv. 24, 25.—6. The father of one of Josiah's officers (2 Chron. xxxiv. 20), called Michaiah in 2 Kings xxii. 12.

7. The sixth of the minor prophets according to the order in our bibles. Scarcely anything is known of Micah's history. He is styled 'the Morasthite' (Mic. i. 1), no doubt from the place of his birth Moresheth-gath (14), a small town in the district of Gath. From the inscription, we learn that the prophet lived in the days of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah; and this is corroborated by the mention of him in Jer. xxvi. 18. In this last-named place Micah is said to have delivered a certain prophecy in Hezekiah's reign. But this has puzzled some modern critics, who declare that they cannot understand why, if Micah prophesied also in the reigns of Jotham and Ahaz, they were not also mentioned. The inscription, therefore (Mic. i. 1), must, they say, be inaccurate. It is useless to reason with men who stumble in so plain a matter. Still more ridiculous is the charge brought by Bleek (Einführung in das A.T., p. 539) against the authors of Kings and Chronicles, that they confound this prophet with Micaiah, the faithful prophet who appeared before Ahab, because they record Micaiah as saying 'Hearken, O people, every one of you' (1 Kings xxii. 28; 2 Chron. xvii. 27), the words with which Micah the Morasthite begins his prophecy (Mic. i. 2)!

MICAH, THE BOOK OF, 750-700 B.C. Attempts have been made to divide this book according to the supposed chronology of different parts. But this cannot be satisfactorily done. It is true that we can assign with certainty the prediction (Mic. ii. 12) to the time of Hezekiah (Jer. xxvi. 18), and, as that sovereign commenced his reformation immediately upon his accession to the throne, we must believe that the denunciations against idolatry (Mic. v. 13, 14, vi. 16) were delivered at an earlier date, under either Jotham or more probably Ahaz. Still no accurate apportionment can be generally made. Indeed, there is an unity in the composition which would lead us to suppose that the prophet had collected his utterances and arranged them into one connected whole in the book he has transmitted to us.

The structure of it is curiously elaborated. There are three sections, i., ii.; iii.—v.; vi., vii.: each begins with the same word 'Hear ye,' and each closes with a promise of strength and salvation to God's people. And there is a kind of parallel development. Thus in the first section Judah is threatened that the deadly blows which are soon to be dealt out on Samaria should reach to the gates of Jerusalem (i. 9, 12). There is also the deliverance of the covenant people from their distress predicted, and a victorious bursting out of captivity (ii. 12, 13). In the second section the prophecy assumes a graver aspect: the actual destruction of Jerusalem with the ruin of the temple is proclaimed, and the exile in Babylon (iii. 12, iv. 10), while the promise also rises higher, and describes positive salvation through the supremacy of Messiah (iv., v.). The third section is altogether of a hortatory cast (Keil, Einführung, § 94).

Micah was contemporary with Isaiah; and his book comprises a summary of the prophecies delivered by the last-named seer concerning Messiah and the final blessedness of God's covenant people. Occasionally the one repeats the other: e.g. comp. Isai. ii. 2-4 with Mic. iv. 1-3. The style in some degree resembles that of Isaiah: it is forcible, pointed, and concise, frequently animated and sublime. The tropes, varied according to the nature of the subject, are very beautiful. Two predictions contained in this book may be particularly noticed. The first relates to Samaria (i. 6), a city beautiful for situation, the crowned hill of Ephraim, adorned with sumptuous palaces. Yet the stones thereof should be poured down into the valley. And modern travellers describe the exact accomplishment. There are the fragments of massy columns, the foundations thereof discovered, and the stones rolled down into the valley—a living witness to the truth of the prophetic word. Another utterance is yet more remarkable. Earlier prophecy had noted the Seed of the woman, the descendant of Abraham, of Isaac, of Jacob, in the line of Judah, from the family of David; and here (v. 2) his birth-place is designated by name—Beth-lehem Ephratah; so that, when Herod enquired of the chief priests and scribes where Messiah should be born, they unhesitatingly replied in Beth-lehem, and referred him to this prediction (Matt. ii. 4-6).

Commentaries on Micah are included in those on the Minor Prophets.

MICAH (id.). The son of Imlah, a faithful prophet, who predicted in vain to Ahab the fatal termination of his expedition against Ramoth-gilead (1 Kings xxii. 8-28; 2 Chron. xviii. 7-27). He delivered his warning in the form of a remarkable vision, in which the weighty lesson is conveyed that God blinds judicially those who have shut their eyes and ears to his monitions, letting them be deceived by lying spirits. Some have conjectured that Micah was the unnamed prophet of 1 Kings vi. 35-42).

MICHA (id.)-1 (2 Sam. ix. 12). See MICAH, 3.-2. A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 11).-3 (xi. 17, 22). See MICAH, 4.

MICHA (Judith vi. 15). A person said to be of the tribe of Simeon.

MICHAEL (who like God?)-1. Father of the spy selected from the tribe of Asher (Numb. xiii. 13).-2. A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 13).-3. An ancestor of the preceding (14).-4. A Levite of the family of Gershon (vi. 40).-5. A chieftain of Issachar (vii. 3).-6. A Benjamite chief (viii. 16).-7. A Manassite captain who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 20).-8. The father of the ruler of Issachar in David's time (xxvii. 18).-9. One of the sons of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi. 2).-10. The father of one who joined Ezra's caravan (Ezra viii. 8).

11. One of the chief angels; sometimes called prince and archangel (Dan. x. 13, 21, xii. 1; Rev. xii. 7). In these places it may be that the name is used symbolically. Many are disposed to view the being, who is described as the special defender of the Jewish church, and as leading the armies of heaven against the dragon and his forces, as no other than the Son of God. But there is another mention of Michael more perplexing. He is said to have contended with the devil 'about the body of Moses,' and to have brought no railing accusation, but to have said 'The Lord rebuke thee' (Jude 9). Various legends there are, professing to explain this statement; some of which are mentioned by Dr. Alford, The Greek Test., note on Jude 9. The question is whether the apostle was describing a literal fact, or whether 'the body of Moses' might not intend the Jewish law, or the Jewish church; just as Christian believers are termed 'the body of Christ' (1 Cor. xii. 27). If this interpretation be admitted, there is doubtless an allusion to Zech. iii. 1, 2. But the matter offers only a choice of conjectures.

MICHAH (who like Jehovah?) (1 Chron. xxiv. 24, 25). See MICAH, 5.

MICHAIAH (id.)-1. The father of one of Josiah's officers (2 Kings xxii. 12), called also Micah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 20).-2 (2 Chron. xii. 2). See MAACHAH, 3.-3. One of Jehoshaphat's officers (xvii. 7).-4 (Neh. xii. 35). See MICAH, 4.-5. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (41).-6. An officer in the reign of Jehoiahin (Jer. xxxvi. 11, 13).

MICHAL (who as God?) The younger daughter of king Saul, who was bestowed in marriage on David (1 Sam. xiv. 49, xviii. 20, 27, 28). She assisted David to escape when her father sent officers to apprehend him (xix. 11-17). She was given, after David had fled, in marriage to Phalti or Phaltiel (xxv. 44), from whom at David's demand she was taken by her brother Ish-bosheth and restored to her rightful husband (2 Sam. iii. 13-16). But a change had probably passed upon the two, David and his wife. Michal perhaps regretted Phaltiel; and she seems to have inherited Saul's bitter temper. On the occasion of the festive rejoicing at the bringing of the ark to Jerusalem, she was displeased at the part the king took, and as a judgment was childless (vi. 16-23; 1 Chron. xv. 29). It is likely therefore that Merab (which some MSS. have) may be the right reading in 2 Sam. xxi. 8.

MICHEAS (2 Esdr. i. 38). The prophet Micah.

MICH'MAS (something hidden) (Ezra ii. 27; Neh. vii. 31). A form of MICH'MASH (id.). A town to the eastward of Beth-aven, and south of Migron, not far from Gibeah. It must have been a place of military importance (1 Sam. xiii. 2, 5, 11, 16, 23), more especially as there was a narrow pass between sharp rocks, through which the road passed (xiv. 4, 5, 31; Isai. x. 28, 29). Some of the inhabitants returned after the captivity, and appear to have again settled in their ancient habitation (Ezra ii. 27; Neh. vii. 31, xi. 31). Michmash is now a desolate village, Mukhmas, with ruins, near a steep ravine, called Wady es-Suweinit, which was probably the above-noted pass, where some travellers believe that they have recognized the rocks Bozez and Seneh, the scene of Jonathar's exploit.

MICH'METHAH (hiding-place). A border-town of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvi. 6, xvii. 7). It is difficult so to fix the position of Michmethah as to satisfy the conditions in the two passages referred to. Further investigation is required.

MICH'RI (price of Jehovah). A Benjamite (1 Chron. ix. 8).

MICH'TAM. A title prefixed to Psalms xvi., lvi., lviii., lix., lx. Some have believed that it means 'golden,' i.e. precious or pre-eminent. But a more probable interpretation is that, by the interchange of m and b, michtam is equivalent to nichtab, a 'writing,' 'poem'; which word is found prefixed to Hezekiah's lamentation or prayer (Isai. xxxviii. 9).

MID'DIN (measures). A city in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv. 61).

MID'IAN (strife). One of the sons of Abraham by Keturah. He is described as having five sons (Gen. xxv. 2, 4; 1 Chron. i. 32, 33); but little can be ascertained respecting them. Midian must, however, soon have multiplied—and this is some presumption that Keturah was Abraham's concubine in his earlier days—into a tribe or nation; as we find merchants belonging to them in the life-time of Jacob conducting caravans, together with Ishmaelites (the two tribes it is likely being connected by intermarriage), through Palestine into Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 28, 36). These probably lived to the east of the Jordan, near to the Moabitish territory; for a defeat of Midian by one of the early Edomitish kings is said to have been 'in the field of Moab' (xxxvi. 35); and we shall afterwards see them acting in conjunction with the Moabites against Israel. They must have been also an agricultural and nomadic people, and have occupied a portion of Arabia Petraea near to Egypt; for Moses fled into Midian, and married there the daughter of Jethro their priest or prince, whose flocks he tended, leading and pasturing them among the slopes of Horeb (Exod. ii. 15-22, iii. 1: comp. iv. 18-20, 27). But these pastures were perhaps but occasionally occupied; for the actual settlements of Midian were somewhat out of the track of the Israelites when they traversed the desert; as Jethro is represented as coming (as if from some distance) to visit Moses, and as afterwards departing 'into his own land' (xviii. 1-6, 27). We may suppose then that the bulk of the nation inhabited the region extending from the eastward of Moab and Edom, perhaps along the frontier of Palestine, down to the shores of the eastern gulf of the Red sea, and that some of the wandering branches of it were occasionally found in the Sinaitic peninsula (see 1 Kings xi. 17, 18, with Keil's observations, Comm. on Kings, vol. i. pp. 195, 196). On the shores of this eastern gulf the Arabian geographers have placed the ruins of a town called Madyan.

The Midianites joined with Moab in inviting Balaam to curse the tribes of Israel (Numb. xxii. 4, 7); and when that project failed they were more successful in alluring the Israelites into debauchery and idol-worship (xxv.). For this a fearful vengeance was exacted from Midian (xxxii.). They were governed it would seem by several chiefs, heads perhaps of separate clans; and they were apparently under some sort of vassalage to the Amoritic king Sihon (Josh. xiii. 21); their settlements extending into his country. In later times, when they over-ran Palestine in conjunction with the Amalekites, penetrating to the Philistine plain, and coming with their cattle and their tents, as if to establish themselves there, they were also commanded by a number of chiefs or kings. Seven years they prevailed against Israel, till Gideon was raised up as a deliverer, who so entirely defeated them that we read little more of them in the sacred history (Judges vi., vii., viii.)—a victory long after referred to by Hebrew writers (Psal. lxxxiii. 9; Isai. ix. 4). Their wealth was great, as evidenced by the rich booty obtained by Gideon and his army. Their commerce is also mentioned (ix. 6); and there is a notice of them in the Apocrypha (Judith ii. 26); but they seem to have been in after times comprehended under the general name of Arabians.

The Midianites, like the neighbouring Moabites, worshipped Baal-peor (Numb. xxv. 18).

MID'IANITES (Gen. xxxvii. 28, 36; Numb. x. 29, xxv. 6, 14, 15, 17, xxxi. 2; Judges vi. 2, and elsewhere). Inhabitants of Midian; see the preceding article. Little is known of them save from the sacred writers; see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Oriental., art. 'Midian.' MIDRIF. The explanation given in Exod. xlix. 13, marg. of 'caul' in the text; see CAUL, LIVER.

MIDWIFE, MIDWIVES (Gen. xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 28; Exod. i. 15-21). The two mentioned in the last-named place were probably the superintendents of their class; if, as some have fancied, parturition were so easy that midwives were rarely required, and two were sufficient for the Hebrew nation, Pharaoh's injunction would have been useless. The 'stools' were no doubt the chairs still used in Egypt (see Lane, Mod. Egypt., p. 503, 5th edit.).

MIG'DAL-EL (tower of God). A town in the territory of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38). Very probably identical with MAGDALA, which see. There are, however, other conjectures respecting it.

MIG'DAL-E'DAR (tower of the flock) (Mic. iv. 8). See EDAR.

MIG'DAL-GAD (tower of Gad, i.e. the ancient idol). A city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 37). There is a village called el-Medjdel, two miles inland from Ashkelon; it may possibly be on the site of Migdal-gad.

MIG'DOL (tower?).—1. A place near the head of the western arm of the Red sea (Exod. xiv. 2; Numb. xxxiii. 7).—2. A city on the north-eastern border of Lower Egypt, said to be twelve miles from Pelusium. Many consider this identical with No. 1; but it seems more reasonable to believe it a different place. A colony of Jews settled here after the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. xlv. 1, xlv. 14); and the word is used in conjunction with Syene in the extreme south, 'from Migdol to Syene' (Ezek. xxix. 10, marg., xxx. 6, marg.), to signify the whole country of Egypt. The name has been thought Egyptian, meshtol, 'many hills,' which Gesenius imagines that the Israelites softened into the Hebrew Migdol. But this is questionable; and there is reason to believe that the Egyptians adopted the appellation from a foreign source. Migdol was probably the Magdulus said to be twelve Roman miles south of Pelusium.

MIG'RON (precipice). A place in the territory of Benjamin lying, it would seem, between Aiath and Michmash (Isai. x. 28). It is questioned whether the Migron where Saul had his head-quarters under a pomegranate-tree could be the same (1 Sam. xiv. 2). Winer argues that the position of the Philistine forces must have prevented this, and supposes that the Migron of the last-named text was a precipice at the outskirts of the town of Gibeah (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Migron').

MIG'JAMIN (from the right hand).—1. The head of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 9).—2. A priest, perhaps the representative of No. 1, who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 7). See MIAMIN.

MIK'LOTH (staves).—1. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 32, ix. 37, 38).—2. One of David's military officers (xxvii. 4).

MIKNEY'AH (possession of Jehovah). A Levite porter appointed to play on the harp (1 Chron. xv. 18, 21).

MIL'ALAI (eloquent). A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 36).

MIL'CAH (a queen, or counsel).—1. The wife of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xi. 29, xxii. 20, 23, xxiv. 15, 24, 47).—2. One of the five daughters of Zelophehad (Numb. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3).

MIL'COM (great king) (1 Kings xi. 5, 33; 2 Kings xxiii. 13). See MOLOCH.

MILDEW. The word so rendered is always found in conjunction with one rendered 'blasting' (Deut. xxviii. 22; 1 Kings viii. 37; 2 Chron. vi. 28; Amos iv. 9; Hagg. ii. 17). The blasting or blight, as by the cutting east wind (Gen. xli. 6), is the cause; and then mildew is the result: the exact meaning of the Hebrew word is paleeness, yellowness, the turning yellow from disease. It is the same that is used (Jer. xxx. 6) to express the ghastly pallor on the countenances of those who are surprised by some disastrous tidings.

MILE (Matt. v. 41). See MEASURES. The Roman mile was 1,618 yards. The Jews also had miles, which are said to have been of two kinds, long and short, according to the length of the pace, which was different in different parts.

MILE'TUM (2 Tim. iv. 20). The same with

MILE'TUS. A city of Asia Minor, to the south of Ephesus, twenty or thirty miles away. It was the old capital of Ionia, though Ptolemy assigns it to Caria: it had four havens, and was the mother of many colonies. Thales, Anaximander, and other eminent men were natives of this place; which had an evil reputation for licentiousness and luxury. It was to Miletus that St. Paul hastening to Jerusalem summoned the elders of Ephesus, that he might give them a solemn charge (Acts xx. 15-35). The remains of this city were probably absorbed in the swamp formed by the silting up of the Mæander; but there are ruins still visible of the magnificent temple of Apollo, and an insignificant village, Palat or Palatsha, stands near the site of Miletus.

MILK. It is clear from scripture that the milk not only of cows but also of camels, sheep, and goats was in common use (Gen. xxxii. 15; Deut. xxxii. 14; Prov. xxvii. 27; Isai. vii. 21, 22); and such is the custom in the east to the present day. Besides the word expressing generally milk, fresh milk, there is another, usually rendered 'butter' in our version, which with few exceptions denotes curdled milk: this if kept long enough acquires a slightly-inebriating quality. Abraham set sour milk and fresh milk before his guests (Gen. xviii. 8); and it was this with which Jael supplied Sisera (Judges v. 25). This sour milk under the name of leben is still a very common beverage, and when properly prepared is said to be pleasant and refreshing. Meat is boiled in it, instead of in water: it is mixed with flour, dried, and carried on a journey to be dissolved in water for a drink. A fertile land is said to flow with milk and honey (Exod. ix. 8, 17; Numb. xvi. 13, 14; Josh. v. 6; Joel iii. 18). In one case (Isai. vii. 22) butter (the sour milk) and honey are said to be the food of the remnant of Israel, to signify that the land shall be so desolate that the ordinary articles of food would be only such as an uncultivated country would yield. Metaphorically milk, as the food of children, is used to signify elementary truths (1 Cor. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12); and because of its simplicity it is also taken to denote unadulterated doctrine (1 Pet. ii. 2).

The prohibition against seething a kid in his mother's milk (Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Deut. xiv. 21) may be noticed here. Dr. Thomson thus describes a favourite dish of the Arabs: 'They select a young kid, fat and tender, dress it carefully, and then stew it in milk, generally sour, mixed with onions and hot spices such as they relish. They call it leben imma, "kid in his mother's milk." The Jews, however, will not eat it. They say that Moses specifically forbade it in the precept. . . . which he repeated three several times. . . . They, further, maintain that it is unnatural and barbarous to cook a poor kid in that from which it derives its life. This may have been one reason for the prohibition. . . . but "kid in his mother's milk" is a gross unwholesome dish, calculated also to kindle up animal and ferocious passions; and on these accounts Moses may have forbidden it. Besides, it is even yet associated with immoderate feasting, and originally, I suspect, was connected with idolatrous sacrifices. A great deal of learning has been spent upon this passage. . . . but, after seeing the dish actually prepared, and hearing the very name given it which Moses employs, we have the whole mystery explained' (The Land and the Book, pp. 94, 95).

MILL. One of the most simple ways of preparing corn for food was by pounding it between two stones; and convenience would suggest that one of these should be hollow, the other easy to handle. Hence the pestle and mortar still not out of use. But a better contrivance for grinding was the mill of which we read much. The hand-mills spoken of in scripture are doubtless of the same kind as those almost everywhere seen at this day in western Asia. They consist of two stones, eighteen inches or two feet in diameter, slightly convex, placed one upon the other. The upper one has a hole in it through which the grain is introduced, and a wooden handle by which it is turned. The upper stone, the rider, was probably that which the woman seized by the handle, and, running with it to the battlement, let it fall on Abimelech's head (Judges ix. 53). The lower stone is often fixed in cement, forming a kind of raised border to receive the meal as it falls; or a piece of sackcloth is laid for this purpose. Two women sit facing each other to grind, both taking hold of the handle, while the one who has her right hand disengaged pours in the grain as it is wanted. Women now almost invariably grind (Matt. xxiv. 41); captives used to be put to the mill (Judges xvi. 21). For it is tedious fatiguing labour, accounted fit for only slaves or the lowest servants. A terrible significance is thus given to the threatening against Babylon (Isai. xlvii. 2); and the expression (Exod. xi. 5), from the monarch to the maid-servant behind the mill, is emphatically from the highest to the lowest. Mills were in almost every house, as necessary for daily use (comp. Numb. xi. 8); hence the merciful prohibition against taking the mill-stones in pledge (Deut. xxiv. 6); the subsistence of the family would be interfered with. 'I heard the ring of this apparatus,' says Dr. Thomson, 'some time before I saw it, and now understand what is meant by the preacher when he says, "The sound of the grinding is low, because the grinders are few" (Eccles. xii. 4). Jeremiah also saddens his picture of Israel's desolation by Nebuchadnezzar by adding that the sound of the mill-stones should cease (Jer. xxv. 10). And upon Babylon, whose king thus stilled the voice of the grinding in Jerusalem, John, with apocalyptic thunders, denounced the like desolation, "The sound of a mill-stone shall be heard no more at all in thee" (Rev. xviii. 22)' (The Land and the Book, p. 526).

MILLET (Ezek. iv. 9). The word so rendered is derived from a root signifying in Arabic 'to smoke.' There can be no doubt that some species of millet is meant, of which several kinds are cultivated in Italy, Syria, and Egypt. The Panicum miliaceum, common millet, is plentiful and is used partly as green fodder, and partly for the grain; which is of a dark smoky colour, and of which bread, pottage, &c. are made. Other kindred plants, as the Panicum italicum and the Sorghum vulgare, may be included in the general term. They all belong to the important natural order Gramineae. Comp. Pict. Bible, note on Ezek. iv. 9.

MIL'LO (filling in, a rampart, fortress).—1. A citadel or fortress in Shechem (Judges ix. 6, 20): 'the house of Millo' therefore, means those who garrisoned the fortress.—2. A castle possibly built by David at Jerusalem, enlarged and strengthened by Solomon (2 Sam. v. 9; 1 Kings ix. 15, 24, xi. 27; 2 Kings xii. 20; 1 Chron. xi. 8; 2 Chron. xxxii. 5). The particular position of Millo is nowhere specified. It might be a rampart or bastion at the north-west corner of the old city, where the natural defences were weakest, and where afterwards the tower of Hippicus was raised. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Millo.' Mr. Grove imagines Millo 'in the neighbourhood of the Tyropæan valley which lay at the foot of Zion' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 365, 366). Comp. Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. ii. p. 163. Possibly, as the building by David was 'inward,' it was the filling in by erections of the space then existing between Zion and the rest of the city. But no certain conclusion seems at present possible.

MINA (Luke xix. 13, marg.). See MONEY. MINCING (Isai. iii. 16). Spoken of the affected gait of coquettish ladies, tripping.

MIND. The intellectual part of any one, as distinguished from the material substance (Isai. xxvi. 3; Matt. xxii. 37). Hence various intellectual powers or modes of acting, as disposition (Eph. iv. 17, 23), purpose (2 Thess. ii. 2), will (Rom. vii. 25). Sometimes the word is applied to God or Christ; and then it means his counsel or purpose (Rom. xi. 34; 1 Cor. ii. 16).

MINE, MINING. That there was anciently a considerable knowledge of the modes of procuring metals from the earth is sufficiently clear from Job xxviii. 1-11. And Moses, commending the land into which God had promised to bring the Israelites, describes its mineral wealth (Deut. viii. 9). For some notice of metals in use among the Hebrews, and of the localities whence they were obtained, see METALS, METALLURGY.

MIN'IAIN (from the right hand).—1. One of the Levites appointed by Hezekiah to distribute the free-will offerings (2 Chron. xxxi. 15).—2. (Neh. xii. 17, 41). See MLAMIN. But different persons may possibly be meant in these two places.

MINISTER, MINISTRY. A minister is one who acts in subordination to another, waiting on him or performing his commands. Thus Joshua is called the 'minister' of Moses (Exod. xxiv. 13). The word used has reference to the duty of a free attendant, as distinguished from the condition of a servant or slave. This is clearly shown in the description of Solomon's court, where the ministers and the servants are different persons (1 Kings x. 5). The term is applied to angels (Psal. cii. 21, civ. 4; comp. Heb. i. 7), to the priests and Levites as ministering in sacred things, and to the Jews generally in their happy state of devoted service to God (Isai. lxi. 6; Jer. xxxiii. 21; Ezek. xlv. 11, xlv. 4; Joel i. 9).

There are several Greek words thus rendered in the New Testament: one, leitourgos, signifying the performance of a sacred service, is applied to Christian teachers (Acts xiii. 2; Rom. xv. 16), also to Christ (Heb. viii.

2), and to the tribute-collectors (Rom. xiii. 6), those that are in authority on earth performing therein a duty to God (comp. xv. 27). The word diakónos often signifies generally a subordinate officer, or assistant (Matt. xx. 26; Rom. xii. 7). This name is given to Christian teachers, including those highest in position, i.e. apostles (1 Cor. iii. 5; 2 Cor. iii. 6, vi. 4, xi. 23; 1 Thess. iii. 2), and even to Christ himself (Rom. xv. 8); also to magistrates (xiii. 4), and to false teachers (2 Cor. xi. 15). But sometimes it intends a particular kind of minister, a deacon (Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 8, 12); see DEACON. There is another word, hypēretēs, properly an under-rower, often rendered 'minister.' It seems to involve the idea of personal attendance, and is applied to an officer in the Jewish synagogues (Luke iv. 20), to the subordinates of official persons (Matt. v. 25, John vii. 32), and to teachers of the divine word (Luke i. 2; Acts xiii. 5, xxvi. 16; 2 Cor. iv. 1). Minister ordinarily now signifies an ordained person, and ministry his office.

MIN'NI (division?). A province or district mentioned only (Jer. li. 27) in conjunction with Ararat: it must have been an Armenian region, perhaps that of the Manavassæi, near the centre of Armenia. According to Sir. H. Rawlinson, Van was the capital.

MIN'NITH (allotment?). A place east of the Jordan in the land of the Ammonites, in a district rich in grain, which was carried thence to the markets of Tyre (Judges xi. 33; Ezek. xxvii. 17).

MINSTREL (2 Kings iii. 15). Properly a player on a stringed instrument. In Matt. ix. 23 hired minstrels, flute-players, are intended, who made lamentation for the dead. See BURLAL.

MINT (Matt. xxiii. 23; Luke xi. 42). A well-known herb, much used in domestic economy. The Jews are said to have scattered it, on account of its pleasant smell, on the floors of their houses and synagogues. The species most common in Syria is the Mentha sylvestris, horse-mint: this and the Mentha arvensis were the kinds best known to the ancients. According to Jewish writers, mint was one of the herbs to be tithed, and subject to the law of the seventh year.

MIPH'KAD (appointed place, number?). One of the gates of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 31).

MIRACLE. We read in scripture of many wonderful works being performed, which are commonly called miracles. It is not indeed that these occur in constant series, or accompany the whole course of sacred history. There are particular times at which we find them; and then they apparently cease; years, centuries probably, rolling on without any notice that what is called the ordinary course of nature was interrupted. The times of miraculous energy seem to have been (with few if any exceptions) when the church of God was brought into conflict with the external world—crises these when we might fairly suppose that, if ever, God would make manifest his extraordinary power. Thus miracles are said to have been wrought by Moses when Israel was to be delivered from the Egyptian tyranny and placed in possession of Canaan: we read of them again, when Israel had nationally apostatized, and the worship of foreign false gods had been set up by authority under Ahab and his family; yet again, when Judah had been carried into Babylon, and God's people stood face to face with the mighty heathen despotism that ruled there; and once more, when the Son of God became incarnate, and was setting up in opposition to the world's power a new kingdom of righteousness which was to last for ever. These were all crises of peculiar importance.

In considering this subject, so far as the limits of the present work allow, it may be well after defining miracles to enquire into the evidence we have of them: that is to say, whether we can reasonably believe alleged wonders to have occurred, then whether, granting the facts to have been as stated, they were of supernatural character, and afterwards what miracles if established may be taken to prove.

We may define a miracle as an event contrary to the ordinary course of things, an effect for which natural causes are not alone sufficient; so that God must have interposed to suspend or modify the common laws of nature. Such event or effect produced by God's immediate touch or special assistance is intended as a proof of some particular truth or doctrine, or in attestation of the authority or divine mission of some particular person.

Now, if we meet with any extraordinary statement in history, our first object should be to ascertain whether it is true. Falsehoods may be devised by knaves and propagated in such a way as to impose upon the credulous, until being handed on from generation to generation they obtain a kind of prescriptive authority, and are generally acquiesced in without much thought of investigating the source from which they were derived. We ought to see whether the strange facts recorded in scripture have any better grounds. If they are fables originally put about by crafty men, there must have been some object in it, some pride to gratify, some advantage calculated on. Or, if they are the fancies of foolish men, there must have been circumstances which gave them credit, some singular faculty in the age, which made it easy to be practised on. Let us sift a little what we read of the wonderful deliverance of Israel from Egypt, the great deeds said to be wrought by our Saviour, his raising of Lazarus for example, his own rising from the dead.

We should first see by whom these events are recorded. They were contemporaries who wrote the history of them. Moses was generally been taken as the author of Exodus; and the evangelists published their accounts at the time when Christianity had its origin. There is thus contemporaneous authority. And the writers were certainly in a position to know the truth. Moses was the leader of Israel, taking part, indeed having the command, in all things that were done. The evangelists, too, were some of them apostles always about the person of Christ, professing to be eyewitnesses of what they told: others were known to be the trusted companions of the apostles. They all had full means of information. And, if we look at the general character of their histories, we shall find them well worthy of credit. Many profane writers confirm various particulars recorded in the Pentateuch. The descriptions of countries, e.g. of the cities of Bashan, are verified by modern research. And, as to the evangelists, there is that air of truthfulness in their works, which at once leads a reader to see that he is perusing an honest history. This, however, need not be here dwelt on: some arguments are produced for the credibility of the sacred writers in the article SCRIPTURE, which see. It may be further added that, if untrue accounts of things are put forth by contemporaries, there is every probability of their being at once contradicted. The children of Israel must have known whether they passed dry-shod through the Red sea: they were inclined to murmur and resist Moses; so that, when he frequently referred to that event, we can hardly conceive of their acquiescing in what he said, if he had given a false colouring to an ordinary fact. Moreover, a deep impression seems to have been made on neighbouring nations (Josh. ii. 9-11). It was their interest to have the falsehood, if falsehood there were, exposed; and yet, so far as we can discover, there was no attempt of this kind. Take, again, some of the remarkable events narrated in our Lord's history, such as the raising of Lazarus, the casting out of devils, the curing of the sick, the resurrection of Christ himself. We do not find generally the facts controverted, but explained away. Thus, when the people surprised at what they saw exclaimed, 'It was never so seen in Israel,' the Pharisees declared, 'He casteth out devils through the prince of the devils' (Matt. ix. 33, 34). The Jewish council also, when Lazarus was raised, acknowledged, 'This man doeth many miracles' (John xi. 47); and, to stifle the impression made upon the public mind, they consulted about putting Lazarus to death (xii. 10, 11). Certainly the simplest course would have been, if the fact reported were untrue, to expose its falsity, instead of trying to destroy the evidence of its truth. Later, in regard to the apostles, there is the same confession that a notable deed was manifestly done which could not be denied (Acts iv. 16). An attempt, to be sure, was made to discredit our Lord's resurrection; but the shift resorted to only proved the difficulty in which the chief priests felt themselves (Matt. xxviii. 11-15). So then, neither at the time when the events occurred, nor a few years afterwards when the histories were published, were the Jews able to impeach the truth of the recital. They had full opportunity of testing the facts; and they had certainly the will to convict, if they could, the Christians of mistake or imposture. But we see that for a series of years, through that whole generation, the facts were fearlessly appealed to by Christian teachers, appealed to under just the circumstances and in the very places where exposure of falsehood was most easy (Acts vi. 8, viii. 6, 7, 13, xiv. 3; Rom. xv. 19; Heb. ii. 4).

Matters of fact are capable of being proved by proper evidence; and we can easily tell whether the evidence is of a satisfactory character. If witnesses are trustworthy men, if they had full opportunities of knowing what was done, if there were many of them, if their reports, agreeing in the main, are yet so far different in the mode of recording them as to show that they had not planned together to make a tale, if they have persisted when persistence was dangerous, and retraction, even silence, would have been safety, there is the very strongest moral ground for believing that what they maintain is fact. There is no room for evasion on the supposition of knavery or of fanatic madness. Individuals may be knaves, and escape detection; but a whole class or body of men who have earned from history a good report can never have been merely successful impostors. And men may be mad for opinions, but not for facts: no band of enthusiasts would agree in their testimony, if it flowed but from the vagaries of a distempered mind. More especially, as in the case of the scripture miracles we should have to suppose enthusiasts or deceivers in one age succeeded by similar bodies in distant generations, and yet all uniting in the same purpose.

Criteria have been proposed by which to test the alleged occurrence of events said to be miraculous. To try them as facts, to test the history which relates these extraordinary events, let us use some of the proposed criteria. If we find that anything which history reports was (1) publicly performed before credible witnesses; if (2) it was sensible and easy to be observed; if (3) public monuments were set up, and some outward actions constantly performed in memorial of the facts thus publicly witnessed; and if (4) these monuments were set up, and these actions and observances instituted, at the very time when the events took place, and were afterwards continued without interruption—then it can hardly be that the alleged facts did not occur. If there can be mistake or falsehood here, how can we ever depend on any asserted event's being true? Now, leaving the two former of these criteria, which have been sufficiently touched by what was previously said, look at the application of the last two. The Jews have always, as long as their history goes back, observed the feast of the passover. This, it is stated, was instituted to commemorate their wonderful deliverance from Egypt. It was celebrated first the very night when the first-born of the Egyptians were slain, and when the Israelites were thrust out by their late masters. Who or what could make this people sacredly, through all their generations, observe such a feast as a memorial of a fact in their history, if no fact of the kind occurred? Again, our Lord instituted the holy supper on the night of his passion to commemorate his death; and the first day of the week has always been kept in honour of his resurrection, the observance commencing on the very day: how could these memorials be imposed on men, if there were no facts to ground them on?

It may fairly be said then that there is as much, nay, that there is more, historical evidence for these remarkable events than there is for any accepted statement of ancient authors, for the exploits of Alexander the Great, for example, or for the invasion of Britain by Julius Cæsar; and men would no more doubt the one than the other, if it were not for the apparent improbability of the alleged occurrences. If a natural satisfactory solution could be found, every man would at once admit the facts, instead of supposing that a body of writers, ordinarily so grave and relating generally such trustworthy histories, were all from time to time seized with the uncontrollable desire of introducing baseless wonders into their books, mingling in the strangest manner truth with falsehood. It is the mode of accounting for their statements, then, which is the difficulty; in other words, Are the events vouched for by so much evidence miraculous in their nature? Now we must consider both branches of the alternative. If it is difficult to allow supernatural interference, there is also extreme difficulty in imagining the statements false, particularly when we consider the way in which they are made, and the ready credence they obtained. The evidence for the facts, we have seen, is very strong: how can it be disproved or evaded?

We must, therefore, enquire whether the events recorded can be miraculous, or whether, their occurrence allowed, some other explanation may not be given. In several of the cases referred to, if the fact be as stated, a miracle must have been wrought. If Lazarus, who had been dead four days and had been actually buried, came out of the tomb at Christ's command, and went home alive, it was plainly contrary to nature. If Jesus himself, who was crucified, and seen to die by assembled thousands, was really the next week alive, conversing, eating, and drinking with his disciples, why, here must have been a miracle. And, if no miracle were wrought, the testimony on which the belief of these two resurrections was grounded must have been in some way falsified. Yet we have seen how strong, how satisfying for all ordinary cases it is. The disciples must have known whether they really saw and talked with their Master after his death. They could not be deceived in such a matter. The less, because they evidently did not expect him to revive, and were hard to be convinced till they actually saw him with their own eyes. Now, if he did not rise again, there must have been imposture. St. Paul acknowledges this. He says that, if this miracle were not performed, the apostles were 'false witnesses' (1 Cor. xv. 15). There is no other alternative. And what are the grounds for denying that there was a miracle? A miracle, we are told, is impossible: no amount of testimony can establish the truth of it; because it is by its very definition contradictory to the laws of nature, it interrupts the necessary sequence of cause and effect.

But what are these laws of nature? who established them? and from whom have they their force? God in constructing the universe was pleased to regulate the government of it according to a certain order. Thus there are physical laws, the operation of which is patent to our observation; certain sequences regularly attending the same efficient causes. This is what is called the course of nature. Effects which result from the ordinary working of these laws, or which are conformable to the established order of events, are said to be natural; while palpable deviations from the constitution of the natural system and the usage according to which events occur in that system, as they would be termed miraculous, are held to be impossible.

But why should it be deemed impossible for the Deity to suspend the laws which only his own will has imposed? There are, indeed, some essential conditions of being which, be it reverently spoken, not even Omnipotence could abrogate. Thus there are self-evident truths, which have nothing to do with cause or effect, such as that two and two make four. There are mathematical processes, by which from certain premises necessary conclusions follow. Absolute contradictions cannot be reconciled. Thus, the God of truth cannot lie. There are some laws, then, which must be inviolable. But these are altogether distinct from the physical laws according to which God has chosen ordinarily to limit his actings. So that the question is not whether the necessary conditions of being are violated or can be violated, but whether God can, and ever does, effect that by an immediate act of will, which he ordinarily effects through some mediate elaboration. Surely it would be an unworthy notion of the Highest if we imagined him inextricably tied to those secondary causes to which he alone has given their efficiency. Men may interfere with—we see it every day—the machines they have constructed: are we to deny the right or even the likelihood of God's interfering with his work? There may be then, we must conclude, an exceptional mode as well as an usual mode of the divine acting—miracle as well as the working of natural law.

No observed uniformity can disprove the possibility of this exceptional mode of action. It has been shown that a machine could be constructed on such a principle that, though a certain sequence should occur millions of times, there would come at length an interruption. We have an illustration of the possible break of uniformity given in Mill's System of Logic: 'Not all the instances,' he says, 'which have been observed since the beginning of the world, in support of the proposition that all crows are black, would be deemed a sufficient presumption of the truth of the proposition to outweigh the testimony of one unexceptionable witness, who should affirm that, in one region of the earth, not fully explored, he had caught and examined a crow, and found it to be grey.' We cannot, then, conclude upon the unalterable fixity of the so-called laws of nature, which are not rigid statutes to confine the freedom of a personal God, but rather the index of his ordinary dealings.

The alleged opposition between testimony and experience can avail only to this point, that testimony, however strong, is insufficient to establish an improbability, unless the testimony be such that its falsehood would be more improbable than the actual occurrence of the facts which it is used to establish. But on this ground the evidence for the scripture miracles cannot be disproved. For 'it may be safely maintained,' says Dr. W. Lee, 'that the falsehood of this evidence would be more miraculous than the very miracles which it endeavours to establish. The testimony of the first Christians was not merely testimony to a doctrine which might deceive the understanding, or to a dream or vision which might impose upon the imagination—it was the testimony of eye-witnesses to a number of public and notorious facts, of which the senses had full opportunity to judge' (On Miracles, 1861, p. 85). This argument may be applied to confirm the truth of our Lord's resurrection. Seeing that the disciples, judged by their previous position and conduct, were most unlikely to begin their career as founders of a new faith just after the death of Jesus, seeing that if Jesus did not rise again the impression made on those who had hunted him to death was absolutely unaccountable, and the largest results were produced by utterly inadequate causes, we cannot avoid the conclusion that it is far more improbable to suppose the evidence false than to credit the assertion that Christ rose from the dead. See RESURRECTION.

Neither is there force in the argument that miracles are above our comprehension. We may not be able to understand how an event can be immediately produced by the divine will—how, for example, the Creator formed any material substance. But as little can we comprehend many of those results which are brought about by the elaboration of means. The steps we can chronicle; but the process we cannot explain. And we are not bound to suppose that for every material effect there must be a material cause. In fact we see from the very motions of our own limbs that mind can act on matter. How this is we know not: the thing itself no man disbelieves.

But after all, it is not so much, to those who admit the being and power of a God, the possibility as the probability of miracles that is the question. It is held that a violation of the laws of nature would introduce so much general confusion, would throw, so to speak, the machinery of the universe so entirely out of gear, as to render it inconceivable that the Deity would be the author of such confusion. This objection is urged in the most exaggerated form against the notion that the sun stood still, or rather that the motion of the earth was stayed, in the time of Joshua. Now, without arguing here whether or no the recorded wonder was effected by a stoppage of the earth's revolution, or whether some powerful refraction might not have produced the required result, it must be said against the general principle that such objectors argue altogether from the wrong standpoint. A mischievous boy may by interfering with a single wheel disturb or ruin an elaborate machine. For he has no comprehensive acquaintance with the whole: he is unable to compensate for the power he suspends. But are we to suppose that he who arranged every part of the universal frame, and gave to each its proper office, fitting it so nicely into its relative position—that he, if he touches one point, forgets or has no power over the rest? To recur to Joshua's miracle, it is monstrous to suppose that if the Deity stayed the earth's revolution he would not by the same exertion of his power provide against the ruin that would doubtless have ensued if the machine were stopped by a human hand. The word that could produce the one effect could as well produce the other. We may freely acknowledge that there will be no needless expenditure of power; but yet hard and easy, it cannot be too frequently repeated, have no application to the doings of an almighty hand.

But then it is said that no testimony ever has been produced, or can be produced, strong enough to countervail the universal experience of mankind against miraculous interposition. There is really, however, a petitio principii here. The experience is assumed to be uniform only upon testimony; so that testimony and experience cannot be thus pitted one against the other. Besides, the experience that is for miracles is destroyed, in order to make out experience against miracles. The experience of the apostles and their contemporaries was, they have left on record, that miracles had been witnessed by them. So that the matter comes to a question of testimony at last, whether the testimony of those who declare that miracles were within their experience is to be overborne by the testimony of those who maintain that experience is against them. And observe: these testimonies are not fairly balanced unless the affirmative of eye-witnesses is met by the negative of eye-witnesses too, present at the same time, who could say that no miracle could have been performed without their perceiving it, and that they did not so perceive it. Indeed the experience relied on by an objector comes, when it is sifted, to be the experience of a single individual, who disbelieves what others tell him from their experience, because he has not seen it with his own eyes, has not had experience of it himself. The legitimate conclusion from such a principle would be the destruction of all belief save that which was forced on a man by the evidence of his own senses. His own experience is against a thousand things in every-day life, which he accepts without question upon another's credit, and acts accordingly.

The theories which have been invented to discredit the testimony we have for the occurrence of miracles are in the highest degree improbable and unsatisfactory. The coarse accusation of wicked fraud is perhaps now altogether abandoned: at least it is held by none with whom it could be at all worth while to argue. Some indeed are still inclined to impute pious fraud, if not perchance to Jesus, at least to his disciples. It is in this way that they would account for the alleged resurrection of Lazarus. It was to give credit to the teacher whose influence was endangered, and was resorted to with the commendable motive of furthering his salutary projects of reform. The glaring improbability of this solution need not be dwelt on. How could such a deception be practised under the very eyes of acute and powerful opponents? And, greater marvel still, how, if successful at first, was it that the mystery did not ooze out or was not betrayed, especially when we know that there were false brethren, nay, even a traitorous apostle, who put himself in confidential communication with the priests and rulers, and could have enabled them to crush Christianity at once by the disclosure of the disgraceful secret? What a reward might Judas have obtained from the chief priests for such a disclosure!

More specious theories are those called naturalistic and mythic. According to the first of these, the recorded miracles of scripture were but natural events, mistaken by unphilosophic minds, fired with enthusiastic excitement. This is a somewhat-improbable conjecture for a single case; but, when we come to apply it to one example after another, and suppose the same ignorance, the same fanaticism, to have concurred in so many different crises, the improbability becomes enormous, far exceeding any presumed improbability of God's miraculous interposition. Archbishop Whately has well disposed of such a theory: 'Some infidels have laboured to prove, concerning some one of our Lord's miracles, that it might have been the result of an accidental conjuncture of natural circumstances; and they endeavour to prove the same concerning another, and so on, and thence infer that all of them occurring as a series might have been so. They might argue in like manner that, because it is not very improbable one may throw sixes in any one out of a hundred throws, therefore it is no more improbable that one may throw sixes a hundred times running.' A further resort, therefore, has been the mythical theory that the narratives we have are legends which have grown up from the desire men had to invest Jesus with all the attributes and powers which they conceived suitable to the Messiah's character. Plainly stated, this notion is that the disciples attached themselves to one (why is not explained) who did not fulfil the idea of the expected Messiah, and that they represented him as doing what Messiah ought to do, but what this man did not do. This supposition really leaves the disciples in the first most important step of their career without a motive. It supplies no kind of reason why they should have been originally drawn to adopt and to recommend Jesus as the Messiah. And it is, if possible, yet more incomprehensible how, on such a theory, a sharp-witted zealous opponent, like Saul of Tarsus, could have been induced to preach and propagate the faith he once laboured to destroy, more especially when he placed miracle as the ground of belief, and acknowledged that, if the alleged wonder of Christ's resurrection were not fact, Christianity was worthless (1 Cor. xv. 17, 18).

If we examine the purpose for which miracles were performed, we shall find that it has been one worthy the character and perfections of God. It has already been observed that such divine interference has usually occurred when the church is as it were face to face with the world, and when it has been necessary to show, by the stretching forth of the almighty hand, that false deities are powerless before Jehovah. It is reasonable to believe that God would then interfere. But, in addition, he has told us again and again of his intention to appear at such crises. We find him indicating this purpose when in the reign of Ahab, while Israel was demoralized and apostate, God declared that the Syrians should be defeated because they had touched his supremacy, had pronounced him but the 'God of the hills' (1 Kings xx. 23, 28). And miracles continually illustrate this purpose. Thus it was a trial of strength before Pharaoh, the Egyptian magicians by their imitations—whether real wonders or but impositions it matters not for this argument—trying to persuade the king that they were equally able with Moses and Aaron to wield supernatural power. God, therefore, effectually vindicated his own honour. There was a similar defiance when Elijah met the priests of Baal.

And in many other cases the same principle may be perceived. In certain instances it may not be so evident; but these may well be taken as parts of a whole for which generally we can see satisfactory reason, though we are not sufficiently aware of all the details to apply it to each individual case. Besides the great evidence which the power of performing miracles gave to any teacher—and we find our Lord appealing to it (John x. 25, 38), as did his apostles afterwards (Acts ii. 22, iii. 16)—there was a present and more particular purpose served in each miracle. It was an acted sermon, conveying in the most forcible manner lessons of instruction, warning, rebuke, and encouragement. It was the voice of God which would be heard. And accordingly we see impressions made, which no word however solemn was likely to produce (e.g. Numb. xvii. 6-13; 1 Sam. xii. 16-19; Mark i. 33). The power of working miracles was the more needful when Christianity was first promulgated, because those who pretended to supernatural powers were abundant at the time, and, unless they were met by really superior divine interposition, it would have been difficult to persuade men that Jesus was actually a teacher sent from God. We see this exemplified on more than one occasion. Simon Magus had bewitched the people of Samaria with his sorceries. It is not necessary to enquire here whether these sorceries were fraudulent or whether they were produced by evil spirits. The fact is plain: they made the deepest impression. And most effectually were they counteracted by the miracles which Philip wrought (Acts viii. 6-12). A similar result followed in Cyprus, when Barnabas and Saul met and vanquished the false prophet Elymas (xiii. 6-12). We may see then that the true purpose of miracles is to authenticate the mission of a teacher.

But it is not enough for this to show that some super-human power is in exercise: we must be assured that the source of that power is truth. The scripture seems to contemplate the possibility of lying wonders. And it furnishes a simple and sufficient test. Whatever marvellous work might be wrought, if it contradicted that which was already known to be truth, to be from God, it was to be rejected (Deut. xiii. 1-3; Matt. xxiv. 24). Hence, if the doctrine be unworthy, this does not necessarily discredit the miracle, but the revelation it is alleged to attest. It is when a doctrine has commended itself to the conscience as good that miracle seals it as divine truth. Herein is the great purpose of miracle illustrated. And very well has Prof. Mansel said, 'A teacher who proclaims himself to be specially sent from God, and whose teaching is to be received on the authority of that mission, must, from the nature of the case, establish his claim by proofs of another kind than those which merely evince his human wisdom and goodness. A super-human authority needs to be substantiated by super-human evidence; and what is super-human is miraculous. It is not the truth of the doctrines, but the authority of the teacher, that miracles are employed to prove; and, the authority being established, the truth of the doctrine follows from it. In this manner our Lord appeals to his miracles as evidences of his mission: "The works which the Father hath given me to finish, the same works that I do, bear witness of me that the Father hath sent me" (John v. 36). It is easy to say that we might have known Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, had he manifested himself merely as a moral teacher, without the witness of miracles. It is easy to say this, because it is impossible to prove it' (Aids to Faith, essay i. 28, p. 35). It is precisely that teaching which ordinary reason could not have reached which requires the authentication of miracles—those high truths respecting the personal subsistence of the Deity, and his purpose of saving sinners without violating his holy justice, which his ordinary works of creation and providence do not declare. He who looks at the magnificent frame-work of the universe may readily draw conclusions of the power and Godhead of the mighty Former (Rom. i. 19, 20); but deeper mysteries, which yet it most concerns us to know, cannot be learned in this way. They must be communicated by direct revelation; and the revelation which communicates them can be proved only by some special exertion of divine power. So that to say that miracles are impossible is to say that God cannot make known essential truths to his creatures because he cannot or he will not in the only sufficient way authenticate the necessary revelation, give adequate credentials to the teacher he must employ.

There is a worthy and sufficient end, then in scripture miracles. Their proper effect is to mark clearly the divine interposition. And for this end it was that Moses, that Christ and his apostles, appealed to them, as we have seen, in proof of their mission. So that, when evidence more abundant and convincing than has ever been produced for any other kind of history proclaims that wondrous works were wrought, when all the principles of reason go to prove that they were beyond mere human skill, and cannot be explained by the supposition of fanaticism or fraud, and when, to reveal great and necessary doctrines above but not discordant from whatever of settled truth could be otherwise learned, the finger of God must appear, the conclusion is not of childish fatuity but of the most exalted wisdom, that we have not followed cunningly-devised fables in believing and acknowledging the direct interference of divine power to establish divine truth.

It was noted above that, besides the grand object in miraculous working, there were special beneficial results obtained from them: these are the deep impression made at the time on those that witnessed them, the moral lessons of the divine goodness, compassion, omniscience, &c., conveyed by every separate mighty work. So that, with scarce an exception, every miracle was a parable, illustrating some great spiritual truth. It would be highly interesting to trace and enforce all these lessons; but this cannot be done here. It may, however, be well to present to the reader a compendium of our Lord's miracles, and to make a brief observation thereupon.

The following table is taken from Horne's Introduction, vol. i. pp. 552, 553.

1. Water turned into wine (John ii.).
2. Nobleman's son of Capernaum healed (John iv.).
3. Passing unseen through the multitude (Luke iv.).
4. Miraculous draught of fishes (Luke v.).
5. Demoniac cured (Mark i.; Luke iv.).
6. Peter's wife's mother cured (Matt. viii.; Mark i.; Luke iv.).
7. Multitudes healed (Matt. viii.; Mark i.; Luke iv.).
8. Also throughout Galilee (Matt. iv.; Mark i.).
9. A leper healed (Matt. viii.; Mark i. Luke v.).
10. The paralytic let down in a bed (Matt. ix.; Mark ii.; Luke v.).
11. The impotent man at Bethsaida (John v.).
12. The withered hand on the sabbath (Matt. xii.; Mark iii.; Luke vi.).
13. Many healed (Matt. xii.; Mark iii.).
14. Many, and some by mere touch (Luke vi.).
15. Centurion's servant (Matt. viii.; Luke vii.).

16. The widow's son raised, at Nain (Luke vii.).
  17. Various miracles appealed to (Matt. xi.; Luke vii.).
  18. Many healed (Matt. ix.).
  19. A demoniac (Matt. ix.; Mark iii.; Luke xi.).
  20. The tempest stilled (Matt. viii.; Mark iv.; Luke viii.).
  21. The legion of devils cast out (Matt. viii.; Mark v.; Luke viii.). St. Matthew says two demoniacs; the others mention only one. Probably one was more remarkable than the other.
  22. The woman who touched his garment (Matt. ix.; Mark v.; Luke viii.).
  23. The daughter of Jairus raised (Matt. ix.; Mark v.; Luke vii.).
  24. Two blind men (Matt. ix.).
  25. A dumb demoniac (Matt. ix.).
  26. Power given to the apostles to heal (Matt. x.; Mark vi.; Luke ix.).
  27. Many sick healed (Matt. xiv.; Luke ix.).
  28. Five thousand fed (Matt. xiv.; Mark vi.; Luke ix.; John vi.).
  29. He walks on the sea (Matt. xiv.; Mark vi.; John vi.).
  30. Ship immediately at its destination (John vi.).
  31. As many as touched healed (Matt. xiv.; Mark vi.).
  32. Daughter of Syro-phœnician woman (Matt. xv.; Mark vii.).
  33. Deaf and dumb man (Mark vii.).
  34. Multitudes healed (Matt. xv.).
  35. Four thousand fed (Matt. xv.; Mark viii.).
  36. A blind man cured (Mark viii.).
  37. The great miracle of the transfiguration (Matt. xvii.; Mark ix.; Luke ix.).
  38. A deaf and dumb demoniac (Matt. xvii.; Mark ix.; Luke ix.).
  39. A fish brings the tribute-money (Matt. xvii.).
  40. The man blind from his birth (John ix.).
  41. The infirm woman restored (Luke xiii.).
  42. The drowsy healed on the sabbath (Luke xiv.).
  43. The lepers cleansed (Luke xvii.).
  44. Lazarus raised from the dead (John xi.).
  45. Blind Bartimeus cured (Matt. xx.; Mark x.; Luke xviii.). St. Matthew says two blind men. Of whom, doubtless, Bartimeus was the most remarkable.
  46. Many blind and lame (Matt. xx.).
  47. The barren fig-tree destroyed (Matt. xxi.; Mark xi.).
  48. The ear of Malchus restored (Matt. xxvi.; Mark xiv.; Luke xxii.; John xviii.).
  49. Miraculous draught of fishes after his resurrection (John xxi.).
- To these may be added—
50. The casting out of seven devils from Mary Magdalene (Mark xvi.; Luke viii.).
  51. Christ's own resurrection (Matt. xxviii.; Mark xvi.; Luke xxiv.; John xx.).

The gospel miracles have been well classified in Westcott's Introd. to the Study of the Gospels, app. E. pp. 446-449, as 'miracles on nature,' 'miracles on men,' 'miracles on the spirit-world,' with many subdivisions.

The miracles of Christ as thus reported present many noticeable features. They were numerous; a multitude more having been performed than are described in detail (John xx. 30, xxi. 25). They exhibit great variety: they were wrought almost always instantaneously, by a word of power, without the use of auxiliary means, sometimes taking their effect at a distance from the place in which Christ personally was. They were permanent in their results, were subjected at the time to keen investigation, and convinced a hostile people of the truth of them, to such an extent that, though there were persons who concealed or resisted their convictions, very many in consequence attached themselves, to the great detriment of their worldly interests, in several cases with the sacrifice of their lives, to the person and doctrine of this extraordinary Teacher. They were miracles, too, of mercy, with no dark malignant influence, intended to relieve human suffering, and to promote the well-being of those on whom or for whom they were wrought. The only apparent exceptions were the cursing of the barren fig-tree with its consequent withering away, and the allowance of the devils' entry into the herd of swine. Reasons good may be found for both these, which cannot be detailed here; but see DEMONIAIC, p. 212. And the power of working miracles was conveyed by our Lord to his followers, was repeatedly exercised by them, and was continued for a while in the church, how long it is the province of ecclesiastical history to investigate, rather than of such a book as the present. It may, however, be remarked, as a proof of the existence of miracles in the early church, that care was taken to check and censure pretended and profane wonders (Bingham, Antiq. Eccles., book xvi. chap. v. 6, 7). In all this, especially in the plain accounts and circumstances of our Lord's miracles, confirmation will be found of the conclusions before drawn.

It is perfectly true that there have been counterfeit miracles, that some are narrated by heathen authors, and that abundance of them are said to have occurred and to be still occurring in the Romish church. Many of these are so palpably absurd and false, that sceptics rejecting them are ready to class those of the scripture with them, and hence to regard all pretensions to supernatural power as equally unfounded. Bp. Douglas has fully investigated the subject: he has shown that the evidence, the nature, the circumstances of such alleged wonders are perfectly diverse from the proofs and descriptions of the miracles of scripture. To his book, The Criterion or Rules by which the true Miracles recorded in the New Test. are distinguished from Spurious Miracles, the reader must be referred.

Several books have been cited in the course of this article. A long list of important works on the subject might easily be compiled. But it must suffice to direct the reader to Mill, On the Myth. Interp. of the Gospels, part i. sect. vii.; Birks, Bible and Modern Thought, chapp. iv. vii.; and abp. Trench, Notes on the Miracles, 5th edition, 1856, in which thirty-three of our Lord's miracles are discussed.

MIR'AM (rebellion).—1. The daughter of Amram and sister of Aaron and Moses (1 Chron. vi. 3); though, as she is in scripture never distinctly called Moses' sister, some have imagined that she was but his half-sister. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Mirjam.' But this seems an unfounded notion (Numb. xxvi. 59). It was she, very probably, who was set to watch Moses while exposed on the Nile (Exod. ii. 4-10). Miriam, called a prophetess, appears after the passage of the Red sea as heading the women of Israel in that responsive song in which the glorious deliverance was celebrated (xv. 20, 21). The next occasion on which she is mentioned presents a dark contrast to that earlier day of joy. Miriam, by whom the Lord had spoken, and whom he had sent before his people (Mic. vi. 4), unites with Aaron in jealous murmuring against Moses. Her sin is immediately visited with frightful punishment. She is struck with leprosy; and Aaron as the priest has to look on his accomplice, and officially pronounce her unclean; and consequently for seven days, till healed and cleansed by the mercy of God, she is excluded from the camp (Numb. xii.; Deut. xxiv. 9). It must have read an impressive lesson to Israel that God will by no means spare the guilty. We afterwards hear only of her death and burial in the fortieth year after the exodus (Numb. xx. 1). Miriam is said (Joseph., Antiq., lib. iii. 2, § 4, 6, § 1) to have been the wife of Hur. See HUR, 1.—2. One among the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 17).

MIR'MA (fraud). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 10).

MIRROR. The so-called 'looking-glasses' of which we occasionally read (e.g. Exod. xxxviii. 8) were metallic mirrors: see LOOKING-GLASS.

MISHAEL.—1 (1 Esdr. ix. 44). Mishael (Neh. viii. 4).—2 (Song of Three Child. 66). Mishael, the original name of Meshach (Dan. i. 6, 7).

MIS'GAB (height). The name of a place in Moab (Jer. xlviii. 1). It has the article: it may therefore be merely 'the height,' or the town on the height. Perhaps it is alluded to in Isai. xxv. 12.

MI'SHAEL (who is what God is?).—1. A Levite, son of Uzziel (Exod. vi. 22; Lev. x. 4).—2. One who stood by Ezra when he read the law (Neh. viii. 4).—3. The original name of Meshach (Dan. i. 6, 7, 11, 19, ii. 17).

MISH'AL (entreaty) (Josh. xxi. 30). See MASHAL.

MISH'AM (swift-going). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 12).

MISH'EAL (entreaty) (Josh. xix. 26). See MASHAL.

MISH'MA (a hearing).—1. One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chron. i. 30).—2. A Simeonite (iv. 25, 26).

MISHIMAN'NAH (fatness). A Gadite chieftain, who joined David in the wilderness (1 Chron. xii. 10).

MISH'RAITES. The designation of some family or clan (1 Chron. ii. 53), of which nothing certain is known.

MIS'PAR (number). One who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2): he is called also

MISPE'RETH (Neh. vii. 7).

MIS'REPHOTH-MA'IM (burnings of water, or burnings by the waters). Some place or district, probably not far from Sidon (Josh. xi. 8, xiii. 6); 'on the north border of the plain of Acre,' says Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 215), 'now called Musheirifeh.'

MIST. This word occurs in its literal sense of vapour in Gen. ii. 6. Some would translate: 'Neither had there gone up a mist.' The intention of the sacred writer is to show how plants and trees came from their Maker's hand, without the ordinary process which now they undergo: vegetation was by the fiat of his will, not requiring as it first showed itself the genial moisture which now fosters it. See Bush, Notes on Genesis, p. 42. Mist is elsewhere used figuratively (Acts xiii. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 17).

MITE (Mark xii. 42; Luke xii. 59, xxi. 2). See MONEY.

MITH'CAH (sweetness, probably sweet fountain). A station of the Israelites in the desert (Numb. xxxiii. 28, 29).

MITH'NITE. Josphaphat, one of David's warriors, is so called (1 Chron. xi. 43), it is not known whence.

MITH'REDATH (given by Mithra, the sun-god).—1. The treasurer of Cyrus king of Persia (Ezra i. 8).—2. A Persian officer in Samaria (iv. 7).

MITHRIDATES.—1 (1 Esdr. ii. 11). Mithredath (Ezra i. 8).—2 (1 Esdr. ii. 16). Mithredath (Ezra iv. 7).

MIT'RE. The head-dress of the Hebrew high priest (Exod. xxviii. 4, 37, 39, xxxix. 6, xxxix. 28, 31; Lev. viii. 9, xvi. 4; Zech. iii. 5). See HIGH PRIEST, p. 381.

MITYLE'NE. The chief town of Lesbos, situated on its eastern coast, with two harbours. It was noted for its beauty, riches, and literary renown. Among the natives may be named Sappho, Alcæus, Pittacus, and Theophrastus. St. Paul touched here when voyaging towards Palestine (Acts xx. 14). The ancient town has given name to the whole island, which is now called Mitylini. The modern town is usually termed Castro. Some ruins betokening the original splendour still exist.

MIXED MULTITUDE. It is observable that, both when the Israelites left Egypt, and when they returned from the Babylonish captivity, a 'mixed multitude' are said to have accompanied them (Exod. xii. 38; Neh. xiii. 8). These people were generally the offspring of marriages of the Hebrews with those among whom they had dwelt. They were of neither pure blood nor pure faith; and their presence and conduct were found to be injurious (Lev. xxiv. 10, 11; Numb. xi. 4).

MIZ'AR (smallness). The name of a summit, probably belonging to the ridge of Antilibanus or Hermon (Psal. xlii. 6).

MIZ'PAH (watch-tower, lofty place).—1. The name given to the place in Gilead where Jacob and Laban parted, and set up a memorial heap of stones (Gen. xxxi. 45-55).—2 (1 Kings xv. 22; 2 Kings xxv. 23, 25; 2 Chron. xvi. 6; Jer. xl. 6, 10, 12, 13, 15, xli. 1, 3, 6, 10, 14, 16; Neh. iii. 7, 15, 19). See MIZPEH, 4-3 (Hos. v. 1). As there were several places of the same name, we can but conjecture which of them is intended here. Possibly it may be the Mizpah or Mizpeh in Gilead. See MIZPEH, 3.

MIZ'PEH (id.).—1. A valley or district in the region of mount Lebanon, which was inhabited by the Hivites (Josh. xi. 3, 8). A conjecture has been hazarded this was Coele-syria.—2. A city in the plain country of Judah (xv. 38), perhaps identical with Tell-es-Safiyeh.—3. A town in Gilead (Judges x. 17, xi. 11, 34). It seems to be called more fully Mizpeh of Gilead (xi. 29), and is perhaps the same with Ramath-mizpeh (Josh. xiii. 26), and Ramoth-gilead: see RAMOTH, 1. It may also be identical with Mizpah, 1.—4. A city of Benjamin (xviii. 26). Here assemblies of the Israelites were often convened (Judges xx. 1, 3, xxi. 1, 5, 8; 1 Sam. vii. 5, 6, 7, 11, 12, 16); and here Saul was elected king (x. 17); it was fortified by Asa (1 Kings xv. 22; 2 Chron. xvi. 6), and was the place where Gedaliah was assassinated (2 Kings xxv. 23, 25; Jer. xl. 6, 10, 12, 13, 15, xli. 1, 3, 6, 10, 14, 16). It is probably this town that is mentioned in Neh. iii. 7, 15, 19). In several of these places the name is spelt Mizpah; and perhaps it is the Maspha of the Apocrypha (1 Macc. iii. 46). Its site is supposed to be marked by the ancient ruins on Nebv Samvil, a high point about two hours north-west of Jerusalem. But Mr. Grove, after Bonar and Stanley, argues with much plausibility that it is more likely to be Scopos, just close to Jerusalem, 'the broad ridge which forms the continuation of the mount of Olives to the north and east, from which the traveller gains, like Titus, his first view, and takes his last farewell, of the domes, walls, and towers of the holy city' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 389).—5. A town of Moab (1 Sam. xxii. 3); possibly identical with Kir-moab?

MIZ'RAIM (the dual number of a word, matzor, signifying a bulwark or fortress). This is occasionally used for Egypt, i.e. Lower Egypt, though not taken as a proper name by our translators: see 2 Kings xix. 24; Isai. xix. 6, xxxvii. 25. But perhaps an Arabic derivation must be sought: the word in that language signifies a limit, red earth, or mud. The term Mizraim being dual, must be supposed to mean the two Egypts, Upper and Lower). The name of a nation or people descendants of Ham (Gen. x. 6, 13; 1 Chron. i. 8, 11). These appear to have settled in Egypt; and from them various tribes sprung, going forth (some of them at least) perhaps as colonies elsewhere. Several of these tribes are named in Gen. x. 13, 14; 1 Chron. i. 11, 12; the supposed location of which must be sought under their respective names: see also EARTH. In the earliest times the Hebrews were acquainted, we may believe, only with Lower Egypt: they then used the singular number of the word by which to designate it: when they became acquainted with the upper province, another Egypt, they used the dual number, just as the kingdom of Naples and Sicily has been called 'the Two Sicilies.' See EGYPT.

MIZ'ZAH (fear). One of the descendants of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 13, 17; 1 Chron. i. 37).
MNA'SON (remembering). A Christian of Cyprus, called 'an old disciple,' with whom Paul and his company were to lodge at Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 16), where he seems to have had a residence.

MO'AB (seed of the father, the son from the father?) The son of Lot by his eldest daughter (Gen. xix. 37). From the neighbourhood of Zoar the children of this patriarch must have extended themselves; Ammon to the more distant north-east country, previously inhabited by the Zuzim or Zam-zummim; Moab in the districts nearer to the Dead sea. These were possessed by the Emim, a gigantic people, a branch probably of the Rephaim; but the Moabites were successful in expelling them (Deut. ii. 9, 10), and occupied at first a considerable region, the uplands east of the Dead sea and the Jordan as far as the mountains of Gilead, together with the lowlands between their own hills and the river, a region perhaps fifty miles in length and ten or twelve broad, the modern Belka and Kerek. It comprised three divisions, the 'country' or 'field' of Moab (Ruth i. 1, 2, 6) to the south of the Arnon; the 'land' of Moab, the open country opposite Jericho to the Gileadite hills (Deut. i. 5); and the 'plains,' or more properly the dry arid district in the Jordan sunk valley (Numb. xxii. 1). But the Moabites were not left in peaceable possession of all this region. They were in their turn dispossessed by the Amorites, coming probably from the west of the Jordan; and this conquest had been achieved not long before the arrival of the Israelites in the neighbourhood; for Sihon, whom they found in possession, was the king who had so extended the Amorite territory (xxi. 26-30). It is no wonder that after such losses Moab dreaded the approach of the Israelites, lest further calamities should desolate their nation (xxii. 3-4). Their country was now confined to the southern part of the high table-land on the east of the Dead sea. It was bounded on the north by the Arnon (xxi. 13; Judges xi. 18), and probably on the south by the 'brook of the willows' (Isai. xv. 7), now Wady el-Ahsi. But it was compact and readily defensible. There were but two or three steep passes through the cliffs which overhang the sea; and the hills which swept round on the south and east were not easily penetrated. It was well watered, with valleys and wide plains among its hills: it was fruitful (Ruth i. 1; Isai. xvi. 8-10); and its downs afforded abundant pasture (2 Kings iii. 4). Ar or Rabbath-moab was the metropolis; and Kir or Kir-haraseth was one of the strongest fortresses. See AR, KIR-HARASETH.

