we have mention of midwives (Gen. xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 28); and the operation of circumcision must have required a careful hand (xvii. 10-14, 23-27). We frequently read of external applications, as for the treatment of wounds (Exod. xxi. 19; 2 Kings viii. 29, ix. 15; Isai. i. 6; Ezek. xxx. 21). Also we find internal and mental maladies treated (1 Sam. xvi. 15, 16; 2 Chron. xvi. 12); and some of the remedies prescribed were singular enough (1 Kings i. 1, 2). Regulations in regard to diet seem to have been originally regarded as of principal importance. For, while the commands and prohibitions in respect to food (Lev. xi.; Deut. xiv. 3-21) had a religious aspect, we cannot doubt that they were grounded on sanitary principles; and that kind of food was specially forbidden which in that climate would pre-dispose to leprosy or other diseases. The various purifications enjoined, and the setting apart of lepers had the same tendency: they promoted the public health (See Harle's Essay on the State of Physic in the Old and New Test., pp. 8-10). In later ages the science of medicine seems to have been more cultivated, and the skill of the physician recognized (Jer. viii. 22; Mark v. 26; Luke iv. 23, v. 31, viii. 43; Col. iv. 14; see also Ecclus. xxxviii. 1-15).

The remedies used were unguents, salves, and balsams (Jer. viii. 22, ii. 8), poultices or plaisters (2 Kings xx. 7), infusions of oil and wine (Luke x. 34), perhaps the application of leaves (Ezek. xlvii. 12); also mineral baths (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xvii. 6, § 5). Honey seems to have been employed as an internal medicine (Prov. xvi. 24). There were also more questionable modes of treatment. Amulets, charms, invocations, &c. were resorted to, the belief in which to the present day is common in the east (see Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 151, 152), nor quite extinct in other countries.

It has sometimes been imagined that the Hebrew prophets and priests were the physicians of their times. With regard to the prophets, the notion has arisen from miraculous cures occasionally performed by them (e.g. 2 Kings v. 10). But as well might it be said that the apostles were the physicians of their day because they received power from the Lord to heal (Matt. x. 8; Mark xvi. 18), and because people in consequence resorted to them (Acts v. 15). With regard to the priests, they were commissioned to examine persons suspected of leprosy, and to pronounce them, according to certain symptoms, leprosy or clean (Lev. xiii., xiv.); but it does not appear that they treated them medically, or had the power of cure. It is of course not improbable that Levites or priests, who often devoted themselves to other studies, and were lawyers or judges, might some of them profess the healing art; but they were not physicians by office. The priests themselves were subject to special diseases: they are said to have ministered barefoot, and thence to have been subject to colds, &c. A medical officer was therefore in later times always attached to the establishment of the temple (see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Arzneikunst'). There must probably have been some knowledge of anatomy. The slaying and dissecting of the sacrifices would afford an insight into the construction of a victim's carcass; and embalming, so far as it was practised, might exhibit somewhat of the human frame. Some have imagined that knowledge of this kind might be traced in such passages as Job x. 8-11; but the indications are too faint to build upon. See Winer, ubi sup.; Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 44, vol. ii. pp. 60-65.

It is not easy to enumerate the various diseases mentioned in scripture, partly as they are often described by general names, and partly because maladies change their type according to climate and lapse of time. Eruptive diseases were common; boils with blains were among the plagues inflicted on the Egyptians (Exod. ix. 10). Also we have consumption, fever, inflammation noted (Deut. xxviii. 22), the botch of Egypt, emerald, scab, itch (27, 35), leprosy, already mentioned, blindness, partial or total, probably ophthalmia (Gen. xxix. 17; Luke xviii. 35), dysentery (2 Chron. xxi. 15, 19), probably sun-stroke (2 Kings iv. 18, 19), pestilence (Numb. xvi. 46-49; 2 Sam. xxiv. 15), palsy (Matt. iv. 24), issue of blood (ix. 20), dropsy (Luke xiv. 2), boil breeding worms (Acts xii. 23); see also Exod. xxi. 22; 1 Kings xiii. 4, xv. 23; 2 Kings xx. 1, 7; Job ii. 7, 8, vii. 4, 5, xvii. 1, xix. 17, xxx. 27, xxxiii. 21; Isai. i. 5, 6, xxvi. 18; Mark i. 30; Acts xviii. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 17, and elsewhere, for notices or allusions to various forms of disease. Wounds also are frequently mentioned (e.g. Numb. xxi. 6; 2 Kings i. 2, viii. 28, 29; Ezek. xxx. 21, 22, 24, 25).

The term physician is sometimes applied figuratively. Sin is the disease of the soul; and he who cures that is the most skillful of physicians (Isai. i. 5; Jer. viii. 22; Matt. ix. 12; Rev. xxii. 2).

PI-BE/SETH (abode of Pasht?). A city of Egypt (Ezek. xxx. 17). It appears to have had its name from Pubasti, or Bubastis, an Egyptian goddess (Bast, or Pasht; see EGYPT, p. 243), whom Herodotus identified with Artemis or Diana (lib. ii. 59, 60, 137, 138, 156), in whose honour a great festive pilgrimage was yearly made thither. It was on the western side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile; and, though its walls were destroyed by the Persians, it continued to be a place of consideration (Bubastus) under the Romans. The site of the ancient city is now called Tel Basta. There are mounds of great extent, and masses of broken pottery. The temple which Herodotus characterized as, though not the largest, one of the most beautiful in the country, is entirely destroyed; but there are remnants of the very fine red granite of which it was constructed.

PICTURES (Lev. xxvi. 1, marg.; Numb. xxiii. 52; Isai. ii. 16). In most of these places idolatrous representations are intended (see CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY, PAINTING), sculptured and coloured work. In Prov. xxv. 11 the idea is fruit or foliage of gold surrounded with carved mouldings overlaid with silver.

PIECE OF MONEY. 'Pieces of gold' (2 Kings v. 5) and 'pieces of silver' (Gen.

xx. 16, and elsewhere) probably mean shekels, not the coins so called, but as measured by weight. In the New Testament 'pieces of silver' (e.g. Matt. xxvi. 15) represent shekels or coins equivalent thereto. The 'piece of money' (xvii. 27) was the stater; the 'piece of silver' (Luke xv. 8) the drachma. See MONEY.

PIGEON. See DOVE.

PIETY (1 Tim. v. 4). Dutiful respect is here meant, if, as is most probable, the conduct of the children and grandchildren is alluded to. Some, however, would interpret of the widows ruling religiously their households.

PI-HAHY'ROTH (the place where grass or sedge grows). A spot before which the Israelites encamped on their departure from Egypt when Pharaoh's host overtook them (Exod. xiv. 2, 9; Numb. xxxiii. 7, 8). It must have been near the northern end of the western arm of the Red sea, or gulf of Suez, perhaps eastward of Baal-zephon. There are still places which bear the name Ghuweybel el-Boos, 'the bed of reeds'; and it has been thought that one of these might indicate Pi-hahiroth. But the identification is very doubtful, the more because the face of the country has probably changed, the head of the gulf running anciently farther to the north.

PILATE. Pontius Pilatus, ordinarily called Pilate, was (as usually reckoned) the sixth Roman procurator of Judea, succeeding Valerius Gratus. It was under his government that John the Baptist commenced his ministry (Luke iii. 1) and that our Lord was put to death. This last fact is confirmed by the Latin historian Tacitus (Annal., lib. xv. 44). Pilate entered on his office at the end of 25 or beginning of 26 A.D., in the reign of Tiberius: he held it about ten years, till a short time before that emperor's death. He was unscrupulous in the exercise of his authority; and instances are recorded by Josephus of his contempt of the Jews, as bringing the Roman standards with the emperor's image into Jerusalem (Antiq., lib. xviii. 3, § 1; Bell. Jud., lib. ii. 9, § 2). An atrocity is also referred to by St. Luke (xiii. 1) which Josephus does not notice. His behaviour was equally tyrannical towards the Samaritans; and, on their complaint to Vitellius, president or prefect of Syria, Pilate was ordered to go to Rome to answer for his conduct before the emperor. His deposition must have occurred in 36 A.D., most probably prior to the passover. Before he arrived in Rome, however, Tiberius was dead (March 16, 37 A.D.). Pilate is said to have been banished by Caligula to Vienne in Gaul: according to Eusebius, he put an end to his own existence (Hist. Eccles., lib. ii. 7).

The crime in which Pilate, as our Lord's judge, was involved is so frightful, that we are almost involuntarily led to charge more of its malignity upon him than upon a fair examination he would seem to deserve. The history is familiar to every reader, and need not be here repeated (Matt. xxvii.; Mark xv.; Luke xxiii.; John xviii. 28-40, xix.). Pilate was sensible that Jesus was without blame, and would have released him, had he thought it possible without peril to himself. He was alarmed at the political charge urged against Christ making himself a king, and believed with reason that if he spared one so accused the emperor's jealousy would be roused. He was perplexed at our Lord's behaviour before him, utterly unlike that of an ordinary criminal, and at his being said to be the Son of God, and must have thought of the demi-gods of legendary story, and perhaps apprehended if he condemned such a man that the wrath of some deity would light upon him. He was further troubled by his wife's dream and message (for at that time procurators took their wives with them into their provinces: see Tacitus, Annal., lib. iii. 33, 34). He tried therefore to cast the responsibility on Herod. He scourged Jesus, hoping that that punishment would move to pity and be deemed sufficient. He proffered the people the choice between the Lord and Barabbas, trusting that they could never prefer the robber; and as a last miserable expedient he washed his hands in public, as a token that he was guiltless of the Saviour's blood. 'He was,' says bishop Ellicott, 'a thorough and complete type of the later-Roman man of the world. Stern but not relentless, shrewd and world-worn, prompt and practical, haughtily just, and yet . . . self-seeking and cowardly, able to perceive what was right, but without moral strength to follow it out, the sixth procurator of Judea stands forth a terrible instance of a man whom the fear of endangered self-interest drove not only to act against the deliberate convictions of his heart and his conscience, but further to commit an act of the utmost cruelty and injustice, even after those convictions had been deepened by warnings and strengthened by presentiments' (Hist. Lect., p. 350; comp. pp. 340-351, and Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Pilatus').

The name of Pilate's wife according to tradition was Procla, or Claudia Procula. Some memorials called the Acta Pilati were probably sent by the procurator to the emperor: if so, the genuine documents have perished: those afterwards so termed were forgeries. See Winer, ubi supra; Gieseler, Kirchengesch., vol. i. pp. 84, 85, note 3. Tischenendorf's judgment may be found in his Evang. Apocr., Prol. pp. liv.-lxvii.

PIL'DASH (Name?). One of the sons of Nahor, Abraham's brother, by Milcah (Gen. xxii. 22).

PILE'HA (a slice). One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 24).

PILL, PILLED (Gen. xxx. 37, 38). Peeled, stripped off.

PILLAR. Pillars are spoken of in scripture as supporting a building (Judges xvi. 26, 29; see HOUSE), or placed for ornaments (1 Kings vii. 15-32; see BOAZ, JACHIN). Pillars were sometimes set up as trophies or memorials; and with a religious purpose libations were poured upon them: they were also inscribed (Gen. xxviii. 18, xxxv. 20; Exod. xxiv. 4; 1 Sam. xv. 12, where 'place' in our version; 2 Sam. xviii. 18).

The word is often used in a symbolical sense; as to describe the columnar form in which the divine Presence was manifested (Exod. xlii. 21). So the earth is represented as resting on pillars (1 Sam. ii. 8); and eminent persons are thus designated (Gal. ii. 2). 'The plain of the pillar' (Judges ix. 6) is rather the 'oak of the pillar,' an oak-grove planted near a memorial stone, perhaps that mentioned in Josh. xxiv. 26.

PILLAR OF SALT (Gen. xix. 26). See LOT.

PILLOW. See BED.

PIL'TAI (whom Jehovah delivers). A priest in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 17).

PIN (Judges xvi. 14; Ezek. xv. 3). See NAIL, WEAVING.

PINE, PINE-TREE. There are many species of trees belonging to the genus Pinus. Most of them are timber trees, growing generally in various temperate countries of the northern hemisphere. We find 'pine' or 'pine-tree' only three times in our version of the scripture (Neh. viii. 15; Isai. xii. 19, lx. 13); and in all these places the translation is erroneous. In the first-named the oil-tree, perhaps the wild olive, oleaster, is meant. In the two other passages, though Henderson renders 'pine' and others propose elm and plane-tree, Gesenius with more reason prefers hard oak, holm, ilex. The 'ash' (xlv. 19) in all probability designates a pine. See ASH-TREE.

PINNACLE. The devil is said to have placed our Lord upon a pinnacle of the temple (Matt. iv. 5; Luke iv. 9): as the definite article occurs, some special 'pinnacle' is intended. The word used in the original may well signify a pointed roof or gable. It is probable therefore that the place intended was the roof of Herod's royal portico, which overhung the ravine of the Kidron at such a height that, according to Josephus, if any one standing on it looked down into the valley, his eye could scarce reach the bottom (see Alford on Matt. iv. 5).

P'INON (darkness). One of the 'dukes' of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 41; 1 Chron. i. 52); or possibly the name of the district which the 'duke' ruled. See PUNON.

PIPE. The Hebrew word which we translate 'pipe' (1 Sam. x. 5; 1 Kings i. 40; Isai. v. 12, xxx. 29; Jer. xlviii. 36) signifies 'bored through.' It would seem to have been a pipe furnished with holes. The ancient Egyptian instrument was very similar to that now in use in western Asia. It was quite straight, generally about eighteen inches in length, but sometimes longer or shorter, with mouth-piece made of reed. Some had three holes, others four. Actual specimens have been found. Occasionally this pipe was double, consisting of two tubes with a common mouth-piece: the left-hand one had fewer holes and emitted a deeper sound: the other had more holes with a sharper sound. This pipe is still used in Palestine. It was very suitable for festive occasions; but sometimes for lamentation. Thus our Lord found pipers in the ruler's house whose daughter was dead; and these he ordered away (Matt. ix. 23).

P'IRA (1 Esdr. v. 19).

PIR'AM (wild-ass-like, i.e. indomitable). The king of Jarmuth, one of the Amorite chiefs who leagued against Israel after the submission of Gibeon (Josh. x. 3).

PIR'ATHON (perhaps chief). A place in the land of Ephraim (Judges xii. 15). It is now called Fer'ata, six miles from Nablous.

PIRA'THONITES. The inhabitants of Pirathon (Judges xii. 13, 15; 2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chron. xi. 31, xxvii. 14).

PIS'GAH (part, piece). A ridge or summit in the mountains of Abarim, on the east of the Dead sea, towards the wilderness. It was on the southern border of Sihon's kingdom, and in the territory afterwards assigned to Reuben, consequently to the north of the Arnon (Numb. xxi. 20, xxiii. 14; Deut. iii. 27, iv. 49, xxxiv. 1). The view from Pis-gah must have been extensive, as it was to the point Nebo, probably the loftiest height of the ridge, that Moses was commanded to ascend in order to feast his eyes before closing them in death with the view of that delightful land which for his sin he was forbidden to enter. See ASHDOTH-PIS-GAH, NEBO.

PISID'IA. A region of Asia Minor, noticed in the New Testament as bordering on Pamphylia, and containing a city called Antioch (Acts xiii. 14, xiv. 24), sometimes regarded as a Phrygian town. This district stretched along the maritime province or Pamphylia, on the declivities of Taurus, and was inhabited by a warlike people whom the Persians were never able to subdue. Even under Alexander and his successors they preserved their independence and made inroads on the level country. As the Syrian power sank, they extended themselves and appropriated several towns, Antioch being of the number, splitting into various petty sovereignties. The Romans, to whom they had been useful auxiliaries, left them to themselves, but took possession of Antioch, where they established a colony, and other towns in the plain country.

P'ISON (overflowing). One of the four rivers into which the stream that watered Eden was parted. It is described with great particularity by the sacred writer, as if less clearly known than the rest. It is said to compass the land of Havilah, which might be distinguished as producing good gold, bdellium, and the onyx-stone. See HAVILAH. Conjectures as to the Pison are almost innumerable. Some identify it with the Phasis, others with the Nile: some will have it the Danube, others the Araxes, and others again the Ganges. See these opinions examined by Kalisch (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 92, 93, 96), who decides for the Indus. A still greater number of conjectures are enumerated in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, art. 'Eden.' It may be sufficient here to cite the opinion of Col. Chesney, who thinks that 'the rivers known by the comparatively-modern names of Halys and Araxes are those which in Genesis have the names of Pison and Gihon, and that the country within the former is the land of Havilah, whilst that which borders upon the latter is the still more remarkable country of Oush' (Exped. to Euphrates and Tigris, vol. i. p. 267). See EDEN.

PIS'PAH (dispersion?). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 38).

PIT. There are several Hebrew words which are more or less frequently rendered

'pit' by our translators. Bôr is generally a cistern or tank constructed as a receptacle for rain-water. See CISTERNA. And, as these places when empty were used as dungeons, the word has the signification of a prison (Zech. ix. 11); it also denotes a grave, or sepulchre hewn in the rock (Psal. xxviii. 1; Isai. xiv. 15, 19, xxxviii. 18). The word mahâmôrôth occurs only once (Psal. cxl. 10); it means whirlpools, abysses of water. Shahhath properly is a sinking; hence a pit or chasm, used for a pit-fall (Ezek. xix. 4, 8), and figuratively for plots, treachery, or peril (Psal. vii. 15, ix. 15; Prov. xxvi. 27; Jonah ii. 6, marg.). Sometimes the word denotes a hole or cistern with mire at the bottom, as in Job ix. 31, where our translators render 'ditch.' It also signifies the grave (Job xxxiii. 24; Psal. xxx. 9), and thence death, or corruption the consequence of death (xvi. 10, xlix. 9): comp. the phrase 'see death' (lxxxix. 49). Shêôl is often translated 'pit' (Numb. xvi. 30, 33; Job xvii. 16): it means the unseen world. See HELL.