There was long-continued jealous and hostile feeling between Moab and Israel. The tribes, indeed, were warned in their journey towards Canaan not to interfere with the Moabites, or appropriate any part of their territory (Deut. ii. 9); and they marched round through the country to the east; but Balak the king either did not understand or did not trust this peaceful purpose. He therefore in conjunction with the Midianites hired Balaam to curse them (Numb. xlii. 2-6). Hence the prohibition, for this unfriendliness, against admitting a Moabite into the congregation of the Lord to the tenth generation (Deut. xxiii. 3-5). The curses demanded were changed into blessings; but the Moabites were more successful in debauching the Israelites (though not so guilty herein as Midian), and bringing a heavy retribution upon them for the idolatry and immorality into which they had enticed them (Numb. xxv. 1-5). After the settlement in Palestine, Moab, in conjunction with Ammon and Amalek, subjected the southern tribes of Israel, and perhaps also part of the trans-Jordanic territory; Ehud, however, delivered them after a servitude of eighteen years (Judges iii. 12-30). During the rest of the period of the judges we hear little of Moab, save that the country was a refuge for the family of Elimelech during a famine in Israel (Ruth i. 1), and that the Moabitish Ruth was introduced into that line from which David was descended (iv. 10-22). The relations between the two peoples were afterwards more complicated. Saul fought against Moab (1 Sam. xiv. 47); but David confided his parents to the Moabitish king while he was in hold during Saul's persecution of him (xxii. 3-4); and we subsequently find one of his heroes a Moabite (1 Chron. xi. 46); yet after he was established on the throne he invaded and subdued Moab (2 Sam. viii. 2). No reason is assigned for this change of policy; and the conjectures which have been hazarded are baseless. The Moabites seem still to have retained their own king, as a vassal of the Hebrew crown: after the disruption they were attached to the northern kingdom; but on the death of Ahab they rebelled (2 Kings i. 1, iii. 4, 5); and Jehoram, though, in conjunction with Jehoshaphat and his dependent the king of Edom, he wasted the country, was unable to re-conquer it (6-27). The Moabites and Ammonites had previously attacked Jehoshaphat, but were entirely defeated (2 Chron. xx. 1-25); and we find them making incursions in the reign of Joash into the kingdom of Israel (2 Kings xlii. 20, 21); but we may reasonably suppose them to have been brought under by Jeroboam II. (25-28). After the captivity of the trans-Jordanic tribes (1 Chron. v. 26) the Moabites must have occupied a good deal of their territory (Isai. xv. 2, 4, xvi. 8; Jer. xlviii. 2, 22, 23); several of the towns there named as Moabite having previously been Israelitish. They were probably then in possession of all they had formerly lost to the Amorites. They joined the Chaldeans against Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv. 2), but encouraged Zedekiah against Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxvii. 3). They rejoiced at the fall of Judah (Ezek. xxv. 8-11; Zeph. ii. 8-10), having perhaps made terms with the victors, but were themselves about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem subdued by the king of Babylon (Josephus, Antiq., lib. x. 9, § 7). They are just mentioned after the return from captivity (Ezra ix. 1); but they seem to have been subsequently absorbed by the Arabians (Joseph., ubi supr., lib. xlii. 13, § 5).

The form of government, we may suppose, was monarchical, the chiefs possessing also considerable influence (Numb. xxii. 8, 10, 14, xxiii. 6); the religion idolatrous, Baal-peor and Chemosh being their deities (xxv. 1-3; 1 Kings xi. 7).

The desolation of Moab was predicted by several of the prophets (Isai. xv. xvi. xxv. 10-12; Jer. xxv. 21, xlviii.; Amos ii. 1-3; Zeph. ii. 8-11); and the fulfilment is to be seen in the present state of the country. See Keith's Evidence of Prophecy, chap. vii. pp. 278-290, edit. 1848.

MO'ABITE, MO'ABITNESS (Deut. ii. 9, 11, 29, xxiii. 3; Judges iii. 28; Ruth i. 22, &c. &c.). Natives of the country of Moab.

MOADI'AH (festival of Jehovah). A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 17), called also Maadiah (5).

MOCH'MUR (Judith vii. 18). A wady somewhere in central Palestine.

MO'DIN (1 Macc. ii. 70, ix. 19, xiii. 25, xvi. 4; 2 Macc. xiii. 14). The native city and burial-place of the Maccabean family. It has not been certainly identified. It has been placed at Latrân or Kubbâb, both within six or eight miles of Lydd or Lydda, and by some at Soba, seven miles from Jerusalem.

MO'ETH (1 Esdr. viii. 63). A strange corruption of Noadiah (Ezra viii. 33).

MO'LADAH (birth, lineage). A town in the southern part of Judah towards the Edomitish border (Josh. xv. 26), afterwards transferred to Simeon (xix. 2; 1 Chron. iv. 28). It was inhabited after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 26). The ruins of el-Mith, nine hours to the south of Hebron, appear to mark the site. See Wilton, The Negeb, pp. 109-114.

MOLE. A well-known animal of the family Talpidae. The common mole, Talpa Europæa, or vulgaris, has its limbs remarkably adapted to its habits of burrowing underground. We find the 'mole' classed among unclean animals (Lev. xi. 30); but the word so translated (implying respiration) is thought to signify the chameleon. Possibly the animal in question may be the Chameleo vulgaris. Moles are mentioned again in our version of Isai. ii. 20; but a different Hebrew word is used in that place. Perhaps rats or mice may be meant; and it is more likely that these should occupy deserted places than moles. Indeed travellers tell us that the forsaken sites of the east are 'perforated with the holes of cave-digging animals' (Pict. Bible, note on Isai. ii. 20). Any such creatures, therefore, may very likely be comprehended in the term.

MO'LECH (king) (Lev. xviii. 21, xx. 2-5; 1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 10). See MOLOCH.

MO'LI (1 Esdr. viii. 47). Mahli (Ezra viii. 18).

MO'LID (beggetter). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 29).

MO'LOCH (almost always with the article, the ruler). An idol-god, whose name is sometimes given as Molech (Lev. xviii. 21, xx. 2-5; 1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 10; Jer. xxxii. 35; Amos v. 26; Acts vii. 43). It is generally identified with Milcom (1 Kings xi. 5, 33; 2 Kings xxiii. 13), Melcom (Jer. xlix. 1, 3, marg.), and Malcham (Zeph. i. 5).

To this idol the Hebrews sacrificed children in the valley of Hinnom. According to the rabbins, its image was of brass with the head of an ox and the members of a human body. It was hollow, and was heated from below; the children to be sacrificed being placed in its arms, while drums were beaten to drown their cries. It has, however, been questioned whether the children were actually burnt or only made to pass through the fire for a purification. But that they were really destroyed may be gathered from several passages of scripture (Psal. cvi. 37, 38; Jer. vii. 31; Ezek. xvi. 20, 21, xxiii. 37). It is probable, indeed, especially from the passages last referred to, that the children were not burnt alive, but first put to death; their bodies being then burnt. See Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. pp. 38, 39.

The worship of Moloch, as mentioned in the Pentateuch, was practised among the Canaanites; but it is questionable whether it was of Canaanitish origin. Keil, maintaining that the Milcom, to whom Solomon built a high place, the abomination of the Ammonites, was different from Moloch, supposes that the worship of the latter was introduced from the Assyrians (ubi supr., vol. i. pp. 190, 191, vol. ii. pp. 36-38). Ahaz certainly appears to be the first who practised it in Judah.

Moloch has been identified with Saturn; and points of resemblance have been noted in the descriptions of their worship. But perhaps it may be more just to regard this idol as one of the forms of Baal, the sun-god, to whom in Carthage and Numidia children were immolated. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Molech.'

It may be added that, as the Hebrew name of this idol signifies ruler or king, the idol may possibly be sometimes meant where 'king' appears in our version (e.g. Isai. xxx. 33, lvii. 9). It has hence been thought that the worship of it was very widely spread in Israel, more so than at first sight might be thought.

MOLTEN SEA, THE (1 Kings vii. 23; 2 Chron. iv. 2). See LAVER, SEA, THE MOLTEN.

MOM'DIS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Maadai (Ezra x. 34).

MONEY. It would be quite departing from the character of the present work to introduce a long disquisition on the origin of money, the first traces of coinage, and the monetary system of ancient nations generally. For such information other books must be consulted. Here it will be more to the purpose to point out the notices we find in the sacred writings of the use of the precious metals as expressive of value or for the interchange of commodities.

The first intimation that we meet with is that which speaks of Abraham as 'rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold' (Gen. xiii. 2). This, it will be observed, is just after the patriarch's return from Egypt, where he had been entreated well and enriched by Pharaoh for his wife's sake (xii. 16). Now the Egyptian monuments show us that gold and silver were there used in the form of rings, and that these rings were placed in scales, payments being made by the weight of the metal. Abraham therefore, if ignorant of it before, would have become acquainted with a circulating medium in Egypt, and might have brought back with him some of the forms of gold and silver, in other words, the ring-money, which he there found. Sometime after he received a present from Abimelech, king of Gerar, of 'a thousand pieces of silver' (xx. 16) according to our version. These thousand pieces, we may suppose, were of some definite weight. Still later we have the purchase of the field and cave of Machpelah for four hundred shekels of silver (xxiii. 16, 17); but that this was not coined money and that the shekel was simply here a measure of weight is evident from the expression used that 'Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver.' Afterwards Jacob bought a piece of land of the children of Hamor 'for an hundred pieces of money' (xxxiii. 19).

The Hebrew word kestiah, used here, and also in Job xlii. 11, has provoked much difference of opinion. Some have imagined that lambs are meant; and others have believed that coined money with the impress of a lamb was then current. It is more likely that weights in the shape of a lamb were used: we know that there were such weights in the forms of lions, bulls, &c. among both the Egyptians and Assyrians (see KESITAH); and all evidence goes to show that there was at that early period no coin properly so called. We find soon after another monetary transaction. The sons of Jacob went down into Egypt to buy corn, and they took money with them. This money is frequently mentioned, but with distinct reference to weight (xlii. 25, 27, 35, xliiii. 12, 15, 18, 21-23). Money is again spoken of as paid by the Egyptians and Canaanites to Joseph for corn; but the circulating medium, whatever it was, does not seem to have been very abundant. For it was all speedily gathered up; and then barter was resorted to (xlvii. 14-16). Here also is presumptive evidence that there was no coin, which would most likely in the process of ordinary business have been again disseminated, instead of coming into and remaining in Joseph's hands. Indeed, there is little reason to believe that Egypt had a coinage till the Persian conquest, when coins were introduced, as afterwards by the Greeks. In several of the enactments of the Mosaic law shekels are mentioned, in the imposition of a poll-tax (Exod. xxx. 13, 15), in the compensation or redemption-money for a vow (Lev. xxvii. 3-7), &c. The shekel was a measure of weight, and, therefore, we may still suppose that the silver—for it is observable that silver and not gold is almost exclusively mentioned in monetary transactions—was told out by weight.

But, though coins are not as yet distinctly named, it is clear that the process of buying and selling must have brought the usage pretty nearly to what it would be with a coinage. And there is a singular narration in the life of Saul which confirms this. When Saul was about to consult Samuel in regard to the asses which had been lost, he paused, because he had no present ready, without which he could not think of waiting on the seer. But his servant had about him a bit of silver, the fourth part of a shekel; and this it was agreed should be offered to Samuel (1 Sam. ix. 6-8). It is manifest that there was no weighing at the time of this transaction, and that, whether its weight had been previously ascertained or not, this little piece of silver was to all intents and purposes for commercial value the same as if it had been coined.

This, however, it must be repeated, was not coined money; and it is observable that

The Syrian king Antiochus VII. granted to Simon Maccabeus the power of coining money with his own impress (1 Macc. xv. 6). This appears to have been 139 B.C.; but it is possible that Simon may have used the practice before the permission was formally given. Coins of Simon are yet in existence. And, though it is true that some doubt has been expressed and these coins have been attributed to an earlier era, yet on the whole the most reasonable conclusion is that to Simon first and other Asmonean princes after him the most ancient Jewish coinage belongs. Subsequently there were coins of the Idumean kings, coins issued by the procurators of Judea under the Roman emperors from Augustus to Nero, coins during the first revolt under Eleazar, those which commemorate the capture of Jerusalem in Assyria and Babylonia clay tablets have been found commemorating grants of money specified by weight. Probably the Lydians were the first to coin. At all events the first idea of impress and actual coin is due to them; while the Æginetans issued by Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian, those of the second revolt under Bar-chochebas, also the imperial colonial coins struck at Jerusalem, then called Ælia Capitolina, by Adrian and succeeding emperors, and those by the Arabian conquerors to 695 A.D.

must have the credit of completing pieces of money according to our notion of it by adding a reverse design. Greek coinage may, it seems, be carried up to the eighth century before Christ; but purely Asiatic cannot be traced so early. It is clear, therefore, that coinage could not have been known in Palestine till the taking of Samaria, 721 B.C.

On the return from captivity coined money is really mentioned, the 'drams,' i.e. darics of the Persian kings (Ezra ii. 69, viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70-72); and the same word occurs in 1 Chron. xxix. 7. See DARIC. There were coins of Alexander and the Syrian monarchs. And afterwards Jewish rulers coined money themselves. The first notice of this occurs in the Apocrypha.

The materials of coins have most generally been gold, silver, copper; but other substances have been occasionally employed, such as iron, tin, lead, leather, wood, shells, &c. The Persian daric was properly of gold; but there was a silver piece, called by the Greeks the siglos, of which 20 went to a gold daric; consequently the ratio of gold to silver at the time was as 13 to 1. The names of Hebrew money were significant; talent implying circle, globe, perhaps aggregate sum, shekel weight, bekah division, i.e. half, gerah grain or bean.

It is to be observed that the legends on Jewish coins are in a character nearly resembling what is now called the Samaritan; and the representations are most probably the pot of manna and Aaron's rod which budded. The gold shekel (answering to the foreign daric) weighed 129 grains troy; the silver shekel 220, half-shekel 110; the copper half-shekel 264, quarter 132, sixth, 88; coins not being, which is also sometimes the modern usage, always exact in relative weight.

In the New Testament certain coins or money, Greek and Roman, are mentioned, such as the pound or mina, the stater, the didrachma (Matt. xvii. 24, 27, marg.), the drachma (Luke xv. 8, marg.), the penny or denarius (Matt. xviii. 28), the farthing, quadrans (v. 26; Mark xii. 42), assarion (Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6), and the mite, lepton (Mark xii. 42; Luke xxi. 1).

The following tables will give the value of the Hebrew and other money mentioned in scripture as well as it can be reduced to our standard; but the computations of different writers vary:—

the half-shekel was wanted for the payment of the temple tax. Hence money-changers established themselves in the city and even in the courts of the temple. They received a commission on exchanges, about 10 per cent., and interest on loans; and, as we may conclude from our Lord's words, they were not free from fraudulent practices (Matt. xxi. 12, 13, xxv. 16, 27; Luke xix. 23, 45, 46; John ii. 13-16).

MONTH. The ordinary Hebrew word for 'month' is derived like ours from the moon, signifying primarily 'new,' and thence 'the new moon.' We find occasionally the fuller expression 'a month of days' (e.g. Gen. xxix. 14). The length of the month therefore was naturally determined by lunations, and would seem to have consisted of alternately 29 and 30 days. There is a notice of the month at a very early period. From a comparison of vii. 11, 24, with viii. 4, five consecutive months must

Among the important works treating on Hebrew coinage may be named De Saulcy's Numismatique Judaïque, and F. Madden's Jewish Coinage, 1864: to the last-named work this article is much indebted.

MONEY-CHANGER. Before coined money was introduced, pieces of metal of a certain weight were necessary for the purposes of commerce: these were probably stamped, to show that they were genuine and of full weight, 'current money with the merchant' (Gen. xxiii. 16). But they must of course be from time to time again weighed; and therefore the Israelites usually carried scales about with them, a practice very common in the east at the present day. It is also common to have the money weighed and examined by a factor, whose special business this is. Such a factor would also exchange coins of one species for those of another. And, as persons came from a distance and from other countries to worship at Jerusalem, they would naturally bring the money current in their respective localities; and it would be a convenience to them to get this exchanged for that which was current in Jerusalem. Besides, the particular coin of have comprised 150 days; and each therefore must have contained 30 days. But the whole period of Noah's dwelling in the ark appears to have been 365 days; for the day of the month on which he left is not the same (14) with that on which he entered it (vii. 11). Hence, though the months were lunar, there was probably some knowledge at the time of a solar year. How the months were arranged, or in what way days were then intercalated to make the lunar and the solar years agree, we are not able to determine.

In later times we have sufficient proof that Hebrew months were lunar, because the cycle of religious feasts was regulated by the changes of the moon. The new moon itself was the signal for certain observances (Numb. x. 10, xxviii. 11, 15; 1 Sam. xx. 24); and the passover, the first of the great annual festivals, after which the others followed in specified order, depended on the time of the full moon. Originally the new moon was watched for, and the announcement of it formally made. But, though this watching might be continued through Jewish history, it is evident that there were calculations to determine the day before-hand; as Jonathan and David both mention when it would occur (5, 18).

There were twelve months in the Hebrew year (1 Kings iv. 7): consequently, in order to make their time conformable to the recurrence of the seasons, an additional month was occasionally added at the year's end. The exact order in which this intercalation was made is not known. The modern Jews introduce it seven times in a cycle of nineteen years (Mills' Brit. Jews, part ii. chap. 6, p. 152). Their present calendar was settled by rabbi Hillel about 360 A.D.: see Prideaux, Connection, vol. i. p. 156, note 8.

It is likely that the months were originally distinguished according to their numbers and not by special names, unless we except the first of the ecclesiastical year, called Abib (Exod. xiii. 4). Subsequently names were attached, sometimes given in addition to the number of the month. Thus the first month is termed Nisan (Neh. ii. 1; Esth. iii. 7); the second Zif (1 Kings vi. 1, 37); the third Sivan (Esth. viii. 9); the sixth Elul (Neh. vi. 15); the seventh Ethanim (1 Kings viii. 2); the eighth Bul (vi. 38); the ninth Chisleu (Neh. i. 1; Zech. vii. 1); the tenth Tebeth (Esth. ii. 16); the eleventh Sebat (Zech. i. 7); the twelfth Adar (Esth. iii. 7, viii. 12, ix. 1, 15, 17, 19). Other names are found in Jewish writers, as the second Jyar or Ijar, the fourth Tammuz, the fifth Ab, the seventh Tisri, the eighth Marchesvan. The intercalated month is Veadar. It is observable that the month Bul is mentioned in a very ancient Phœnician inscription, found a few years ago on the lid of a sarcophagus (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 138).

Of course there is some difficulty in making the Hebrew months correspond to those in our calendar, twelve of which very nearly make up a solar year. This may be illustrated by the fact that in 1853 Nisan 1 fell on March 30, Nisan therefore nearly answering to our April; whereas in 1863 Nisan 1 fell on March 21, and in 1865 on March 28. We may best reach a definite conclusion by the observation of the seasons in Palestine. Now travellers inform us that barley harvest is, even in the hot neighbourhood of Jericho, not till about the middle of April. But the first-fruits were to be presented Nisan 15, or just after (Lev. xxiii. 5-11, 15). Hence that month must have coincided rather with our April than, as some would have it, with our March; and the intercalation must have been managed so as to bring up the month to that time. The Jewish months may therefore be arranged:

1. Nisan or Abib, corresponding to April.
2. Jyar or Zif, corresponding to May.
3. Sivan, corresponding to June.
4. Tammuz, corresponding to July.
5. Ab, corresponding to August.
6. Elul, corresponding to September.
7. Ethanim or Tisri, corresponding to October.
8. Bul or Marchesvan, corresponding to November.
9. Chisleu, corresponding to December.

10. Tebeth, corresponding to January.
11. Sebat, corresponding to February.
12. Adar, corresponding to March.
13. Veadar, intercalated.

In the Apocrypha we have the mention of two months, Dioscorinthus and Xanthicus (2 Macc. xi. 21, 30, 33, 38). Xanthicus in the Macedonian calendar corresponded to the Jewish Nisan; and Dioscorinthus or Dioscoros was probably the Macedonian Dystrus, which immediately precedes Xanthicus. See Prideaux, Connection, vol. ii. pp. 186, 187; Wiseler, Chronol. Synops. p. 448.

MOON. We find this secondary planet very early mentioned as appointed to be the great light-bearer of the night (Gen. i. 14-18), ruling, so to speak, among the stars, and testifying to the glorious power of the Creator (Psal. viii. 3, 4, cxlviii. 3). The Hebrew years were lunar years; and the cycle of their feasts was regulated by the moon (see Ecclus. xliii. 6-9). The day of the new moon was one of these feasts (Isal. i. 14), announced by the sound of trumpets (Numb. x. 10; Psal. lxxxii. 3), and, according to Jewish authority, by beacon-fires, and celebrated with special sacrifices (Numb. xxviii. 11-15; comp. 1 Sam. xx. 5, 24-27; Ezek. xlvi. 3). It would seem that trade was unlawful on this festival (Amos viii. 5). In the kingdom of the ten tribes people resorted, possibly for public instruction, to the prophets at the new moon (2 Kings iv. 23).

The worship of the heavenly bodies was one of the corruptions which we find largely prevalent in ancient times, an influence over the fortunes of men being attributed to them. Thus the moon was honoured (Job xxxi. 26, 27) under various names (see ASHTORETH, DIANA), generally with some relation to the sun, which was believed to be the active generative principle, while the moon, commonly regarded as feminine, was deemed the passive productive power. The Israelites were warned against imitating this idolatry (Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3), but in vain: they burnt incense to the moon (2 Kings xxiii. 5; Jer. viii. 2); and their women especially adored her as the 'queen of heaven,' offering her cakes, probably honey-cakes (vii. 18, xlv. 17-19, 25), a kind of oblation usual in moon-worship elsewhere (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Mond').

The moon-light has been supposed to exercise a baneful influence upon both animate and inanimate creation (Psal. cxxi. 6). Eastern people have had exaggerated notions of this; and an explanation of it has been attempted, as owing merely to the change of temperature; the nights being chill, while the days are warm (Gen. xxxi. 40). But there seems no reason to doubt that some unfavourable power, however it may be accounted for, is attributable to the beams of the moon.

The moon is sometimes introduced in scripture into a comparison for beauty (Sol. Song vi. 10), and sometimes is symbolically used (Joel ii. 31; Matt. xxiv. 29; Rev. vi. 12, xii. 1), probably for the ecclesiastical, as the sun for the civil state.

MOOSTAS (1 Esdr. ix. 31). Possibly Maa selah (Ezra x. 30).

MO'RAD (Josh. vii. 5, marg.) The ren dering of the text is very likely more accurate, 'in the descent.'

MO'RASTHITE. The designation given to the prophet Micah (Jer. xxvi. 18; Mic. i. 1) as being probably a native of MORE-SHETH-GATH, which see.

MOR'DECAI (little man, or worshipper of Mars).—1. One who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).—2. A Benjamite, whose ancestor had been carried away captive by Nebuchadnezzar with Jehoiachin. Mr. Galloway, however, has an ingenious argument to prove that Mordecai himself was made captive in the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, and third of Jehoiakim (Isaiah's Test, for Jesus, 1864, pp. 403-406). He consequently maintains that Esther was the wife of Astyages, and grandmother of Cyrus. But this supposition is not tenable, as it disregards the fact that the Persians were then the ruling nation, being named before the Medes (Esth. i. 3, 14, 18, 19). Mordecai adopted and brought up his uncle's daughter Esther. Refusing to pay obeisance to Haman, he provoked that jealous courtier to plot the destruction of the Jews: but by God's providence the design was defeated. Mordecai had rendered great service to the Persian king by discovering a conspiracy against his life; and the honour paid him for this was the first step of the advancement which, through the influence of Esther, now queen, he reached as one of the chief ministers of the king (ii.—x.). At the feast of Purim, while curses are invoked against Haman, blessings are pronounced upon Mordecai. Lord A. C. Hervey is inclined to believe him identical with Matacas or Natacas, mentioned by Cresias (De Rebus Pers., edit. Müller, 1844, pp. 50, 51) as a chief favourite of Xerxes (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 420).

MOR'EH (teacher).—1. There was an oak-grove near to Shechem; for the word should be rendered 'oak,' not 'plain,' as in our version (Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xii. 30); which it has been thought took its name from a Canaanite called Moreh, as the oak-grove of Mamre from Mamre (Gen. xiii. 18, xiv. 13).—2. A hill in the plain of Jezreel (Judges vii. 1). Possibly Jebel ed-Duhy, the 'Little Hermon.'

MORE'SHETH-GATH (possession of Gath). A place most likely very near to Gath, the birth-place or residence, it is thought, of the prophet Micah (Mic. i. 14); whence he was called (1) the Morasthite. Dr. Thomson seems inclined to identify it with Mareshah, and to regard it as just a suburb of Gath itself (The Land and the Book, pp. 564, 565). See GATH. But others are disposed to doubt the identification.

MOR'AH (the chosen of Jehovah, or manifestation of Jehovah). The name of a region to which Abraham was commanded to go, and on one of the hills there offer his son Isaac for a burnt-sacrifice (Gen. xxii. 2). On mount Moriah also Solomon is said to have built the temple at Jerusalem (2 Chron. iii. 1). It therefore lay on the north-east of Zion, overlooking the valley of the Kidron, or of Jehoshaphat, and is at present crowned by the mosque of Omar. See JERUSALEM. It has, however, been disputed whether the Moriah of Abraham be identical with that of Solomon; and, chiefly because the 'place' is said to have been seen 'afar off' (Gen. xxii. 4), while Moriah at Jerusalem is not visible at any great distance, it has been urged that Gerizim better fulfils the conditions of the narrative, and must have been the spot on which Isaac was bound for sacrifice. But this conclusion is hardly tenable. For, besides that the journey from Beer-sheba to Gerizim could not well have been accomplished in the specified time (see GERIZIM), it is evident that the expression 'afar off' cannot imply a considerable interval. For at the point where the place was seen Abraham left his attendants, and loaded Isaac with the wood, taking himself the fire and the knife. Gerizim is seen miles away; and it is inconceivable that the patriarch and his son should toil along, burdened as they were, for several miles. The most probable belief therefore is that the scene of Abraham's sacrifice was on the spot where afterwards the temple stood, not far apart from that on which our Saviour suffered.

The composition of the word Moriah, including Jah or Jehovah, furnishes proof that the name Jehovah was known to the early patriarchs. Objections have of course been urged; and it has been stoutly maintained by some scholars that 'Jah' does not enter into the word. A philological question cannot be discussed here. It must be sufficient to say that those who are most entitled to be heard, though they differ somewhat in the interpretation of the former portion of the term Moriah, agree that its ending is 'Jah.' See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 445, 446. Kalisch himself prefers interpreting, 'thy instructor is Jehovah.'

MORNING. See DAY.

MORNING-STAR. See STAR, MORNING.

MORTAR (Numb. xi. 8; Prov. xxvii. 22). See MILL, PUNISHMENTS. Dr. Thomson says a large stone mortar is found in every house in Palestine, and that it is commonly used to bray wheat in to make kibby, a favourite Arab dish (The Land and the Book, p. 94).

MORTAR, MORTER. See LIME, SLIME. Bitumen, moistened clay, and a composition of lime, ashes and sand, are generally used in the east as cement or mortar. Stubble or straw is sometimes intermixed.

MOSE'RA (bond) (Deut. x. 6). Apparently the same with MOSE'ROTH (bonds). One of the stations of the children of Israel (Numb. xxxiii. 30, 31). Evidently it must have been near to mount Hor, where Aaron died. See HOR.

MO'SES (drawn out of the water, or probably, as having an Egyptian origin, water-saved). The son of Amram and Jochebed, of the family of Kohath, of the tribe of Levi. He was born in Egypt at a time when the Pharaoh was endeavouring to check the growth of the Israelite population. At first his parents concealed him; but concealment became soon too hazardous; and Jochebed, we may be sure with a heavy heart, placed her babe in a little bulrush-ark, and exposed him on the Nile. His sister Miriam, however, probably a grown girl, was set to watch. And just then, in God's providence, the king of Egypt's daughter came with her maidens to bathe. She espied the little ark among the flags, and had it brought to her. The infant was beautiful, and it wept. Pharaoh's daughter had compassion; and Miriam, at once embracing the opportunity, proposed to bring a Hebrew nurse. She brought Jochebed, who received her own child from the princess, with a charge to tend it carefully. Joy indeed there was then in that household. And when Moses grew he was carried again to the king's daughter, who adopted him as her own son (Exod. ii. 1-10, vi. 16-20; Acts vii. 20, 21; Heb. xi. 23).

'Moses was learned,' we are further told, 'in all the wisdom of the Egyptians' (Acts vii. 22). We must consider what such an account implies. It has been urged against the truth of scripture that writing was not known at that early age. But no scholar would venture to make such an assertion now. What was 'the wisdom of the Egyptians'? Was it oral teaching? 'The art' of writing, says Dr. Bartlett, 'was practised, and most abundantly, in the very nation among whom the Hebrews dwelt for some hundreds of years. The ancient Egyptians were a race of indefatigable writers. They inscribed or marked every thing that admitted of it, from a temple, an obelisk, a pyramid, or a tomb, to a brick, a sarcophagus, a bracelet, or a seal-ring. Every thing was done in writing. In all pictorial representations the scribe was ubiquitous. In levying soldiers, scribes write down the names: they count, in the king's presence, the severed hands of the slain: they present to him the amount of weapons, horses, and other booty. The scribe notes down weights, in the markets and the jeweller's shop alike: he records for the steward all the products of the farm, sheep, goats, asses, oxen, cows, geese, goslings, and even eggs. No bargain of consequence, says Wilkinson, was made without a written voucher' (Biblioth. Sacr., Oct. 1863, p. 803). Moses, then, must have been well acquainted with writing, and he must have been in the habit himself of writing, unless we suppose him an exception to all around him. It is very important to bear this in mind.

The scripture says little of Moses during his residence at court; but tradition is copious. He is described as mastering all branches of learning, and also as heading the armies of Pharaoh against the Ethiopians (Joseph., Antiq., lib. ii. 10, § 2). Certain it is that splendid prospects were spread before him. And, if he had chosen to separate himself from his own people, and to renounce his fathers' God, and to grasp 'the pleasures of sin,' he might have had his fill of worldly honour: he might, perhaps, have wielded the Egyptian sceptre, and have founded a new dynasty of Pharaohs. But he was influenced by a nobler principle. He was aware of the promise of God to visit Israel, and he expected its accomplishment. 'By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of Christ (such as Christ suffered) greater riches than the treasures in Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompence of the reward' (Heb. xi. 24-26). It is not unlikely that some special proposal of dignity and power was made to him, which, for his temper was characteristically unambitious, he formally declined.

Be this, however, as it may, he had some perception that by his hand God might deliver Israel. And accordingly he interfered, when he saw an Egyptian maltreating an Israelite. He slew the oppressor, and expected his brethren to rise at the signal (Acts vii. 25). But their spirit was broken; and he was reproached for his deed; and the reigning Pharaoh, hearing of it, deemed it necessary to nip any symptoms of insubordination in the bud; so that Moses had to flee for his life out of the land. He wandered away to Midian and there fed the flocks of Jethro, the chief of one of those tribes that dwelt by the eastern gulf of the Red sea.

The Midianitish prince gave Moses one of his daughters, Zipporah by name, to wife. It is probable that she was earned, so to speak, by service; just as Jacob had served Laban for Rachel. Very likely, therefore, some years elapsed before the marriage, more especially as one at least of the sons was but young when Moses at the end of forty years quitted Midian (29, 30). It was at the divine command that he returned to Egypt. For, tending his sheep by Horeb, he was startled by a strange sight. A bush (which some call an acacia) was on fire, and yet was not consumed. Moses was stepping aside to examine the wonder, when an awful voice forbade him, commanded him to put off his shoes upon ground made holy by the visible symbol of the divine Presence, and announced to him that he was to go to Pharaoh and demand the release of the Israelite bondmen. Moses' leading characteristic again displays itself. He was not ambitious enough to desire the high pre-eminence. Forty years had cooled the ardour he might once have felt; and therefore he repeatedly excused himself, on account of his want of influence and his slowness of speech. But he was told that the Lord, who pronounced to him his solemn covenant-name, would be with him; certain signs were given him to assure him; and it was promised that his eloquent brother Aaron should accompany him as his spokesman, and that even now, warned also by a divine message, he was on his road to meet him (Exod. iii., iv. 1-17). Moses no longer hesitated: returning to Jethro, he desired leave to depart, and took his wife and sons to go into Egypt. In a camping-place on the road a circumstance occurred which it is not very easy to understand. One of the party, Moses or a son, most likely the latter, was seized with a mortal disease. Some connection was understood between this and the neglected rite of circumcision. Zipporah at once circumcised the child, exclaiming in her apprehension, 'A bloody husband art thou to me.' But the disease was mollified: still the mother repeated her words. Perhaps, as the threat was just before recorded that the first-born of Egypt should perish, there might be some symbolic reference to the delivery of those of Israel, yet so as by blood. It is probable that afterwards Zipporah and her sons were sent back to Midian. Moses proceeding on his way would pass by Horeb, and there he met his brother Aaron; and the two entered Egypt prepared for their high mission, and, having gathered the elders of their people, convinced them that they were sent to them by God (18-31).

It was a sublime attitude in which Moses now stood, demanding of the haughty Pharaoh the release of Israel. We find at first occasional misgivings; but ere long, convinced that Jehovah's might would really be put forth, he insisted on his demands, and in ominous words described the miseries which resistance would inflict on Egypt, and the ultimate destruction of their bravest and their best. No wonder, when he had discomfited the magicians, and when at his word plagues, such as neither they nor their fathers had felt, fell upon them—no wonder that this man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh's servants, and in the sight of the people' (xi. 3). See PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

At length the last fatal blow was struck; and at midnight a loud universal wail rang through the land. 'There was not a house where there was not one dead.' And then Moses, who had prepared his people, and had instructed them to celebrate a passover in that much-to-be-remembered night, placed himself at their head, and led, under the guidance of a marvellous pillar of cloud which went before them, their long files towards the wilderness and the Red sea (xii., xiii.).

The history of Moses is now, for the most part, the history of Israel (see RED SEA, WANDERING). Still his individuality is from time to time displayed. When the Egyptians, recovering a little from the fearful shock, pursued the tribes to take a deadly revenge, and Israel, hemmed in by mountains and the sea, and appalled at the sight of their late masters, began to utter their unmanly complaints, Moses was firm: 'Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord;' and at his lifted rod the waves parted: Israel marched through the dry sea-bed; and the Egyptian host, following, were drowned. Then Moses burst forth in that song of praise, 'Sing ye to the Lord; for he hath triumphed gloriously,' than which no nobler strain hath ever pealed, or ever shall peal from human voice, till that day when the last final victory shall have added to it a new topic of illustration, and the ransomed church by the sea of glass and fire shall sing the song, not of Moses only, but of the Lamb (xiv., xv.; Rev. xv. 2, 3).

There are some other particulars to be noticed. Moses had a hard task in leading the perverse Israelites. They soon began those murmurings which were repeated from time to time through their whole journey, and laid the blame of their wants on Moses. And then there was an enemy ready to attack them. A tribe of Amalekites set upon their rear, and also fought a pitched battle with them. The Hebrew troops were placed under the command of Joshua; while Moses accompanied by Aaron and Hur ascended a neighbouring eminence, and held up that rod of God with which so many wonders had previously been wrought, accompanying the gesture doubtless (as the Jewish interpreters say) with prayer for Israel's victory. Joshua prevailed; and a sentence was denounced on Amalek, that the Lord would have war with him from generation to generation (Exod. xvi., xvii.; Deut. xxv. 17-19).

The manna had been sent and water miraculously procured while the camp was at Rephidim: Jethro, also, Moses' father-in-law came to meet him, bringing his wife and sons, and gave him wise advice, which had the divine sanction, to relieve himself of the endless task of personally deciding every cause of question which might arise among the people, by appointing subordinate judges. And soon the camp moved on to Sinai; and Moses was admitted to that wonderful close communication with Jehovah, entering into the awful cloud which tempered and veiled the divine glory, and remaining forty days and forty nights there while the tables of the moral law were delivered to him, and other statutes prescribed; Joshua waiting meanwhile in some lower place. It was then that the foolish Israelites, tired of expecting their leader's return, made themselves a god after the fashion of an Egyptian idol. Moses, apprised of this by Jehovah, hurried down the mountain; and when he saw the abomination he cast away in hot anger the precious tables of the law, which were broken, rushed boldly into the midst of the infuriated multitude, and, by the assistance of the Levites who ranged themselves around him at his cry, slew 3000 of the idolaters, and, burning and stamping to pieces the god they had made, compelled the people to drink the powder of it in the water which supplied the camp (Exod. xix.-xxxii.).

We may further note Moses' disinterestedness. The Lord had threatened to destroy the people, but promised to make of Moses' posterity a greater nation than they. It was a flattering prospect; but he interceded again and again for Israel, and begged that rather than behold their destruction he might himself be blotted out of the book of the living. And then came that apparently-bold request, 'I beseech thee, show me thy glory.' He could not, he was told, look upon the full blaze of divine splendour; but he was placed in the cleft of a rock, and he heard wonderful things, the all-merciful name of Jehovah proclaimed; and again for forty days and forty nights he was in the near presence of God; so that when he descended his face (though he knew it not) was beaming with reflected brilliance, and till he had thrown a veil over it the awe-struck people dared not approach him (xxxiii., xxxiv.). Such is the account as given in our translation; but it would seem that the original might be more accurately understood as intending that Moses spoke to the people with uncovered face, and then assumed the veil till he went again to the Lord's presence. So the Septuagint translates; and it accords better with St. Paul's reference to the history and with the symbolical interpretation he gives of it (2 Cor. iii. 7, 12-18). The veil implied concealment and transitoriness: the ministry of Moses was broken, his teachings occasionally suspended, when he resumed the obscuring veil. Far different the clear uninterrupted manifestation of the gospel revealed in its endless glory (see Dr. Alford's note on 2 Cor. iii. 12, 13). It seems likely that the radiance of Moses' face continued long—at all events to the complete establishment of that early covenant. Blessed are they who have approached so near the source of life and light, as that their lives shine like lights in a dark world.

Many more cases of opposition and trial had Moses from his people. And once his very family murmured against him. His wife Zipporah, a Cushite, had lately joined him, and she would naturally take a high place. Miriam, hitherto the first lady of Israel, could not brook what she thought her degradation; and Aaron, too, imagined perhaps his priestly office overshadowed by Moses' authority. Moses had not grasped at it. He was not, as our version has it, the meekest, but—we have had proofs enough—the most unambitious of men. He might, perhaps, have yielded; but the Lord interposed; and Aaron and Miriam stood two culprits before the Presence. O wonder! Miriam is leprous, white as snow; and Aaron in his capacity of priest has to look on her and to pronounce her unclean, one to be expelled with loathing from the camp. It was a terrible crisis. Aaron in supplicating tones addressed Moses; and Moses prayed to God. Yet Miriam the prophetess must be for seven days an outcast (Numb. xii.). Other events, really (as before noted) the history of Israel, must be passed over; and then after Miriam's death, when the fated years of wandering were well-nigh expired, when Canaan was in view, we come to Moses' sin. The people murmured in Kadesh-meribah for water; and Moses was told to speak to the rock. Impatient and almost disbelieving he addressed the malcontents in harsh language, and twice smote the rock. The miracle was performed; but God had been dishonoured; and Moses now must not enter the promised land. Deeply, no doubt, he bewailed his fault; and the Lord pardoned his servant; but sin must be punished; and Moses was afterwards a sentenced man (xx. 1-13).

In that last year of the wandering Moses gathered up the precepts of the law and in earnest exhortation pressed them on the people. He reiterated what God had done for them: he referred to his own sin: he warned them against disobedience; and in inspired song and with special reference to the tribes individually he predicted their future destiny. Accurately indeed have his predictions been accomplished; and the Jews scattered and still a people are a standing testimony to the truth of the divine revelation.

And now Moses must die. Still he shall see the fair land he must not enter. The glowing prospect lay spread before him as with undimmed eye he gazed from Pisgah. A blessed inheritance it was; but he was about to enter one more blessed. 'So Moses, the servant of the Lord, died there, in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord. And he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over-against Beth-peor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day' (Deut. xxxiv. 5, 6). No mortal eye must see the great legislator of Israel put on immortality.

Yet once again he appeared on earth, when on the mount of transfiguration he attended Jesus, and talked with the Divine One of that propitiatory death to be accomplished, of which the sacrifices he had been told to prescribe were lively types (Matt. xvii. 3, 4; Mark ix. 4, 5; Luke ix. 30, 31).

No greater man was ever born of woman than Moses, yet he was but a servant to the glorious Lord of whom he testified (Heb. iii. 1-6).

Of course tradition has been busy with Moses. But legendary stories need not be detailed here. The curious reader may refer, among other sources of information, to D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., art. 'Moussa Ben Amran.'

Besides the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCH) the Jews ascribe ten psalms to Moses, Psalms xc.—xcix. The first-named of these is very probably from his pen; but there is no ground for believing that he wrote the others. Some imagine him the author of the book of Job; and there are various apocryphal works bearing his name. It must be enough to mention the titles of these spurious productions, an 'Apocalypse' or 'Little Genesis,' the 'Ascension of Moses,' the 'Assumption of Moses,' the 'Testament of Moses,' the 'Mysterious Books of Moses.'

MOSOL'LAM (1 Esdr. ix. 14). Meshullam (Ezra x. 15).

MOSOL'LAMON (1 Esdr. viii. 44). Meshullam (Ezra viii. 16).

MOTH. The Hebrew word, 'ash, so translated, is derived from a root signifying to fall away; because moth-eaten garments fall to pieces: this occurs in Job iv. 19, xiii. 28; Isai. l. 9; Hos. v. 12, and elsewhere. The Greek sēs is also so rendered in Matt. vi. 19, 20; Luke xii. 33. There can be no doubt that some species of the genus Tinea is intended. In almost all the cases in which the moth is mentioned it is in reference to its habit of destroying garments. Now it was customary in the east to accumulate articles of apparel: hence the allusion is peculiarly apposite. We may therefore fairly suppose that the Tinea pelionella, the clothes-moth (not excluding some kindred species), is meant. The larva of this insect constructs a kind of nest or case of the material on which it feeds: comp. Job xxvii. 18, 'He buildeth his house as a moth; and it is said to be common in Palestine.

The frailness of man, and decaying nature of his possessions, are often illustrated by a reference to the moth (e.g. Psal. xxxix. 11; James v. 2).

MOTHER. This term besides its literal meaning is applied to any female ancestor or superior—as, of individuals, a grandmother (1 Kings xv. 10) or more remote relation (Gen. iii. 20), a step-mother (xxxvii. 10), a political leader or governess (Judges v. 7); of collective bodies, a nation or mother-country (Isai. l. 1; Jer. l. 12; Ezek. xix. 2), a chief city (2 Sam. xx. 19). The mother's love for her children is sometimes taken to illustrate and enhance God's love to his people (Isai. xlix. 14, 15, lxxvi. 12, 13). For king's mother see QUEEN.

MOULDY (Josh. ix. 5, 12). The word so translated properly means 'crumbs.' It occurs again in 1 Kings xiv. 3, where our version has 'cracknels': these were, no doubt, a kind of cake which crumbled easily. See CRACKNELS.

MOUNTAIN, MOUNTAINS. The Hebrew word har is used as distinguishing a mountain from a lower eminence or hill; which is gibeah. 'Har,' says Dr. Stanley, 'is employed both for single mountains, as Sinai, Gerizim, Zion, or Olivet, and for ranges, as Lebanon. It is also applied to a mountainous country or district, as in Josh. xi. 16, where "the mountain of Israel" is the high land of Palestine as opposed to the "valley and the plain"; and in 21, xx. 7, where "the mountains of Judah" (incorrectly rendered plural) is the same as "the hill-country" in xxi. 11. Similarly mount Ephraim is the mountainous district occupied by that tribe; which is evident from the fact that the mount Gaash (Josh. xxiv. 30), mount Zemaraim (2 Chron. xiii. 4), the hill of Phinehas (Josh. xxiv. 33), and the towns of Shechem, Shamir (Judges x. 1), Timnath-serach (Josh. xix. 50), besides other cities (2 Chron. xv. 8), were all situated upon it.' Dr. Stanley adds the apposite note: 'Thus "the Peak," originally the name of the highest mountain of Derbyshire, is now applied to the whole district' (Sinai and Palestine, Append. § 23, p. 494).

Of the mountains noted in scripture those of Ararat, Sinai, and Hor, Nebo from which Moses surveyed the promised land, Lebanon, and Anti-libanus of which Hermon is the most prominent summit, Carmel, Tabor, &c., may be mentioned; some account of each will be found in the articles under their respective names. Mountains were places of refuge from war or other calamity (Gen. xiv. 10, xix. 17, 30), as furnishing caves and secret recesses for concealment: comp. Isai. ii. 10, 19, 21. On the tops of mountains sacrifices were customarily offered and temples erected, as on Moriah, and by the Samaritans on Gerizim. Hence the censure of idol-worship on mountains (lvii. 7; Ezek. xviii. 6).

Dr. Stanley, illustrating the frequent practice in scripture of personifying the great features of the country, gives the following curious table of words so used in reference to mountains or hills:—

- 'Head, rosh, Gen. viii. 5; Exod. xix. 20 Deut. xxxiv. 1; 1 Kings xviii. 42 (A.V. "top"). Of a hill (gibeah) Exod. xvii. 9, 10.
- 'Ears, aznoth. Aznoth-tabor, Josh. xix. 34; possibly in allusion to some projection on the top of the mountain.
- 'Shoulder, chateph, Deut. xxxiii. 12; Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16 ("side"), all referring to the hills on which Jerusalem is placed, Josh. xv. 10, "the side of mount Jearim."
- 'Side, tzad (see the word for the "side" of a man in 2 Sam. ii. 16; Ezek. iv. 4, &c.). Used in reference to a mountain in 1 Sam. xxiii. 26; 2 Sam. xiii. 34.
- 'Loins or flanks, chisloth, Chisloth-tabor, Josh. xix. 12, and occurs also in the name of a village, probably situated on this part of the mountain, Ha-chesul-loth, i.e. the "loins," Josh. xix. 18.
- 'Rib, tzelah. Only used once, in speaking of the mount of Olives, 2 Sam. xvi. 13, and there translated "side."
- 'Back, shechem. Probably the root of the name of the town Shechem, which may be derived from its situation, as it were on the back of Gerizim.
- 'Elbow, ammah. The same word as that for "cubit." It occurs in 2 Sam. ii. 24, as the name of a hill near Gibeon.
- 'Thigh, yarchah (see the word for the "thigh" of a man in Judges iii. 16, 21). Applied to mount Ephraim, Judges xix. 1, 18, and to Lebanon, 2 Kings xix. 23; Isai. xxxvii. 24. Used also for the "sides" of a cave, 1 Sam. xxiv. 3.
- 'The word translated "covert" in 1 Sam. xxv. 23 is sether, from sathar to hide . . . and probably refers to the shrubbery or thicket through which Abigail's path lay. In this passage "hill" should be "mountain" (cubi sup., pp. 495, 496).

MOURNING. For the ceremonies of mourning on occasion of deaths see BURIAL, pp. 122, 123. Similar signs of grief were customary on other occasions of public or domestic calamity. Persons wept, laid aside ornaments, rent their clothes, struck their breasts or their thighs, fasted, lay upon the ground, went barefoot, wore sackcloth, or black or dirty garments, covered their heads or lips, and put dust upon them, lay in ashes, pulled their hair and their beards, tearing themselves with their nails and making incisions in their flesh. Some, however, of these excesses were forbidden as being connected with idolatrous practices (Gen. xxxvii. 34; Exod. xxxiii. 4-6; Lev. xix. 27, 28; Deut. xiv. 1, 2; Josh. vii. 6; 2 Sam. iii. 31, 35, xii. 16, 17, xv. 30; 1 Kings xxi. 27; Ezra ix. 5; Esth. iv. 16; Job i. 20, ii. 8, 12; Isai. xlvi. 1, 2; Jer. xvi. 6, xli. 5; Ezek. vi. 11, xxiv. 17; Dan. ix. 3; Joel i. 13, ii. 15-17; Jonah iii. 5-8; Mal. iii. 14, marg.; Luke xviii. 13). The regulations in regard to the mourning of the priests and the Nazirites are given in Lev. xxi. 1-6, 10-12; Numb. vi. 7.

A singular mourning custom still subsists among the Jews in Jerusalem. At the base of the wall supporting the west side of the temple area they utter their lamentations. 'No sight,' says Dr. Thomson,

'meets the eye in Jerusalem, more sadly suggestive than this wailing of the Jews over the ruins of their temple. It is a very old custom; and in past ages they have paid immense sums to their oppressors for the miserable satisfaction of kissing the stones, and pouring out lamentations at the foot of their ancient sanctuary. With trembling lips and tearful eyes they sing, "Be not wroth very sore, O Lord, neither remember iniquity for ever: behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people. Thy holy cities are a wilderness: Zion is a wilderness; Jerusalem a desolation. Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, is burned up with fire; and all our pleasant things are laid waste" (Isai. lxxiv. 9-11)' (The Land and the Book, pp. 690, 691).

MOUSE. This animal was forbidden as an article of food to the Hebrews (Lev. xi. 29; Isai. lxvi. 17). An excellent species of dormouse, the Mus jaculus of Linnaeus, may be meant here; though some suggest the jerboa, Dipus jaculus. But it is likely that the term is generic, including various species. The ravages of field-mice are referred to in 1 Sam. vi. 4, 5, 11, 18. There are several kinds of these, of which the Arvicola agrestis, short-tailed field-mouse, is said to be still very destructive to the harvest in Syria.

MOUTH. There are some phrases into which this word is introduced which may require explanation. To speak with any one 'mouth to mouth' (Numb. xii. 8; Jer. xxxii. 4) means in person, without any mediator; 'with one mouth' (1 Kings xxii. 13) with one accord; 'with the mouth' or with the whole mouth (Job xix. 16), earnestly, with strength of voice; to 'put words in' another's 'mouth' (Exod. iv. 15) to suggest to him what to say; to be 'in' one's 'mouth' (xxii. 9) to be often spoken of; to 'lay the hand upon the mouth' (Judges xviii. 19) to be silent; to 'write from' a person's 'mouth' (Jer. xxxvi. 4) to write at his dictation. A 'mouth' is also put for a spokesman, or, so to speak, mouth-piece (Exod. iv. 16). There are many similar uses of the word, which it is easy to understand.

MOW, MOWING. Hay is not made in Syria as it is with us. The superfluous grass is left to wither away. So that probably by 'mown grass' (Psal. lxvii. 6) and 'mowings' (Amos vii. 1), pastures that have been eaten by cattle and are left to grow again may be meant. March is said to be the only month in which cattle are not at grass in Palestine; 'the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth' may therefore point to the early part of April.

MO'ZA (a going forth, fountain).—1. A descendant of Judah, son of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 46).—2. One of king Saul's posterity (viii. 36, 37, ix. 42, 43).

MO'ZAH (id.). A place in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 26). It has not been certainly identified.

MUFFLERS. The word so rendered (Isai. lii. 19) is derived from a root signifying 'to tremble.' It denotes light thin veils, so called from their tremulous or fluttering motion. They consisted of two pieces, united by clasps near the eyes, and hung over the face to protect it from the sun. The clasps were doubtless gorgeous; and to these perhaps particular allusion may have been intended by the prophet. See HENDERSON, The Prophet Isaiah, p. 31.

MULBERRY-TREE. The name of a tree, which signifies 'weepers,' i.e. weeping or distilling, is so given in our version (2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chron. xiv. 13, 14). But, though mulberry-trees are now found all over Palestine (see SYCAMINE), the tree in question is rather a balsam-tree, distilling white 'tears' of a pungent acrid taste. Mulberries are mentioned in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. vi. 34).

MULE. A name given properly to the offspring of an ass and a mare, but frequently applied to any description of hybrid. Hybrids are not prolific, or only under certain limitations. The Hebrews were forbidden to let their cattle gender with another kind (Lev. xix. 19); but the prohibition does not seem to have been directed altogether against the use of such animals, but rather against the taking means to produce them. Still mules for riding are not mentioned before the time of David, when they became common (2 Sam. xliii. 29, xviii. 9; 1 Kings i. 33, 38, 44, xviii. 5; 2 Kings v. 17; Psal. xxxii. 9; Isai. lxvi. 20). They were used, it appears, both for domestic service and in war, also on state occasions; one being specially appropriated to the king. Mules were imported into Palestine (1 Kings x. 25; 2 Chron. ix. 24), probably from Egypt, Armenia, and Persia. We find them mentioned as an article of commerce between Togamah and Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 14). From Tyre, therefore, the Israelites could supply themselves. The mule is a proverbially-patient and sure-footed animal, obstinate, but active and highly serviceable. It is still much used in the east, and in other countries, as Spain, &c. For the alleged discovery of mules (Gen. xxxvi. 24) see BEERI, 1. Possibly the 'mules' of Esth. viii. 10, 14 were swift horses.

MUP'PIM (perhaps for Shuppim). (Gen. xli. 21). See SHUPHAM.

MURDER. A crime of the most heinous character, to be visited with the punishment of death (Gen. ix. 5, 6). This enactment was intended to be of lasting force. But, as taking the life of another does not necessarily reach the guilt of murder, in the Hebrew law notes were given by which to distinguish. So that, if the act proceeded from hatred or enmity (Numb. xxxv. 20, 21; Deut. xix. 11), if it was committed presumptuously and with guile (Exod. xxi. 14), or premeditatedly by lying in wait, then it was murder; and to be avenged as such. Whereas, if there was no previous enmity or hatred, with no premeditation or lying in wait, but the deed was done by mistake or accident (13; Numb. xxxv. 11, 15, 22, 23; Deut. xix. 4-6), then it was only manslaughter. And, though the avenger of blood might, if he met him, at once slay one who had so taken life, yet cities were assigned as places of security to which he might flee. There was another provision which must be noticed. If any one broke into a house by night, the owner might take his life; but, if it was after sunrise when the thief was killed, the householder, by so avenging a crime of which the proper punishment was restitution, was held guilty of murder (Exod. xxii. 2, 3). Striking a pregnant woman so as to cause death was deemed murder (xxi. 23); so also was the neglect, after warning, of securing a vicious animal, if it killed any one (29). Further, if a murder was committed, and the culprit could not be discovered, the city nearest to the spot where the body was found was to make a certain protestation and expiation (Deut. xxi. 1-9), that the land might not be defiled. The mode of putting a murderer to death seems to have been left in great measure to the avenger of blood. But see PUNISHMENTS.

MU'SHI (felt out by Jehovah). One of the sons of Merari, Levi's son (Exod. vi. 19; Numb. iii. 20; 1 Chron. vi. 19, 47, xxiii. 21, 23, xxiv. 26, 30).

MU'SHITES. A family of Levi, descended from Mushi (Numb. iii. 33, xxvi. 58).

MUSIC. We find a very early notice of music in scripture (Gen. iv. 21). Indeed, it is but natural to man to express his feelings by some kind of modulated sounds, which would be varied according as the emotion was joyous or mournful. We may be sure, therefore, that from the first infancy of the world music was practised, rough and simple in its original (Exod. xxxii. 17, 18), to be afterwards refined and regulated.

Music, though little is said of its cultivation as a science, is spoken of as the accompaniment of family celebrations, of leave-taking or return (Gen. xxxi. 27; Luke xv. 25), as the expression of triumph (Exod. xv. 1-21; Judges xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6), of grief (Matt. ix. 23) as soothing a distempered mind (1 Sam. xvi. 16-18, 23, xviii. 10), as customary at revels (Isal. xxiv. 8, 9; Amos vi. 4-6), and conjoined with dancing; also as connected with religious observances (1 Sam. x. 5; 2 Sam. vi. 15; 1 Chron. xv. 28), as composing the spirit of a prophet (2 Kings iii. 15), &c. David made regulations for sacred music, appointing twenty-four bands of twelve, two hundred and eighty-eight in all, under the superintendence of Asaph, Heman, and Ethan or Jeduthun, who were to order the services of praise. Provision was made for the instruction and training of musicians; for masters and scholars are specially mentioned; and there was a body of 4,000 Levites, out of whom choirs could be selected (1 Chron. xv. 16-24, xxiii. 5, xxv.). We may conclude that under such guidance the musical art attained considerable perfection; and the delight experienced from it is sometimes alluded to (Ezek. xxxiii. 32). Of course in times of sorrow the sweet strains of music ceased (Psal. cxxxvii. 2; Lam. v. 14); and it was peculiarly descriptive of utter desolation when the sound of musical instruments was no more heard in a city (Rev. xviii. 22). Some notice is taken in scripture of the music of Gentile nations (Dan. iii. 5, vi. 13).

Of the nature of Hebrew music we can best judge from that which at present prevails among the orientals, consisting not so much in harmony (as the term is now usually applied) as in melody or unison. Vocal and instrumental music were combined (Psal. lxxix. 25); and different choirs appear to have taken separate parts. Thus, on an occasion already referred to, Miriam and the women are represented as responding to the strain led by Moses. This music was doubtless of a monotonous character, less pleasing to ears accustomed to modulations and cadences, but acceptable to eastern taste.

Musical instruments were of three kinds; stringed instruments, wind-instruments, and instruments of percussion (Job xxi. 12). Of the first there may be enumerated the harp, sackbut, and psaltery; of the second, the cornet, dulcimer, flute, horn, organ, pipe, and trumpet; while of instruments of percussion, bells, cymbals, and tabrets are spoken of. Descriptions of all these will be found under their respective names.

There are also some other words connected with music, left untranslated in our version: a notice of these too must be sought in the special articles dedicated to them. Other terms with a general rendering may be mentioned here. Such are dachāvān (Dan. vi. 18) 'instruments of music,' possibly the meaning is concubines; minnām (Psal. cl. 4) 'stringed instruments,' no doubt accurately translated; in xiv. 8, where the same word occurs, the meaning may be, 'out of the ivory palaces the stringed instruments make thee glad;' 'āsōr (xxii. 3) 'on instruments of ten strings;' this refers to the 'psaltery' which is mentioned just after—a ten-stringed psaltery; shiddāh wēshiddōth (Eccles. ii. 8), 'musical instruments, and that of all sorts,' palanquins or litters are perhaps meant; shālīshīm (1 Sam. xviii. 6) 'instruments of music,' three-stringed instruments, or possibly triangles. See, for further information, Winer, Bibl. EWB., arts. 'Musik,' 'Musikalische Instrumente;' Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 27, vol. i. pp. 272-296; Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 442-446.

MUSTARD (Matt. xiii. 31, 32, xvii. 20; Mark iv. 30-32; Luke xiii. 18, 19, xvii. 6). This, according to the belief of the late Dr. Royle, is the plant called in Syria Khordak, and known to botanists as the Salvadora Persica. From a small seed it grows into a considerable tree, with numerous branches, in which birds may shelter. It bears its fruit in bunches resembling the currant; and the seeds have a pleasant aromatic taste, much like our mustard, being used for the same purposes. It has been said to grow abundantly on the shores of the lake of Galilee. Duns adopts Dr. Royle's opinion (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. pp. 581, 582); but some doubt has been recently thrown upon it. According to late travellers, the Salvadora is rare in Palestine; and our Lord is more likely to have taken for his illustration some common shrub. Now the Sinapis nigra, common wild mustard, grows to a considerable height. Dr. Thomson says he has seen it

'as tall as the horse and his rider' (The Land and the Book, pp. 414-416). The seed, it is true, is not the smallest of all seeds in the world, but it was the least the husbandman was accustomed to sow, and the shrub the largest in his garden. It is likely therefore that this is the plant intended.

MUTH-LABBEN (Psal. ix. title). It is not easy to tell what is meant by this expression. Probably the word al, rendered as a preposition, 'upon,' should be taken as a part of muth: this may then signify a virgin song, or for a chorus of virgins. Labben means 'to (Ben) the son.' But Ben is mentioned as a Levite (1 Chron. xv. 18): perhaps he was the precentor (comp. 20). Some have fancied that the words are incomplete, and that they may have signified 'upon Alamoth' (comp. Psal. xlyi., title) for the sons of Korah'; but this is merely a conjecture.

MUZZLE (Deut. xxv. 4; 1 Cor. ix. 9; 1 Tim. v. 18). See THRESHING.

MYN'DUS (1 Macc. xv. 23). A town on the coast of Caria.

MY'RA. A city of Lycia in Asia Minor, where the centurion who had charge of St. Paul found the ship of Alexandria, in which he embarked for Italy (Acts xxvii. 5). The city stood upon a hill about twenty furlongs from the sea; Andriaca being its port. The Greeks still use the ancient name; but the Turks call it Dembre. There are some magnificent ruins in the neighbourhood.

MYRRH. A gum resin, celebrated for its aromatic properties. It derives its name from the Hebrew word mor, which implies 'flowing' or 'distilling,' Greek myrrha. The Balsamodendron myrrha, of the natural order Terebinthaceae, is the tree, found in Arabia and Africa, from which myrrh is chiefly procured. It exudes from the bark, and is at first soft, oily, and yellowish-white: it afterwards acquires the consistency of butter, and becomes still harder by exposure to the air, changing to a reddish hue. In commerce it is of two kinds, 'myrrh in tears' and 'myrrh in sorts.' Myrrh is frequently mentioned in scripture. It was an ingredient in the holy anointing oil (Exod. xxx. 23): it was used in perfumes (Psal. xlv. 8; Prov. vii. 17; Sol. Song i. 13, iii. 6); in unguents (Esth. ii. 12; Sol. Song v. 5); for strengthening wine (Mark xv. 23), also in embalming (John xix. 39). Myrrh was among the offerings made by the eastern sages (Matt. ii. 11). The best was that which flowed spontaneously from the tree. Another Hebrew word, lot, is translated 'myrrh' (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11). This, more properly ladanum, is at present imported chiefly from Greece and the Greek islands. It is the produce of the Cistus creticus, the oak-rose, a shrub about two feet high, from which the ladanum is beaten with a kind of whip, furnished with thongs, which when filled with the sticky resin are scraped with a knife. Sometimes a bow is passed over the plant, with the string stretched and covered with wool, to which the ladanum adheres. It is used in medicine. See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 613, 614.

MYRTLE. This plant, Myrtus communis, grows in the east into a tree of twenty feet in height. It has a reddish bark, thick pliant branches, smooth oval evergreen leaves, punctured with a multitude of translucent spots, white or reddish-white flowers, standing singly, of which each has a trifoliate integument. They come out in May, and produce oval black berries, filled with a multitude of white odoriferous grains: from these berries an oil, and even a kind of wine, has been extracted. Both flowers and leaves have a pleasant smell. The myrtle grows in valleys, and on the banks of streams, also on heights. Both for its beauty and sweet scent, it was a favourite tree among the ancients, and by the Greeks was considered sacred to Venus. There are various species, some of which yield an edible fruit. The myrtle was an emblem of peace and quietude; hence allusions to it are frequently introduced by the sacred writers (Isal. xii. 19, lv. 13; Zech. i. 8-11). Branches of it were used for constructing booths and arbours at the feast of tabernacles (Neh. viii. 15). Emerson (Emerson Tennyson), in Letters from the Aegean, 1829, says, 'In the Morea I have travelled for hours through an uncultivated tract, whilst the groves of myrtle formed an almost-continuous arbour above our heads, covered here and there with its delicate white flowers, and exhaling at every motion the most delicious perfume, whilst its dark polished leaves combined coolness with beauty. It is such a scene as this that explains the phrase of Zechariah, . . . and these are trees of the dimensions such as I refer to that preserve the consistency of the phrase of Isaiah, 'I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the myrtle, and the oil-tree'' (vol. i. pp. 112, 113).

MY'SIA. The north-western province of Asia Minor, separated from Europe by the Propontis. It was just upon the frontier of Asia and Bithynia. This region was fertile in corn and wine, but is now in a neglected condition. St. Paul passed through Mysia just before he first entered Europe (Acts xvi. 6, 7). Troas, a district round the city of that name, was sometimes reckoned as belonging to Mysia.

MYSTERY. This word does not mean something absolutely hidden and unintelligible, neither is it used in the sense in which it is applied to heathen idolatrous doctrines and rites, into which only chosen persons were initiated. It is rather a design hidden in God's counsels until revealed to mankind and by Christ: see Alford's note on Eph. viii. 9. Hence we find it continually employed in the New Testament to indicate those gracious purposes and plans, which were by degrees elaborated and illustrated, and on which the teaching of our Lord and his apostles threw the clearest light, but which remained hidden to those who would not understand, and who had their minds blinded against the truth. Thus the gospel is called 'the mystery of the faith,' 'the mystery of godliness' (1 Tim. iii. 9, 16) which mystery is immediately after explained to be the revelation and glorious work of the Lord Jesus Christ. So the calling of the Gentiles and their union into one body, God's church, with the Jews, is called a mystery, long hidden, but at last made known (Eph. i. 9, 10, iii. 8-10; Col. i. 25-27). In the same way it is elsewhere used for a truth or doctrine, which required elucidation, and which received it (Matt. xiii. 11; Rom. xi. 25; 1 Cor. xiii. 2, xv. 51, 52). The word is also employed symbolically. Thus St. Paul treating of the primary institution of marriage introduces the term, because the marriage-tie was a figurative representation of that yet-closer union into which Christ brings his church, wherein the two are 'one spirit' (Eph. v. 31, 32; comp. vi. 17). In prophetic language there is a similar use of the word mystery. Thus the 'seven stars' symbolized 'the angels of the seven churches,' and the 'seven candlesticks' the 'seven churches' (Rev. i. 20; comp. xvii. 5, 7).

N

NA'AM (pleasantness). A descendant of Judah, and son of Caleb (1 Chron. iv. 15).

NA'AMAH (pleasant).—1. The daughter of Lamech, of the race of Cain (Gen. iv. 22).—2. An Ammonitess, the mother of Rehoboam (1 Chron. xiv. 21, 31; 2 Chron. xii. 13).

NA'AMAH (id.). A city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41).

NA'AMAN (pleasantness).—1. A descendant of Benjamin, sometimes called his son (Gen. xlvi. 21; elsewhere his grandson (Numb. xxvi. 40; 1 Chron. viii. 4, 7), unless we are to suppose that two persons are intended.

2. The captain of the king of Syria's host, whose services to his country had been conspicuous; but he was a leper. Hearing from an Israelitish maid that there was a mighty prophet in Samaria who could heal him, he procured a recommendatory letter from his master to the king of Israel, who at first thought that a quarrel was intended. But Elisha desired Naaman to be directed to his house, that the power of the God of Israel might be vindicated. Naaman accordingly presented himself with his suite at Elisha's door, expecting to be treated as a patient of importance. He was mortified and affronted when told by message to bathe seven times in Jordan. But his wrath was appeased by one of his servants: he obeyed the command, dipped himself seven times in Jordan, and was healed. And now he desired to offer presents. He had received a wholesome lesson. His pride was abated; and he was convinced that Jehovah was the only God. But, with a lingering notion that the God of Israel's power was in some measure connected with Israelitish ground, he asked for two mules' burden of earth to erect therewith an altar to Jehovah in his own land. To him alone he would himself sacrifice, but still he would attend the king his master to the house and worship of Rimmon. Elisha's reply has been misunderstood. It expressed neither approbation nor disapprobation. It was just a commendation of the Syrian to the Lord, leaving him to God's further guidance and grace (2 Kings v.). Naaman's cure is alluded to by our Lord (Luke iv. 27).

NAAMATHITE. The designation of Zophar, one of the friends of Job (Job ii. 11, xi. 1, xx. 1, xlii. 9). The place from which this designation is derived has not been satisfactorily ascertained. See Carey, The Book of Job, note on ii. 11.

NA'AMITES. A family of Benjamin, descended from Naaman (Numb. xxvi. 40).

NA'ARAH (a girl, handmaid). One of the wives of Ashur, a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 5, 6).

NA'ARAI (id.). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 37), called also Paarai (2 Sam. xxiii. 35).

NA'ARAN (juvenile). A border-place of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 28); probably identical with NA'ARATH (a girl, handmaid) (Josh. xvi. 7), supposed to be not far from Jericho.

NA'ASHON (enchanter) (Exod. vi. 23). See NAHSHON.

NAAS'SON (Matt. i. 4; Luke iii. 32). A Greek form of Naashon or NAHSHON, which see.

NA'ATHUS (1 Esdr. ix. 31).

NA'BAL (foolish, impious). A man of the house of Caleb, who had large possessions in Carmel (of Judah). He treated David very churlishly and was saved from the disastrous consequence by his wife Abigail, whom David married after Nabal's death (1 Sam. xxv., xxvii. 3, xxx. 5; 2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 3). Nabal's character is sufficiently depicted in the history, obstinate, low-minded, and sensual, whom even his own dependents did not dare to warn of the danger his folly had provoked, but a very coward when after his debauch he learned from Abigail the whole truth.

NABARJAS (1 Esdr. ix. 44). Zechariah (Neh. viii. 4).

NA'BATHITES (1 Macc. v. 25). The descendants of Nebaioth.

NA'BOTH (fruit, produce). An inhabitant of Jezreel whose sad story is graphically related in the history of Ahab's reign. He had a vineyard which the king coveted, as it was hard by his palace, most probably just outside the city-gate. Naboth refused to sell or exchange it. Jezebel the queen, therefore, devised a wicked plan. She ordered a fast to be proclaimed as if some heavy guilt were on the city, and then Naboth, who as a chief citizen occupied a foremost place, to be accused of blasphemy. False witnesses having been procured, Naboth was convicted, and stoned, and as it would seem his sons with him (2 Kings ix. 26). Ahab then went to Jezreel to seize the vineyard, but was met there by Elijah, who pronounced a fearful sentence on him and on his house; which struck for a while the miserable king with terror, and led to a temporary repentance. But the deserved vengeance was only suspended. The dogs licked Ahab's blood (1 Kings xxi., xxii. 38; 2 Kings ix. 21, 25, 26, 35), and devoured Jezebel; and their son Joram's dead body was cast out upon the very plat of ground which had been illegally wrested from Naboth.

NABUCHODONOSOR (1 Esdr. i. 40, 41, 45, 48) Nebuchadnezzar. The name also occurs for some other Assyrian or Babylonish king in Tob. xiv. 15; Judith i. 1, and elsewhere.

NA'CHON (prepared). The name given to the threshing-floor by which Uzzah died (2 Sam. vi. 6). It is also called (1 Chron. xiii. 9) CHIDON, which see.

NA'CHOR (snorting).—(1 Josh. xxiv. 2). A Greek form for Nahor, Abraham's brother.—(2 Luke iii. 24). Abraham's grandfather. See NAHOR.

NA'DAB (spontaneous, liberal).—1. The eldest son of Aaron (Exod. vi. 23, xxiv. 1, 9, xxviii. 1; Lev. x. 1; Numb. iii. 2, 4, xxvi. 60, 61; 1 Chron. vi. 3, xxiv. 1, 2). See ABIHU.—2. The son and successor of Jeroboam I. king of Israel, whose sinful conduct he imitated. He reigned two years (954-953 B.C.), and while engaged at the siege of Gibbethon he and all his house were slain by Baasha (1 Kings xiv. 20, xv. 25-31).—3. One of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. ii. 28, 30).—4. A Benjamite, one of the family from which Saul descended (viii. 30, ix. 36).

NADAB'ATHA (1 Macc. ix. 37). The scene of an attack upon a wedding-party, in revenge for the death of John or Joannan, one of the Maccabean family. The locality has not been ascertained.

NAG'GE (illuminating). One of our Lord's ancestors (Luke iii. 25).

NAH'ALAL (pasture). A city of Zebulun, afterwards assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 35): it is also called Nahallal and Nahalol. It is probably identical with the modern Malul, a village about four miles from Nazareth in the plain of Esdraelon.

NAHA'LIEL (valley of God). A station of the Israelites on the confines of Moab (Numb. xxi. 19). Mr. Grove thinks it may be the Wady Encheyle (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 456).

NAH'ALLAL, NAH'AIOL (pasture) (Josh. xix. 15; Judges i. 30). See NAHALAL.
NA'HAM (consolation). One of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. iv. 19).

NAHAMANI (compassionate). One who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 7). The name is omitted in Ezra ii. 2.

NAH'ARAI, NAH'ARI (snorer). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 37; 1 Chron. xi. 39). He is said to have been Joab's armour-bearer.

NA'HASH (serpent).—1. A king of the Ammonites who laid siege to Jabesh-gilead, and required as the condition of a treaty that the inhabitants should lose their right eyes in order to disable them for military service. The fear of this chief seems to have been one of the reasons which inclined the Israelites to desire a monarchical government. It was the first act of Saul to defeat the invader and deliver Jabesh. At a subsequent period offices of friendship passed between Nahash and David; who wished also to maintain amicable relations with Hanun the Ammonitish king's successor, but was insulted by him in the person of his ambassadors (1 Sam. xi. 1-12, xii. 12; 2 Sam. x. 1-5; 1 Chron. xix. 1-5). It is probable that the same Nahash is intended in 2 Sam. xvii. 27.—2. The parent of Abigail, David's sister or half-sister, the mother of Amasa (25). Conjecture has been busy as to the person here intended. Some have supposed this Nahash to be Jesse, others Jesse's wife the mother of all his children. The least probable guess is that this Nahash was the king of Ammon; for the startling consequence would be that Jesse had married the concubine or divorced wife of a heathen king. To entitle such a notion to a degree of credit there should be some show of evidence for it.

NA'HATH (rest).—1. A grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 13, 17; 1 Chron. i. 37).—2. A Kohathite Levite (vi. 26) called also Toah (34).—3. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

NAH'BI (hidden). The spy selected from the tribe of Naphtali (Numb. xiii. 14).

NA'HOR (snorting).—1. One of the post-diluvian patriarchs, father of Terah and grandfather of Abraham (Gen. xi. 22-25; 1 Chron. i. 26). He is called Nahor in Luke iii. 34.—2. A son of Terah. It would seem that he must have accompanied his father to Haran; for it is sometimes styled the city of Nahor (Gen. xi. 26, 27, 29, xxii. 20-24, xxiv. 10, 15, 24, 47, xxix. 5, xxxi. 53). He is called Nahor in Josh. xxiv. 2.

NAH'SHON (enchanter). The prince of the tribe of Judah in the wilderness (Numb. i. 7, ii. 3, vii. 12, 17, x. 14; Ruth iv. 20; 1 Chron. ii. 10, 11). He is also called Naashon (Exod. vi. 23) and Naasson (Matt. i. 4; Luke iii. 32).

NAHUM (consolation). One of the minor prophets who is designated (Nah. i. 1) 'the Elkoshite.' It seems that there was an Elkosh, or Elkosha, in Galilee; and this there can be little doubt was the birth-place or residence of Nahum. There is, however, an Assyrian Elkosh on the east of the Tigris, not far from Nineveh; and here it is supposed by Ewald and others that the prophet lived (Ewald, Die Propheten des A.B., vol. i. pp. 349, 350), being one of the Israelites carried captive into Assyria. This they think accounts for the minute acquaintance he shows with Assyrian affairs beyond that of any other prophet, and for the small reference he makes to the kingdom of Judah which still existed. The so-called tomb of Nahum is still shown at this Elkosh; but there can be no stress laid on this fact: the tomb is not older than Christian times. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, it seems most probable that Nahum lived and prophesied in Palestine; in support of which view Henderson (Minor Prophets, Pref. to Nahum) produces several passages in which phrases occur similar to those in Isaiah (comp. Nah. i. 8 with Isai. viii. 8; Nah. i. 9 with Isai. x.

23; Nah. ii. 10 with Isai. xxiv. 1 and xxi. 3, Nah. i. 15 with Isai. lii. 7), and hence infers that Nahum, being contemporary with Isaiah, must have lived near him, and have borrowed from his writings.

The date of Nahum may be ascertained with tolerable exactness. It must of course have been before the capture of Nineveh, and most likely some considerable time before. Then there are historical references to suffering endured at the hands of the Assyrians. Thus, Nah. i. 11 probably intends Sennacherib; and 14 is a threatening against the same king; ii. 13 alludes to the Assyrian messengers who bore Sennacherib's summons to Jerusalem; and i. 9, 12 conveys a comfortable message that the Assyrian power should not attack Judah a second time. There is another note of time in iii. 8-10, where the capture of 'populous No,' i.e. Thebes, is mentioned as of late occurrence. History does not record this; but, as Bleek remarks (Einleitung in das A.T., p. 543), we may connect the passage with Isai. xx., and may reasonably believe that the desolation referred to was prior to the fourteenth of Hezekiah, the date of the Assyrian invasion of Judah. Hence we shall hardly err in placing Nahum in Hezekiah's reign.

NAHUM, THE BOOK OF (720-698 B.C.). This book is placed in our bibles seventh among those of the minor prophets. The purpose is to foreshow the entire destruction of the Assyrian empire, and specially of its metropolis Nineveh; with which is intermingled consolation for the prophet's countrymen who should be delivered from the oppressor and hear the happy news of peace. The whole is one undivided poem; in which, after an introduction (i. 1-8) describing in lofty terms the righteous power of God tempered with abundant mercy, the prophet notices the destruction of Sennacherib's army (9-12), and announces his death, with good news for Judah, to have doubtless its full significance in Messianic times (13-15). Then the fall and utter desolation of Nineveh is predicted with a singular minuteness of detail (ii., iii.).

Nahum's composition must be placed high among those of the minor prophets. He evinces great poetic power; his language is pure, his images beautifully appropriate. It may be added that he appears occasionally to refer to the Pentateuch: comp. Nah. i. 2, 3 with Exod. xx. 5, xxxiv. 6, 7, 14; Numb. xiv. 18; Deut. iv. 24. The destruction of Nineveh was almost a century after the delivery of Nahum's prophecy.

Commentaries on Nahum are included in those on the minor prophets.

NA'IDUS (1 Esdr. ix. 31).

NAIL. There are two Hebrew words rendered 'nail' or 'pin' in our version. Yathed, from a root signifying to fix fast, is a peg or nail forced into a wall (Isai. xxii. 25; Ezek. xv. 3). It is also a stake driven into the ground to secure a tent, a tent-pin (Judges iv. 21, 22; Isai. xxxiii. 20, where 'stakes'). This word is sometimes used (Judges xvi. 14), for the pin of the web, that by which the cloth was fastened in a loom. Hence, to drive a peg, to fasten a nail, i.e. in the wall, is a metaphorical expression denoting to render firm or stable (Isai. xxii. 23: comp. Ezra ix. 8). And, further, a nail or peg means a prince, who supports the weight of state affairs (Zech. x. 4). Mismeroeth, found only in the plural, denotes pointed things, nails of iron (1 Chron. xxii. 3), or of gold (2 Chron. iii. 9). This is the word used in Eccles. xii. 11: the words of the wise penetrate, sink deep into the heart.

A female captive, described as for a month bewailing her parents (Deut. xxi. 10-13), is said to pare her nails. The exact meaning of the passage is disputed. Most probably at the beginning of the month the head was shaven, and through the whole time the nails neglected. The word implying nail of the finger is sometimes used for a point or style for writing (Jer. xvii. 1, marg.).

NA'IN (pleasant). A town in Galilee, once a considerable place, but now little more than a cluster of ruins, still retaining its ancient name. It was here that our Lord raised the widow's son (Luke vii. 11-17). 'It is in keeping,' says Dr. Thomson (The Land and the Book, p. 445), 'with the one historic incident that renders it dear to the Christian, that its only antiquities are tombs. These are situated mainly on the east of the village; and it was in that direction, I presume, that the widow's son was being carried on that memorable occasion. It took me just an hour to ride from the foot of Tabor to Nain.'

NAI'OTH (habitations). A place close by Ramah, where Samuel dwelt, and whither David fled to him (1 Sam. xix. 18-23, xx. 1). Winer supposes it either a suburb of Ramah, or perhaps the buildings of the school of the prophets there (Bibl. RWE., art. 'Naijoth').

NAKED. This word is used literally to denote persons altogether unclothed (Gen. ii. 25, iii. 7), or those partially uncovered, being without their upper garments (1 Sam. xix. 24; John xxi. 7); also figuratively to express the being empty of worldly goods (Job i. 21); destitute of divine grace and righteousness, and so defenceless (2 Chron. xxviii. 19; Rev. iii. 17, 18). It further signifies that a thing is discovered, laid open to the eye (Job xxvi. 6; Heb. iv. 13).

It may be added, in illustration of Exod. iii. 5, that the orientals appear with bare feet in a superior presence, or in a place accounted holy: they manifest thus the respect which an European shows by uncovering his head. It is most probable that the Hebrew priests officiated with naked feet: see Pict. Bible, note on Lev. viii. 6.

NAME. A child sometimes received its name immediately upon its birth (Gen. xxxv. 18); sometimes at the time of circumcision (Luke i. 59). The mother frequently gave the name (Gen. xxix. 32-35), occasionally the father (xxxv. 18). Names were significant, and were suggested by some circumstance connected with the birth (xxxviii. 29, 30), some hope of the parent (xxx. 24), some prophetic anticipation (v. 29), some event of joy or sorrow (1 Sam. i. 30; 1 Chron. vii. 23), some suggestive divine command (Gen. xvi. 11, 15). Names were frequently changed, or a fresh one superadded, sometimes by God in making a covenant with an individual, or designating him to some office (xvii. 5, 15, xxxii. 28; Mark iii. 16, 17). Occasionally also an appellation was affixed as a mark of judgment for some great sin (Jer. xx. 3). Sovereigns, moreover, changed the names of vassal princes (2 Kings xxiii. 34, xxiv. 17); or of those they raised to dignities; or, if they were foreigners, they gave them a name significant in the language of the country into which they were brought (Gen. xli. 45; Dan. i. 7). Similarly persons often bore two names, sometimes those which had the same signification in different languages (John xi. 16), sometimes when the name in one language was altered by assuming a form more akin to the usage of another (2 Sam. xxiii. 39, compared with Matt. i. 6). Names were also changed by augmentation or contraction (2 Kings viii. 16, 21, 24, 25), or by substitution of a form having the same meaning (2 Sam. xi. 3 compared with 1 Chron. iii. 5; 2 Chron. xxi. 17 compared with xxii. 1). But we cannot always account for the variety of names by which the same individual is known (2 Sam. iii. 3 compared with 1 Chron. iii. 1). As in the case of persons, so in that of places appellations were significantly given (Exod. xvii. 7), and frequently the names were changed (Gen. xxviii. 19; Josh. xix. 47). The names by which the Deity made himself known were descriptive, often conveying the idea of covenant-blessing, as Jehovah, Jesus; comp. Rev. iii. 17, iv. 12, xiv. 1, xix. 12, xxii. 4, and see STONE. Hence the reverent estimation and use of such names (Lev. xxi. 11, 16; Isai. xxx. 27; Acts iv. 10, 12; Phil. ii. 9, 10). 'To know by name' implies favour and friendship (Exod. xxxiii. 12, 17).

NANEA (2 Macc. i. 13, 15). A Persian deity, perhaps the moon-goddess, whose temple Antiochus Epiphanes, fatally for himself, attempted to plunder.

NA'OMI (my pleasantness). The wife of Elimelech. Having lost husband and sons during a sojourn in Moab she prepared in sorrow to return to her own land, desiring that her name of joy might be changed into one more suitable to her sadness. But Ruth, her daughter-in-law, would not leave her; and a blessing was in store for Naomi. Boaz married Ruth: a son was born to them, Obed (David's grandfather), whom Naomi cherished and nursed as her own (Ruth i. iv.).

NA'PHISH (recreated). One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31); called also Nephish (v. 19).

NAPHISI (1 Esdr. v. 31). Nephusim (Ezra ii. 50).

NAPH'TALI (my wrestling). The son of Jacob by Bilhah, Rachel's maid. He had his name from the earnest struggles of Rachel with God, and in opposition to her sister, to obtain seed (Gen. xxx. 8, xxxv. 25; Exod. i. 4; 1 Chron. ii. 2). Of Naphtali's personal history we know nothing further than that he had four sons, who became heads of the families of the tribe (Gen. xlvi. 24; Numb. xxvi. 48, 49). According to Jewish tradition he was one of the five presented by Joseph to Pharaoh (Gen. xlvii. 2).

The prophetic blessing which Jacob pronounced upon the tribe descended from Naphtali, 'A hind let loose; he giveth goodly words' (xlix. 21), was remarkably fulfilled in the times of the judges. The men of this tribe have been considered deficient in self-reliance. They left some of their cities in the hands of the Canaanites (Judges i. 33); they did not like to combat alone but joined themselves with Zebulun (v. 18); their hero Barak was unwilling to go to battle unless Deborah would accompany him (iv. 8). 'But, when he had once conquered his hesitation, he and his soldiers shone by their heroic devotion and unwearied alacrity; conspicuous "on the heights of the field," they gave their countrymen a brilliant example of indomitable fortitude; so that . . . they were compared with the "graceful hind," which, light-footed and swift, easily eludes its persecutors on the mountain-heights. But, not satisfied with having bravely fought in the war, Naphtali helped to celebrate it by the immortal song which is attributed to "Deborah, and Barak the son of Abinoam" (v. 1). Even if the tribe gave no other proof of its poetical genius, of the careful culture of the mind, and of the artistic conceptions of which it was capable, it amply deserved the encomium bestowed upon it, that it uttered "words of beauty." Thus the text is entirely intelligible by a reference to the time of Sisera and Barak' (Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 760, 761). The number of the males in the tribe of Naphtali at the first census after leaving Egypt was 53,400: its place on march was the rear-guard (Numb. ii. 29, 30). At the time of the second census the number had diminished: it was then only 45,400 (xxvi. 50).

The blessing of Moses was emphatic (Deut. xxiii. 23); and fully to interpret it we must examine the location of the tribe in Palestine. Its possession was in the north, bordered by the Anti-Libanus, which seems to have partially extended into this territory, so that mention is made of a 'mountain of Naphtali' (Josh. xx. 7). Southwards Naphtali abutted on Zebulun, in the west on Asher: in the east it reached to the Jordan and the lakes of Merom and Galilee, and, according to Josephus even to Damascus (Antiq., lib. v. 1, § 22). It is difficult to trace exactly the boundary-line; as many of the places mentioned (Josh. xix. 33, 34) have not been identified. And there is one remarkable part of the description that the coast reached 'to Judah upon Jordan toward the sun-rising.' That Naphtali could border upon the territory of Judah proper seems impossible: the following explanation, therefore, has been offered. Jair had taken and occupied a number of small towns on the east of the Jordan. But Jair, though by the mother's side descended from Manasseh, was by the father's side a descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22). Accordingly his possessions locally in Manasseh were reckoned to Judah; and it was to the point opposite these that Naphtali extended. Now this territory situated as just described was peculiarly favoured in climate and soil. Kalisch (ubi supra) referring to Josephus, dwells on 'the rare productiveness of this part of the country, appearing like "a happy contention of the seasons, each laying claim upon the district," and bringing forth, during ten months of the year, both the fruits of the cold, hot, and temperate zones, as walnuts, dates, and olives; as if it had been "the ambition of nature to force plants, naturally enemies to one another, to agree together." Surely Naphtali was 'satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord.' It possessed, too, 'the west (by which some understand the sea of Galilee) and the south,' the south, that is, in respect to the northern Dan mentioned in the preceding verse. Dr. Thomson's testimony is to the same effect; and it is the rather cited because it replies to an objection sometimes made that the Israelites could not have had the difficulty in extirpating wild beasts which we find represented in scripture. 'It is,' he says, 'with a kind of pleasure altogether peculiar that one wanders over the park-like hills and through the solemn ravines of Naphtali. With a sort of breathless expectation you dive into wild gorges deeper and deeper, ever on the watch for a wolf, wild boar, or wild Arab, and held wide awake, hour after hour, communing with the grand, the beautiful, and the sublime. It is only by thus exploring the rocky mysteries of the country that we can discover the wisdom of that divinely-established process of exterminating the original inhabitants little by little before the Israelites. "Thou mayest not consume them at once, lest the beasts of the field increase upon thee" (Exod. xxiii. 29, 30). I am not surprised to find this matter of wild beasts and their depredations often referred to in the bible, nor to read of lions, leopards, and bears in the very heart of the land. The lion, it is true, has been driven back into the desert; but, notwithstanding the multiplication of fire-arms, and other modes of destruction far more effective than the ancients possessed, these wadies now abound in large leopards, in bears, wolves, hyenas, and many other kinds of destructive animals' (The Land and the Book, p. 286).

A 'ruler' of this tribe was appointed by David (1 Chron. xxvii. 19); and under Solomon we find it one of the commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 15). One of the refuge-cities, Kadesh, stood within its territory (Josh. xxi. 22). At the division of the kingdom Naphtali, of course, was a part of the northern monarchy; and its people shared the desolations deserved by the sins of Israel. Their territory was ravaged by Ben-hadad, king of Syria (1 Kings xv. 20); and the inhabitants were, at a later period, carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvi. 29). But on Naphtali and Zebulun there was to dawn a brighter light. It was predicted by an ancient prophet (Isai. ix. 1, 2): it was fulfilled when the Redeemer lived and taught and did his wondrous works in Galilee (Matt. iv. 15, 16). For Galilee comprised the districts of those two tribes and of Asher and Issachar. Through many of the towns and villages of Naphtali spread widely the glorious gospel of Christ. The present state of this part of Palestine is sufficiently indicated in the extracts which have been made. In the New Testament Naphtali is called Nephthalim.

NAPH'THAR (2 Macc. i. 20-36). A substance called also Nephi, of which a legendary account is given as found in a pit where, before the captivity, the sacred fire was hidden. Tradition identifies the pit with the Be'er Eynub close by Jerusalem.

NAPH'TUHIM (border-people). An Egyptian tribe, descendants of Mizraim (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chron. i. 11). Kalisch supposes them the inhabitants of the Libyan town Napata, in the north of the province of Meroe. It was a rich and magnificent town, and a royal residence; of which very remarkable monuments exist among the ruins. It was well situated for commerce, and flourished for many centuries, till it was, 22 B.C., taken by Augustus and plundered by Petronius; after which it rapidly declined (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., pp. 265, 266).

NAPKIN (Luke xix. 20; John xi. 44, xx. 7). This was a handkerchief, the Greek name being derived from its use of wiping off perspiration. In the two places last referred to, it was employed to tie up the chin of a corpse.

NARCIS'SUS. A person to some of whose household, being Christians, St. Paul sent salutation (Rom. xvi. 11). It is often supposed that the famous freedman and favourite of the emperor Claudius is meant. But this is questionable. That Narcissus was executed at the beginning of Nero's reign; and the epistle was written later. Besides, Narcissus was probably not an uncommon name.

NARD (Mark xiv. 3, marg.). See SPIKE-NARD.

NAS'BAS (Tob. xi. 18). One of Tobit's relatives.

NA'SITH (1 Esdr. v. 32). Neziath (Ezra ii. 54).

NA'SOE (1 Macc. xi. 67). The Hazor of the bible.

NATHAN (given, sc. of God).—1. One of the sons of David, born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 14; 1 Chron. iii. 5, xiv. 4; Zech. xii. 12; Luke iii. 31).—2. A prophet, who delivered the divine message to David after his sin with Bath-sheba; we find him also taking part in other transactions of the time (2 Sam. vii. 1-17, xii. 1-25; 1 Kings i. 8-45; 1 Chron. xvii. 1-15; 2 Chron. ix. 29, xxix. 25; Psal. li., title). Probably also it is he that is mentioned in 1 Kings iv. 5.—3. A resident at Zobah, father of one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 36; 1 Chron. xi. 38).—4. A descendant of Judah (ii. 36).—5. One whom Ezra sent in order to obtain the company of some priests and Levites (Ezra viii. 16).—6. A person who had married a foreign wife (x. 39).

NATHAN'AEL (given of God). A native of Cana, one of the earliest disciples of our Lord. He was brought to Jesus by Philip, and was pronounced 'an Israelite indeed, in whom' was 'no guile' (John i.

45-51). Nathanael was afterwards with our Saviour at the remarkable interview by the sea of Tiberias subsequently to the resurrection (xxi. 2). We can scarcely imagine any but apostles present on this occasion; but the first three evangelists do not mention Nathanael as an apostle, or at all. They do, however, mention Bartholomew, and generally in conjunction with Philip. Most probably, then, Nathanael was BARTHOLOMEW, which see.

NATHANAEL.—1 (1 Esdr. i. 9). Nethaneel (2 Chron. xxxv. 9).—2 (1 Esdr. ix. 22). Nethaneel (Esra x. 22).—3 (Judith viii. 1). An ancestor of Judith.

NATHANIAS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Nathan (Esra x. 39).

NATHAN-ME'LECH (placed, i.e. appointed, by the king). An eunuch or officer of state in Jerusalem (2 Kings xxiii. 11).

NATION, NATIONS. See GENTILES.

NATURE. This word variously implies the regular course of things according to God's ordinance (Rom. i. 26, 27), habit, feeling of propriety, common sense or general custom (ii. 14; 1 Cor. xi. 14), birth or natural descent (Gal. ii. 15), essence (Gal. iv. 8), qualities or dispositions of the mind, whether good (2 Pet. i. 4) or evil (Eph. ii. 3).

NA'UM (consolation). One in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Luke ii. 25).

NAVES (1 Kings vii. 33). The original word put here for the central part of a wheel implies protuberance. Elsewhere it is the 'bosses' of a shield (Job xv. 26), and has other meanings.

NA'VE (Ecclus. xlv. 1). Nun, the father of Joshua.

NAVY (1 Kings ix. 26, 27, x. 11, 22). See SHIP.

NAZ'ARENE. When our Lord was taken as a child to Nazareth, which thus became for many years his dwelling-place, the evangelist records this as a fulfilment of prophecy (Matt. ii. 23), citing no particular place, but referring generally to 'the prophets,' who predicted Messiah's humble and despised condition (e.g. Psal. xxii. 6; Isai. lii., liii.). The words, 'He shall be called a Nazarene,' do not occur in the writings of the Old Testament; but the thing or meaning conveyed by them is sufficiently obvious. For the Galileans generally were scorned; but the people of Nazareth were proverbially stigmatized. So that Jesus, living at Nazareth, was from that very circumstance contemned; and we find in the course of his public career his connection with that town repeatedly objected to him, as a great reason why his pretensions could not be allowed (John i. 46, vii. 41, 52). Most justly, therefore, does St. Matthew note that event, which branded him with an ill-omened name 'Jesus of Nazareth' (comp. Acts xxiv. 5), as an exact fulfilment of what ancient seers had foretold. It is an error to connect Matt. ii. 23 with Isai. xi., from a fancied relation of the original Hebrew word there translated 'branch,' with the name Nazareth.

NAZARETH (perhaps separated?). A town of lower Galilee, in the territory of Zebulun.

'Four miles,' says a late traveller, 'south of the strong Greek city of Sephoris, hidden away among gentle hills, then covered from the base to the crown with vineyards and fig-trees, lay a natural nest or basin of rich red and white earth, star-like in shape, about a mile in width, and wondrously fertile. Along the scarred and chalky slope of the highest of these hills spread a small and lovely village, which, in a land where every stone seemed to have a story, is remarkable as having had no public history, and no distinguishable native name. No great road led up to this sunny nook. No traffic came into it: no legions marched through it. Trade, war, adventure, pleasure, pomp, passed by it, flowing from west to east, from east to west, along the Roman road. But the meadows were a-glow with wheat and barley. Near the low ground ran a belt of gardens, fenced with loose stones, in which myriads of green figs, red pomegranates, and golden citrons ripened in the summer sun. High up the slopes, which were lined and planted like the Rhine at Bingen, hung vintages of purple grapes. In the plain among the corn, and beneath the mulberry-trees and figs, shone daisies, poppies, tulips, lilies, and anemones, endless in their profusion, brilliant in their dyes. Low down on the hill-side sprang a well of water, bubbling, plentiful, and sweet; and above this fountain of life, in a long street straggling from the fountain to the synagogue, rose the homesteads of many shepherds, craftsmen, and vine-dressers. It was a lovely and humble place, of which no poet, no ruler, no historian of Israel had ever yet taken note' (W. H. Dixon, The Holy Land, 1865).

No: it is not mentioned in the Old Testament; but we read enough of it in gospel history. Here Mary resided when the angel announced to her that of her womb Messiah should be born (Luke i. 26-28). From Nazareth Joseph went with Mary to Beth-lehem, to the taxing (ii. 4, 5), and at Beth-lehem, according to prophecy, the divine Child was born (Matt. ii. 5, 6; Luke ii. 6); and there, probably, they intended to settle, believing it most fitting that the heir of David's throne should dwell in David's city. But first the cruel quest of Herod, and then, after their return from Egypt, the fear of Archelaus induced them, by heavenly motion, to return to their original abode at Nazareth, where our Lord's infancy and youth were spent (Matt. ii. 13-23; Luke ii. 39-51). It was from Nazareth that Jesus went to the Jordan to be baptized by John (Mark i. 9); and it would seem that he returned thither, though for but a brief season. When in Galilee, after his baptism, he was chiefly at Capernaum or Cana (John ii. 1, 12, iv. 46). His early Judean ministry succeeded: subsequently to which he visited Nazareth, and preached there in the synagogue. His family was probably still resident in the place. But so maddened were the people at his address that they attempted to precipitate him from the hill on which their city was built. And thenceforth Capernaum was his home, so far as the Redeemer had an earthly home (Matt. iv. 13; Luke iv. 16-31), though it is possible that one more visit was paid to Nazareth: see JESUS, pp. 466, 467. We afterwards hear little of the place except as a designation of our Lord, sometimes merely descriptive (Matt. xxi. 11; John i. 45), but most generally by way of reproach (Matt. xxvi. 71; John xviii. 5, 7, xix. 19); for proverbially no good thing could come out of Nazareth (l. 46).

Nazareth lies on the western side of a narrow vale, to the north of the plain of Esdraelon. It is south of Cana, an hour and a half from Tabor, eight hours from Tiberias, and about equi-distant from the lake of Gennesaret and the Mediterranean. It grew into some importance at the time of the crusades, and has now, under the name en-Názirah, about 3000 inhabitants. Many places are shown as scenes of events connected with our Lord's history, such as the cave of the annunciation, the kitchen of Mary, the workshop of Joseph, the dining-table of our Lord and his apostles, the synagogue where he read the prophet Isaiah, and the mount of precipitation. It is needless to say that most of these rest on no sufficient authority. The precipice is certainly well suited to the purpose with which the Nazarenes were actuated; but it is two miles from the modern town. Dr. Thomson, indeed, mentions a ruin much nearer to it, where he was told the ancient Nazareth stood, higher therefore than the present; but he adds, 'On my way back through the upper part of the town, I found precipices enough for all the requirements of the narrative in Luke. Most of them, it is true, appear to be partly artificial; but doubtless there were some of the same sort in ancient days.' He observed, too, the bold immodest aspect of the girls to be found at the fountain of the annunciation (The Land and the Book, pp. 431, 432). Shut in by hills—fourteen they are said to be—Nazareth is hot, and the views are confined. But from the so-called mount of precipitation there is a noble prospect.

NAZARITE. A person separated and devoted to the Lord by a special vow, the terms of which were carefully prescribed (Numb. vi. 1-21). It has been imagined that this kind of vow already existed in Egypt, and that it was thence adopted into Israel with particular regulations. There is, however, no certain proof of this. Either male or female might become a Nazarite.

The restrictions of the vow were threefold. There must be entire abstinence from all strong drink, from the juice of the grape, and from every thing belonging to the vine. A similar prohibition was given to the priests when performing the service of their ministry (Lev. x. 9); that holiness being in both cases signified and required, without which no man shall see the Lord. The second injunction was that the hair of the Nazarite was to grow, no razor touching his head all the days of his separation. The intention of this prohibition has been questioned. Perhaps the explanation of Dr. Fairbairn is as reasonable as any. Referring to the expression of St. Paul that long hair in a man is ordinarily a sign of effeminate weakness (1 Cor. xi. 14), he argues that 'the Nazarite, who gave himself up by a solemn vow of consecration to God, and who should therefore ever feel the authority and the power of his God upon him, most fitly wore his hair long, as the badge of his entire and willing subjection to the law of his God. By the wearing of this badge he taught the church then, and the church indeed of all times, that the natural power and authority of man, which in nature is so apt to run out into self-will, stubbornness, and pride, must in grace yield itself up to the direction and supremacy of Jehovah. The true child of God has renounced all claim to the control and mastery of his own condition. He feels he is not his own, but bought with a price, and therefore bound to glorify God with his body and spirit which are his' (Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. sect. viii. vol. ii. p. 391). The third restriction was, like that laid upon the high priest (Lev. xxi. 10-12), that the Nazarite should not defile himself in any case for the dead, indicating not merely the purity which every one set apart for God should cultivate, but more pointedly that, being alive to God, he has nothing to do with that death which is sin's penalty, and with the sin of which death is the wages. If unavoidably the Nazarite became so defiled, he was to shave his head, bring a trespass-offering, for the discharge of the debt he had thus contracted to the Lord, also a sin-offering, and a burnt-offering, and to begin again his vow; all the time before the defilement being lost. And, when the term of the vow expired, the Nazarite brought a sin-offering, for he was still a sinful creature, a burnt-offering, and a peace-offering, with the usual appendages, his hair being shorn or shaven, and cast into the fire, under the sacrifice of the peace-offerings, indicating the ordinary state of friendly communion with God.

The customary term of the Nazarite vow, according to the rabbis, was thirty days. But sometimes it was to continue for life. Three instances are recorded in scripture of persons so sanctified and devoted from their mother's womb—those of Samson (Judges xiii. 5), of Samuel (1 Sam. i. 11), and of John the Baptist (Luke i. 15). Such persons are said to have had certain sacerdotal privileges. It is doubtful whether the vow which St. Paul had upon him was that of the Nazarite (Acts xviii. 18: comp. xxi. 23-26); but on the question whether the head might be shaven out of Palestine, see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Nasiräer.' It will not escape notice that the Nazarites were not bound to celibacy; their vow therefore gives no countenance to any profession involving such a restriction.

NE'AH (motion, perhaps earthquake). A place on the border of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 13).

NEAP'OLIS (new-town). A sea-port on the coast of the Ægean, originally belonging to Thrace, and about ten miles from Philippi, the frontier Macedonian town; but it was attached to the province of Macedonia by Vespasian. St. Paul landed there on his voyage to Europe (Acts xvi. 11). The village of Kavalla is on the site of Neapolis, containing present about 5000 or 6000 Inhabitants: see Biblioth. Sacr., Oct., 1860, pp. 881-885, 892, 893.

NEARIAH (servant of Jehovah).—1. One of David's descendants (1 Chron. iii. 22, 23).—2. A Simeonite chieftain (iv. 42).

NEBA'I (perhaps fruit-bearer). One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 19).

NEBAI'OTH, NEBA'JOTH (heights). Nebaioth was the eldest son of Ishmael (1 Chron. i. 29) called Nebajoth in Gen. xxv. 13, xxviii. 9, xxxvi. 3. His descendants were the Nabathæans, a most distinguished Arabian tribe. They originally devoted themselves to the feeding of cattle (Isai. lx. 7); their habits were simple, and their principles independent. Afterwards they built towns, especially the noted Petra: they were under a monarchical government; but the power of their king was limited. In later times they applied themselves to commerce. They were plundered by Sennacherib, and had wars with the Syrian kings. By this time their manners had deteriorated, and they were little better than a nation of robbers. But the Syrian wars curbed and reformed them: they had the confidence of more than one of the Maccabean princes; and it was not till the reign of Trajan that they were fully subjected to the Roman power. The extent of their territories varied at different times, according to their successes and commercial enterprise. See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 477-482; and comp. an article in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii., pp. 476-479.

NEBAL'LAT (jolly in secret). A town inhabited after the captivity by Benjamites (Neh. xi. 34). It was probably in the territory of Dan, on the site of the modern Beit Nebala, north-east of Lydda.

NE'BAT (aspect). The father of Jeroboam I. (1 Kings xi. 26, xii. 2, 15, and elsewhere).

NE'BO (interpreter?). One of the Assyrian gods; worshipped also with higher honours by the Babylonians; represented by the Hebrew prophet as unable to deliver the great city from captivity (Isai. xvi. 1). The name is incorporated with the appellations of several of the Babylonian kings, as Nabonassar, &c.; so that he seems to have been regarded as the tutelary deity of the royal race. He presided over literature, and corresponded with the Hermes or Mercury of the Greeks and Romans: he is also identified with the planet Mercury. The Assyrian monarch Pul set up a statue of Nebo, which is now in the British Museum brought from Nimroud. Across the body of it is a cuneiform inscription of twelve lines; the arrow-head of cuneiform writing being his special emblem. The town of Borsippa was under his protection; and he had a temple there, repaired or re-built by Nebuchadnezzar. The ruins of this temple are the modern Birs Nimrud. See BABEL, pp. 84, 85.

NE'BO (id.). 1. A mountain in the land of Moab, over-against Jericho. It was probably a spur or summit of the ridge of Pisgab, belonging to the chain of Abarim (Deut. xxxii. 49, xxxiv. 1). It was from Nebo that the Lord showed Moses the extent of Canaan, just before his death. According to Burckhardt, the Jebel Attâras is Nebo; but Robinson questions the identity; and at least one other summit has been suggested. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Nebo, 1'.—2. A town occupied by the tribe of Reuben (Numb. xxxii. 3, 38; 1 Chron. v. 8). It would appear after the captivity of the trans-Jordanic tribes to have fallen under the power of Moab (Isai. xv. 2; Jer. xlviii. 1, 22). Possibly it was not far from the mountain so called; but Eusebius locates it eight miles south of Heshbon.—3. A place, belonging to Judah, called for distinction's sake 'the other Nebo' (Ezra ii. 29; Neh. vii. 33). Perhaps it may be identical with the modern Beit Nabah, twelve miles north-west of Jerusalem. Some of the inhabitants, who returned from captivity, had married strange wives (Ezra x. 43). It has been supposed that both these towns derived their name from the worship of the god Nebo; or they may have been denominated from a Hebrew word signifying 'high.'

NEBUCHADNEZZAR (the prince Nebo's king, or, perhaps preferably, Nebo is the protector against attack). The most celebrated of the kings of Babylon, great for both his warlike achievements, and his magnificent works in embellishing his capital and promoting the internal prosperity of his dominions. His name is variously given in scripture, being usually Nebuchadnezzar in Jeremiah and Ezekiel; and it is found in very different forms in profane writers. Nebuchadnezzar was the son of a monarch generally called Nabopolassar, the founder of the great Babylonian empire. When Nabopolassar rebelled against Assyria, he cemented the alliance between himself and the Medes by marrying his son Nebuchadnezzar to Amuhea, daughter of the Median prince Astyages. In the later years of his father's reign Nebuchadnezzar appears to have headed the armies of the empire; and it was under his command that the victory at Carchemish was gained over Pharaoh-necho's army, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, king of Judah (Jer. xlvi. 2). He is at that time called king, as the ostensible chief of the Babylonian hosts, though he did not really ascend the throne till a while after. It would seem most probable that he had previously marched to Jerusalem in Jehoiakim's third year, put that king, who was a vassal of Egypt, in chains, to carry him to Babylon, and actually sent many of the young nobles of Judah and the sacred vessels thither (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7; Dan. i. 1, 2). Jehoiakim, however, compelled to submit, was re-placed upon his throne; and from that date began the Babylonish subjection, which lasted three years (2 Kings xxiv. 1). The events of the time are so concisely related in scripture that it is confessedly difficult to arrange them in their true order; and hasty objectors have imagined irreconcilable discrepancies. The explanation of Zündel is adopted here (Unters. über die Abfass. des B. Daniel, pp. 19-26).

After the victory at Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar, who was pressing his advantages against Egypt, received intelligence of the decease of his father. He, therefore, deemed it necessary to hasten back to Babylon, where his authority was at once acknowledged, and he commenced his actual reign, 604 B.C. (Josephus, Contr. Apion., lib. i. § 19).

It was in his second year, three years after Daniel had been placed at the Babylonian court (Dan. i. 5), that Nebuchadnezzar had his prophetic dream (ii.). It has been objected that it is unreasonable to suppose that the king would require an interpretation of a vision which he had forgotten. But there is no force in the objection. Nebuchadnezzar very sensibly thought that, if the Chaldean wise men were really possessed of the secrets of heaven, they could just as easily tell him what his dream was, as give him the interpretation. The time to which we must assign the erection of the image in the plain of Dura is not mentioned (iii.). The transaction is more of a political than a religious cast. Doubtless, as the three Jews felt, to comply with the king's mandate would be to transgress the command of Jehovah. But Nebuchadnezzar's purpose seems to have been to require an open mark of subjection to the symbol of his own power from the civil officers in the various districts and provinces subjected to his sway. Daniel held then no civil office. He was attached to the court as 'chief of the governors over all the wise men': he, therefore, was not required to perform this homage.

Whether Nebuchadnezzar made another personal campaign in Judea during Jehoiakim's life is questionable. The scripture, speaking of the Jewish king's rebellion, says that bands of Chaldees, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites were sent against him, but is silent as to any march of the great king himself (2 Kings xxiv. 2). Comp. Josephus, Antiq., lib. x. 6, § 3. And, when Jehoiachin had succeeded, it is said first that his servants besieged Jerusalem before that Nebuchadnezzar besieged it (2 Kings xxiv. 10, 11). Be this as it may, Jehoiachin submitted, and his uncle Zedekiah was placed on the throne, who afterwards rebelled; and Nebuchadnezzar's forces again reduced Jerusalem in his nineteenth year, while the wretched king of Judah, brought to his conqueror at Riblah, was blinded; his sons having been previously slain before his eyes. And it is noted that different parties of captives were carried to Babylon in Nebuchadnezzar's seventh (the year of Jehoiachin's short reign), eighteenth (just before the burning of Jerusalem), and twenty-third years (Jer. lli.).

Little more can be said with certainty of the great emperor's campaigns. He besieged Tyre in the seventh year of his reign; and the siege lasted on for thirteen years. The Egyptians attempted to relieve Jerusalem during the investment in Zedekiah's reign (xxxvii. 5-12); but they were either defeated, or retired through fear of the superior Babylonian force; and Nebuchadnezzar, after the reduction of Phœnicia and Judea, invaded and subdued Egypt (xliv. 8-13, xlv. 13-26; Ezek. xxix. 1-20): see Josephus, Antiq., lib. x. 9, § 7. And, according to Megasthenes, quoted by Eusebius, Præp. Evang., lib. ix. 41, he is said to have extended his conquests through Libya into Iberia or Spain. His madness (Dan. iv.) was probably in the latter part of his reign, which lasted forty-three years: he died 561 B.C., probably upwards of eighty, and was succeeded by his son Evil-merodach.

Nebuchadnezzar was not merely a conqueror: he was distinguished by the magnificence of his civil administration. Many of the great works which adorned Babylon, temples, palaces, the hanging-gardens, constructed (we are told) for the gratification of his queen, Amuhea, to remind her of her native Median mountains, the canals, reservoirs, &c. &c., not in the metropolis alone, but in many other cities of his dominions, were executed by Nebuchadnezzar; a proof of which is that his name is inscribed on multitudes of the bricks yet remaining in Babylonia.

This monarch was, indeed, one of the great ones of the earth (ii. 37, 38, iv. 36). With vast abilities he was vain-glorious, passionate, and cruel; yet there are traits of nobleness in the way in which he received the intelligence of the judgment that was to befall him, and in his account of it, also in the honour he gave to Daniel. How far he became really acquainted with the power of Jehovah must be uncertain. Inscriptions, and incidental notices of scripture, seem to show him devoted to his god Bel-merodach; and he might but regard the God of Israel as a local deity inferior to Bel. It would be pleasing to draw, if we could, a different conclusion from Dan. iv.

NEBUCHADREZZAR (Jer. xxi. 2, 7, xxii. 25, xxiv. 1, xxv. 1, 9, and elsewhere). See NEBUCHADNEZZAR.

NEBUSHAS'BAN (adherent of Nebo, or Mercury). A chief officer (or perhaps eunuch) of Babylon (Jer. xxxix. 13).

NEBUZAR'ADAN (the chief whom Nebo favours). One of the great military officers in the army of Nebuchadnezzar, who was charged to protect Jeremiah the prophet (2 Kings xxv. 8, 11, 20; Jer. xxxix. 9, 10, 11, 13, xl. 1-5, xli. 10, xliii. 6, lii. 12, 15, 16, 26, 30).

NE'CHO, NE'CHOH (lame?). A king of Egypt, the second of the name, the sixth of the twenty-sixth dynasty. He was the son and successor of Psammetichus, and reigned, according to Herodotus sixteen years, according to Manetho six, 611-605 B.C. Palmer, however, supposes Necho to have reigned fifteen years, 609-594 (Egyptian Chronicles, vol. ii. p. 900). Necho was a man of enterprise: he undertook to connect the Mediterranean and Red seas by a canal; and his vessels, manned by Phœnician sailors, are said to have circumnavigated Africa. See PHARAOH, 9.

a prostrate foe signified complete triumph over him (Josh. x. 24; 2 Sam. xxii. 41). To put the hand in the neck of another was to arrest him when trying to flee, importing therefore conquest (Gen. xlix. 8; Job xvi. 12). To place a yoke upon the neck, as on a beast of draught, implied the reducing to captivity (Gen. xxvii. 40; Deut. xxviii. 48; Isai. x. 27; Jer. xxvii. 2, 8, 11, xxviii. 10-14; Acts xv. 10). Hence, to stiffen the neck was to refuse the yoke, i.e. to rebel (2 Chron xxxvi. 13; Neh. ix. 29). The yoke of pri soners or slaves was a collar to which their chains might be attached.

Ornaments were often worn about the neck; as they still are in most countries (Gen. xli. 42; Prov. i. 9, iii. 22). See CHAIN.

NECO'DAN (1 Esdr. v. 37). Nekoda (Ezra ii. 60).

NECROMANCER (Deut. xviii. 11). See DIVINATION, MAGIC.

NEDABI'AH (whom Jehovah impels). One of David's descendants (1 Chron. iii. 18).

NEEDLE (Matt. xix. 24; Mark x. 25; Luke xviii. 25). We must suppose the expression in these places a proverbial one. Instances have been produced from the Talmud of proverbs very similar; there is, therefore, no occasion to imagine any error in the text. In Matt. xxiii. 24 a camel is introduced to signify something large; and there the literal interpretation of the words is impossible, as it is here. Our Lord meant by using a common proverb to show that the thing was exceedingly difficult—humanly speaking, an impossibility, which yet divine grace could accomplish.

NEEDLE-WORK (Exod. xxvi. 36, xxvii. 16, xxviii. 39, xxxvi. 37, xxxviii. 18, xxxix. 29; Judges v. 30; Psal. xlv. 14). See EMBROIDER.

NEEMIAS (Ecclus. xlix. 13; 2 Macc. i. 18-36, ii. 13). Nehemiah, of whom the apocryphal writer relates a legendary story.

NEG'INAH (a stringed instrument) (Psal. lxi. title), the singular of NEG'INTH (Psalms iv., vi., liv., lv., lxxvii., lxxvi., titles; Hab. iii. 19, marg.). It would seem that the compositions to which this expression is prefixed were to be sung or chanted with an instrumental accompaniment.

NEHE'LAMITE. A person named Shemah is thus designated: it is not known from what place (Jer. xxix. 24, 31, 32).

NEHEMI'AH (whom Jehovah comforts).—
1. One who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).

2. Nehemiah, an eminent Jew, who is variously said to have been a Levite, and of the tribe of Judah, a descendant of the royal house. These traditions rest on no ground of certainty; but the last is the more probable of the two. For the post he held of cup-bearer at the Persian court was not likely to be bestowed on any but a person of distinction. It was Artaxerxes Longimanus whom Nehemiah thus served. And, while in attendance in the twentieth year of that king's reign, his countenance was so sad for the evil news he had heard of the desolation of Jerusalem and afflicted state of the returned remnant of Jews there, that the monarch enquired the cause. Nehemiah, lifting up his heart to God, entreated that he might be permitted to visit Jerusalem; and the king accordingly sent him thither, with a commission as governor. There he re-built the walls, and, in conjunction with Ezra, carried on a work of reformation among the people. His administration lasted twelve years; and then he returned to the Persian court; but after some time, variously estimated from five to nine years, he was permitted to resume his office at Jerusalem, to redress the abuses which had grown up during his absence. Here it is probable he spent the remainder of his life, having shown himself a humble, disinterested, pious man, and a zealous, patriotic, and conscientious governor. His administration, including the interval, lasted probably from 445 to 409 B.C. These are the dates assigned by Prideaux, Connection, book vi.; but we cannot fix any certain time for the second administration. The latest date in scripture is the 32nd of Artaxerxes (Neh. xiii. 6).

3. A person who had a charge in re-building the walls of Jerusalem (ii. 16).

NEHEMI'AH, THE BOOK OF. This book was placed by the Jews in one volume with that of Ezra: contemporary events are treated of in both.

The book of Nehemiah may be roughly divided into three sections; I. (i.-vii.) comprising the narrative of Nehemiah's appointment to office, his re-building, in spite of opposition, the walls of Jerusalem, and his purpose of bringing the people to an orderly settlement. In II. (viii.-x.) there is an account of certain religious solemnities; and in III. (xi.-xiii.) we have various lists, appointments, and settlements, with a recital of some acts of Nehemiah's administration on resuming his post.

In many parts of this book Nehemiah appears as speaking in the first person; but there are difficulties in the way of believing that the whole proceeded from his pen. It is true that some of the arguments urged, as that taken from the use of different divine names, are not of much weight; still, when we find a perceptible diversity of diction, when in parts of the book Nehemiah seems to retire into the background, when his own title varies and the designation of the nobles is not the same, when, too, we see lists extended beyond what we can reasonably imagine was the limit of Nehemiah's life, we can hardly feel coming to the conclusion that various hands contributed to this book. The following will probably be found not an unfair apportionment of the parts of it. Nehemiah evidently was in the habit of noting the occurrences of his time. Now the section, Neh. i. 1-vii. 5, is written in the first person: there is an uniformity in its style; and several favourite expressions recur. The writer also declares that he found a document (nearly identical with Ezra ii.) which he adds to his own narrative, Neh. vii. 6-73. There is no reason to doubt that the whole of this section, therefore, belongs to Nehemiah himself. But in viii.-x. there is a change: the governor is spoken of in the third person; and, though Keil has endeavoured to account for this (Einleitung, § 152), maintaining the Nehemiah authorship, his reasons are not satisfactory, and it is most probable that the section is from another pen. Hävernick (Einleitung, § 187, vol. ii. 1, pp. 305, &c.) would ascribe it to Ezra; but this is doubtful. The remainder of the book, xi.-xiii., was, with small exceptions, most likely written by Nehemiah: xi. 1 seems to connect itself with the first part of vii. 5. But the list of xii. 1-26 was from a later hand, as the succession of high priests is carried down to Jaddua, who was contemporary with Alexander the Great; or else the final editor added some names. Jaddua, however, may have been born before Nehemiah's death: see Zündel, Krit. Unters. über die Abfass. des B. Daniel, pp. 227, 228. The verses xii. 44-47 may possibly not be by Nehemiah, as xiii. 1 is closely connected with xii. 43. We may believe, then, that, as much of this book was written by Nehemiah, but not the whole, it was ultimately arranged in its present form by some one, the author of the Chronicles very possibly (to which it, with Ezra, formed an appendix), who, under divine guidance, has transmitted to future ages of the church this most instructive narrative as we now have it.

NEHEMI'AS.—1 (1 Esdr. v. 8). Nehemiah

Ezra ii. 2).—2 (1 Esdr. v. 40). Nehemiah, the governor.

NE'HILOTH (Psal. v., title). This word, signifying perforated, showed that the psalm was to be accompanied by the music of a wind-instrument: some have supposed that the organ, others that flutes were meant.

NE'HUM (consolation, or by a copyist's error for Rehum) (Neh. vii. 7). See REHUM.

NEHUSH'TA (brass). The mother of king Jehoiachin (2 Kings xxiv. 8).

NEHUSH'TAN (the brazen thing). The serpent of brass (or copper) which Moses made by God's command in the wilderness (Numb. xxi. 8, 9) was preserved for many ages. Hezekiah, perceiving that the people had been in the habit of paying a superstitious reverence to it, broke it up (2 Kings xviii. 4). Probably Nehushtan was the name by which it had been ordinarily known; though some believe it a term of contempt then first applied: see Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. ii. pp. 81, 82.

NEI'EL (moved by God?). A place on the northern border of Asher (Josh. xix. 27). Mr. Grove thinks it may be identified with the modern village M'ar.

NEIGHBOUR. The Pharisees were disposed to restrict the meaning of neighbour to their own countrymen or friends. Our Lord, therefore, to teach the universal brotherhood of men spoke his parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke x. 25-37). When compassion can be shown, or a kind office done, there must be no limitation: every one is to be deemed for such purposes a 'neighbour' (Matt. v. 43-48).

NE'KEB (a cavern). A place in the territory of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33).

NEKO'DA (distinguished). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 48; Neh. vii. 50). Some of them, however, could not show their genealogy (Ezra ii. 60; Neh. vii. 62).

NEMU'EL (perhaps for Jemuel, day of God).—1. A descendant of Reuben and brother of Dathan and Abiram (Numb. xxvi. 9).—2. One of the sons of Simeon (12; 1 Chron. iv. 24). He is also called Jemuel.

NEMU'ELITES. A family of Simeon, descended from Nemuel (Numb. xxvi. 12).

NE'PHEG (sprout).—1. A Levite, son of Izhar, and brother of Korah (Exod. vi. 21).

—2. One of the sons of David, born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. iii. 7, xiv. 6).

NEPHEW (Judges xii. 14; 1 Tim. v. 4). A grandson.

NE'PHI (2 Macc. i. 36). See NAPHTHAR.

NE'PHIS (1 Esdr. v. 21). Possibly a corruption of Magbish (Ezra ii. 30).

NE'PHISH (recreated). (1 Chron. v. 19). Naphish.

NEPHI'SHESIM. See NEPHUSIM.

NEPH'THALI (Tob. i. 1). Naphtali.

NEPH'THALIM (Matt. iv. 13, 15). The Greek form of NAPHTALI, which see.

NEPHTO'AH (opening). A fountain, the source of the waters of Nephtoah, on the boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 9, xviii. 15). It has been supposed to lie to the south-west of Jerusalem, and to be the modern 'Ain Yalo, in the Wady el-Werd,

But Mr. Grove identifies it with 'Ain Lifta, two miles and a half to the north.

NEPHU'SIM (expansions). The children of Nephusim, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 50). The name is Nephishesim in Neh. vii. 52.

NER (a light or lamp). The brother of Kish, Saul's father. Abner was his son (1 Sam. xiv. 50, 51, xxvi. 5, 14; 2 Sam. ii. 8, 12, iii. 23, 25, 28, 37; 1 Kings ii. 5, 32; 1 Chron. ix. 36, xxvi. 28). But elsewhere it seems that Ner is considered as the father of Kish (viii. 33, ix. 39). Either there is here a copyist's error, or there were two persons named Ner, or two named Kish, in the same family.

NE'REUS. A Christian at Rome, who, with his sister, is saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 15).

NER'GAL (man-devourer, great hero). An idol of the Cuthites (2 Kings xvii. 30). The Jewish rabbins fancied that this idol was figured by a cock. It is now very commonly supposed to be the planet Mars. See Wiener, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Nergal;' Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. ii. p. 73.

NER'GAL-SHARE'ZER (Nergal fire-prince).—1, 2. The name of two Babylonian grandees who were present at the taking of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix. 3, 13). The last-named is styled Rab-mag, that is, president of the Magi. There is every reason to believe that he was the person known as Nerglissar who, having married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, put Evil-merodach to death and succeeded to his throne. He reigned between three and four years, 559-556 B.C., and built a palace on the right bank of the Euphrates. Bricks have been discovered there bearing his name and title Rab-mag.

NE'RI (my light, or light of Jehovah). One in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Luke iii. 27).

NERI'AH (lamp of Jehovah). The father of Baruch, the scribe and minister of Jeremiah, and also of Seraiah (Jer. xxxii. 12, 16, xxxvi. 4, 8, xliii. 3, xlv. 1, li. 59).

NERIAS (Baruch i. 1). Neriah.

NE'RO. L. Domitius Nero succeeded Claudius as emperor of Rome, 54 A.D., and killed himself to avoid a public execution, 68. In his reign that war commenced between the Jews and Romans which terminated subsequently in the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus and the overthrow of the Jewish polity. It was under Nero, too, that a fierce persecution of the Christians began, about 64 A.D., which lasted till his death. St. Paul suffered martyrdom in it at Rome. So great were this monarch's cruelties, that his name has ever since served specially to distinguish a tyrant. He is frequently indicated as Cæsar in the New Testament (Acts xv. 8, 10-12, 21, xxvi. 32, xxviii. 19; Phil. iv. 22), and as Augustus (Acts xxv. 21, 25); but his name Nero does not occur.

NEST (Deut. xxii. 6, xxxii. 11, and elsewhere). See BIRDS. Besides the literal meaning of the word, 'nest' is often used figuratively to denote a quiet and secure habitation (e.g. Numb. xxiv. 21; Job xxix. 18; Jer. xxxii. 23).

NET (Prov. i. 17; Eccles. ix. 12, and elsewhere). See FISHING, HUNTING. In p. 294 an Egyptian landing-net is figured. The word is repeatedly used metaphorically (e.g. Psal. xxxv. 7, 8).

NETHAN'EEL (given of God).—1. The prince of Issachar (Numb. i. 8, ii. 5, vii. 18, 23, x. 15).—2. The fourth son of Jesse (1 Chron. ii. 14).—3. A priest in David's time (xv. 24).—4. A Levite (xxiv. 6).—5. A Levite porter (xxvi. 4), possibly the same with No. 4.—6. One of Jehoshaphat's nobles (2 Chron. xvii. 7).—7. A Levite in the reign of Josiah (xxxv. 9).—8. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 22).—9. A priest in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 21).—10. One of those priests' sons who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (36).

NETHAN'IAH (given of Jehovah).—1. One of the seed royal, father of Ishmael who murdered Gedaliah (2 Kings xxv. 23, 25; Jer. xl. 8, 14, 15, xli.).—2. The head of one of the divisions of the singers (1 Chron. xxv. 2, 12).—3. One of the Levites whom Jehoshaphat sent out to teach (2 Chron. xvii. 8).—4. The father of Jehudi (Jer. xxxvi. 14).

NETH'INIM (the given, the devoted). The name by which in post-exilic times the inferior servants of the sanctuary, subordinate to the Levites, were designated. It is very likely that the Gibeonites, condemned to be hewers of wood and drawers of water (Josh. ix. 27), were the original stock. They were augmented, no doubt, by prisoners of war (comp. Numb. xxxi. 47), who must have become Jewish proselytes (Neh. x. 28). Yet they were looked upon as a degraded class; and, if the Talmud may be believed, they might not marry Hebrew wives. David and successive princes had dedicated them for Levitical service, and multiplied their numbers (Ezra viii. 20); and it may be supposed that gradually they were held in higher estimation; for, on the return from Babylon, many of them having accompanied Zerubbabel, and others Ezra, they were located partly in Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 26, 31, xl. 21), partly in the Levitical cities (Ezra ii. 70; Neh. vii. 73); and they seem to have been associated with those called 'Solomon's servants,' who also performed the subordinate duties of divine service (Ezra ii. 43-58; Neh. vii. 46-80).

NETO'PHAH (distillation). A place perhaps in some way connected with Beth-lehem (Ezra ii. 22; Neh. vii. 26). Possibly it was situated where is now the village Beit Nettif. But this is some distance from Beth-lehem. The residents are called Netophathi and Netophathites.

NETO'PHATHI, NETO'PHATHITES. The inhabitants of Netophah (2 Sam. xxiii. 28, 29; 2 Kings xxv. 23; 1 Chron. ii. 54, ix. 16, xl. 30, xxvii. 13, 15; Neh. xii. 28; Jer. xl. 8).

NETTLE. There are two Hebrew words so rendered in our version. One occurs in Job xxx. 7; Prov. xxiv. 31; Zeph. ii. 9. Genesis is inclined to interpret this of a thorn-bush or bramble, from pricking or burning, such being the meaning of the root; but nettles would answer quite as well to this signification. Dr. Royle has suggested wild mustard as the plant intended. Another word is found in Isai. xxxiv. 13; Hos. ix. 6: it means a prickly weed, and may designate the nettle or the thistle. The nettle, Urtica, is too common to need description: its apparatus for stinging consists of a pointed tube through which the poison is forced into the wound which the point has made.

NEW TESTAMENT (Matt. xxvi. 28; Mark xiv. 24; Luke xxii. 20; 1 Cor. xi. 25; 2 Cor. iii. 6; Heb. ix. 15, xii. 24, marg.). See BIBLE, COVENANT, MANUSCRIPT, SCRIPTURE.

The first printed edition of the Greek New Testament was that of Erasmus, which appeared in 1516. He afterwards published other editions with various corrections: the fifth in 1535 is the basis of those still in common use. The Complutensian edition was not published till after the first of Erasmus; but it was printed previously: it bears the date Jan. 10, 1514. Robert Stephen printed his first edition in 1546. His earlier editions blend the Complutensian and Erasmusian texts: the later ones adhere more to that of Erasmus, with some various readings from manuscripts. In 1624, the Elzevirs, printers at Leyden, put forth the first of their editions. These generally follow Stephen, sometimes adopting alterations from Beza, who had published a Greek Testament first in 1565. In the preface to the second Elzevir edition in 1633, it was said, Textum ergo habes nunc ab omnibus receptum, whence the common phrase, textus receptus, 'received text.' This was, till of late years professedly in general use on the continent, but readings from Stephen were not unfrequently introduced. It was in this country that the collection of materials for the thorough revision of the sacred text began; bishop Walton and Dr. John Mill being among the earlier labourers in the field. Many eminent critics have since spared no amount of pains for the same object. Among these may be named Wetstein, Griesbach, Lachmann, and Tischendorf; to whom biblical students are deeply indebted. The critical editions in England of Dr. Alford, 1849, and subsequent years, of Dr. Wordsworth, 1856, &c., of Messrs. Webster and Wilkinson, 1855-1862, are full of valuable matter.

Of commentaries on the New Testament Bengel's Gnomon Nov. Test., 3rd edit. 1850, 2 vols. and one vol. 1855, is of high merit. An English translation appeared in 5 vols. Edin. 1857: Whitty's Commentary on the New Test., first published in 1703, will never be out of date; Doddridge's Family Expositor, 1760-1762, has been frequently reprinted, and as a popular work is deservedly valued. E. H. Bickersteth's Commentary on the New Testament, 1864, is also useful. More learned books, such as the commentaries of the ancient fathers, and modern foreign critics need not be mentioned here.

NEW YEAR. See YEAR.

NEZI'AH (illustrious). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 54; Neh. vii. 56).

NEZ'IB (a garrison, statue, or idol). A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 43), doubtless Beit Nusib, between Beat Jibrin (ancient Eleutheropolis) and Hebron.

NIB'HAZ (barker?). An idol worshipped by the Avites (2 Kings xvii. 31). The rabbinical writers say that it was figured as a dog: it may, therefore, have been identical with the Egyptian Anubis, if that deity had really a dog's head, and not that of a jackal. According to De la Roque, the colossal figure of a dog was found, three days' journey from Beirut on the road to Tripolis, to which the inhabitants of the locality paid divine honours. But in the Zabian books Nebaz is the name of an evil demon who sits on the throne on the earth, while his feet rest on the bottom of Tartarus. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Nibchas'; Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. ii. p. 74.

NIB'SHAN (light soil). A city in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv. 62), that is, the region contiguous to the Dead sea.

NICA'NOR (victorious). One of the seven chosen to administer the goods of the church (Acts vi. 5).

NICA'NOR (1 Macc. iii. 38, vii. 26-50; 2 Macc. xiv., xv.). An officer of Antiochus Epiphanes and other Syrian kings.

NICH'OLAS. In some copies for NICOLAS, which see.

NICODEMUS (if this name be of Hebrew origin it may mean pure in blood, i.e. upright). A ruler of the Jews who came to Jesus by night and received instruction from our Lord on the subject of the new-birth (John iii. 1-10). It is usually assumed that Nicodemus visited Jesus at night in order, through fear, to conceal his communication with one opposed and persecuted. But this assumption does not rest on certain grounds. It is the custom in the east to pay visits at night; and nowhere is it said of Nicodemus, as it is of Joseph of Arimathea (John xix. 38), that he was afraid. The rest of his conduct is open and straightforward. He speaks fearlessly in the council (vii. 50, 51), and takes his part in the burying of Christ (xix. 39).

NICOLA'ITANS. The designation of a party or sect whom our Lord declares (Rev. ii. 6, 15) that he hates. There is a difficulty in deciding who these persons were and whence they had their origin. A prevailing early opinion was that they were the followers of Nicolas the deacon, who had lapsed from the faith and lived in impurity. Afterwards another Nicolas was deemed the founder of the Nicolaitans. Dr. Alford (The Greek Test., note on Rev. ii. 6) believes a plain historical fact referred to, and sees nothing unreasonable in imagining that an associate of the apostles made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. Abp. Trench, on the other hand (Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, pp. 82-87), prefers a symbolical interpretation. He does not deny that in the second century there were actual Nicolaitans, but he thinks that no sect really bore the name in the apostolic times. He considers those who held the doctrine of Balaam (Rev. ii. 14) identical with those who held the doctrine of the Nicolaitans (15); and, as the meaning of the name Balaam is nearly that of the name Nicolas, he says that the Nicolaitans or Balaamites were 'those who, after the pattern of Ba-laam's sin, sought to introduce a false freedom, the freedom of the flesh, into the church of God.' Jewish legalism was the first enemy of the truth; afterwards came heathen licentiousness. The student must take his choice of these two explanations; each of which is supported by distinguished critics. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Nikolaus.'

NIC'OLAS (conqueror of the people). One of the seven chosen to administer the goods of the church (Acts vi. 5). He is described as a proselyte of Antioch. See preceding article.

NICOP'OLIS (city of victory). There were many ancient cities which bore this name: three in particular have been supposed by different critics the one meant (Tit. iii. 12). One of these was in the north-eastern corner of Cilicia; another on the Nessus in the interior of Thrace; the third in Epirus (though Pliny assigns it to Acarnania). This last, most probably the Nicopolis intended by St. Paul, was built by Augustus in commemoration of his victory at Actium.

NIGER (black) (Acts xiii. 1). A surname of Simeon, 4.

NIGHT. In respect of the literal meaning of the word it is enough to say here that, as the Hebrews commenced their day in the evening, the night preceded the day. As night is dark and gloomy, it is used metaphorically to denote ignorance (Mic. iii. 6), mourning (Rev. xxi. 25), also the clouded time of mortal life (Rom. xiii. 12), and death (John ix. 4). The absence of night therefore expresses the highest light and gladness (Rev. xxi. 25, xxii. 5). And, as it is in a time of darkness, when men commit abominable sins, as if darkness and light were not equally clear to the eye of the Being who shall bring their secret deeds into open judgment, evil men are said to be 'of the night,' i.e. children of the night; as the godly are called 'children of the day,' or 'children of light' (1 Thess. v. 5-8: comp. Rom. xiii. 13).

NIGHT-HAWK. See HAWK.

NIGHT-MONSTER (Isai. xxxiv. 14, marg.). See OWL, SCREECH-OWL.

NILE. This river, though frequently referred to, is not mentioned by this name in scripture. See SHIHOR.

NIM'RAH (limpid, sc. water) (Numb. xxxii. 3). See BETH-NIMRAH.

NIM'RIM (id.) (Isai. xv. 6; Jer. xlviii. 34). The 'waters of Nimrim' appear to have been some stream or pool in Moab. The exact spot has not yet been satisfactorily ascertained.

NIM'ROD (a rebel). An eminent early warrior and king: he was the son of Cush, and grandson of Ham; and his history is briefly summed in a few verses (Gen. x. 8-12; 1 Chron. i. 10). He is commonly represented as a tyrant and godless personage: he is identified with some of the mythical characters of Grecian story, and is said to be the original Bel worshipped as a God at Babylon. And some choose to deny that such a king ever existed; while others bring him down to a comparatively-late period, and suppose him to be the same with the Babylonian ruler contemporary with Hezekiah. The narrative of Genesis however, is natural and perspicuous. Nimrod was the first mighty hero upon the earth: he was successful in war, and was distinguished in the chase, so that his skill and intrepidity as a huntsman passed into a proverb. He was not content with a narrow sphere: he roamed northward into the fertile land of Shinar, and to the great town Babylon. There he established the first seat of his empire, so that Babylon was afterwards called 'the land of Nimrod' (Mic. v. 6): there, too, he ruled other cities, Erech, Wurka, Accad, according to some, Akkerkuf, but see ACCAD, and Calneh, Nifer. His ambition prompted him, however, to wider conquests; he went into the country called Asshur (Gen. x. 11, marg.) from a son of Shem, and there he founded Nineveh, not at its origin so considerable as the neighbouring Rosen, but destined far to outshine it in celebrity. Resen, possibly Selamiyeh, Rehoboth, perhaps Rahabeh-malik, and Calah, Nimroud, or Kalah Sherghat, were the other cities built in this region by Nimrod. This is all that at present we know for certain of Nimrod. He is placed by Kallsch 2450-B.C.; but this is earlier than the ordinary computation would admit (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., pp. 253-263, 305). Among the Assyrian monuments a figure has been discovered which is said to represent Nimrod: he is grasping a lion in his left hand, while his right holds probably a missile weapon. The fables of Jewish writers respecting Nimrod do not deserve notice.

NIM'SHI (drawn out, saved). The grandfather of king Jehu (1 Kings xix. 16; 2 Kings ix. 2, 14, 20; 2 Chron. xxii. 7).

NIN'EVE (Matt. xii. 41; Luke ix. 32). Nineveh.

NIN'EVEH (habitation of Ninus? or perhaps compounded with the name of the Assyrian deity, Nin). This great city is first mentioned in Gen. x. 11, where it is said to have been founded by Nimrod, who went from the land of Shinar into Assyria and there builded cities—such being the more accurate interpretation of the text: see marg. Nineveh is not again noticed in the sacred history till, many years subsequently, at the time of the mission of Jonah, we find it the seat of a powerful monarchy (Jonah i. 2, iii., iv. 11), the centre of the Assyrian empire (2 Kings xix. 36; Isai. xxxvii. 37). Assyria, itself, is but rarely noticed in early times, but after its influence was extended to the west, both in the narrative, and in the denunciations of the prophets, the country and also Nineveh, the grand metropolis, frequently occur. Some account has been already given of this monarchy, of the different kings named in scripture, and of those discovered in the deciphered inscriptions: see ASSYRIA. In the present article the reader's attention will be directed to the history of the city Nineveh, to its ruin and disappearance, and to the marvellous disinterment in our own days of its long-lost memorials.

After the mission of Jonah which resulted in a temporary repentance, we find prophetic denunciations renewed by Nahum. His prophecy is almost exclusively directed against the city, the ruin of the country and the sovereign being, however, involved in the fall of the capital (Nah. iii. 12, 18). Zephaniah also predicts the destruction of Nineveh with the kingdom (Zeph. ii. 13-15); and the threatening was probably fulfilled before his eyes; for Ezekiel speaks of the Assyrian empire as already destroyed, and applies from its destruction a solemn warning to the Pharaoh of Egypt (Ezek. xxxi.). Thenceforth the name of Nineveh was but a voice of admonition to other generations (Matt. xii. 41; Luke xi. 32).

Nineveh stood upon the river Tigris. Of its vastness and splendour only traditional accounts had been preserved. It was said to have been larger than Babylon, to have been in the form of a rectangular parallelogram, 150 stadia in length by 90 in breadth, the whole circuit being 480 stadia or 56 miles. It was encompassed by walls 100 feet high and so broad that three chariots could drive on them abreast. It had also 1,500 towers, each 200 feet in height (Diod. Sic., Biblioth. Hist., lib. ii. 3; Diodorus erroneously places it on the Euphrates; Strabo, Geograph., lib. xvi. cap. i. 3). This estimation of the magnitude, enormous as it seems, is in some degree corroborated by the scripture statement that 'Nineveh was an exceeding great city of three days' journey' (Jonah iii. 3). The circuit is probably intended; and the 480 stadia correspond very well with a three days' journey, of about 20 miles a day. Of the buildings of this great capital no ancient descriptions remain. After a long existence in grandeur the time of its desolation came. Cyaxares, king of Media, and Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, destroyed it. The date of this conquest is variously given. Winer places it in 606 B.C.; but it may have occurred earlier; perhaps in 625 B.C. Mr. Galloway, imagining that it was at the time of an eclipse (see Xenoph., Anab., lib. iii. 4, §§, 6-9), and identifying this eclipse as the one known to have happened in 585 B.C., would bring its final fall down to some years after the destruction of Jerusalem, viz., to the year above named, 585 (Isaiah's Test. for Jesus, 1864, pp. 409-413, 418).