PITCH. There can be little doubt that the 'pitch' (côpher) of Gen. vi. 14 was bitumen or asphalt. Another word, zepheth, is used (Exod. ii. 3; Isai. xxxiv. 9), implying to flow, or become liquid: this probably was the resinous pitch obtained from the pine and fir-trees. There is another term, hêmâr, usually rendered 'slime,' as in Gen. xi. 3. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 880, 881, believes that the three words designate mineral pitch in three aspects—zepheth when liquid, hêmâr in the solid state, and côpher in reference to its use in overlaying wood-work.

PITCHER. Besides the leather or skin bottles (see BOTTLE) in common use among the Hebrews for keeping liquids, earthen pitchers must have been employed for drawing water (Gen. xxiv. 14, 15, 16, 45, 46; Lam. iv. 2; Mark xiv. 13; Luke xxii. 10). And indeed both sorts of pitchers may be commonly seen so used now; and also ancient Assyrian and Egyptian ones have been discovered. As to the 'pitchers' in which Gideon placed his lamps (Judges vii. 16, 20), Dr. Thomson has often seen lamps carried at night in a pitcher or earthen vessel (The Land and the Book, p. 450).

PITHOM (the narrow place? abode of Atum?) One of the treasure-cities which the Israelites built for Pharaoh (Exod. i. 11). It is believed to be identical with the Patumos mentioned by Herodotus (lib. ii. 158); and this lay on the eastern side of the Pelusiac arm of the Nile, in the Arabian part of Egypt, not far from the canal uniting the Nile with the Red sea. Pithom therefore may perhaps be placed on or near the site of Abbaseh at the entrance of the Wady et-Tumeylat.

PITHON (the meaning can only be guessed at). A descendant of king Saul (1 Chron. viii. 35, ix. 41).

PITY. A quality or grace which feeling for the distress of others prompts us to relieve them. God is said to pity those who fear him, as a father pitieth his children (Psal. ciii. 13). Such a temper in one man to another is inculcated in 1 Pet. iii. 8.

PLAGUE. The words 'plague' and 'pestilence' are used with laxity in our version. The former does not even always imply a disease (e.g. Rev. xvi. 21). And, when diseases are meant, it is not always one particular type: thus we read of the plague of leprosy (Lev. xiii. 2), of an issue of blood (Mark v. 29). And often both words seem to imply any deadly epidemic. But it can hardly be doubted that some of these must have been that fatal sickness which has even to our own time specially ravaged Egypt and the east, and which formerly visited western Europe, the plague, described as virulent typhus in the highest degree contagious, and accompanied with extreme debility. On an uncertain day of the disease there is an eruption of buboes or carbuncles, and at the first outbreak it is usually fatal in a few days, perhaps hours. The word 'plague' is sometimes used symbolically (1 Kings viii. 38).

PLAGUES OF EGYPT. This is the ordinary appellation of those ten fearful judgments which were inflicted on Pharaoh and his people on account of their unjust detention of the Israelites in slavery. Reduced they had been without reason to bondage by a king unmindful of the benefits which Joseph had conferred on Egypt: they were made, too, to serve with rigour (Exod. i. 8-14); the demand therefore to release them was one most proper to be enforced. Jehovah apprised Moses of his intention to bring the Israelites into Canaan, but yet he instructed him at first to ask only leave for three days' journey into the wilderness to offer a great sacrifice to God (iii. 8, 17, 18). It was soon, however, perfectly understood that the tribes once delivered would return no more: otherwise the act of Pharaoh in pursuing—daring madness as it was—would have had no shadow of reasonable purpose. It is not to be thought, therefore, that the Egyptians lent their jewels (xii. 35, 36) in expectation of their being returned. They were gifts—a righteous recompense, so far as it went, for the injustice committed against Israel.

The scene of the plagues was Lower Egypt, 'the field of Zoan' (Psal. lxxviii. 12, 43): whether they extended to Upper Egypt we have no means of knowing.

The first plague inflicted after the sign of Aaron's rod becoming a serpent, which the magicians imitated (Exod. vii. 10-13), was the changing of water into blood, that is, into something resembling blood, of a character so pestilential that the fish (which are abundant in the Nile) died, and no man could drink of the river (which ordinarily was held sacred). The Egyptian magicians effected a kind of imitation of this plague, which lasted seven days; and Pharaoh still hardened his heart (14-25).

The second was the plague of frogs. These creatures have a sacred character in Egypt, and still abound there in summer and autumn. But this judgment was inflicted in early spring; and grievous must the infliction have been. The magicians, however, contrived to imitate it; though it had been more to purpose if they removed the frogs that swarmed everywhere.

instead of gathering more. And still Pharaoh hardened his heart (viii. 1-15).

Next was a plague of lice, or it might possibly have been mosquitos. Both these kinds of insects are common in Egypt, and are an intolerable annoyance. Multiplied as they were by the miracle, the magicians, unable any longer to rival Moses and Aaron, were constrained to acknowledge, 'This is the finger of God' (16-19).

The fourth was the plague of flies, from which, it is expressly said, Goshen was to be free. Travellers speak of common flies covering the food, and producing ophthalmia by their pertinacious clustering round the eyes of the Egyptians. But it is not quite certain that flies are meant. Some have suggested beetles, and some gad-flies: certainly, when the infliction is mentioned elsewhere, the devouring of the people is spoken of (Psal. lxxviii. 45), which must at least mean some venomous bite. Pharaoh now was inclined to yield a little: still on the removal of the plague he again hardened his heart (Exod. viii. 20-32).

The fifth was a grievous murrain on the cattle, some kinds of the animals destroyed being accounted sacred (as, for instance, oxen). And none of those belonging to the children of Israel died (ix. 1-7).

Still more appalling was the sixth plague, boils upon man and beast—perhaps, it has been thought, the disease specially termed the plague, which is characterized by fearful swellings; or it may have been elephantiasis, the black leprosy or 'botch of Egypt' (Deut. xxviii. 27). And these boils were upon the magicians (Exod. ix. 8-12).

The seventh was ushered in by a solemn warning. It was thunder and hail so terrific as to destroy the growing crops, to break trees, and smite down men who were exposed to it. And again Goshen was spared. Pharaoh again in his alarm—for any visitations of the kind are very rare in Egypt, where rain seldom falls—relented, but hardened once more his heart when the judgment was withdrawn (13-35).

A plague of locusts was the eighth. But on the announcement of it Pharaoh's servants remonstrated with him, and brought him to make some further concession; but it was not enough; and he contemptuously dismissed Moses and Aaron from his presence. Then came the locusts in frightful myriads, and consumed all that the hail had spared. Now Pharaoh in haste summoned the Hebrew chiefs, and seemed inclined to submit; but again when there was a respite he held out (x. 1-20).

A thick darkness for three days next hung upon Egypt—there being light in Goshen. It might be the samoom, or suffocating wind which fills the air with sand, intensely aggravated; and spirits of evil may have been at hand to increase the horror (Psal. lxxviii. 49). For three days no man could rise from his place. Great was the obstinate king's alarm: he entreated mercy, and made a further concession; but he did not yet grant all that was required, and turning upon Moses in his impotent folly threatened him with death if again he saw his face (Exod. x. 21-28).

It was an ominous threat; and awful were the words of Moses in reply, 'I will see thy face again no more' (29). There was one more stroke for which the thick darkness seemed a preparatory mourning. The first-born, the choicest in every house, was smitten. And a fearful wail burst forth at midnight through all the land of Egypt: 'there was not a house where there was not one dead.' Now the rebel will was subdued. Pharaoh thrust the Israelites out, shrieking after them in his terror: 'Be gone, and bless me also' (xi., xii. 29-36). In that crisis was the passover instituted.

Generally we may observe on the course of these plagues their gradually-increasing severity, their peculiar fitness to show the vanity of Egyptian idols, and their close connection with natural phenomena, and yet so timed and so aggravated as to exhibit unmistakably miraculous power, and to prove that the great agent was 'the finger of God.'

PLAIN. By this word is frequently to be understood the ARABAH, which see. Other plains were that of Jezreel or Esdraelon, the Philistine plain, and that of Sharon. See ESDRAELON, PHILISTIA, SHARON. The term, however, is often improperly used in our translation, as the rendering of various Hebrew words implying meadow, downs, &c. &c. These cannot be enumerated and distinguished here. They must be sought rather in a lexicon than in a work like the present.

PLAIT, PLAINTING (1 Pet. iii. 3). See HAIR.

PLANE-TREE (Ecclus. xxiv. 14). The Platanus orientalis.

PLANETS (2 Kings xxiii. 5). See MAZAROTH.

PLASTER. The use of plaster was well known to the ancient Hebrews. Notices of its being employed may be found in Lev. xiv. 42, 48; Deut. xxvii. 2, 4. It was used, too, in Babylon, where the brick materials were coated with stucco or plaster (Dan. v. 5).

PLEDGE. Something deposited as security for an act to be done or a payment to be made. Thus Judah gave his signet to Tamar as security for the kid he promised to send her (Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18). The Mosaic law was very tender to the debtor in respect of pledges. If the raiment was taken, it was to be restored before sunset (Exod. xxii. 26, 27). Neither the upper nor the nether mill-stone was to be taken in pledge; because the want of it would interfere with the daily food of the household (Deut. xxiv. 6). The creditor, moreover, was not to enter a house for a pledge, but to wait at the door till the debtor brought it him (10, 11). Various other merciful regulations were made (12, 13, 17); and harshness in retaining pledges was often censured (Job xxii. 6, xxiv. 3, 9; Ezek. xviii. 7, 12, 16, xxxiii. 15). The 'pledge' (1 Sam. xvii. 18) must have been some token which David was to bring back from his brethren.

PLEIADES. A well-known cluster of stars in the shoulder of the constellation Taurus, the Bull. According to Greek mythology, seven daughters of Atlas being pursued by Orion were changed by Jupiter into doves, and then placed in the heavens. Their names were Electra, Mala, Taygeta, Alcyone, Celano, Sterope, and Merope. Six stars of this group are visible to the naked eye, but many more with the aid of the telescope. The Pleiades are intended by the Hebrew word Cimah or Kimah (Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31): the same word occurs in Amos v. 8, but there it is rendered 'the seven stars.'

PLOUGH. The ancient Syrian plough was a very simple instrument—at first perhaps but an improvement on the hoe with which originally the soil was broken up—and was a stake from which projected a shorter pointed piece of wood. Afterwards it consisted of a pole, a point or share, a handle, and a yoke. This is the plough now in use, very much resembling the ploughs figured on the Egyptian monuments. It is a most imperfect implement, making no proper furrow. Ploughs were drawn by oxen, driven by a goad or long pole furnished at one end with a flat piece of metal to clear the plough, and at the other with a spike: see Pict. Bible, note on Hos. x. 11. Dr. Thomson describes the Arabs as fond of ploughing in company, both for protection and because the land is cultivated in common, and says that he has seen as many as twelve ploughs closely following in a line (1 Kings xix. 19); one sower being enough for the whole company (The Land and the Book, pp. 143-145). Our Lord takes an apt illustration from the plough (Luke ix. 62). The labourer must look forward at his furrow: if he turns his eyes aside, his work will be spoiled. See AGRICULTURE.

Ancient Egyptian plough. From a painting at Thebes.

Plough still used in Asia Minor.

Modern plough, used in Armenia.

PLUMB-LINE. A well-known instrument by which exact perpendicularity is secured. It is symbolically used in scripture to denote the strict line of justice according to which God would act towards those who provoked him (Amos vii. 7, 8: comp. 2 Kings xxi. 13; Isai. xxviii. 17).

PO'CHERETH OF ZEBATH (snaring or getting ahead of the foes). It is probable that Pochereth-hatsebam is one appellative; being the name of a person whose descendants, called Solomon's servants, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59).

POET, POETRY. It is obvious that the poetical element prevails largely in the composition of the sacred volume. Indeed some of the books have been specially classed as 'the poetical books,' an appellation which was given them by a variety of ancient authors. These books, which are almost wholly metrical, are Job, the Psalms, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles or Song of Solomon.

But they by no means contain the whole of Hebrew poetry. Large parts of the prophetic writings are in verse; and, besides, there are to be found many detached poems and stanzas in the historical portions of the bible. Examples of these might be readily produced: it is sufficient here to name the address of Lamech to his wives (Gen. iv. 23, 24), the triumphal odes of Moses and of Deborah (Exod. xv. 1-21; Judges v.), and in the New Testament the canticles of the Virgin, of Zacharias, and of Simeon (Luke i. 46-55, 68-79, ii. 29-32).

It was natural that poetry should be developed among the Hebrews. For it is the expression of high-raised thought. Anything which lifts the mind above the routine of ordinary events, as it furnishes poetic material, seems to require poetic utterance. Some high and noble object to be gained, the rapid change, the exultation of success, the misery of failure, may even natural scenes of loveliness or grandeur—these cannot be told of in unimpassioned words. The pulse will quicken and the tongue break forth in metaphoric language: the ideas will be adorned with imagery appropriate to the various moods of minds jubilant or sorrowful. Israelitish history was specially calculated to kindle the poetic rapture. The chosen people were brought into communion with the Highest. The wonders that were wrought for them, the motives made to tell on them, the mysterious depths into which they might look, must have given them a loftiness of thought to which less-favoured nations could not reach. And, when, besides, there was vouchsafed a marvellous afflatus, that indescribable influence which brought the human mind into near relation with the divine while the secrets of Deity were revealed to man, inspired poetry, it is evident, must be the noblest of all poetry. Truly the harp of Zion was attuned to glorious themes: no wonder that its strains have sounded clear above the world's din, through all the generations of the world's history. The grandeur of its thoughts, then, is the pre-eminent feature of Hebrew poetry. And because of that very grandeur it has not been solicitous about external form. Other nations have been more attentive to the harmony of expression. They have cast their verse into measure, or fettered it by rhyme. They have wrought it and polished it with a finished art, to which the sublime conceptions of the Hebrew bards could not stoop. It must not, indeed, be supposed that poetry was not cultivated at all in Israel. It is very likely that in the schools of the prophets the taste of the young disciples was taught and refined. They were occupied, we know, in hymning Jehovah's praise, their choral chants accompanied with instrumental music (1 Sam. x. 5, xix. 20). And afterwards we find the sweet psalmist of Israel appointing large companies of Levites for the choral worship of the sanctuary, under the presidency of masters whose poetic compositions have come down to us—Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxv.). But, though cultivated Hebrew poetry preserves a natural simplicity and freedom, it is not destitute of the characteristics of verse. Peculiar words and grammatical forms are introduced. Imagery is employed, borrowed from various sources. And there is an elevated tone and a majesty or tenderness of thought and diction, observable generally in all poetical compositions. Josephus professes to discover in its metres, like those of the Greeks and Romans (Antiq., lib. ii. 16, § 4, lib. iv. 8, § 44, lib. vii. 12, § 3); and Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome seem to have adopted the same notion (Euseb., Præp. Evang., lib. xi. 5; Jer., Præf. in Chron. Euseb., Præf. in Job.); yet no such metres are perceptible to modern senses; nor can it reasonably be imagined—making allowance for the loss of the ancient pronunciation—that they ever existed.

But we can discover one great characteristic of Hebrew poetry, a characteristic, too, most consonant with its principle. Its pre-eminence has been said to consist in the loftiness of its conceptions; and its mode of expression is found in what has been happily called 'thought-rhythm.' It is not the language which has been reduced to verse; it is the thought that arranges itself in a wonderful correspondence which, like the lights and shades of a picture, like the echo repeating the song of the swain, was prominent in those antithetical strains which celebrated their great deliverance (Exod. xv. 1, 21), and is the measure generally of the Hebrew poetical idea (see Saalschütz, Arch. der Heb., cap. 26, vol. i. pp. 267, 268). There is a certain equality, resemblance, or relationship visible between periods or verses—a rhythmus of propositions; so that thought in successive lines answers to thought, and things to things. Such is the general character of Hebrew versification; and this parallelism occurs in every part of Old Testament poetry. An example will best explain the meaning of parallelism. Take then the following:—

'Doth the wild-ass bray over his grass?
'Doth the ox low over his fodder?'

Job vi. 5.

Here there is an equality in the number of words with exact proportion of thought. All the examples of parallelism of course do not resemble that just given. There are varieties and gradations; and the correspondence is sometimes more accurate and manifest, and sometimes more vague and obscure. It is therefore necessary to classify and arrange the different species of parallels. This has been done by bishop Lowth in his Lectures on Hebrew Poetry, and by bishop Jebb in his Sacred Literature. The principles on which they have proceeded will be illustrated by the following remarks. Poetical parallelism may be taken to consist of four species—parallel lines cognate or gradational, parallel lines antithetic, parallel lines synthetic or constructive, and parallel lines introverted.

1. Parallel lines cognate or gradational are those which correspond by expressing the same or a similar sentiment in different but nearly-equivalent terms. Occasionally as member succeeds member there is a gradation of thought, a kind of ascending (or sometimes descending) scale in the related terms and periods, with a marked distinction of meaning. This species of parallelism is perhaps the most frequent of all. The following may be taken as examples:—

'O the happiness of that man Who hath not walked in the counsel of the ungodly,
And hath not stood in the way of sinners,
And hath not sat in the seat of the scornful.'
Psal. i. 1.

Again:
Who shall ascend the mountain of Jehovah?
And who shall stand within his holy place?
The clean of hands, and the pure in heart.'

Psal. xxiv. 3, 4.

The next examples are from the prophets:
'Seek ye Jehovah while he may be found,
Call ye upon him while he is near:
Let the wicked forsake his way,
And the unrighteous man his thoughts,
And let him return to Jehovah; and he will compassionate him;
And unto our God; for he aboundeth in forgiveness.'

Isai. lv. 6, 7.

'How shall I give thee up, O Ephraim?
Abandon thee, O Israel?
How shall I make thee as Admah?
Place thee in the condition of Zeboim?
My heart is turned upon me:
My bowels yearn all together.
I will not execute the fury of mine anger
I will not return to make destruction of Ephraim.

For God I am, and not man,
The Holy One in the midst of thee, although I am no frequenter of cities.'

Hosea xi. 8, 9 (Horsley's transl.)

2. Parallel lines antithetic are those which correspond by an opposition of terms and sentiments; the contrast being sometimes in expressions and sometimes only in sense. The degrees of antithesis vary from the precise opposition of form to form, word to word, idea to idea, to a general disparity or contrariety in the two propositions. Parallelisms of this kind are not so well adapted for elevated and impassioned poetry, as for the expression of moral aphorisms, proverbs, and detached pithy sentences. Accordingly many of the proverbs of Solomon assume this form, and owe to it much of their elegance and force.

Thus:

'A wise son rejoiceth his father;
But a foolish son is the grief of his mother.'

Prov. x. 1.

Here every word has its opposite. The antithesis is less complete in the following example:

'The memory of the just is a blessing;
But the name of the wicked shall rot.'

Prov. x. 7.

There are also instances in the prophetic writings. The following is a noble one: 'For the mountains shall be removed; And the hills shall be overthrown; But my kindness from thee shall not be removed; And the covenant of my peace shall not be overthrown.'

Isai. liv. 10.

3. Parallel lines synthetic or constructive are those in which there is a similar form of construction; when there is a correspondence between the different propositions, in respect of the shape and turn of the whole sentence and of the constituent parts, such as noun answering to noun, verb to verb, member to member, negative to negative, interrogative to interrogative. The variety of this form is great; the parallelism being more or less exact. The following may be taken as an example:

'The law of Jehovah is perfect, restoring the soul:

The testimony of Jehovah is sure, making wise the simple:

The precepts of Jehovah are right, rejoicing the heart:

The commandment of Jehovah is clear, enlightening the eyes:

The fear of Jehovah is pure, enduring for ever:

The judgments of Jehovah are truth, they are just altogether;

More desirable than gold, or than much fine gold,

And sweeter than honey, or the dropping of honey-combs.'

Psal. xix. 7-10.

Of these kinds of parallelism there are many subordinate varieties, pointed out by bishop Jebb; for an account of which his work must be consulted.

4. Stanzas are sometimes so constructed that the first line corresponds to the last, the second to the penultimate or last but one; and so forth throughout. This is called the inverted parallelism. The following are said to be examples:

'My son, if thy heart be wise,

My heart also shall rejoice:

Yea, my reins shall rejoice,

When thy lips speak right things.'

Prov. xxiii. 15, 16.

The idols of the heathen are silver and gold,

The work of men's hands:

They have mouths, but they speak not
They have eyes, but they see not;
They have ears, but they hear not;
Neither is there any breath in their mouths:

They who make them are like unto them.
So are all they who put their trust in them.'

Psal. cxxxv. 15-18.

It must be confessed that the classification just given is not always quite distinguishable. Other critics, therefore, have proposed different systems. That of De Wette is elaborate and ingenious. The following is a condensed sketch of it.

There are four different classes—

1. The original perfect kind of parallelism of members, which coincides with metre and rhyme, yet without being the same with them. Such is the kind of parallelism in which the song of Laamech is composed (Gen. iv. 23, 24).

2. The unequal parallelism, subdivided into—

(1) The simple unequal (Psal. lxxviii. 32).

(2) The complex, with the first or second member composed of two propositions, embracing—

(a) The synonymous (Psal. xxxvi. 6).

(b) The antithetic (Psal. xv. 4).

(c) The synthetic (Psal. xv. 5).

(3) That with the simple member disproportionately small (Psal. xci. 7).

(4) That with the complex member increased to three or four propositions (Psal. i. 3).

(5) That with a short clause or supplement, for the most part of the second member, instead of the full subordinate parallelism (Psal. xxiii. 3).

3. The double parallelism, the equality being restored by both members becoming complex. Of this kind also there are—

(a) The synonymous (Psal. xxxi. 10).

(b) The antithetic (Psal. xxx. 5).

(c) The synthetic (Sol. Song ii. 3).

4. The rhythmical parallelism, where the thoughts do not correspond either by their resemblance, or by antithesis, or by synthesis, but where there is a simply-external rhythmical form. There are various examples:

(1) With the number of words nearly equal (Psal. xix. 11).

(2) With striking inequality in the number of the words (Psal. xxx. 2).

(3) With a double and a simple member (Psal. xiv. 7).

(4) With two double members (Psal. xxxi. 22).

See De Wette's Introd. to the Psalms, translated by Torrey, in the American Bibl. Repos., July 1833, pp. 496-504.

De Wette, Köster, and Ewald have further attempted to show that there is a strophical character in Hebrew poetry. Verses consist of parallel members; and so strophes are said to be composed of parallel verses. Köster published the books of Job and of Ecclesiastes and the Psalms arranged after this fashion.

The whole system of parallelism has been carried too far by many writers. The general principles are plainly enough marked; but the minute subdivisions and classifications hardly exist save in the imagination of fanciful critics. With the licence which some have assumed, it would not be difficult to arrange almost any composition, if at all of an elevated or oratorical cast, in parallelisms of some kind.

Hebrew parallelism is not confined to the Old Testament. It occurs also in the Apocrypha: the book of Ecclesiasticus, for example, is composed almost entirely in this way. And in the sententious formulæ of the rabbinical writers the same mode of expression is often to be discovered. It is natural to expect it in the New Testament, written by Jews whose minds were moulded in the form of their elder sacred writings. Accordingly we shall find, not only in the inspired songs (Luke i., ii.), but also in some of the more solemn discourses and pithy admonitions, traces of a parallel structure. Yet here there has been exaggeration to a most ridiculous extent. Bishop Jebb professes to find couplets and stanzas in our Lord's speeches. Boys in his Tactica Sacra has arranged several of the epistles in parallel lines. And this trifling is carried farther still by Forbes in his Symmetrical Structure of Scripture. The kind of amusement in which such writers have indulged merits a grave censure.

We may discover in the bible different kinds of poetical composition. Here too, however, ingenious men have too much indulged their fancy, and have imagined that they could find, besides lyric, idyllic, dramatic, even epic poetry. (1.) Lyric poems or odes are the most ancient. These were intended to be sung or accompanied by music. There are many noble examples of them in various parts of scripture, as the song of Moses (Exod. xv. 1-19); that of Deborah (Judges v.); very many of the Psalms, &c. (2.) Elegiac poetry is in a mournful strain. Examples are the lament of David over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 19-27), and the Lamentations of Jeremiah. (3.) Didactic or moral poetry is intended to instruct. It is unimpassioned, earnest, and sententious, often delivering sage maxims in elegant and pointed verse. (4.) Dramatic poetry is characterized by an interchange of speakers. We find it in the book of Job and in the Song of Solomon. Other kinds of poetry can hardly be said to have been developed in the remains preserved to us of the Hebrew muse.

The prophets generally adopted poetry as the vehicle of their utterances. Many sublime odes are to be found in their writings, as well as pieces distinguished for solemn grandeur, when they threatened the impatient with the approaching sore judgment of Jehovah's anger. Elegiac strains often occur, lamenting the sad fate of Ephraim or Judah; and the return of prosperity is described with pastoral images, presenting somewhat of the idyllic character. The poetic fire burns most brightly in the earlier prophets: the later ones, Ezekiel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, are more prosaic; much of what they penned is simple prose.

A few words must be added on the alphabetical structure of some of the Hebrew poems. These are twelve in number, viz. Psalms xxv., xxxiv., xxxvii., cxi., cxli., cxix., cxlv.; Prov. xxxi. 10-31; Lam. i., ii., iii., iv. They have not all, however, the plan perfectly carried out. In Psalms cxi., cxii. each line or half-verse begins with the letters successively of the Hebrew alphabet. In Psal. cxix.; Lam. iii. there are series of verses each having the same initial letter in regular order. In the rest there are certain irregularities and changes. Perhaps it was intended by this structure to facilitate the committing of these poems to memory.

The highest excellence of Hebrew poetry consists (as above noted) in its religious character. It is stamped with a divine impress. A loftier element pervades it than can be found in the most noble productions of the heathen muse. This must be borne in mind by the interpreter. He must mark its oriental form. He must acquaint himself with the modes of eastern expression, its luxuriant imagery, its boldness of metaphor. And he must take care to distinguish what is symbolical from what is literally intended, lest he mistake the drapery for the substance of the composition. But, while using all diligence in these respects, and observing many of the rules according to which poetry in general is expounded, the student of the poems of scripture must never forget that they come from him who is the Holy and the True One. Their meaning must not be frittered away, as if it were but exaggeration and flourish. The poetry of scripture was delivered 'by holy men of God, who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' (2 Pet. i. 21).

Some of the Greek poets are quoted in scripture; as Aratus (Phænomena), by St. Paul (Acts xvii. 28); Menander (Thais), by the same apostle (1 Cor. xv. 33); and also Epimenides a Cretan (Tit. i. 12). See QUOTATIONS.

POISON. The original word translated poison (Deut. xxxii. 24, 33; Job vi. 4; Psal. lviii. 4) implies 'heat,' and thence poison as causing inflammation. There is another word which signifies the poppy, hence, with 'water of' prefixed, poppy-juice, in our version 'water of gall' (Jer. viii. 14, ix. 15, xxiii. 15); this is sometimes used for poison generally, and even for the poison of serpents: it is rendered 'venom' and 'poison' in Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 16, and elsewhere 'gall.' See GALL. Poison in the passages here named is introduced by way of illustration: comp. Rom. iii. 13; James iii. 8.

POLL (2 Sam. xiv. 26; Ezek. xlv. 20). To cut or clip.

POL/LUX (Acts xxviii. 11). See CASTOR.

POMEGRANATE. This, the Punica granatum of botanists, belongs to the natural family of plants called Myrtaceæ. There is said to be but a single species of pomegranate, though there are certainly varieties. The pomegranate was well known to the Greeks; among whom parts of it were used medicinally. It has been highly valued in various countries, from Syria to the north of India, it was cultivated also in Egypt and other parts of northern Africa. Its dark-green foliage, its conspicuous flowers—of which the flower-cup, bell or tulip-shaped, and petals are both of a crimson colour—and its large reddish-coloured fruit, filled with juicy pleasant-flavoured pulp, which covers its numerous seeds, make it one of the most desirable products of warm countries. One kind is very large and double; but it bears no fruit, and is cultivated merely for its brilliant blossoms. Dr. Thomson thus describes the pomegranate: 'There are some pomegranate bushes in this neighbourhood (Hebron) which may even be called trees by way of courtesy, but in reality these large and delicious "apples" grow on a stout thorny bush. There are several kinds of them in this country. In Jebaah, on Lebanon, there is a variety perfectly black on the outside. The general colour, however, is a dull green, inclining to yellow; and some have even a blush of red spread over a part of their surface. The outside rind is thin but tough; and the bitter juice of it stains everything it touches with an undefined but indelible blue. The average size is about that of the orange; but some of those from Jaffa are as large as the egg of an ostrich. Within, the "grains" are arranged in longitudinal compartments as compactly as corn in the cob, and they closely resemble those of pale red corn, except that they are nearly transparent and very beautiful. A dish filled with these "grains" shelled out is a very handsome ornament on any table; and the fruit is as sweet to the taste as it is pleasant to the eye. They are ripe about the middle of October, and remain in good condition all winter. Suspended in the pantry they are kept partially dried through the whole year.

... The fruit was greatly esteemed in ancient times, and is mentioned by Moses as one of the excellences of the promised land (Deut. viii. 8); and by divine command he was to make pomegranates on the hem of the ephod—a golden bell (the blossom) and a pomegranate alternately round about the hem of the robe (Exod. xxviii. 33, 34); and they were re-produced in the temple, upon the network that covered the chapters on the top of "Jachin and Boaz," those noble pillars of brass—two hundred pomegranates in rows round about (1 Kings vii. 15-21). Solomon of course adorns his Song of Songs with allusions to this beautiful and pleasant fruit (Sol. Song iv. 3, 13, vi. 7, viii. 2); and while admiring it we may enter more readily into the gorgeous chamber of imagery where that poetic monarch delighted to dwell and to revel' (The Land and the Book, pp. 583, 584). The last allusion is probably to the practice still common of pressing out the juice into a kind of wine or sherbet.

POMMEL (2 Chron. iv. 12, 13). A projecting ornament belonging to the capital of a pillar: it is called a 'bowl' in 1 Kings vii. 41.

PONDS (Exod. vii. 19, viii. 5). The sheets of water left after the inundation of the Nile.

PON'TIUS PI'LATE. See PILATE.

PON'TUS. A region of Asia Minor. It is said to have derived its name from its lying upon the Pontus Euxinus, the 'Euxine sea.' Under the Roman emperors the name comprised the whole district along the southern bay of the Euxine, from the river Halys to Colchis and Armenia, separated on the south by lofty mountains from Cappadocia. In the south-east it was mountainous, in other parts level and fertile. After the defeat of the famous Mithridates king of Pontus, 66 B.C., a division of it was made, a portion being added to the Roman province of Bithynia, the rest being parcelled out among petty princes. In Nero's reign Pontus became a Roman province, under one administration with Cappadocia. We learn from the New Testament that Jews had established themselves there (Acts ii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 1). Aquila was a native of Pontus (Acts xviii. 2).

POOL. A large reservoir for water. Fountains in some parts of Palestine were rare; and streams failed during the summer and autumn; it was therefore necessary to collect the water in cisterns and in ponds or pools, both for culinary uses, and for the supply of cattle. The drying-up of these pools was a grievous calamity (Isai. xlii. 15). The people now take little pains to keep the pools by modern Syrian villages clean; and consequently travellers often complain of the filthiness of the liquid they are obliged to drink. See Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 212, 213.

There were many pools in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem for the water-supply of the city: such as the pool of Bethesda, the pool of Siloam, &c.; accounts of which are given under their respective names. The pools of Solomon, however, shall be briefly described here. These lie in a narrow valley between Beth-lehem and Hebron, about eight miles short of the last-named place. The valley falls away eastward: a large castellated Saracenic building, called Kasr-el-Burak, stands in it; and just abreast of this castle is the uppermost pool, each of the two others being on a lower level than the one preceding it. The native rock forms the bed. The sides are walls built up with large regularly-squared stones; and the style of the masonry bespeaks great antiquity. The bottom and sides have been carefully coated. The dimensions given by Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. vol. i. pp. 475, 476), are—for the first, that most to the east, 582 feet by 207 and 50 deep, the second 423 by 250 and 39 deep, the third 380 by 236 and 25 deep. But they are all narrower at the upper end; the first being 148, the second 160, the third 229 feet broad there. These pools are supplied with water mainly from a large fountain not far from the north-west angle of the upper pool. It is a large subterranean chamber, nearly 50 feet long, and half as broad, into which, at four points, the waters gathered from the surrounding country well up: they are conducted hence by an underground passage to the pools. According to tradition this was the 'spring shut up, the fountain sealed,' of Sol. Song iv. 12. The whole of the water from the fountain does not fall into the higher pool, but passes (about one half of it) into an open channel running along the north side. From this channel, and from the overflow of the higher, the lower pools are supplied. Beneath the lowest is a vaulted chamber, explored by Dr. Barclay, who says: 'I was delighted to find as veri-able an arch as ever was made, and with a true key-stone too! (City of the Great King, p. 102). Beyond the pools the valley into which they lead down is Wady Urtás, garden-like, and in a high state of cultivation. Some have believed that here we find the 'garden enclosed' of the Hebrew poet (Sol. Song iv. 12). A conduit on the face of the hill overhanging the north side of Wady Urtás carries off the water. It is sometimes of mason-work, coated with cement inside; sometimes pipes of baked clay, rising and falling with the varying surface of the ground, so that the hydrostatic law, that water rises to the height of its source, was known to the constructors; and it finally enters the south-west corner of the temple area (Thomson, ubi sup., pp. 603-606; Buchanan, Notes of Cler. Furlough, pp. 226-230). Many are disposed to believe that these gigantic reservoirs were really the work of Solomon (Eccles. ii. 4-6).

POOLS OF SOLOMON AND HILL COUNTRY OF JUDAH FROM S. W.

POOR. The poor were tenderly cared for by the Mosaic law. Their rights were specially secured in the administration of justice (Exod. xxiii. 6; Lev. xix. 15; Deut. i. 17); they were not to be oppressed (Prov. xiv. 31); God being specially the defender of the poor, and engaging to listen to their cry (Exod. xxii. 25-27). Many privileges also were granted to them. They might bring the least expensive sacrifices (Lev. v. 7, 11, xii. 8): to them specially belonged the gleanings and remnants of the fields and vineyards (xix. 9, 10; Deut. xxiv. 19-22). The produce of the sabbatical year was theirs (Exod. xxiii. 11); they were to be freely invited to the sacrificial feasts (Deut. xiv. 28, 29, xvi. 10, 11, xxvi. 12, 13); and they were to be liberally assisted in their necessities (xv. 7-11). There were various provisions of the Hebrew polity which tended to diminish pauperism. Thus land, any man's inheritance, could be sold only for a term of years: at the jubilee it would return to its original owner, or his heirs (Lev. xxv. 23-28); wages, too, were to be punctually paid (xix. 13). A family therefore was not likely to be permanently reduced. The same kindly treatment of the poor is inculcated in the New Testament (Matt. v. 42, xxv. 34-40; Gal. ii. 10; James ii. 1-5; 1 John iii. 17). The word 'poor' is sometimes used in a figurative sense, for those who are humble of heart (Isai. lxxvi. 2; Matt. v. 3). And it was declared to be a peculiar mark of the gospel that it was preached to the poor (xi. 5); there being no respect of persons with God.

POPLAR. The Hebrew name of the tree so rendered implies whiteness. It is very probably the white poplar, Populus alba, found in most parts of Europe in woods and thickets in a moist soil. It is mentioned twice in scripture (Gen. xxx. 37; Hos. iv. 13). Some have imagined that the tree intended is the Styrax officinale. Duns however, apparently with reason, combats this opinion (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii, pp. 522, 523).

PORATHA (perhaps given by lot). One of the sons of Haman (Esth. ix. 8).

PORCH. A vestibule, corridor, or entrance-passage. See HOUSE, TEMPLE.