The once-populous metropolis soon became utterly waste; and there was no further mention of it. Even its very site was unknown. Herodotus passed near it: Xenophon encamped upon it; and yet neither of these historians seemed aware that they were close by the ancient mistress of nations. It was disputed, indeed, whether it had not been built upon the Euphrates; and those travellers who were at all acquainted with its true position could tell of little but waste mounds and accumulations of rubbish. A noted city, Mosul, was afterwards built on the opposite bank of the Tigris; but, though the neighbourhood was thus the haunt of men, few had any curiosity to explore the heaps which lay at hand. Bishop Newton's account sufficiently describes the utter oblivion into which Nineveh had fallen, and the contradictory notions entertained in regard to it (Diss. on Prophecies, ix.: comp. Keith, Evidence of Prophecy, chap. x., pp. 386-393, edit. 1843).

Thick darkness, then, had closed over the fortunes of Nineveh, and the history of the dynasties that had reigned there. Little was said in the sacred volume of the Assyrian power save when it came into contact with the chosen people, so that we knew nothing of its general character. Some romantic tales, indeed, there were in Greek and Latin writers of Ninus and his wonderful queen Semiramis, of an Indian invasion, and of magnificent works—and then there was said to be a catastrophe. Sardana-palus, the king, given up to luxury, was beleaguered by his foes, and in the energy of despair lighted the funeral pile which destroyed at once himself, his courtiers, his perhaps less curious that an accidental discovery should suddenly lead us to hope that these records may be recovered, and this site satisfactorily identified.' It is more than curious: it is the wise Providence of Him who uncovereth secret things that, in our busy, speculative, superficial age, when men are questioning the truth of his revelation, and, wise in their own conceit, denying his moral government of the worlds he has framed, the earth should, as it were, give forth a voice, reveal the buried palaces of ancient days, and proclaim thereby a fresh attestation to the truths of sacred writ.

It will be seen by an inspection of the plan, that of the mounds just opposite to the town of Mosul, there are two called Kouyunjik and Nebi Yunus. On the last was traditionally the tomb of Jonah; and it was natural to imagine that this might mark the site of Nineveh. In the year 1820 Mr. Rich, political resident at Baghdad, visited Mosul. Attracted by the mounds, he was induced to make some examination of them, more especially as he learned that a curious sculpture had a while before been dug up. He obtained a few fragments from the rubbish of both Kouyunjik and Nebi Yunus, and on a subsequent occasion made a general survey of the ruins. He had also, as he passed down the Tigris, looked at Nimroud, and been struck with its ancient appearance. But nothing more was done. In 1840 Dr. Layard was at Mosul: he saw and examined the neighbouring mounds, and resolved, when circumstances permitted, to explore them thoroughly. In 1842 he was again at Mosul, and found that M. Botta, appointed French consul there in the interval, had commenced some excavations in Kouyunjik. Little, however, had appeared to reward his pains.

But Dr. Layard, unable to be on the spot, encouraged him to persevere; and Botta was himself well inclined to continue his researches. A peasant, observing how every fragment that turned up was carefully preserved, advised him to explore the mound of Khorsabad, some way off. Workmen were sent thither, and, as Layard tells the tale, 'after a little opposition from the inhabitants, they were permitted to sink a well in the mound; and at a small distance from the surface they came to the top of a wall which, on digging deeper, they found to be lined with sculptured slabs of gypsum. M. Botta . . . went at once. . . . Directing a wider trench to be formed, and to be carried in the direction of the wall, he soon found that he had entered a chamber, connected with others, and surrounded by slabs of gypsum, covered with sculptured representations of battles, sieges, and similar events. His wonder may easily be imagined. A new history had been suddenly opened to him: the records of an unknown people were before him. He was at a loss to account for equally the age and the nature of the monument. The style of art of the sculptures, the dresses of the figures, the mythic forms on the walls, were all new to him, and afforded no clue to the capital, and his empire. These were the phantoms that flitted amid the gloom: they served to point a proverb as words of warning and of fear, but no man could discern their exact lineaments or tell whether there was any substance in them.

And so the world went on. 'It is, indeed, one of the most remarkable facts in history,' writes Dr. Layard, 'that the records of an empire, so renowned for its power and civilization, should have been entirely lost; and that the site of a city, as eminent for its extent as its splendour, should for ages have been a matter of doubt: it is not epoch of the erection of the edifice, or to the people who were its founders. Numerous inscriptions, accompanying the bas-reliefs, evidently contained the explanation of the events thus recorded in sculpture,

It was soon found that the building thus discovered had been destroyed by fire: consequently the slabs of gypsum, reduced to lime when exposed to the atmosphere, soon fell to pieces. Drawings were hastily made; and various remains were secured and conveyed to France.

M. Botta's success greatly stimulated Dr. Layard. He was, however, convinced that Khorsabad lay out of the actual circuit of Nineveh, and he was anxious to prosecute researches nearer to the river Tigris. He had fixed his eye upon the great mound of Nimroud, considerably to the south of Mosul, and about six and a-half miles from the point where the river Zab falls into the Tigris. He was not, however, aided by the British government, as M. Botta had been by that of France, and it was not till the autumn of 1845 that, by the liberality of Sir Stratford Canning, our ambassador at Constantinople, now Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, he was enabled to prosecute his designs.

In November of that year he succeeded in excavating a chamber, in what is now called the north-west palace of Nimroud. Other discoveries followed—in spite of much opposition from the fanaticism and jealousy of the Moslems—sculptures, inscriptions, &c.; while the amazement with which each successive disinterment was received was not a little amusing. 'Thus one morning,' Dr. Layard says, 'I had ridden to the encampment of Sheikh Abd-ur-rahman, and was returning to the mound, when I saw two Arabs of his tribe urging their mares to the top of their speed. On approaching me they stopped. "Hasten, O bey," exclaimed one of them, "hasten to the diggers; for they have found Nimrod himself. Wallah! it is wonderful, but it is true! we have seen him with our eyes. There is no god but God;" and, both joining in this pious exclamation, they galloped off, without further words, in the direction of their tents. On reaching the ruins I de-natural from its position to refer it to the inhabitants of Nineveh, a city which, although it could not have occupied a site so distant from the Tigris, must have been in the vicinity of these ruins. M. Botta had scended into the new trench . . . The Arabs withdrew the screen they had hastily constructed, and disclosed an enormous human head, sculptured in full out of the alabaster of the country . . . I saw at once that the head must belong to a winged lion or bull . . . It was in admirable preservation. The expression was calm yet majestic; and the outline of the features showed a freedom and knowledge of art scarcely to be looked for in works of so remote a period . . . I was not surprised that the Arabs had been amazed and terrified at this apparition. It required no stretch of imagination to conjure up the most strange fancies. This gigantic head, blanched with age, thus rising from the bowels of the earth, might well have belonged to one of those fearful beings which are pictured in the traditions of the country as appearing to mortals, slowly ascending from the regions below. One of the workmen, catching the first glimpse of the monster, had thrown down his basket, and had run off towards Mosul as fast as his twenty-five miles, and from the Tigris to Khorsabad and Karamless on the east, about ten or twelve miles. Over this extent of country almost everywhere traces of ancient buildings are to be seen; and various huge mounds attract special attention. The ruins opposite to Mosul stand—that is, their western face—about a mile from the Tigris, which probably once ran close to them. They form an irregular quadrangle, and consist of an embankment generally forty or fifty feet high, with Kouyunjik and Nebi Yunus on its western face, which is 4,533 yards in length: the northern side is 2,333 yards, the southern little over 1000 yards, while the eastern, which is curvilinear, is 5,300 yards; the whole circuit being about seven and a-half miles. On the eastern side there are moats and formidable ramparts; and advantage was apparently taken of a small stream which flows through the enclosure towards the Tigris. These defences must have been very strong. The embankment is supposed to have been faced, legs could carry him. The neighbouring Arab sheikh and half his tribe were soon upon the spot, and confidently pronounced the gigantic head to be the work of no human hands, but one of the idols which Noah had cursed before the flood. The news speedily reached Mosul; and all the city was in consternation. The cadi and all the grave doctors assembled; and the pasha was entreated to put a stop to proceedings so alarming, and so opposed to the laws of the koran.

More of the adventures which attended the progress of the excavations cannot be here detailed: the curious reader must be referred to Dr. Layard's own book. Suffice it to say that many of the mounds have been explored with most important results, the notice of which shall be as briefly as possible given.

These mounds are scattered over a considerable area on the eastern bank of the Tigris, extending from Shereef Khan in the north, to Nimroud in the south, about at least partially, with stone: at various points in it are eminences, where probably were gateways or towers; and there are out-lying mounds, the remains, it may be imagined, of detached forts. The ground within is everywhere strewed with fragments of brick and pottery; but the only extensive mounds which indicate great buildings are those already mentioned of Kouyunjik and Nebi Yunus. Nimroud is very similar to the ruins just described; but its defences were by no means so important. It consists of an enclosure, indicating ancient walls, nearly square, being about 2,331 yards by 2,095. The Tigris ran formerly along the south and western sides: the others were protected by moats. There is a great mound, 700 yards by 400, on the south-west face, with a kind of earthen pyramid, rising to the height of 140 feet in its north-west corner. Also at the south-east corner of the enclosure is a group of mounds which the Arabs call Athur; and it seems that this name was once given to the whole of Nim roud. At Kur is said to have been Nimrod's lieutenant. Khorsabad is a square of about 2000 yards. There are the indications of towers and gateways, but none of moats. A great mound rises on the north-west face of the enclosure. It is divided into two parts, the lower 1350 feet by 300, the upper, which adjoins, 650 feet square and about 30 high. An Arab village was formerly on its summit; and at one corner there is a pyramid like that at Nimroud, but much smaller. The other collections of ruins and mounds in the district are far less important than those just described; and it is consequently at Nimroud, Kouyunjik, and Khorsabad, that for the most part excavations have been made and sculptures discovered.

It is not easy among these remains, stretching over so wide an area, to decide upon the actual Nineveh. It has been thought that the mounds were different cities; and attempts have been made to identify several of them with some of those named in scripture (Gen. x. 11, 12). It has

An examination of the disinterred palaces confirms the view taken above. There are inscriptions relating the deeds of the sovereign who dwelt therein. Various kings built or re-built in various quarters; so that each mound testifies to the magnificence of one or more of these royal builders. The Assyrian edifices were built upon artificial platforms, usually from thirty to fifty feet above the ground-level, constructed sometimes, as at Nimroud, of sun-dried bricks, sometimes, as at Kouyunjik, of earth and rubbish. They appear to have been faced with stone; and the ascent to them was either by slopes or flights of steps. The plans only of the ground-floors can now be traced; but there can be no doubt that they were of considerable altitude, with storeys of sun-dried bricks and wood; the rubbish from which it is that has covered and preserved the sculptured slabs which have been found. Chambers, galleries, corridors, halls, and uncovered courts have been entered. The partition-walls are thick, from six to been imagined, again, that the great mounds were vast fortified palaces, erected by different kings, standing as it were in parks, and that these, taken together with the inferior habitations and open spaces, constituted the mighty capital of Assyrian power. Within the enclosures that have been mentioned there are few traces of buildings; and this fact strengthens the belief that the greater part of the area was park. Besides, we learn from scripture that Nineveh contained much cattle (Jonah iv. 11); there must have been space, therefore, within the circuit for their breeding and pasturage. This, then, on the whole, would seem the most reasonable supposition. Perhaps at Kouyunjik was the original nucleus; and afterwards additions were made, new buildings arising on the site of old ones; and it might be that former quarters were deserted as fresh palaces were built, round which, as the seat of authority, and very likely regarded also as the abode of their deities, the population would cluster. And so here was Nineveh, swollen in the course of ages to that vast extent through which the Hebrew prophet proceeded his three days' journey as he cried, to the consternation of its people, 'Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown' (Jon. iii. 4).

fifteen feet, of sun-dried bricks, faced with alabaster slabs, on which are carvings in low relief, which were originally coloured. Above the alabaster skirting the walls were plastered and ornamented with painting. No openings for windows have been discovered, so that in the ceiled apartments light must have come through the doors. The pavement of alabaster or kiln-burnt bricks is laid upon bitumen and sand. The same style of building prevails still in Mosul. The rooms are there built round courts with walls of sun-dried bricks, and skirtings of sculptured alabaster. Combining, therefore, what is seen in the modern architecture of the country with what remains of ancient Assyrian erection, attempts have been made to re-construct these palaces, and to represent them as they possibly may have been seen by those who looked on them in their fresh magnificence. Of course such representations are to a certain degree fanciful: they may, however, give some general notion of what these structures were.

The palace of Khorsabad is thought to have been founded by Shalmaneser, but to have been built principally by Sargon, Propylæa formed part of the approaches to it, flanked by colossal human-headed bulls,

The chambers are inferior in size to those in some of the other palaces; but the relief of many of the larger figures is bolder.

The great mound of Nimroud covers several distinct buildings, which must have been constructed at wide intervals. For the south-west palace materials were used taken from that to the north-west. And it is observable that the sculptures in edifices of different ages show a marked diversity, not only in the skill displayed but in the manners and dress represented. Changes must therefore have occurred; and Dr. Layard remarks that in the later monuments there are traces of Egyptian taste unknown in earlier remains. The most an-which were used for later buildings. In this central palace it was that the remarkable black obelisk, now preserved in the British Museum, was discovered. Esar-haddon constructed another palace at the south-west; and in the south-east there is yet another by his grandson Asshur-emit-ili, or Asshur-ebid-ilut. But this last was of very inferior character. Its rooms were small, and panelled with ordinary stone, without inscriptions or sculptures.

At Kouyunjik was the most magnificent of all the royal residences, the nucleus probably of the city. The palace was the work of Sennacherib, and displayed a multitude of large halls, some 150 feet square, long galleries, one extending 200 feet, noble portals, flanked by human-headed lions and bulls, South-west palace, Nimroud.

cient palace of Nimroud is that at the north-west, and yet it was built by Asshur-akh-pal on the site of one yet older. Adjoining it the earthen pyramid, before mentioned, was found to cover a structure, the basement of which was a square of 165 feet, formed of sun-dried bricks, faced with stone. It is supposed that upon this rose a temple, like those of Babylon, in stages, with probably an altar on the top. A building, thought to be a tomb, was constructed by the son (probably named Shalmanubar or Shalmaneser) of the builder of the north-west palace. It is a vaulted chamber 100 feet in length by 6 in breadth, and 12 high: it was long ago rifled. This Shalmanubar built also a palace in the centre of the mound, the materials of some twenty feet high, and decorations of extraordinary splendour. On the same platform another palace was built by the son of Esar-haddon, called Sardanapalus III. And in the neighbouring mound of Nebi Yunus, though little explored, a palace of Esar-haddon was discovered.

It is needless to pursue the enumeration. Each quarter of the great area appears to have been in turn the royal residence: these were surrounded by fortifications; and the intervening spaces were occupied by ordinary dwellings, standing in the midst of gardens, orchards, and corn-fields. There was no wall encircling the vast extent; so that in case of hostile assault the people probably found protection in the fortified separate enclosures. The facts which have been now produced seem well-nigh to prove that the whole of the great district within which the mounds occur constituted Nineveh—Nimroud, Kouyunjik, Khorsabad, and Karamless, being the four corners: see Vance Smith's Prophecies re- ating to Nineveh and the Assyrians, Introd. pp. 53-63. Between these limits, enclosing an area of 252 square miles, lay that huge metropolis which so long made the nations arisen partly from the commerce and the manufacturing skill of the Assyrians; while at the same time the plunder of many conquered states and capitals, and the barrier, and its artificial walls and ramparts, its position on one of the great highways of the world, all contributed to its greatness. Its riches may, says Mr. Smith, 'have thing" (Nah. ii. 9). 'Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches, and with a shadowing shroud, and of an high stature; and his top was among the thick boughs. The waters made him great: the deep set him up on high with her rivers running round about his plants . . . therefore his height was exalted . . . all the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs. . . I have made him fair by the multitude of his branches; so that all the trees of Eden that were in the garden of God envied him' (Ezek. xxxi. 3-9). Such and so great was Nineveh in its glory!

Pages might be filled in describing the gorgeous reliques of this mighty Nineveh. But the story, most interesting, is yet a melancholy one. There are inscriptions telling of world-wide conquests: there are sculptures which represent the conduct, the success, the cruelties of war: there are royal pastimes depicted, the excitement of the chase, the luxury of banquets: there are the symbols of strange worship—these and a thousand other particulars might be detailed (of which indeed elsewhere some account has been given: see ASSYRIA). But all this grandeur and this glory had a disastrous end, shattered, not calmly and gradually sinking, but violently crushed; and the marks of the fire which devastated those lordly halls are yet apparent. 'Thus saith the Lord God . . . I have . . . delivered him into the hand of the mighty ones of the heathen . . . and strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him. . . Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain; and all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches. . . In the day when he went down to the grave I caused a mourning. . . I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall, when I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit. . . They also went down into hell with him, unto them that be slain with the sword; and they that were his arm, that dwelt under his shadow in the midst of the heathen' (Ezek. xxxi. 10-17). Surely there is here in the history and fate of Nineveh a lesson read us, not only of the nothingness of man and his greatest works before the breath of the Almighty, but also of strong corroborative evidence to the accurate truth of holy scripture.

The manners, the mythology, the memoirs of Nineveh have been noticed. It may be added that the inscriptions found are in what is called the arrow-headed or cuneiform character; and much ingenuity and learning have been exercised upon them for their interpretation. See WRITING. The people of Nineveh would seem to have spoken a Shemitic dialect, connected with Hebrew and Chaldee. But it is supposed that concurrently with this an older tongue of the Turanian type existed in the country; and sometimes inscriptions have been found written in the two languages in parallel columns.

Many works on Nineveh might be referred to. Besides those of Layard and others mentioned in this article, the student may consult Botta's Monument de Ninive, Vaux's Nineveh and Persepolis, and Fergusson's Palaces of Nineveh and Persepolis Restored.

NINEVITES (Luxe xi. 30). The people of Nineveh.

NISAN (month of flowers, or new day). (Neh. ii. 1; Esth. iii. 7). See MONTHS.

NI'SON (Rest of Esth. xi. 2). Nisan.

NI'SROCH (great eagle?). An Assyrian deity, in whose house or temple Sennacherib was worshipping when he was slain by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Kings xix. 37; Isal. xxxvii. 38). Very little is known of this god; but it has been proposed to identify him with Asshur, the supreme deity of the Assyrians. It is certain that a human figure, with the head of an eagle, and wings springing from the back, occurs frequently on early Assyrian monuments. The name of Nisroch may have been given to this; and it may correspond with the Egyptian sun-god, Phrah, which had the head of an eagle or hawk. See Keil, Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. ii. p. 110. But learned men can but at present offer conjectures.

NITRE (Prov. xxv. 20). This is, no doubt, the natron found abundantly in certain Egyptian lakes, fifty miles west of Cairo. The Egyptians use it in bread and for soap; also, it is said, mixed with vinegar as a cure for tooth-ache. The contrariety between these two ingredients illustrates the place referred to.

NO (Jer. xlvi. 25; Ezek. xxx. 14, 15, 16) more fully

NO-A'MON (portion, or temple, of Amon?). A large and most important city of Egypt, said to be situated among the rivers, and to have the sea (meaning the Nile) her rampart (Nah. iii. 8-10). This city was as mighty as Nineveh; yet judgment and ultimate desolation were threatened against it. There can be no doubt that the city intended was that called by the Greeks Diospolis or Thebes, in Upper Egypt, seated on both banks of the Nile, renowned for its hundred gates and vast population, and as being the principal seat of the worship of the god Amon.

Some of the mightiest Egyptian dynasties reigned at Thebes, and embellished it with crowds of unrivalled palaces and temples. But the voice of prophecy proclaimed that it should be 'rent asunder.' This doom began to be fulfilled first by the Assyrians (see Isai. xx.): we have, however, no detailed history of the Assyrian invasion; but it is evident from the words of Nahum that Thebes fell earlier than Nineveh. According to Sir H. Rawlinson, Esar-haddon and his son Asshur-bani-bal both conquered Egypt; and the latter took Thebes twice. Perhaps the Babylonians might inflict further injuries: Cambyses, king of Persia, ruthlessly destroyed it and burnt and mutilated its remaining monuments; and its ruin was completed by Ptolemy Lathyrus, about 81 B.C.

The remains of this vast city, which appears to have been quadrangular, four miles by two, still astonish those who visit them. They lie 260 miles south of Cairo, including Karnak and Luxor on the eastern bank of the Nile, and Koornah and Medinat Haboo on the west. Fragments of colossal obelisks, pillars, and statues are scattered over the wide space (see illustrations, pp. 249, 318). The grand hall of the temple at Karnak is described as '170 feet by 329, supported by a central avenue of twelve massive columns, sixty-six feet high (without the pedestal and abacus), and twelve in diameter, besides one hundred and twenty-two of smaller or (rather) less gigantic dimensions, forty-one feet nine inches in height, and twenty-seven feet six inches in circumference, distributed in seven lines on either side of the former' (Wilkinson's Mod. Egypt and Thebes, vol. ii. p. 248). Pictured records and hieroglyphic inscriptions abound in the temples and the tombs; and when these shall be fully deciphered we may hope for much additional information in regard to Egyptian history and customs, illustrating and corroborating the sacred books.

NOADIAH (with whom Jehovah meets).—A Levite (Ezra viii. 33).—2. A prophetess who would have intimidated Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 14).

NO'AH (rest). An eminent patriarch, the ninth in descent after Adam. His name would seem to have been given from some prophetic anticipation of his father Lamech (Gen. v. 29). What the fulfilment was, what exactly was the comfort which was to be enjoyed, critics are not agreed. When the flood of waters had rolled away, when a new bright morning of the earth's history had dawned, and the saved family came forth from the ark that had sheltered them, to re-possess the land, then the cheering voice of God, promising that no more would he inflict such a sweeping ruin, no more would he curse the earth for man's sake (viii. 21, 22), must have comforted Noah's heart, and the generations of his children must have had a happier confidence and comfort in the overruling care of their heavenly Father. Perhaps this satisfies the prophecy. Or possibly, as Kalisch thinks (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., p. 168), it might have a more precise application. Animal food, as well as vegetable, was now permitted to men (Gen. ix. 3): no longer were they to be dependent only on that fruit of the ground for which in the sweat of their face they hardly laboured. Other theories it is needless here to enumerate: suffice it to say that an object was proposed towards which the faith of God's people might look: if they reached it not on earth, there was a heavenly blessing which even then, no doubt, those whose eyes were opened saw, and of which the highest earthly comfort was but a pledge (Heb. xi. 7). In the promise of the child thus named there was hope and rest and consolation.

Noah lived in evil times. Five hundred years he spent in a world filled with violence, and in rampant rebellion against its Maker. But he walked with God. He was a preacher of righteousness (2 Pet. ii. 5), by his conduct, and probably by his words also. At length a message was revealed to him: 'The end of all flesh is come before me' (Gen. vi. 18); and he was instructed to build an ark for the preservation of his own family. Moved with godly fear he obeyed; and his preparations must have preached still more plainly to the world of sinners. For a full century still the long-suffering of God waited. Whether in that interval any had humbled themselves and sought mercy we know not; but we know that, when the hour of destiny arrived, the world was in its mad uproar. There was feasting, and there was the business of life in full whirl, and no man chose to recognize his danger till the storm burst suddenly upon them (Matt. xxiv. 37-39). Noah had had some general directions at first: when the ark was finished he had more precise instructions (Gen. vii. 1-4). Some critics have fancied a contradiction, because in this passage it is said that seven days were to elapse, and (13) that Noah and his family went into the ark the self-same day the rain descended. They have forgotten that some days—seven would be quite few enough—were required for the embarkation; and as soon as all were there the rain descended. The Lord had shut Noah in (16). Happy they whom the Lord shuts in. Safe they are under the covert of his wing, 'in the secret place of the Most High': no evil can touch them there. A year passed over. Noah had more than once opened the window of the ark and sent forth birds; and at last the command came for him to go forth. He built an altar then and sacrificed to the Lord; and glad must have been his heart when he heard the gracious words of a fresh covenant, and beheld the beautiful bow, the pledge of it, and knew now by personal experience how gracious God is to those that humbly seek him. He had exercised faith; and his faith was crowned with blessing.

Noah was to be the father of a new race. From his small family the earth was to be re-peopled. And three hundred and fifty years did he live among his posterity, a monument of God's justice and God's faithfulness. One more incident is related of him (ix. 20-27). He planted a vine and drank, knowingly or not we cannot say, too freely of the fruit of it. A shameful scene ensued. But the patriarch recovered, and in the spirit of prophecy predicted happiness to his faithful sons, judgment to the ungodly. 'Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.' 'The days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years; and he died' (29). See FLOOD.

NO'AH (motion). One of the daughters of Zelophehad (Numb. xxvi. 33; xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3).

NOB (height, hill). A city in Benjamin, on the great road from the north to Jerusalem, in the immediate neighbourhood of which it must have been; perhaps on the ridge of Olivet. The tabernacle seems to have been here in the time of Saul, who, for the alleged favour shown by the high priest Ahimelech to David, destroyed the city, which was, however, afterwards rebuilt (1 Sam. xxi. 1, xxii. 9-19; Neh. xi. 32, Isai. x. 32).

NO'BAH (a barking). A Manassite who took Kenath and called it after his own name (Numb. xxxii. 42). See KENATH.

NO'BAH (id.). Another name of the town Kenath (Judges viii. 11).

NOBLEMAN (John iv. 46). Probably an officer of Herod Antipas; he may have been Chuza, Herod's steward (Luke viii. 3); but this is merely conjecture. The original word as employed by Josephus never designated one of the family or household of the emperor; so that the individual must have belonged to the provincial court. 'Nobleman' occurs in Luke xix. 12; but there the Greek is different, denoting a person well-born.

NOD (flight, wandering). The land in which Cain is said to have dwelt (Gen. iv. 16). It is described merely as 'on the east of Eden.' It is impossible to fix on any distinct locality. Some of the conjectures that have been made respecting it may be seen in Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Nod;' comp. Kallisch, Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., p. 147.

NO'DAB (nobility). Possibly an Ishmaelite tribe (1 Chron. v. 19).

NO'E (Matt. xxiv. 37, 38; Luke iii. 36, xvii. 26, 27; Heb. xi. 7; 1 Pet. iii. 20; 2 Pet. ii. 5). The Greek form of Noah.

NO'EBA (1 Esdr. v. 31). Perhaps Neko-da (Ezra ii. 48).

NO'GAH (brightness). A son of David, born at Jerusalem (1 Chron. iii. 7, xiv. 6). He is not mentioned in the list of David's children in 2 Sam. v. 14-16.

NO'HAH (rest). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 2).

NO'MADES (2 Macc. xii. 11). The wandering Arabian tribes.

NON (fish) (1 Chron. vii. 27). See NUN.

NOON. The Hebrew word which is translated 'noon' (Gen. xliii. 16, 25, and elsewhere) is a dual form: it signifies, therefore, double light, i.e. the strongest brightness. It is metaphorically used for great prosperity or happiness (Job xi. 17; Psal. xxxvii. 6; Isai. lviii. 10). The phrase 'let us go up at noon' (Jer. vi. 4) probably means unexpectedly: an attack would be rarely made in the heat of the day.

NOPH (Isai. xix. 13; Jer. ii. 16; Ezek. xxx. 13, 16). See MEMPHIS.

NO'PHAH (blast, perhaps windy place). A Moabite town (Numb. xxi. 30).

NORTH. A Hebrew, when speaking with reference to the points of the compass, was considered as having his face to the east: the north consequently was on the left; and thus 'the left hand' designates the north (Gen. xiv. 15; Job xxiii. 9). The north also was considered higher than the south; hence those travelling from north to south went down (Gen. xii. 10, xlii. 2); while those who travelled from south to north went up (xlv. 25, l. 6, 7, 9). The lands of the north denote Chaldea, Assyria, Media, &c. (Jer. i. 14, iii. 12, 18; Ezek. xxvi. 7; Zeph. ii. 13; Zech. ii. 6); not that they were precisely to the north of Palestine, but that the course of persons or troops proceeding from those countries would be from north to south, in order to enter Judea, instead of taking the straight direction across deserts.

NOSE. The Hebrews generally placed anger in the nose, because of the hard breathing of an angry person (2 Sam. xxii. 9; Job iv. 9, xli. 20). The idea is used as applied both to men and to the Deity. Further, hooks or rings were placed in the nostrils to secure and curb various animals, as buffaloes and camels (1, 2; Ezek. xxix. 4). Hence we find a metaphorical expression used to signify the subduing of an enemy (Isai. xxxvii. 29; Ezek. xxxviii. 4).

Arab woman at the present day with nose-ring.

NOSE-JEWEL (Isai. iii. 21). The nose-jewel or nose-ring is very common in the east. It is of gold or other metal, with two pearls and a ruby between, or, among the poorer classes, three or more glass beads attached. This ring is an inch or an inch and a-half in diameter, and is passed through the left, occasionally the right, nostril. Also a pendant is sometimes worn suspended from the middle cartilage of the nose.

Nose-ring worn by Arab women at the present day

NOVICE. A newly-converted person. Such a one was not to be ordained to the ministry (1 Tim. iii. 6). The precept is reasonable, and might well apply to all the churches which St. Paul had planted; the epistle in which it occurs not being of very early date.

NUMBER. In expressing numbers the Hebrews used, at all events in later times, the letters of the alphabet. Hence the facility of errors of transcription; different letters having a near resemblance. Certain numbers frequently occur as representative, or as supposed to indicate perfection: see SEVEN. Multiples of these are also used, in the way in which we use 'round numbers.' Thus in enumerations we often find only multiples of ten, or a hundred.

NUMBERING. See CENSUS.

NUMBERS, THE BOOK OF. This book occupies the fourth place in the Pentateuch. It has several names among the Jews; the most common of which are the first and the fifth words in the first verse, which signify respectively 'And he spake,' and 'In the wilderness.' The name which we give it is taken from the fact that twice it records a numbering of Israel. By the Jews it is divided into ten perashioth.

There is no definite plan visible in the composition of this book, which contains both legal enactments and historical notices. It was probably written at different times during the period which it includes, that is, from the first day of the second month in the second year after the departure from Egypt, to the beginning of the eleventh month of the fortieth year (Numb. i. 1, xxxvi. 13, compared with Deut. i. 3). But we may for convenience distribute its contents into three parts: I. Comprising the events and regulations during the continuance of the Israelites at Sinai (Numb. i. 1—x. 10). In this we have the account of the first census: II. Transactions in the wilderness, from their quitting Sinai till the beginning of the fortieth year (x. 11—xix. 22): III. The occurrences and commands given in the first ten or eleven months of the fortieth year (xx.—xxxvi.). The second census is here detailed, also the deaths of Aaron and Miriam, and the arrival of the people in the plains of Moab, on the eastern bank of the Jordan. A list of their various stations through the whole of their wanderings is given in xxxiii.

It will be observed that most of the events narrated in Numbers occurred in the second and fortieth years of the wilderness life of Israel. Little, and that not dated, is recorded of what happened in the interval. Exception has been taken to this fact. But it is in accordance with God's general plan in scripture. Those events only he would have recorded for the permanent instruction of his church, which were necessary to illustrate the covenant-relationship in which he designed to stand to them. Blanks therefore are often left in the history: much is omitted which it would have gratified our curiosity to know: all is related which is needful for our guidance and profit.

It has been imagined by some critics that there are portions of this book which do not fit in well to the rest: thus the date in i. 1 is the first day of the second month, while (ix. 1) the Lord is said to speak to Moses in the first month. Then, again, discrepancy is fancied because (xiii. 30, xiv. 24) Caleb's conduct, and the promise to him, are alone mentioned, though, immediately after (6, 38) Joshua is noticed too; and the untenable supposition is made that the history of the spies comprised at first xiii. 1—xiv. 4, 10 (latter part)—25, 39-45; and that a later hand unskillfully enlarged it by introducing xiv. 5-10 (former part), 26-38. Such are some of the objections stated by Bleek, (Einleitung, pp. 283, &c.). It must be sufficient to say here that, on the principle applied to Numb. i. 1, compared with ix. 1, almost any history ever written might be dismembered, and that the other difficulty is readily solved by supposing that Caleb spoke first in testifying against the evil report of the ten spies, and remembering that there was a special promise made to him, the fulfilment of which is to be noted in the course of the sacred history (Josh. xiv. 6-15). For some other matters connected with the Book of Numbers, see BALAAH, WARS OF THE LORD, THE BOOK OF THE WANDERING.

NUMENIUS (1 Macc. xii. 16, 17, xiv. 22, 24). A person sent on embassy in the Macabean times to Rome and Sparta.

NUN (fish). An Ephraimite, the son of Elishama prince of Ephraim in the wilderness, and father of Joshua (Exod. xxxiii. 11, Numb. i. 10). He is also called Non (1 Chron. vii. 27).

NURSE. A nurse was highly regarded in an eastern family. Thus Rebekah's nurse attended her to Canaan, and was buried by Jacob's family with much lamentation (Gen. xxiv. 59, xxxv. 8). The tenderness of a nurse for her foster-child is frequently alluded to in scripture, to illustrate affectionate care (Numb. xi. 12; Isai. xlix. 23; 1 Thess. ii. 7); and in some of these places a foster-father is intended.

NUT. The 'nuts' of Gen. xliii. 11 are pistachio-nuts. The pistachio-tree, Pistacia vera, is frequently found in Palestine and Syria. It thrives best in a dry and rocky soil; but it is of slow growth. It attains a height of twelve to twenty, sometimes thirty, feet. The stem is not thick; but the branches are numerous and much divided. It is in full bloom in April; and the blossoms are whitish and in clusters. The shell of the nut is odoriferous. These nuts are a favourite fruit in the east: they have a spicy taste, and are eaten either dry or preserved. It has been imagined that the kernel strengthened the stomach, and was a specific against the bite of serpents. In India the seeds are eaten with sweetmeats, or fried with pepper and salt. Another word is translated 'nuts' in Sol. Song vi. 11. Possibly walnuts may be there intended.

NYMPHAS (bridegroom). A Christian, it would seem, at Laodicea, who had a church in his house, and whom St. Paul saluted (Col. iv. 15).

O

OAK. A well-known tree, of which there are a vast number of species belonging to the genus Quercus. Oaks are very widely disseminated throughout the northern hemisphere. Some of them are deciduous, as Quercus pedunculata, the common British oak, and Quercus ilex, the common holm-oak.

The oak is frequently mentioned in scripture; but it is not easy to decide which species in the various places is meant. There are several Hebrew words used, el, elah, elon, alah, allah, allon, all implying the idea of strength. In our version the meanings 'oak,' 'teal-tree' (Isai. vi. 13), 'elm' (Hos. iv. 13) are given; and one of the words, elon, is constantly but incorrectly rendered 'plain' (e.g. Gen. xii. 6). It has been imagined that some of the terms designate the terebinth, Pistacia terebinthus, and others the oak; but then critics are not agreed which terms should describe the one and which the other. And it is very doubtful whether the terebinth is ever really referred to.

Dr. Thomson argues strongly for the oak. 'The Hebrew writers,' he says, 'seem to use these names (elah and allon) indiscriminately for the same tree, or for different varieties of it (one probably deciduous, the second evergreen)—and that was the oak. For example, the tree in which Absalom was caught . . . was the elah, not the allon; and yet I am persuaded it was an oak . . . There are thousands of such trees still in the same country, admirably suited to catch long-haired rebels, but no terebinths. Indeed this latter tree does not meet the requirements of this catastrophe at all. I see it asserted by the advocates of this translation that the oak is not a common nor a very striking tree in this country, implying that the terebinth is. A greater mistake could scarcely be made. As to strength, it is simply ridiculous to compare the terebinth with the oak; and the same in regard to size. The terebinth under which our tent is pitched down at Baniás is the largest I have seen; and yet there are many oaks to which it is but as an infant. Still more surprising are the statements about the extent of oak-forests in this land. Why, there are more mighty oaks here in this immediate vicinity (Medjel es-Sheims) than there are terebinths in all Syria and Palestine together. I have travelled from end to end of these countries, and across them in all directions, and speak with absolute certainty . . . I do not believe that Abraham's celebrated tree at Hebron was a terebinth; as many now affirm without qualification. It is now a very venerable oak; and I saw no terebinth in the neighbourhood' (The Land and the Book, pp. 243, 244). Elsewhere the same writer remarks that the so-called Abraham's tree (a Quercus ballota) cannot be more than 1000 years old (pp. 599, 600). He concludes, 'Until we have more light on this particular matter, and more decisive, let us continue to read out bravely the good old word oak, and never fear the smile of over-wise critics.'

The Quercus pseudo-coccifera, an ever green, and the Quercus agrifolia are frequently met with in Palestine: this last species is found in the woods of Bashan (Isai. ii. 13; Ezek. xxvii. 6; Zech. xi. 2). See BASHAN.

OATH. A solemn appeal to the Deity or some superior being, expressed or implied, in token of the good faith of him who declares or promises anything. We find oaths taken in patriarchal times (Gen. xiv. 22, 23, xxi. 23, 31), regulated by the Mosaic law, forbidden when unnecessary in the New Testament, but used by God himself to seal his promise as most trustworthy, and thereby to end all disputation (xxii. 16-18; Heb. vi. 13-18).

Oaths were usual on occasion of contracts, covenants, agreements, or stipulations (Gen. xxiv. 2, 8, 9, xxxi. 53; Josh. ix. 15, 19, 20; 2 Sam. xix. 23); in making vows (Lev. v. 4; Acts xxiii. 12, 21); as confirming promises (2 Kings xxv. 24; Matt. xiv. 7, 9); and in denouncing imprecations (Josh. vi. 26; 1 Sam. xiv. 24, 26-28). These were voluntary, as also were those more common asseverations when God was called to witness the firm purpose of him that expressed it (Ruth i. 17; 1 Sam. xxv. 22; 1 Kings ii. 23). But sometimes oaths were exacted, as by a sovereign from his subjects, or by a superior from a vassal (xviii. 10; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13; Eccles. viii. 2; Ezek. xvii. 16); akin to which were the oaths laid upon a people to obey the laws of God or of the land (Ezra x. 5; Neh. v. 12, x. 29, xiii. 29). Of the same nature were judicial oaths; persons on trial being obliged to clear themselves by oath (Exod. xxii. 10, 11; Numb. v. 19-22; 1 Kings viii. 31, 32; Matt. xxvi. 63, 64). Witnesses, too, were probably put on oath (Lev. v. 1).

The formula by which an oath was expressed generally involved a special appeal to the Deity, 'As the Lord liveth' (1 Sam. xiv. 39), 'God do so to me and more also' (44). Sometimes, however, the person addressed was joined with the Deity in the adjuration; 'As the Lord liveth and as thy soul liveth, (2 Sam. xv. 21; 2 Kings ii. 2, 4, 6), or the immediate mention of God was omitted (1 Sam. xvii. 55; 2 Sam. xi. 11). Of a similar kind was the oath of Joseph, 'By the life of Pharaoh' (Gen. xlii. 15, 16). Occasionally the oath was taken by more common things, by Jerusalem, by a man's head, &c. (Matt. v. 34-36, xxii. 16-22). As a test of allegiance to the Lord the Israelites were commanded to swear by his name (Deut. vi. 13), and not by the name of false deities (Josh. xxiii. 7); which would be in effect an acknowledgment of their authority.

Certain ceremonies were frequently used in taking an oath, in order to increase the solemnity of it. Such were the lifting of the hand (Gen. xiv. 22; Deut. xxxii. 40; Isai. iii. 7, marg.; Ezek. xx. 5, 6; Rev. x. 5, 6)—analogous to which was the laying of witnesses' hands on a criminal's head (Lev. xxiv. 14)—the placing of the hand under the thigh of another who required the oath (Gen. xxiv. 2, 3, 9, xlvii. 29, 31), of which different explanations have been given, as an allusion to the rite of circumcision, or a testimony to the belief of the Messiah; also the passing between the pieces of a divided victim (xv. 10, 17; Jer. xxxiv. 18). Oaths, too, were sometimes taken before the sacred altar (1 Kings viii. 31). Ceremonies for the same purpose accompany our own judicial oaths; as the holding up of the hand in Scotland, and the kissing of the New Testament in England.

Perjury and the non-fulfilment of an oath were regarded as great crimes. According to the law he who had given false witness was to suffer the same penalties to which his injustice had exposed the man against whom he testified (Deut. xix. 16-21). Even if any one had sworn to his own detriment he must perform his oath (Psal. xv. 4). This could not, however, be held to justify a sin. Herod was not excused by his rash oath for the Baptist's murder (Matt. xiv. 9).

We find in the New Testament prohibitions against swearing (v. 34-37; James v. 12). It cannot be supposed that it was intended by these to censure every kind of oath. For our Lord himself made solemn asseverations equivalent to an oath; and St. Paul repeatedly in his inspired epistles calls God to witness the truth of what he was saying. The intention was, as Dr. Alford well notes upon Matt. iv. 34-37, to show 'that the proper state of Christians is to require no oaths; that, when evil is expelled from among them, every yea and nay will be as decisive as an oath, every promise as binding as a vow': comp. art. xxxix. of the English church.

It may be added that Mohammedans usually swear on the opened koran.

The Roman soldiery were stringently bound by their military oath: see Matt. viii. 9.

OBADI'AH (servant of Jehovah).—1. An officer in Ahab's household, who in an evil time held fast his integrity and concealed a hundred prophets from the blood-thirsty rage of Jezebel (1 Kings xviii. 3-16).—2. A descendant of the house of David (1 Chron. iii. 21).—3. A chief of Issachar (vii. 3).—4. One of Saul's posterity (viii. 38, ix. 44).—5. A Levite (16): he appears to be identical with Abda (Neh. xi. 17).—6. A Gadite captain who joined David in the wilderness (1 Chron. xii. 9).—7. The father of the ruler of the tribe of Zebulun (xxvii. 19).—8. A prince sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 7).—9. A Merarite Levite in the days of Josiah (xxxiv. 12).—10. One who joined the caravan of Ezra returning from Babylon (Ezra viii. 9).—11. A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 5).—12. A Levite porter (xii. 25): possibly he may be the same with no. 5.

13. A prophet of whose personal history nothing certain is known. There have been various conjectures in regard to him, and various attempts to identify him with some of the other persons who bear the same name. We can only arrive at a reasonable conclusion by examining the terms of his prophecy. He speaks of the calamities of Jerusalem, when foreigners entered its gates and carried its forces captive. To what event does this refer? Some have imagined that the raid of the Arabians and Philistines in Jehoram's reign (2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17) is intended. But it is more reasonable to believe that some Chaldean invasion is described. Yet here again critics differ. Some maintain that the prophet means the captivity of Jehoiachin. Surely, however, the terms employed point to a yet more entire destruction, the final overthrow by Nebuchadnezzar. But then there is another question: is this desolation prophetically described? or is it narrated after it had occurred? The latter supposition would appear the true one, because the censure of the prophet is specially directed against Edom: it was for judgment upon him that Obadiah was inspired to utter predictions: it is natural therefore to believe that his sin for which such punishment was to follow had been already committed. It has also been thought from Obad. 20 that the prophet himself was one of the captives; on this, however, much stress cannot be laid. But we may on the whole conclude that he lived at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and that his prophecy was uttered shortly after.

OBADI'AH, THE BOOK OF. 588-583 B.C. This is the shortest of all the prophetic books: it is said to have been put in the place it occupies in our canon (the fourth among the minor prophets) because of the connection of its subject with that of the closing verses of Amos immediately preceding. There is a remarkable similarity between Obad. 1-8 and Jer. xlix. 7-16; and it seems clear that one of these prophets must have had the composition of the other before him. Which was the earlier is doubtful. As, however, we know that Jeremiah frequently re-produced the oracles which had previously been delivered, we may suppose it to have been the case here. Ewald imagines (Die Proph. des A.B., vol. i. pp. 399, 400) that both prophets borrowed from an older writer: Bleek dissents from this opinion (Einleitung in das A.T., p. 537); and in truth it rests entirely upon conjecture.

The style of Obadiah is animated, and his prophecy orderly and perspicuous. He first (1-9) denounces judgment against Edom, then (10-16) dwells upon the special sin committed, the malicious joy with which the Edomites had abetted Judah's enemies (comp. Psal. cxxxvii. 7), reiterating the threatening, and afterwards (17-21) he describes the restoration of Jewish prosperity, their dominion being largely extended. The accomplishment of the earlier part of the prophecy took place about five years after the taking of Jerusalem, that of the latter in the victories of the Maccabean princes: this has, however, no doubt its fullest completion in the establishment of Messiah's kingdom.

OBADIAHU (1 Kings xviii. 3, marg.). Obadiah, 1.

O'BAL (stripped or bare of leaves). A son of Joktan, being the name of a tribe and region in Arabia, the position of which is very uncertain (Gen. x. 28). In 1 Chron. i. 22 he is styled Ebal.

OBDA (1 Esdr. v. 38). A corrupted form of Habaiah (Ezra ii. 61).

O'BED (servant, sc. God).—1. The son of Boaz by Ruth, and father of Jesse (Ruth iv. 17, 21, 22; 1 Chron. ii. 12; Matt. i. 5; Luke iii. 32).—2. One of Judah's posterity, through the Egyptian Jarha (1 Chron. ii. 37, 38).—3. One of David's warriors (xi. 47).—4. A Levite porter (xxvi. 7).—5. A person whose son Jehoiada associated with himself and others in order to make Joash king (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

O'BED-E'DOM (servant Edom).—1. A person in whose house, after the death of Uzzah, the ark was deposited, and on whom in consequence God's blessing rested. He is called a Gittite, but he can hardly have been an alien, as elsewhere he is ranked among the Levites. Perhaps he was of the body attached to David during his residence at Gath (2 Sam. vi. 10-12; 1 Chron. xiii. 13, 14, xv. 18, 21, 24, 25, xvi. 5, 35). Or, probably, Obed-edom the Levite (xv. 18, 21, 24, xvi. 5, 38, xxvi. 4, 8, 15) was a different person from Obed-edom the Gittite.—2. An officer or treasurer of the temple in the time of king Amaziah (2 Chron. xxv. 24).

OBEDIENCE. Compliance with the requirements of law. Even inanimate things and irrational creatures may be said to pay obedience when they fulfil the purpose for which they were created, and are subservient to divine authority (Psal. cxlviii. 6-8; Matt. viii. 27; James iii. 3, 4). But this is not the moral obedience which reasonable beings are to render to those who have the just control of them. The pure angels do exactly God's commandments (Psal. ciii. 20); and men ought to show an equal obedience, as their paramount duty, to their Creator (1 Sam. xv. 22). Obedience is often due also from one person to another, as from children to parents (Eph. vi. 1), from wives to husbands (v. 22; 1 Pet. iii. 1, 6), from servants to masters (Eph. vi. 5), from subjects to rulers, civil and others (Rom. xiii. 1; Heb. xiii. 17; 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14). Our blessed Lord, having become man, paid obedience to the law of God which was laid on man. Christ's obedience was perfect: he entirely fulfilled his Father's commandments, becoming 'obedient unto death' (Phil. ii. 8); his death being, so to speak, the acme of his willing compliance, and entire performance of the work given him to do. It is this, the fulfilment of the law in his life, which, together with the endurance of its penalty in his death, completes that work, for the virtue of which those who believe in him are saved. His obedience unto death, then, while it by no means abates the claims of God's law on men as a moral rule of life, is yet a moral equivalent for the world's sin, and becomes available to all who plead it as the ground of their acceptance with God. This is forcibly argued by St. Paul (Rom. v. 12-19): comp. Dr. Alford's notes on the passage.

O'BETH (1 Esdr. viii. 32). Ebed (Ezra viii. 6).

O'BL (chief, i.e. overseer, of the camels). An Ishmaelite who had charge of David's camels (1 Chron. xxvii. 30).

OBLATION (Lev. ii. 4, 5; Isai. i. 13, and elsewhere). See OFFERINGS.

O'BOTH (water-skins). One of the stations of the Israelites, to the east of Edom, not very far from the southern extremity of the Dead sea (Numb. xxi. 10, 11, xxxiii. 43, 44).

OCHIEL (1 Esdr. i. 9). A corrupt form of Jeiel (2 Chron. xxxv. 9).

O'CHIM (howlings, howling animals) (Isai. xiii. 21, marg.). See OWL.

OCIDELUS (1 Esdr. ix. 22). A strangely-corrupted form of Jozabad (Ezra x. 22).

OCINA (Judith ii. 28). Not improbably for Accho.

O'CRAN (afflicted). The father of Pagiel prince of Asher (Numb. i. 13, ii. 27, vii. 72, x. 26).

O'DED (setting up, a sustainer).—1. The father of the prophet Azariah in Asa's reign (2 Chron. xv. 1-8): probably in 8 also Azariah is meant, and the words 'the son of' are erroneously omitted.—2. A prophet in Samaria in Pekah's reign (xxviii. 9-11).

ODOL'LAM (2 Macc. xii. 38). The Greek form of Adullam.

ODONAR'KES (1 Macc. ix. 66).

OFFENCE. This word is used to signify that against which a person stumbles, an occasion of falling, or, morally, that which causes any one to sin. It may or may not be entirely the fault of him who so stumbles and transgresses; but there is by no means necessarily implied any blame in the stumbling-block. Thus Messiah is called 'a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence' (Isai. viii. 14). It was by their own perverseness that the Jews were offended at him, because he did not come with the temporal grandeur they had expected; on them, therefore, the whole fault lay. But he that by his sin causes an offence is justly held to be very guilty (Matt. xviii. 7); and men are commanded to deny themselves even lawful indulgences which probably would give occasion to their own falling (v. 29, 30), or which might prove injurious to their brethren (Rom. xvi. 21).

OFFERINGS. Various kinds of sacrifice. The institution of sacrifice is elsewhere noticed. See SACRIFICE. In the earlier ages of the world it appears to have formed a part, generally speaking, of divine worship; and there was a certain distinction between those animals which might and those which might not be thus offered to the Deity (Gen. viii. 20). In the Mosaic law minutest details were given, and various offerings were prescribed, which, while they were graciously accepted as an act of service from the worshipper, inculcated also lessons most instructive for all future time, and had their full significance and completion in the great Christian sacrifice, the one offering of the Lamb of God once for all. The type contains less than the antitype. To convey all the lessons, therefore, that were intended, several forms of offering were commanded. And it is only by putting them together that we can at all grasp the entire purpose of God in them. We must view them, therefore, as parts of a whole, the well-ordered development of great fundamental truths, to bring out all that is connected with the sinner's reconciliation and restored fellowship with God; in which, too, his appropriate affections when in the divine favour may be expressed.

It was the first demand of the Israelites that they might be permitted to leave Egypt to offer sacrifices to Jehovah (Exod. v. 1-3). And we find them very soon after their departure making offerings on various occasions (xviii. 12, xxiv. 5). One of the first directions also given them was for an altar to be constructed for the different kinds of sacrifice (xx. 24, 25), such an altar as might be used at once, and used at any time when the altar of the sanctuary was not accessible. Somewhat later we have the whole code of regulations for offerings (Lev. i-vii.); the sin-offering, the trespass-offering, the burnt-offering, the peace-offering, with the meat and drink-offerings; each having its peculiar signification.

The sin-offering, ḥhattāth, is commanded and the order of it prescribed in iv. 1-v. 13, vi. 24-30. This betokened abasement in the most express sense, and was to be offered for special acts of sin, not, as our translation 'through ignorance' would lead the reader to suppose, those merely which had been unconsciously committed, but all which arose from that want of care which men to whom the will of God was revealed were bound to exercise. The original expression, according to abp. Magee (On Atonement, note xxxvii.), 'besides sins of ignorance, includes likewise all such as were the consequence of human frailty and inconsideration, whether committed knowingly and wilfully, or otherwise. It stands opposed to sins committed "with a high hand" (Numb. xv. 22-31), that is, deliberately and presumptuously, for which no atonement was admitted. So that the efficacy of the atonement was extended to all sins which flowed from the infirmities and passions of human nature, and was withheld only from those which sprang from a deliberate and audacious defiance of the divine authority. This view is also abundantly confirmed by the examples given of the particular sins which called for the atonement, and among which fraud, lying, rash swearing or perjury, licentiousness are to be found.' In this offering there was a gradation of victims, more or less costly, to mark the more or less offensive character of the sin, according to the position of the offender, or other circumstances. The blood of these victims was to be variously dealt with. If the victim were of an inferior kind, for a poor person, some of it was to be sprinkled on the side of the altar, and the rest poured out at the altar foot. If the victim were of higher degree, for a private person or a ruler, then in addition some of the blood was to be put upon the horns, the most prominent part, of the altar. If, still further, the offering were for the congregation or for the high priest, then also a portion of the blood must be taken into the sanctuary and sprinkled seven times before the inner veil, some being put upon the horns of the altar of incense. In each case the offerer had to lay his hand upon the victim before it was slain; and thus the blood-shedding with the sprinkling was taken as an atonement for his sin. Certain portions of the victim, the fat, the caul and adjoining parts, were then burnt upon the altar; while the rest, if the offering were for an individual, was to be eaten by the priest within the precincts of the sanctuary; if for the congregation, or for the priest himself, then it was to be carried forth, and burnt in a clean place. The full acceptance of the offering was thus shown: the flesh had become most holy: it was God's; by his priests, therefore, it was eaten, in his more immediate presence, except when the priests were directly, for their own sin, or indirectly, as members of the congregation, concerned: then the priests could not eat the flesh; else it would have been a peace-offering: neither could it be consumed upon the altar; else it would be a burnt-offering. The burning, therefore, took place without. Thus most clearly through the whole was the prominent idea exhibited—the identification of the offering with the sinner's guilt, the completeness of the satisfaction, and the entire removal of the iniquity. No meat-offering or drink-offering accompanied this rite: these symbolized the faithful obedience of the worshipper. But, as the sin-offering was pre-eminently atonement, that idea was made to come so prominently forward that there was no room for anything else. The consecration of the person, with the offering of his good works, was reserved for another stage in this great typical development.

The trespass-offering, asham, is the next to be considered. The regulations in regard to it are given in Lev. v. 14—vi. 7, vii. 1-7. A difficulty has been sometimes felt in distinguishing the trespass-offering from the sin-offering; and this is aggravated by the mistranslation of v. 6, which would be better rendered, 'he shall bring for his trespass.' The trespass or, as it might be called, the debt-offering, was a supplement or appendage to the sin-offering; it represented sin in a fresh light as an injury for which there must be recompense. The injury was two-fold—against the Lord, whose rights had been violated, and against a fellow-creature, whose property or person had been maltreated. In all such cases there must be a trespass-offering. The rites prescribed were these, that the victim should be killed, but the blood only poured round the altar, not sprinkled on the horns, or carried into the sanctuary; the same parts as in the sin-offering were to be burnt on the altar, and the rest to be eaten in the holy place. Then too, in respect of the injury done or debt incurred, estimation of value was to be made, and a fifth part added thereto: this, where the Lord was wronged, was to be given to the priest, where a neighbour, to him that had so suffered. Here we see a dealing with sin, not for its actual nature but for the evils that flow from it; and there was a great lesson inculcated, pressing home upon the conscience the moral debt incurred, and the consequent necessity of satisfying the divine justice, and making restitution to the brother who had been injured. It may be observed, as confirming the view that has been taken, that Christ's sacrifice, frequently represented as a sin-offering—the atonement being thus fully brought out—is not spoken of in the New Testament as a trespass-offering; the Greek word which specially signifies this last not being there used.

The burnt-offering must be now examined: it is called olah, 'ascension,' because it was consumed and went up in flame to the Lord; also chatt, 'the whole,' as being altogether burnt. The statutes respecting it are found in i., vi. 8-13. The burnt-offering may be said to be of pre-eminent dignity: it had a comprehensive character for those peculiarly who had been brought within the bonds of the covenant. It was the offering, therefore, of the ancient patriarchs (Gen. viii. 20, xxii. 13: comp. Exod. xxiv. 5). Herein it differed from the two kinds of offering before spoken of: they were for special sins, which, unatoned for, excluded the transgressor from covenant-blessings. But, when the conscience was so purged, then God's servant might approach him on the general ground of his promise, seeking in such an offering as this the large remission, not of this or that specified offence, but of all his short-comings, and imperfections, and sins. It was a voluntary service; and the offerer laid his hand on the head of the victim: the blood was to be sprinkled round about upon the altar, and the sacrifice to be entirely burnt, the skin alone being given to the priest. The entire consuming betokened the unlimited self-dedication of the offerer to God; and, as this would express itself in the fruits of a holy life and conversation, a meat and drink-offering (of which more hereafter) must accompany the burnt-offering.

The law of the peace-offerings, shel'mim, is given in Lev. iii., vii. 11-21. There were three different kinds of these, viz. of thanksgiving, the adoring gratitude of a full heart, expressing its sense of rich spontaneous mercy; for a vow, when some benefit had been granted as in consideration of a promise made; and a free-will-offering, when something was devoted to the Lord, but without any special purpose or occasion. Of these, the first-named would seem to stand in highest estimation. Peace-offerings were eucharistic. True, there was the imposition of hands upon the victim, and its blood was to be sprinkled on the altar: still such offerings were those of a reconciled state, the offerer being in amity with God. And this is further expressed by the fact that, while the priest had a portion, the offerer was with his friends to eat also (the same day if of thanksgiving); the permission betokening that he had a seat at God's table, and might rejoice before him. This, too, was to be accompanied with a meat and drink-offering.

Portions of the peace-offerings, the breast and the right shoulder of the victim, were reserved for the priest (31-34), being consecrated by 'heaving' or 'waving.' According to Jewish tradition, the parts were placed on the hands of the offerer; and then the priest, putting his hands underneath, moved them in a vertical direction for the heaving, in a horizontal one for the waving. This ceremony must have implied a presentation of the parts to God; and they became the property of the priests as God's officers. This view is confirmed by the fact that the same ceremony was practised in some other cases (Numb. xv. 19-21): hence the term 'heave-offering.'

The meat-offering, minchah, is prescribed in Lev. ii., vi. 14-23. It was an unbloody offering; and therefore it was not to be presented alone: it accompanied the burnt-offering and the peace-offering. So necessary was this conjunction that we find it even at the offering of the first-fruits, a lamb being also then slain for a burnt-offering (xxiii. 10-12, 17-20). And it may be added that no unbloody offering could be accepted for sin, save in the single case of a man's being so poor that he could not provide the doves or pigeons ordered as the cheapest victims for sacrifice (v. 11-13). The meat-offering consisted of flour or cakes, prepared with salt, oil, and frankincense; salt being the preservative against decay, oil the symbol of spiritual influence, and frankincense betokening the pleasant savour of a pure offering to the Lord. So that, as the meat-offering was to teach that God's servants were to be fruitfully engaged in good works, those good works must, it was shown, be incorrupt, inwrought by the divine Spirit, and must be presented before God with the incense of grateful prayer

But neither leaven nor honey was to be used, nothing that could corrupt or by self-pleasing oppose itself to the simple and entire dedication of the heart to God. A drink-offering of wine accompanied the meat-offering, and was, as it were, included in it (Exod. xxix. 40, 41; Lev. xxiii. 13; Numb. xv. 4-7, 9, 10). A portion of the meat-offering was to be burnt on the altar, and the rest eaten by the priest in the court of the tabernacle; except when the offering was for the priest himself; then, as in the analogous case of the sin-offering, it was to be wholly burnt.

Very beautiful and impressive, then, were the lessons taught to the devout Israelite by the series of offerings prescribed. Within the embrace of the divine covenant, he might present his burnt-sacrifice of expiatory character for sin; but, if any special guilt weighed upon his conscience—as in the consecration of Aaron and his sons the sin-offering preceded the burnt-offering (Lev. viii. 14-21)—his sin-offering must be brought; and in certain cases the debt incurred by trespass to be repaired, as well as the guilt of sin to be atoned for, was placed before him. Purged by the propitiatory offering he might feast before Jehovah on the sacrifices of peace-offerings, a welcome guest, sharing his reconciled Father's love; and with his other offerings he must bring his meat-offering, in token that in self-dedication he would be fruitful and abound in every good word and work. By ordinances such as these he was pointed forward to that completion in the gospel of all that the law pre-signified—the purging of the conscience by Christ's precious blood-shedding, the perfect sacrifice of atoning virtue made upon the cross, the peace and reconciliation with God procured thereby, the devoted service which with grateful love the forgiven sinner will ever be ready to pay prompted by the divine Spirit, and which has its high blessedness in communion with God (Heb. ix. 11-14). See Fairbairn's Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. sect. 7, vol. ii. pp. 334-364.

It must be added that the victim of every offering must be clean and unblemished, meet type of him who was 'holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners' (Heb. vii. 26; 1 Pet. i. 19).

The offerings which have been enumerated might be made as occasion should require, or were the voluntary expression, the free-will-offering, of a loving heart. But there were particular seasons when sacrificial rites were necessarily to be performed—these were daily, weekly, monthly, and annual. The daily sacrifice was a burnt-offering, consisting of two lambs, offered every day, morning and evening, at the third and ninth hours (Exod. xxix. 38-42; Numb. xxviii. 1-8). They were burnt as holocausts, but by a small fire, that they might continue burning the longer; a bread-offering and a drink-offering accompanying each. Incense also was to be burned every morning and evening (Exod. xxx. 7, 8). The weekly offering on the sabbath was equal to the daily offering, and was in addition to it (Numb. xxviii. 9-10). The monthly sacrifice at the new moon consisted of two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of a year old, for a burnt-offering, with a suitable meat and drink-offering, together with a kid for a sin-offering (11-15). There were, besides, the yearly offerings, at the passover; on the day of pentecost, on the first of the seventh month or beginning of the civil year, on the tenth of the same month or day of expiation, and at the feast of tabernacles. The offerings for these are carefully prescribed (16-31, xxix.).

There were besides perpetually other occasions when offerings were to be made. Families seem sometimes to have had yearly sacrifices (1 Sam. xx. 6, 29). There were the purification-offerings for women after child-birth (Lev. xii.), at the cleansing of the leper (xiv. 1-32), and of other persons who had been unclean (xv. 13-33), by the Nazarite (Numb. vi. 9-21), those at dedications, marriages, &c; there was also the offering of the shewbread; rites being continually prescribed in which some of the great lessons of the law were impressed upon the mind.

Such, briefly, were the ceremonial offerings of the first dispensation—not a mere collection of unmeaning burdensome services, but full of instruction, intended and adapted to prepare for the better covenant wherein the shadows would have their abiding substance. Doubtless devout Israelites looked onwards to this; the prophets testifying to the inutility of mere formal offerings (Isal. i. 11-15). And believers now may, to their great consolation, argue, from the legal offerings which fulfilled their purpose, to the full efficacy of the Redeemer's offering of himself (Heb. ix. 13, 14). Let no man, moreover, forget that he is to be himself 'a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God' (Rom. xii. 1).

OG (perhaps long-necked? prince?). The gigantic king of Bashan, an Amoritic prince, who reigned in Ashtaroth and Edrei. He attacked the Israelites, and was overthrown and destroyed by them, and his kingdom was taken possession of, and given to the half-tribe of Manasseh. His bedstead was preserved in Rabbath of Ammon: it was of iron, nine cubits long, and four cubits broad. Some have supposed this a common flat bed-frame (see BED), made of iron, in stead of palm-branches which would not have supported Og's weight: it has been otherwise suggested that it was a sarcophagus of basalt iron-stone. In any case, this 'bed' would be probably one-third longer than the height of the person for whom it was intended (Numb. xxi. 33-35, xxxii. 33; Deut. i. 4, iii. 1-13, iv. 47, xxix. 7, 8, xxxi. 4; Josh. ii. 10, ix. 10, xii. 4, 5, xiii. 12, 30, 31; 1 Kings iv. 19; Neh. ix. 22; Psal. cxxxv. 11, cxxxvi. 20). Bashan appears to have been originally inhabited by the elder stock of the Rephaim, also called Zuzim, or Zamzummim; and their chief bore sway over other inferior princes. These people were displaced by the Ammonites, who pushed their settlements as far northward as the upper Jabbock (Deut. ii. 19-21). Hence Og may be considered as one of the last representatives of the gigantic Rephaim (comp. Miss Corboux in Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp. 363-367). For some legends respecting Og see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., arts. 'Anac,' 'Falasthin.'

O'HAD (united). One of the sons of Simeon (Gen. xvi. 10; Exod. vi. 15).

O'HEL (a tent, dwelling). One of David's descendants (1 Chron. iii. 20).

OIL. Oil was very extensively used among the ancient Hebrews, just as it is at the present time throughout western Asia. For culinary purposes it is much preferred to animal fat or butter, which is likely to be soon rancid, or to melt, in a warm climate. Oil is consequently spoken of as one of the rich productions of the country (Deut. xxxii. 13; Ezek. xvi. 13). It was used also in some of the offerings (Exod. xxix. 40; Lev. vii. 12; Numb. vi. 15), mingled with the meal, or for the making of unleavened cakes; but it was excluded from the sin-offering (Lev. v. 11), and from the jealousy-offering (Numb. v. 15), on account of their character of humiliation. Oil was applied to the person in anointing, it being usually poured upon the head and the beard; it also was an ingredient in perfumes or ointment (Exod. xxx. 24, 25; 1 Sam. x. 1, xvi. 13; 2 Sam. xiv. 2; Psal. xxiii. 5, xcii. 10, civ. 15; Luke vii. 46). It was employed for medicinal purposes (Isai. i. 6; Luke x. 34), and symbolically used at the miraculous cures of sick persons (Mark vi. 13; James v. 14, 15). The bodies of the dead, too, as among the Greeks and Romans, would seem to have been anointed with oil, or at least some unguent (Matt. xxvi. 12). Oil, once more, was used for burning in lamps (Exod. xxvii. 20; Matt. xxv. 3, 4, 8). And in all these cases olive-oil was considered the best. Oil of myrrh is mentioned in Esth. ii. 12. From this extensive use of oil many illustrations are derived in scripture. The use of oil betokened gladness (Isai. lxi. 3); the omission of it, sorrow (2 Sam. xiv. 2). It pre-signified also spiritual blessing (Psal. xlv. 7). It may be added that the first-fruits and tithes of oil were to be offered to the Lord (Numb. xviii. 12; Deut. xii. 17, xviii. 4; 2 Chron. xxxi. 5; Neh. x. 37, 39, xiii. 12). See ANOINT, OLIVE.

OIL-TREE (Isai. xli. 19). See OLIVE-TREE.

OINTMENT. The use of unguents was common in the east, and is noted in scripture for personal adornment, for funereal, medicinal, and ritual purposes (Exod. xl. 9-15; Ruth iii. 3; Isai. i. 6; Matt. xxvi. 12; Mark xvi. 1). In warm climates they are especially required. Perfumed oils were generally employed by the Hebrews for the person; but perfumed waters are most used in modern times. Directions were given to Moses for the composition of an ointment to be reserved for sacred purposes (Exod. xxx. 22-33); and it is likely that the Israelites had learned the art of compounding unguents during their captivity in Egypt. Egyptian vases, which are supposed to have held such unguents, have been found; and the contents of some of these have been analysed. The pleasant odour of rich unguents is sometimes metaphorically used to express the attractions of an agreeable person (Eccles. vii. 1; Sol. Song i. 3); just as the opposite idea is denoted by unpleasant smell (Gen. xxxiv. 30; Exod. v. 21). See ANOINT, BURIAL, OIL, SPIKENARD; also Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Salbe.'

OLA'MUS (1 Esdr. ix. 30). Meshullam (Ezra x. 29).

OLD TESTAMENT. (2 Cor. iii. 14). See BIBLE, MANUSCRIPTS, SCRIPTURE, TESTAMENT, OLD.

OLIVE, OLIVE-TREE. The olive, Olea Europaea, is a well-known species of the order Oleaceae. It grows plentifully almost everywhere near the shores of the Mediterranean, and is abundant in Palestine (Deut. vi. 11, viii. 8). Olive-yards are therefore commonly mentioned as a considerable part of a man's property (1 Sam. viii. 14; 1 Chron. xxvii. 28). This tree flourishes in Syria, in warm and sunny situations, on a rocky soil, at a height not greater than about 3000 feet above the level of the sea. It increases slowly to a moderate altitude of twenty or thirty feet, with a knotty trunk, and numerous extended branches. The leaves grow in pairs, of a pale dusty colour, and are not deciduous. The white flowers appear in June; and the fruit is an oblong berry, first green, and, when fully ripe, a blackish-purple. The wood is something like box, but softer, with dark grey veins. The olive-tree lives to a great age.

This tree is mentioned very early in scripture. It was with an olive-leaf in her mouth that the dove returned to Noah, apprising him thereby that the waters of the flood were abated (Gen. viii. 11). The high estimation in which the olive-tree was held is seen by its being placed first in Jotham's parable (Judges ix. 8, 9). And it is often mentioned as indicating plenty, prosperity, and strength; the allusion taking its force both from the products, from the evergreen character, and the protracted existence of the tree (e.g. Psal. lli. 8, an olive being often planted in the court of a building, cxxviii. 3, young shoots springing from an old trunk; Jer. xl. 16; Hos. xiv. 6). And various applications are referred to of the berries (Deut. xxiv. 20), the oil (Lev. xxiv. 2), which was an article of commerce (1 Kings v. 11), and the wood (vi. 31-33).

Dr. Thomson describes the culture and use of the olive in modern Syria; and his descriptions illustrate the scripture accounts in a remarkable way. 'The olive is the most prodigal of all fruit-bearing trees in flowers.' But then scarce one in a hundred comes to maturity: see Job xv. 33. Fruit is yielded only every other year; but a large tree will produce ten or fifteen gallons of oil, a most indispensable article, used in every culinary process, and the material of soap. The 'shaking' of the trees (Isai. xvii. 6) is usually about November, and is a laborious process (The Land and the Book, pp. 51-57). Two kinds of presses are now used for obtaining the oil; the m'aserah, worked by hand, and the m'atrah, driven by water-power, like an ordinary mill (pp. 338, 339). Similar processes were doubtless anciently in use. The olives were ground to a pulp in a kind of stone basin, a heavy stone roller being passed over them; and the oil was received in stone presses, the jest being that which flowed first. Many of such presses, with their floors, gutters, troughs, and cisterns, may still be seen almost perfect in a ruin above Tyre, called Em El-Awamtd. They consist of upright posts, two feet apart, in the inner faces of which are grooves. A plank moved in these, forced down by a lever on the masses of olives. The oil flowed into a stone trough. In the large basin the olives were ground to a pulp by the stone wheel. In the other perhaps they were trodden with the feet (see Mic. vi. 15).