PORCIUS FESTUS. See FESTUS.

PORTER. When David arranged the offices of the Levites, 4000, we are told, were appointed porters (1 Chron. xxiii. 5). The classification of these porters we find made, according to their families, of the Korhites and of the sons of Merari (xxvi. 1-19). The principal duties of the porters were to open and shut the doors and gates of the temple-courts, at which they attended during the day to prevent the entrance of any person or thing unclean or injurious. They were to take part in the guarding of the temple at night. They had also charge of the treasure-chambers in their respective wards. Thus we find four chief porters holding this trust (ix. 26); and, again, a porter is specified as having charge over the free-will offerings (2 Chron. xxxi. 14). Occasionally also they were employed as musicians (1 Chron. xv. 18). The word 'porter' occurs, moreover, for the keeper of a city-gate (2 Kings vii. 10, 11), analogous to the door-keeper of a house (John xviii. 16; Acts xii. 13).

PORPHYRE, or PORPHYRY (Esth. i. 6, marg.). Probably white marble.

POSIDONIUS (2 Macc. xiv. 19). An envoy sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabeus.

POST. Runners, swift of foot, were employed to carry intelligence (2 Sam. xviii. 19-32). See FOOTMAN. These runners are repeatedly mentioned, and are the 'posts' of 2 Chron. xx. 6, 10; Jer. li. 31; they supply an apt comparison to Job (Job ix. 25, 26), whose days, he says, were swifter than that which moved most rapidly by land, by sea, or through the air. But it was in Persia that a regular establishment of couriers was first organized. It is said that, the necessity of rapid communication between the seat of government and the provinces having impressed itself on the mind of Cyrus, that prince ascertained how far a good horse might be expected to go in a day; that he then caused stables to be erected at specified distances. At each of these was a postmaster, and a sufficient number of horses and attendants. The postmaster's duty was to receive the despatches and forward them immediately by fresh mounted couriers. Hence the posts travelled night and day, and were proverbially said to fly faster than a crane. Mules, camels, and dromedaries were also used on this service (Esth. iii. 13, 15, viii. 10, 14). A similar usage, according to the Jesuits' Mémoires sur les Chinois, existed very early (at least 230 B.C.) in China.

The word 'post' is sometimes found in another sense, for lintel, threshold, &c. (Isai. vi. 4, and elsewhere).

POT. See POTTER, POTTERY.

POTIPHAR (belonging to, or consecrated to, the sun). The captain of the king of Egypt's guard, or 'chief of the slaughtermen' (a position analogous to that of the Kapidji-bashy at the modern Turkish court), to whom Joseph was sold. He first treated Joseph well, and gave him charge of his house; but afterwards, deceived by his wife's false accusation, he threw him into the prison (Gen. xxxvii. 36, xxxix.). Some modern critics have objected to the narrative, and pretend that xxxix. 20, 21-23, and xl. 4 are irreconcilably at variance. But they are guilty of the error of confounding the 'captain of the guard' with the 'keeper of the prison.' Potiphar, it is true, was at the same time captain of the guard and chief superintendent of the state-prison. But it is not likely that he would personally or alone undertake the oversight and care of prisoners: he had doubtless a keeper under him. And, as Potiphar himself previously, so this subordinate keeper soon became aware of Joseph's capability and trustiness, and was glad to employ him. When distinguished court-officers had offended the king, it was very natural that Potiphar himself should be busied and careful for their treatment. Accordingly he appears again; and, either having learned from his subordinate how useful Joseph had proved himself, or recollecting from his own experience Joseph's ability, the captain felt he should do best for these notable prisoners by charging Joseph with them. All is thus natural and consistent. See Kurtz, Einheit der Genesis, p. 192.

POTI-PHERAH (id., Potiphar being a contracted form of Poti-pherah). The priest of On, or Heliopolis, whose daughter Ase-nath was given in marriage to Joseph (Gen. xli. 45, 50, xlvi. 20).

POTSHERD. A fragment of earthenware. The word is used to denote something worthless (Psal. xxii. 15; Prov. xxvi. 23; Isai. xlv. 9). Kitto (Cycl. of Bibl. Lit.) remarks that the sites of ancient towns are often covered with a mass of broken pottery, which is generally of coarse texture and glazed. He supposes that this is only when the city was built of unburnt brick, the ruins of which are disintegrated and worn away by time and weather, so as to leave just the pottery, which was not likely to be so dissolved. Towns built with stone or kiln-burnt bricks do not exhibit this form of ruin. The expression of Isai. xxx. 14 is admirably illustrated by modern Syrian habits. It is customary for children to bring a sherd of pottery to the public ovens in an evening, and the baker puts into it a few glowing embers, that they may warm up their evening meal with them. The destruction foretold by the prophet was to be so complete that not a fragment large enough for this service would remain.

POTTAGE (Gen. xxv. 29-34). See LEN-TILES.

POTTER, POTTERY. The art of pottery is very ancient. Earthenware vessels were used by the Israelites in the wilderness; and we find the employment of them common afterwards for both culinary and other purposes. The potter and his wheel are often referred to in scripture. The potter's wheel is a simple machine, depicted on Egyptian monuments, of the same kind as is now in use. It consists of a horizontal wheel, fixed on the top of an axis, the lower part of which is sometimes in a pit in which the potter stands. Sometimes he sits at his work at a kind of table: he gives the necessary motion with his feet to another wheel at the bottom of the axis, and moulds the clay with his hands. The process is exactly described by an apocryphal writer (Ecclesi. xxxviii. 29, 30). Dr. Thomson mentions it as now practised: 'There was the potter sitting at his "frame," and turning the "wheel" with his foot. He had a heap of the prepared clay near him, and a pan of water by his side. Taking a lump in his hand, he places it on the top of the wheel (which revolves horizontally) and smoothed it into a low cone, like the upper end of a sugar-loaf; then, thrusting his thumb into the top of it, he opened a hole down through the centre, and this he constantly widened by pressing the edges of the revolving cone between his hands. As it enlarged and became thinner, he gave it whatever shape he pleased with the utmost ease and expedition. This I suppose is the exact point of those biblical comparisons between the human and the divine potter (Jer. xviii. 4, 6). . . . From some defect in the clay, or because he had taken too little, the potter suddenly changed his mind, crushed his growing jar instantly into a shapeless mass of mud, and, beginning anew, fashioned it into a totally-different vessel (comp. Rom. ix. 21). . . . The potter's vessel was the synonym of utter fragility . . . for this country it is still as appropriate and forcible as ever. Arab jars are so thin and frail that they are literally "dashed to shivers" by the slightest stroke' (The Land and the Book, pp. 520, 521).

Egyptian potters at work. From an ancient Egyptian painting at Thebes. Champollion.

Modern Egyptian potter. From an original sketch.

Early Egyptian and Assyrian pottery. Brit. Museum.

The lying 'among the pots' (Psal. lxxviii. 13) may seem to require a word of explanation. A very ingenious one is given by Mr. Wilton in Good Words, Dec. 1863, p. 852, as communicated by a lady resident in the east: 'The roofs are usually in a great state of litter . . . One thing never seemed cleared away . . . and that was the heap of old broken pitchers, sherds, and pots, that . . . are piled up in some corner; and there is a curious observation to be made in connection with this. A little before sunset numbers of pigeons suddenly emerge from behind the pitchers and other rubbish, where they had been sleeping in the heat of the day, or pecking about to find food. They dart upwards, and career through the air in large circles, their out-spread wings catching the bright glow of the sun's slanting rays, so that they really resemble shining yellow gold: then, as they wheel round and are seen against the light, they appear as if turned into molten silver; most of them being pure white, or else very light-coloured. This may seem fanciful; but the effect of light in those regions is difficult to describe to those who have not seen it; and evening after evening we watched the circling flight of doves, and always observed the same appearance.'

Various words are used in the original to denote different kinds of pots; and sometimes earthen and metal vessels are distinguished (Lev. vi. 28). The use to which pots were put is occasionally defined by an adjunct, as 'flesh-pot,' 'wash-pot,' 'fining-pot' (Exod. xvi. 3; Psal. lx. 8; Prov. xxvii. 21); and the blackening of such vessels is alluded to (Joel ii. 6, marg.). The water-pots at the marriage in Cana (John ii. 6) were of a considerable size: that carried by the Samaritan woman (iv. 28) may have been a leathern bucket, for such are used now; but see PITCHER.

POTTER'S FIELD (Matt. xxvii. 10). See ACELDAMA.

POUND. This word is used (1 Kings x 17; Ezra ii. 69; Neh. vii. 71, 72) for the Hebrew maneh. It occurs also in the New Testament for money (Luke xix. 13, 16, 18, 20, 24, 25), the mina, and also for weight (John xii. 3, xix. 39). See MONEY, WEIGHTS.

POWER. Ability to act. All power is of God (Psal. lxxii. 11), and from him it is derived to creatures. Angels are called 'powers' (Col. i. 16); and earthly magistrates are designated as 'powers,' to whom by God's ordinance due obedience must be paid (Rom. xiii. 1-3). Various interpretations have been given of the text that a woman should have 'power' on her head (1 Cor. xi. 10). The context evidently shows that a veil is meant. The woman has no power over her own head: she is under the power of her husband; and for this reason she is to be covered. The holy angels are present in Christian assemblies, 'delighting in the due order and subordination of the ranks of God's servants; and by a violation of that order we should be giving offence to them' (Alford, note on 1 Cor. xi. 10).

PRETORIUM, PRÆTORIUM. The word often occurs (Matt. xxvii. 27, rendered 'common-hall,' 'governor's house,' marg.; Mark xv. 16; John xviii. 28, rendered 'hall of judgment,' 'Pilate's house,' marg., as also 33, xix. 9; Acts xxiii. 35, 'Herod's judgment-hall'; Phil. i. 13, 'the palace,' 'Cæsar's court,' marg.). It was the head-quarters of Roman military commanders. There they not only resided themselves but had some of their troops quartered in attached barracks; and there were kept persons under arrest. For such purposes the palaces that were found in provincial cities were commonly used: thus in Jerusalem Herod's palace was the prætorium of the Roman procurator, justice being often administered in the open court before it—so also in Cæsarea. It is true that some doubt has been felt whether the governor did not rather occupy the tower of Antonia at Jerusalem; but, as Herod's palace was generally empty, it might have been taken as the head-quarters of the governor with a body-guard, and the rest of the troops have been quartered in Antonia. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Richthaus.' For explanation of Phil. i. 13 see PALACE.

PRAISE. A thankful setting-forth of God's perfections and goodness (Psal. cxxxviii. 1; Rev. xix. 5); a commending of the good actions of other men (Prov. xxvii. 2); the matter or object of our commendation (Deut. x. 21; Psal. cxlviii. 14); approval (Rom. xiii. 3; 1 Pet. ii. 14); praiseworthy deeds (Psal. cvi. 2).

PRAY, PRAYER. Prayer, or the expression of human wants to the Deity, is both a duty and a privilege. It is fitting that subjects should present their petitions to their Sovereign: it is great condescension when the Lord of the universe permits the creatures of his hand to speak to him with assurance of a favourable hearing.

We do not find in the earlier parts of scripture an express command to pray; nor have we definite examples before the time of Abraham of the practice of prayer. But it can hardly be doubted that sacrifices were accompanied with some kind of invocation or uttered desire; and, if we might interpret Gen. iv. 26 according to our version, we should find in it the establishment of regular worship. Laying, however, no stress on this, we cannot but see that prayer was familiar to Abraham and his immediate descendants (xii. 8, xv. 2, 3, xvii. 18, xviii. 23-33, xx. 7, 17, xxiv. 12-14, xxv. 21, xxxii. 9-12, 24-29). And, just as in other respects there were gradually clearer manifestations for both faith and practice, so the duty and privilege of prayer became more distinct: commands more precise were given for it; promises more definite were made to it; till ultimately it was sanctioned by the Saviour's example, fashioned according to his prescription, and so clearly understood to be the medium of obtaining divine blessing that by it men were told they should have what they would (Luke xi. 9, 10), without it they would be destitute of all they desired (James iv. 2).

There are sundry advantages effected by prayer, apart from the obtaining of the particular boon asked. For the man who presumes to speak to his Maker humbles himself: his temper is rendered submissive; and, as he acknowledges in the act of entreaty the greatness, the mercy, and the power of God, so he comes into a position and a state of mind befitting the relation between himself and the Deity. Faith is exercised: love is called forth; and obedience virtually pledged.

Some are disposed to consider this—the moral effect upon the praying man himself—the only benefit of prayer. They will not allow that God's purposes, nay, the machinery of the universe, can be affected by the breath of a human desire. All things occur in orderly sequence; and it is presumptuous, they think, to imagine that this can be broken, as it must be if prayer could prevail to alter results. Such a view has a show of humility; but, if followed out to its ultimate consequences, it would leave the world bound in a miserable fatalism, under which, as creatures would be powerless, moral responsibility would cease, and man must only bear as he might his inevitable destiny. Such a theory implies that the Creator did not foresee, made no provision for, the exercise of those powers and faculties with which he endowed his creatures—in a word, that all the play of thoughts and feelings and desires of human agents was never counted as a part of the machinery which the Almighty will would control, and which he would use in the bringing about of his great designs. It really deposes God from his office of governing.

If it be allowed that God created the visible universe, the finite must stand in a certain relation to the infinite, and there must be some point of contact between the natural and the supernatural. You may track causation for a long distance, but you must come somewhere to a point beyond which you cannot ascend—you must acknowledge at last the touch of the divine finger.

It is just here that the prayer which enters the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth reaches. It neither asks nor expects that the chain of cause and effect be miraculously broken, but it is taught to ask and to believe that he, who first sets cause in motion and links to it its orderly effect, would so at the beginning by his gracious influence determine the line of action as that this might be found one of the means by which the end is reached. This is contrary neither to reason nor to sound philosophy. The uniformity of nature is not violated; and yet the influence of God's moral government is felt. Dr. Chalmers admirably discusses this, and has shown how the Deity has, from the first constitution of things, taken account of all the properties of matter and of all the impulses of mind, and made provision for every result. His vast plan, then, may well include answers to prayer by no violation of, but in exact harmony with, and even by means of, the laws of nature. Chalmers supposes the prayer of a mother who dreads the storm for her child upon the ocean: 'God might answer the prayer, not by unsettling the order of secondary causes, not by reversing any of the wonted successions that are known to take place in the ever-restless ever-heaving atmosphere, not by sensible miracle among those nearer footsteps which the philosopher has traced, but by the touch of an immediate hand among the deep recesses of materialism, which are beyond the ken of all his instruments. It is thence that the Sovereign of nature might bid the wild uproar of the elements into silence.' And again: 'Thus... is met the cry of a people under famine for a speedy and plenteous harvest, not by the instant appearance of the ripened grain at the bidding of a voice from heaven, not preternaturally cherished into maturity in the midst of storms, but ushered onwards by a grateful succession of shower and sunshine to a prosperous consummation. An abundant harvest is granted to prayer, yet without violence either to the laws of the vegetable physiology, or to any of the known laws by which the alterations of the weather are determined' (The Two Kingdoms, disc. ii. in Select Works, vol. iii. pp. 617-634). It is no 'subservient accommodation on the part of the Creator to the creature. It is simply the Creator carrying into effect his own established processes' (Id., Nat. Theol., book v. chap. iii. vol. v. pp. 432-459).

And this is in exact accordance with the divine word, with the invitation and the promise. A remarkable corroboration is in the fact that prayer in time of drought, famine, pestilence, &c. is regarded in scripture as a means towards relief (1 Kings viii. 35-40). But it must be observed that men are to ask according to God's will (1 John v. 14), and in Christ's name (John xvi. 23, 24). It is thus alone that we can ask with that faith with which only man can acceptably approach his Maker (Heb. xi. 6; James i. 6, 7). The promises within the compass of which the praying soul must come are very precious. The Holy Spirit is to help our infirmities (Rom. viii. 26); and Christ is to make intercession for those who come to God by him (34).

Prayer has sometimes been considered as including invocation, confession, thanksgiving, and ascription of praise, as well as supplication. But these are, more properly, parts of worship—prayer being essentially petition. And, as it was observed before that there was an advance in the distinct inculcation and definite promises of prayer as revelation expanded, so we may perceive in the prayers contained in scripture an enlargement of character and greater spirituality of tone. The recorded prayers of Abraham, though doubtless implying spiritual blessings, have not the full grasp of them which those of Paul present.

Forms of prayer in the Old Testament are found in Numb. vi. 24-26, x. 35, 36; Deut. xxvi. 5-15. And there can be little doubt that some of the Psalms were so used; at all events they imparted a colouring to the expressions of prayer. That which Christ gave his disciples (Matt. vi. 9-13; Luke xi. 2-4), whether in some degree adopted from existing forms need not here be enquired, has always been taken as the model of Christian devotion. It was to the urging of these petitions, to the use and amplification of the prayer, that the first disciples gave themselves; and how it was incorporated into every early liturgy and used on every solemn occasion the history of ecclesiastical antiquity sufficiently testifies. The ancient use, too, of liturgical forms is fully established (see Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xlii.).

Of the practice of and promises to prayer, private, social, and public, we have abundant scriptural examples (Matt. vi. 6, xviii. 19, 20; Luke vi. 12; Acts i. 14, x. 9, xx. 36). And accounts of successful prayer are furnished in order that we may imitate those who so obtained their petitions for their own personal wants or for their brethren (James v. 16-18).

The frequency and usual times of prayer may have somewhat varied. Three are often spoken of—morning, and evening, or the hours of the daily sacrifices, and midday (Psal. lv. 17; Dan. vi. 10, ix. 20, 21; Acts iii. 1, x. 3, 9): prayer, too, was offered at meals (Matt. xv. 36); so that when all the occasions were numbered they would sometimes amount to seven (Psal. cxix. 164). Prayer was occasionally uttered standing (1 Sam. i. 26; Luke xviii. 11, 13); more frequently kneeling or prostrate, with a stretching-out of the hands, and a direction of the face towards Jerusalem (2 Kings vi. 13; Dan. vi. 10; Matt. xxvi. 39; Luke xxii. 41; Acts vii. 60, xx. 36). The temple was used as a place of prayer (Luke xviii. 10; Acts iii. 1), even by those who offered up private devotions: hence it was called 'the house of prayer' (Matt. xxi. 13). Prayer also accompanied the ritual offerings (Luke i. 9), and formed a part of the synagogue service.