The reference of St. Paul to the grafting of the olive-tree is illustrated by a singular fact. If the good be grafted on the wild tree, it will, as the Arabs say, 'conquer the wild.' But, if the wild shoot be grafted into the good tree, the wild will conquer the good. Hence the apostle says this was 'contrary to nature' (Rom. xi. 17-24); and so the mercy shown to the Gentiles was magnified, when they, a wild race, introduced into the church, became good and fruitful, contrary to the ordinary process, unto eternal life.

Occasionally the 'oil-tree' is mentioned in scripture (Isai. xli. 19). This is perhaps sometimes identical with the olive, and is so translated in our version in 1 Kings vi.

23, 31-33. But in Neh. viii. 15 ('pine-branches') it is distinguished from the olive. Some have thought that any resinous tree might be meant. Perhaps it was the wild olive, or more probably, according to Dr. Hooker in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 596, the Balanus Egyptiaca, or common zackum.

OLIVES, THE MOUNT OF, OLIVET, MOUNT. A mountain ridge to the east of Jerusalem, from which it is separated by the valley of Jehoshaphat. It is generally described as having three summits or peaks. Dr. Stanley, however, including more of the ridge under the general name, notices four summits, 'one outlier starting off to the north, and another to the south.' These are now designated (1) the 'Galilee,' because there it is supposed that the angels stood when saying, 'Ye men of Galilee,' or because this was the Galilee to which Christ retired after his resurrection; (2) the 'Ascension,' the supposed site of that event; (3) the 'Prophets,' from the catacombs on its side, termed the 'prophets' tombs;' and (4) the 'Mount of Offence,' demominated from Solomon's idol-worship (Sinai and Palestine, pp. 185-195, 452-456).

The mount of Olives, called also Olivet (and by the Arabs at present Jebel et-Tur, a name they give to elevated summits generally), was so styled from the olive-trees which clothed its sides. Some of these still remain (see GETHSEMANE); and on part of the hill are corn-fields; and in a few half-cultivated gardens are fig and pomegranate-trees.

Little mention is made of Olivet in the Old Testament, save that it was up its slopes that David, when fleeing from Jerusalem for fear of Absalom, went wearied and weeping as his faithful guards fled on before him. Here he met Hushai and Ziba (2 Sam. xv. 30-xvi. 4). It is also referred to by Zechariah (Zech. xiv. 4). And yet it may very well be that there were other deeds done on Olivet recorded in the Old Testament, though the well-known name is not mentioned in connection with them. On the northern summit there is great reason to believe stood Nob, that city of the priests, where David and his men ate the shewbread, where the sword of Goliath was kept, and where Doeg, the evil-minded Edomite, at whose treacherous information Saul destroyed the city, was 'detained before the Lord' (1 Sam. xxi., xxii.). And this may explain the singular phrase, 'where David worshipped God' (2 Sam. xv. 32): David's feet were treading in sorrow the precincts of that sanctuary where he had been accustomed, ere its desolation, to worship in joy. And it has been suggested (see Stanley, ubi supr., pp. 187, 188) that it was hither David brought the giant's head (1 Sam. xvii. 54). The towers of Jebus were so close to Nob, that at a distance they seemed one city. Even now to the spectator, in some positions, the buildings on Olivet are mixed with those in Jerusalem.

It is from the New Testament, however, that this mount derives its most touching interest. Hither the Lord was wont to resort. From Olivet he looked down upon the rebellious city and wept bitter tears over its perverseness and its fate. Over Olivet he passed to and fro visiting Bethany. On the side of Olivet was Gethsemane. From Olivet, when all was done, the great atonement made, the victory over death achieved by the glorious resurrection, the last charge given to the disciples who were thenceforth to build up the impregnable fortress of the Christian church, Christ ascended to reign till every enemy should be subdued beneath his feet (Matt. xxiv. 3, xxi. 30; Mark xi. 1-20, xiii. 3, xiv. 26; Luke ix. 29-44, xxi. 37, xxii. 39; John viii. 1; Acts i. 9-12).

Very dear to the believer and very sacred is the spot last touched by the Redeemer's feet, where a pledge was given that as he departed so surely shall he one day come again. Some connect with this return the prediction of Zech. xiv. 4. This, however, cannot be discussed here. See Henderson, Minor Prophets, pp. 437, 438.

Christ did not ascend from the spot whereon now stands the church of the Ascension: it was rather from some point over the summit, near upon Bethany (Luke xxiv. 50, 51). The views from this mount in different directions are extensive: you look into Jerusalem on one side, while on another there are the dreary hills over which the road passes to Jericho, with the northern end of the Dead sea visible, and the mountains of Moab beyond. The highest point of Olivet is 2397 feet above the sea-level, or according to Van de Velde 2724.

OLYMPAS. A Christian at Rome, to whom St. Paul sent salutation (Rom. xvi. 15).

OLYMPIUS, JUPITER (2 Macc. vi. 2). See JUPITER.

OMAEUS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Corrupted from Amram (Ezra x. 34).

O'MAR (perhaps eloquent). One of the descendants of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15; 1 Chron. i. 36).

O'MEGA (great O). The last letter of the Greek alphabet (Rev. i. 8, 11, xxi. 6, xxii. 13). See ALPHA.

O'MER (a handful) (Exod. xvi. 16, 18, 22, 32, 33). See MEASURES.

OM'RI (perhaps pupil of Jehovah).—1. The captain of the host of Israel, who, when Zimri had killed king Elah, and occupied his throne, marched with the army to Tirzah, besieged Zimri, and reduced him to such straits, that after a miserable reign of seven days he fired the palace and perished in the conflagration. Omri was supported in his pretensions to the vacant throne, it would seem, by the army; but a competitor, Tibni, had a large part of the people with him. The struggle continued for some years, from 928 to 925 B.C.: then Omri prevailed, and Tibni died. From this time Omri reigned with full authority till 918, twelve years in all. His conduct was ungodly; and he left his crown to his weak and wicked son Ahab. It was this king who, having purchased the hill Samaria from its owner Shemer, built thereon the splendid city which was ever after the capital of the kingdom of the ten tribes (1 Kings xvi. 16-30; 2 Kings viii. 26; 2 Chron.

xxii. 2; Mic. vi. 16). It appears from the treaty of Ben-hadad with Ahab that Omri had been engaged in an unsuccessful war with Syria.—2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. vii. 8).—3. A descendant of Judah (ix. 4).—4. The ruler of Issachar in the time of David (xxvii. 18).

ON (strength). A Reubenite who joined with Dathan and Abiram (Numb. xvi. 1). As his name is not again mentioned, it has been supposed that he separated himself in time from those who persisted and perished in their rebellion.

ON (light, or specially the sun?). An ancient and celebrated city of Lower Egypt. Here was a famous temple of the sun; and the priests that officiated in it were highly distinguished. Joseph married the daughter of one of these priests (Gen. xli. 45, 50, xlii. 20); an alliance which must have contributed greatly to his credit with the Egyptians, but which some have looked to as the reason of that fatal tendency manifested by the Ephraimites his descendants to favour Egyptian idolatry. The scripture, however, is perfectly silent as to any such influence existing in Joseph's family from his marriage. From the worship paid at On to the sun (under different forms, as Ra, the sun simply, and Atum, the setting sun), the city was called Beth-shemesh, house of the sun, by the Hebrews (Jer. xliii. 13), and from the vanity of idol-worship it was termed Aven in Ezek. xxx. 17. It was rendered Heliopolis, sun-city, by the Septuagint translators, and was known under that name to Greek writers, as one of the four great Egyptian cities which were centres of religious solemnities. Heliopolis gave name to the district or 'nome' surrounding it; and it was at Leontopolis, said (though it is alleged incorrectly), to have been in the Heliopolitan nome, that the Jewish high priest Onias, excluded from his dignity in Jerusalem, erected a temple under the auspices of Ptolemy Philometor, and established regular service there, which continued till the days of Vespasian. Onias alleged that he thereby fulfilled a prophecy (Isa. xix. 18, marg.): see IR-HAHERES. This city suffered much from the Persian invasion; and works of art were carried from it to enrich first Rome and afterwards Constantinople. In the time of Strabo it was but a mass of splendid ruins, among which some of those halls could be traced in which Greek sages as well as Egyptians had studied. The site is still marked by low mounds enclosing a space of about three quarters of a mile long and half a mile broad: the only remnant of ancient magnificence amid the utter desolation is an obelisk of red granite, sixty-eight feet high, attributed to the reign of Osirtesen I. These ruins lie two hours, or nearly ten miles, north-east of Cairo, six hours from ancient Memphis. In the neighbouring village of Matariyeh is a fountain called 'Ain-Shems, sun-fountain, the Arabic name of the city. And hard by is an old sycamore, under which according to tradition the holy family rested when they came into Egypt.

O'NAM (strong, stout).—1. One of the descendants of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi 23).—2. A descendant of Judah, son of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 26, 28).

O'NAN (id.). One of the sons of Judah, who died by God's visitation for his criminal evasion of the levirate law (Gen. xxxviii. 4, 8, 9, xlvi. 12; Numb. xxvi. 19; 1 Chron. ii. 3).

ONE'SIMUS (useful). The slave of Philemon who had fled from his master, but was converted by means of St. Paul, who sent him back from Rome with a letter to Philemon (Col. iv. 9; Philem. 10). Tradition says that he was afterwards made bishop of Berea, and ultimately martyred at Rome. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Onesimus.'

ONESIPH'ORUS (bringing profit). A Christian who had been serviceable to St. Paul at Ephesus. He also sought him out when a prisoner at Rome, and ministered to him (2 Tim. i. 16-18, iv. 19).

ONIA'RES (1 Macc. xii. 19). This word is corrupt. With a slight alteration it would be 'Aureus to Onias.'

ONTAS.—1. A Jewish high priest, successor of Jaddua, about 330-309 B.C.: it is he that most probably is referred to in Ecclus. l. 1, as the father of Simon the Just, who was father of a second Onias.—2. Another high priest, the third of the name, about 198-171 B.C., grandson of the Onias, son of Simon the Just. It must have been with him that the correspondence of the Lacedonians and the Jews commenced (1 Macc. xii. 7, 8, 19, 20). He was unjustly deposed and murdered (2 Macc. iv. 33-38). He is said to have appeared in a vision to Judas Maccabeus (xv. 12-16). His brother bore the same name, but exchanged it for Menelaus. See MENELAUS. It was the son of this Onias who fled into Egypt, and founded a temple at Leontopolis: see ON.

ONION. One of the plants which the Israelites in the wilderness regretted. They had eaten it in Egypt, and they murmured for want of it (Numb. xi. 5). The Allium cepa, or common onion, has been cultivated in Egypt from time immemorial, and there attains its greatest excellence. Its leaves and roots are annual, dying in the course of a summer, after perfecting a bulb. But the bulb is biennial, and will put forth roots and leaves in the following season, when it increases in size. Onions will thrive in any good rich soil.

O'NO (strong). A city built by the Benjamites (1 Chron. viii. 12), some of the citizens of which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37). The plain near it bore its name (vi. 2), and it was re-occupied after the captivity by Benjamites (xi. 35). It must have been in the immediate neighbourhood of Lod or Lydda, with which it is almost always named. It possibly may be the modern Kefr 'Ana; but this is uncertain.

O'NUS (1 Esdr. v. 22). Ono.

ON'YCHA. One of the ingredients in the sacred perfume (Exod. xxx. 34). It is the shell or operculum of a species of mussel, the Murex ramosus of Linnæus, found in the waters of India, also in the Red sea, and on the Arabian coast. When burned it emits a sweet musky odour. It is known as the Unguis odoratus, the Blatta Byzantina of the shops. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Teufelsklaue.' But according to Duns it is rather the gum of some tree, perhaps the gum-benjamin, Styrax benzoin (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 64).

ONYX. The Hebrew word shoham is thus rendered (Gen. ii. 12; Exod. xxviii. 9, 20, xxxv. 9, 27; 1 Chron. xxix. 2; Job xxviii. 16; Ezek. xxviii. 13). Opinions differ as to the gem intended by this word: some prefer translating it 'beryl.' But Duns defends the version of our translators (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. i. pp. 98, 99). The onyx has its particles arranged in parallel layers; white alternating with blue, grey, or brown. It was much used by the ancients for cameos; the device being cut out of the opaque white, while the darker part formed the ground.

O'PHEL (a hill). A hill or ridge on the east of mount Zion, surrounded and fortified by a separate wall (2 Chron. xxvii. 3, xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 26, 27, xi. 21). After the return from captivity, the Nethinim had their habitations here. Robinson identifies Ophel with the continuation of Moriah, southward towards Siloam, between the valley of Jehoshaphat to the east, and the Tyropæon to the west. It is about 1,550 feet in length, and 290 in breadth, and ends in a rocky bluff, forty or fifty feet above the pool of Siloam. The ground is tilled and planted with olive and other fruit-trees (Bibl. Res., vol. i. p. 267). In the margin of our version the word is rendered 'tower,' also in 2 Kings v. 24; where either the hill on which Samaria was built is meant, or the well-known hill by the prophet's habitation.

O'PHIR (abundance?). A descendant or son of Joktan, of the family of Shem (Gen. x. 29; 1 Chron. i. 23).

O'PHIR (id.). A country peopled by the posterity of Joktan's son. There is much difficulty in determining the region designated in scripture by this name. It was a place whence the navies of Solomon and Hiram, sailing from a port on the Red sea, brought gold, precious stones, ivory, almug-trees, apes, and peacocks (1 Kings ix. 26-28, x. 11, 22; 2 Chron. viii. 18, ix. 10). It would seem that the voyage lasted three years; though some have inferred from certain passages (1 Kings x. 14; 2 Chron. ix. 13) that an annual voyage was made to Ophir and back. Jehoshaphat attempted to renew the communication; but his ships were wrecked at Ezion-geber (1 Kings xxii. 48). The gold procured from this region was peculiarly valued (1 Chron. xxix. 4; Job xxii. 24, xxviii. 16; Psal. xlv. 9; Isai. xliii. 12); so that 'gold of Ophir' was proverbial for gold of the most precious kind.

Now, as to the situation of this country, no difficulty need be felt on account of its being said that ships of Tarshish were engaged in the Ophir trade; as if Tarshish and Ophir were near. Large vessels were called 'ships of Tarshish;' or the vessels used might be those that had been employed in voyages to Tarshish or Tartessus. Ophir is often placed on the African coast, and identified with Sofala, or Zanguebar, where it is said there is a gold district called Fura. But this district is 200 miles from the coast, and the name Sofala cannot at all be connected with Ophir, the significations being quite different. Besides Ophir is named (Gen. x. 29) between Sheba and Havilah, that is, in Arabia. And, indeed, there is at present an Arabian town Ophar, in the province of Oman; though, to be sure, the names are not so closely allied in the original as they appear to be in English. The long time consumed in the voyage to a country comparatively so near as Arabia, may be accounted for by the slowness of ancient coast navigation; and, besides, commodities might be exported, as well as others imported, and thus a longer delay be necessary at the ports. Neither is the fact that some of the articles imported are not now found in Arabia decisive. Ophir might be an emporium where trade from the east and west might meet; and thus Indian treasures might be procured there.

These reasons are very strong for identifying Ophir with some part of Arabia. Still the Septuagint translators frequently render Ophir by a word understood to mean India; and Josephus favours this interpretation (Antiq., lib. viii. 6, § 4). And the argument of Prof. Max Müller is most weighty. He observes that the Hebrew expressions for apes, peacocks, sandal-wood, and ivory, are clearly of a foreign cast, that there is every reason to believe that they are Sanscrit, or of Sanscrit origin: hence he concludes that these things must have come from the country from which they brought their names. Ophir, therefore, is India (Lect. on Science of Language, pp. 189-191). Still the proof that some of the commodities imported came from India is not decisive to show that Ophir was in India. It is conclusive for the country from which the commodities originally came, not for the place where the Hebrews obtained them. As above stated, Ophir might be an emporium, where Indian and Hebrew merchants met. The theory that there were two Ophirs, one in India one elsewhere, is destitute of sufficient foundation. See on this vexed question Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Ophir'; Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 281, 282; Duns, Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. pp. 274-279.

OPHNI (mouldy). A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 24). Perhaps the modern Jifna, two or three miles north-west of Beth-el.

OPH'RAH (female fawn). A name in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 14).

OPH'RAH (id.).—1. A town belonging to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23; 1 Sam. xiii. 17). This has been supposed identical with Ephraim or Ephron (2 Chron. xiii. 19), and Ephraim (John xi. 54). See EPHRAIM. Perhaps it may be the village et-Taiyibeh, on a hill north-east of Beth-el.—2. A city in the territory of Manasseh, west of the Jordan, the residence of Gideon (Judges vi. 11, 24, viii. 27, 32, ix. 5). It has not been satisfactorily identified.

ORACLE. This word is sometimes used to denote the sanctuary of the tabernacle and of the temple, where the special presence of Jehovah dwelt (1 Kings vi. 16, viii. 8; 2 Chron. iv. 20; Psal. xxviii. 2). Divine communications were made to persons enquiring of the Lord: hence 'the counsel of Ahithophel' was accounted so judicious, 'as if a man had enquired at the oracle (or word) of God' (2 Sam. xvi. 23). In the New Testament the revelations of God in his holy word are denominated 'oracles' (Acts vii. 38; Rom. iii. 2; 1 Pet. iv. 11). They were the true testimony of him who cannot lie.

But by oracle ordinarily is understood that power of utterance ascribed to heathen deities when interrogated by their worshippers, the word being loosely applied sometimes to the response itself, and sometimes to the place where the response was delivered. The Greek oracles were of chief note. The mind of the Greeks was specially inquisitive into futurity; and the multiplicity of the gods they worshipped would furnish facilities for communications with them. The most celebrated oracle was that of Apollo at Delphi. Here the Pythia—in early times a young maiden, later a woman of fifty, of low origin and uneducated, but of unsullied moral character—was supposed to have the divine inspiration. She prepared herself by chewing laurel leaves, and drinking from the Castalian fountain. She then mounted a tripod, placed over a chasm, from which ascended an intoxicating vapour, which she received and under its influence uttered incoherent words. These were arranged and interpreted by a prophet and five assistants, and formed the oracular response. Other noted oracles were three, also of Apollo, in Asia Minor, at Didyma, Claros, and Patara; that of Zeus or Jupiter at Dodona; and that of Ammon in Libya. Unquestionably imposture was practised: dubious replies were given, which the superstition of enquirers disposed them to accept, when the result did not agree with the anticipation; and it is likely that oracles were not always inaccessible to bribery. But after every allowance of this kind the whole mystery of them is not solved. Some have imagined that they kept up a system of wide espionage for the sake of obtaining information. If in certain cases this were so, it could not have been effectively carried out for several generations. Is it too much to suppose, when adoration was paid to demons instead of to the living God, that the dark power of evil was permitted to exercise some mysterious influence over his votaries?

The Greek oracles decayed or were extinguished in the last days of the Roman republic, and those of the early emperors. In the time of Adrian, indeed, and of the Antonines, with the convulsive struggle of paganism, oracles in some measure revived, ere long entirely to pass away. The fact of their gradual extinction is puzzling. May we suppose that he who had winked at earlier ignorance (see Acts xvii. 30) was now resolved, on the promulgation of Christ's gospel, that the vanity of all opposing power should be manifested, when he 'commanded all men everywhere to repent'? See Döllinger, The Gentile and the Jew, transl., book iv. 2, vol. i. pp. 209-219; book viii. 2, § 6, vol. ii. pp. 202-206.

ORATOR. So Tertullus is called in Acts

xxiv. 1. Here is an example of a hired advocate being employed, according to the forms of the Roman law. In Isai. iii. 3 the word may be used in a bad sense, perhaps with reference to divination.

ORCHARD. See GARDEN.

ORDAIN. This term in a general sense means to command or appoint (Numb. xxviii. 6; Dan. ii. 24; 1 Cor. ix. 14). Our translators have used it to express several different words of the original. With regard to some of them, the theological meaning has caused much discussion. Thus the apostles are said to 'have ordained elders in every church' (Acts xiv. 23; Tit. i. 5), implying that certain persons were solemnly set apart for ecclesiastical offices. The questions relating to the mode and manner of this ordination cannot be determined here: they are treated at length by Bingham (Orig. Eccles., book iv.).

Again, there are passages (Acts xiii. 48; Jude 4) in which some have found a pre-determination of God influencing men's eternal destiny for life or death. It may be sufficient on the first of these texts to cite a few sentences from Dr. Alford's note upon it. 'The meaning of this word must be determined by the context. The Jews had judged themselves unworthy of eternal life: the Gentiles, "as many as were disposed to eternal life," believed. By whom so disposed is not here declared; nor need the word be in this place further particularized. We know that it is God who worketh in us the will to believe, and that the preparation of the heart is of him.' Dr. Alford proceeds to enumerate the different opinions which have been held upon the subject. In Jude 4 the word properly means 'before written,' with a reference probably to the Old Testament prophecies.

ORDINANCE. A word used for general laws, whether of God (Isai. xxiv. 5; Ezek. xi. 20), or of civil governors (1 Pet. ii. 13), to which due obedience must be paid. It also sometimes occurs in our version for the ceremonies or regulations of divine worship (Heb. ix. 1, 10).

O'REB (a raven). One of the two princes of Midian whom the Ephraimites took and slew, sending their heads to Gideon (Judges vii. 25, viii. 8; Psal. lxxxiii. 11).

O'REB (id.). A rock, so called because Oreb was slain there (Judges vii. 25; Isai. x. 26). It is probable that it was to the west of the Jordan; but see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Oreb.'

O'REB (2 Esdr. ii. 33). Horeb.

O'REN (the pine). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 25).

ORGAN. A wind-instrument invented by Jubal (Gen. iv. 21). It was, no doubt, at first of very simple construction, a single reed with holes. But afterwards the reeds or pipes were multiplied into what is called the syrinx, or Pandean pipe, a mouth-organ in which the number of reeds varied from five to twenty-three. It is still common in western Asia. When mentioned in the later books of scripture we may suppose it to have attained its more complex form (Job xxi. 12, xxx. 31; Psal. cl. 4). Some have thought it identical with the 'dulcimer of Dan. iii. 5, 10, 15. See DULCIMER.

ORION. A well-known brilliant constellation, south of Taurus and Gemini, and partly on the equator. It bears this name from a Greek legendary story, which with its variations must be sought in classical dictionaries. The word occurs three times in our version (Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31; Amos v. 8) as the rendering of the Hebrew term chesti; and there can be little doubt that the translation is a just one. In the Persian mythology Orion was identified with Nimrod; and the same notion seems to have prevailed among the Arabians and Chaldeans, who called this constellation the hero or the giant, assigning him Sirius as a dog for his companion. The plural is found in Isai. xlii. 10, 'constellations.' See Henderson, Isaiah, pp. 119, 120.

ORNAMENT. A fondness for personal ornament has always distinguished oriental nations; and it exists unchecked to the present day. Both by particular description and from incidental notices of scripture we learn how, generally, the Hebrews and their neighbours, male and female, decked themselves with ornaments, such as anklets, armbands, bracelets, ear-rings, nose-jewels, &c., &c., descriptions of which will be found under the respective articles. In times of festivity of course they were specially used (Isai. lxi. 10; Jer. ii. 32; Hos. ii. 13), and in times of mourning they were taken off (Exod. xxxiii. 5, 6). Censures were directed against extravagance in ornament (1 Tim. ii. 9, 10; 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4). The ornaments of grace are infinitely more precious. See DRESS, STONES, PRECIOUS.

OR'NAN (active). (1 Chron. xxi. 15-28; 2 Chron. iii. 1). See ARAUNAH.

OR'PAH (mane, forelock, or, according to some, faun). A Moabite female, wife of Chilion son of Elimelech and Naomi. She at first intended to accompany Naomi to Beth-lehem, but was persuaded to return to her own people (Ruth i. 4-14).

ORPHAN. The fatherless and the widow were equally regarded in the Mosaic law (e.g. Exod. xxii. 22; Deut. x. 18). A fatherless child among the Jews had two guardians. He became of age at the time appointed by his father's will (Gal. iv. 2); but, if his father died intestate, the minority terminated at the usual age of thirteen years and one day, if the signs of ripeness of age then appeared; if not, it might be protracted till the youth was twenty, or, it is said, sometimes thirty-five (see Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on Gal. iv. 2).

ORTHOB'SIAS (1 Macc. xv. 37). A city of Phœnicia, north of Tripolis.

OSAFAS (1 Esdr. viii. 48). Probably Jeshaiah (Ezra viii. 19).

OSE'A (2 Esdr. xlii. 40). King Hoshea.

OSE'AS (2 Esdr. i. 39). The prophet Hosea.

OSE'E (Rom. ix. 25). Hosea.

OSHE'A (deliverance, safety). The original name of Joshua (Numb. xiii. 8, 16). See JOSHUA.

OSPRAY. An unclean bird (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12). There is a difference of opinion in respect to it; but it very pro bably is the Pandion haliaetus. This is a very powerful bird, sometimes weighing five pounds: its limbs are muscular, and its feet adapted for retaining firm hold of its prey. It feeds on fish, and is therefore found in the vicinity of lakes and rivers. It pounces upon its prey with sudden dash, and carries it off in its talons. It is found in all the various quarters of the world.

OSSIFRAGE (bone-breaker). An unclean bird (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12). This is believed to be the Gypaetos barbatus, the lämmergeier of the Germans, and in our nomenclature the bearded vulture. It is large and powerful, measuring four feet from the point of the bill to the end of the tail: the head and neck are not, as in vultures generally, naked, but covered with whitish narrow feathers; and there is a beard of bristly hair under the lower mandible. It is now rare in Europe: it frequents mountainous countries, and is found among the craggy rocks on the borders of the Red sea. It lays two white eggs, marked with brown blotches. This bird is bold in its predatory habits, seizing animals larger than itself, the mountain hare, the wild goat, the young chamois, and various kinds of birds. It devours its prey, when it has seized it, on the spot, and refuses flesh when in a state of putrefaction; and hence, by a wise provision, its numbers are limited, while vultures, which are to clear off animal matter in a state of decomposition, largely multiply.

OSTRICH. A large bird, the Struthio camelus of Linnæus, of the order Corsores, belonging to the family Struthionidæ. The Hebrew words, ya'en, bath-hayya'anah, signifying probably, 'voracious,' 'the daughter of the voracious,' describe this bird, the flesh of which was forbidden as food (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15), where in our version 'owl'; but in several places 'ostriches' is given rightly in the margin (e.g. Job xxx. 29; Isai. xlii. 21, xxxiv. 13, xliii. 20). There is another word, rânân or rênânâh, implying a wailing cry, which through our translators make it 'peacocks' (Job xxxix. 13) certainly denotes the ostrich. The verse is rendered by Carey, 'The wing of the ostrich thrilleth joyously: is the feather and plume [that] of the stork?' (Book of Job, p. 152). The description given in the succeeding verses (14-18) has caused some perplexity. Naturalists describe the bird as the largest of the feathered tribe, exceedingly swift, employing its wings which are useless for flight to aid it in running. It is voracious, and will swallow any hard substance, as stones or metal; but these are to assist the action of the gizzard. Sometimes, however, it is said that its indiscriminating appetite proves fatal to it. Several female ostriches lay their eggs in a single nest, a mere shallow hole in the sand, and then carefully cover them. In very hot climates the sun's heat on them is sufficient in the day-time without incubation by the parent birds; but in less sultry regions both male and female are said to sit upon the eggs. There are also other eggs scattered near which are apparently neglected, but are really designed for the food of the young birds when hatched. These habits are the result of the instinct with which the Deity has endowed the ostrich; but some of them are so strange as to have given rise to an Arabian proverb, 'As foolish as an ostrich.' And this is sufficient to justify the statement in the book of Job. Scripture must of course be composed in popular language; and the meaning here is evidently not that the bird is through stupidity unfaithful to its instinct, but that that instinct is of a kind which seems to imply want of forethought and natural care. And it is worth notice that another bird of the same family, the rhea, or American ostrich, as described by Darwin, leaves about great numbers of eggs, which are useless and become putrid, but does not desert her young more frequently than other wild birds when their nests have been disturbed. The ostrich is a native of Africa, Arabia, and the Syrian deserts: the feathers are much prized.

OTH'NI (lion of Jehovah). A Levite, one of the porters (1 Chron. xxvi. 7).

OTH'NIEL (lion of God). A son of Kenaz younger brother of Caleb, of the tribe of Judah. It has been with less reason supposed that Othniel himself was Caleb's brother. He took Kirjath-sepher, and so obtained the hand of Achsah, Caleb's daughter (Josh. xv. 17; Judges i. 13; 1 Chron. iv. 13). Afterwards, when Chushan-rishathaim had subjected the Israelites, Othniel was the instrument of their deliverance, and was the first of their judges (Judges iii. 9-11). The name is again mentioned in 1 Chron. xxvii. 15; possibly Heldaî there spoken of was a descendant of Othniel.

OTHONIAS (1 Esdr. ix. 28). Mattaniah (Ezra x. 27).

OUCHES (Exod. xxviii. 11, 13, 14, 25, xxxix. 6, 13, 16, 18). The settings or bezels in which gems are fixed.

OVEN. See BREAD, FURNACE.

OWL. The characteristics of the family of the Strigidae, to which owls belong, are that they have large heads, with great eyes directed forward, and surrounded by a disk of loose delicate feathers; this disk being more or less developed according to the nocturnal habits more or less of the species: they have raptorial beaks, crooked claws, and a downy plumage, generally speckled or barred with shades of brown and yellow. Species are found almost everywhere.

Owls are several times mentioned in scripture: mistakes, however, have unquestionably been made by the translators of our version. Thus the 'owl' forbidden as food (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15) is certainly the ostrich, and is so rendered in other passages: see OSTRICH. 'The great owl' is among the birds enumerated as unclean (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 16); and the same original word, yanshâph, or yanshâph, occurs in Isai. xxxiv. 11, where it is translated simply 'owl.' It has been supposed that a marsh or water-fowl must be here intended; and some have suggested a species of crane or heron. The Septuagint translators call it the ibis, the Egyptian sacred bird; and the Vulgate adopts this rendering. But then there is the objection not easily got over that the ibis is unknown in Palestine. It is little likely that a law intended to be permanent would forbid a kind of food which the people would never find in their own country. If, however, the word be taken really to signify the ibis, we may add this as another proof of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. For unquestionably no later compiler, living in Canaan, would have introduced an entirely foreign bird into his lists. Another bird forbidden is 'the little owl' (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 16). The Hebrew word côs signifies a cup or receptacle; and hence it has been thought that the pelican must be meant. But in another place (Psal. cii. 6) the côs is distinguished from the pelican. It is likely therefore that the term designates some kind of owl; but the particular species can only be conjectured. Duns suggests Athene noctua, or Athene meridionalis (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 86). There is another word, lîlîth, rendered 'screech-owl' (Isai. xxxiv. 14). The rabbinical story of a night-spectre lying in wait for children may safely be dismissed; though certain critics have imagined that the prophet really meant some such being by the word he uses. It implies doubtless some nocturnal creature, and is very probably an owl, the Strix flammea, or Bubo maximus. Irby and Mangles found owls in the very locality described, at Petra: 'The screaming of eagles, hawks, and owls, who were soaring above our heads, in considerable numbers, seemingly annoyed at any one approaching their lonely habitation, added much to the singularity of the scene:' comp. Kitto, Pict. Bible, note on the place. In Isai. xxxiv. 15 we have 'the great owl' as the translation of the Hebrew kippôz, which is said to imply darting: consequently Henderson renders 'arrow-snake,' after Gesenius; but in the connection in which the word occurs it is more likely to mean a bird. What bird can only be guessed at: it may have been some kind of owl. The ochim (Isai. xlii. 21, marg.) are supposed by Gesenius to be howlets or owls. It is but a conjecture. More probably any howling creatures are meant.

OX, OXEN. Oxen constituted a large part of the wealth of an agricultural people (Job i. 3). Sometimes they were fed in pastures, sometimes stall-fed (1 Kings iv. 23; Prov. xv. 17). Oxen were used for food, for draught, and for sacrifices. See BULL, BULLOCK. The wild ox is enumerated among the animals which were clean, whose flesh might be eaten (Deut. xiv. 5). The same Hebrew word occurs in Isai. li. 20; where it is rendered a 'wild bull:' it implies swiftness, and denotes a species of antelope, probably the Antilopus leucoryx, or abu-harb of Sennaar and Kordofan, where it lives in large herds. It is a powerful animal, with the horns, which are long and sharp, slightly bent backwards. Delineations of it are common on the ancient monuments of Egypt and Nubia.

OX-GOAD. See GOAD.

OX (Judith viii. 1). Judith's grand father.

O'ZEM (strong). 1. One of the sons of Jesse (1 Chron. ii. 15). 2. A son of Jerahmeel of the posterity of Judah (25).

OZI'AS (Matt. i. 8, 9). Uziah.

OZI'AS.—1 (2 Esdr. i. 2). Uzzi (Ezra vii. 4, —2 (Judith vi. 15, 16, 21, and elsewhere). One of the governors of Bethulia.

OZ'IEL (Judith viii. 1). One of Judith's ancestors.

OZ'NI (the hearing). A son of Gad (Numb. xxvi. 16), called Ezbon in Gen. xli. 16.

OZ'NITES. A Gadite family descended from Ozni (Numb. xxvi. 16).

OZO'RA (1 Esdr. ix. 34).

P

PA'ARAI (probably for Naarai) (2 Sam. xxiii. 35). See NAARAI.

PA'DAN-A'RAM (the plain of Syria, Aram of the fields). A district (it is usually said) of Mesopotamia, viz. that lying round the city Haran, which is seated in a wide fertile plain, bounded by mountains (Gen. xxv. 20. xxviii. 2, 5, 6, 7, xxxi. 18, xxxiii. 18, xxxv. 9, 26, xli. 15, xlviii. 7, in which last place it is Padan only). But there is strong reason for doubting whether Padan-aram lies in Mesopotamia, properly so called, that is, the country between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates: it has been with much probability supposed rather to be 'those extensive plains of well-watered and luxuriant pastures which are now well ascertained to extend for more than three days' journey eastward beyond the Jebel Hauran': see

MESOPOTAMIA; and comp. Miss Corboux in Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp. 386, &c.

PA'DON (deliverance). One whose children, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 44; Neh. vii. 47).

PAG'IEL (event of God). The prince of the tribe of Asher in the wilderness (Numb. i. 13, ii. 27, vii. 72, 77, x. 26).

PA'HATH-MO'AB (governor of Moab). One whose descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 6, viii. 4, x. 30; Neh. iii. 11, vii. 11, x. 14). It has been conjectured that, as some of the Shilonite family of Judah had, at some unknown time, 'the dominion in Moab' (1 Chron. iv. 22), the name Pahath-moab might attach to their descendants. It is as likely a conjecture that, as Moab was subjected by David (2 Sam. viii. 2), and remained a vassal state till after Ahab's death (2 Kings i. 1), the name was derived from an Israelitish governor placed over the Moabites.

PAI (a bleating) (1 Chron. i. 50). See PAU.

PAINT, PAINTING. There is no reason to suppose that the art of painting was cultivated among the Hebrews. The prohibitions of the law would discourage the production of pictures. And, though according to our translation there is mention in Isai. ii. 16, of 'pleasant pictures,' yet the original words can hardly admit such a meaning. Henderson renders 'vessels of delightful appearance' (Isaiah, p. 23). But buildings were decorated with painting. The walls and beams of houses were coloured with vermilion (Jer. xxii. 14). Figures, probably of idols, were so depicted on the walls of temples (Ezek. xxiii. 14); and idols themselves seem to have been thus coloured (Wisd. xiii. 14). The Assyrian discoveries have illustrated these customs. Dr. Layard found the walls of various chambers in the palaces of Nimroud, constructed of sun-dried brick, covered with plaster coating, on which were painted figures and ornamental devices. The colours, he says, were blue, red, white, yellow, and black, arranged with considerable taste. But the laws of perspective and proportion do not seem to have been understood. On the walls of Egyptian monuments, also, paintings have been discovered. For eye-painting see EYE.

PALACE. This word often denotes the entire mass of buildings, courts, and gardens contained within the external wall enclosing a royal residence (Dan. i. 4, iv. 4, 29). Sometimes, however, it designates a citadel or fortress, like the keep of a more modern castle, the strongest part of the king's house (1 Kings xvi. 18; 2 Kings xv. 25); where some have imagined, but probably not on sufficient grounds, that the harem, or women's apartment, was meant. In Isai. xxv. 2 the name is used for the citadel of a hostile metropolis. The expression 'Shushan the palace' (Esth. i. 2, 5) must have implied that quarter of the city where the royal residence was. See SHUSHAN. Elsewhere, and specially in the New Testament the name was given to the residence of a man of rank or wealth (Matt. xxvi. 3; Mark xvi. 66; Luke xi. 21; John xviii. 15). Solomon is said to have built a magnificent palace (1 Kings vii. 1-12). This structure was no doubt of great size and costly materials. It occupied thirteen years in building; and we may readily suppose, from the unlimited resources at the sovereign's command, that it equalled, probably exceeded, any palace of which history gives account. The hall of judgment, the house for Pharaoh's daughter, and, it may be, the house of the forest of Lebanon, were all portions, more or less connected, of this vast edifice. Modern plans of it have been drawn: they are, however, almost entirely conjectural. Josephus attempts to describe it (Antiq., lib. viii. 5, § 2), but professes himself unable to tell the numbers of its halls and chambers, and the riches with which it was adorned. The 'palace' of Phil. i. 13 must have been the barrack of the Prætorian guards attached to the emperor's palace. Herod's palace at Jerusalem (Josephus, Bell. Jud., lib. v. 4, § 4) was occupied by the Roman governor.

PA'LAL (judge). One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 25).

PALESTINA (Exod. xv. 14; Isai. xiv. 29, 31). See next article.

PAL'ESTINE (land of strangers, or sojourners). A region, Peleseth in the original, comprising the southern portion of the coast and plain of Canaan, along the Mediterranean, which was hence called 'the sea of the Philistines,' from Ekron to the border of Egypt. The inhabitants of this district were termed Philistines; and at various times they pushed their conquests and held possession of large portions of the interior. See PHILISTINES. From the Hebrew Peleseth came the Greek Palæstina; and this name was frequently by ancient writers (Josephus among the number, Antiq., lib. viii. 10, § 3) applied to the whole land of Israel. Palestine is also the common modern appellation. See CANAAN, LAND OF.

The different districts of Palestine have been described, as assigned to the respective tribes, in the articles headed by the names of the tribes. The natural features, the inhabitants and the cities, the productions, the climate, the manners and customs, &c., are more or less minutely treated of; and to such notices the reader must be referred. But it may be desirable in the present article to give a brief general view of the country, comprising in an orderly enumeration those particulars which are scattered elsewhere.

Palestine, though but a small region, is admirably situated for acting, as it was intended to act, upon the great nations of the world. At the extremity of Asia, closely connected with Africa, lying on the shores of the Mediterranean, which washed many of the most important states of Europe, not far either from that extended gulf by means of which intercourse could be held with India, it yet was compact and defensible, a kind of citadel from which influence and authority might flow forth, but which, except for one weak point, the lowland near the coast, other nations could not successfully assail. In length it is about 140 miles, in average breadth not more than forty between the Mediterranean westward, and the deep Jordan valley to the east, while to the north it is closed in by Lebanon and Anti-libanus, and bordered on the south by the desert.

The physical structure of Palestine is peculiar. It is mountainous, the highlands of Lebanon extending (so to speak) in subordinate eminences through the whole country; but among these mountains are plains and valleys and torrent-beds. And the mountain-mass which occupies the central region is bordered on each side east and west by a lowland belt. On the west the plains of Philistia and Sharon lie between the Mediterranean and the hills, interrupted by a ridge which, shooting out from the main highlands, terminates in the bold promontory of Carmel. To the north of this ridge the low plain widens and extends in one part its undulating surface quite across the country to the Jordan. And still farther to the north is Phœnicia with headlands down to the sea. The eastern depression is much more remarkable than that just noticed on the west. It is a deep cleft in which lie a chain of lakes, connected by the Jordan. And the bottom of this cleft is not only below the mountains and the eastern plain, but far, in its lower part, below (2,625 feet) the level of the Mediterranean sea. It is, in fact, a part of that great valley which, with certain interruptions, extends from the north of Syria to the head of the eastern gulf of the Red sea, comprising Cœle-syria, the Ghor, and the Arabah. Owing to this extraordinary depression, the slopes on the eastern side of the central elevated land are much more abrupt and rugged than on the west.

The mountain-mass of Palestine is limestone with basaltic and other deposits. It is much disturbed, but whether by volcanic or other action no conjecture can be here hazarded. This, however, may be said—that the extraordinary cleft described above is probably not paralleled elsewhere.

The southern hill-country is dry and bare. There is little wood: it is near upon the desert, and possesses few springs of water. The hill-tops are rounded and monotonous; the eastern part of the tract being but an arid wilderness. And a note-worthy feature in these hills is the abundance of caverns, partly natural, partly, perhaps, artificial. As the traveller journeys northward the country improves. There are more and more frequently fertile plains winding among the hills which present a more varied aspect. There is more vegetation and more wood, till in the north the swelling hills are clothed with beautiful trees, and the scenery is described as pleasing, oftentimes romantic. In central and north Palestine, too, there are gushing fountains of water, imparting fertility to the valleys through which they pour their streams. Fertile, indeed, still are the lowlands which, it has been said, border the hill-country. The Philistine plain is one vast corn-field, yielding the most abundant increase. And dry and barren as are many of the hills at present, there is evidence enough that in earlier happier days they were terraced, wooded, and productive, so that the encomium bestowed upon the country was not too high: 'a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil-olive, and honey . . . a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass' (Deut. viii. 7-9).

Of course, with the differences of altitude above noticed, the climate varies much in different parts of Palestine; a circumstance favourable for a variety of natural productions. Four regions have been marked out, distinguished by difference of climate: 1. Region of Ghor and Wady el-Arabah, depression 1 to 1,300 feet, mean annual temperature 75° to 70°; 2. Littoral plains, elevation 1 to 500 feet, mean temperature 70 to 68°; 3. Table-lands, elevation 2000 to 3000 feet, mean temperature 63° to 60°; 4. Lebanon, 4000 to 10,000 feet, mean temperature 35 (Peterman, Phys. Atlas, p. 135). Hence there are to be found in this country the productions of the tropics, and of alpine regions. Indeed, in its physical character, Palestine presents a kind of miniature of all the countries of the world, highland and desert, maritime and inland, arctic and tropical, pastoral, arable, and volcanic. 'This fact, which has rendered the allusions in the scriptures so varied as to afford familiar illustrations to the people of every climate, has had its natural effect on the zoology of the country. In no other district, not even on the southern slopes of the Himalaya, are the typical fauna of so many distinct regions and zones brought into such close juxtaposition. The bear of the snowy heights of Lebanon, and the gazelle of the desert, may be hunted within two days' journey of each other: sometimes even the ostrich approaches the southern borders of the land: the wolf of the north, and the leopard of the tropics, howl within hearing of the same bivouac: while the falcons, the linnets, and buntings, recall the familiar inhabitants of our English fields, the sparkling little sun-bird, and the grackle of the glen, introduce us at once to the most brilliant types of the bird-life of Asia and South Africa' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 691). Similarly with lower forms of animals and insects, the natives of different lands meet in Palestine.

Lists of the beasts and birds mentioned in the bible have been elsewhere given: see BEASTS, BIRDS. Some species, heretofore not uncommon, have now disappeared. Thus the lion is no longer found; but bears, panthers, hyenas, wolves, foxes, jackals, wild boars, squirrels, hares, rats, mice, porcupines, badgers, &c., occur, and, of domestic animals, camels, horses, asses, mules, buffaloes, oxen, sheep, and goats. Among the birds are eagles, vultures, falcons, kites, and different kinds of owls, also ravens, crows, partridges, quails, storks, herons, sea-swallows, gulls, doves, and various song-birds. Of reptiles there are lizards and serpents, tortoises, frogs, and toads. The Mediterranean and inland lakes yield fish; while, of insects, scorpions, spiders, bees, locusts, and butterflies abound.

Of trees there are oaks, carob or locust-trees, planes, the sycamore-fig, walnut, tamarisk, olive, oleander, the vine, and the fig-tree, the crops from which are large and most important to the people: there are also mulberry-trees, quinces, almonds, bananas, pomegranates, and other fruit-trees. The prickly pear is used for fences; and its fruit is acceptable. Palm-trees are now rarely seen. Of flowering plants there are abundance: see FLOWERS: and the prolific yield of corn in the lowlands has been already noted. Palestine is not, properly speaking, a mining country: for a notice of the metals known there see METALLURGY.

Palestine was early inhabited by seven tribes of the stock of Ham. These are enumerated as Hittites, Gergashites, Amorites, Canaanites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites (Deut. vii. 1); and other tribes are also noted as occupying adjacent regions, and in a greater or less degree pushing themselves into this country (Gen. x. 15-19, xv. 18-21; Numb. xliii. 28, 29): for some notice of these see EARTH, and the articles under the names mentioned respectively. It became afterwards the land of Israel; but, when judgment fell upon the Hebrews for their sins, they were removed, and there was at different times a large influx of foreign population, eastern nations (2 Kings xvii. 24; Ezra iv. 9, 10), Greeks, &c.; so that even in our Lord's time the inhabitants of Palestine were of a mixed character; and in later ages additional foreign elements were introduced.

After the Hebrew conquest, Palestine, together with the trans-Jordanic territory (for which see BASHAN, GILEAD), was divided among the twelve tribes. Subsequently it was split into the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah (see ISRAEL, and JUDAH); and in our Lord's time the whole country, that beyond the Jordan inclusive, was distributed into Judea, comprising the territories of Judah, Benjamin, Simeon, and part of Dan; Samaria in the central part of the country, and nearly corresponding to the territories of Ephraim and Manasseh; Galilee, embracing the districts occupied by Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, Asher, and northern Dan; Perea, including Abilene, Trachonitis, Iturea, Gaulanitis, Batanæa, and Perea properly so called; to which some geographers add Decapolis. Idumea, it may be noted, had encroached on Judea in the south.

Reference must be made to other articles for an account of the mountains of Palestine (see MOUNTAINS), of its lakes, and streams, cities, generally upon hills, which will be found noted under their respective names; and for its history such articles as ISRAEL, JUDAH, JEWS, KINGS, MACCABEES, &c., may be consulted.

Most highly honoured of the regions of the world has been Palestine. Therein the wonder-working hand of God has most visibly displayed itself, and therein he specially dwelt as King of its inhabitants. In that land the Word took flesh, and was 'found in fashion as a man;' and its present state is the fulfilment of prophecy, the corroboration of the sacred writings. Perhaps it may recover its beauty and dignity, and be again the acknowledged heritage of the Great King. But man must not presume to map out the future. Time alone will show.

PAL'LU (distinguished). A son of Reuben (Exod. vi. 14; Numb. xxvi. 5, 8; 1 Chron. v. 3), called Phallu in Gen. xli. 9.

PAL'UITES. A family of Reuben, descended from Pallu (Numb. xxvi. 5).

PALM, PALM-TREE. There are many species, several hundreds, it is said, of palm; but the Phoenix dactylifera, or date-palm, is that which, growing in Palestine, is referred to in scripture. It is highly valued by eastern nations; and travellers tell us that its fruit furnishes a considerable part of their subsistence to the inhabitants of Egypt, Persia, and Arabia. A conserve is also made of it with sugar; while the stones are ground in the hand-mills for the food of camels. Baskets, bags, mats, &c., are manufactured of the leaves: the trunk is split up, and is serviceable in various ways: the web-like integuments at the bases of the leaves are twisted into ropes: the sap is collected, and is at first a sweetish mild beverage, but afterwards ferments, and a kind of arrack is produced from it by distillation. Every part, therefore, of the tree has its use.

Formerly palm-trees abounded in Judæa; a fact sufficiently proved by the names of several localities, into which the word tamar, a palm, enters, as Baal-tamar, Hazeton-tamar, &c. And it is very probable that Phœnicia is so called as the palm-country; phœnix, or phœnix, being the Greek for palm. Jericho, again, was celebrated for its palm-groves, so that it was termed 'the city of palm-trees' (Deut. xxxiv. 3; Judges iii. 13; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15). And Bethany was 'the house of dates.' Few palms, however, are now left, except in gardens about Jerusalem and elsewhere, and in the Philistine plain.

The palm furnishes several allusions for the sacred writers. The scripture notices of it are well illustrated in Moody's The Palm Tree, 1864, pp. 333-448. Thus a lady is sometimes likened to a palm (Sol. Song vii. 6, 7); and we find its name, Tamar, borne by several ladies (Gen. xxxviii. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 1, xiv. 27). The expressions of the palmist are note-worthy: 'The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree . . . those that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age: they shall be fat and flourishing (Psal. xcii. 12-14). 'The palm,' says Dr. Thomson, 'grows slowly but steadily. . . It does not rejoice overmuch in winter's copious rain, nor does it droop under the drought and the burning sun of summer. Neither heavy weights which men place upon its head, nor the importunate urgency of the wind, can sway it aside from perfect uprightiness. There it stands, looking calmly down upon the world below, and patiently yielding its large clusters of golden fruit from generation to generation. They "bring forth fruit in old age." The allusion to being planted in the house of the Lord is probably drawn from the custom of planting beautiful and long-lived trees in the courts of temples and palaces, and in all "high places" used for worship. This is still common: nearly every palace, and mosque, and convent, in the country has such trees in the courts; and, being well protected there, they flourish exceedingly. Solomon covered all the walls of the "holy of holies" (1 Kings vi. 29) round about with palm-trees. They were thus planted, as it were, within the very house of the Lord; and their presence there was not only ornamental, but appropriate and highly suggestive—the very best emblem, not only of patience in well-doing, but of the rewards of the righteous, a fat and flourishing old age, a peaceful end, a glorious immortality. The Jews used palm-branches as emblems of victory in their seasons of rejoicing (Lev. xxiii. 40; Neh. viii. 15; John xii. 13); and Christians do the same on Palm-Sunday, in commemoration of our Saviour's triumphal entry into Jerusalem. They are often woven into an arch, and placed over the head of the bier which carries man to his "long home," and speak sweetly of victory and eternal life' (The Land and the Book, pp. 49, 50). In allusion to this Jewish custom, and to the giving of palms to victors in the games, the great company whom the apocalyptic writer saw had palms in their hands (Rev. vii. 9). In the medal of Vespasian (see JERUSALEM, p. 456), the daughter of Judah is represented as mourning under a palm-tree. It is an expressive and appropriate emblem.

PALMERIST (Jonah iv. 6, marg.). See GOURD.

PALMER-WORM (Joel i. 4, ii. 25; Amos iv. 9). See LOCUST.

PALMONI (Dan. viii. 13, marg.). A Hebrew word used (as well as some kindred terms, peloni and almont, of which it is compounded) to denote an unnamed person; as we say 'such a one.'

PALSY. Palsy or paralysis (which last is a Greek word, signifying a loosening or relaxation) is a disease in which sensation or the power of motion is lost in some part of the body. There is a distinction between nerves of sensation and of motion; hence, according as one or other is affected, paralysis is loss of sensation or anæsthesia, or incapacity of moving. The two, however, may be affected together, and power of motion and sensation be both lost. The disease varies in intensity and in the extent to which it prevails. Sometimes it is complete, all power sensational or motive being destroyed; sometimes incomplete, the powers being only impaired. It may be partial, a single nerve being touched, or it may affect half the body, hemiplegia, or the lower parts, paraplegia. Again, it may be general, almost every member being more or less incapacitated. Other varieties of the disease need not be mentioned here. Many persons described as palsied or paralytic were cured by our Lord (e.g. Matt. iv. 24, viii. 5-13, ix. 2-7; Mark ii. 3-11; Luke vii. 2-10), and by the apostles (Acts viii. 7, ix. 33, 34). Probably the word is used in scripture in an extended signification. Dr. Harle (Essay on the State of Physic in the Old and New Test., &c., pp. 126, 127) imagines that it includes apoplexy. In one case racking pain was felt (Matt. viii. 6); perhaps the disorder was attended with violent cramps or neuralgia. See Barnes, Notes on the New Test., note on Matt. iv. 24.

PAL'TI (deliverance of Jehovah). The spy from the tribe of Benjamin (Numb. xiii. 9).

PAL'TIEL (deliverance of God). A chief of Issachar, selected to superintend the division of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 26).

PAL'TITE. The designation, it is unknown whence derived, of one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 26). He is elsewhere called the Pelonite (1 Chron. xi. 27).

PAMPHYLIA. A maritime province of Asia Minor, having to the south that part of the Mediterranean called the Pamphylian sea (Acts xxvii. 5), Cilicia to the east, Pisidia to the north, whence we find St. Paul passing through Pisidia to Pauphlyia (xiv. 24), and from Pamphylia to Pisidia (xiii. 14); to the west it bordered on Lycia. Pamphylia was a small slip of country, lying, so to speak, on the slope of the Taurus, which stretched in a north-westerly direction, and along the heights and in the hollows of which was Pisidia; it was fruitful, well watered, and possessed some navigable rivers and considerable towns. Under the Syrian kings it was with more extended boundary to the north a notable province of their empire: when subjected to Roman rule it had sometimes its own governor and was sometimes held in conjunction with Galatia. It was united by Claudius to Lycia and part of Pisidia. The cities of Pamphylia mentioned in the New Testament are Perga and Attalia (ii. 10, xiii. 13, xiv. 25, xv. 38). Many Jews had settled there: comp. 1 Macc. xv. 23.

PAN. Several Hebrew words are thus rendered in our version. That which occurs most frequently, from a root which signifies 'to cook,' probably meant a cooking-pan or frying-pan (Lev. ii. 5, vi. 21, vii. 9; 1 Chron. xxiii. 29). It was sometimes made of iron (Ezek. iv. 3), and was probably a flat or nearly-flat plate. A derivative of the same root is used (1 Chron. ix. 31) to denote the things cooked on such an utensil. The 'pans' of 2 Chron. xxxv. 13 were pots for boiling. The same original word signifies 'ash-pans' which were of copper (Exod. xxvii. 3). Those in Numb. xi. 8 were also pots for boiling, saucepans. We have another word in 1 Sam. ii. 14, a basin or fire-pan for cooking. The 'pan' of 2 Sam. xiii. 9 was a metal pan, which probably had its name from its being kept bright. The 'fire-pans' (Exod. xxvii. 3), from a root implying to take up, were fire-shovels in which coals were taken up, or incense kindled. The 'frying-pan' (Lev. ii. 7, vii. 9) was a kettle or pot for boiling.

PAN'NAG. A word occurring only once in scripture (Ezek. xxvii. 17), in respect to which nothing satisfactory can be said. Henderson on the passage is inclined to consider it a place. Gesenius, after the Targum, imagines it to mean a kind of pastry or sweet cake. The Septuagint translates the word castia, the Vulgate balsam. Various other conjectures have been proposed; sufficiently showing that we have not at present the proper information to decide what Pannag really was.

PAPER (2 John 12). See WRITING.

PAPER-REEDS. The word so rendered in Isai. xix. 7 signifies naked places, without trees: it means here the grassy places on the banks of the Nile used for meadows or pasturage. The 'paper-reed' or papyrus is elsewhere alluded to, but the word in the original is different, and is translated 'rush' or 'bulrush': see BULBUSH, REED.

PAPHOS. A city of Cyprus, over-against Pamphylia (Acts xiii. 6, 13). It is New Paphos that is here meant, a sea-port with a good harbour on the western coast of the island, which under the Roman dominion was made the capital and the seat of the proconsul. It was about seven or eight miles north of the Old Paphos, so celebrated for the temple of Venus. New Paphos, too, had a splendid temple. In the reign of Augustus it was overthrown by an earthquake, but was restored by the emperor. The modern name is Buffa, where there are ruins existing.

PARABLE. This word is variously used in scripture, denoting 'a proverb or short saying (Luke iv. 23); a famous or received saying (1 Sam. x. 12; Ezek. xviii. 2); a thing gravely spoken, and comprehending important matters in a few words (Numb. xxiii. 7, 18, xxiv. 3, 15; Job xxvii. 1; Psal. xlix. 4); a thing darkly or figuratively expressed (Psal. lxxviii. 2; Ezek. xx. 49; Matt. xiii. 35); a visible type or emblem, representing something different from and beyond itself (Heb. ix. 9, xi. 19); a special instruction (Luke xiv. 7); and a similitude or comparison (Matt. xxiv. 32; Mark iii. 23)'; see Horne's Introd., vol. ii. p. 344, edit. Ayre. In some of these places the word parable is not used in our version, but 'proverb' or 'figure'; but the original words are always the same, māshāl and parabolē. A parable in its more definite signification may be called the continued narration of something fictitious, used to illustrate by way of simile an important truth. Thus there are three things to be specially regarded in it: the representation or external narrative, which is employed for illustration; the truth or inner sense, which is illustrated or taught; and the parallelism or similitude between them; or, as Dr. Davidson describes them, (1) the thing to be illustrated, (2) the example illustrating, (3) the similitude between them (Sacr. Herm., chap. ix. p. 311). Abp. Trench well says: 'The parable differs from the fable, moving as it does in a spiritual world, and never transgressing the actual order of things natural—from the mythus, there being in the latter an unconscious blending of the deeper meaning with the outward symbol, the two remaining separate and separable in the parable—from the proverb, inasmuch as it is longer carried out, and not merely accidentally and occasionally, but necessarily, figurative—from the allegory, comparing as it does one thing with another, but . . . preserving them apart as an inner and an outer, and not transferring, as does the allegory, the properties and qualities and relations of one to the other' (Notes on the Parables, chap. i. pp. 9, 10, edit. 1855).

The mode of teaching by parables is of great antiquity. We find it in the Old Testament, as in the address of Nathan to David (2 Sam. xii. 1-4), the artifice of the woman of Tekoah (xiv. 6, 7), the prophet's rebuke of Ahab (1 Kings xx. 39, 40), and the denunciation of Isaiah (Isai. vi. 1-7); and it appears to have been very generally afterwards adopted by the Hebrew doctors. There was an advantage in it; and therefore we need not be surprised at finding that our Saviour largely employed it. But yet there were peculiar reasons for what he did. He did not commence his ministry with parables. So far as we can arrange chronologically his instructions, he spoke at first very plainly. The exposition of Isai. lxi. 1, 2, in the synagogue of Nazareth (Luke iv. 16-27), in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v., vi., vii.), contained no regular parables. And this was perhaps one of the characteristics in which the people contrasted his teaching with that of the scribes. But then his testimony was not received: his plain dealing only provoked opposition. And, therefore, while doubtless there were many advantages in parables as arousing the attention and likely to dwell in the memory, they had in some respects a judicial character. The Jews rejected our Lord's doctrine: it was therefore to be clothed in figurative speeches. Had they been docile hearers, they should have had everything explained: they shut their eyes and hardened their hearts, and so truth assumed a veiled form, which the careless did not choose to search into, and only the earnest-minded desired to understand. Our Lord gave this reason to his disciples when they questioned him, and showed that besides the intrinsic beauty of the parable it tested the hearts of those to whom it was spoken (xiii. 10-17).

Very beautiful indeed are the parables of Christ. And, when we really seek to understand them, and use for this the key which he himself delivered, we may find in them treasures of instruction, from which all classes may derive the highest profit.

But in the interpretation of parables we must take care not just to indulge our own fancy. Well-meaning men have supposed that the circumstances of the parable, the drapery of the figure presented, have in every particular a symbolical meaning, apart from the principal illustration, thus making the whole a collection of riddles, on which ingenuity may amuse itself, but which common sense repudiates. The general scope, therefore, of a parable must be ascertained, and the attendant circumstances interpreted only as they bear on this. With this as a guiding principle, we may properly adopt Dr. Tholuck's rule: 'A similitude is perfect in proportion as it is on all sides rich in applications; and hence, in treating the parables of Christ, the expositor must proceed on the presumption that there is import in every single point, and desist from seeking it only when it does not result without forcing, or when we can clearly show that this or that circumstance was added merely for the sake of giving intuitiveness to the narrative. We should not assume anything to be non-essential, except when, by holding it fast as essential, the unity of the whole is marred and troubled' (Auslegung der Bergpredigt, p. 201).

A single illustration may be given. No sound expositor will doubt that there is a deep spiritual sense underlying the narrative of the 'Good Samaritan,' though he may not be inclined to suppose an allegorical meaning of every particular in the description. It is not fanciful to see in the wounded traveller the race of man despoiled and maltreated by spiritual foes, deriving no consolation or cure from the observances and deeds of the Levitical law, but kindly cared for and abundantly supplied by him who (called in bitter scorn a 'Samaritan') came to bind up the broken-hearted, and who, when he quitted the world, commissioned his servants to deal out to the needy and suffering the precious gifts he left in their charge, the faithful disposal of which he will at his coming again acknowledge and richly recompense.

The number of our Lord's parables is considerable. More or fewer are enumerated, according to the wider or narrower application of the term. And some writers have gathered them into groups. Mr. Westcott has constructed a table in which he classifies—i. parables drawn from the material world; ii. parables drawn from the relations of man; with a variety of subdivisions, and a few over which he cannot conveniently get into his synopsis (Introd. to the Gospels, append. F. pp. 450-452). They are ranged here as they occur in the Gospel narrative.

They are these—

1. The sower (Matt. xiii. 3-8; Mark iv. 3-8; Luke viii. 5-8).
2. The wheat and the tares (Matt. xiii. 24-30).
3. The mustard-seed (Matt. xiii. 31, 32; Mark iv. 30-32).
4. The leaven (Matt. xiii. 33).
5. The hid treasure (Matt. xiii. 44).
6. The pearl of great price (Matt. xiii. 45, 46).
7. The net cast into the sea (Matt. xiii. 47, 48).
8. The lost sheep (Matt. xviii. 12, 13; Luke xv. 4-6).
9. The merciless servant (Matt. xviii. 23-34).
10. The labourers in the vineyard (Matt. xx. 1-16).
11. The two sons (Matt. xxi. 28-30).
12. The vineyard let to husbandmen (Matt. xxi. 33-39; Mark xii. 1-9; Luke xx. 9-15).
13. The marriage-feast (Matt. xxii. 2-14).
14. The wise and the foolish virgins (Matt. xxv. 1-12).
15. The talents (Matt. xxv. 14-30).
16. The sheep and the goats (Matt. xxv. 31-46).
17. The seed cast into the ground (Mark iv. 26-29).
18. The two debtors (Luke vii. 41, 42).
19. The good Samaritan (Luke x. 30-35).
20. The importunate friend (Luke xi. 5-8).
21. The rich fool (Luke xii. 16-20).
22. The return from the wedding (Luke xii. 35-40).
23. The fig-tree (Luke xiii. 6-9).
24. The great supper (Luke xiv. 16-24).
25. The lost piece of money (Luke xv. 8, 9).
26. The prodigal son (Luke xv. 11-32).
27. The unjust steward (Luke xvi. 1-8).
28. The rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi. 19-31).
29. The unjust judge (Luke xviii. 2-5).
30. The Pharisee and the publican (Luke xviii. 10-13).
31. The pounds (Luke xix. 12-27).

It will be observed that there are no parables in St. John's Gospel. It is true that the word occurs in our version (John x. 6, xvi. 25, 29, marg.); but the original term differs from that used by the other evangelists.

The excellent work of abp. Trench, Notes on the Parables, frequently re-printed, may well be recommended to the reader.

PARADISE. A word derived from the Sanscrit parādēca, 'a region of surpassing beauty'; the Hebrew pardes is rendered in our version 'forest' and 'orchard' (Neh. ii. 8; Eccles. ii. 5; Sol. Song iv. 13); while the Greek paradeisos is classically used to designate the parks or pleasure-grounds stocked with wild animals attached to the palaces of Persian monarchs. In ordinary speech we understand by paradise the happy garden in which our first parents were originally placed—and so the term is used in the Septuagint—a spot which curious enquirers have vainly striven to identify. See EDEN. But the word has not this meaning in scripture. It occurs in our translation only three times (Luke xxiii. 43; 2 Cor. xii. 4; Rev. ii. 7). Jewish writers had fanciful notions of it, but generally they understood by paradise the place where the souls of the righteous were collected (see Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. &c., col. 1802); and it is so to be understood in our Lord's address to the penitent thief. St. Paul would seem to mean the heavenly abode; and the promise in the Revelation must apply to some happier state of which Eden was but an image, where the true tree of life grows and yields fruit for ever, to be freely enjoyed by the glorified denizens: comp. Rev. xxii. 1, 2.

PARAH (heifer-town). A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23); perhaps in the modern Wady Farah, south-east of Beth-el.

PARALLEL, PARALLELISM. See POETRY.

PARAN (perhaps region with caverns). A desert region inhabited by nomad tribes. Paran is celebrated in sacred song as the spot whence in close connection with the solemn legislation of Sinai the glory of the Lord shone forth (Deut. xxxiii. 2; Hab. iii. 3). In this wilderness in later times David took refuge after Samuel's death (1 Sam. xxv. 1). It lay to the south or south-west of Palestine, in the neighbourhood of Beer-sheba and Kadesh (Gen. xxi. 14, 21; Numb. xii. 3, 17, 26), between Egypt and Edom, or Midian (1 Kings xi. 18). The Israelites traversed it in their journey from Sinai, from which it was three days' march (Numb. x. 12, 33); and from it the spies were despatched into Canaan (xiii. 3, 26). Paran therefore may be regarded as that elevated desert tract, now called et-Tih, which extends from the wilderness of Shur in the west to the ridge Jebel ét-Tih in the south, the land of Edom in the east, and Canaan in the north, intersected by the Wady el-Arish the direction of which is north-west. In the south and west it sinks into a sandy plain towards the Mediterranean: in the north-east it is rugged and mountainous; hence we find 'mount Paran' spoken of. In its wider sense it included the deserts of Zin and Kadesh; and at the point where it reached northward to the wilderness of Judah was an oak: to this, El-Paran, the invasion of the confederate kings (Gen. xiv. 6) reached. Josephus mentions a Pharan, towards Idumea, a valley with caverns (Bell. Jud., lib. iv. 9, § 4): it may have been a part of the ancient Paran; and some have proposed to identify it with Wady Feiran in the Sinaitic peninsula; but this is very doubtful. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Paran'; Kallsch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 353. A writer in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 707, placing generally the wilderness of Paran north of the et-Tih range, and that of Sinai on the south, supposes that mount Paran was one of the Sinaitic group: Wilton believes it at the north-east corner of the desert of Paran, now termed the mountains of the 'Azâzimeh (The Negeb, p. 124).

PAR'BAR (perhaps an apartment open to the light and air). According to Gesenius the open porticoes surrounding the temple courts, from which was the entrance to the various chambers (1 Chron. xxvi. 18). The same word is, in 2 Kings xxiii. 11, translated 'suburbs'; though possibly the same place may not be meant in both cases. Mr. Grove, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 708, takes a somewhat-different view from that of Gesenius, and would identify 'the Parbar with the suburb mentioned by Josephus in describing Herod's temple (Antiq., lib. xv. 11, § 5), as lying in the deep valley which separated the west wall of the temple from the city opposite it; in other words, the southern end of the Tyropœon, which intervenes between the wailing-place, and the (so-called) Zion.

PARCHED GROUND. The word thus rendered (Isai. xxxv. 7) refers to a phenomenon, frequent in the deserts of Arabia and Egypt, of India and Persia, and occasionally witnessed in the south of France, which is usually known by the name mirage. It is produced by the refraction of the rays of light during the exhalation of vapours by the excessive heat of the sun; an inverted image of the sky being formed and mingled with ground-scenery. The desert thus wholly or in part presents the appearance of a sea or lake; surrounding objects being apparently reflected in the water. So complete is the illusion that experienced travellers have often been deceived, and hurrying on to enjoy the proffered shade and refreshment have found nothing but an arid waste. The meaning of the prophet, then, is that the vapoury illusion shall become actually a lake, the desert sands shall be real water.

PARCHMENTS (2 Tim. iv. 13). 'The parchments, which as more costly probably contained the more valuable writings, perhaps the sacred books themselves' (Alford).

PARDON. See ATONEMENT, FORGIVENESS, JUSTIFICATION.

PARLOUR. There are three words so translated. That in Judges iii. 20, 23-25 meant there perhaps a hall of audience; the term properly denoting an upper room: another was literally a bed-chamber, designated in 1 Sam. ix. 22 an eating-room. The parlours of 1 Chron. xxviii. 11 were interior or withdrawing rooms.

PARMASH'TA (superior). One of Haman's sons (Esth. ix. 9).

PAR'MENAS (constant). One of the seven selected to administer the secular business of the church (Acts vi. 5).

PAR'NACH (nimble?). The father of a chief of Zebulun (Numb. xxxiv. 25).

PA'ROSEH (a flea). One whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel and with Ezra (Ezra ii. 3, viii. 3, where Pharosh; Neh. vii. 8), several of them married foreign wives (Ezra x. 25): one is mentioned as repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 25); and the name is found among those who sealed the covenant (x. 14).

PARSHANDA'THA (an interpreter of the law, or, possibly, given by prayer). One of Haman's sons (Esth. ix. 7).