PREACH, PREACHER, PREACHING. These words are for the most part used in scripture for the announcement of a message, doctrine, or warning, rather than in the technical sense in which we now employ them. Thus Noah is said to have been 'a preacher of righteousness' (2 Pet. ii. 5): the author of Ecclesiastes calls himself 'the preacher' (Eccles. i. 1, 2, 12, xii. 8, 9, 10): Jonah's warning to the Ninevites is termed 'preaching' (Jonah iii. 2). Sometimes 'preaching' is put for 'doctrine' or mode of teaching (1 Cor. i. 18, ii. 4, xv. 14; 2 Cor. i. 18, marg.); and sometimes to 'preach' is equivalent to 'assent' or 'declare' (Rom. ii. 21). Discourses or addresses delivered in a synagogue more nearly resembled preaching as now understood (Luke iv. 18-27; Acts xiii. 15-41). There are also instances of preaching in Christian assemblies (xx. 7-12); in regard to which St. Paul gives sundry directions (1 Cor. xiv.). A full account of preaching and the usages relating to it in the ancient church is given by Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xiv. chap. iv.

PRECIOUS STONES. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

PREDESTINATE. A word signifying the sovereign purpose of God as the ruler of the universe (Rom. viii. 29, 30; Eph. i. 5, 11). The same word is sometimes rendered 'determined before' (Acts iv. 28), 'ordained' (1 Cor. ii. 7). It would be of course beside the purpose of the present volume to enter on the controversies which have been provoked on the subject of predestination. The following sentences may be cited from Dr. Alford's note on Rom. viii. 28: 'It may suffice to say that, on the one hand, scripture bears constant testimony to the fact that all believers are chosen and called by God, their whole spiritual life, in its origin, progress, and completion, being from him; while, on the other hand, its testimony is no less precise that he willeth all to be saved, and that none shall perish except by wilful rejection of the truth. So that, on the one side, God's sovereignty, on the other, man's free-will, is plainly declared to us. To receive, believe, and act on both these is our duty and our wisdom.'

PREPARATION (Matt. xxvii. 62; Mark xv. 42; Luke xxiii. 54; John xix. 14, 31, 42). The preparation of the sabbath which fell in passover-week. So Wordsworth; but some differ. See PASSOVER: comp. Wieseler, Chronol. Synops., pp. 335, &c.

PRESBYTER, PRESBYTERY (1 Tim. iv. 14). See BISHOP, ELDER.

PRESIDENT. A great officer of the Persian court. The title is given to the three highest ministers (Dan. vi. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7).

PRESS (Joel iii. 13; Hagg. ii. 16). See WINE-PRESS.

PREVENT (Psal. xxi. 3; 1 Thess. iv. 15). To go before, anticipate.

PRICKS. To 'kick against the pricks' (Acts ix. 5, xxvi. 14) is a proverbial expression referring to oxen at plough, which on being pricked with the goad kick against it.

PRIDE. Inordinate self-esteem, generating often insolent behaviour to others. Scripture is full of warnings against it (e.g. Prov. xvi. 18, 19; Dan. iv.; 1 Pet. v. 5).

PRIEST. This word (contracted in our language from presbyter, i.e. elder) is the representative of khôhen in the Old Testament and of hiereus in the New. Critics are not exactly agreed on the ground-meaning of the Hebrew word. Gesenius imagines that it implies the notion of presaging or divining, hence one who communicates the divine will to men. Saalschütz prefers the idea of ministering or serving (Arch. der Hebr., cap. 78, vol. ii. p. 353). It is sometimes therefore used of secular functionaries apart from any sacerdotal office. In the New Testament hiericus is applied not to the Christian ministry but to the Hebrew and heathen priesthood.

From the beginning the necessity of presenting some acceptable service to God was understood; and sacrifices appear to have been the earliest mode of worship. See SACRIFICE. It was a natural step to establish what might be termed a household priesthood, in which the most honourable of the family drew near to God in the name and as the representative of the rest, and offered for all that victim which it was hoped would propitiate the divine favour. So we find the patriarchs, Noah, Abraham, and others, officiating as the priests of their households (Gen. viii. 20, xii. 8); and the priestly dignity was regarded as descending by a kind of right to the first-born. No trace was yet visible of a sacerdotal body or caste. It was not merely in the chosen race that this was the practice; elsewhere we find persons conspicuous for dignity, the heads of houses or of tribes, denominated priests: Melchizedek and Jethro are examples (xiv. 18; Exod. ii. 16). In Egypt, however, at an early period, the priests were a separate class distinguished by special immunities (Gen. xlvii. 22, 26). The idea, therefore, must have become familiar to the Israelites during their residence in that land. Yet they do not seem to have acted on it. The first demand for liberty was that they might sacrifice to the Lord (Exod. v. 1, 3); and it is probable, corroborated by the fact that each head of a family was to kill the paschal lamb, that the household priesthood still prevailed among them, and that the priests mentioned before the giving of the law were those that in every house held the sacred office (xii. 3-6, xix. 22). Indeed there are traces of the custom at a much later date.

It pleased God, however, to select one family of Israel to be his priests (xxviii. 1; Heb. v. 1-4), the family of Aaron, of the tribe of Levi. This selection did not pass without question. There was at one time a combined opposition from members of the tribe to whom by right of primogeniture the priesthood might seem to have belonged, and from Levites who were displeased that the high office should be entrusted to a single family and not shared generally among their tribe. This opposition was quelled by the supernatural interference of God himself (Numb. xvi., xvii.). At what precise period it occurred we can but conjecture: perhaps it was not till after some years' sojourn in the wilderness.

Some of the highest functions were reserved for the high priest (see HIGH PRIEST); under whose authority the ordinary members of the sacerdotal class would seem to have been placed. But it may be generally said that these were to conduct the customary services of the sanctuary, to prepare and offer the daily, weekly, and monthly sacrifices, and those which from time to time were brought by individuals, on special occasions, or at the great annual festivals: they were to officiate at purifications, and pronounce judgment in cases of alleged or apprehended leprosy: they were to have charge of the holy vessels, watching the sacred fire, and feeding the golden lamp, covering also the sanctuary and its furniture when the camp was moving: they were to conduct the trial of jealousy, and to estimate the redemption-money for a vow: they were to preserve and teach the law, and to bless the people: they were employed as judges and magistrates, and in war they carried the ark of the covenant, sounded the holy trumpets, and animated the people to combat. But in the more laborious duties connected with their office they were to be assisted by the Levites (Exod. xxvii. 20, 21, xxx. 7, 8, 18-21; Lev. i.-vii., x. 8-11, xii.-xiv., xxiv. 1-9, xxvii.; Numb. iv. 5-16, v. 11-31, vi., x. 1-10; Deut. xvii. 8-13, xxi. 1-9, xxxi. 9-13, xxxiii. 10).

The descendants of Aaron were priests by hereditary right. But there were certain blemishes and imperfections which, if they were found in any man, disqualified him from performing the functions of his office, though he might partake of the sacred food which belonged to the order. These blemishes are specified in the law (Lev. xxi. 16-24): they have been largely multiplied by the rabbins; according to whom first the genealogy and then the freedom from defect were carefully ascertained before a young priest was admitted to perform any sacerdotal ministrations. There were certain regulations, too, to which a priest must conform. He must not mourn or defile himself at the death of any except his nearest relatives—the high priest defiling himself for no one, how near of kin soever—he must not practise those cuttings and shavings which were common among the heathen: he must not marry a woman of bad character or divorced—the high priest was to marry only a virgin of his own people—and his family were to be pure in conduct (1-15). He and his household were to eat of the sacred things, save when disqualified by uncleanness: his daughter, if she married a stranger, must not touch this hallowed food; but if as a widow she returned to her father's house she might partake of it, as in her youth (xxii. 1-13). All these rules had a pregnant meaning: they bore witness to the purity of Jehovah, and read the lesson that they that approach the holy God must not be defiled with evil.

The priests were to have a special consecration. The ceremonies were carefully prescribed to Moses, and were accurately carried out by him at the consecration of Aaron and his sons. They consisted in certain sacrifices, washings, the putting-on of the holy garments, the sprinkling of blood, and the anointing with oil, and lasted for seven days (Exod. xxix. 1-37; Lev. viii., ix.). Higher rites as well as more beautiful garments were prescribed for Aaron than for his sons; and most likely he alone was anointed. Provision, too, was made for the inauguration of succeeding high priests by the solemn putting-on of the pontifical robes seven days, and receiving unction in them (comp. Numb. xx. 25-28); but it is very doubtful whether at the succession of ordinary priests there was any kind of consecration repeated.

Particular vestments were appropriated to them. These were—1. Linen drawers (Exod. xxviii. 42). 2. A white linen tunic, fitting closely to the body, and reaching from the neck (in which it differed from the Egyptian priestly tunic) down to the ankles: it had tight sleeves, and appears to have been woven without seam. 3. This was confined by a linen girdle, curiously embroidered with blue, purple, and scarlet. 4. A tiara or bonnet, composed of several folds of linen, said to have been originally of a pointed shape, but afterwards almost globular (40, xxix. 9, xxxix. 27-29). It has been thought that other garments were prescribed for priests, which were called 'clothes of service' (xxxix. 1, 41); but these were much more likely those cloths which were used for covering the sacred furniture (Numb. iv. 6-13). That the holy vestments were worn only while the priests were ministering in the sanctuary is indeed very probable (Ezek. xlii. 14); and it is said that they were never washed when soiled, but used to make wicks for the lamps of the temple. There is no mention of shoes or sandals; we may therefore conclude that the priests ministered barefooted (see before, p. 703), contrary to the Egyptian practice (see Fairbairn's Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. sect. iii. vol. ii. p. 264). 'A linen ephod' was also worn by the priests generally (1 Sam. xxii. 18). See EPHOD.

The maintenance of the priests was provided on, at least a fair, probably an ample scale. Very likely, amid the degeneracy of the nation and disregard of the law which so often recurred, the priesthood did not receive all to which they were entitled; and there are occasional indications of their suffering from poverty (e.g. 1 Sam. ii. 36): there are also on the other hand indications of grasping wealth and power (13-16; Jer. v. 31), which drew down on the offenders deserved and terrible threatenings. Thirteen out of the forty-eight Levitical cities were assigned for their residence: see LEVITES. Besides, they had tithes, and first-fruits, redemption-money, and portions of many of the sacrifices. The tenth of the produce of the land was assigned to the Levites generally, and of this a tenth, the best, was to be the priests' (Numb. xviii. 21-30). In addition thereto there was a special tithe every third year (Deut. xiv. 28, xxvi. 12), the tenth of which we may probably suppose was also given to the priests. The first-fruits are prescribed in Exod. xxiii. 19; Lev. ii. 14; Deut. xxvi. 1-10: these offered to the Lord became the portion of the priests. The redemption-money was levied on account of persons, animals, or things devoted to God (Lev. xxvii.), and for the first-born of men and beasts (Numb. xviii. 14-18). The shew-bread, too, and the flesh of offerings—of the sin-offering, the trespass-offering, and parts of the peace-offering, also the meat-offering—belonged to the priests, and formed their ordinary diet (Lev. vi. 26, 29, vii. 6-10, x. 12-15, xxii. 10-13; Numb. xviii. 8-13). These seem to have been the regular sources of the priests' subsistence: sometimes there would be the dedicated portion (the per-centage differing) of the spoils of war; of which there is a notable example in the conquest of the Midianites (xxxix. 25-47). It is probable also that they might like other persons acquire and hold private property (Jer. xxxii. 1-15). The high priest, no doubt, received a greater proportion from the different sources of income than the inferior priests.

In early times the number of priests must have been few: we read of several at the passage of the Jordan (Josh. iii. 6), and of seven who sounded the trumpets, besides those who carried the ark round Jericho (vi. 4, 6). But it is not likely that they could at once occupy the cities allotted to them. And even at a later date they were not very numerous: at the sacking of one of their cities, Nob, only eighty-five priests were slain (1 Sam. xxii. 18, 19). We read little of them in the time of the judges; and it may have been because they were so few that sometimes priestly functions were performed by others. In David's reign, however, they had largely multiplied. For 3,700 joined him at Hebron on his succeeding to the sovereignty of all Israel (1 Chron. xii. 27, 28). Indeed so many were they that that monarch divided them into twenty-four courses (sixteen of the family of Eleazar, eight of that of Ithamar), so that they might minister in rotation (xxiv. 1-19). It would seem that these courses changed every sabbath (2 Chron. xxiii. 8), and that the special functions of individual priests were assigned by lot (Luke i. 9). According to this arrangement each course would be in ordinary attendance at the sanctuary about twice in the year: the rest of the time they could spend in their cities. But unquestionably at the great festivals large numbers were present at Jerusalem, where the services of many priests would be required; and it is understood that any one might at any time be voluntarily in attendance, and minister, provided he did not interfere with those who were officiating in regular turn. The time of commencing their functions was probably at twenty years of age (2 Chron. xxxi. 16, 17). And Aristobulus, the last of the Asmonean family, is said to have officiated as high priest at seventeen.

David's distribution of the priests was preserved through succeeding reigns. Of course they adhered to the kingdom of Judah; their cities being in the southern division of the land. And there can be little doubt that the priests partook of the degeneracy of later times. Among so large a body—though some estimates of their number are probably exaggerated—many must have been of an inferior class, ignorant very likely, and demoralized. As a body they ought to have had and must have had great influence. And yet we seldom hear of them acting in a body, or in masses; and in times of reformation, instead of taking the lead, they were rather behind the Levites and others (xxix. 24, xxx. 2, 3). Neither did they make the bold stand they ought to have made against the idolatry of the kings: rather they helped on their evil courses (2 Kings xvi. 10, 11, 15, 16). No wonder, therefore, that we find in the prophets repeated denunciations against the unworthy priests (Jer. i. 18, v. 31, xxxii. 32; Lam. iv. 13; Ezek. xxii. 26; Hos. vi. 9; Mic. iii. 11; Zeph. iii. 4). Individual cases indeed there were of zeal and piety in the priestly class; and some of them we know, faithful men, were called to the prophetic office (2 Kings xi. 4-20, xii. 2; 2 Chron. xix. 11, xxiv. 20-22, xxvi. 16-20; Ezra vii. 1-5; Isai. viii. 2; Jer. i. 1; Ezek. i. 3).

It has been already said that the courses arranged by David continued in subsequent times (2 Chron. xxxv. 2-5). At the captivity naturally everything fell into confusion. On the return 4289 accompanied Zerubbabel; apparently but four out of the twenty-four courses (Ezra ii. 36-39; Neh. vii. 39-42); and among these we do not find that of Abijah, to which, long after, Zacharias, John Baptist's father, belonged (Luke i. 5). To account for this, Prideaux out of Jewish writers says that 'the old number of the courses, as established by king David, were still kept up. For of the four courses that returned each subdivided themselves into six; and the new courses, taking the names of those that were wanting, still kept up the old titles' (Connect., vol. i. p. 115, under 536 B.C.). Lord A. C. Hervey, however, is disposed to think this statement erroneous, and shows that Nehemiah has enumerated twenty-one or twenty-two courses as being at Jerusalem after the exile. He has also constructed two tables, one exhibiting the original courses and those of them in post-exilic times which correspond, the other those which cannot be identified, having perhaps adopted from some distinguished member fresh titles. These tables are on the opposite page, introduced from Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. i. p. 946.

There was still occasion after the return to complain of the irreverent conduct of the priests (Mal. i. 10, ii. 1-10). And, it may be added, there were those who claimed the priesthood, but who, because they could not prove their line of descent, were not admitted to the function (Ezra ii. 61-63; Neh. vii. 63-65). Nevertheless there were many zealous men in those days, whose names are recorded with honour; and the provisions for their maintenance were re-enacted according to the law (viii. 13, x., xii. 30, 41, 44-47). The Maccabees, later, were a priestly family (1 Macc. ii. 1), and are deservedly celebrated as having delivered their country from the intolerable Syrian yoke. Of them came a line of high priests, several of whom united with their sacerdotal office the royal dignity.

In New Testament times some of the priests were of distinguished piety: such were Zacharias and John the Baptist; but the mass appear to have been formalists and worldly men. Accordingly we always find the priests forward among those that resisted Christ (Matt. xvi. 21, xxi. 15, 23, xxvi. 3, 14, 47, xxvii. 1, 6, 12, 20, 41, 62, xxviii. 11). The leaders of the body especially they were, men of the greatest influence among them, called chief priests those who were heads of the courses, with such as had borne the office of high priest. For that great dignity was no longer for life in regular descent, but was transferred from one to another by the violence of faction, and at the will of their foreign masters: see HIGH PRIEST. Next to him it may be observed was the second priest (2 Kings xxv. 18), called by the Jews the sagan. After our Lord's ascension, when his disciples began to preach the gospel, we find the same general temper among the priests. Thus they lost the opportunity of concentrating the new dispensation within the Jewish nationality. And so the decay of Israel became 'the riches of the Gentiles' (Rom. xi. 12), and a larger platform was prepared for God's wonderful dealings. True 'a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith' (Acts vi. 7); but, so far as we know, none was distinguished as a Christian leader or preacher. Corruption went on among the remnant: fearful acts were done in the very temple; till at last the day of vengeance came; Jerusalem was destroyed; and now, though claims have been made, there is perhaps no man who can satisfactorily prove that he is a descendant of Aaron. Those, however, who are so regarded enjoy some honorary privileges, the chief being that they receive the redemption-money for the first-born (Mills' British Jews, part i. chap. i. p. 15).

It matters not. We have a great High Priest, who having offered a perfect sacrifice with his own blood hath entered into the holiest, even into heaven itself. He 'hath an unchangeable priesthood,' and 'ever liveth to make intercession' for those that come to God by him (Heb. ii. 17, iii. 1, iv. 14-16, v. 1-10, vi. 20, vii., viii. 1-6, ix. 24-28, x. 1-22). And just as every thing, their freedom from blemish, their beautiful garments betokened holiness in the Levitical priesthood, so was Christ 'holy, harmless, undefiled;' as the Hebrew priest was anointed at his consecration, so was Christ ordained, the Spirit without measure being poured upon him, made with the high sanction of an oath; as the priesthood of the law was the only means of access to God, so by a new and living way through Christ alone can sinners approach the Father. Far more effectual is the offering of Christ's blood than the blood of bulls and of goats sacrificed under the law (ix. 11-14). And, as the ancient priest had nearness of access to God, and bore the names of Israel on his breast, so does Christ as our representative enter the very heavenly presence for us, bearing ever the cause of his people in his heart when he gives them boldness to come to the throne of grace by him. While the Levitical priesthood typified Christ, it fell far short in its pre-significative—as far indeed as 'the law of a carnal commandment' falls short of 'the power of an endless life.' Christ, then, was made a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek, the glory

COURSES OF PRIESTS.

In David's reign, 1 Chron. xxiv.	In list in Ezra ii.; Neh. vii.	In Nehemiah's time, Neh. x.	In Zerubbabel's time, Neh. xii.
1. Jehoiarib, 1 Chron. ix. 10; Neh. xi. 10.	—	—	Joiarib.
2. Jedaiah.	Children of Jedaiah.	—	Jedaiah.
3. Harim.	Children of Harim.	Harim.	Rehum (Harim, 15).
4. Seorim.	—	—	—
5. Malchijah.	Children of Pashur, 1 Chron. ix. 12.	Malchijah.	—
6. Mijamin.	—	Mijamin.	Miamin (Miniamin, 17).
7. Hakkoz.	—	Meremoth, son of Hakkoz, Neh. iii. 4.	Meremoth.
8. Abijah.	—	Abijah.	Abijah.
9. Jeshuah.	House of Jeshua? Ezra ii. 36; Neh. vii. 39.	—	—
10. Shecaniah.	—	Shebaniah.	Shechaniah (Shebaniah, 14).
11. Eliashib.	—	—	—
12. Jakim.	—	—	—
13. Huppah.	—	—	—
14. Jeshebeab.	—	—	—
15. Bilgah.	—	Bilgal.	Bilgah.
16. Immer.	Children of Immer	Amariah.	Amariah.
17. Hezir.	—	—	—
18. Aphses.	—	—	—
19. Pethahiah.	—	—	—
20. Jehezekel.	—	—	—
21. Jachin, Neh. xi. 10; 1 Chron. ix. 10.	—	—	—
22. Gamul.	—	—	—
23. Delaiah.	—	—	—
24. Maaziah.	—	Maaziah.	Maadiah (Moadiah, 17).

POST-EXILIAN COURSES, which cannot be identified with original ones.

Neh. x.	Neh. xii.	Neh. xi.; 1 Chron. ix.	Neh. x.	Neh. xii.	Neh. xi.; 1 Chron. ix.
Seraiah.	Seraiah.	Seraiah?	Ginnethon.	Ginnetho.	—
Azariah.	Ezra.	Azariah.	Baruch.	—	—
Jeremiah.	Jeremiah.	—	Meshullam.	—	—
Pashur.	—	—	Shemaiah.	Shemaiah	—
Hattush.	Hattush.	—	—	Sallu.	—
Malluch.	Malluch.	—	—	Amok.	—
Obadiah.	Iddo.	Adaiah?	—	Hilkiah.	—
Daniel.	—	—	—	Jedaiah (2).	—

and dignity of his person being indicated thereby, as the nature of his work was by the similitude of the order of Aaron (see on this subject Fairbairn, ubi supr., pp. 267-275). And, as his people are vitally united to Christ, so they have according to their measure the gifts and dignity which have been bestowed on the Mediator (Rev. i. 5, 6). They are priests, and offer up spiritual sacrifices: they are kings, and have even now the Spirit of power. And eventually, 'when Christ's work in them is brought to its proper consummation, they shall, as kings and priests, share with him in the glories of his everlasting kingdom.'

It is not necessary to do more than refer to the idolatrous priests mentioned occasionally in scripture. The doings of the priests of Baal in their worship are described in 1 Kings' xviii. 26-29. Jeroboam I. consecrated priests for the performance of his unhallowed worship (xii. 31); and 'priests of the high places' are mentioned in Josiah's reformation (xxiii. 9, 10, 20). See CHEMARIM. The priest of Jupiter is spoken of in Acts xiv. 13. For much in-information as to the Hebrew priesthood the student may consult Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., capp. 78, 79, vol. ii. pp. 342-369.

PRINCE. This word is used in our translation with considerable latitude of meaning, and as the representative of more than one original term. Thus Abraham is called 'a mighty prince' (Gen. xxiii. 6); the Hebrew word nâsi signifying an exalted person, and being applied sometimes to kings (1 Kings xi. 34; Ezek. xii. 10, xxi. 25, xlv. 7); also to the heads of the tribes of Israel (Numb. i. 44, vii. 10), and of Ishmael (Gen. xvii. 20). It designates, too, the heads of families (Numb. iii. 24, 'chief' in our version, xvi. 2; 1 Kings viii. 1). Another Hebrew word sar, 'one having dominion,' is applied to the principal rulers of a nation under the sovereign (1 Sam. xxix. 3), the chief officers or ministers of state (1 Kings iv. 2; Job xxix. 9; Isai. xxx. 4), local governors or magistrates (1 Kings xx. 14). It designates the merchants of Tyre who were wealthy as princes (Isai. xxiii. 8), the priests, or 'princes of the sanctuary' (xliii. 28), the foremost angels (Dan. x. 13, 20, 21). And this word is applied to the Deity, as 'Prince of princes' (viii. 25), and to Messiah 'the Prince of peace' (Isai. ix. 6). In the feminine it is princesses, ladies (1 Kings xi. 3; Esth. i. 18; Isai. xlii. 23). Another word, nâgidâ, 'the foremost,' is used for kings (1 Sam. ix. 16, x. 1, xlii. 14, generally 'captain' in our version), nobles (Psal. lxxvi. 12), Messiah (Dan. ix. 25), 'the prince of the covenant' (xi. 22). Other words are used, as in vi. 1, where the 'princes' corresponded to the satraps afterwards appointed through the Persian empire. In the New Testament a word implying 'leader' or 'governor' is rendered 'prince.' Thus Christ is the 'Prince of life' (Acts iii. 15), 'the Prince of the kings of the earth' (Rev. i. 5); and Satan is 'the prince of this world' (John xii. 31), 'the prince of the power of the air' (Eph. ii. 2).

PRINCIPALITIES (Rom. viii. 38). See ANGEL. (Tit. iii. 1). Magistrates.

PRINTED (Job xix. 23). Rather, inscribed.

PRIS'CA (ancient) (2 Tim. iv. 19). The same person with

PRISCILLA (diminutive of Prisca) (Acts xviii. 2, 18, 26; Rom. xvi. 3; 1 Cor. xvi. 19). The excellent and active wife of Aquila.

PRISON. We first read of a prison in the history of Joseph. It was 'a place where the king's prisoners were bound,' and was under the charge of a great officer, assisted by a subordinate keeper (Gen. xxxix. 20-23, xl. 3, 4). Imprisonment was not one of the punishments prescribed by the Hebrew law; we therefore read little of it in the earlier parts of the sacred history, more especially as trial and condemnation almost immediately followed apprehension. In the wilderness two persons were 'put in ward,' but merely to detain them till God's mind was known (Lev. xxiv. 12; Numb. xv. 34). Samson was a prisoner, condemned to ignominious labour (Judges xvi. 21, 25); but that was among the Philistines. In Ahab's reign there was a prison in Israel, possibly attached to the king's palace (1 Kings xxii. 26, 27). So in Judah (2 Chron. xvi. 10; Neh. iii. 25; Jer. xxxii. 2, xxxvii. 21). There were prisons also in the houses of private persons (15). Very doleful places were some of these prisons. Joseph was cast into a pit by his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 24); and such a pit or cistern, where indeed there was no water but soft mire, was that in which Jeremiah was at one time confined (Jer. xxxviii. 6). Sometimes, however, friends were allowed access to people in prison (xxxii. 2, 8-15). Thus it was in New Testament times, when charitable persons could minister to those confined (Matt. xi. 2, xxv. 36, 43). There was a prison attached to Herod's palace, or to some of his fortresses (xiv. 6-11; Luke iii. 20, vii. 18, 19). The Jewish council had a prison (Acts v. 18, 23, viii. 3). The Romans used the castle of Antonia at Jerusalem as a prison (xxiii. 10), and Herod's 'judgment-hall' or prætorium at Cæsarea (35). The Roman mode of securing prisoners is indicated in xii. 6, xvi. 24, xxviii. 16, 30. In the last-named passage Paul is represented as living in his own house, only under guard.

PRIZE (1 Cor. ix. 24; Phil. iii. 14). The reward, a chaplet or crown, bestowed by the judges in the ancient GAMES, which see.

PROCH'ORUS (leader of the chorus or dance). One of the seven appointed to distribute the alms of the church (Acts vi. 5).

PROCONSUL, PROCURATOR. The designations of two Roman provincial officers, usually given in our version as 'deputy' and 'governor': see DEPUTY, GOVERNOR. The proconsuls administered the senatorial provinces, discharging civil functions, without the power of life and death. They were appointed for a year. The procurators represented the emperor, had the power of life and death, and held their office at the emperor's will. They used the military dress, and were occasionally sent into the senatorial as well as the imperial provinces. Pilate was procurator, but was subordinate to the governor of Syria. The usual residence of the procurator of Judea was at Cæsarea (Acts xxv. 1, 4).

PROGNOSTICATORS, MONTHLY (Isai. xlvii. 13). See DIVINATION, STAR-GAZERS.

PROMISE. As understood in scripture, a declaration or assurance of the divine will, in which God signifies the particular blessings he will bestow, or evils he will remove. Promises are opposed to threatenings, the former being declarations of good, the latter denunciations of evil. The promises of scripture have been divided into classes. We may note promises of the Messiah flowing from God's mere mercy, and made the ground of all subsequent promise and blessing. These promises are nearly allied to predictions (e.g. Gen. iii. 15, xxii. 18). There are also promises that God would give his Son a people, that his mediatorial work should be effectual to the building-up of a church, his own purchased possession (e.g. Psal. ii. 7, 8; Isai. liii. 11, 12). Further, there are promises to the church, promises of acceptance to those who come to God on the ground of his covenant, promises of blessing both temporal and spiritual, encouraging to the exercise of those graces and fulfilment of those duties which go to constitute the Christian character. Such are the promises of answer to prayer (Psal. l. 15; Luke xi. 9-13), of grace to the humble (1 Pet. v. 5), of everlasting life to the believer (John iii. 14, 15), of larger talents to him who has improved those already given (Matt. xxv. 29), &c. Those promises which are made in one case may be applied to other similar cases, consistently with the analogy of faith. Thus the promise given to Joshua (Josh. i. 5) is applied to the believing Hebrews (Heb. xiii. 5), it being in its nature of a comprehensive character; but those which were made to individuals under special circumstances are not to be taken as intended generally (Mark xvi. 17, 18). God has suited his promises to his precepts (comp. Deut. x. 16 with xxx. 6), and to the necessities of his people; it being always remembered that, where anything is promised to obedience, the contrary is implied to disobedience.

PROPHECY. Prophecy is not only the predicting of future events: it had the larger office of receiving and communicating generally the will and purposes of God. It was revelation, in fact, the dealing of the Creator with his creatures, disclosing his high pleasure for the interests of truth and righteousness in the government of the world, occupied with both the past and the present, and laying open the future only so far as was required for the accomplishment of its great object. So that we find in scripture prophecy instructions, warnings, rebukes, as largely as predictions of things to come. And men are termed prophets, Abraham for example (Gen. xx. 7), of whom it is nowhere recorded that they uttered a single prophecy in the common acceptation of the word. Christ, moreover, in whom the promise of Deut. xviii. 15-19 was to have its ultimate and complete fulfilment, and who was to be the great Prophet of the church, performed that office, not so much by actual predictions (for, though the whole future was before his eye, his predictions were but few), as by teaching all that it was needful the world should know, as the depository and the channel of divine wisdom, dispensing the riches thereof, that the mystery of God might be fully apprehended. The way, too, in which prophecy is spoken of in the apostolic writings goes to establish the same fact. It is described as touching the heart and conscience, convicting, instructing, edifying, comforting (1 Cor. xiv. 1, 3, 24, 25). The heathen had little conception of prophecy in this its largest and most excellent sense: they deemed it but an inexplicable knowledge of futurity.

Prophecy was manifested in every phase of its comprehensive character from the very earliest times. But these we may pass over, and rather direct our view to its development among the chosen people. When the priesthood was defined in Israel by Moses, there was another ministry connected with it, not discordant, not in opposition, but still intended to be in advance of it, leading on the law, so to speak, and enabling it for its office as introductory to the gospel. The law by itself would have left men stationary: they would not have seen through its shadows the substance it was intended to pre-figure. But the prophetic ministry, opening out its spiritual meaning, and ever tending forwards, carried on the education of the elder church, and trained men to look for redemption in Jerusalem. So that the gospel when it came was not altogether new: it was the bright day which had been preceded by the dawn. And Christ could appeal to the Old Testament scriptures as testifying of him, in whom all that was 'written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms' should be fulfilled (Luke xxiv. 44).

It is a serious error to represent prophecy as merely a refinement of heathen sooth-saying. Its essence was truth, the highest truth; and that can proceed from God alone. Men might cultivate and refine their minds to the utmost, without attaining the gift of prophecy: they might be trained in the prophetic schools; but God's Spirit alone commissioned and sent them. 'The essence and subjective speciality of prophetic inspiration,' says Hävernich (Einleit. in das A.T., § 199, vol. ii. 2, p. 30), 'lies herein, that it does not find its origin in the unassisted intelligence of man, in his natural parts and powers, however great, but proves itself to be the higher supernatural working of the Spirit of God.'

With regard to the modes of divine communication little need be said. There were some which might be called official, as the voice which spoke from out of the Shechinah or clouded presence resting on the mercy-seat (Exod. xxv. 22, xxix. 42, 43; Numb. vii. 89), and the responses by Urim and Thummim (Exod. xxviii. 30; Numb. xxvii. 21). But to the prophets God's will was made known by dreams or visions, by internal impression on the mind, by angelic message, or by audible voice.*

Of prophetic dreams we have an example in that of Nebuchadnezzar, in which as interpreted by Daniel, also from a dream, the destiny of four successive earthly kingdoms was depicted, to be succeeded by that kingdom of God which should never be destroyed (Dan. ii.). In vision, again, Isaiah, when he received his prophetic commission, saw the glory of the divine Lord (Isai. vi.); and the visions of God were vouchsafed to Ezekiel on the banks of Chebar (Ezek. i.). It has, indeed, been questioned whether these visions were real, or whether they were but the dress in which the prophets clothed their conceptions. It is of no great moment to decide. But certainly John xii. 41 seems to show that the spiritual forms actually shaped themselves to the mental eye, communicating ideas transcending human experience and which could not be embodied in human language. The colouring, no doubt, of such visions, when afterwards, so far as they could be, described, was taken from the scenes in which the prophet lived. And it is very noteworthy that Ezekiel's imagery bears an evident relation to the figures lately discovered in the Assyrian palaces. Dr. Lee (The Insp. of Holy Script., lect. iv. p. 184, 2nd. edit.) observes a striking fact which shall be given in his own words, closely connected with the imagery of prophetic visions: 'There was one topic which was not submitted' to the prophets' own style of representation. Amid the copious and varied symbolism of scripture, we can observe how the pictures of those visions in which Jehovah himself is revealed always preserve a character quite peculiar, although, when describing certain attributes of Deity—which in no case can be described otherwise than by metaphors—each prophet still employs his wonted imagery. When Jehovah himself appears, the sacred writers borrow no colouring from external sources: were they to do so, indeed, they would manifestly abandon the whole genius and spirit of the theocracy; and this uniformity in describing their visions of God characterizes the compositions of all the prophets, notwithstanding the prominence, in other parts of their writings, of their own individuality. To satisfy ourselves of this fact, it will be sufficient to compare the accounts of the visions of Jehovah vouchsafed to Isaiah, Daniel, and Ezekiel (Isai. vi. 1-4; Dan. vii. 9, 10; Ezek. i. 26-28; comp. Exod. xxiv. 10; 1 Kings, xxii. 19; Rev. iv.)

* A convenient distribution has been made, of civil, sacerdotal, and prophetic communications with God (see Carpov, Introd. ad Lib. Bibl. Vet. Test., pars iii. pp. 14, &c.). For examples of the first we have the casting of lots (Josh. vii. 16-18; 1 Sam. x. 20, 21, xiv. 41, 42): the priestly was by Urim and Thummim; the prophetic by dreams, &c. According to Jewish tradition, the Bath Kol, i.e. 'the daughter-voice' or 'daughter of a voice' was heard as a voice from the aerial regions, after the cessation of regular prophecy; and passages in the New Testament have groundlessly been thought to confirm the notion.

Prophetic communication was also made by the suggestion of ideas to the understanding without the kind of representation implied by visions. We continually find narratives in scripture of such suggestion, often suddenly produced, as in the case of the old prophet of Beth-el, who while sitting at meat with the man of God that came from Judah had the message of the Lord imparted to him (1 Kings xiii. 20-22). And then there was the word brought by an angel, as to Daniel (Dan. ix. 20-27, x. 4-14); and, further, sometimes the articulate divine voice was heard; as when in the still night it echoed through the chambers at Shiloh, and summoned the youthful Samuel to listen to the heavy woe that was denounced against the family of Eli (1 Sam. iii.). To Moses this was specially vouchsafed; and he the great lawgiver of Israel stands out distinguished from other prophets in the near access he had to God (Numb. xii. 6-8; Deut. xxxiv. 10).