PARTHIA, PARTHIAN. Parthia was the designation of an Asiatic country south-east of the Caspian, called also Parthya and Parthyene. The name was originally given to a mountainous and woody region, the boundaries of which appear to have varied at different times. Pliny describes it as bordered on the east by the Arii, on the south by Carmania and the Ariani, on the west by the Medi Pratitæ, and on the north by the Hyrcani, encircled everywhere by deserts (lib. vi. 29). This country was peopled by an uncivilized and needy tribe, probably of Scythian origin. They were subject to the Persian kings, and passed over to the Macedonians at the conquest, Parthia and Hyrcania forming a single satrapy. Afterwards Parthia revolting from the Syrian rule became the nucleus of a great monarchy, the Parthian empire. It was founded by Arsaces I. about 256 B.C., and ultimately comprised the provinces of the earlier Persian kingdom (see 1 Macc. xiv. 2), extending itself westward till it met the Roman power on the Euphrates. The sovereigns are known as the line of the Arsacidæ, after the founder of the monarchy. The struggles of Parthia with Rome were long-continued, with varied fortune; their chief force being horsemen, using bows and arrows with great skill; but this eastern empire was never conquered or dismembered by the masters of the western world. It continued till the reign of Artabanus, 226 A.D.; when Artaxerxes who had served in this king's army, asserting that he was a descendant of the ancient Persian sovereigns, founded the new Persian empire under the race of the Sassanidæ. The Parthians came little into contact with the Jews; they did, however, maintain the party of Antigonus against Hyrcanus, and took Jerusalem 40 B.C. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Parther.' There were Jews who had settled in Parthia who resorted at the feasts to Jerusalem (Acts ii. 9).

PARTITION. Christ is said to have broken down the middle wall of partition, or the fence which was between Jew and Gentile (Eph. ii. 14). Reference has been supposed here to the rending of the temple veil at the crucifixion; but that denoted the removal of every obstacle to free access to God by men in general: here the apostle is touching a different topic; and the fence is rather that wall which separated the court of the Israelites from that of the Gentiles. It was broken down; that is, in Christ Jew and Gentile are equally regarded in the sight of God.

PARTRIDGE. The original word for the bird so called implies 'the crier.' It is clear that a species of the family Tetraonidæ, including grouse, partridges, is intended; but it is difficult to say which. The Pterocles alchata, or pin-tailed sand-grouse, is now called katta by the Arabs from its cry. These birds abound in Palestine, and deposit on the ground two or three eggs of a greenish-black colour and about the size of a pigeon's: the dangers to which they are exposed of being driven from their nests sufficiently illustrate what is said of the partridge in Jer. xvii. 11. The Arabs collect large quantities and eat them fried in butter. The red-legged partridge, Perdix rubra, is also, according to Kitto (Pict. Bible, note on 1 Sam. xxvi. 20) common in Palestine. It is partial, he tells us, to upland brushwood, and is a powerful runner. The Arabs hunt these birds by approaching a covey secretly, underneath an oblong piece of canvas, stretched over two reeds or sticks. They thus get near enough to fire with effect; and then, as the partridges become wearied after being put up two or three times, the hunters run in on them and knock them down with clubs. This bird, therefore, would seem to correspond well with the mention in 1 Sam. xxvi. 20. And Dr. Thomson describes their being hunted with falcons (The Land and the Book, pp. 208, 209). But other writers deny that the red-legged partridge is to be found in Palestine. Mr. Tristram seems to consider the bird in question the Caccabis saeatilis, or the Caccabis Heyii. See the matter discussed by Duns (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. pp. 249-254), who properly discredits the oriental legend that the partridge steals eggs from other nests to hatch than for her own, and illustrates the passage of Jeremiah as above.

PARU'AH (blossoming). The father of one of Solomon's officers (1 Kings iv. 17).

PARVA'IM (oriental regions). A word occurring in 2 Chron. iii. 6 to describe the gold used for the construction of the temple. Some have believed Parvaim identical with Ophir: more probably the term signifies 'gold of the eastern regions,' the finest gold. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Parvaim.'

PA'SACH (cut off, or torn asunder). An Asherite chief (1 Chron. vii. 33).

PAS-DAM'MIM (boundary or cessation of blood) (1 Chron. xi. 13). See EPHES-DAMMIM.

PASE'AH (lame).—1. One of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. iv. 12).—2. One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 49); in Neh. vii. 51 called Phaseah.—3. The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6). Perhaps the reference is to no. 2.

PA'SHUR (prosperity round about).—1. A priest (1 Chron. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 12), probably the same with the person mentioned in Jer. xxi. 1, xxxviii. 1.—2. Another priest, governor of the temple, descended from Immer. Because he put Jeremiah in the stocks, a fearful sentence was denounced against him: see MAGOR-MISSABIB (xx. 1, 2, 3, 6). Possibly he was the father of Gedaliah (xxxviii. 1); but it is not clear whether it was his posterity or that of no. 1 that returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 38; Neh. vii. 41); some of whose sons had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 22), and of whom the representative sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 3).

PASSENGERS, THE VALLEY OF THE. A place where the multitude of Gog were to be buried (Ezek. xxxix. 11), so called in reference to its position, which was on the east of the Dead sea, on the usual route to Petra and Ezion-geber, along which many travellers constantly pass.

PASSION. In one place (Acts i. 3) the sufferings and death of Christ; elsewhere (xiv. 15; James v. 17) human feelings or nature. The original word occurs frequently, but is otherwise rendered.

PASSOVER. One of the chief yearly festivals of the Israelites. Its name expresses the great deliverance when at its first institution the Lord passed through the land of Egypt to destroy their first-born and passed over the houses in which his own people dwelt.

This was the last plague; and it forced the oppressors to let go their captives. The event was, therefore, to be commemorated for ever, and the month in which it occurred to be the first of the Hebrew (ecclesiastical) year. The directions given for the observance of the passover were these. On the tenth of Abib (or Nisan) each household was to select a lamb or a kid, an unblemished male of the first year. But, if a family were too small, neighbouring households were to join. On the fourteenth the lamb was to be killed about sunset: 'between the two evenings' is the literal rendering of the Hebrew phrase: this is most generally understood to be the period of twilight, between sunset and dark; but according to other opinions it lasted from the sun's beginning to decline to his setting, or it was the time just before and just after sunset. It may be observed that the hour of offering the daily sacrifice was defined by the same phrase: this, however, at least in later times, was at 3 o'clock p.m. (see Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. i. p. 281). Another supposition that it was the interval between the evenings of two successive days (Nisan 14 and 15), is made by Prof. Lee (Serm. on Sabbath, edit. 1834, pp. 22-24). The blood of the passover lamb was to be received in a basin, and to be sprinkled with a bunch of hyssop on the door-posts and the lintel. The lamb itself, of which not a bone was to be broken, was to be roasted whole, and eaten in haste with bitter herbs and unleavened bread; each who partook having his loins girt, his shoes on his feet, and his staff in his hand; and any portion of the flesh that was left was to be burnt. The Israelites obeyed: they killed the lambs on the fourteenth of the month: they ate them in the evening when the fifteenth had commenced; and at midnight the loud wail echoed through every Egyptian habitation, for the first-born in each family was dead. Then was Israel thrust out in haste; and the passover was ever after to be observed, a season of holy gladness (Exod. xii.)

There were several provisions for the future celebration of this feast, which were not applicable to that kept in Egypt. It was to last seven days from the fourteenth of the month to the twenty-first unleavened bread was to be eaten: the first day and the seventh day of the festival were to be holy convocations, in which no work must be done; and, as connecting this feast with the gathering of the produce of the earth, the first-fruits or first sheaf of harvest was then to be presented; also special sacrifices were to be offered through all the seven days: further, the passover was to be observed in the place where the sanctuary was, and there the lambs were to be slain and the blood sprinkled on the altar (xiii. 4-10; Lev. xxiii. 5-14; Numb. xxviii. 16-25; Deut. xvi. 1-8, 16). It may be added that servants, if bought with money, and not hired, were to eat the passover; and so might a stranger or foreigner who submitted to the rite of circumcision (Exod. xii. 43-45, 48, 49). Modifications were afterwards enjoined or permitted. Thus, any one unclean or on a journey was to keep the passover on the fourteenth day of the second month instead of the first (Numb. ix. 4-13). According to the Talmudists, this second or little passover was to be observed only one day. Also, though females might and did go up to the sanctuary at the great feasts, yet the obligation was laid on only the males: on men, therefore, alone was it absolutely incumbent to keep the passover. It is probable, too, that the original rule that none should leave the house till the morning was relaxed: the lamb also does not appear to have been selected four days before; and, instead of the haste as prepared for a march which characterized the first passover, the feast was afterwards partaken in a sitting or reclining posture, thus betokening the condition of rest to which God had brought his people.

Very many particulars in regard to the celebration of the paschal feast are enumerated by the Talmudists; some of the principal alone can be noticed here. The priests were arranged in two rows in the court of the temple, provided with basins of silver and of gold. The people were admitted in three divisions; and, as each killed his lamb, the blood was received into a basin, which was passed up to the priest nearest the altar, who cast the blood thereon. The lamb was then prepared for roasting, while the hallel or psalms of praise, were sung, the fat being burnt with incense that evening on the altar. A skewer or spit of pomegranate wood was thrust through the lamb when taken away for roasting, or, according to some authorities, two skewers crossed. The oven used was of earthenware; and care was taken that the lamb did not touch its sides. The unleavened bread was usually of wheat-flour, made quickly that no fermentation might begin: the houses, the evening before the fourteenth of Nisan, were carefully searched for any piece of leavened bread which might remain; and all that was found was burned by the sixth hour of that day. Endive, chicory, wild lettuce, &c., were used as the bitter herbs; and a kind of sauce was made of vinegar and water, or, as some say, vinegar, dates, figs, almonds, and spice, beaten into the consistency of mustard, to represent the clay in which their ancestors were made to work: this was eaten with the lamb and the other viands. There were also to be not fewer than four cups of wine: it was red, and was drunk mixed with water. Such were the materials of which the paschal feast was composed.

The order of partaking it is thus described. The company, who had not eaten since mid-day, assembled in the evening, and took their places on couches. They were usually not under ten in number: they might be more, twenty, even one hundred, as many as the lamb would supply with a piece as large as an olive. A cup of wine was first mixed with water, over which the master of the household or the person who presided pronounced a thanksgiving for the day, and for the wine, which was then drunk. All next washed their hands, another benediction being pronounced. The different dishes of the feast, the lamb, the unleavened bread, the bitter herbs, and the thick sauce, were next placed on the table; and the president first, and afterwards the rest of the company, dipped some of the bitter herbs in this sauce and ate them. Then the dishes were removed; in order that the children might enquire the reason of such a festival; and a second cup of wine was drunk; and, the dishes being re-placed, the import of them was explained and a thanksgiving uttered, followed by Psalms cxiii., cxiv. The hands were again washed, with a brief prayer; and then the president broke a cake of unleavened bread, which he blessed; and all partook of it, dipping the portions with the bitter herbs into the sauce. Then the lamb was eaten; and another blessing pronounced, when the third cup or cup of blessing was handed round. This was succeeded by the fourth, termed the cup of hallel or of song, because Psalms cxv., cxviii. (the rest of the hallel) were recited with a prayer. A fifth cup of wine might be introduced, provided what was called the greater hallel, Psalms cxxx.-cxxxvii., were sung over it. So the celebration concluded. We may believe, from many expressions used in the Gospels when describing the last supper, that this substantially was the mode of celebration in our Lord's time.

One adjunct of the passover, the offering of the first-fruits of harvest, has been already mentioned: there was another—certain voluntary peace-offerings, which seem to have accompanied all the festivals (Numb. x. 10; 2 Chron. xxx. 22): these followed the general rule given in Lev. iii. 1-5, vii. 16-18, 29-34. Certain portions were to be assigned to the priest; and the rest might be eaten by the offerer, and apparently formed part of the paschal feast. At the passover, too, a criminal was released (Matt. xxvii. 15; Mark xv. 6; Luke xxiii. 17; John xviii. 39); it is uncertain whether by Roman courtesy, or by ancient Israelitish custom.

There are several special notices of passover celebrations in scripture history. It seems indeed probable that after the second year of their departure from Egypt the observance was suspended; more especially as the children born in the wilderness were not circumcised (Josh. v. 2-9). But, as soon as the proper time came after the Jordan was crossed, the festival was kept (10, 11). It is not distinctly mentioned again for a very considerable period; but, as the resort of pious Israelites to the sanctuary is repeatedly alluded to (1 Sam. i. 3, 7, 21; 1 Kings xii. 27; Psal. cxlii. 4), we cannot doubt that this great feast was generally observed (though perhaps imperfectly and with mutilation of the rites), at least in Judah. A very remarkable one was celebrated in the reign of Hezekiah, extending over fourteen days. It was, however, held in the second month, because the priests and people were not sufficiently prepared at the statutable time (2 Chron. xxx.). This exceeded all passovers since the days of Solomon. There was another still more noticeable passover in the eighteenth year of Josiah, more solemn than any since the time of Samuel (xxxv. 1-19). Another great passover was held after the return from Babylon (Ezra vi. 19-22). On these three occasions the Levites killed the lambs, because many of the people were ceremonially unclean. In the New Testament we find this feast regularly observed (Luke ii. 41); and our Lord's attendance during his public ministry is specially noted.

With regard to the last passover, at which time Christ's passion and death occurred, there is much difficulty in reconciling the accounts given by the different evangelists. The difficulty arises, no doubt, from our want of full information; so that, had two or three additional links of the narrative been supplied, all would be clear. The law prescribed that the passover should be kept on the fourteenth of Nisan, and called the fifteenth 'the feast' (Numb. xxviii. 16, 17). Now it is reasonable to suppose that the sabbath during which Jesus lay in the grave was Nisan the fifteenth, for it is called 'an high day' (John xix. 31), and, besides, Friday, according to all the evangelists, was the 'preparation' or 'preparation of the passover' (Matt. xxvii. 62; Mark xv. 42; Luke xxiii. 54; John xix. 14, 31, 42); how was it then that our Lord and his disciples ate the passover on the Thursday evening, while the Jews generally, it is evident, had not eaten it, because on Friday morning they would not go into Pilate's judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled, and be thereby incapable of partaking of the holy meal (xviii. 28)? A variety of solutions have been proposed, such as that our Lord's was not the actual paschal feast, that he observed it at the true time which the Jews somehow mistook, that the passover which they intended to eat when they feared defilement was not the lamb, but the peace-offerings, &c. &c. A full discussion of the subject is impossible in this place, but some few considerations shall be offered which may tend to elucidate it; and the reader shall be referred to other authorities.

Dr. Fairbairn (Herm. Manual, part ii. sect. ix.) proposes a very ingenious explanation. He believes that the Jews—understanding by the term that comparatively-small faction who took an active part in the seizure and trial of Christ—would have eaten the passover on Thursday night, had not the communication made to them by Judas hurried their proceedings. They had before (Matt. xxvi. 5) resolved to defer our Lord's apprehension till the feast was over. But suddenly an opportunity presents itself. Judas goes to the elders and promises to lead them that very night to a retired place where they would find their victim. Their resolve must be immediate: if they let slip this favourable occasion, they might never have such another. And the whole business might probably be despatched in a few hours. They would delay their paschal supper till it was over. And, even though the time wore on, and morning dawned, still they did not relinquish their intention of eating the passover, and would keep themselves undefiled for it. The precise legal time, indeed, was past; but that was of less importance, since they would have secured the destruction of Jesus. This explanation, however, necessarily gives up the view generally adopted, that Christ suffered on the day legally appointed for slaying the paschal lamb, type and Anti-type being thus brought into closest coincidence. And besides, if Friday were the feast, Nisan 15, how could the disciples imagine late on Thursday evening, when according to Jewish calculation the sated day had already begun, that Jesus was directing Judas to make purchases for the feast (John xiii. 29)? It would seem, then, most probable that the meal eaten by Christ and the apostles was before the paschal meal of the generality of the Jews. But yet so exactly do the accounts we have of it tally with the ordinary ceremonies, as above described, of the passover, that we can hardly avoid the conclusion that it was, in some sense or way, the passover itself. It has been already observed that the Jews commenced a fresh day at sunset; so that from sunset on Thursday to sunset on Friday was Nisan 14, a day including what we should call portions of two days, including, therefore, the supper and the crucifixion. Some writers have maintained that the passover was ordinarily eaten at the beginning of the fourteenth, i.e. after the sunset of the thirteenth. This is very unlikely; but may the notion be so far adopted as to consider the whole of the twenty-four hours of Nisan 14 the statutable time for celebrating the passover; so that the actual meal might be eaten at the beginning, as well as at the commencement as at the close, without exciting wonder or being deemed a breach of the law? If provision was made in some cases, as noted above, for deferring the passover a month, it could not be deemed surprising if the latitude of a few hours was, on good reasons, allowed, merely different parts of the same day selected. And it will be observed that Christ seems to allege such a reason more than once. When he sent the disciples to prepare, he desired them to say 'The Master saith, My time is at hand' (Matt. xxvi. 19), i.e. I have urgent affairs pressing me: I must take the first hour I legally can. And again, when sitting down with the twelve he gave them a kind of explanation why he had put his meal so early, 'With desire I have desired to eat this pass-over with you before I suffer' (Luke xxii. 15). If this hypothesis be allowed, we see that our Lord's meal preceded that of most of the Jews, yet that it was really and truly an eating of the passover, and with no transgression of the legal directions. Various minor details cannot be examined here; and for further information on the whole subject the reader may be referred to Browne, Ordo Sæclor., part i. chap. i. sect. ii. pp. 53-62; Robinson, Harm. of the Gosp., notes, part viii. §§ 133-158; Davidson, Introd. to New Test., vol. i. pp. 102-109; Alford, note on Matt. xxvi. 17-19; Horne, Introd., edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 475-478; Ellicott, Hist. Lect., lect. vii. pp. 322, 323.

Of course since the destruction of Jerusalem and the overthrow of the Jewish polity the sacrificial offering has ceased. The mode, however, in which to this day the Jews eat the paschal meal so nearly resembles that which has been already detailed, that it would be a mere repetition to describe it at length. It will be sufficient to note some particular alterations and additions. Three unleavened cakes are placed in one dish, a fourth being ready in case one of the three should be broken. 'In another dish is put a shank-bone of a shoulder of lamb, having a small bit of meat thereon, roasted quite brown on the coals, and an egg roasted hard in hot ashes. The bone is to commemorate the paschal lamb; and the egg to signify that it was to be roasted whole.' Besides the bitter herbs and sauce, there is a cup of salt water or vinegar, in memory of the passage through the Red sea. 'An extra cup of wine is always placed on the table for Elias the prophet, who is expected as the forerunner of the Messiah, to visit them in course of the evening.' And just before the fourth cup of wine is filled all sit in profound silence, looking for the prophet's approach, the doors being set open for him; and then Psal. lxxix. 6, 7, and Lam. iii. 66 are repeated. And before the wine is drunk it is said, 'The year that approaches, we shall be in Jerusalem' (see Mill's British Jews, pp. 190-206).

By the institution and continued observation of the passover there is the strongest corroboration of the reality of the facts which it commemorated. No man could persuade a nation to commence and perpetuate such an observance, if there were no truth to ground it on. Herein, as in so many other respects, the Jews are a proof of the credibility of the bible.

The symbolical and typical meaning of this rite is full of interest. It was instituted, as we have seen, at the deliverance from the bondage of Egypt; and the sprinkling of the blood of the lamb was a sign and an assurance of the preservation of the Hebrew first-born, while those of their oppressors were cut off. And many attendant circumstances, as the hard bondage and the haste of the departure, were signified. The celebration was, therefore, a standing memorial of the Lord's mercy and the Lord's power; and we may well conceive the glowing triumph with which the pious Hebrew, questioned as to the meaning of such rites by his children would describe the wonderful works done of old time for their fathers. But, besides the retrospective meaning, the passover had also a future aspect. It was to read lessons for the present and the coming time. It was to point to a yet greater deliverance, and to teach the befitting temper and purity of heart which God demands. These lessons are brought out by the apostle Paul, who speaks of Christ as 'our passover sacrificed for us,' and exhorts to 'keep the feast, not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth' (1 Cor. v. 7, 8). Thus then, as the lamb without blemish was selected, slain, and roasted whole, its blood being accepted as a propitiation, and all its flesh being eaten by the household, so Christ, a pure and spotless victim, designated by his Father, was sacrificed for his people, not a bone of him was broken, for he was a complete offering, and his blood sprinkled is of precious power, and he is received whole and undivided by his people's faith, who feed on him and are nourished thereby to salvation and eternal life. And, as bitter herbs were eaten, symbolizing the hard bondage of Israel, so the power of sin and the miserable captivity in which it leads its victims will be felt by those who are taught to appreciate the Saviour's sacrifice. Bitter will be their grief, deep their repentance for what they have done amiss under the yoke of Satan. And, as all leaven was to be cleared away, so will he who partakes the benefit of Christ's atonement purge out and cast off everything which defiles and swells, fermenting and festering against the holy law of God. In sincerity, and truth, and pureness he is taught to adorn his profession. And the presentation of the first-fruits, and the sacrifice of peace-offerings, may also have their meaning. The believer brought nigh by the blood of Christ has peace with God, whom now, in his new position, he regards as his Father reconciled, and he will present himself, the first and best, yea, all he has and is, a thank-offering, a living sacrifice to the Lord.

Such are some of the lessons which this holy feast inculcates. The reader may find them more fully drawn out by Dr. Fairbairn (Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. 9, vol. ii. pp. 404-410).

PASTOR. A word equivalent to shepherd (Eph. iv. 11). See SHEPHERD. It is used figuratively for minister or teacher.

PASTURAGE, PASTURE. We find it noted that the early patriarchs sowed and reaped an abundant harvest (Gen. xxvi. 12); but for the most part they are described as possessors of flocks and herds, for which they must provide pasture. Sometimes, therefore, they had to travel far for convenient places. Thus Jacob's sons led their flocks from Hebron to Shechem and Dothan (xxxvii. 12, 17). Generally speaking, the southern parts of Palestine and the neighbouring wilderness were well adapted for pasturage—hilly ranges abounding in herbage and shrubbery, or sandy plains, on which during the moister parts of the year abundant food for cattle was produced.

PAT'ARA. A large sea-port town of Asia Minor, to which St. Paul went from Rhodes (Acts xxi. 1). It was in Lycia, lying east of the mouth of the river Xanthus. It had a celebrated temple and oracle of Apollo. Considerable ruins of it still exist.

PATHE'US (1 Esdr. ix. 23). Pethahiah (Ezra x. 23).

PATH'ROS (region of the south, or the abode of Hat-her, the Egyptian Venus). The proper name of what is said to be the native land of the Egyptians (Ezek. xxix. 14). It is ordinarily used to signify a part of Egypt, viz. Upper Egypt or Thebaid (called by the Arabs Said), as distinguished from Mazar, Mizraim, Lower Egypt (Isai. xi. 11; Jer. xiv. 1, 15; Ezek. xxx. 14). The inhabitants of Pathros were one of the tribes descended from Ham, and are found in the genealogical list of nations, under the domination of Pathrusim. Mr. R. S. Poole, in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 727, 728, considers Pathros were one of the tribes of Upper Egypt, and would trace the name in the Pathryite nome. It may be added that he thinks it questionable whether Mazar or Mizraim is ever used for Lower Egypt.

PATHRU'SIM (Gen. x. 14; 1 Chron. i. 12). The people of Pathros.

PATIENCE. A quality, or grace, sometimes ascribed to God, who, out of his illimitable love, not willing to punish, bears long with men, and sends messengers and warnings (Gen. vi. 3; Jonah iii. 1), that his forbearance may lead them to repentance (Rom. ii. 4). The grace of patience in men is exhibited in bearing trial with meekness (v. 3, 4; 2 Tim. iii. 10), and in a submissive waiting for the accomplishment of God's promises (Rom. viii. 25; Heb. x. 36; James v. 7, 8). Patience must also be exercised by one man towards another (Matt. xviii. 28-34; 1 Thess. v. 14).

PATMOS. A small island, one of the Sporades off the south-western coast of Asia Minor, about thirty miles south of Samos. It is a continuous rock, fifteen miles (according to Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Patmus,' thirty Roman miles) in circumference, for the most part rugged and barren: the coast is lofty with many capes and several good harbours. The only town stands on a high rocky eminence rising abruptly from the sea: it contains about four hundred houses: there are fifty at La Scala, the landing-place; and these may be said to be the only habitations in the island. In the middle of the town is the monastery of St. John, a massive building erected by the emperor Alexius Comnenus. About half-way up the mountain, between La Scala and the town, is a natural grotto, where it is said St. John had his apocalyptic visions. A small church is built over it. Patmos was a place to which persons were banished; and here St. John was exiled (Rev. i. 9), most probably in Domitian's reign. See JOHN, 2, REVELATION, THE BOOK OF. It is now called Patino.

PATRIARCH (head of a tribe or family) (Acts ii. 29, vii. 8, 9; Heb. vii. 4). By this word are now commonly understood those eminent persons who lived in the earlier ages of the world, specially before Moses: notices of them will be found under their respective names.

The religious knowledge and worship of the patriarchs was of an incomplete and introductory type. Great truths were communicated to them, but not in their full development. For the teachings of God have always been of a gradual character, exercising the faith and patience of the church (xi. 13). But these fathers looked beyond the transitory promises, and were enabled to fix their eye on the future glory. Some notice of the principles they held may be found in JOB, THE BOOK OF, which see. The longevity of the patriarchs must be conceded by those who do not deny the credibility of the scripture history.

PAT'ROBAS (one who treads in his father's steps). A Christian at Rome whom St. Paul salutes (Rom. xvi. 14).

PATROC'LUS (2 Macc. viii. 9). The father of Nicanor, an adversary of Judas Maccabeus...

PAU (a bleating). A place in Idumea (Gen. xxxvi. 39); also called Pai (1 Chron. i. 50).

PAUL (small). This eminent apostle, originally named Saul, was a Jew of pure Hebrew descent, of the tribe of Benjamin, circumcised according to the law when eight days old. He was born at Tarsus in Cilicia, and was by birth a free Roman citizen. Possibly his father or some ancestor had obtained the right for service performed, or by purchase: see Alford's note on Acts xxii. 28. He was taught, according to Jewish custom, a manual employment—that of tent-maker, i.e. the manufacturing of goats' hair cloth, commonly used for tents. But he was early sent to Jerusalem, where he was trained under the famous doctor of the law, Gamaliel (xxi. 39, xxii. 3, 27, 28; Phil. iii. 5). Of his family we know nothing, save that he had a nephew, who detected a conspiracy against his life (Acts xxiii. 16-22).

The future apostle appears first in the New Testament history after the ascension of our Lord, being then a young man, we may suppose about thirty. He was attached to the stricter sect of Jews, 'a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee' (6), and naturally, being very zealous for the law, he set himself to oppose the Christian doctrine. It has been questioned whether or no he was a member of the sanhedrim. There is some presumption that he was; for he subsequently says that when the saints were put to death he 'gave' his 'voice against them' (xxvi. 10). If one of the council, he must have been a married man. But it is more probable that without being an actual member he was a trusted agent of the sanhedrim, carrying out with excessive rigour the persecuting measures devised under the authority of the rulers for extinguishing the religion of Jesus.

At the martyrdom of Stephen, Saul was present, the witnesses having laid down their clothes at his feet. Exasperated, it would seem, by Stephen's exstancy, Saul bestirred himself yet more actively: he arrested men and women in their own houses, he had them beaten in the synagogues; and, though no other death than that of Stephen is related in the history, yet there must have been cases in which capital punishment was inflicted (vii. 58, viii. 1, 3, xxii. 19, 20, xxvi. 9-11; Gal. i. 13). Saul was not content with what he could do at Jerusalem. The violence used had dispersed the infant church, but, instead of extinguishing, it contributed to spread the gospel more widely (Acts viii. 4, xi. 19-21). He resolved, therefore, being armed with letters from the high priest, to repair to Damascus, and there apprehend and carry to Jerusalem those whom he found professing the faith of Christ (ix. 2).

But a crisis was at hand. We may imagine the eagerness with which the zealot pressed onwards to the Syrian city. Perhaps the believers there knew not of their danger; or perhaps it was whispered among their circles that he who had been so ruthless in Judea was on his way to them. He was coming; he was near; he was close upon the city-gate. He rode at the head of a company. Escape was hopeless: resistance they might not offer. It was at mid-day; and the sun was shining in his strength, when suddenly a blinding light, more brilliant than the sun, burst forth; and Saul in terror fell to the earth, while a strange voice addressed him in the Hebrew tongue, a glimpse of the Speaker being perhaps for a moment caught. The men of his party, too, saw the light; and they heard the sound of speech but understood not what was said. Then thrilling words reached his ear: 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' In an agony of amazement, he asked who it was that spoke. 'I am Jesus, whom thou persecutest.' It was true, then! the Crucified One, against whom he had been so mad, and whom, thinking to do God service, he had reviled and blasphemed, was at the right hand of power. O wondrous fact! Was ever truth so utterly confounding to man's principles and prejudices as this? Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God! The glory passed away; and the voice was still. But, blind and helpless, Saul was taken up and carried into the city; and for three days he ate nothing. Perhaps in that time some communications were made to his perturbed mind, for he prayed for mercy; some vision, peradventure, was shown to the inward eye; but those around could not instruct him nor console him; till on the third day Ananias, a Christian, entered the house—it was in Straight street, and belonged to one Judas—and, going up to the prostrate man, he laid his hands on him, as he had been divinely directed, and said, 'Brother Saul, receive thy sight.' Then scales fell from the eyes that had been closed: he sat up, he was baptized, he took meat and was strengthened; and speedily he who had come to destroy the church at Damascus preached the gospel there (3-22, 27, xxii. 6-16, xxvi. 12-20; 1 Cor. ix. 1, xv. 8).

There hardly ever was so wonderful a reversal of judgment. How was it? What occasioned it? Was it a trick played upon the persecutor by those he came to harass? Was it the weak fancy of a fanatic? Or was it a tale devised to cover the resolution previously taken of going over to the persecuted party? None of these suppositions will account for the circumstances. You cannot doubt the fact. For there are letters extant by the man himself, the authenticity of which not even the most determined sceptic can object to, in which he refers to the change produced in him. It could not be with the expectation of worldly advantage. For the followers of Christ were as yet a small and uninfluential body, unable to protect themselves from any outrage that bigotry and malice might plan against them. And Saul was already in high favour with the ruling party in church and state; all the rewards which usually allure ambitious men being most surely in his grasp by pursuing his present career. And he was not an unstable man. Had he through any pique deserted the chief priests, we should assuredly have found him vacillating and changing sides on subsequent occasions. It is useless to say that he was deceived by trick. And to imagine that the vision was the figment of his own brain, or that he magnified some ordinary natural phenomenon into a miraculous interposition, would be to adopt a theory which a child might refute. The character of Paul, as described in the Acts, and to be gathered from his own writings, utterly destroys such a notion. The idea, that he who answered for himself before Agrippa, and penned the epistle to the Romans, was but a dreamy enthusiast, is perfectly preposterous. There is but one sound conclusion, then. It is that by the divine voice Saul was taught to recognize in Jesus of Nazareth that Messiah for whom the ancient seers had taught the nation to look forward. Some minute philosophers, indeed, have amused themselves by picking out discrepancies between the various accounts of this remarkable event. On their principles any man's life and letters laid together might be pronounced antagonistic, and every fact of most certain history proved to be 'unhistoric.' These criticisms cannot be elaborately investigated here: it needs but common sense to detect their worthlessness; and such books as Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, and Blunt's Undesigned Coincidences, will satisfy any reasonable mind of the harmony of all that the sacred writers have recorded of St. Paul. And, whenever through the course of his life we have a difficulty, it is no other than what fuller knowledge would enable us to solve. The narrative, therefore, remains one of strong corroborative proof of Christianity.

The date of Saul's conversion is variously fixed. Some, as Browne (Ordo Sæclor., p. 102), place it as early as the beginning of 30 A.D.: Wieseler, on the other hand (see the chronological table at the end of his Chron. des Apost. Zett.), brings it down to 40 A.D.; and others would place it still later. But of this somewhat more below.

Divinely commissioned, Saul began to preach in the synagogues of Damascus, for how long we do not know: it is in one place said to be for 'many days.' But of course such a mighty revolution could not pass announced; and the Jewish party in the city determined to put an end to the new convert's zeal. They took their measures well; and it was only by being let down over the wall in a basket that Saul escaped the watch that was prepared to arrest him at the city-gates. He retired into Arabia, unless his sojourn there is to be assigned to the period immediately after his conversion, for he returned from Arabia to Damascus. At all events, the time of preaching at Damascus, with the Arabian visit, and possibly visits elsewhere, was in all three years (Acts ix. 23-25; 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33; Gal. i. 17, 18). It was perhaps while in Arabia that the revelations of 2 Cor. xii. 1-4 were vouchsafed.

And now he turned his face to the holy city. Three years, as just observed, had elapsed since he left it the agent of the high priest for persecution; he returned, persecuted himself, the preacher of that faith he had so violently opposed. Little was known of him by the disciples whom he desired to join. They saw him last their haughty foe: they could not think he was now their friend; and they shrunk from him, as if he had some covert purpose to ensnare them. But Barnabas, it matters not how, was acquainted with him, and was aware of his story; and so he brought him to the apostles. Few of these were then in Jerusalem; only Peter, it would seem, and James. And Saul's stay was short, a single fortnight. For there of course curiosity and opposition would be roused; and his life was not safe. Besides, he had a divine intimation that his mission was to be more specially to the Gentiles. Accordingly the brethren hurried him away; and he went by Caesarea to his birth-place, Tarsus (Acts ix. 26-30, xxii. 17-21; Gal. i. 18, 19, 21-24).

We cannot suppose Saul idle whilst at Tarsus: he no doubt embraced every opportunity of preaching Christ; and perhaps as his worldly prospects were blighted by his conversion he maintained himself here, as we know he did elsewhere, by working at the craft he had been taught (Acts xviii. 3). But a larger field of usefulness was being prepared. The gospel had reached Antioch; and the apostles at Jerusalem had despatched Barnabas thither, who, delighted with the opening prospect, went to Tarsus and brought back Saul as his fellow-labourer; and for a twelvemonth the two diligently preached in that great city, where the name 'Christians' was first infixed on the disciples, then a word of reproach, afterwards most glorious as pointing out the Master whom they rejoiced to serve. The fruits of faithful teaching were soon apparent. On the prediction of Agabus that there would be a famine, the disciples at Antioch raised a contribution for the relief of the Judean brethren, and sent as the bearers of it Barnabas and Saul (xi. 22-30). How long they continued at Jerusalem we do not know; probably it was no great time. But it is likely that while they were there the martyrdom of James and the imprisonment of Peter by Herod Agrippa occurred. Returning to Antioch they took with them another helper, John Mark, the nephew of Barnabas (xii. 25).

There were many distinguished teachers at Antioch; and hitherto Saul had ranked but as one of them, and probably not the foremost. His peculiar designation by the Lord himself was not unknown; but it was not yet seen that he was to stand forth a burning and a shining light, independent of men, at least the equal of any of the great apostles and pillars at Jerusalem. But now the Holy Ghost intimated that Barnabas and Saul must leave Antioch and deliver a testimony elsewhere. So the church fasted and prayed; and hands were laid upon them, not to communicate authority, but as a formal designation to this particular mission. And they took John Mark with them and sailed to Cyprus, Barnabas's own country. Hitherto it had been 'Barnabas and Saul': now it is almost exclusively, 'Paul and Barnabas.' For Saul among the Gentiles was Paul; and he was the principal speaker. In Cyprus he confounded before the proconsul a sorcerer called Elymas; and, when they returned to the continent, where at Perga John Mark left them, Paul preached at Antioch in Pisidia to the Jews in their synagogue; and, as they contradicted and blasphemed, the two apostles boldly uttered the ominous words, to be ever afterwards the maxim of their work: 'It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but, seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles.' The further incidents of the narrative, how they visited Iconium, and Lystra, and Derbe, how they were taken for gods at Lystra, Barnabas with his grave aspect being called Jupiter, and Paul with his fluent tongue being supposed to be Mercury, how Paul was stoned and left for dead, but, supernaturally perhaps, was restored to strength, how through several provinces the Lord was pleased to bless his message, and how churches were formed and pastors ordained over them cannot be particularly noted here. With glad hearts the apostolic missionaries returned to Antioch, and told out to the rejoicing disciples there that God 'had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles.' For a while then they rested at Antioch (xiii. xiv.).

But there was fresh work for them. Men came down from Judea—Christians in profession, but deeply imbued with Jewish prejudice, and insisted on the necessity of circumcision for salvation. Paul and Barnabas opposed the dogma; but so great was the importance of the crisis that it was deemed necessary to send the question to Jerusalem for solemn consideration and resolution by the apostles and elders there. Paul and Barnabas therefore with certain other delegates journeyed into Judea; and, if this visit be the same with that he mentions in Gal. ii. 1-10, a divine admonition was not wanting for it. Of Paul's more private communications with James, Peter, and John, of the attitude he assumed towards them in their harmonious arrangement, of his public address in the council, and his bold determination for Christian liberty in refusing to have Titus circumcised, and of the decree adopted, nothing can be here said. Paul and Barnabas returned with thankful hearts to Antioch, proclaiming as they went the decision arrived at at Jerusalem, which they read in full assembly to the church at Antioch gathered to receive them. They had been accompanied by Judas and Silas, who were commissioned to confirm the account of what had been resolved on, and one of these, Silas, became afterwards the missionary companion of Paul (Acts xv. 1-35).

For soon there was a disagreement between Paul and Barnabas; and we know not whether they met again (36-41). It was, therefore, probably before this separation that Peter paid a visit to Antioch. For Barnabas was yet there at the time, and was influenced by Peter's example to yield a point which would seriously have compromised the purity of Christian doctrine. But Paul maintained his ground, and faithfully rebuked Peter for his vacillation; and meekly did the elder apostle seem to have borne the reproof (Gal. ii. 11-21).

Paul's second missionary journey must be very briefly touched. He had proposed it to Barnabas, but on account of a dispute about John Mark he took Silas as his companion. His course lay through Syria and Cilicia, to Derbe and Lystra, where Timothy, son of a Greek father and a Hebrew mother, joined the party; Paul having had him circumcised, that no reasonable offence might be given to the Jews. Then guided by the divine Spirit the apostle traversed Galatia, Phrygia, and Mysia to Troas. Here he had a notable vision. Not yet had he proclaimed the gospel in Europe. But a Macedonian seemed to cry for help. It was the Lord's suggestion. So from Troas the heralds of salvation crossed the sea to Neapolis and Philippi; and there they preached the word of life. The conversion of Lydia, the cruel punishment inflicted by the magistrates on Paul and Silas, and the gaoler's baptism followed. And herein Paul showed again his independent spirit. He had been unjustly beaten, and yet he sang praises to God in the prison at midnight. Persecution he gladly endured for Christ's sake. But he felt it right to make the magistrates ashamed of their conduct; and they, so arbitrary one day, had to come the next crouching to the men they had abused (Acts xvi.). Then Paul and Silas went through Amphipolis and Apollonia to Thessalonica and Berea; and, disturbances being stirred up, Paul was by the kind care of the brethren hurried off alone to Athens (xvii.). His address there would of itself stamp him as no common man. From Athens he repaired to Corinth, where Timothy, whom he had sent from Athens to Thessalonica, and Silas rejoined him. There he continued a year and six months, founding and tending a noble church. There, too, he wrote his earliest apostolic letter, the first to the Thessalonians (xviii. 1, 5; 1 Thess. iii. 1-6), and no long time after the second. Subsequently he visited Ephesus; but, being anxious to be at Jerusalem at an approaching feast, probably pentecost, his stay was short. From Jerusalem, he went by Cæsarea to Antioch (Acts xviii. 1-22). A brief record remains of the journey thus completed; but vast were the results of it. The apostle's faith and patience were sorely exercised; yet he ceased not from his labours. He cheered the churches he had previously founded; he carried the banner of the cross to a fresh continent: he preached in licentious Corinth, in philosophic Athens, in luxurious Ephesus; and it was on this journey that Christian bodies were gathered in so many cities, to whom afterwards those inspired letters were directed which have ever since been so choice a treasure of Christian doctrine. Labour indeed he did, and more abundantly than other teachers.

It might be thought that he would now take rest. Years must be beginning to tell on him; and the hardships he had endured had perhaps enfeebled him. But Paul would not rest on earth. Rest is in heaven. It was not long before he commenced his third missionary journey. Passing through Galatia and Phrygia (23), he came, as on his previous visit he had promised he would, to Ephesus. His epistle to the Galatians was written after the visit just referred to, possibly from Ephesus. And in the last-named great city a marvellous work was accomplished. The deepest impression was made upon multitudes. Special miracles were performed by the hands of Paul; and many converts gave the best proof of their sincerity by publicly burning their valuable unlawful books. The apostle's three years' sojourn at Ephesus was brought to a close by the great tumult incited by Demetrius (xix.). But very likely in this time he made short excursions elsewhere. Thus it is not improbable that he then visited Corinth: see CORINTHIANS, THE EPISTLES TO THE, p. 181. It was from Ephesus that the first epistle to the Corinthians was written; the second after leaving Ephesus, when he had reached Macedonia. Thence he visited Greece proper, and from Corinth wrote his letter to the Romans: then, retracing his steps through Macedonia, he sailed from Philippi to Troas. His preaching there, with the accident to Eutychus, his voyage to Miletus, where the Ephesian elders met him and received a most pathetic farewell, his further course till he reached Cæsarea can be only alluded to here (xx., xxi. 1-8). In this last journey much had been accomplished in both Europe and Asia. The settlement of the church at Ephesus, a centre of religious influence for the Asiatic districts, was most important: abuses elsewhere were rectified; and during this portion of the apostle's life some of the most weighty of his letters, as above noted, were penned. Again we may say he was in labours most abundant.

It was with mournful feelings that he ended this missionary tour. He had told the Ephesians that they should see his face no more; and at Cæsarea, in Philip the evangelist's house, Agabus from Judea warned him that if he went to Jerusalem his arrest was certain. Vainly did his company dissuade him with tears from prosecuting his journey. The apostle, feeling as a man, was determined as a follower of Christ. 'What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus.' He went up, therefore, to the city and was received joyfully by the brethren and lodged at the house of Mnason, an aged man of Cyprus, who was of his company (9-17).

The predicted storm soon burst upon the apostle. He had, upon the advice of James, joined in a legal ceremony, when, being in the temple, a riot was suddenly raised, because it was fancied that one of his Gentile associates with whom he had been seen walking in the city had accompanied him into the holy house. The entire population were at once in uproar; and, had not the Roman tribune hurried down with troops, Paul would have been torn to pieces. As it was, he was with difficulty rescued, and carried into the castle or tower of Antonia, from the steps of which he was permitted to harangue the crowd (18-40). At first, as he spoke in Hebrew or Syro-Chaldaic, he was listened to, but as soon as he related the divine command to him to go to the Gentiles the tumult re-commenced; and the tribune, thinking him some demagogue, ordered him into the castle to be scourged that the truth might be extracted from him. This, however, Paul prevented by his claim of Roman citizenship; which made the tribune tremble for the length to which he had already gone. Still he detained him, and the next day placed him before the Jewish council (xxii.). The details of his behaviour and treatment there, and how he was rescued from the villainous plot to assassinate him, and sent under a guard to Cæsarea, are full of interest (xxiii.); but they cannot be given here. The active missionary was now perforce stationary. For two years he was kept in custody by the governor Felix; and the only incidents recorded of the period relate to the court held when the high priest and elders came down to prosecute him with a hired advocate, and the conversations he had with Felix, whose guilty conscience reproached him when Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. Yet the apostle was not altogether secluded: his friends might have access to him; and doubtless his converse instructed and comforted many (xxiv.). Festus, who succeeded Felix as governor, found Paul still a prisoner. And, though so long a time had passed, the Jews were as eager as ever to have him condemned; and, on Festus enquiring whether he would go to Jerusalem for formal trial, he exercised his right of appeal, and transferred his cause to the hearing of the Roman emperor. Then followed his wonderful address before Agrippa, so forcible, so truthful, so persuasive, that the governor and the king agreed that but for the appeal, which removed Paul from local jurisdiction, he might have been freed at once (xxv., xxvi.).

Long before this the apostle had expressed his intention of visiting Rome (xix. 21; Rom. i. 9-15, xv. 22-24, 28, 29). He had thought of going thither at his own will; but he was to be carried as a prisoner to the imperial city. The history of the voyage is given with great minuteness by Luke, who was on board the vessel (Acts xxvii.); and it has been well illustrated by Mr. Smith in his Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul. The officer in command soon perceived that he had no ordinary man under his charge; and the calmness and faith exhibited by the apostle not only served for the preservation of the ship's company and passengers, whose lives the Lord in vision told him he had given him, but have also left a noble example for succeeding generations of the church. Cast on the island of Malta, at a spot which may yet be identified, now called St. Paul's bay, he was the messenger of blessing to the people there, and ultimately he arrived in Rome, cheered by the brotherly love of the Roman Christians who had gone far to meet him. The Jews there had not been apprised by those in Palestine of the charges against Paul. They heard him, therefore, at first with less prejudice; and to them, so far as they would listen, and to the Gentiles he was permitted to preach freely. For after being reported to the captain of the guard, the celebrated Burrus, he was allowed to hire a house and live only under the charge of a soldier (xxviii.). And this continued for two years.

At this period we lose the guidance of St. Luke; and Paul's subsequent history is uncertain and disputed. During his enforced stay at Rome he wrote letters to the Ephesian and Colossian churches, and also to Philemon, and probably later, when he was in stricter custody, to the Philippian. Moreover, if that to the Hebrews is from his pen, it must have been composed during his imprisonment. But then the question is, Was he ever released? Ecclesiastical history, which cannot reasonably be doubted, records his martyrdom at Rome: Did he return thither? or was his death the close of this single confinement? Able critics maintain both sides of the alternative. But after the fullest consideration it must be said that the evidence preponderates in favour of Paul's release, of extended further labours, of a second apprehension, and then of the martyr's crown.

Mr. Browne argues very strongly that the pastoral epistles entirely forbid the supposition of a single imprisonment: 'We know from the epistle to the Philippians that Timothy was with the apostle during part at least of one imprisonment: now, 2 Timothy is addressed as to one who needed to be informed of the writer's situation and prospects. But suppose that imprisonment to have lasted several years; so that Timothy was at Rome when the epistle of the Philippians was written, and then returned to Ephesus, whence, towards the close of the imprisonment, and in the near prospect of his martyrdom, St. Paul now summoned him by this second epistle, still how is this to be reconciled with the instructions about the cloak and books and parchments which were left at Troas with Carpus (2 Tim. iv. 13), and the information at 20: 'Erastus abode at Corinth; but Frophimus have I left at Miletus sick? When were the cloak and books left at Troas? Why, on this hypothesis, at latest when Paul was on his way from Corinth to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 6), at least three years before the earliest date that can be assigned to this epistle. Again, that Erastus abode at Corinth, if this refers to St. Paul's final departure from Corinth on that occasion (4), it was superfluous to inform Timothy, who was on that very occasion with St. Paul, and equally superfluous to inform him, the bishop of Ephesus, that Trophimus was on that same voyage left sick at Miletus, besides the incongruity and unmeaningness of thus adverting to matters which happened so long ago' (Ordo Secl., p. 140). It may be added that Trophimus was not on the supposed occasion left at Miletus; for he accompanied Paul to Jerusalem; and it was his presence there that gave rise to the tumult when Paul was apprehended (Acts xxi. 29). Ingenious attempts, it is true, have been made to evade this objection: but they are not satisfactory.

There are two classes of critics who maintain that the apostle was but once a prisoner at Rome. Some would deny the authenticity of the pastoral epistles. Little notice can here be taken of these. Competent scholars have demonstrated the fact that these pastoral epistles were penned by St. Paul. Dr. Alford, for example, carefully investigates the whole question, and comes to the conclusion that (1) 'External testimony in favour of the genuineness is so satisfactory as to suggest no doubt on the point of their universal reception in the earliest times. (2) The objections brought against the genuineness by its opponents, on internal grounds, are not adequate to set it aside, or even to raise a doubt on the subject in a fair-judging mind' (Proleg. on the Past. Epistles, chap. vii. 1): see also TIMOTHY, THE EPISTLES TO; TITUS, THE EPISTLE TO.

Other critics there are, who, admitting the authority of the pastoral epistles, strive to reconcile their contents with the hypothesis of a single imprisonment. Perhaps the strongest point in favour of their theory is the fact that St. Paul had expressed to the Ephesian elders his full conviction that they should see his face no more (Acts xx. 25); whereas, if released from the original imprisonment, he visited Ephesus again. But this really cannot be admitted to be decisive; because if the apostle was never released there were other assertions, pretty nearly as confident, which must then have been unfulfilled. For example, he purposed and expected to visit Spain (Rom. xv. 24, 28); if there were but one imprisonment, he could not have visited Spain. Again, he said he knew that he should continue with the church, and trusted that he should soon be at Philippi again (Phil. i. 23, ii. 24): if there were but one imprisonment, he did not continue to live and labour after the writing of that epistle, and did not go to Philippi again. Still further, he expected to visit Philemon, at Colosse, or Laodicea (Philem. 22): if there were but one imprisonment, he never did visit Philemon. His confident anticipations, like those of any other man, were modified by events, nor did he in uttering them profess to speak by the prophetic Spirit. For what can be said in favour of a single imprisonment the student may consult Wieseler, Chronol. des Apost. Zeitalt., pp. 521-551; and Davidson, Introd. to New Test., vol. ii. pp. 96-106, vol. iii. pp. 48-62.

On the whole, it is reasonable to believe from the considerations above stated, from the internal character of the pastoral epistles, as well as from external notices—a belief corroborated by ancient tradition—that St. Paul was at liberty at a period subsequent to the imprisonment mentioned in the latter part of Acts, that he resumed his labours and preached again the gospel both in the east and in the west. We may in some measure trace his course. He visited Asia and Greece (1 Tim. i. 3), perhaps being at Ephesus more than once (iv. 13; 2 Tim. i. 18). He went to Crete, where he left Titus (Tit. i. 5), and intended to winter at Nicopolis (iii. 12). He passed through Miletus, Troas, and Corinth (2 Tim. iv. 13, 20), and had to lament the defection of the Asiatic churches (i. 15). At last he was in Rome well-nigh alone, yet stoutly maintaining the faith and expecting soon his crown of righteousness (ii. 9, iv. 6-8, 10, 11, 16, 17).

Of his labours in the west we have less certain information, nor can we tell where chronologically to place them, whether after or before (though more probably the latter) those just referred to in the east. But, when Clement, his contemporary, declares that he preached to the bound of the west (Epist. i. ad Cor. 5), and other early writers distinctly say that he visited Spain (see various authorities in Jacobson's Patres Apost., note, tom. i., p. 26), we can hardly doubt the fact. Some believe that he was in Britain: see Savile's Introduction of Christianity into Britain, 1861, and Morgan's St. Paul in Britain, 1861, two works which, widely differing in many important particulars, agree in maintaining that the apostle visited this island, and supply generally the evidence on which that opinion is based. Still, more cannot well be said than generally that such a visit is not impossible, and on particular parts of the history we must not be confident.

Thus the chronology of St. Paul's life is very uncertain: the following table, however, may not be unuseful to the student. The second and third columns are variations of date according to Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul, vol. ii. pp. 665-667, and Davidson's Introd. to New Test., vol. ii. pp. 111, 112.

Of the circumstances attending the death of the great apostle scarce anything can be certainly known. We may well believe that it was a day of gladness to him. He—who had long before expressed 'a desire to depart to be with Christ' (Phil. i. 23), who had been ever pressing 'towards the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus' (iii. 14), who was little moved by the hardships of the contest, anxious only to finish his course with joy (Acts xx. 24), who, as the tedious night of storm was passing off, could fix his eye with triumphant hope on the near brilliance of everlasting day (2 Tim. iv. 6-8)—he could not have dreaded the conflict with the last enemy. 'The sting of death is sin'; and his sin was blotted out by the blood of the Lamb: 'the strength of sin is the law,' which his Saviour had fulfilled: doubtless then he realized his own inspired exclamation: 'Thanks be to God which giveth me 'the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ' (1 Cor. xv. 56, 57).

His last imprisonment is traditionally said to have been very different from the mild coercion of the former. No longer in his own hired house, he is thought to have been confined in the Mamertine dungeon. It still exists, comprising two large apartments, built of uncemented stones, one below the other. Into this last (called the Tullianum, from the king Servius Tullus, by whom, as the story goes, it was constructed), accessible only through a hole in the floor of the upper chamber, a place characterized by ancient historians as most foul and loathsome, the apostle was thrust. No man had stood with him on his trial; but he was not alone, for his Lord was there (3 Tim. iv. 16, 17). From this dungeon he was dragged to Aquæ Salviæ, on the Ostian road, two miles beyond the limits of the present city, and was there beheaded. Glorious martyr! Doubtless fresh strains of gratulation poured from heavenly harps when Saul of Tarsus, a chief of sinners, a chief of saints, was borne by angelic ministers into the Everlasting Presence, there to receive his crown; and wondrous sweet—may fancy be allowed thus far?—must have been the recognition of Stephen and Saul, the martyr and the persecutor a martyr too, as bound in the tie of indissoluble love they together adore the grace of Him who hath placed them near his throne to behold his countenance for ever.

Of St. Paul's personal appearance tradition has preserved some features. He is said to have been short of stature, of strongly-marked Jewish type of countenance, to have had a long face with high forehead, an aquiline nose, a clear complexion; his beard being long and thin, his head bald, his eyes grey, beneath thickly-overhanging eyebrows, with a cheerful and inviting expression, easily showing the quick changes of his feelings. Probably his body was disfigured by some lameness or distortion. But the characteristics of his mind are of yet greater interest. Ardent in disposition, with much tenderness of heart, he was fearless, determined, patient, courteous, and of honourable bearing, with clear logical grasp of truth, which he could illustrate with commanding eloquence; and he united intellectual qualities of different kinds, impulsive zeal with practical good sense and a singleness of purpose which, in any walk of life, would have ensured distinction. How much more when all these natural endowments were sanctified and directed by the highest wisdom, even the guidance of God's Spirit, to the highest end.

A meet vessel indeed—so made by divine grace—was this to proclaim the everlasting gospel. And faithfully did he bear the message. His lucid expositions of divine truth have always occupied a foremost place among the standards of Christian doctrine. Some, indeed, have chosen to represent him as inconclusive and vacillating; and some have dwelt upon the difference in type of his teaching from that of other of the apostles. To the first charge only a decided negative can be opposed; and to the alleged variation it must be said that different aspects of the same truth may be presented without opposition, nay, that they must be presented if we would apprehend the whole. There was but one who could exhibit a complete picture, giving to every part its due prominence, and leaving nothing to be supplied. What the Master has done by a single touch the disciples could do only in conjunction and by repetitions, each illustrating a part or parts which, collected, form a perfect image. Doubtless those who learned from them have often failed to combine their teachings; and hence there have been divisions, one of Paul, another of Apollos, and another of Cephas. But this has been man's infirmity: it was one Spirit that originally breathed in all of them his harmonious gifts. None of the sacred writers has more thoroughly illustrated the great Christian doctrine of the atonement than the apostle Paul. The work and offices of Christ, justification by faith in him, are prominent topics in his productions. And again and again does he break off from the main thread of his discourse to dwell upon the exceeding great love of his Master and only Saviour.

His history and writings furnish a proof not to be gainsaid of the truth of Christianity. If the facts of Paul's life be admitted—and how can they be questioned?—it is clear that we have not been deceived, but that Christ did indeed die for our sins and rise again for our justification (Rom. iv. 25).

The various works of St. Paul are noticed under their respective headings. A large list might be given of writers who have treated on his life, character, and works: it must be sufficient here to name Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, and Paley's Horæ Paulinæ. Several editions of both these standard books have appeared.

PAULUS, SERGIUS (Acts xiii. 6-12). See SERGIUS PAULUS.

PAVEMENT (John xix. 13). See GABBATHA.

PAVILION. We ordinarily use this word to indicate a superior kind of tent. For the most part when it occurs in our version it is as the equivalent of a Hebrew term signifying a booth, or hut, and frequently translated 'tent' or 'tabernacle' (1 Kings xx. 12). The 'pavilion' of Psal. xxvii. 5 is an enclosure or covert. The word rendered 'royal pavilion' in Jer. xliii. 10 means the ornament or tapestry with which a throne is spread or decorated. See TENT.

PEACE. A Christian grace (Gal. v. 22). The carnal mind being described as 'enmity against God' (Rom. viii. 7), and men under the dominion of sin being enemies (v. 10), he of his great mercy has proclaimed peace through the redemption effected by Christ Jesus (Luke ii. 14; Acts x. 36; Eph. ii. 17). Those, then, that are justified by faith have peace with God (Rom. v. 1); and, as it is by virtue of what Christ did and suffered that this peace is obtained (Col. i. 20), he is sometimes called 'our peace' (Eph. ii. 14), reconciling men to God, and forming them, once separated and apart, into one united body. The word 'peace' is often used to express temporal, and still more spiritual, prosperity. It was a common form of salutation and blessing to say, 'Go in peace' (Exod. iv. 18; Mark iv. 34), or 'Peace be unto you' (Luke x. 5; John xx. 19, 21; Rom. i. 7). To enquire after the peace of another was to ask if he was well (Gen. xxix. 6, marg., xxxvii. 14, marg.; 2 Kings x. 13, marg.). And to die in peace described the happy end of God's servants (Gen. xv. 15; Isai. vii. 2; Luke ii. 29).

PEACE-OFFERING. See OFFERINGS.

PEACOCK. A well-known bird, brought in Solomon's fleets to Judea (1 Kings x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21). There seems no reason to doubt that the peacock, Pavo cristatus, is really here intended, though some critics have suggested parrots, and others pheasants. Peacocks are said to be great destroyers of serpents in India, even of the most venomous kind, which they will fearlessly attack, confusing them with their rapid evolutions, and usually despatch with a blow upon the head. 'Peacocks' is the rendering in our version of another word (Job xxxix. 13); but the female ostrich is meant: see OSTRICH.

PEARL. This substance is mentioned but once in our version of the Old Testament (Job xxviii. 18); but the word so translated there is more likely to be crystal: see, however, Carey, Book of Job, notes, p. 328. Some have imagined that the 'rubies' in the same place are pearls; but this is questionable; and Lam. iv. 7, where the same word is found, seems to offer an insuperable objection. If, then, 'bdellium' (Gen. ii. 12) be not pearl, of which there is some probability (see BDELLIUM), the Old Testament writers do not mention it at all. In the New Testament, however, we repeatedly find pearls, but for jewels or precious things generally, or, possibly, wise sayings (Matt. vii. 6), as choice and sought-for articles of costly merchandise (xliii. 45, 46; Rev. xviii. 12, 16), as used ornamentally by females (1 Tim. ii. 9; Rev. xvii. 4). The gates of the heavenly Jerusalem also are described as each one several pearl (xxi. 21): see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Perlen.' The mother-of-pearl shell is from the Avicula margaritifera, or pearl-oyster, belonging to the genus Avicula of bivalve mollusks. Fisheries of this are established in various parts of the world: the principal are near Ceylon, Cape Comorin, and in the Persian gulf. Pearls hold a high place among the decorations of an eastern monarch. See Duns, Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. pp. 607-610.

PEDAHEL (whom God delivers). A chief of Naphtali, appointed to superintend the division of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 28).

PEDAHZUR (whom the rock, i. e. God, delivers). Father of Gamaliel, prince of Manasseh (Numb. i. 10, ii. 20, vii. 54, 59, x. 23).

PEDAIAH (whom Jehovah delivers).—1. The father of Zebudah, Jehoiakim's mother (2 Kings xxiii. 36).—2. The father of Zerubabel (1 Chron. iii. 18, 19).—3. Father of Joel, ruler of the half-tribe of Manasseh in David's reign (xxvii. 20).—4. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 25).—5. A Levite (probably) who stood by Ezra when he read the book of the law (viii. 4). The person named in xliii. 13 may be the same.—6. A Benjaminite (xi. 7).

PEDIGREE (Numb. i. 18; Ezra ii. 59, marg.; Neh. vii. 61, marg.). See GENEALOGY.

PEKAH (open-eyed). The son of Remaliah, a captain in Pekahiah's army who conspired against his master, slew him, and reigned over Samaria in his stead for twenty years (758-738 B.C.). His conduct was evil: he maintained the sinful worship set up by Jeroboam I. In the latter part of his reign, about the seventeenth year, he allied himself with Rezin, king of Syria, against Judah, over whom he gained a great victory; but he was himself attacked and his kingdom dismembered by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. And then he was slain by conspirators headed by Hoshea, who afterwards obtained the crown (2 Kings xv. 25-38, xvi. 1-9; 2 Chron. xxviii. 6; Isai. vii. 1-16, viii. 6).

PEKAHIAH (Jehovah has opened his eyes). The son of Menahem, king of Israel. He succeeded his father and reigned wickedly two years (760-758 B.C.). He was murdered in his palace by Pekah, one of his officers (2 Kings xv. 22-26).

PEKO'D (visitation, punishment?). A name allegorically given to Babylon, perhaps in anticipation of her destruction, the city to be visited and punished (Jer. i. 21; Ezek. xxiii. 23): comp. Psal. cxxxvii. 8. But the meaning seems to vary in the two passages in which the word occurs.

PELAIAH (whom Jehovah makes distinguished).—1. One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 24).—2. One of the Levites who expounded the law, and sealed the covenant (Neh. viii. 7, x. 10).

PELALIAH (whom Jehovah judges, i. e. whose cause he protects). A priest (Neh. xi. 12).

PELATIAH (whom Jehovah delivers).—1. One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 21).—2. A Simeonite captain (iv. 42).—3. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 22).—4. A prince of the people, against whom Ezekiel was commanded to prophesy for his wicked counsel, and who died while the prophet was speaking (Ezek. xi. 1, 13).

PE'LEG (division). One of the sons of Eber (Gen. x. 25, xi. 16, 17, 18, 19; 1 Chron. 1. 19, 25). His posterity may be supposed to have settled in various parts of Arabia Deserta. The expression, 'in his days the earth was divided,' has given rise to much conjectural discussion; and it has been imagined that some literal disruption of the earth's surface then occurred. But it is perhaps most satisfactory to adopt the explanation of Kalisch, who, tracing the dispersion of the progeny of Arphaxad, says: 'From the boundaries of Armenia, his immediate descendants, the Salahites, spread (Salah) along the eastern side of the Tigris, and on the mountains of the Median highlands: a part of their population gradually wandered and settled beyond (Eber) the Tigris and Euphrates; whilst the chief stock of the latter, no doubt urged on and accompanied by a general commotion of nations, was the origin of extensive and distant colonies (Peleg) in the wide tracts of Arabia, to the Indian ocean in the south, and the Mediterranean sea in the west (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 278).

PE'LET (deliverance).—1. One of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. ii. 47).—2. A Benjamite chief, who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 3).

PE'LETH (swiftness).—1. A Reubenite (Numb. xvi. 1).—2. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 33).

PEL'ETHITES (runners). (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18, xx. 7, 23; 1 Kings i. 38, 44; 1 Chron. xviii. 17). See CHERETHITES. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible doubts the etymology of the names given here, and conceives that the Cherethites and Pelathites were of tribes kindred to the Philistines. Cherethim, probably Cretans, were employed as mercenaries by some Egyptian kings (vol. ii. pp. 766, 767).

PEL'IAS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Perhaps a corruption of Bedeiah (Ezra x. 35).

PELICAN. The Pelecanidæ are a family of the Palmipedes; including a variety of swimming birds, pelicans, cormorants, &c. The genus Pelecanus comprises many species. The pelicans are large and heavy birds, with a great extent of wing, and are excellent swimmers. Their expansive pouch will hold a considerable number of fish: in it they dispose of the superfluous quantity taken during fishing expeditions, for their own future consumption, or the nourishment of their young. The male, too, is said to supply the wants of the female when sitting. In disgorging the contents of the pouch, the under mandible is pressed against the neck and breast; and during this action the red nail of the upper mandible, it would seem, comes in contact with the breast; this probably is the foundation of the fable that the pelican feeds its young with its blood. The neighbourhood of rivers and lakes, also sea-coasts, and marshes are the haunts of pelicans. Burckhardt describes them as abounding in Idumea. The Pelecanus onocrotalus, common pelican, and the Pelecanus crispus, are common in Palestine and the adacent countries. The general aspect of this bird is said to give the notion of thoughtfulness or melancholy. The Hebrew term for it signifies 'vomiter,' most probably from its disgorging what it has swallowed. It was forbidden as food (Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 17; see also Psal. cii. 6; Isai. xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14; in the two last-named places our version has 'cormorant' in the text).

PEL'ONITE. The designation of some of David's warriors, of which the origin is unknown (1 Chron. xi. 27, 36, xxvii. 10). See PALTITE, and comp. PALMONI.

PELU'SIUM (Ezek. xxx. 15, 16, marg.). The Greek name of SIN, which see.

PEN (Judges v. 14; 3, John 13 and elsewhere). See WRITING.

PEN'IEL (face of God). The place where Jacob had his mysterious conflict: he wrestled through the night; and, though the might of his antagonist was manifested by a touch upon Jacob's thigh, yet the patriarch had power with God, and prevailed: at day-break he received a blessing; and his name was changed from Jacob to Israel, from the supplanter to the prince of God (Gen. xxxii. 24-30). The spot must, in all probability, have been to the south of the Jabbok. From early times it had a tower or castle called Penuel: this tower Gideon destroyed (Judges viii. 8-17); and the city was afterwards re-built or fortified by Jeroboam I. (1 Kings xi. 52).

PENIN'NAH (coral). One of the wives of Elkanah, the father of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. i. 2, 4).

PENNY, PENNYWORTH. The Roman denarius (Matt. xx. 2, 9, 13, xxii. 19; Mark vi. 37, xii. 15; Luke xx. 24; John vi. 7; Rev. vi. 6). See DENARIUS, MONEY.

PENTATEUCH, THE. The name by which the first five books of the Old Testament, commonly ascribed to Moses, are collectively designated. The word is of Greek origin, implying five books or volumes. In scripture various appellations are given to the Pentateuch, such as 'the law,' 'the law of Moses,' 'the book of the law of the Lord,' &c., &c. (Deut. xxviii. 61; 2 Kings xxii. 8, 11; 2 Chron. xvii. 9, xxxiv. 14, 15; Neh. viii. 1, 3, 18; Luke xxiv. 44, and elsewhere); and by the rabbins it is termed 'the five-fifths of the law.' It forms to the present day but a single roll or volume in the Jewish manuscripts, distributed into 54 larger parashioth or sections, and into 669 smaller ones, called open or closed, according as they commence respectively at the beginning or in the middle of lines. It is not agreed when the five-fold division was made. Some scholars consider it original; others would attribute it to the Alexandrian translators. It is at any rate of great antiquity; for it is mentioned by Josephus (Contr. Apion., lib. i. § 8).

The authorship, date, integrity, and credibility of the Pentateuch have often been keenly discussed. It is only a compendious account of the discussion that can be given in the present work. The observations to be made shall be ranged under two heads—(1) the Mosaic authorship; (2) the truthfulness of the record.

1. The current of external evidence is very strongly in favour of the Mosaic authorship. That great law-giver is said to have been 'learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians' (Acts vii. 22). Now it is notorious that the art of writing was known and was continually practised in Egypt prior to the time of Moses. See, for full confirmation of this fact, Dr. Bartlett in Biblioth. Sacr., Oct. 1863, p. 803, cited above, p. 608. It was among such a people that Moses was reared, and in such wisdom he must have been trained. When, then, the stirring events of the exodus occurred, when a nation was to be organized, laws to be promulgated, and customs to be established, it is a moral certainty, apart from the consideration of any divine command, that such a man would take care to chronicle passing events, and to have his laws a written code.

Perfectly reasonable, therefore, are the notices which we find in the Pentateuch itself (Exod. xvii. 14, xxiv. 3, 4, 7, xxxiv. 27, 28; Numb. xxxiii. 2; Deut. i. 5, xvii. 18, xxviii. 58, xxxi. 9-11, 22, 24-26), which go to show that Moses was in the habit of committing things to writing, for preservation to succeeding ages. Some of these notices, indeed, refer to particular historical events, or to a compendium of laws. But others furnish a strong presumption that the entire Pentateuch was intended. Thus, when it is said that 'the book of the law' was to be placed beside the ark of the covenant (26), a natural conclusion is that this was the complete roll. So, when, the 'law' was ordered to be read to the people at the feast of tabernacles (9-11), it could hardly be a mere fragment. The Jews, it is true, have a notion that Deuteronomy alone was meant. But when the reading is afterwards mentioned we find that precepts from Leviticus were rehearsed (Neh. viii. 14, 15). Besides, the length of time devoted to this reading was several hours a day for eight days. Less than the entire Pentateuch would not have lasted so long.

If we pass to the following books of the Old Testament we have a chain of evidence for the existence of the Pentateuch. There are several notices in Joshua of 'the book of the law,' sometimes expressly called 'the law of Moses' (Josh. i. 8, viii. 30-32, 34, xxiii. 6, xxiv. 26). And that such a volume continued to exist, and was often appealed to, the following references will prove (1 Kings ii. 3, viii. 53; 2 Kings xi. 12, xiv. 6, xxi. 8, xxii. 8, 10, 11, 16, xxiii. 24, 25; 1 Chron. xvi. 40, xxii. 12, 13; 2 Chron. xvii. 9, xxiii. 18, xxv. 4, xxx. 16, xxxi. 3, xxxiii. 8, xxxiv. 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 21, 24, 30, xxxv. 6, 12, 26; Ezra iii. 2, vi. 18, vii. 6; Neh. i. 7, 8, viii. 1-3, 5, 8, 14, 15, 18, ix. 3, x. 34, 36, xiii. 1-3; Dan. ix. 11, 13; Mal. iv. 4). The testimony may be traced still farther. For, though soon after the return from captivity the Spirit of prophecy ceased, yet there were Jewish secular writers of credit who preserved and carried on the record which they had received from their fathers. They bear witness to the existence of the book in their days, and to the fact that it was attributed to Moses. Proofs have been elsewhere (see CANON OF SCRIPTURE, p. 134; and comp. p. 110) produced from the Apocrypha and from Josephus, and they need not be repeated here. But it is necessary to advert to the mention of the Pentateuch, and of Moses as its author, found in the New Testament. For this the following passages may be examined: Matt. xix. 7; Mark x. 3-5, xii. 19, 26; Luke xvi. 29, 31, xxiv. 27, 44; John i. 45, v. 46, 47, vii. 19, viii. 5; Acts iii. 22, xv. 21, xxvi. 22, xxviii. 23; Rom. x. 5; 2 Cor. iii. 15; Heb. vii. 14.