It was not always to men of piety exclusively that prophetic communication was made. He who can use every instrument, and make even his enemies contribute to his praise, was sometimes pleased to speak immediately to sinful or even heathen men. Thus Abimelech (Gen. xx. 3), Pharaoh (xii. 1-7), Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. ii. iv.) had prophetic dreams; and Balaam uttered prophecies (Numb. xxiii., xxiv.), teaching us that the rarest gifts may be possessed, and yet no grace (1 Cor. xiii. 2). But still, generally speaking, the prophets were 'a goodly fellowship,' and it is rightly said that personal piety was a necessary qualification of those who were to bear the holy message of the Lord. And, though the communication was entirely the gift of God, yet it was to be humbly sought; as Daniel fasted and prayed when he would interpret Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and know the destiny of the captive Jews (Dan. ii. 17, 18, ix. 2, 3). And the mind must be serene and freed from earthly passion. Thus we find that Elisha desired a minstrel to play to him; and then 'the hand of the Lord came upon him' (2 Kings iii. 15). It must have been an awful moment when this hand of the Lord grasped his creature, and the mind of the Infinite came into contact with the finite feeble mind of a child of the dust. No wonder that the divine word was as 'a burning fire shut up in the bones' (Jer. xx. 9). No wonder that the soul soared aloft in its high communings; and that the body was faint and trembled under the visions of God (Dan. x. 7, 8). But still the human agents' intelligent consciousness was preserved, while their natural faculties were elevated for the reception of the divine suggestions. The whole extent of the vision, indeed, they could not comprehend (1 Pet. i. 10, 11); and very likely their minds were, when the spiritual intuitions ceased, exercised, like those of ordinary men, upon the things they had themselves uttered. But the rational powers of the prophets were not (as is affirmed of heathen soothsayers) suspended. Certain bodily functions might not be actively employed in sleep or in ecstatic vision; but the mind was awake; and, had not consciousness been retained, the scenes on which the internal eye had looked could not afterwards have been described, the words which were spoken to the inward ear could not afterwards have been recorded. We must not forget that the prophets did not speak in ecstasy.

The prophetic word communicated in some of the ways above noticed was variously announced. Sometimes a symbol was used; as when Ahijah foreshadowed the revolt of the ten tribes (1 Kings xi. 26-39). Whether, however, the symbolical actions we find occasionally mentioned were always really done may admit of question. Thus, though Jeremiah wore literally the symbolical yoke which Hananiah broke from his neck (Jer. xxviii.), yet it may be doubted whether he actually made the two long journeys to Euphrates to hide and to recover a linen girdle (xiii. 1-11), and still more whether Hosea contracted literally those symbolical marriages of which we read in Hos. i., iii. The actions might be proclaimed without being really performed; for they were intended but as a vehicle to convey to the people the message the prophet had received.

In regard to predictions of future events, there are two particulars which must be noted. They bear a certain relation to the mode in which the images of the future were presented to the prophet's mind, but a more immediate one to the mode in which they were placed on record. Thus, first, the way in which remote events are presented is remarkable. The prophet stands like a watchman on some high hill or lofty tower, scanning the distant horizon, and tells what meets his gaze. To one who so looks out the far and the near lie apparently in contact: the fore-ground has a distincter outline, and its colours are more vivid; but a multitude of things are blended together, and the haze through which the distant objects are seen obscures their figure and relative proportions. The prophet describing what is so placed before him describes as he sees, and therefore not in historical or chronological order; so that it is hard before the accomplishment to distinguish which of the events is near at hand and which more remote. This is called the 'perspective' character of prophecy, and illustrates the juxta-position in the prophetic writings of utterances to be immediately fulfilled with those before the fulfilment of which ages must roll by. An example may be given from Zech. ix. First—the prophet sees the triumphant march of Alexander (1-8); he then beholds Messiah in the distant future (9, 10), and afterwards reverts to the age of the Maccabees (11-17). On the same principle our Lord's discourse (Matt. xxiv.) may be interpreted; as also those passages in which the apostles seem to describe the final close of all things as to occur in their days.

The other point which was to be noted is the re-production of past events. There is an organic unity in God's plans, the earlier being the type of the later, and the later exhibiting, only with higher combinations and in a more perfect form, that which had appeared before. It was convenient, then, to describe the future in language borrowed from the past. Thus Messiah is said to renew the rule of David: the final triumphs of the church are coloured with the imagery of the fall of Babylon; and the full blessedness of God's people is represented as a return from captivity into the peaceful possession of the land of Canaan. We see here how futile the objection is that the prophet's eye cannot reach to the far-distant future, nor his tongue describe enemies or empires not in his time in existence. He is furnished from the past with an alphabet for the future. And it is not always past events which are so used. Events may have not yet occurred, which when they do occur shall be the ground and the type of others similar yet greater to occur thereafter. This is what is termed the double sense of prophecy; and it is impossible to shut our eyes to the fact of it. The return of small caravans of exiles from Babylon under the edicts of the Persian kings, who re-peopled their cities, and rebuilt their temple in fear, vassals to a foreign liege-lord, cannot exhaust the magnificent predictions of the ransomed of the Lord coming to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads (Isai.

xxxv. 10). There was joy, indeed, when the foundation of the new temple was laid, but there was weeping too (Ezra iii. 11-13); and not then were the walls of restored Jerusalem salvation, nor her gates praise (Isai. lx. 18). The prophecy had an accomplishment in Zerubbabel, but a fuller one in Messiah; and it is travelling onward still, with Messiah's extending kingdom, not to be satisfied till the Redeemer King shall manifestly reign amid the splendours of the New Jerusalem. There is no real ground for objecting to this; for why should not the near event be brought forward as a pledge of what lies far beyond? The principle is admitted in regard to types; for the typical rite had its instruction and its value for those who joined in it, while at the same time it pointed to some greater object: why, then, should it be denied in prophecy? No element of uncertainty is introduced. 'The double sense of prophecy,' says Mr. Davison (Discourses on Prophecy, disc. v. part. ii. pp. 144, 145, 6th edit.), 'is of all things the most remote from fraud and equivocation, and has its ground of reason perfectly clear. For what is it? Not the convenient latitude of two unconnected senses, wide of each other and giving room to a fallacious ambiguity; but the combination of two related, analogous, and harmonizing, though disparate subjects, each clear and definite in itself; implying a twofold truth in the prescience, and creating an aggravated difficulty, and thereby an accumulated proof in the completion. For a case in point, to justify the predictions concerning the kingdom of David in their double force, it must be shown of them, that they hold in each of their relations, and in each were fulfilled. So that the double sense of prophecy in its true idea is a check upon the pretences of vague and unappropriated predictions, rather than a door to admit them.' It may be added that it is by no means intended to assert that prophecy has always a double sense: many predictions, e.g. Mic. v. 2, point to one single event by which alone they are perfectly fulfilled. And in all cases it is wide enough of the cheating ambiguity of heathen responses which were made to answer equally well to two opposite events. The double sense is applicable only where through one event another is foreshadowed. For scripture has no other meaning in addition to the simple meaning of its words; but yet under this it again has the same, only lying somewhat more deeply imbedded.

That there is great difficulty in the interpretation of prophecy the fact that interpretations are so discordant sufficiently proves. Yet it is not impossible to clear away many difficulties, if we are disposed to use the necessary means. By diligent reading and meditation, comparing scripture with scripture, the writings of the Old Testament with those of the New, and pre-eminently by earnest prayer for the guidance of God's Spirit, a great knowledge may be obtained of the meaning and object of prophecy. A complete system of rules cannot here be given: it must suffice to point out some general principles. And if these be thoroughly apprehended the application of them in detail will not be hard. They involve the phraseology, the historical relations, and the doctrinal type of prophecy.

1. It must be the first business to arrive at the just understanding of the words and sentences in which the prophetic declarations are conveyed. In many respects prophecy has a language of its own. Symbolic terms are employed (which must be consistent through the same prophecy); as when a beast denotes a power, and a candlestick a Christian church. These must be carefully noted, that it may be understood whether the expressions are to be construed literally or figuratively. The figurative and, as some would say, hyperbolic character of prophetic speech is not capricious, not just to be ascribed to the cast of the oriental mind, but is definite in its measure, and results from the principles already laid down of prophetic communication by vision, and the clothing of the future in forms taken from the past. And so the past is frequently used in speaking of the future, and described as done when it is to be done, because the prophet looking on with prescient eye beheld it within his horizon. Hence too the succession of events in relation to each other, rather than as arranged according to chronological order. Nor must the poetical cast of prophetic diction be overlooked—not poetical simply and altogether: it had too definite a bearing upon the practical life of men, but yet too elevated in thought and tone to sink into bare prose.* These various characteristics must be diligently studied and clearly apprehended by him who would interpret prophecy aright. Careful examination therefore there should be, the comparison of one part of scripture with another, the laying over-against the prediction of the fulfilment it has received, if it should have already been fulfilled, guided by the declarations of our Lord and his apostles, who pour a flood of light upon the utterances of the ancient seers. And, it may be added here, separate prophecies must as far as possible be accurately distinguished; the ordinary division into chapters occasionally breaking up a single prophecy.

2. The historical relations must also be ascertained, under what circumstances a prophecy was delivered, by whom, and on what occasion. The condition of the covenant-people among whom the prophet stood, the events on which he was commissioned to speak, the sins he was to reprove, the judgments that were impending, the fears he was to soothe, and the position of surrounding nations, whose deeds and whose history had an influence on God's church and people, should be scrutinized; else an interpreter might readily apply to one time or event the predictions which were clearly directed to another. The historical portions of the scripture should be paralleled with those that are prophetical.

3. And then there is the doctrinal aspect to be known. This is based on the covenant-relationship of God to Israel. Sin is viewed both as treason to a sovereign, and as unfaithfulness to a husband. The desperate guilt of it, and the greatness of the mercy that remits it, are thus most largely illustrated. And prophecy, in accordance with this type, while denouncing sin and predicting judgment, runs on to the fulfilment of the divine purpose, the highest development of the covenant-relation, when the faithless spouse, polluted no more, shall be reinstated in the love she had outraged—when the rebellious subjects, disloyalty purged out for ever, shall be gathered in peace and prosperity beneath the beneficent sceptre of the universal King.

These observations are but outlines: they may serve, however, to point out the true mode of prophetic interpretation. It is necessary now to direct attention to the accomplishment of prophecy.

To examine this with any fulness would require a far greater space than can be here allowed. For volumes have been filled with the mere list of the predictions which have been accomplished. To such volumes the reader must be directed. And to pick out a few of those on which especially the seal of fact has been placed is to occupy a disadvantageous position. For it is easily forgotten, when particular examples are discussed, and perhaps objections are urged against them, that the subject has really a far wider sweep. The accomplishment of a single prediction may be note-worthy; but it is in its connected chain, it is in its accumulated evidence, that the supernatural character of prophecy is really seen. Particular cases, taken severally, may, if not actually paralleled, be likened to the lucky guesses, the sagacious anticipations, the strange coincidences which from time to time exhibit themselves in history, and which are eagerly laid hold of by those who are glad to produce any show of argument against the authority of the divine word. But prophetic evidence 'does not, says Dr. Fairbairn, in the work already referred to (p. 198), 'consist so much in the verifications given to a few remarkable predictions, as in the establishment of an entire series, closely related to each other, and forming an united and comprehensive whole. This is peculiarly the case in respect to the prophecies which relate to the person and kingdom of Messiah, which more than any others form a prolonged and connected series.' We have trains therefore of accomplishment, each valuable in itself, but how much more valuable and weighty when they are found all meeting in one point. Their united force, so brought together, each receiving as it adds, is infinitely greater than the mere sum of so many different unconnected events.

Perhaps it will be best in the space here

* The threefold character of prophetic style and diction—poetical elevation, figurative representation, and the exhibition of events as present, or successive only in relation to each other, rather than as linked to definite historical epochs, is fully illustrated by Dr. Fairbairn, Prophecy viewed in respect to its Distinctive Nature, its Special Function, and Proper Interpretation, part i. chap. v. pp. 121-176 allotted to point out some of those general features which distinguish prophetic accomplishment, leaving it to the reader to examine for himself more minutely the details. Prophecies have been variously classed. The simplest and commonest arrangement is—I. Those relating to nations in the neighbourhood of Israel. II. Those which respect the Hebrew nation. III. Those referring to Messiah. IV. Those which predict the destruction of Jerusalem.

I. The nations in contact with Israel, and from time to time their conquerors or oppressors, are threatened. Edom, and Tyre, and Babylon, and Egypt, have their future delineated, their fate distinctly announced. Now there is a marvellous diversity perceptible. Sagacious men, looking at the natural causes which tend to the ruin of states, or the local reasons why one should exalt itself above its neighbours, have often been able to anticipate the aggrandisement of the first, the misfortune of the other. But observe the distinguishing peculiarity of scripture prophecy. Edom should cease to be a people (Ezek. xxv. 12-14; Obad. 18): Tyre should be brought low, should in a great measure recover, but should ultimately be a mere desolate rock, a place on which fishermen were to spread their nets (Isai. xxiii.; Ezek. xxvi. 13, 14): Babylon was to be no more inhabited (Isai. xlii. 19-22): Egypt was to be humbled yet not destroyed: the nation would survive but be the basest of the kingdoms (Ezek. xxix. 15). Now the course of events has shown the extraordinary truthfulness of these prophecies. The Idumeans literally ceased to be a people; so thoroughly subdued by John Hyrcanus as to be obliged to conform to the law of Moses, and to be, to the entire loss of their nationality, absorbed by the Jews. In this is a more complete fulfilment of prediction than in the desolate ruins of the country which once was theirs—ruins which belonged to a later age. Tyre, again, is little more than a fishing-village now; and the plains of Babylonia lie waste, their teeming population gone; while Egypt, still a busy land, has for 2000 years lost its independence, and, 'a base kingdom,' has borne a foreign yoke. Now it may be asked, How could natural sagacity have calculated these results? What quick-sighted eye of man could have foreseen the different fates of Babylonia and of Egypt?—total subversion in the one case, perpetual depression in the other?

II. The prophecies in regard to the Hebrew nation have the same speciality. It was not extinction as against Babylon that was predicted: it was not subjugation as for Egypt; but a scattering throughout the earth without absorption by the nations among whom they should be mingled; the national existence and identity being still preserved. The predictions of the Pentateuch (Lev. xxvi.; Deut. xxvi., xxix.) draw the accurate outline of this, to which the declarations of later prophets give additional body and colouring. The fulfilment is a patent fact. 'Every attempt,' says Dr. Lee (On Miracles: an Examination of the Remarks of Mr. Baden Powell, &c., p. 42), to explain it by natural causes has merely served to account for the event itself, but not for its coincidence with what had been foretold many hundred years before. The preternatural character of the fact consists altogether in the correspondence and coincidence between ancient predictions and the present condition of the Jewish people—a condition which one scarcely knows how distinctly to express, but in the words of the prophetic account of it, given, too, by the legislator of the commonwealth whose dissolution he is directed to foreshow: "Thou shalt become an astonishment, a proverb, and a byword, among all nations, whither the Lord shall lead thee" (Deut. xxviii. 37). Supernatural foresight there must have been, then, in the old prophets; now let us see its bearing on Christianity.

III. There is the same noticeable peculiarity in the prophetic promise of Messiah. It is quite different from what natural or national prepossessions would have imagined. We might suppose the dim ideal of a future conqueror and king, with an anticipation that the destiny of Israel would have its highest prosperity under his sway. And prophecy accordingly describes the glories which should encompass One whose throne should be established in righteousness, and whose rule should comprehend the kings of the earth. But along with such a description there runs continually a darker augury: from the very first intimation of a Seed of the woman, the bruising of his heel is prognosticated (Gen. iii. 15); and there is the constant witness to mysterious blood-shedding, and foreshadowings of unutterable sorrow to be endured, and shame, and rejection, and death; so that those who most anxiously looked for the fulfilment of the nation's, of the world's, hope, were most reluctant to admit that such humiliation could touch the promised One; and even in the anticipation of his reign they had shaped out a far different sovereignty, unconscious of the great principle on which future spiritual glories are delineated in language taken from the earthly fortunes of their royal house. Now here is a whole system of prophetic declaration, foretelling what human thought would have been least likely to conceive; while the fulfilment came in a form so marvellously strange as to contradict all foregone conclusions, and yet so satisfactory as to engage men for the truth of it to resign all they would naturally covet, and seal their belief of it with their blood. The accomplishment of prophecy in the birth, the rejection, the death, the resurrection of Christ is complete. And, though he did not sway a worldly sceptre, yet his kingdom was not the less real: it was that wondrous rule over the hearts of men, that sovereignty, that more than imperial power, which gathered him a people from every nation of the world. The prophetic description of his kingdom is receiving daily fresh accomplishment: the stone cut out without hands is breaking and subduing other powers; and things are tending to that perfect consummation, when the pride and pomp of earthly kings shall have passed away, and the universe shall become the one wide dominion of the King of kings and Lord of lords.

IV. Our Lord's own prophecy was of the same type. While his enemies were proudly presuming on some worldly material deliverance, and while his followers expected him to restore the kingdom to Israel, his eye looked sadly on to the time when the holy house of Jerusalem should be desolate (Matt. xxiii. 37, 38; Luke xix. 41-44). 'To foresee such results,' says Dr. Fairbairn (ubi supr., part ii. chap. i. sect. 4, p. 233)—'results in many respects opposed to the intentions, and the general policy of the Romans, who were the chief instruments in effecting it—and with such a tone of assurance announce them so long beforehand, was not to speak in the manner of men; and no one who looks calmly into the circumstances can ever find an explanation that will be satisfactory to his own mind, by the help merely of some unusual degree of shrewdness on the part of Jesus, or of a certain peculiar combination of circumstances in Providence.'

The weight of prophecy as an evidence of the truth of the religion of the bible may be in some degree estimated by what has been said. It stands alone. No other claim to supernatural foreknowledge can be put in comparison with it. And no petty objection to this or that detail, no fancied discovery that here or there fulfilment has not answered to prediction, can be admitted to shake such evidence of such a comprehensive character.