Scarcely for any other ancient book can such a continuous line of witnesses be produced. It is indeed alleged that they are not all relevant, that the law-book, so called by the earlier, is not identical with the law-book (acknowledged to be the Pentateuch) of the later, that it is by a series of accretions that some fragmentary original grew into a volume. The burden of proof may well be laid upon those who maintain this hypothesis. And historical proof they have none: their theory is based on certain internal characteristics, which they think betoken a less remote age than that which must be claimed for the Pentateuch if it was really the work of Moses.

Let this for the present pass. Attention must be called to the mode in which Christ speaks of the Pentateuch. Some indeed object to this witness being produced. It is hard to say why. If Christ were but an ordinary writer; were he only like the Jewish historian Josephus, no man would dream of putting aside his testimony. It is hard to see why, because he is invested with a higher character, because he is the founder and teacher of the new dispensation, because he speaks with an authority which no mere man can claim, his judgment is not to be appealed to. Surely, if we want to decide rightly any disputed matter, we ought to avail ourselves of all the evidence which can in any way bear upon it.

But then our Lord's evidence is represented as not so very conclusive. It cannot be denied that the Pentateuch in his hands was the Pentateuch we have; but it is alleged that he was not better acquainted with its origin than other Jews of his time, or that he spoke in accommodation to Jewish notions, or that, when he referred to Moses as the author, he did not refer to the entire book. We are gravely warned to beware of trenching on the truth of Christ's perfect manhood if we ascribe to him more than the ordinary knowledge of the men of his day; just as if we should not be trenching on the truth of his Godhead if we did not ascribe to him far higher knowledge. In fact, to put the matter on the lowest ground, if Christ were unable to detect what modern critics declare to be so patent to their eyes, if he were misled in attributing to Moses laws which Moses never penned, and prophecies which Moses never uttered, there can surely be little dependence placed on his own fitness as a teacher, little reason to bow to the authority of the gospel dispensation which he promulgated and based upon the earlier record. Of this further use will be made. At present it must be enough to refer to Porter's Pentateuch and the Gospels, 1864, in which our Lord's testimony to Moses is amply vindicated.

cated, and to some sensible observations by bp. Browne in The Pentateuch and the Elohist Psalms, lect. 1., pp. 10-15: see also a very excellent summary of the external evidence for the Mosaic authorship by Dr. Bartlett, ubi supr., pp. 811-840.

Besides the direct evidence, there are various collateral proofs of the antiquity of the Pentateuch. Thus the whole body of the later writings of the Old Testament is in accordance with what we find therein. The customs of the Pentateuch are observed, the laws of it are acknowledged, the history it details is referred to, its phraseology colours the style of every Hebrew author. It would be very difficult to account for this, if the book itself were not at the time in existence, if there were merely some floating traditions or unauthorized documents, which were not till a later period formed into a collected consistent whole. It is not merely that, as has been shown, there is distinct mention of a law-book, but the rest of the Old Testament is, so to speak, impregnated with the Pentateuch. Detailed proof of this obviously cannot be produced here; but it has been gathered by various critics, and may be seen drawn out at some length in Horne's Introduct., vol. ii. edit. Ayre, pp. 598-603. Of course exception is taken against many of the presumed allusions. It is said that the number of them is exaggerated: it is affirmed, by a cool begging of the question, that the fragmentary parts of what afterwards became the Pentateuch furnished ground enough for all these references. Little notice need be taken of such allegations. But there is much more to be said. There are archaisms in the language of this book which are for the most part wanting in other books of the bible. These archaisms run through even those portions, Deuteronomy may be instanced, which are frequently called most modern. The fact cannot be denied, even by critics like Hupfeld, nor can it be evaded by his childish supposition that the author or editor was possessed with a wonderful passion for uniformity, or had, mayhap, a fancy for imitating the phraseology of old books (see Horne's Introduct. p. 605; and Bartlett, ubi supr., pp. 841-844, for various examples of archaic phraseology). Then, again, there is the use of Egyptian words, of which some became incorporated into the language, while others subsequently disappeared. This fact, of which Bartlett produces examples (pp. 844-846), is reasonable enough on the ground of the Mosaic authorship, but is not readily to be explained on any other hypothesis. Still further, a vast deal of Pentateuchal legislation is suitable to the wilderness life of the Israelites. There are statutes for their then circumstances and position, with prospective changes and modifications in regard to their future residence in Canaan (e.g. Numb. xv. 1-31; Deut. vii. 1-5, xii.). It is unreasonable to believe that these things were devised by a later writer. Stronger, if possible, is the evidence of progressive legislation. God treats his creatures as sentient reasonable beings. He lets them find out their wants, and make application to him for their supply. So the daughters of Zelophehad conceived it hard that their father's house should lose name and inheritance because he had no son; and therefore it was provided that daughters should inherit. Subsequently, the tribe of Manasseh objected that, by the unrestrained marriage of heiresses, an inheritance might pass from tribe to tribe; it was provided therefore that such should marry only with their own tribesmen (Numb. xxvii. 1-11, xxxvi. 1-12). It was natural to chronicle these things as they happened: it is preposterous to suppose that they were devised centuries after they are said to have occurred (comp. also Exod. xii. 3, 6, 25; Numb. v. 1, 2, ix. 1-13). Add to all this the fact that in the Pentateuch there is no distinct enunciation of the soul's immortality. 'But if we read from Genesis through the history, the devotional poetry, the prophetic utterances of scripture, we see an orderly development. The future world, distant and darkly hinted at first, draws nearer and nearer: the veil is gradually lifted; and flashes of the inner glory shine more brightly forth. So that David could gaze upon the path of life, and anticipate the pleasures at God's right hand for evermore; while the prophets describe exultingly the spiritual and endless magnificence of Messiah's salvation. All is in order—the church advancing, God's purposes ripening, as the ages rolled on. But now put the Pentateuch in the time of the prophets, even in David's time, and you have a vast anomaly. A compiler, sitting down then to construct the guide-book of the nation, the laws and the ordinances and the covenant, even if he had used older documents (and these older documents are placed by the new critics very late), could not have thrown back his mind, and have shut out that blessed light which was glowing around him. It is impossible to account for the phenomena of the Pentateuch in regard to the great doctrine of the soul's immortality, if you bring down its composition to a late period' (see Horne, ubi supr., pp. 605, 606).

There is no growth of law and legislative enactments after the settlement of Israel in Canaan. In the history of other states we find this growth; nay, we may see it during Moses' life-time as the circumstances of his people changed. Why was there no subsequent advance? Why, rather, on the contrary, are there laws remaining in the statute-book, the strictness of which—the punishment decreed against adultery is an example—had ceased? Surely, if a compiler in the time of the judges or the kings—such is the allegation of certain critics—had for his own purposes reduced old documents into a code, he would have been succeeded by others who would have tried to improve upon his labours. But we find no trace of this. Not even did David or Solomon presume to make new laws. They accepted those already existing; and in the revivals and reformatations of later kings, directed and aided by prophetic men, we find only the ancient authority re-asserted—the regulations not going beyond the orderly assignment of the already-prescribed duties of priests and Levites. In what time could a compiler live who could so fix the whole worship and polity of the nation?—in the disturbed period of the judges, when there was hardly ever a central government, and separate tribes made separate wars uncontrolled, and suffered under separate captivities? in Saul's reign? who can believe that? in David's or any of his successors? we should have had particular notice of the fact then. It is hard therefore to fix on any date for the Pentateuch save that to which it has by the voice of ages been ascribed; and almost as well might we imagine the New Testament written in medieval times as, taking all the circumstances into consideration, the Pentateuch in the later days of Israel's history.

Besides, look at its particularity, consisting, a very large part of the last four books, of words distinctly said to be uttered by God to Moses, or by Moses to the people. Who could chronicle these? They must have been recorded at the time, or else they must have been dictated by special revelation to some later prophet. Will the modern critics accept the latter branch of the alternative? If not, they must have another offered. A subsequent author must have devised mainly from his own mind those sacred conversations, those authoritative utterances which are presented to us with such minuteness as the very words of God. Some have actually embraced this theory, and have fixed on the prophet Samuel as the guilty man. For guilty, in spite of all the explanations offered, he must be called, who dared to publish as the very words of God what God never uttered. The sin of Hananiah (Jer. xxviii.) was not so deep: the presumption of Korah (Numb. xvi.) was not so daring.

Such is a very compendious sketch of the evidence direct and indirect for the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch: it is necessary now to see how far it is neutralized by the objections which are commonly made to such a theory. These objections are taken mainly from internal phenomena. They are grounded on the use in these writings of different divine names, on alleged variations in the style, on imagined repetitions, and discrepancies, on the assumed improbability of Moses writing certain parts, on the traces of several hands throughout the work, on the supposed introduction of topics and events reasonably thought to be posterior to the age of Moses. Let it be at once admitted that there can be no objection to the freest examination of these and kindred matters, provided it be conducted in a reverent spirit. Truth, even if it involve the relinquishing of long-cherished prejudice, must fearlessly be accepted. But then we must not be overborne by confident assertion, even though it be made by men of greatest erudition, whose knowledge of the Hebrew language, in spite of the paucity of its remains, is so comprehensive and so delicate that they can strike out every word or phrase which Moses would not have used, whose judgment can decide exactly what Moses ought to have written, whose privilege, too, it is to vary from one another and call it unanimity, nay, individually to maintain different opinions at different periods, and to require the same deference to be paid to each.

Let us look at what they allege.

The Pentateuch is not a whole from a single hand. Floating suspicions of this kind had been long entertained. Writers, both Jewish and Christian, were inclined to believe that earlier documents were incorporated. This is what we find not unfrequently in other books of scripture. The decree of Cyrus, for example, was obtained from what we may call the state-paper office at Ecbatana (Ezra vi. 1-5); and the genealogies in the Gospels (Matt. i. 2-16; Luke iii. 23-38) were copied, there is no doubt, from carefully-preserved records. But two names, it was observed, were given to the Deity. Tertullian, Augustine, Chrysostom noticed this. It was not, however, till the middle of the last century that Astruc, a Belgian physician, ventured to mark out by this rule the documents which he supposed had been employed. In a work published in 1753, Conjectures sur les Mémoires originaux dont il parait que Moïse s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse, he maintained that Moses had compiled Genesis from two principal documents, in which the names Jehovah and Elohim were respectively used, with additions from ten others of inferior importance. It was concluded from Exod. vi. 3 that the name Jehovah was unknown to the ancient patriarchs, and that therefore the introduction of this word in early history must indicate a writer diverse from the one who used in his early description the name Elohim. From these two words the supposed two writers have been called the Elohist and the Jehovist. Here then is a principle according to which, it is said, the Pentateuch may be distributed. But this is not the only, it is not always an exact, criterion. There are other marks. Thus the Elohist is more simple and circumstantial in his style, with less polish. He abounds with repetitions, and is fond of introducing genealogical and ethnological registers. He uses many words and phrases foreign to the Jehovist; who also has his peculiar phraseology. The style of the latter is more compact and shorter, also more smooth and clear. He frequently cites proverbs and snatches of old poetry: he describes appearances of angels and of the Deity, and is careful to magnify his own nation.

It is by such indications that various scholars have attempted to divide the Pentateuch, ascribing each portion to, as they think, its suitable owner. But unfortunately they have not been successful. For, if tables are made out of their distributions, these are found marvellously at variance. Such a table is given in Horne's Introd. (ubi supr., p. 551), where De Wette, Tuch, and Stähelin are shown to disagree. And the disagreement does not end here. Some multiply, and some diminish the number of original writers. Some are content with an Elohist and a Jehovist, one who produced the ground-document, and another who supplemented and completed it. Some must have an Elohist, a Jehovist, and a final editor. Others require two or more Elohist, or two Jehovists. Some introduce a Deuteronomist. Some consider one document complete in itself, and some another; while others will not allow that any is complete, so that the editor according to their notion worked from a mass of fragments. And these different writers are assigned to all possible ages, from the time of Sanson to that of Jeremiah. It must not be thought that these statements are exaggerated. There are more diversities on the different points among critics of name than can possibly be here enumerated, as may be seen by any reader who will take the trouble to turn to Dr. McCaul's Essay in Aids to Faith, pp. 190-193, or to Bartlett, ubi supr., pp. 853, 854. 'It is self-evident,' says Dr. McCaul, 'that criticism leading to such inconsistent conclusions must be in a high degree imaginative: a little examination shows that it is also unreasonably arbitrary.' Very often, for instance, a passage has to be cut up into fragments, because the word Jehovah appears just where it should not.

But these two names of Deity are not synonymous. They imply different notions. What then if they were introduced, not according to the varying custom of individual writers, but because the use of one or other suited best with the scope of the passages in which they respectively appear? There are scholars of the highest name who think they can trace such a propriety of use. And it is very similar to what we find in the New Testament. The names Jesus and Christ, though we now through familiar habit employ them indifferently, have each a special signification; and generally in the earlier books the change of one for another would obscure and confuse the sacred writer's meaning. In regard to the derivation and meaning of the names Jehovah and Elohim something has been said elsewhere: see JEHOVAH. And it may be added here that it by no means follows from Exod. vi. 3 that the first patriarchs were ignorant of Jehovah as a name: it was the covenant-relation implied in it which they did not comprehend. The stress of the passage lies in the term 'know,' denoting an experimental acquaintance with fulfilled promise. That it and kindred expressions mean something more than bare acquaintance is evident from such passages as the following: Exod. ii. 25, xxxiii. 12, 17, xxxv. 30; Psal. i. 6; Isai. xliii. 1, xlv. 4; Jer. i. 5; Nah. i. 7; John x. 3; 1 Thess. v. 12.

Various eminent critics, among whom Hengstenberg (Dissertations on the Genuineness of the Pent.), and Kurtz (Die Einheit der Genesis) may be specified, have undertaken to show that the two names are employed very carefully according to their respective significations. They have analyzed the sacred text, and have pointed out with a great deal of skill the peculiar fitness, as it goes along, of this or that divine appellation to the character of the narrative and the tone of thought. It is impossible to give here an exemplification of their process: it may be seen in some measure drawn out in Horne's Introd., ubi supr., pp. 555-561. And, though the reasoning may not appear always satisfactory, and cases may occur in which, when Jehovah is used, Elohim would be equally appropriate, yet it should be remembered that, if the book were made up from materials of a Jehovist and an Elohist, put together without much skill, it would be marvellous to detect in such a conglomerate any kind of system after which the occurrence of the names could be explained. Surely, if composed so to speak at hap-hazard, each would sometimes be found in places for which no plausible theory whatever could account. There is another point. In Gen. ii., iii. the names are combined. The combination occurs very rarely elsewhere in scripture. If we believe that there was but a single writer, we can well understand how, having shown that Elohim (the ground-notion of the name being power) created the world, and proceeding to describe the covenant-relationship in which Jehovah (the self-developer) appears and acts, he would be careful to make it known that there were not two Gods, but one, who manifests himself in different aspects. The use of Jehovah-Elohim, 'the Lord God,' sufficiently proves this. No adequate explanation of it has yet been produced by the critics who advocate the theories of fragments or documents.

Great stress is laid upon the alleged fact that two different accounts are frequently given of the same story, with such diversity, or even discrepancy, in the details, that both, it is inferred, cannot have proceeded from the same hand. Only a single illustration can here be given. We have, it is asserted, two narratives of the deluge, so inartificially combined as that in one part the command prescribes that pairs of all creatures were to be taken into the ark, in another sevens of many kinds; in one part Noah is represented as embarking seven days before the flood, in another the very day it began; in one part the rains are described as descending forty days, in another the waters prevailing one hundred and fifty (Gen. vi., vii.). Critics, it would seem, are often not well skilled in the ways of the world, and the events of common life; else they need not have stumbled at statements like these. They forget that two different communications must necessarily have been made to Noah. Again, even an ordinary flood does not cease so soon as the descending rains are stopped. Every one with eyes perceives that the inundation is not all over. So that very well, after the forty days of rain and the breaking up of the fountains of the great deep, may the waters have 'prevailed' with little or no sensible diminution three or four months longer. The narrative fairly read, and interpreted as ordinary histories are interpreted, is consistent enough, and does not require the hypothesis of two different writers to it. See these particulars more largely treated under FLOOD, p. 296, NOAH, p. 637.

Then, further, it is urged that there is a difference in the phraseology. Very little can be said on this topic. Scholars have explained again and again that there are varying shades of meaning, which required varying phrases to express them. Yet again and again the same objection is pressed, as if no reasonable explanation had ever been attempted. The reader shall judge by a single instance. Padan-aram, we are told, is peculiar to the Elohist, Aram-naharaim, rendered 'Mesopotamia' in our version, to the Jehovist. But the names are not identical. Padan-aram is the district of Mesopotamia which lies around Haran, Mesopotamia the whole sweep of the country between the rivers. And be it known that 'Mesopotamia' occurs—a slender foundation on which to base a theory—but twice in the whole Pentateuch (Gen. xxiv. 10; Deut. xxiii. 4), in both which passages the name of a particular place is properly adjoined. In the first (Gen. xxiv.) the country is given from which Isaac's wife was to be brought, and then the particular 'city of Nahor' in it is specified. When the reader was once acquainted with the country and place, it was natural to employ generally the special appellation, Padan-aram. But in Deut. xxiii. Padan-aram would be inappropriate, because Balaam was of Mesopotamia indeed, but not from Haran. When, again, it is objected that different phrases for male and female are used by the two writers, the objectors are not even accurate. Both phrases occur in both. And, besides, the one distinguishes the sexes according to their physical constitution, the other according to their moral personality. Such arguments tell very little indeed for the theory they are produced to support.

It is assumed by several critics that the final compiler, having in his hands the productions of the Elohist and the Jehovist, very unartificially combined them, retaining in full the whole of each document, but distributing the portions into places which he conceived they best would fit. It is only necessary to glance at one of the tables before referred to, in order to see what trouble such a compiler must have undergone. Is it reasonable to believe that he would take that trouble? more especially as if, instead of transcribing and transposing, he had used his materials as other historians do theirs, he would with greater facility have produced a more satisfactory work. An honest and truthful writer does not combine contradictory statements by mere juxta-position, he does not, if he has lighted upon the annals of old times—instead of weighing the probability and evidence of the different stories, and selecting that which he deems the truth—set about concocting a narrative by stringing together first a piece from one, and then a piece from another, careless whether they are consistent, and presenting the same incident again and again in a different dress. This is just what a man who desired credit for his work, and was possessed of common sense, would not do. Besides, if what are called the Jehovistic and Elohist sections were respectively picked out and laid together, it would be found that neither of them would be complete. The one requires the other in order to be perfectly comprehended. For illustration it may be remarked that only the so-called Jehovist narrates the fall of man. But how without this narration could the universal depravity noted in Gen. vi. 11-13 by the so-called Elohist be understood? Still further, the Jehovist is said to belong to a later time. Yet there are references to him in the Elohist, pre-supposing his work to have been known to the imagined earlier writer. Many such references have been pointed out by Kurtz, Keil, and others, which cannot be given here: the student will find examples in Horne's Introd., ubi supr., pp. 589, 590, demonstrating that the Pentateuch is the product of a single mind, not a heterogeneous composition, but a well-compacted body, the parts of which take their proper place. Surely there is proof here of the existence of a plan, laid down at first and regularly carried out.

Dr. Kurtz has carefully examined the structure of Genesis. He finds that, besides an introduction (Gen. i.—ii. 3), it comprises ten sections; as ten is the number of completeness, the author thereby perhaps intending to indicate the completeness of the work. These ten sections, moreover, have distinct and similar superscriptions: 'These are the generations,' or, 'This is the book of the generations.' Here is the list (Der Einheit der Genesis, pp. lxvii., lxviii.).

The generations of the heaven and the earth (ii. 4—iv. 26).

The generations of Adam (v. 1—vi. 8).

The generations of Noah (vi. 9—ix. 29).

The generations of the sons of Noah (x. 1—xi. 9).

The generations of Shem (xi. 10-26).

The generations of Terah (xi. 27—xxv. 11).

The generations of Ishmael (xxv. 12-18).

The generations of Isaac (xxv. 19—xxxv. 29).

The generations of Esau (xxxvi.).

The generations of Jacob (xxxvii. 1—l. 26).

Moreover, there are certain similarities of arrangement frequently to be observed in these sections. Is it likely, then, it may be pertinently asked, if two or more hands in different ages had been employed upon it, that the work could have presented the regular structure in which we have it? The same observations may be extended to the entire Pentateuch. And, in addition to what has been previously said, it may be noted that there is a chronological thread running through the whole, according to which events are placed in orderly succession; any minor departure from this being only for the better arranging and completing of the histories to be given. There is a careful elaboration of the subject, and a consistent linking of its parts, so that the earlier sections tend forward, in preparation for what is yet to come, and the later sections, in their regular development, continually refer back, in the most natural way, to those which have preceded—the references being not of a one-sided character, but, as above noted, from the so-called supplement to the ground-work, and from the ground-work to the supplement.

The united voice of antiquity testifies to the soundness of this conclusion. If the modern notion be adopted that the Pentateuch is an inartificial gradual compilation by different hands, and in different ages, we are entitled to ask not only how it first acquired its position as the law-book and authoritative chronicle of the Hebrew nation, but also how through times of national declension and of exile, when its enactments were felt a heavy yoke and its denunciations galling to the national spirit, how in gospel times, when the Christian scriptures among which it was incorporated were exposed to the keenest investigation, how in later days of scholarly research, it maintained its place, satisfying the most enquiring intellect, till at last, on a sudden, ancient prescription is supposed to be groundless, and the compact edifice of the Hebrew polity is represented as something that can be crumbled into discordant fragments. Surely there would be a moral wonder in all this; and common sense revolts against the notion. Take the history of Joseph for example. Critics sitting in their studies have tried to dismember it. It is useless to argue with men who do not feel its exquisite adaptation and consistency; it must be enough to oppose to them the well-weighed opinion of a learned author, who, not denying that the writer may have availed himself of an earlier chronicle, remarks upon the excellent judgment which guided him, and declares that 'the history of Joseph is carried out with such admirable unity and precision, that all attempts of the fragmentists to dismember it have utterly failed' (Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 617).

The observations hitherto offered are directed mainly against the notion that the Pentateuch is made up by accretion of ill-assorted parts, combining different and discordant traditions, so as to multiply the same event, and represent that which occurred once to a single individual, as occurring repeatedly and to different persons. They are directed against the notion which sacrifices the perfect truthfulness of the Pentateuch, and which would reduce it from the dignity of an inspired record to a mere human chronicle, imperfect through the misapprehension, and embellished according to the fancy, of the compiler. If—for the matter requires much delicacy of handling—if any one is convinced by the varied use of the divine names, by, as he believes, the perceptible difference of tone and expression, by the not-always-similar phraseology, that more than one hand may be detected in the composition, then, though many of the reasons adduced for this conclusion are very slight, and stress is often laid on matters which will not bear it, yet the conclusion is such as an earnest believer in the authority of the book may admit without compromise of principle, provided the composition be not carried down below the time of Moses. There is nothing unbecoming, nothing strange, in the admission that the great lawgiver may have interwoven—as Ezra, as Daniel, as Matthew, as Luke, and others, it has been admitted, unquestionably did—previously-existing documents into his narrative.

But then, it is alleged that there are traces of a later date, that the composition shows by its very form that it was posterior to Moses, that it uses names and refers to events of later occurrence, that it speaks of Moses as no man would have spoken of himself, and that one division, the book of Deuteronomy, is so evidently diverse from the rest that it could not have been composed till long after. These allegations must be briefly sifted.

An argument is taken from the frequently-recurring phrase, 'unto this day,' which implies, it is said, that a considerable time must have elapsed between the event recorded and the recording of it. Now the phrase appears in Gen. xix. 37, 38, xxii. 14, xxvi. 33, xxxii. 32, xxxv. 20, xlvi. 26. Every thing here alluded to occurred long before Moses' birth: Moses might very well therefore have employed the words. In Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, they do not appear. But we have them in Deut. ii. 22, iii. 14, x. 8, xxix. 4, xxxiv. 6. Of these passages there is but one which presents a difficulty. A bare inspection of ii. 22, x. 8, xxix. 4, will show that Moses might well have penned them. And xxxiv. 6 is necessarily excluded from the investigation, because no man supposes that Moses chronicled his own death and burial. Well, then; there is but iii. 14; and on this it may be said that the phrase had very likely come to imply little more than our 'still,' which may mean a longer or shorter period, that it is confessedly used in both the Old and New Testaments, when the interval was very short (e.g. Josh. xxii. 3; Matt. xxviii. 15). And, if this be not altogether satisfactory, it must be urged that the use of the phrase generally in the Pentateuch is what we might expect, on the presumption of the Mosaic authorship, frequently in the history of events long passed, rarely in the history of contemporaneous events, and then only in addresses made by Moses to the people. It may be fairly added that, if the author of the Pentateuch were posterior to Moses, instead of one case in which there is some difficulty, we should have found many.

It is urged again that Gen. xiii. 7 betrays a later date, that it was written after the expulsion of the Canaanites. Nay, it may be rejoined; for, as remnants of the Canaanites were in Palestine after the Babylonish captivity (Ezra ix. 1), the date would then have to be brought down to a time in which no sane man would choose to place it. Rather, we have in the words objected to the natural reason stated why Abram and Lot could not dwell together. Had there been no other settlers, there would have been room enough; but it was not so: the Canaanites and the Perizzites even then, at that early time, were there.

But it is said that places are called in the Pentateuch by names which they did not bear till after the days of Moses. Beth-el (Gen. xii. 8), Hebron (xiii. 18), and Dan (xiv. 14) are examples of the alleged anachronism. But really little stress need be laid on such objections. The title Beth-el might not be generally adopted till the Israelites had occupied Canaan, but as so solemnly given by Jacob it is reasonable to believe that it was from his time used by his descendants. Hebron was probably the old name (its antiquity seems proved in Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp. 379, 380) of the city to which the title Kirjath-arba, 'town of Arba,' was additionally and subsequently (for not Ananik, but Hittites, dwelt there in Abraham's days) given, as that of 'the city of David' to Zion and to Beth-lehem. There is nothing to surprise in the old name's being resumed: modern examples of such a resumption might easily be produced. As to Dan, there seems to have been another place, Dan-jaan (2 Sam. xxvi. 6) so called, besides that which took its name from the tribe (Josh. xix. 47); but we have scarcely information enough to decide. After all, though the text as it is may be satisfactorily defended, yet who shall say, as it is likely that the hands of inspired men subsequently arranged some of the holy books, that a name may not have been for perspicuity exchanged; or a slight explanatory addition have been made—like the notice of Moses' death—such as those which occur in ordinary works without impeachment of their authority or good faith? Such minute objections will not in any reasonable man's mind cast doubt upon the Mosaic authorship.

The law of the king (Deut. xvii. 14-20) was written, it is said, after the establishment of the Hebrew monarchy. The real ground of objection to it is its prophetic character. That the injunction against multiplying horses and wives was not properly obeyed is no proof that there was no such early law; else every statute that ever existed in any country might be pronounced 'unhistorical'; for none has been always observed. The prophetic objection cannot be here discussed: the reasonable right of the Creator to foreshadow things to come may be found noticed elsewhere: see PROPHECY. And for a brief statement of the reasons why we receive Deuteronomy as the work of Moses see DEUTERONOMY.

One more point must be here adverted to. The writer of the Pentateuch applies the third person to Moses, and speaks of him, it is said, as he would not have spoken of himself. It is perhaps necessary to notice only that remarkable passage (Numb. xii.) which, as appearing to involve self-com mendation, has created the chief difficulty. We must bear in mind that Moses shrunk from the charge laid upon him. In his earlier life, indeed, fired with a sense of his people's wrongs he had zealously stood forth as their defender (Exod. ii. 11-14). But afterwards he repeatedly declined the offered mission (iii. 11, iv. 1-17, v. 22, 23, vi. 12, 28-30). And even after the deliverance from Egypt we find Moses desiring to be relieved from his burden and rejoicing when others were called to share it (Numb. xi. 10-15, 23, 29). Who can doubt that such a man would readily, if it had been permitted him, have devolved on Aaron and Miriam all the authority they coveted? Moses was not 'meek' in the ordinary sense of the word, for we frequently read of his wrath; but he was thoroughly unambitious. So far then from personal commendation, he simply records (xii. 3) the fact that for his part his brother and sister might have had their way. What is there inconsistent with his authorship of the history in this?

It is impossible here to pursue this part of the argument farther. The objections to the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch have been lightly touched; but it has been in some degree shown that they are not of a conclusive character. Thus, then, to sum it up the matter stands. There is every antecedent probability that Moses, educated as he had been, and charged as he was with the superintendence of Israel, would commit large particulars to writing. This is every reasonable testimony in the book itself and in posterior records that he did write. Authorship, generally speaking, must be settled by such testimony; and examples, some of them sufficiently ludicrous, might be produced of critics, even in our own day, who have been woefully deceived in their estimate of the age and authorship of productions devised to test their sagacity. Thus the modern tale of the 'Amber Witch' was pronounced by Gesenius and others a veritable record of antiquity. The internal evidence of the Pentateuch adds force to the external. The manner and tone of it ought not to be overlooked, the fact that a multitude of things are related of which Moses alone was cognizant, the archaic forms, the Egyptian words, the traces from many of the directions and allusions that Israel was in a wandering, not a settled, position at the time of writing, the unsuitableness of every other period of Hebrew history for the composition of the book, the inability to discover any other author except by random guess, when of such a work surely the author's name was not likely to fall into oblivion—these and a multitude of other considerations corroborate the belief of ages in the Mosaic authorship. Then the arguments alleged in opposition are by no means decisive. The so-called anachronisms admit of explanation: the progressive character of the legislation, so far from betraying a late authorship, is rather a proof of its early date—a contemporaneous writer would naturally chronicle statutes as they were enacted: no one long after would record those that had been superseded—diversities of diction may be accounted for: repetitions are frequent in almost every writer, especially in eastern writers: variations are not contradictions; and even if they were (laying aside for a moment the question of inspiration) they do not tell upon authorship; else, seeing that some eminent critics have published within brief space contradictory opinions on this very subject, they would be proved to have had no hand in their own compositions. Moreover, the alleged duplicate accounts, the various use of the divine names, even if the explanations offered are thought unsatisfactory, go only to show that the writer of the Pentateuch, like other sacred writers, availed himself of existing materials (the Divine Spirit never superseding human industry, or directly revealing that which was known by other means), and yield not the shadow of a proof against the Mosaic authorship, unless it could be demonstrated—which has not been done—that these materials were of later date than Moses. The fair conclusion surely is that to which Dr. Bartlett (ubi supr., Oct. 1864, p. 751) comes: 'It will be seen that the systematic policy of the objectors has been to hurl all manner of missiles, taken at random, in the hope that some of them may reach the mark. It will also be seen that, out of that whole mass of materials, scarcely more than half-a-dozen passages, lying on the surface of the narrative, could fairly suggest the thought of a later hand, and that these can be accounted, on intrinsic probabilities, general testimony, and special indications, as superficial glosses, without for a moment disturbing the concurrent testimony of all antiquity that Moses was the responsible author of the Pentateuch.'

This conclusion is defended in no dogmatic temper; and the scruples of those who hesitate in receiving it, if they have dealt with this confessedly-difficult matter in a reverent spirit, must certainly be treated with that respect which reckless criticism has no right to claim.

2. Besides the question of authorship there is yet another—that of the truthfulness of the record—which must be briefly looked at. If we cannot depend upon it as credible, it matters little by whom the Pentateuch was written.

Regarding, however, the Mosaic authorship generally as proved, we have presumptive evidence that the narrative is true. A large part of it comprises events in the lifetime of Moses, events many of them witnessed by the Israelitish nation, events published before those who could have exposed their falsehood if they were falsely reported, and who, from the temper they manifested, we may be sure would have exposed it if they could. The Pentateuch demonstrably moulded the manners of Israel: it contained the ordinances of their religion based upon alleged facts: it prescribed their political constitution and rights based also upon alleged facts: it regulated, moreover, their domestic habits, meeting them, so to speak, at every point publicly and socially. Their passover was to be observed because they had been delivered by divine judgment from bondage. The division of the nation was fixed because their early ancestor had twelve sons. Their priesthood was assigned to one of these tribes, because of the zeal reported at a particular crisis to have been shown by that tribe. How could all these ordinances have taken effect, unless the events which are said to have led to them really happened?

Attacks, however, have been made upon the credibility of the Pentateuch, and certain critics not content with assigning different portions of it to different persons, have assumed that the Jehovist and Elohist have written, not according to the truth of history, but according to their own turn of mind, colouring events as their pre-disposition inclined them. Thus, as before hinted, the Jehovist is said to have been imbued with ritualistic tendencies, to have manifested a Levitism, as it is termed. And yet very many references to ceremonial observances appear in the so-called Elohist. Again, the Jehovist is said to have been anxious to exalt the patriarchs and the Israelitish nation. And yet it is in sections attributed to him (e.g. Gen. iii. 6, 16-24, ix. 20-27, xii. 10-20, xxvii. 6-11, xxviii. 1-36, xxx. 25-42, xxxviii.; Exod. xvii. 2, 3; Numb. xi., xii., xiv. 1-4) that some of the worst features of their history appear. So far, then, there is not much to discredit the truth of the history.

But actual contradictions are alleged; as a sample of which take the following. Two varying reasons are given for Jacob's being sent into Mesopotamia; the one that he might escape the results of his brother's anger, the other that he might marry with his own kindred (Gen. xxvii. 41-45 compared with xxvii. 46-xxviii. 5). But these reasons were not contradictory, and may both be true. Esau's threatening against his brother may well consist with Rebekah's wish that Jacob should take a wife from among his own relations. Indeed, the two parts of the history fit accurately together. For it is not said that Esau's angry threats reached his father's ear. They were told only to Rebekah. And she, of course, did not convey them to Isaac. With characteristic tact she mentioned to him only her fear that Jacob also might intermarry with the daughters of Heth, sure that that would procure Isaac's consent to Jacob's departure. Matters fell out as she had anticipated; and Jacob obeyed both his father and his mother (7), the one in going to seek a wife of his kindred, the other in consulting for his safety in flight. The narrative is complete and consistent.

Such cavils as these, however, are petty and little deserving notice. Still more formidable objections have been urged. Thus it is alleged that the Pentateuch is contradicted by scientific discovery, that it contains demonstrable historic errors, and—which is the ground-work of every other objection—that it so deals with the marvellous, relating supernatural events, that it must necessarily be relegated to the domain of mythos or fiction. A few words shall be said on each of these points. As to the first, it is the narratives of the creation and of the flood that chiefly are assailed. Geological research, it is said, disproves them: long ages must have elapsed before the appearance of man upon our globe; and a universal deluge could not have occurred. Then, again, a greater antiquity is claimed for man than the scripture seems to allow; and some will not admit that all the races of the world have sprung from a single pair. Now, it is freely confessed that interpretations were heretofore put upon the Mosaic narrative which science has contradicted, just as it was thought in earlier days that the scripture had decided against the motion of the earth round the sun. Better examination shows that Gen. i. does not limit creation, from the first almighty fiat to the finished preparation of Eden for man's abode, to the short space once imagined, so that there might very well intervene vast periods sufficient for geological changes, with no contradiction to the sacred text. And geologists of the first reputation have seen and maintained that the two records are in harmony. See, among others, Hugh Miller's Testimony of the Rocks, and Dana's Manual of Geology: see also CREATION. Moreover, for some proof that the theory of a partial deluge is not inconsistent with scripture, see FLOOD.

But there are, further, said to be historical inaccuracies—indeed, yet stronger language has been used; and many of the recorded events, we are now plainly told, are impossible. One or two examples must be given. We are told that Israel could never have multiplied from a family into a populous nation within the period during which they were held in bondage by the Egyptians. But, first of all, this objection overlooks the fact that Jacob went down into Egypt with a very large establishment. We may well suppose that it was not from the family only, but from the family and the dependants, with whom there would be intermarriages, that the nation sprung. But, setting this consideration apart, it has been sufficiently proved and confirmed by modern examples, that it is quite possible that the recorded increase could have taken place within the specified time: see CENSUS; more especially when the divine blessing was vouchsafed purposely for this multiplication. Again, it is maintained that the vast masses of Israel never could have lived, as we read they did, with their cattle for many years in the desert. But to this there are two answers. Modern travellers declare that the wilderness is not, as men are ready to suppose, all a bare and naked waste. Amid arid plains there are extensive fertile tracts, abundantly watered, and, in parts of the year at least, covered with vegetation. And, so far from its being impossible for large bodies of men to traverse it, at this day the caravans of the pilgrims to Mecca, often including many thousands, pass directly through the whole length of the most desert portion of the peninsula. Besides, it is a gratuitous assumption that the Arabian wilderness was always as inhospitable as it is at present. There is strong reason to believe that there were anciently cities where now there is a sandy waste; and there are still visible the traces of works, yielding full proof that the country was once far more fitted for the sojourn of nomadic tribes than it is now. The whole question is satisfactorily handled by Dr. Bartlett, ubi supra, July 1864, pp. 511-529.

The grand objection, however, to the truthfulness of the Pentateuch is the supernatural character of many of the events related; and men, professing to know accurately what their Maker can or will do, have gravely pronounced his special interference in the government of the universe, the work of his fingers, the domain of his power, impossible. Objections of this kind have a larger scope than the credibility of the Pentateuch: they affect the whole of revealed religion. So far as they can be treated in this work they are considered elsewhere. See MIRACLE, SCRIPTURE.

The direct evidence for the truthfulness of the Mosaic writings is, at least, as strong as it is for any historical document whatever. We find the leading facts of them alluded to or pre-supposed in almost all the later books of the Old Testament. And archdeacon Pratt in his useful work, Scripture and Science not at variance, pp. 69-88, 3rd edit., has shown how many of those facts (of the earlier part of Genesis) are treated as literally true by our Lord and his apostles. Here, especially, Christ's authority before adverted to may properly come in. Would he have grounded his pretensions on a book which was not literally true? Besides, though profane history does not reach so far back as sacred, yet it does furnish innumerable weighty proofs of the credibility of Moses. Mr. Rawlinson has exhibited many of these in his Historical Evidences of the Truth of the Scripture Record. Every book of travels in the east is an additional witness. The manners are still very much what Moses describes them. The natural productions, the face and structure of the country, unite their voice. The cities of Bashan which he mentions—it was once thought with exaggeration—as so mighty, yet remain to corroborate his statements: see Porter's Giant Cities of Bashan. And, above all, there is the present condition of his people. Their destiny, as foretold in the Pentateuch, our own eyes may see. They are a standing miracle, a testimony resounding through the world, that it was no forger, no pretender to divine communications, no mere guesser that traced from its origin the house of Jacob, narrated its early history, sketched its yet future fortunes, drew the accurate picture of its present state, but one endued with the wisdom which could flow from the Spirit of truth alone.

More cannot be added. It is but an outline which has here been given; and the student must be referred for fuller particulars to other books. PENTECOST. The name, signifying fiftieth, by which the Hebrew feast of weeks is known in the New Testament. It was to be kept the fiftieth day, i.e. seven weeks, a week of weeks, after the passover, counting from 'the morrow after the passover sabbath,' the second day of that feast (Exod. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 15, 16; Deut. xvi. 9, 10). It was a festival of thanksgiving for the harvest, which began immediately after the passover; and the first-fruits were then to be offered to the Lord (Numb. xxviii. 26-31). This was one of the three great occasions on which the Israelites were to resort to the sanctuary (Exod. xxiii. 14-17; Deut. xvi. 16). And accordingly we find several notices in the New Testament that the practice was still observed (Acts ii. 1, 9-11, xx. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 8). The giving of the law was also considered, as commemorated at pentecost; for it was delivered from Sinai on the fiftieth day after the departure of Egypt, that is, after the institution of the passover. It was at pentecost that the promised out-pouring of the Holy Spirit on the gathered disciples occurred; and continually since, almost if not quite from the times of the apostles, has this great event been commemorated with solemn joy in the church of Christ at the season now called Whitsuntide. For an account of the name and the observance see Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xx. chap. vi.

The modern Jews observe the feast of pentecost or weeks on the sixth and seventh days of the month Sivan. The three preceding days are called the 'three days of bordering,' because before the giving of the law God directed Moses to set bounds to the mountain that the people might not trespass upon it. The scenery of the open country is imitated: the synagogues are decorated with flowers; and the tables and floors of the houses are strewn with flowers and fragrant herbs. For it was not in a temple but in the waste that the law was promulgated. On the evening of the fifth of the month, after synagogue service, the families sit at table to sanctify the feast. The master of the house takes a glass of wine in his hand and repeats the kidush or sanctification: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, the Creator of the fruit of the vine. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast selected us from all other people, and exalted us above all other nations, and sanctified us with thy commandments, and granted unto us, O Lord our God, in love, solemn feasts to rejoice, with festivals and times for gladness, this festival of the weeks, the time of the giving of our law, a holy convocation, a memorial of our departure from Egypt; for thou didst select us and sanctify us from all other people; and thy holy seasons with (love and favour) joy and gladness thou causedst us to inherit. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the sanctifier of Israel and the times. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast maintained us and preserved us to enjoy this season.' The next morning, in addition to the usual services, certain special prayers, descants, and paraphrases are read, with portions of scripture, among which are Exod. xix., xx. The sanctification is repeated on the second evening; and the service of the following day is similar to that of the first, save that different portions of scripture are read, among which is the book of Ruth. When the stars appear the festival is over (Mills' British Jews, part ii. chap. vi. pp. 207-210).

PEN'UEL (face of God).—1. One of the descendants of Judah who was the 'father' or founder of Gedor (1 Chron. iv. 4).—2. A Benjamite chief, one of those who dwelt in Jerusalem (viii. 25).

PEN'UEL (id.) (Gen. xxxii. 31; Judges viii. 8, 9, 17; 1 Kings xii. 25). See PENIEL.

PE'OR (clef).—1. A mountain in the territory of Moab, at the north-east end of the Dead sea (Numb. xxiii. 28).—2. Put for Baal-peor, an idol of the Moabites (xxv. 18, xxxi. 16; Josh. xxii. 17). See BAAL-PEOR.

PERA'ZIM (breaches). See BAAL-PERAZIM.

PE'RES (divided) (Dan. v. 28). See MENE.

PE'RESH (dung). A descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 16).

PE'REZ (breach) (1 Chron. xxvii. 3; Neh. xi. 4, 6). See PHAREZ.

PE'REZ-UZ'ZA, or PE'REZ-UZ'ZAH (the breach of Uzzah). A place so called, because there God burst forth on Uzzah for his sacrilege, so that he died (2 Sam. vi. 8; 1 Chron. xiii. 11).

PERFECT, PERFECTION. We find that persons are repeatedly spoken of in scripture as 'perfect'; and 'perfection' is placed before men as an attainment at which they ought to aim. It does not, however, follow that any are absolutely perfect in this life: day by day the holiest fall short of the high standard before them (1 Kings viii. 46; Prov. xx. 9; Eccles. vii. 20). The first who is said to have been 'perfect in his generations' is Noah (Gen. vi. 9) 'not perfect in the sense of sinless,' says Prof. Bush (Notes on Genesis, pp. 83, 84), 'but sincere, simple, upright, having respect to all God's commandments, and, like Caleb, following the Lord fully. Christian perfection is not absolute freedom from sin, but evangelical integrity; a perfection implying completeness of parts rather than of degrees in the renewed character; and it may be better understood by viewing it as opposed to partiality and hypocrisy, to a partial obedience and an insincere profession.' More than one original word in the New Testament is translated 'perfect'; but the interpretation given of one may well apply to others. Our Lord inculcates a duty, 'Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect' (Matt. v. 48); on which Dr. Alford very well observes: "complete" in your love of others; not one-sided or exclusive, . . . but all-embracing, and God-like. . . . No countenance is given by this verse to the ancient Pelagian or the modern heresy of perfectibility in this life. Such a sense of the words would be utterly at variance with the whole of the discourse. See especially vv. 22, 29, 32, in which the imperfections and conflicts of the Christian are fully recognized.' In Eph. iv. 12 a different Greek word is used: in 13 the idea is that of maturity. To 'make' Christ 'perfect' (Heb. ii. 10) means to make him complete, that is, to bring him to the glory purposed as the end of his humiliation. The same idea is implied in v. 9, 'brought,' says Dr. Alford, 'to his goal of learning and suffering through death.'

PERFUME (Exod. xxx. 35, 37; Prov. xxvii. 9, and elsewhere): see INCENSE, OINTMENT.

PER'GA. A town in Pamphylia, upon the river Cestrus, about sixty stadia (seven miles) from its mouth, between and on the sides of two hills, with an extensive valley in front, watered by the river, and backed by the mountains of the Taurus. It contained a celebrated temple of Artemis or Diana. Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel here; and it was here that Mark left them (Acts xiii. 13, 14, xiv. 25). There are some ruins of Perga, almost entirely Greek, sixteen miles north-east of Attalia, at a spot now called Eski-Kalesi.

PERGAMOS, or PERGAMUM. An illustrious city of Mysia on the river Caicus. It was originally but a strong hill-fortress, but became an important place under the successors of Alexander, the capital of a kingdom which the last sovereign, Attalus III. bequeathed (133 B.C.) to the Roman people. It was famous for its vast library, given by Antony to Cleopatra, and added to that of Alexandria, for the Nicephorium, a grove in which were the splendid temples of Zeus or Jupiter, of Athene or Minerva, and of Apollo, but most especially for the worship of Æsculapfus, the remains of whose magnificent shrine may still be seen. The modern name is Bergamah. To the church there one of the apocalyptic epistles was addressed (Rev. i. 11, ii. 12-17). In that epistle it is called 'Satan's seat,' respecting which there have been various conjectures; but no satisfactory explanation has yet been given. The most feasible, perhaps, is that persecution, Satan's work, even to death was already rife there. A martyr of the Pergamene church, Antipas, is mentioned; but nothing else is certainly known of him. In later days several of Pergamos gained the crown of martyrdom. See Trench, Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, 2nd. edit. pp. 113-117.

PERIDA (kernel) (Neh. vii. 57). See PERUDA.

PERIZZITES (villagers). One of the tribes described as dwelling in Palestine, to be expelled by the Israelites. Taken in conjunction with Canaanites the term seems sometimes to include all the inhabitants of the land (Gen. xiii. 7, xxxiv. 30; Judges i. 4, 5). Kalisch is disposed to believe from the signification of the word that the Perizzites were those who lived in open villages; so that the two appellations together comprise the dwellers in cities, and the dwellers in the country (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 344). Hence it is that Perizzites are named as residing in so many different parts of the country, in the mountains (Josh. xi. 3), in the wooded plains (xvii. 15), in the territories allotted to Judah and Ephraim (ibid.; Judges i. 4, 5), and near Beth-el and Shechem (Gen. xxiv. 30): comp. Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Peresiter.' Some of them were left in the time of Solomon (1 Kings ix. 20; 2 Chron. viii. 7), and perhaps even after the captivity (Ezra ix. 1).

PERJURY (1 Tim. i. 10). See OATH.

PERSECUTE, PERSECUTION. By these words we are to understand the inflicting of penalties or punishments on account of religion. Thus the disciples at Jerusalem were molested at the time of the death of Stephen (Acts viii. 1). Under the Mosaic law uniformity of worship was prescribed; and, as the Deity was in a special sense the King of the nation, idolatry was high treason, to be visited with the severest punishment (Deut. xiii.). According to statute no other kind of religion was tolerated in Palestine; and those aliens who would obtain the full privileges of Hebrew nationality must embrace the Hebrew faith (Exod. xii. 48). Foreigners were not obliged to adopt the Israelitish religion: they were to be punished for open idolatry, and gross crimes (Lev. xviii. 26, xx. 1-5), but they were to be rather encouraged than compelled to worship the true God (Numb. xv. 14).

Under the Christian dispensation those penal laws which were naturally in force under the theocracy had no place. Christians were persecuted; but they had no warrant to persecute again. Of course they had a right to remove an offending member from their body (1 Cor. v. 3-5, 13); but the notion of propagating their religion by force was entirely opposed to the spirit of the gospel (Matt. vii. 1; Luke ix. 54-56; Rom. xiv. 4; James iv. 11, 12).

PERSEPOLIS (2 Macc. ix. 2). A celebrated city of Persia, the capital of Persia proper, probably founded by Darius Hystaspis, the frequent residence of Persian monarchs, till the time of Alexander the Great, by whom it was wantonly fired. It seems in a degree to have recovered, as it was rich enough for Antiochus Epiphanes to attack and attempt to plunder it. It was some distance from the ancient capital Pasargadae; and its splendid remains are yet seen at a spot called Chel-Mindar, 'the forty pillars.'

PERSEUS (1 Macc. viii. 5). The last king of Macedon, defeated 168 B.C. by the Romans under L. Æmilius Paullus at Pydna. His kingdom then became subject to the Roman power.

PERSEVERE, PERSEVERANCE. Though the word occurs but once in the English version (Eph. vi. 18), yet the duty of perseverance, that is, of steady earnest continuance in the ways of godliness, is continually and most forcibly inculcated (Matt. x. 22, xxiv. 13; Heb. iii. 6, 14; Rev. ii. 10); and the danger of falling back is forcibly depicted (Luke ix. 62; Heb. vi. 4-8, x. 26-31, 39; 2 Pet. ii. 20-22). There is abundant reason, therefore, for the caution of 1 Cor. x. 12. The discussion of the theological question whether those who are made really God's children do persevere, or whether they can fall finally away, does not belong to such a work as the present.

PER'SIA. This name is generally applied in scripture to the wide Persian monarchy. In Ezek. xxxviii. 5, however, it appears to designate the region which may be called Persia proper; and this is separated from Media on the north by a mountain ridge: on the west it borders on Susiana (Elam), to the east on Carmania, and extends southward to the Persian gulf. It is the modern Fars or Farsistan. That portion which lies along the coast is a sandy plain hardly habitable on account of the heat and pestilential winds. In the interior are lofty mountains, a large part of the year covered with snow: still there are among these hills many well-watered valleys and plains, in a pleasant climate, and highly productive. To the north the country is wild, fitted only for shepherds and migratory tribes (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Persien'). In the larger sense Persia must be taken to comprehend the empire that extended from India to Egypt, including the wide regions between the Black sea, the Caucasus, the Caspian sea, the Persian gulf and Indian ocean, and the Arabian desert, together with parts of Europe and Africa.

The Persians (a name thought to signify 'the tigers') were a brave and active people, vain and impulsive, but truthful and simple in their habits till they came into close contact with the Medes, a people probably descended from the same stock with themselves. Their own dress had been close-fitting; but they adopted the Median flowing robes and fondness for ornament, becoming by degrees a luxurious and effeminate nation. Polygamy was practised among them. They worshipped a supreme god, Oromasdes, but believed also in other inferior deities, as Mithra, the sun, and Homa, the moon. They imagined, too, that there was an independent and very powerful principle of evil, Arimanius, or Ahriman.

But at length this simpler faith was alloyed with Magianism, the worship of fire and the other elements, a system that widely prevailed among the people of western Asia. The two contended for pre-eminence; but a kind of compromise was effected: the old creed was retained; and the rites and ceremonies of Magianism were superadded. The language of ancient Persia was near akin to the Sanscrit; the modern speech is a modification of it, as Italian is derived from Latin.

The Persians were divided into ten tribes, of which three were noble, three agricultural, and four migratory or nomadic. The Pasargadae, from whom sprung the royal Achaemenian race, were the most distinguished of the noble tribes.

Very brief notice can here be taken of Persian history, and that mainly as connected with the Jews.

In remote antiquity the nation occupied other settlements to the east of the Caspian. And it is said that a certain Achaemenes was their leader, about 700 B.C., into the country called after them. From him the line of kings noted above derived their name. All, however, is very uncertain before the reign of the great Cyrus. The Medes seem to have kept the Persian princes in vassalage; and it was not till Cyrus, son of a Persian king, headed a revolt, that Persian independence was secured. The Medes thenceforward were the dependant nation. Cyrus extended his conquests widely. The Median dominions were his. The countries bordering on India owned his sway. He conquered Lydia, and attacked and captured Babylon. This conquest had been long foretold, and the conqueror named (Isai. xlv. 28, xlv. 1-7). It was because the destinies of God's church and people were involved, that a just retribution was to be meted out to the haughty power that had enslaved them, and freedom to be proclaimed to the Jews to return to their own land. The prophecy was fulfilled; and in the first year of Cyrus' extended rule he published the remarkable edict recorded in Ezra i. 1-4. By virtue of this many Jews returned to Palestine, and began to re-build their temple. But their progress was soon stopped. Their enemies hired counsellors to oppose them, 'all the days of Cyrus king of Persia, even until the reign of Darius king of Persia' (iv. 5). To Daniel, who in the third year of Cyrus was lamenting the continued desolation of his people, this thing was revealed. 'One and twenty days,' said the divine messenger, 'the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me' (Dan. x. 13); and it was not till the end of one and twenty years that the temple of the Lord was again completed (Ezra vi. 14, 15). Cyrus died 529 B.C.: his tomb is said to be still at Murgaub, the site of the ancient capital Pasargadae. He was succeeded by his son Cambyses (most probably the Ahasuerus of Ezra iv. 6), who invaded Egypt. After him Gomates the Magian, who pretended to be Smerdis, son of Cyrus, usurped the throne. He is the Artaxerxes who forbade the re-building of the temple (7-23). He was slain after a reign of seven months; and Darius, the son of Hystaspes, succeeded. He built palaces at Persepolis and Susa (Shushan), and was the sovereign under whom the temple was completed (24, v., vi.; Hagg. i. 1; Zech. i. 1). He died 485 B.C., and left his crown to Xerxes, in all probability the Ahasuerus of Esther (see Dan. xi. 1, 2). Xerxes was assassinated 465 B.C. His son Artaxerxes Longimanus was the prince who commissioned Ezra (Ezra vii.), and to whom Nehemiah was cup-bearer (Neh. ii. 1). He reigned forty years. Other kings succeeded; the only one of whom that is mentioned in scripture is Darius Codomannus (xii. 22): he was the last; his empire being overthrown by Alexander the Great (Dan. viii. 5-8, 21, 22, xi. 3, 4). In later ages the Persian monarchy revived; and Persia is still an important Asiatic power.

PER'SIANS (Esth. i. 19; Dan. v. 28, vi. 8, 12, 15, 28). The inhabitants of Persia.

PER'SIS (perhaps of Persian origin). A Christian female at Rome, whom St. Paul salutes and speaks of as having laboured much in the Lord (Rom. xvi. 12).

PERU'DA (kernel). One of Solomon's servants, whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 55). He is also called Perida (Neh. vii. 57).

PESTILENCE (Exod. v. 3; 2 Sam. xxiv. 13; Psal. xci. 3; Hab. iii. 5). See PLAGUE.

PESTILS (2 Chron. xxiv. 14, marg.). Pests. But the version of the text is preferable.

PE'TER (rock, stone). One of the foremost of the twelve apostles. Originally called Simon, he was the son of Jona, and a resident at Bethsaida. His brother Andrew, being a disciple of John the Baptist, was by John directed to Jesus; and speedily he prevailed on Simon to accompany him to one who he felt convinced was the predicted Messiah. Our Lord kindly received the newcomer, and gave him the name of Cephas, the Aramaic equivalent to the Greek Peter (John i. 35-42). This name was intended to be a perpetual memorial to him who bore it. It implied the steadiness with which he would be enabled, in spite of a naturally-impulsive and therefore vacillating character, to hold the faith he was now embracing. It was his personal relation to Christ that was thereby signified, not the relation in which he stood or was to stand (except through Christ) to the church (see Wieseler, Chronol. des Apost. Zeitalt., p. 581).

Peter and Andrew were fishermen, not altogether without property, but certainly not of the class of the rich and great. They were not at first required to be in close attendance on their Master, and they still pursued their ordinary calling. After the conclusion of his early Judean ministry, Jesus, walking by the sea of Galilee, saw them so employed. He then desired them to follow him, promising to make them 'fishers of men.' A miraculous draught of fish was given at the same time, which so impressed Peter with a sense of the divine power of Jesus, that he felt himself unworthy to stand in that holy Presence. But, re-assured by the Lord's kind words, both he and Andrew, with their partners John and James, the sons of Zebedee, left all—as much to them as the far larger all of the rich man can be to him, and followed Christ (Matt. iv. 18-22; Mark i. 16-28, x. 28; Luke v. 1-11). This occurred near Capernaum, where the brothers had then a house; and there Jesus healed Peter's mother-in-law of a fever (Matt. viii. 14, 15; Mark i. 29-31; Luke iv. 38, 39). It was some time afterwards when the Lord nominated the twelve apostles. Of these Peter is always placed first. From his age or from his zealous temper he seems to have had precedence; but no supremacy or authority over the rest was thereby given him (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 16; Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13: see APOSTLE).

It is not necessary to trace in minute and chronological detail the various incidents of Peter's life while personally attending the Lord. He was always foremost to speak and to put questions, and he with James and John formed the choice highly-favoured band who witnessed the more remarkable manifestations of Christ's power and dignity (e.g. Matt. xvii. 1, 2; Mark v. 37, 40, 41). But there are some events which must be somewhat more particularly noticed. Such are Peter's confession of Christ, his behaviour at the passion, the address of Christ to him after the resurrection, with the question of his residence at Rome.

Jesus had demanded of his disciples who in their judgment he was. It was as the mouth-piece of the whole that Peter replied, 'Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God' (Matt. xvi. 16). It is elsewhere shown (see SON OF GOD) that the title Peter then gave his Master implied that he believed him to be a Divine Person. Peter might not, perhaps, apprehend as yet the full significance of this; but he had reached a belief higher than the current notions of the age: he had some glimpse of the cardinal truth to be in time fully proved, though not to be proclaimed just yet, that Jesus was the only-begotten of the Father. Hence the peculiar force of our Lord's reply, 'Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father, which is in heaven' (17). It was heavenly teaching, no doubt, which imparted to him such a mystery. The succeeding words of Christ (18, 19) are very remarkable, and have provoked keen controversy.

Various expositions have been given of the declaration, 'Thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build my church;' but two only need be noticed here. It is maintained by some that Peter was the rock on which the church was to be built; and that the promise was fulfilled when on the day of pentecost the first preached Jesus the crucified, 'both Lord and Christ' (Acts ii. 36), exercising the authority of the keys which had been entrusted to him, and opening to the people the door of salvation by faith in the Saviour. There is a propriety, it is readily admitted, in this interpretation; and it agrees well with other passages of scripture in which apostles are spoken of as foundations of the church (Eph. ii. 20; Rev. xxi. 14). If this interpretation be admitted, it gives no countenance to any supremacy of Peter, still less to the claim of such supremacy as descending in a single line of bishops, presumed successors of Peter in a particular see. For this apostle spoke in the name and with the accordance of his fellows, to whom in general the question had been addressed: they, equally with him, are termed foundations; and to them, too, not derived through Peter, the power of the keys was as largely given (John xx. 21-23).

But there is an interpretation of the words in question perhaps more satisfactory. Putting aside as scarcely to be defended the view that Christ in saying 'upon this rock' pointed to or meant himself in contrast with Peter, we may advert to the peculiar character, above-noticed, of Peter's confession. It was the announcement of the most glorious truth of the gospel. Made in good faith, as revealed by the heavenly Father to the apostle, it showed that he was upon the rock. He was now Peter indeed, exhibiting that personal characteristic in the view of which Christ had long before given him the name. And well, therefore, on this might the Lord say, 'Thou art Peter,' the firm maintainer of fundamental truth; and on this rock, this immutable truth, a church should be built, against which the gates of hell could not prevail. It was the dignity of the Lord's person which gave effect to his work, and security to those that believed in him. Had he been merely a man, the gates of the unseen world would not have unclosed at his bidding: it was because he was the Son of God that, as Peter himself proclaimed on the day of pentecost, 'it was not possible that he should be holden of' death (Acts ii. 24). It was rather, then, from this great ground-dog-trine that the church grew, than that it rested on Peter as a foundation. This view is adopted by a large number of able expositors. Bishop Jewel adopts it; see Jewel's works, Park. Soc. edit., vol. i, p. 340; where authorities are produced from ancient authors.

Passing strange it was to Peter, after making the acknowledgment which was so approved, to hear Christ speak of approaching degradation, suffering, and death. All this was in his view simply impossible; and therefore we are told he hastily exclaimed, 'This shall not be unto thee.' His exclamation drew down on him a severe rebuke (Matt. xvi. 21-23). We may conceive the astonished perplexity into which he must have been thrown; and we have therein a clue to some of the apostle's subsequent inconsistencies. The stronger his faith in his Master's dignity, the less could he imagine that drear eclipse which was to come upon the Sun of righteousness; and it was this very faith, when afterwards, as it seemed, so utterly deceived, that made him deny Christ. Perhaps, had his expectations been less high, he might have held on through those last doleful hours.

We may see the working of Peter's mind in his various observations and questions. Thus on the mount of transfiguration he proposed to pitch tabernacles, the headquarters of the splendid kingdom he supposed just about to be inaugurated (xvii. 4). Then he would not at first allow his Master to demean himself by washing his feet (John xlii. 8). His unquiet curiosity about the traitor, and his puzzled enquiries, 'Whither goest thou?' and 'Lord, why cannot I follow thee now?' (23, 24, 36, 37) indicate what was passing within. He felt that a crisis was at hand. And, when the Lord spoke of buying a sword (Luke xxii. 36), then doubtless his hopes were high; and, as the band of officers approached, the long period of suspense was over—he was the first to strike a blow. What cared he now for the authority of the priests! his Master would presently blaze forth in the refulgence of divine might, and the rulers of the world must sink before him. Then it was when the meek Victim made no resistance, and was actually led off a prisoner—then came that vast revulsion, and Peter seemed to wake from a flattering dream: So, then, it has been all a delusion! instead of wielding heavenly power, Jesus cannot deliver himself from a party of peace-officers. I have been somehow deceived. It was this, the crushing of all his high-raised hopes, the disappointment of his faith, and not mere cowardice that made Peter shrink. He thought he had no longer any cause to contend for. And, though curiosity and lingering affection for the defeated one carried him to see the end, yet it was no more as a disciple, but just as a spectator, that he pressed into the high priest's palace. He did not belong to Jesus: he could have nothing to do with a man who had trifled with his honest attachment. Why should he involve himself in danger for such a one? Hence the repeated denials, not caused by fear alone, but by mortified affection, the strength of his denials corresponding to the greatness of his former expectations. But, when the Lord turned and looked upon him, then he felt it was with an omniscient eye. He who stood to be judged could read his heart, and was pointing to his prophetic word just then fulfilled. And the apostle's mind misgave him. Though a dark cloud hung over the Son of man, he might be after all the Master and the Lord; and in an agony of shame, and self-upbraiding, and love, and sorrow—for all that has been said does not excuse, it but explains his conduct—Peter went out and wept bitterly.

The three denials are differently recorded by the different evangelists. But, if all the details are laid together, and it is borne in mind that not merely three definite expressions, but a torrent of hasty words were uttered on both sides, the independent narratives will be found by no means contradictory. As to the first denial, all is plain. Peter was in the hall or court of the palace, warming himself by the fire, when he was taxed by the portress, who came up to him, with being of Jesus' company. He denied, and retreated from the fire to the porch or vestibule; and the cock crew; but the anxious apostle did not heed it. Next he was lingering in the porch; but his movements had attracted notice: so several persons charged him, the portress again (now probably returned to the door), another maid, a male servant, according to the first three evangelists. We should naturally expect this: several in such a group would be sure to speak at once; and this is just what St. John, who was present, reports, 'they said.' Then as to the third denial a while after: Peter perhaps, as thinking the danger over, had returned to the fire; but his provincial accent betrayed him to the bystanders as a Galilean; and a kinsman of Malchus, whose ear he had cut off, identified him as one of those he had seen with Jesus in the garden. The words of his reply are differently reported; but, as St. Matthew tells us he 'began to curse and to swear,' it is obvious that he did not just utter a single sentence, but denied with repeated asseverations. It was then that the cock crew again; and the Lord cast his sad warning look upon Peter (Matt. xxvi. 69-75; Mark xiv. 66-72; Luke xxii. 54-62; John xviii. 15-27). A fuller explanation may be seen in the Journal of Sac. Lit., April, 1854, pp. 84-92; Birks' Horæ Evang., book iii. chap. ii. pp. 415-417; Horne's Intro., edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 478, 479.

Of St. Peter at the crucifixion, and during the following day, we read nothing. On the resurrection morning he ran with John to the sepulchre (John xx. 2-10); and the Lord in the course of that day vouchsafed to appear to him (Luke xxiv. 34; 1 Cor. xv. 5); and with the rest of the disciples he repeatedly saw the risen Saviour. One occasion was when he had returned to his old occupation of fishing on the sea of Galilee; and Jesus questioned him of his love to him, and in touching terms gave him charge to feed his sheep, and told him that he should follow him to death (John xxi.). Peter's mind was clear enough then: he saw it all, that Jesus was alive, the Son of God for evermore.

After the ascension we find him taking his old place as spokesman of the apostles.

He proposed the election of another in the place of Judas (Acts 1. 15-25): he specially addressed the multitude that crowded round the apostles on the day of pentecost (ii. 14-40), and was indeed the central figure of the first part of the Acts of the Apostles, which describes the planting and extension of the church among the Jews by his ministry. The experience he had gained he turned to profit. He had learned his own weakness, and his Master's power; and it was one of the marvels of the age, a problem not to be solved unless the gospel doctrine were true, that the impulsive, vacillating, inquisitive fisherman, in six or seven short weeks, was so changed in character and deportment, into the grave and learned teacher, that, with logical argument and masterly application of the ancient scriptures, he boldly confronted and confounded the leading councillors and profound doctors of the nation (iii. 12-26, iv. 1-20, v. 29-42).

The rest of Peter's history, as we find it in scripture, can be but lightly sketched. He was incessantly engaged in preaching Christ; and many miracles were wrought by his hand. When Samaria had received the gospel, he was sent thither with John, where he rebuked Simon Magus; and he passed through various other districts, the Lord blessing his labours (viii. 14-25, ix. 32-43). There was then a special crisis of the church. God had determined, according to ancient prophecy, to make the Gentiles fellow-heirs with Israel of the promise. And by means of Peter the door should be set open. But the apostles did not as yet understand the largeness of Messiah's kingdom. And Peter must be taught by a symbolical vision that he was not to call anything common or unclean. Accordingly he was instructed to go with the messengers of Cornelius, the devout centurion; and while he was speaking to him and his company the Holy Ghost fell upon them. Then they were of course admitted to Christian baptism. But the church at Jerusalem at first censured Peter for what he had done; and, when he had recounted the matter, in utter wonder they exclaimed, 'Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life' (x., xi. 1-18). Peter was afterwards imprisoned by Herod Agrippa, and the night before his intended execution miraculously delivered in answer to the prayers of the church (xii. 1-17). He was also subsequently present at a council of apostles and elders (xv. 7-11).

We read no more of Peter in the Acts. A few scattered hints of him may be gleaned from the epistles (to be noticed hereafter). For the rest of his life we are left to tradition. Ecclesiastical story, however, tells us that he left Jerusalem early, founded and presided over the church at Antioch; that subsequently he went to Rome, where he once more met and confounded Simon Magus; and that he was bishop many years of the imperial city. He visited the east again, and planted many churches in the west; and at length he was martyred with Paul, at Rome, under Nero, being crucified with his head downwards.

That he was martyred we may be sure, and by the same kind of death as his Lord suffered (John xxi. 18, 19). That this occurred at Rome is highly probable. Several of the early writers, such as Tertullian, Dionysius of Corinth, Caius the Roman presbyter, and others, report it; some of them mentioning memorials of the fact which they say were existing in their times. And, though some of these authors were credulous, and their statements not always to be relied on, yet, as Wieseler well remarks, if Peter had suffered in any other city, we may feel certain that the church of that city would have claimed honour as the scene of the martyrdom of so eminent an apostle (see Chronol. des Apost. Zeitalt., pp. 568-570).

But a long residence at Antioch or Rome cannot be made to fit in with the New Testament accounts of Peter. Neither can he have been the founder of the churches there. For Paul, three years after his conversion, found Peter at Jerusalem (Gal. i. 18: comp. Acts ix. 26-28). Somewhat later, when tidings came of the success of the gospel at Antioch, not Peter but Barnabas was sent thither, who soon associated Paul with him; and, when, after a year's sojourn there, the two went to Jerusalem, there was Peter; for it was just at the time of Herod's rage against the disciples (xi. 19-30, xii. 1). Again, fourteen years after Paul's conversion he was at Jerusalem with Barnabas (Gal. ii. 1). This must have been at the time of the council (Acts xv. 2-4); at which Peter was present, though, it may be observed, he did not preside. It was at this meeting that James, Peter, and John agreed to direct their ministrations chiefly to the Jews; while Paul and Barnabas went to the heathen (Gal. ii. 7-9). It is inconceivable that Peter would just after betake himself to Rome, where the church was for a long time almost exclusively Gentile; for, on Paul's subsequent arrival there, the Jews seem scarcely to have heard the gospel (Acts xxviii. 17-29). Besides, soon after the council, Peter must have gone to Antioch (Gal. ii. 11-13), probably at the time marked in Acts xv. 35, before Paul and Barnabas separated. Then, further, when Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, on his way to Jerusalem, lodging with Gaius at Corinth (Rom. xv. 25, xvi. 23: comp. Acts xx. 2, 3; 1 Cor. i. 14), he does not name Peter to them. Years later, when Paul was carried a prisoner thither, there is no mention of welcome from Peter. Nor is there any reference to Peter in any letters written from Rome. Certainly too much stress ought not to be laid upon silence; but from Peter's own epistle (1 Pet. v. 13) the probability is that he had not at that time quitted the east. And how could Paul at a still later period have spoken as he did (2 Tim. iv. 6, 16, 17), had Peter been at hand?

The conclusion then is a probable one that, though Peter suffered at Rome near upon the time of Paul's martyrdom, in the Neronian persecution, yet it could not have been till at or after the close of Paul's life that Peter reached the metropolis. The date of his martyrdom is variously placed; possibly it was about 67 or 68 A.D.

PETER, THE EPISTLES OF. There are two epistles in the canon of scripture which bear the name of St. Peter.

Of the genuineness of the first there has scarcely ever been a doubt. The early testimonies to it are numerous and decisive. Polycarp and Papias cite it. Irenaeus quotes it, expressly naming Peter as the author; also Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Origen. And, though not introduced into the Muratorian canon, which when it speaks of Peter is confused and obscure, it appears in every other ancient catalogue (see Westcott, Canon of the New Test., app. D. pp. 565-584). It is in the early Peshito Syriac version; and in short so conclusive is the proof that few have ever questioned it save some modern critics, whose arguments, such as they are, have been disposed of by Dr. Alford, Proleg., sect. i. vi.

The apostle writes to 'the strangers (i.e. pilgrims on earth, comp. 1 Pet. ii. 11) scattered (i.e. of the dispersion) throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia.' From the mention of the dispersion we may probably conclude that, as he regarded Jerusalem still as the central point of holy worship, that city was not yet destroyed (see Wieseler, Chronol. des Apost. Zeitalt., pp. 559-563). Still it must not be supposed that St. Peter was writing only to Jews: various passages (e. g., 1 Pet. i. 14, 18, ii. 9, 10, iii. 6, iv. 3) are applicable mainly to those who had been heathens but were now converted to the faith of Christ. And then the churches generally in the provinces which Peter names had been planted by St. Paul, who had ever instructed them that all, both Jews and Gentiles, were one in Christ (Gal. vi. 15; Eph. ii. 14-18, iii. 6, iv. 3-6). Peter, writing to these communities with the purpose of confirming them in the doctrine they had previously learned, would never, we may be sure, pick out, so to speak, the Jewish believers from the Gentiles, and direct his counsels to them apart from their brethren.

The place from which this epistle was written was 'Babylon' (1 Pet. v. 13), whether Babylon literally or Babylon symbolically (that is, Rome) has been questioned. Other conjectures—as that it was an Egyptian city—are not worth notice. Now Rome is called Babylon only in the poetic and highly-symbolical book of the Revelation (e.g., Rev. xvii. 5, 18). It is not likely that it would be so termed in a prose matter-of-fact epistle, where other places or countries have their ordinary names. Besides, the order in which (1 Pet. i. 1) those countries are ranked is that which would naturally occur to one writing on the banks of the Euphrates, ranging generally from north-east to south and west; while it would be unsuitable to one sojourning in Italy. It was in the highest degree probable, seeing that Judea and Babylonia were in close intercourse, and many Jews had settled in the last-named country (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xv. 3, §1), that the apostle of the circumcision would carry the gospel thither. And certain causes which had tended to unsettle the Jews there—as a persecution by Caligula, and a plague—had by this time passed away. It will be observed that 'church' is supplied in our version: some have imagined that rather Peter's wife who used to travel with him (1 Cor. ix. 5) is intended. But we may safely dismiss such a conjecture, which would render it very difficult to account for the words 'in Babylon' being introduced at all.

We can with much probability approximate to the time when this letter was written. The following notes may be laid together. Jerusalem, as already observed, was still standing. And Silas (Silvanus) and Mark were with the apostle (1 Pet. v. 12, 13). Now Silas was St. Paul's companion, and did not leave him till he quitted Corinth (Acts xviii. 5, 18; 2 Cor. i. 19). It was after that date, then, that Silas joined Peter. Again, Mark was in Rome with Paul when the epistle to the Colossians was written, in which there is an intimation that Mark would visit Asia (Col. iv. 10), while at a later date Paul desires that he may return to him in Rome (2 Tim. iv. 11). It is very likely that it was in the interval that he was with Peter. Still further, while Paul was at large, Peter would hardly have violated the compact of Gal. ii. 7-9. But, if Paul was in prison, unable to remedy the evils growing in the churches he had founded and might be said to govern, Peter, who probably had seen the epistles Paul wrote out of his Roman prison, might readily feel himself bound to confirm those churches in the faith. We may not unfairly conclude that Mark, having visited the Asiatic churches soon after the epistle to the Colossians was written, carried the news of their condition to Peter, and that this apostle under the guidance of the divine Spirit wrote to them by Silas, charging them to continue in that true faith in which they had been grounded (1 Pet. v. 12). The expressions in regard to persecution do not require us to bring the date down to the time of that of Nero; for they imply rather trial impending than actually present (ii. 12, iii. 13), and no greater amount of opposition than Christ's disciples had always had to meet. Besides, it is not certain that the Neronian persecution extended to the Asiatic provinces. The probable inference from all this is that the epistle may be dated 62 or 63 A.D.

The purport of the apostle's writing is indicated in the verse just referred to (v. 12). Now the 'true grace' wherein they stood, since we have no proof that Peter had himself visited these churches, must necessarily have been that body of doctrine which had been delivered to them by Paul and his associates. Keeping this in mind, and seeing that the strain of Peter's admonition was to fortify and encourage the disciples in the prospect of that more desperate struggle into which they were likely to be brought with the rulers of the world, we shall see that the various parts group well round the central design. St. Peter did not mean to teach elementary truth, but rather, recognizing the fundamental doctrines of the gospel which St. Paul had inculcated, to supplement the last-named apostle's teaching. He could do this with the more effect as the apostle of the circumcision.

the one especially looked up to by those who imagined that Paul was inclined to undervalue the authority of the law. Peter thus strengthens his brethren (Luke xxii. 32). His address is very earnest; his mind ever dwelling on his Master, his labours and sufferings, and his expected manifestation to the joy of his now-struggling people. All is in accordance with what we know of Peter's character, and resembles very strikingly his addresses as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles. It has been already said that Peter must have been acquainted with St. Paul's epistles: he adopts their form of doctrine, and often re-produces their sentiments; so that tables have been constructed to exhibit the similarity by a comparison of passages. Similar coincidences have been pointed out between this epistle and those of St. James and St. John (De Wette, Einleit. in N.T., § 172; Alford, Proleg., sect. vi.). Thus one mind pervades the whole scripture, one Spirit 'dividing to every man severally as he will' (1 Cor. xii. 11).

It is not easy to arrange this letter into distinct parts; so many of the admonitions running into each other. The following is Bengel's distribution of it: it will illustrate the composition and connection as well as any:—

I. The inscription (1 Pet. i. 1, 2).

II. The stirring up of a pure mind. He stirs up the elect,

(a) As begotten again of God. Here he mentions both the benefits of God to the faithful, and the obligations of the faithful towards God: these he interweaves and presses by three urgent considerations, to which force is added from the mystery of Christ:— (A). God hath begotten again to a lively hope, to an inheritance of glory and salvation; therefore hope to the end (3-13). (B). As obedient children yield forth the fruit of faith to your holy Father (14-21). (C). Purified by the Spirit love with a pure heart blamelessly (22—ii. 10).

(b) As strangers in the world they must abstain from fleshly lusts (11): (A). With an honest conversation (12); i. particularly (1) subjects (13-17), (2) servants after Christ's example (18-25), (3) wives (iii. 1-6), (4) husbands (7); ii. generally all (8-15): (B) by a good profession; i. by an answer for the truth and the avoidance of evil association (15—iv. 6). (The whole career of Christ from his passion to his death adds force to this); ii. by virtues and the good stewardship of God's gifts (7-11).

(c) As participators of future glory they must endure afflictions. This all must do, (1) In the general position of Christians (12-19), (2) In the individual position of each (v. 1-11).

III. Conclusion (12-14).

The second epistle of St. Peter has perhaps less amount of ancient testimony than any other of the books in the sacred canon. And it is freely acknowledged by early writers that its authority was doubted. Still there are probable references to it in Justin Martyr, Theophilus of Antioch, and Irenæus. Origen and Firmilian distinctly mention or allude to it; and in the fourth century after Christ it was generally received, and thenceforward appears in the catalogues of canonical books. And we are bound in fairness to believe, as the fathers of that time were aware that this epistle had been objected to, that they did not receive it without satisfying themselves, by such evidence as they could command, that the objections were untenable. Olshausen has very carefully and temperately examined the whole question. He is quite ready to give up every testimony prior to that of Origen. But he reminds us of the very early classification of various books of the New Testament—the Gospels—the Pauline epistles—the epistles called catholic; which gradually coalescing formed with the Acts and the Apocalypse a single volume. So that, if not individually named, it by no means follows that this was unknown or rejected. And he shows that it may reasonably be supposed to have been included in the collection of catholic epistles. Even those who mention the objections to it received it themselves. And the objections had no definite ground: they arose rather from men's speculations about the contents. Olshausen's deliberate conclusion, therefore, is—1. That our epistle, as far as we can ascertain from history, was used by the church, and was generally read, along with the other catholic epistles: 2. There were those who denied that Peter was the author of this epistle, but they were influenced particularly by critical and, perhaps, by doctrinal reasons: 3. That there were historical considerations which led them to assail our epistle is not probable; certainly it cannot be demonstrated. History, then, avails scarcely anything in overthrowing the authority of our epistle (Integr. and Authent. of Second Epistle of Peter, transl'd. in Amer. Bibl. Repos., July 1836, pp. 123-131).

The objections, then, are of an internal character; and they have been urged both from the contents of this epistle considered by itself, and also from a comparison of it with the first, an undoubted production of St. Peter's pen.

It is of course impossible even to touch on all the arguments taken from the epistle itself: one or two may just be indicated. Thus it is said that too great anxiety is shown by the writer to exhibit himself as the apostle, giving thereby ground for suspicion that he only personates St. Peter (2 Pet. i. 13-18). The reply is that as he was gravely censuring false teachers there was good reason why Peter should bring himself prominently forward. St. Paul under similar circumstances frequently does the same. Again, it is urged that he refers to Paul's epistles as forming part of the recognized scriptures (iii. 15, 16). Dr. Alford (Proleg., sect. iv.) allows considerable weight to this argument, and thinks that we must infer that Peter's life was more extended than is usually supposed. But Olshausen considers 'the other scriptures' as simply designating the other epistles of Paul: 'The unstable pervert, not unrequently, all the epistles of Paul, those sent to you as well as those sent to others' (ubi supr., Oct. 1836, pp. 355-357). Schott, denying also that the words imply that there was then any recognized complete collection of St. Paul's epistles, reminds us that each apostolic writing was at once acknowledged by those to whom it came as the word of God (Der Zweite Brief Petri u.s.w. erklärt, p. 144).

Schott also disposes of the argument taken from the alleged difference between the first and second epistles in regard to subject, and shows how by the working of the evil leaven in the church there necessarily would be a difference; each letter being suitable to the circumstances of the time when it was penned. He ridicules the idea that in the short compass of sixty-one verses the distinctive characteristics of the first epistle must re-appear, and maintains that with equal wisdom the epistles to the Romans and to the Ephesians might be supposed not to be from the same pen; for, though the letter to the Romans is a regular exposition of Pauline doctrine, that idea of the church which is so prominent in that to the Ephesians does not once appear (ibid., pp. 167-174).

With regard to style and phraseology much variation has been imagined between the two epistles; so that it has been confidently affirmed that the same man could not have expressed himself so very differently. And some critics have suggested that, as Peter was ignorant of Greek, he dictated what he had to say in Aramaic, and that his mind was expressed in Greek in the first letter perhaps by Silas, in the second by Mark. But really to suppose the apostle ignorant of Greek is a monstrous assumption; all probabilities telling the other way. Schott believes that with his first epistle Peter took especial pains in regard to his expressions, as writing to those whom he had not visited. Be this as it may, the leading topics of the second were peculiar: there was a certain influence (to be hereafter more particularly mentioned) which would make itself felt in his style; and some time, we may reasonably suppose, elapsed between the two letters (comp. Schott, pp. 175-188). And we have to lay over-against objections of the kind just now considered the fact that the writer distinctly claims to be the apostle Peter. This is not like a disquisition respecting the authorship of the book of Job, which holds its place, whoever the penman might be. Hence if not Peter's writing we have an impudent forgery, and the falsest of teachers with awful gravity warning the church against false teachers. Is any man, putting all the circumstances together, prepared to take this frightful alternative?

Of the time and place of writing nothing certain can be said. That it was penned not long before the apostle's death is evident; but where he was at the time we can only conjecture.

This epistle would seem to have been addressed to the same persons to whom the former was written, being intended as a kind of supplement to that (2 Pet. iii. 1), with the purpose of stirring up and confirming in the knowledge of the truth, with special reference to certain dangerous errors in both doctrine and practice, which were even then developing themselves, and which would spread and strengthen to the last days. For surely no pen could more accurately describe those whom we now behold, whose great principle is that 'all things continue as they were,' and who scorn the notion of the great God ever coming to touch the orderly mechanism of the universe (3, 4).

The following is Bengel's distribution of this epistle:—

I. The inscription (i. 1, 2).

II. The repeated stirring up of a pure mind; in which—1. He exhorts those who are partakers of faith, that, increased with divine gifts, they should show forth all zeal for growth in grace and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ (3-11).—2. He adds motives; (a) from the constancy of true teachers (12-21); (b) from the evil of false teachers (ii. 1-22).—3. He warns against scoffers; (a) confuting their error (iii. 1-9), (b) describing the last day, with fitting exhortations (10-14).

III. Conclusion; in which—1. He declares his accordance with Paul (15, 16).—2. And repeats the sum of his epistle (17-18).

There is one more topic in respect to this letter, which must be briefly touched—and that is its relation to the epistle of St. Jude. It is evident that the later writer must have been cognizant of what the earlier had said; but it is a question which is the earlier. Gausson (Canon of Holy Scripture, transl., part 1. book iv. chap. 3, pp. 368-371), and Schott (ubi supr., pp. 265-277), believe that Peter wrote first, and regard Jude's work as one of the testimonies to the authority of the second of Peter. It is, however, more generally supposed that Jude is prior to the second of Peter. In proof of which it may be said that the corruption described seems to have reached a greater development in Peter than in Jude; the false disciples occupying in the first-named the teachers' chair, while no evidence of this appears in the other. It is urged, indeed, that Peter's observations are more compressed than those of Jude; so that the latter has illustrated them. But, perhaps, such an argument may tell more forcibly the other way; and Peter, if he had not known that Jude's letter was in the hands of the church, might have been more explicit. Dr. Alford, comparing Jude 11 with 2 Pet. ii. 15, 16, where Peter mentions of Old Testament false prophets only Balaam, and Jude names others, pertinently asks, 'Can any one persuade us that in the impetuous whirlwind of St. Jude's invective he adopted and abridged the example furnished by St. Peter, prefixing and adding those of Cain and Korah?' (Proleg., sect. iii.). As to the fact of one sacred writer borrowing from another, we have examples enough in the Old Testament; where a prophecy delivered by a seer in earlier times is subsequently re-produced by another. And Peter, it has been seen in his first epistle, has taken a tinge of colouring from St. Paul: there can, therefore, be no valid objection to the belief that, divinely guided, he adopted something of what Jude had said, and that his style was hence somewhat influenced.

Of commentaries on St. Peter's writings, besides those already referred to, that by archbp. Leighton on the first epistle, frequently re-printed, must be specially recommended. Dr. John Brown's Expos. Discourses on 1st Epistle of Peter, 1848-1849, may also be mentioned.

PETHAHIAH (whom Jehovah sets free).

—1. A chief of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 16). —2. A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 23). It was perhaps the same who took part in a solemn service of confession and praise (Neh. ix. 5). —3. A descendant of Judah, who held some office at the Persian court on behalf of his countrymen (xl. 24).

PETHOR (possibly a table). A city, as usually supposed, of Mesopotamia, more probably in the neighbourhood of Bashan: see Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp. 384-386: it was the residence of Balaam (Numb. xxii. 5; Deut. xxiii. 4).

PETHUEL (vision of God, or possibly for Methuel, man of God). The father of the prophet Joel (Joel i. 1).

PETRA (rock). A very celebrated city in the land of Edom, the capital of the Nabathæan Arabs. Strabo (lib. xvi. cap. iv. 779) and Pliny (lib. vi. cap. 32) describe it. Petra lay in the route of the caravan-traffic through Arabia to the Elanitic gulf of the Red sea. The name occurs only in Isai. xvi. 1, marg.: in the text we have Sela, a word of like signification. See SELA.

PEULTHAI (wages of Jehovah). One of the Levite porters (1 Chron. xxvi. 5).

PHAATH-MOAB (1 Esdr. v. 11). Pahath-moab (Ezra ii. 6).

PHACARETH (1 Esdr. v. 34). Pochereth (Ezra ii. 57).

PHASUR (1 Esdr. ix. 22). Pashur (Ezra x. 22).

PHALDAIUS (1 Esdr. ix. 44). Pedaiiah (Neh. viii. 4).

PHALEAS (1 Esdr. v. 29). Padon (Ezra ii. 44).

PHALEC (Luke iii. 35). Peleg.

PHALU (Gen. xlv. 9). See FALLU.

PHALTI (deliverance of Jehovah). A person to whom David's wife, Michal, was given (1 Sam. xxv. 44). He is also called PHALTIEL (deliverance of God) (2 Sam. iii. 15).

PHANUEL (face or vision of God). An Asherite, father of the prophetess Anna (Luke ii. 36).

PHARACIM (1 Esdr. v. 31).

PHARAOH (the sun). The ordinary title by which the Egyptian kings are known in scripture. It was at one time believed that this word signified king: but later researches seem to have conclusively established the fact that, as the monarch was supposed to represent the sun-god, he therefore bore the name of the sun (Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. ii. p. 293); the Pharaoh of the Hebrew bible corresponding to

P-RA, or PH-RA in hieroglyphics. The deity Re or Ra was the sun.

Certain kings (as Shishak, So, Tirhakah, and Zerah) of Egypt or Ethiopia do not bear the title Pharaoh: for some account of them reference must be made to the articles under their respective names. And two of the later sovereigns have each a name added to the title, Pharaoh-necho, and Pharaoh-hophra. To all the rest the appellation Pharaoh is given with no mark of distinction. It is therefore very difficult to identify these different princes, more especially as, besides the uncertainty of Egyptian dynasties or regal lines, the events in Hebrew history contemporary with particular Pharaohs are placed at very different dates by different chronologers. Thus, according to the common Usserian reckoning, the call of Abraham was 1921 B.C. But, if that call occurred 2084 B.C., as some suppose, we should have to seek for another Pharaoh as the monarch whom Abraham found reigning when he visited Egypt. For special investigation, then, the reader must be referred to those who have written at length on Egyptian chronology and history. It will be more in unison with the general character of this book to give brief accounts, so far as we have them in scripture, of the successive Pharaohs there mentioned, and to add, if they have been made on probable grounds, the identification, of these sovereigns as proposed by the best authorities:—

1. The first Egyptian king of whom we find a notice was the one who reigned when Abram went to sojourn in his land on account of a famine in Canaan (Gen. xii. 10-20). This prince appears to have acted uprightly. He was at first deceived by the representation that Sarai was Abram's sister, and took her into his house; but when he knew the truth he restored her to her husband, with a very proper reproof for the deception practised, and then dismissed the patriarch with substantial gifts. Some have imagined that this Pharaoh was the Salatis of Manetho, head of the fifteenth dynasty of shepherd kings. By others he is called Osirtesen I., or Sesortasen I.; while Kalisch, among a variety of conflicting opinions, thinks it useless to attempt fixing upon any particular monarch (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 341). It was evidently one who reigned in Lower Egypt.

2. The next Pharaoh mentioned is he who advanced Joseph and received the blessing of Jacob. His reign must have been of considerable length; for there is no note of any change of person from the time when the chief butler and baker were committed to prison till the death of Jacob; and the interval was fully twenty-eight years. This king exercised great but not quite despotic power. He imprisoned or released his great officers at his will, yet he consulted his nobles before he placed Joseph in his high position, and he observed the custom of the country in leaving untouched the inheritance of the priestly caste, while he got possession of the lands of the other proprietors (Gen. xl. xlv., xlvii., l.). It has been imagined that this monarch also was one of the shepherd kings. Mr. Palmer supposes him to have been Apophis, who reigned sixty-one years in lower Egypt, and in his fortieth year, the third of the famine, reduced the king of the Thebaid to vassalage (Egypt. Chronicles, vol. ii. p. 897). Others, with less probability, would identify him with Sesortasen III., celebrated under the name of Sesostris.

3. The Pharaoh that knew not Joseph (Exod. i. 8-22), and endeavoured to check the growth of the Israelites whom he had reduced to bondage, was perhaps a native Egyptian. It was the daughter of this inhuman prince who rescued and adopted Moses. Mr. Palmer (ubi supra), would identify this Pharaoh with Amosis the first of the eighteenth dynasty, who reigned about twenty-four years. Of the princess his daughter nothing certain is known beyond what is recorded in scripture. Some have supposed her to be Hatasu (afterwards called Numt Amun), sister and wife of Thothmes II.

4. If Amosis was the Pharaoh just mentioned, then, as his reign was not a long one, the one from whom Moses fled (Exod. ii. 15) must have been one of his successors. Mr. Palmer (p. 898) places the event in the first year of Hatasu with Thothmes II. It is reasonable to believe that Moses might be incited to attempt the deliverance of his brethren on a change of sovereigns.

5. Of all that bore the title the Pharaoh of the exodus has left the most frightful history. Boldly questioning the right of Jehovah to interfere with him, he held out as long as possible against the evidence of miracle and judgment. His very magicians acknowledged that there was a power at work superior to theirs: his courtiers remonstrated that Egypt was being destroyed. Yet the obstinate king would only yield by degrees, and retracted his concessions as soon as the plagues which terrified him were removed. Compelled to submit by the last fearful stroke of the death of the first-born, when the loud wail of bitter grief resounded at midnight through the whole land, from the palace equally as from the prison, this king soon gathered heart again, pursued the retreating tribes, and lost all his army in the depths of the Red sea (Exod. vii.-xii.). It has been questioned whether Pharaoh himself perished in the last catastrophe. In Exodus this is not distinctly stated; but elsewhere (Psal. cxxxvi. 15) it is implied. Opinions are strangely at variance in regard to this monarch. Kalisch calls him 'Ramses V. Amenophis, the last of the sixteen monarchs of the eighteenth dynasty' (Gen., p. 643). Palmer says he was Amenoph II., and that his whole reign lasted nearly twenty-six years, the exodus occurring in the third (p. 898). These writers place the exodus in 1491 and 1654 B.C. respectively. Miss Corboux, on the other hand, in her very able memoir on the Rephaim, printed in the Journal of Sacred Literature, 1851-1852, identifying a branch of the stock of the Rephaim with the shepherds, brings down the date to somewhere between 1325 and 1300 B.C. (Jan. 1852, p. 376). Some would make the Pharaoh in question Ramses II., or his son Menptah (Amenophis). Other writers fix on Thothmes III. We must be content to wait for further investigation before we consider this Pharaoh certainly identified.

6. There was a Pharaoh whose daughter Solomon married, and for whom he built a palace (1 Kings iii. 1, vii. 8); and the Egyptian king her father took the Canaanitish town Gezer, sacked it, and gave it her for a present (ix. 16).

7. Another Pharaoh reigned in Egypt during David's time, and received Hadad of the Edomite royal family, who was rescued when a child from the military execution of Joab. Pharaoh brought him up, made him grants, and gave him in marriage the sister of Tahpenes his queen (xi. 18-22); but he left the Egyptian court as soon as he heard of David's death. Probably this Pharaoh was predecessor of Solomon's father-in-law. Oschor and Pseusennes II. have been suggested as likely to be these two kings.

8. A Pharaoh of Egypt is mentioned in Rabshakeh's harangue (2 Kings xviii. 21; Isai. xxxvi. 6). Possibly he was Sethos.

9. Of Pharaoh-nechoh (Phra the lame) we have more definite information. He went up against the king of Assyria to the Euphrates, and defeated Josiah king of Judah, who came out to withstand him, at Megiddo. He afterwards deposed Jehoahaz, whom the Jews placed on the throne, and gave the kingdom to Jehoiakim as his vassal (2 Kings xxiii. 29-35). This king was subsequently defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar (xxiv. 7; Jer. xlvi. 2). He is known as the Necho who reigned fifteen years, from 609 to 594 B.C. According to Herodotus (lib. ii. 159), Necho after defeating the Syrians at Magdolos (Megiddo) took Cadytis, a Syrian city. This has been supposed to be Jerusalem: it was more likely Gaza; but a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 818, would identify it with a Syrian strong-hold, Ketesh on the Orontes.

10. Pharaoh-hophra (Phra the priest of the sun) is also mentioned (Jer. xlvi. 30). This most probably was the king who attempted to raise the siege of Jerusalem (xxxvii. 5-11). He was the Apries of secular historians. He received into his dominions the Jews who against God's warning fled into Egypt after the murder of Gedaliah; but there they were told that war should overtake them. There is every reason to believe that Nebuchadnezzar successfully invaded Egypt in Hophra's reign. This and other untoward events alienated his subjects: the army placed Amasis on the throne; and the deprived monarch was ere long put to death.

10. There is another Pharaoh mentioned (1 Chron. iv. 18), whose daughter Bithiah was taken to wife by one Mered, a descendant probably of Judah. Speculation is useless in regard to this king.

PHARATH'ONI (1 Macc. ix. 50). A place in Judea fortified in the Maccabean wars.

PHA'RES. The Greek form of Pharez (Matt. i. 3; Luke iii. 33). This occurs also in the Apocrypha (e. g. 1 Esdr. v. 5).

PHAR'EZ (a breach). One of the sons of Judah by his daughter-in-law Tamar (Gen. xxxviii. 29, xlvi. 12; Numb. xxvi. 20, 21; Ruth iv. 12, 18; 1 Chron. ii. 4, 5, iv. 1, ix. 4). He gave name to one of the great families of Judah, the Phazrites. He is also called Perez (xxvii. 3; Neh. xi. 4, 6). Of his personal history nothing is recorded: his numerous descendants are frequently noticed in the genealogies.

PHARISA (1 Esdr. v. 33). Peruda or Perida (Ezra ii. 55; Neh. vii. 57).

PHARISEES, THE. One of the religious sects or parties among the Jews, occupying a very distinguished position in their later history. The origin of the Pharisees is somewhat obscure. We may readily believe that after the return from the Babylonish captivity, when the nation was placed under foreign sovereignty, a tendency would soon show itself to form parties. The administration of the Persian and especially the Syrian government would naturally have an influence in assimilating the Jews to the rest of their subjects. Some would be inclined to yield to this influence; and others would hold the more strictly to the observances of their own law. The difference would probably be aggravated by the neighbourhood of the Samaritans, hostile politically and, yet more, religiously. And the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, attempting to force the Jews into idolatry, would push matters to a crisis. It is to this period that we must ascribe the origin of the Pharisees. They are not mentioned by name till the New Testament times. But it has been supposed that the Assideans (probably meaning the pious) of whom we read (1 Macc. ii. 42, vii. 13; 2 Macc. xiv. 6) were the beginnings of them: see Prideaux, Connection, vol. ii. pp. 159, 283, 284, under dates 167 and 107 B.C. The name Pharisee imports separated: comp. Westcott, Introducto Gospels, chap. i. pp. 60, &c.

The Pharisees rose by degrees to great estimation and power. In our Lord's days they appear very prominently. It is true that sometimes the rival sect, the Sadducees, held high office (Acts iv. 1, 2, xxiii. 6); but the Pharisees were more in favour with the people: they courted the applause of men, and they were successful: they had their reward: the leading men were of their party: the scribes and lawyers for the most part belonged to them. There was, however, some internal division, there being two schools of them, those of Hillel and Shammai, celebrated doctors a little before the Christian era; of these the last-named was the strictest.

The main distinguishing principle of this party was that they placed tradition upon a level with the divine written law. Nay, as they conceived the written law imperfect, i.e. not containing all that God delivered, they not only superadded but in some degree superseded it by the interpretations which they put upon it. For this our Lord especially reproved them, showing how they had 'made the commandment of God of none effect by their tradition' (Matt. xv. 1-9). Their teaching on this point, as recorded in the Mishna (part iv. tract. 10, Pirke Aboth, c. 1) was that Moses received on Sinai both the law and the interpretation of it, with the command to commit the former to writing, but to deliver the other only by word of mouth to be preserved in the memories of men; that, accordingly, he communicated it to Joshua, Joshua to the elders, the elders to the prophets, and the prophets to the men of the great synagogue, from whom it was handed down through a succession of rabbis (see Prideaux, ubi supr., vol. i. pp. 284, 285, under date 446 B.C.; Winer, Bibl. EWB., art. 'Pharisäer: comp. Josephus, Antiq., lib. xiii. 10, § 6). Hence the Pharisees inculcated the most minute and frivolous observances; instances of which, some of them almost ludicrous, have been given by various writers. But to all these things they attached a greater degree of sanctity than to moral virtues (Matt. xxiii. 23). It was no wonder, therefore, that they were bitterly opposed to our Lord's teaching, which demonstrated the folly of trusting in these 'weak and beggarly elements,' declared that the only acceptable worship to God who is a Spirit must be that offered 'in spirit and in truth' (John iv. 24), and contradicted their favourite notion that they were the chosen ones who had a right to look down on others as less righteous than themselves (Luke xviii. 9-12).

The Pharisees maintained the immortality of the soul and the doctrine of a resurrection. Hence St. Paul enlisted them in his favour in a council composed partly of them, and partly of Sadducees whose belief was far different (Acts xxiii. 6-9). But, according to Josephus, they seem to have supposed that the souls of good men are united to other bodies in which the chastisement perhaps for lesser sins may be endured, while the souls of the wicked suffer eternal punishment (Bell. Jud., lib. ii. 8, § 14; Antiq., lib. xviii. 1, § 3). It may be doubted, however, whether these notions were not more of a speculative cast, so that the real and practical belief of the Pharisees was herein nearly identical with that which the gospel teaches. And Prideaux, who imagines that the doctrine of the Pharisees was akin to the Pythagorean transmigration of souls, acknowledges that all the Jewish books now extant speak of the resurrection of the dead, and the last judgment thereon to follow, no otherwise in the main particulars than as the Christians do' (vol. ii. p. 289).

The Pharisees, further, are said to have held that all things were controlled by fate, though not so as absolutely to take away man's free-will (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xviii. 1, § 3; Bell. Jud., lib. ii. 8, § 14). But the account of the Jewish historian must probably be taken with some allowance. They were anxious to make proselytes (Matt. xxiii. 15), and as of republican principles they were in this respect as well as in others opposed to the more aristocratic Sadducees.

But after admitting all their faults—and they were great enough to deserve the strong condemnation of our Lord—it must be acknowledged that among the Pharisees there were those who were zealous and conscientious. Neither, generally speaking, were they chargeable with luxurious living or licentiousness of morals. Their grand error was that they substituted a religion of externals for a religion of the heart; yet the converting grace of God was powerful enough to bring one of them (and doubtless many more) humbly to the cross. The great apostle of the Gentiles had in his earlier years, 'after the most stratetest sect' of their religion, lived a Pharisee (Acts xxvi. 5).

PHA'ROSH (a flea) (Ezra viii. 3). See PAROSH.

PHAR'PAR (swift). One of the rivers of Damascus mentioned by Naaman in conjunction with the Abana (2 Kings v. 12). It is only of late years that this stream has been satisfactorily identified and described. Mr. Porter visited its sources in 1852, and has traced its entire course. In a deep valley running far up into the heart of Hermon several small fountains burst forth, uniting into the Nahr el-Arny. This flows through a picturesque and rugged valley, entering the plain about five miles from its source, and winds a few miles farther till it reaches S'a's'a. Here it is joined by another stream, the Nahr Beit-Jenn, which rising more to the south passes through a wild glen shaded by walnuts and poplars, and, augmented by another brook a little below the village Beit-Jenn, crosses an undulating plain five or six miles to S'a's'a. After the junction the river bears the name of the 'Awaj, 'curved'; and this is the ancient Pharpar. It does not approach very near to Damascus, but, flowing in its upper course through limestone strata and afterwards through basalt, it waters the adjacent territory. S'a's'a is about twenty-five miles from Damascus; and the greater part of the road is dreary and uninteresting. Some portions, however, of the course of the 'Awaj are picturesque, as it glides by meadows and cornfields fringed with poplars and willows. Its waters are diminished by canals constructed to irrigate neighbouring villages; and, when it reaches a place called Nejha, the greater part of what remains is carried off by two canals. Below Nejha, therefore, its bed is often dry; but after the winter rains it continues to run with a deep and rapid stream into the lake Heijany, which is about seven miles from north to south by four and a-half from east to west, the whole being covered with water in winter and spring, afterwards much contracted and occasionally quite dry at the end of summer. The district through which the 'Awaj flows is called Wady el-Ajam, extending from the walls of Damascus along the base of Anti-Libanus to the borders of Jedir beyond the 'Awaj. Its greatest breadth is thirty miles, but near the lake Heijany it is but four or five. The extreme length is thirty-two. It contains fifty-one villages, and a population of about 18,000. See Journ. of Sac. Lit., Oct. 1853, pp. 45-57.

PHAR'ZITES. A family of Judah, descendants of Pharez (Numb. xxvi. 20).

PHASE'AH (lame) (Neh. vii. 51). See PASEAH, 2.

PHASE'LIS (1 Macc. xv. 23). A town on the coast of Asia Minor, on the borders of Lycia and Pamphylia, where Jews were settled—many brought thither as slaves.

PHAS'IRON (1 Macc. ix. 66). Perhaps the chief of an Arab tribe.

PHASSA'RON (1 Esdr. v. 25). Pashur (Ezra ii. 38).

PHÉ'BE or PHŒ'BE (shining, the moon). A deaconess (servant) of the church at Cenchrea whom St. Paul commends to the Romans (Rom. xvi. 1, 2). See DEACONESS.

PHENI'CE.—1 (Acts xi. 19, xv. 3). See PHENICIA.—2. A town, more properly Phœnix, with a harbour on the south-west coast of Crete, which the officers of the vessel in which St. Paul was endeavoured to reach in order that they might winter there (Acts xxvii. 12). It has been identified by Mr. Smith of Jordanhill as the modern Lutro. The inhabitants preserve the memory of the ancient name, Phœniket; and there are some ruins of the town remaining on a hill a little way from the shore (The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, chap. ii. pp. 84, &c. Append. iii. pp. 246, &c.).

PHENIC'IA, PHŒNIC'IA (the Greek name of the country in question, from phoinix 'a palm,' that tree probably abounding there). Phenicia or Phœnicie was a small narrow strip of country, with an average breadth of hardly twenty miles, lying along the shores of the Mediterranean, from the river Eleutherus near Aradus on the north, 120 miles to the promontory of Carnel, or the town of Dor, on the south. But this limit appears to have varied at different times. Phœnicia proper was still more confined, extending from the Promontorium Album, Ras el-Abyad, six miles south of Tyre, to the Bostrenus, Nahr el-Auly, two miles north of Sidon, twenty-eight miles in length, with a breadth of one mile. The whole country, sloping from the foot of Lebanon, comprised hilly plains, well-watered by streams descending from the uplands, very fruitful, and studded with towns and cities, of which the principal were Tripolis, Byblos, Sidon, Tyre, and Berytus. It was admirably situated for commerce. Lebanon supplied timber for ship-building; there were iron and copper-mines near Sarepta. Celebrated in the oldest writings of pagan antiquity, the Phœnicians are said to have traded with distant lands, and planted numerous colonies, of which Carthage may be mentioned as the most distinguished. From the north of Europe they brought amber, from Britain tin; various other commodities supplying their markets. Nor was this commerce carried on only by sea: their caravan-traffic was great with Egypt and Arabia; and through such communications the highway of the Red sea was open to them.

Phœnicia was peopled by the descendants of Ham; for Sidon is said to have been the first-born of Canaan; and the Arkite and probably the Sinite, the Arvadite and the Zemarite, had their settlements in this region (Gen. x. 15, 17, 18). At first their towns are supposed to have been independent, but subsequently they were united under the dominion of Tyre. The Assyrians in later times, the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Macedonians, the Egyptians, and the Romans were in turn their masters.

The Greeks professed to have borrowed letters from the Phœnicians; and it is unquestionable that the characters they used were of great antiquity, the origin perhaps of the old Hebrew. See WRITING. Their language too, as inscriptions which have been discovered prove, was nearly akin to Hebrew. Phœnicia is mentioned in Acts xi. 19, xv. 3, xxi. 2; where, in the first-named two places, our version has 'Phenice.' The religion of the Phœnicians in its popular form was that natural but debased and foolish worship paid to the sun, moon, and planets by the appellations of Baal, Ashtoreth, &c., of which some account is given in the articles under their respective names. These bodies were supposed to be intelligent beings exercising an influence on mundane events, and by the more refined thinkers the chief deities were deemed the male and female productive powers. Very pernicious effects were produced on Israel by their contact and alliance with the Phœnicians. Not only was idol-worship thus imported, but also the most cruel rites of it (Jer. xix. 5, xxxii. 35). See TYRE.

PHERESITES, PHER'EZITES (1 Esdr. viii. 69; 2 Esdr. i. 21; Judith v. 16). The Perizzites.

PHI-BE'SETH in some copies (Ezek. xxx. 17), for PI-BESETH; which see.

PH'CHOL (mouh of all, i.e. all-commanding). The chief captain of the forces of Abimelech king of Gerar (Gen. xxi. 22, 32, xxvi. 26). This might be an official title, borne by various individuals holding the same post; and possibly, in the two places referred to, different persons—since the lapse of time was great—might be meant.

PHILADEL'PHIA. A city of Lydia, at the foot of mount Tmolus, on the banks of the little river Cogamus, which falls not far from the city into the Hermus. It is twenty-eight miles south-east from Sardis, and was built by Attalus II. Philadelphus (158-138 B.C.), from whom it derives its name. Earthquakes were very prevalent in this district; and Philadelphia was more than once nearly destroyed by them. To the church here an apocalyptic epistle was addressed (Rev. i. 11, iii. 7-13), conveying unqualified commendation; and over Philadelphia has been extended the hand of divine protection. 'Among the Greek colonies and churches of Asia,' says Gibbon (Decl. and Fall, chap. lxiv.), 'Philadelphia is still erect, a column in a scene of ruins, a pleasing example that the paths of honour and safety may sometimes be the same.' It is still a considerable town, named Allah-shar, or Allah-shehr, with ruins of its ancient wall, and of about twenty-five churches. See Trench, Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, 2nd. edit. pp. 170, 187, 188.

PHILAR'CHES (2 Macc. viii. 32). This is really not a proper name, but the designation of the chief of the cavalry.

PHILE'MON (affectionate). A Christian at Colossæ or, as some critics believe (see next article), at Laodicea, whose wife it is likely was Apphia, and Archippus their son, at least a near relation (Phil. 2). It seems that Philemon was converted by the instrumentality of St. Paul (13, 19); and it is clear that he was a large-hearted zealous believer, abounding in good works (4-7).

PHILE'MON, THE EPISTLE TO. This,

the shortest of St. Paul's letters, bears upon its face decisive proof of its authorship. There is also abundant testimony to it given by early writers. And, though some have disputed its genuineness, and would exclude it from the canon on the ground of its being addressed to an individual on a private matter, yet the evidences for its canonicity are too plain, and the arguments adduced against its authority too superficial to require further notice here. The occasion on which this letter was written is clear from the contents. Onesimus, Philemon's slave, had absconded after robbing his master (18). Having fled to Rome, the providence of God had brought him into contact with the apostle, then in confinement; and the fugitive was led to Christ (10, 11). He was now ready to return to his earthly master; and St. Paul furnished him with this letter, in which he asked for him a favourable reception by Philemon, not now as a worthless slave, but as a brother beloved in the Lord. We cannot but conclude that the request of the apostle was granted. This epistle was written from Rome at the same time with those to the Colossians and Ephesians, i.e. about 61 or 62 A.D. It was probably altogether in St. Paul's own hand-writing, and is a beautiful specimen of tenderness, delicacy, and judgment. The style is natural and easy, and the topics are arranged with inimitable skill. It is proper to say that Wieseler (Chronol. des Apostol. Zeitalt., pp. 450-455) has, with a great deal of ingenuity, supported the opinion that Philemon resided at Laodicea, and that the epistle to him is that Laodicean epistle (Col. iv. 16) supposed to be lost. He thinks that, had Archippus been pastor at Colossæ, the apostle would have addressed him at once, and not have merely sent a message to be conveyed by the Colossian church, when, it would seem, their epistle was read at Laodicea (16, 17). It is a curious fact, in corroboration of this view, that, in the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 46), Archippus is called bishop of Laodicea; and, though Onesimus is said (Col. iv. 9) to be 'one of you,' the Colossians, the expression might only imply that he was a native of their town, a fact quite consistent with the residence of his master at Laodicea. Dr. Alford was at one time inclined to accept Wieseler's opinion: he now, however, dissents (Proleg. Epist. to Phil.), and Bleek (Einleitung in das N.T., p. 442) is of the same opinion, because they cannot conceive that a private letter could be that epistle which was to be publicly read in the Colossian church. Whatever be thought of the force of the positive evidence, it is manifest that the objection of Alford and Bleek is of little weight. They might as well argue that the epistle to Philemon ought to be excluded from the canon. An inspired composition, designed by the Holy Spirit to be placed on record for the instruction of the church in all ages, might very well, though first of all addressed to Philemon, be read in other places. Besides, it was not directed to Philemon alone, but to the church in his house (Phil. 2). The matter seems to deserve more careful investigation than it has yet received.

PHILETUS (amiabile). A person censured with Hymeneus for saying that the resurrection was past (2 Tim. ii. 17). 'They appear to have been persons who believed the scriptures of the Old Testament, but misinterpreted them, allegorizing away the doctrine of the resurrection, resolving it all into figure and metaphor. The delivering over unto Satan seems to have been a form of excommunication, declaring the person reduced to the state of an heathen; and in the apostolical age it was accompanied with supernatural or miraculous effects upon the bodies of the persons so delivered' (Waterland, Imp. of Doctrine of Holy Trinity, chap. iv. vol. iii. pp. 459, 460, edit. 1843).

PHILIP.—1. One of the twelve apostles. He was a native of Bethsaida, and probably already known to our Lord when he was called to follow him. It was he that brought Nathanael (no doubt Bartholomew) to Jesus, and with Bartholomew he is generally named in the lists of the apostles, once, however, with Thomas, occupying himself always the fifth place (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 14; John i. 43-46; Acts i. 13). A few notices of Philip are found in the gospel history, which may seem to show that he was of an active enquiring mind (John vi. 5-7, xii. 21, 22, xiv. 8, 9); and it has been imagined (Clem. Alex., Strom., lib. iii. 4, tom. i. p. 522, edit. Potter, 1715) that he was the disciple referred to in Matt. viii. 21, 22; Luke ix. 59, 60. Of the later life and labours of Philip nothing is certainly known. He is said to have preached in Phrygia and met his death at Hierapolis. But traditions differ in regard to him. See Euseb., Hist. Eccles., lib. iii. 30, 31; Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Philippus,' no. 6.

2. Philip or Herod Philip (Matt. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17; Luke iii. 19). See HERODIAN FAMILY, THE, 4.—3. Another Philip or Herod Philip (Luke iii. 1). See HERODIAN FAMILY, THE, 5.

4. One of the seven appointed to minister to the poor (Acts vi. 5), and commonly (though not in scripture) called deacons. This Philip (perhaps a Hellenist), who is also designated an evangelist, was one of the first who gave the gospel a wider scope, in this respect a kind of precursor of St. Paul: he was very successful in preaching in Samaria, and working miracles there. When the news of this reached Jerusalem, the apostles sent two of their number, Peter and John, thither, that by prayer and imposition of their hands the newly-baptized might receive the Holy Ghost (viii. 5-17). Philip afterwards was commissioned to meet an Ethiopian eunuch, whom he instructed and baptized: he then went (carried by the Spirit) to Azotus, or Ashdod, and having preached in various cities came to Cæsarea (26-40). Probably he settled there; for we find him in Cæsarea when St. Paul passed through on his way to Jerusalem. He was a married man and had four daughters endued with the prophetic gift (xxi. 8, 9). No more is certainly known of Philip: according to a tradition he died at Cæsarea. Some ancient writers appear to confound the apostle and the evangelist.

PHILIP.—1. The celebrated king of Macedonia, father of Alexander the Great (1 Macc. i. 1, vi. 2).—2. A favourite and foster-brother of Antiochus Epiphanes, appointed lieutenant of his realm and guardian of his son (vi. 14, 15, 55, 56, 63; 2 Macc. ix. 29, xiii. 23).—3. Philip V., another Macedonian king, defeated by the Romans (1 Macc. viii. 5). He died 179 B.C., in the forty-second year of his reign, and was succeeded by Perseus.—4. A Phrygian officer of Antiochus (2 Macc. v. 23, vi. 11, viii. 8), sometimes identified with no. 2.

PHILIPPI. A city of Macedonia, according to the Roman division, in the first region of that province. It was on the borders of Thrace, thirty-three Roman miles north-east of Amphipolis, and about ten miles from Neapolis its port, where St. Paul landed. It was built on the site of a village, called Krenides (also Datos) by Philip king of Macedonia, and made a strong military station. In the hills to the north and east were gold-mines; and on the plains extending towards the west to the river Strymon, and between it and the Gangites, on which the town was situated, was fought the decisive battle between Antony and Octavius and Brutus and Cassius. The Roman town was probably not exactly on the Greek site: it was made a colony by Augustus. The ancient name is still applied to the locality; but there are no inhabitants (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Philippi'). The line of the walls may be traced, and there are two lofty gateways amid the fragments that are left: there are also the remains of an amphitheatre on the sides of the overhanging hill, the seats of which are quite perfect. We do not know whether early converts may not have carried previously the news of salvation to Italy or to Rome; but, so far as the New Testament history directly informs us, Philippi was the first city in Europe which heard the gospel message. The account of St. Paul's visit and of his founding of a church there is given in Acts xvi. There has been some difficulty in interpreting 12, where according to our translation Philippi is termed 'the chief city of that part of Macedonia.' It was not the chief city; and, though different modes of explanation have been proposed, the most simple and satisfactory is to translate, 'the first Macedonian city of the district,' as Neapolis properly belonged to Thrace. St. Paul visited Philippi again, probably twice (Acts xx. 1-6). There is an interesting account of a journey to Philippi by Dr. Hackett, in the Biblioth. Sacra., Oct. 1860, pp. 869-880, 890-892.

PHILIPPIANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. A tie of peculiar affection seems to have existed between the apostle Paul and the Philippian church. In their city he had suffered grievous wrong at the hands of the heathen magistrates, and from the disciples there he had, contrary to his general custom, twice accepted gifts soon after his departure from them (Phil. iv. 15, 16: comp. 2 Cor. viii. 1-6). Nor, when the apostle was far away a prisoner at Rome, did the Philippians forget him. They sent him a present by Epaphroditus (Phil. iv. 18); on whose return he despatched this letter, pouring out his heart in warm affection towards those who had so tenderly shown their love to him.

We may arrange this epistle in three sections:—I. After an affectionate introduction (i. 1-11), the apostle gives an account of his condition at Rome (12-26), and then exhorts to unanimity and Christian humility (27-ii. 16), adding an expression of his hope of visiting them, with a notice of Epaphroditus's sickness and recovery (17-30).—II. The apostle cautions the Philippians against Judaizing teachers, and confirms his warning by a special reference to his own experience, and thence, having shown how he renounced all self-dependence, he takes occasion to exhort to heavenliness of mind (iii. 1-iv. 1).—III. He gives various admonitions (2-9), then expresses his thanks for the present sent him (10-20), and concludes with salutation and a benediction (21-23).

It has been already noted that this epistle was written while St. Paul was a prisoner at Rome: it would seem not impossible to fix more precisely the date of it. Some time must obviously have elapsed after St. Paul's arrival in the great city. For the Philippians had become acquainted with his necessity there: they had then sent to him by Epaphroditus, who had been sick at Rome. We cannot determine how long the sickness lasted; but we learn that the Philippians heard of it; and the news of their sorrow on hearing had travelled back to Rome, and had troubled Epaphroditus, not then it would seem convalescent, his mind being perhaps enfeebled by what he had suffered (ii. 25-28). His illness, therefore, was not a short one. Now, however, he was well and was the bearer of this letter. Again, for two years Paul dwelt in his own hired house, and preached the gospel without interruption (Acts xxviii. 30, 31). This was the case when he wrote to the Ephesians (Eph. vi. 19, 20). It is otherwise while writing to Philippi (Phil. i. 12). The apostle is not in his own house. He is in what is called (13) 'the palace,' i.e. the prætorium, or guard-house of the prætorian bands attached to Nero's palace. (For it may be observed that attempts to make out that it was 'Herod's judgment-hall' (Acts xxiii. 35), and that the epistle was written from Cæsarea are futile.) Hence the salutation from those 'of Cæsar's household' (Phil. iv. 22). And it is evident that the apostle felt that a crisis was come (i. 20, 30, ii. 23, 27). He hopes indeed that he shall be delivered (i. 25, ii. 24); but he is in great anxiety, such as would naturally be felt by one, however strong in faith, to whom the awful expectation of martyrdom was very close. Indications of this kind point to the period after the death of Burrus, the prætorian prefect under whose charge the apostle had been, and the change for the worse in Nero's government. We may, therefore, reasonably fix the date of the epistle to the latter end of St. Paul's imprisonment, about the middle of 63 A.D.

Its genuineness has been generally acknowledged. It is referred to by Polycarp, and cited by Irenæus and Clement of Alexandria and other early writers. The fancies of some modern critics in opposition are not worth notice. The style is animated and affectionate, occasionally abrupt, but in a strain of almost-unqualified commendation. The Judaizers whom Paul had to oppose elsewhere had, it is true, attempted to gain influence here—and it was perhaps as much a desire to warn the Philippians against them as to acknowledge the present he received that induced him to write—but they had not succeeded. There were, indeed, some tokens of disagreement; and therefore the apostle earnestly presses unity upon them; but his admonitions are conceived and expressed in the tenderest spirit. They were, we may trust, not ineffective.

Of commentaries on the epistle to the Philippians may be named those of L. Ridley, 1540, re-printed in Richmond's Fathers of the English Church, vol. ii.; of Airay, 1617, re-printed 1864; of Dailly, 1639, translated and printed in English, 1841, 1863; and of bishop Ellicott, 1861, 1864.

PHILISTIA. The Hebrew word Petesheth (land of strangers or sojourners) is sometimes so translated (Psal. lx. 8, lxxxvii. 4, cviii. 9; elsewhere it is generally rendered Palestine. Hence the Greek name Palestine applied by many writers to the whole country of the Israelites. But Philistia is distinctively the region inhabited by the Philistines. It comprised the southern portion of the coast, along the Mediterranean, extending inwards to the Judean hills, from Ekron to the border of Egypt (Josh. xiii. 3), adjacent to the three tribes of Dan, Judah, and Simeon. There were five principal cities in this district—Ekron, Ashdod, Gath, Ashkelon, and Gaza. The Philistine plain is described as being still of great fertility, producing abundant crops yearly; so that Dr. Thomson remarks that, if it were protected by a settled government, it would 'quickly be studded with villages, and beautified with vineyards, olive-yards, and orange-groves' (The Land and the Book, p. 537). See PHILISTINES.

PHILISTIM (Gen. x. 14) See PHILISTIA, PHILISTINES.

PHILISTINES. The origin of this celebrated people is involved in much obscurity. Some modern critics have been anxious to show that they were descendants of Shem, and that they migrated from Crete either directly or through Egypt into Palestine. This theory is exposed to formidable objections, and is not consistent with the notices of scripture. According to the genealogy of nations (Gen. x. 13, 14) they were of the Mizraimite race (Hamites) from the Casluhim, probably increased from the Capthorim. This is borne out by various other testimonies (Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4; Amos ix. 7). Miss Corbaux in her interesting memoir on the Rephaim adopts generally this view, and regards the Philistines as a branch of the Rephaim. For the giant family whom David and his warriors destroyed are distinctly said to have been sons of a certain Rapha of Gath (2 Sam. xxi. 16-22: comp. marg.); see Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Oct. 1851, pp. 169, 170. Abraham found the Philistines in what is called 'the south country;' and they were then but an inconsiderable tribe, evidently of pastoral habits (Gen. xx.). Indeed Abimelech, their chief, seems to have regarded the patriarch with his numerous tribe of dependents as quite equal in power with himself, and was glad to make a treaty with him at Beer-sheba (xxi. 22-32). Nor were the Philistines more formidable in the days of Isaac; for the then Abimelech urged as a reason for pressing his departure from Gerar, 'Thou art much mightier than we,' and afterwards renewed the treaty of Beer-sheba (xxvi. 12-33). In the time of Joshua, however, the Philistines had not only largely multiplied, but were also in possession of that most fertile plain, the Shefelah, lying along the coast, between the Mediterranean and the hill-country of Judah and Dan. It may be that from the peculiar advantages of this district, into which they had introduced themselves, the tribe had naturally increased into a nation; or they may have been reinforced by fresh settlers from Egypt. Miss Corboux adopts the latter supposition, and says: 'An important accession to their numbers had accrued to them from a kindred stock, on the expulsion of the Hyksos from Egypt. A great number of emigrants from the Delta were among the number; and it seems that these established themselves in the pastoral region of the Avim, and subsequently extended themselves northward, becoming intimately blended with the Philistines.' She considers, further, the texts above referred to (Jer. xlvii. 4; Amos ix. 7) as palpably alluding to this great immigration (ubi supr., July 1852, pp. 324, 325; comp. Wilton's Negeb, Append. pp. 246-249). It may be taken as some corroboration of this view that the Philistines, as their subsequent history shows them, were no longer a merely-pastoral people, but well skilled in handicrafts, engaged in commercial pursuits, and especially powerful in war, able to contend with even the Sidonians and Egyptians. Some suppose the Pelethites, named with Cherethites as David's body-guard, to have been Philistines: see PELETHITES.

The Philistine country lay within the limits of the promised land (Numb. xxxiv. 5, 6); and the Israelites ought to have possessed themselves of it. Indeed, it was actually assigned (some of the principal towns being specified) to Judah and Dan (Josh. xv. 45-47, xix. 41-45). But the opportunity was neglected; and five lords of the Philistines remained in five chief towns, to be a scourge to Israel through almost the whole course of their existence (xiii. 3; Judges iii. 3). If the Philistines were, as above suggested, of the Rephaim stock, we find an additional reason for their never-ceasing hostility to the Israelites.

An outline only of Philistine history, as connected with that of Israel, can be given here. The tribe of Judah (if the present reading of the text be accurate) at first occupied three of their cities (i. 18), but did not hold them long. And, in spite of the valour of different champions, such as Shamgar and Samson (iii. 31, xiv., xv., xvi.), the Philistine power grew so much that in the time of the later judges they had completely broken the spirit of the Israelites, and kept them—the southern tribes at least—in degrading servitude (xv. 11; 1 Sam. xiii. 19-22). They invaded and spoiled the country at their pleasure: they occupied various strong-holds, pushing forward even to the Jordan, in order to prevent assistance from the trans-Jordanic tribes to their western brethren (xiv. 1, xxxi. 7, 10). An attempt by the Israelites at freeing themselves in the time of Eli was signally defeated (iv.); and it was not till the administration of Samuel that any great advantage was gained (vii. 3-14). The result however of the day of Mizpeh was that the Philistines were for a time confined to their own country. In Samuel's later days and in the beginning of Saul's reign their power was again felt; and, when Jonathan gave the signal for war by destroying a pillar or monument set up as a mark of Philistine superiority, the people were so far from responding to the call that they dispersed and hid themselves, leaving the new king almost defenceless (xiii.). Afterwards, however, by Jonathan's valour in attacking a Philistine strong-hold, and in consequence of an earthquake, a great and decisive victory was obtained by the Israelites (xiv. 1-47); and for some time there was no further Philistine war. The next occasion on which we read of hostilities was when, just on the Philistine border, David slew Goliath, and Saul with his commander-in-chief, Abner, defeated their army (xvii.). But, though they were worsted in the field, the Philistines retained their own territory; and David found with Achish king of Gath a secure retreat from Saul's persecution (xxvii.). And then, taking advantage of the state into which Israel had been brought by Saul's misgovernment, the Philistines raised a vast body of troops, fought a successful battle in the heart of the Hebrew country, slew Saul and his sons, and established themselves in various cities and strong-holds (xxviii. 1-6, xxix. 1, 2, xxxi.).

When David became king over united Israel, the Philistines repeatedly attacked him, but always unsuccessfully: their champions were slain, and their country subdued, though probably there were occasional risings against the conqueror (2 Sam. v. 17-25, viii. 1, xxi. 15-22; 1 Chron. xi. 13-19, xviii. 1, xx. 4-8). Under Solomon while retaining some of their petty chiefs they were tributary (1 Kings ii. 39, 40, iv. 21, 24). Gezer at the extremity of the Philistine plain was given to this king by Pharaoh; and he deemed it prudent to fortify it and some other border-towns (ix. 15-17). When the kingdom was divided, we find both states from time to time involved in hostilities with the Philistines (x. 27, xvi. 15; 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17). And, though Jehoshaphat and Uzziah obtained advantages over them (xvii. 11, xxvi. 6), it was not till the reign of Hezekiah that they were entirely subdued (2 Kings xviii. 8). In the Assyrian invasions and wars with Egypt the Philistine plain was repeatedly traversed by armies; and some of their towns, being considered in a military point of view important places, underwent sieges (Isai xx. 1; Jer. xlvii. 1). At the Babylonish captivity the old hatred against Israel broke out (Ezek. xxv. 15-17); but on the return alliances were made by the Jews with Philistine women (Neh. xiii. 23, 24). Alexander the Great traversed their country and took Gaza; and Philistia was involved in the fortunes of the Syrian, Egyptian, and Maccabean and subsequent Jewish wars. At last it fell under and was disposed of by the Roman power (1 Macc. iii. 41, x. 69-89, xi. 60-62; Josephus, Antiq., lib. xiii. 13, § 3, lib. xiv. 4, § 4, lib. xv. 7, § 3, lib. xvii. 11, §§ 4, 5).

Of the Philistine language we know little: it is generally supposed to have been Shemitic. The mechanical arts must have been cultivated among this people; for they were able to fabricate weapons and defensive armour (1 Sam. xiii. 20, xvii. 5-7). They also worked in the precious metals (vi. 4), and must have had considerable skill in architecture (Judges xvi. 26-29). They appear to have traded in slaves (Joel iii. 3-6; Amos i. 6), and probably possessed ships. Their government was a kind of federal union. The five principal cities had districts with towns and villages dependent on them (Josh. xv. 45-47; 1 Chron. xviii. 1); but in war they acted in concert: those that are called the 'lords' had considerable influence in affairs of state, controlling the 'king,' as he is designated, of Gath (xxix. 3-9). The gods they worshipped were specially Dagon (Judges xvi. 23; 1 Sam. v. 1-7; 1 Chron. x. 10), Ashtaroth (1 Sam. xxxi. 10), Baal-zebub (2 Kings i. 2, 3, 6, 16); also Derceto, not noticed in scripture (Diod. Sic., Bibl. Hist., lib. ii. cap. 4).

They had priests and diviners (1 Sam. vi. 2), and carried their images with them in their campaigns (2 Sam. v. 21).

The Philistines are said to have been a tall well-proportioned people, with regular features, and complexion lighter than that of the Egyptians. They shaved the beard and whiskers entirely. Their arms and accoutrements were peculiar. Their head-dress presented an appearance like feathers set in a metal band, with a defence for the back of the head and the sides of the face. They wore corsets quilted with leather or plates of metal. These were supported by shoulder straps; and the arms were left free. They wore a girdle round the waist, from which hung a quilted skirt. They had circular shields, javelins, and spears as missile weapons, and poniards and long swords for close combat. See Pict. Bible, note on Jer. xvii. 1; Kitto's Daily Bible Illustrations, thirty-third week, second day.

PHILOLOGUS (lover of learning). A Christian at Rome to whom St. Paul sent salutation (Rom. xvi. 15).

PHILOMETOR (2 Macc. iv. 21). A surname of Ptolemæus or Ptolemy VI. king of Egypt.

PHILOSOPHER, PHILOSOPHY. St. Paul was encountered by philosophers at Athens (Acts xvii. 18). These are described as EPICUREANS and STOICS; which see.

The 'philosophy' against which the apostle warns the Colossians was of a different cast (Col. ii. 8, 18-23; comp. 1 Tim. vi. 20; Tit. i. 14, iii. 9). It would seem to have been a mixture of Jewish dogmas with oriental principles, and was the impatient budding of that heresy which afterwards under the general name of Gnosticism, but in many divisions, was so detrimental to the church. It was thoroughly congenial to the speculative mind which loves to busy itself with curious questions, and then boasts of having sounded the depths of wisdom. The Alexandrine and Syrian Gnostics differed: in the former Platonism was amalgamated with Christianity, in the latter there was a Persian influence. Hence there is in one the doctrine of emanation, as if various orders of beings proceeded from or were developed by the Supreme Deity—in the other the dualism of God and matter, which last was supposed to be ruled by a principle hostile to the Deity the fountain of good. The Gnostics have been divided into those of a Jewish cast, and those who had adopted Gentile notions: other divisions have also been proposed. They ramified into numerous classes and sects; Kurtz enumerates four of those which had a leaven of Judaism, and eleven of Gentile Gnostics (Hist. of Christ. Church, transl., §§ 48, 49, vol. i. pp. 99-109). These were subdivided into many more; and Manichæism, which appeared later, was in some respects a form of Gnosticism. But for accounts of such heresies the reader must be referred to ecclesiastical historians; and he may consult with advantage an article in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 849-858, in which the development of Jewish and Greek philosophy and the relation of these to Christianity will be found discussed at length.

PHINEES.—1 (1 Esdr. v. 5, and elsewhere). Phinehas the son of Aaron.—2 (1 Esdr. v. 3). Paseah (Esra ii. 49).—3 (1 Esdr. viii. 63). Phinehas (Esra viii. 33).—4 (2 Esdr. i. 2). Phinehas the son of Eli. But this name is introduced by mistake.

PHINEHAS (mouth of brass).—1. The son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron (Exod. vi. 25; 1 Chron. vi. 4, 50; Esra vii. 5). He distinguished himself for his godly zeal when an open act of licentiousness had been defiantly committed by a Simeonite chief with a Midianitish female of rank. Phinehas with his own hand inflicted on them both, while in the act of sin, the just punishment of the law they had outraged. For this it was promised him that the priesthood should continue in his family (Numb. xxv. 6-15; Psal. cvi. 30). Phinehas was afterwards appointed to accompany the expedition against the Midianites (Numb. xxxi. 6); and we hear of him again when the trans-Jordanic tribes had erected an altar in opposition, it was imagined, to the altar of the tabernacle (Josh. xxii. 13-34), and in the war of Israel with Benjamin (Judges xx. 28). He may be supposed to have succeeded his father Eleazar as high priest (Josh. xxiv. 33; 1 Chron. ix. 20); and it has been said by some writers that he filled that office twenty-five years. We know, however, nothing certain on this point (for some strange traditions respecting him, see Selden, De Succ. in Pont. Ebraeor., lib. i. cap. ii. pp. 115-121), nor how it was that the high priesthood was for a time in the line of Ithamar. It was restored to that of Phinehas in Zadok, and continued in his family till after the captivity. A descendant of his accompanied Esra from Babylon (Esra viii. 2). The traditionary tomb of Phinehas is shown at Awertah, four miles from Nablous.—2. A priest, the ungodly son of Eli (1 Sam. i. 3, ii. 34, iv. 4, 11, 17, 19, xiv. 3).—3. The father of a person engaged in weighing the treasures Esra brought from Babylon (Esra viii. 33). But possibly the first Phinehas is meant, and the word 'son' here means generally descendant.

PHISON (Ecclus. xxiv. 25). The river Pison (Gen. ii. 11).

PHLEG'ON (flaming). A Christian at Rome whom St. Paul saluted (Rom. xvi. 14).

PHCE'BE. See PHEBE.

PHENIC'IA. See PHENICIA.

PHOR'OS (1 Esdr. v. 9, ix. 26). Parosh (Esra ii. 3, x. 25).

PHRYG'IA. A region of Asia Minor, said to be divided on the south by mount Taurus from Pisidia, on the west and north bordering on Caria, Lydia, Mysia, and Bithynia, on the east on Galatia, Cappadocia, and Lycaonia. This was the greater Phrygia, distributed by the Romans into Phrygia Salutaris in the east, Phrygia Pacatiana (see subscription to 2 Tim.) in the west, and Phrygia Katakekaumene, 'the burnt,' in the centre, there being here traces of volcanic action. The country was well-watered and fertile; and its pastures fed celebrated breeds of cattle and sheep. The Phrygian people seem to have extended themselves over a great part of Asia Minor west of the Halys; and some, passing the original boundaries of Phrygia, settled upon the Hellespont in a district thence named the lesser Phrygia (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Phrygien'). But it must be understood that Phrygia was not a regularly-defined Roman province in apostolic times. By the term, therefore, as vaguely used in the New Testament we are rather to understand a region, portions of which, varying at different periods, were comprehended under different Roman provinces. Jews were to be found in this region from the time of the Syrian dominion (Acts ii. 10). Hierapolis, Colosse, and Laodicea of its cities are named in the New Testament. St. Paul twice traversed Phrygia (Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23).

PHUD (Judith ii. 23). Phut.

PHU'RAH (bough). The servant or armour-bearer of Gideon (Judges vii. 10, 11).

PHU'RIM (Rest of Esth. xi. 1). Purim.

PHUT (afflicted, or, perhaps, a bow). A son of Ham (Gen. x. 6; 1 Chron. i. 8). In the last-named passage he is called Put. The name frequently occurs as Phut, or Put, in our version, but is sometimes translated 'Libya' or 'Libyans' (Jer. xli. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 10, xxx. 5, xxxviii. 5; Nah. iii. 9). The descendants of Phut must have occupied districts in Africa. According to Josephus Phut was the colonizer of Lybia (Antiq., lib. i. 6, § 2); and he confirms his belief by stating that there was a river of the name in the country of the Moors, whence the whole adjoining region was termed Phut by Greek historians. In Coptic, moreover, Lybia is called Faiat, and the inhabitants of that part which adjoins Egypt bear a corresponding name. Hence it may be that, while Lehabim denotes Libya in general, Phut designates a leading district close upon Egypt. If this view be thought untenable, Kalisch supposes that Phut might be looked for at Buto, a very famous city, where were the temples and oracle of the goddess Buto, of Horus, and Bubastis. It was the capital of the Delta of the Nile, on its Sebennyitic arm. The modern Kem Kasir occupies its site (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 268). But a writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 868, 869, would rather identify Phut with Nubia.

PHU'VAH (mouth). One of the sons of Issachar (Gen. xlv. 13). He is called also Pua (Numb. xxvi. 23), and Puah (1 Chron. vii. 1).

PHYGEL' LUS (fugitive). A person of Asia (the province) of whom St. Paul complains that he was one of those that had turned from him (2 Tim. i. 15). The circumstances can be only conjectured.

PHYLACTERY (Matt. xxiii. 5). A strip of parchment on which some verses of scripture (such as Exod. xiii. 2-10, 11-16; Deut. vi. 4-9, xi. 13-21) were written. Such strips were enclosed in small leathern boxes, Tephillin, or Phylacteries.

and worn by men during the time of prayer on the forehead between the eyebrows, or on the left arm near the region of the heart, being attached by leathern straps. Their use was to remind the worshipper that the law must be in his head and in his heart; and they were supposed to be preservatives against the power of demons; hence the name phylacteries, i.e. safe-guards. The practice was founded upon a literal interpretation of Exod. xiii. 9, 16; Deut. vi. 8 xi. 18, and is continued to the present day. The following account of it, as now observed, is supplied by Mills, The British Jews, pp. 21-23. The young Jew begins to wear the tephillin, which are two—one for the head, the other for the left arm. Four slips of parchment are prepared, each about an inch wide, and eight inches long. On these the above-named passages are written with great care. The slips being finished, a covering of the same material is prepared to deposit them in. It is a quadrangular box, of about an inch deep. Inside are four pieces of parchment placed at equal distances, and the interior thus divided into four small apartments. The slips are carefully folded, the writing being inside, and separately lodged in these apartments. One end of the parchment of which the box is composed is turned over as a lid, and sewed with leather thongs prepared for the purpose. On two of the squares, raised in the material itself, whilst preparing it to be formed into a box, is the Hebrew letter shin, the initial of Shaddai, Almighty. In forming the lid a kind of loop is made, through which a leather thong, two yards long and an inch wide, is passed, to secure the whole to the head. The other box for the arm is similar, save that there is but one cavity, the passages of scripture being written in four columns on one piece of vellum, and the letter shin is omitted. The lid is provided with a small bag, generally given by his mother or sister, in which to deposit the tephillin. They are to be worn at prayers, public or private. The one for the arm is first put on, the thong being wound seven times round the arm, while the person recites 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and commanded us to wear the tephillin.' Then he takes the one for the head, and places it exactly in the centre between the eyes, touching where the hair begins to grow, and securing it says, 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us with thy commandments, and commanded us the commandment of the tephillin. Blessed be the name of the glory of his kingdom for ever and ever. And I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercy. I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness; and thou shalt know the Lord.' Every time he says 'I will betroth thee,' he winds the end of the thong three turnings around his middle finger.

PHYSICIAN. It is probable that the Israelites learned something of the healing art from the Egyptians, who are said to have paid so much attention to medicine as to have had separate persons devoted to the study and cure of each separate disease (Herod., lib. ii. 84). There are allusions in scripture to the physicians whom Joseph retained in his service (Gen. i. 2): these, however, were embalmers.

At an early period of the world some medical and surgical skill was attained. Thus