It is true that there are prophecies which have not received fulfilment. The prediction uttered by Jonah against Nineveh is an example (Jonah iii.). But the explanation is very easy. God has a purpose to perform. And he uses those means which are best adapted to lead to it. For example, he 'willeth not the death of a sinner.' And it is against men as sinners that his threatenings are directed. So that, if they turn from the error of their way, God's purpose is accomplished, his mercy is exhibited. 'If that nation,' he distinctly says, 'against whom I have pronounced, turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them' (Jer. xviii. 8). This sufficiently vindicates from the charge of changeableness.

Little can here be added. But it is submitted to the candid reader that, after all the deductions which reasonably can be made, after every allowance that can be fairly claimed, prophecy, as exercised among the chosen people and recorded in their sacred books, stands widely distinguished from and far above the pretensions of any ordinary sages. It is a moral wonder that cannot be paralleled elsewhere. If, then, effects have their adequate causes, surely the conclusion to be arrived at here is that 'holy men of old spake,' not according to their own notions, not as evincing mere human sagacity, but 'as they were moved by the Holy Ghost' (2 Pet. i. 21). And we must take this not as an isolated proof that the bible is from God, but as one among several as weighty departments of evidence, all converging to the same point, to have an adequate notion of the force of proof that is thus supplied.

Among the many valuable books on prophecy those of Davison and Fairbairn have been already referred to: there may be also named Bp. Newton, Dissertations on the Prophecies; and Keith, Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion derived from Fulfilment of Prophecy, both frequently re-printed.

PROPHET, PROPHETS. It is proposed in this article to notice some of the historical and personal particulars respecting the prophets of scripture.

There are three Hebrew words commonly used to designate a prophet—nābī, which most probably signifies a speaker or announcer, hōzeh, a seer, and rōeh, also a seer. There is some diversity among critics as to the precise use of these terms. Nābī, however, may be considered as an official title. It was applied very early to those to whom divine communications were made, or who uttered anything by divine suggestion, even though such utterances had not a predictive character. So the name is given to Abraham (Gen. xx. 7). The Greek word prophētēs is of similar character. It implies one who speaks for another, specially for the Deity, and therefore an interpreter. Thus prophesying is used in 1 Cor. xi. 4, 5 (see Alford, note on 1 Cor. xii. 10); and thus Aaron is called the prophet, nābī, of Moses (Exod. vii. 1). Rōeh has sometimes been thought only a more poetical title, identical in meaning with hōzeh. But Dr. Lee has noticed a distinction, and is of opinion that the hōzeh was the general name of one to whom revelations were occasionally made: 'The titles rōeh and nābī equally point out the official prophet (the former term being merely the archaic and popular designation of an office which had been defined from the very first by Moses); while by hōzeh are indicated those individuals who occasionally, or for some specific purpose, were chosen to convey a communication from God, and who possessed the prophetic gift, but not the prophetic office: e.g. the authors of sacred poetry, such as Asaph (2 Chron. xxix. 30), are so called. And hence the nābī might be styled hōzeh, but not conversely' (The Insp. of Holy Script., 2nd edit. append. K. p. 544). The term nābī, given as already said to chosen persons in very early times, and continued, as to Moses, Miriam, Deborah, is thought afterwards to have fallen into disuse (1 Sam. ix. 9), and then from Samuel's time to have again become current. But it is just possible that the verse referred to applies only to Samuel, and means that he, originally a seer, rōeh, was afterwards generally termed a prophet, nābī, though the old name still lingered in the mouths of many.

The Hebrew prophets were, as Augustine has well said, the philosophers, divines, instructors, and guides of the people in piety (De Civ. Dei, lib. xviii. cap. xli. 2, Op., edit. Bened. tom. vii. col. 524). They were selected according to God's sovereign pleasure, who imparts his spiritual gifts as he will (1 Cor. xii. 11), sending his message occasionally even by unworthy messengers.

Whether there was any special inauguration of a prophet may be doubted. Some have imagined that prophets were anointed; but this notion has hardly any other ground than a misinterpretation of a single text (Psal. cv. 15). In the case of Elisha the word appears to have been used figuratively (1 Kings xix. 16, 19). Means were provided for the detection of false prophets. Very often, in order to secure confidence in the ultimate purpose of far-reaching prophecy, some present sign was given, or some near event was foretold (e. g. xiii. 1-5). Men's minds were thus fortified; and faith, though it had to wait, need not fail. But the mere occurrence of a sign or wonder was not in all cases sufficient. There is a consistency in God's dealings; and he cannot contradict himself. True prophecy is in accordance with its own utterances. And, therefore, if any fresh doctrine were brought in, if the teaching ran counter to the known word of God, the falsity of it might be at once concluded. And there were two special enactments in the Mosaic law intended to meet all such cases. If a prophet appeared and gave a sign which came to pass, but the prophet's teaching tended to idolatry (Deut. xiii. 1-5); and again, if a prophet spoke in the name of the Lord and his prediction was not fulfilled (xviii. 21, 22), then in each of these cases the false prophet was to be put to death. We see in after-times these criteria referred to (Jer. xxviii. 9), and God interfering to punish the man who had presumptuously ventured to speak in his name.

But, though there was no special inauguration to the prophetic office, yet there were schools in which those called 'sons of the prophets' were trained under the eye of some experienced man of God; and from persons so instructed God did, it seems, often choose his messengers. We hear of these establishments first in the time of Samuel. But perhaps they were not then permanently organized. Able critics have maintained that it was not till the disruption of the kingdom, and the want caused in the northern state by the departure of the priests and Levites into Judah, that these schools were really founded, in order to the perpetuation of a theocratic spirit in Israel. For this purpose they were admirably suited: see Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. i. pp. 368, 369. They were located in various towns; and there must probably have been some collegiate building, where the young men lived in a community. They were instructed, doubtless, in the sacred law, and in psalmody; prophesying, it is said, with psalteries and other instruments of music. Samuel, and Elijah, and Elisha, if not always resident in such establishments, yet exercised careful superintendence over them (1 Sam. x. 5, 10, xix. 20; 2 Kings ii. 3, 5, 15, iv. 38-44, vi. 1-7, 32). The superior sometimes employed one of these scholars on a message which it was not expedient he should carry himself (ix. 1-3); and so common, it would seem, was God's selection of them for his work that Amos notes it as a remarkable thing that he was neither a prophet nor a prophet's son when the divine word came to him (Amos vii. 14, 15). These schools are supposed to have continued till the Babylonish captivity; and it might be to some such establishment under Ezekiel that they of the captivity resorted for instruction (Ezek. viii. 1, xiv. 1, xx. 1). These were imitated in later days by the schools of the rabbis.

With regard to the ordinary mode of life of the prophets, we may no doubt say that they studied to live above the world, and to set examples of simplicity and purity of conduct. But this they would do, not merely as prophets, but as faithful servants of the Most High. Much has been written about their asceticism, their poverty and privations; and critics have culled out passages from scripture history descriptive of periods of famine, war, or other calamity, and then, because the prophets living at the time were sufferers, they have very unreasonably inferred that they were in their ordinary life similarly pinched and distressed. It would be as reasonable to conclude, because king Joram wore sackcloth and suffered privation at the siege of Samaria (2 Kings vi. 27, 30), that Hebrew kings were generally so clothed, and generally so impoverished. The position and circumstances of prophets varied, like those of other men, with the times. By ungodly princes they were often persecuted; but they often held high office, and discharged the functions of (as we should say) privy-councillors. Even in the reign of such a man as Joram Elisha possessed powerful influence (iv. 13). Titles of high respect were given them (1 Kings xviii. 7, 13; 2 Kings ii. 19, xiii. 14). And, as to their domestic habits, it is true that they probably wore some distinctive plain garment (i. 8; Zech. xiii. 4); but Elijah had his attendant even in his hasty flight from Jezreel to Beer-sheba (1 Kings xix. 3); presents were made them, which, though sometimes they deemed it proper to decline, they at other times accepted (2 Kings iv. 42, v. 15, 16, viii. 9). And some of them were Levites and priests, and received, no doubt, the usual offerings and advantages; while those of higher station lived, we may well suppose, as befitted that station. The pulse on which Daniel was for a while sustained (Dan. i. 8, 16) was preferred by him, not from any principle of asceticism, but in order to observe the law while at a heathen court.

The number of the prophets is very variously reckoned. Leaving out those so called in the earlier times, we may divide them into (1) prophets under the law, and (2) prophets in New Testament times.

Of the former we have those in the wilderness, as Moses, Aaron, Miriam, and the seventy elders (Numb. xi. 16, 17, 24-30). After the entrance into Canaan there have been reckoned Joshua, an anonymous prophet (Judges vi. 8-10), Deborah and Hannah, prophetesses, one who denounced God's judgments on Eli's house (1 Sam. ii. 27-36), Samuel, Nathan, Gad, David, Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun, Solomon, Ahijah the Shilonite, (1 Kings xi. 29-39, xiv. 1-18), Shemaiah (xii. 22-24; 2 Chron. xi. 2-4, xii. 5-8, 15), the man of God who went from Judah, and the old prophet of Beth-el (1 Kings xlii.), Iddo (2 Chron. ix. 29, xii. 15, xlii. 22), Jehu the son of Hanani (1 Kings xvi. 1-4, 7; 2 Chron. xix. 2, 3), Azariah the son of Oded, and Oded (xv. 1-8), Hanani (xvi. 7), Elijah, the hundred prophets whom Obadiah hid from Jezebel's fury in a cave (1 Kings xviii. 4, 13), two, probably three, anonymous prophets who delivered messages to Ahab (xx. 13, 22, 28, 35-43), Micaiah the son of Imlah (xxii. 8, 9, 13-28), Jahaziel the son of Zechariah (2 Chron. xx. 14-17), Eliezer the son of Dodavah (37), Elisha, the prophet who anointed Jehu (2 Kings ix. 1-10), Zechariah the son of Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv. 20-22), a prophet who dissuaded Amaziah from employing an army of Israelites (xxv. 7-9), another who rebuked the same king for idolatry (15, 16), Oded (xxviii. 9-11), Joel, Jonah, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Habakkuk, Obadiah, the prophetess Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 14-20), Urijah the son of Shemaiah (Jer. xxvi. 20-23). During the captivity, Ezekiel and Daniel prophesied, and, after the return from Babylon, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. And then the prophetic spirit ceased.

In New Testament times, the divine power was again manifested; and, both where most of all deprivation of religion had been manifested, and where the legal services had been interrupted.

Many great prophets did not commit their predictions to writing for the future advantage of the church. Such predictions referred to their own times, and did not extend to distant ages. And we may well enough allow that very possibly all the inspired words of those whose books we have were not preserved. Not that any portion of scripture has been lost; but that the wisdom of God did not design that other utterances, whether of prophets or apostles, should form a part of that great standard of his oracles which it was needful that the church should have to study, to be her guide and counsellor until her militant state was ended. Isaiah, doubtless, uttered other holy words; but God did not intend their memorial to last. St. Paul, no question, wrote other epistles: they served a temporary purpose and have passed away with no detriment to the church.

The following table exhibits the order and chronology, so far as it can be determined with reasonable probability, of those prophets whose writings form part of the canonical books of the Old Testament:—

	Before Christ.	Kings of Judah.	Kings of Israel.
Joel	Between 877 and 847	Joash or Amaziah	Jehu or Jehoahaz
Jonah	Between 820 and 784		Joash or Jeroboam II.
Amos	Between 810 and 785	Uzziah	Jeroboam II.
Hosea	Between 784 and 723	Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah	Jeroboam II. to Hoshea
Isaiah	Between 754 and 694	Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, perhaps Manasseh	Pekahiah, Pekah, Hoshea
Micah	Between 750 and 700	Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah	Pekah, Hoshea
Nahum	Between 720 and 698	Hezekiah
Zephaniah	Between 628 and 620	Josiah
Jeremiah	Between 628 and 586	Josiah, Jehoiaquim, Jehoiachin, Zedekiah
Habakkuk	Between 620 and 609	Josiah, Jehoahaz
Daniel	Between 606 and 534
Ezekiel	Between 595 and 573
Obadiah	Between 588 and 583
Haggai	About 520
Zechariah	About 520
Malachi	Between 436 and 420

prior to and after Christ, the Great Prophet of the church, there must be enumerated Zacharias, Simeon, the prophetess Anna, John the Baptist, Agabus (Acts xi. 28, xxi. 10, 11), the evangelist Philip's four daughters (9), several of the apostles, as Paul, Peter, Jude, John, besides those spoken of in 1 Cor. xii. 28, xiv. 29-32; Eph. iii. 5, iv. 11.

Balaam and the false prophets are not noticed in this enumeration.

It will be observed that from the time of Samuel down to the return from Babylon there was an almost-uninterrupted line of prophetic men. And many of the most distinguished of these were after the disruption in the kingdom of the ten tribes; God raising up a company to maintain his truth there PROPHETESS (Exod. xv. 20; Judges iv. 4; 2 Kings xxii. 14; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22; Neh. iv. 14; Isai. viii. 3; Luke ii. 36). See PROPHET.

PROPIIATION. The Greek word so rendered (Rom. iii. 25) is elsewhere the appellation of the 'mercy-seat' (Heb. ix. 5); and some interpreters imagine that the sense of the first-named place is grounded upon the use of the word as signifying mercy-seat. But Dr. Alford very well renders 'a propitiatory offering,' which is much more consonant with the words that follow, 'through faith in his blood. A different but kindred word occurs in 1 John ii. 2, iv. 10; on which Dr. Alford says, 'Christ has, as our propitiation, i.e. as a sin-offering, reconciled God and us by nothing else but by his voluntary death as a sacrifice, has by this averted God's wrath from us.' The need of such a propitiation is evident from the fallen state of man. He is now a sinful being (1. 8, 10), and cannot bear the scrutiny of a holy God (Psal. cxxx. 3). See ATONEMENT.

PRO'REX (2 Kings i. 17, marg.). Viceroy. See JEHOEAM, 1.

PROSELYTE. The Hebrew nation was regarded as God's peculiar people. But yet from the very first a way was open to men of another race by which they might attain to the privileges of the divine covenant. Thus Abraham was directed to circumcise 'all the men of his house, born in the house and bought with money of the stranger' (Gen. xvii. 12, 13, 23, 27). And it cannot be doubted that Jacob carried with him into Egypt not only his sons but his servants, and that from the descendants of all his household proceeded the Israelitish nation. When the law was given, we find repeated mention of strangers, of their duties and disabilities; and a difference is made according to the native country of foreigners in regard to their being admitted earlier or later into 'the congregation of the Lord' (Deut. xxiii. 3, 4, 7, 8).

Foreigners merely by residing in the land became, as was natural in some degree, subject to the Israelitish law. They were to observe the sabbath (Exod. xx. 10); they were punishable for Molech-worship and for blasphemy (Lev. xx. 2, xxiv. 16). They enjoyed, too, some immunities. They were to be kindly treated (Deut. x. 18, 19), and they had the protection, in case of need, of the cities of refuge (Numb. xxxv. 15). These and some other provisions seem to have touched any foreigner who resided in the land, without regard to his receiving or not the Hebrew faith. He was not compelled to enter into the covenant; but he must not outrage the laws, civil or religious, of the country. Provision seems also to have been made for acts of worship to the true God without the necessity of submitting to all the ordinances of the ceremonial law. Just as Jethro when he paid his visit to Moses in the wilderness (before, indeed, the covenant at Sinai) offered sacrifice (Exod. xviii. 12), so might a foreigner draw nigh to Jehovah with an offering made by fire (Numb. xv. 14-16). But, if he wished really to share the privileges of the chosen people, he must be circumcised. He then might eat the passover (Exod. xii. 48, 49; Numb. ix. 14), of which no uncircumcised stranger was allowed to partake. It has been supposed that circumcision was necessary before joining in the other solemn feasts. The letter of the law certainly does not demand it. The observance of the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 29), of the feast of weeks (Deut. xvi. 11), and of that of tabernacles (14) is extended to strangers without any such requirement.

Proper distinctions have not perhaps been always made. The mass of the so-called strangers resident in Israel in the earlier times of the state must have been the remnants of the ancient inhabitants.

These are represented as kept in a subordinate position. They were considered as objects of charity (xxiv. 17, 19-21). And on these certain burdens were laid; and they were compelled to labour in the public works—as good a mode of employing them, perhaps, as could be devised (1 Chron. xxii. 2; 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18). It is not likely that any who were, properly speaking, foreigners, sojourning for trade or pleasure in Palestine, would be so treated; besides, the number of such foreigners in those times must have been small. It is elsewhere explained who they were (1 Kings ix. 20-22), Amorites, Hittites, &c., on whom as strangers the levy was made. And it may be presumed that these persons had not been circumcised. For, long after, they are mentioned as having, so far as they could, continued to practise their own abominations (Ezra ix. 1, 2). Had they become circumcised, had they really entered into the covenant of the law, we may presume that they would have been freed from the compulsory service above adverted to. For we find repeated examples of such men possessing property, filling offices of trust, and attaining high rank, and therefore must suppose that they had become to all intents and purposes like home-born Israelites. Such were Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. xi. 6-13, xxiii. 39), Ittai the Gittite (xv. 19-22, xviii. 2), Araunah the Jebusite (xxiv. 18-24).

In later times persons of other nations and other religions embraced the Jewish faith in larger numbers (Esth. viii. 17). The Jews were more widely dispersed through the world, and had their synagogues in which Moses was read continually in numberless heathen cities. Devout minds would be attracted by the purity of the divine law; and there would be a fulfilment of that prophecy, hereafter, it may be, to be still more emphatically fulfilled, which declared that 'many people and strong nations' should 'come to seek the Lord of hosts in Jerusalem' (Zech. viii. 20-23). Sometimes indeed, when they had the power, the Jews were nothing loth to make converts by force. A notable instance of this occurred when John Hyrcanus imposed circumcision on the Idumeans, under pain of banishment or death (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xiii. 9, § 1).

We are prepared, after what has been said, to find proselytes spoken of in the New Testament. Many of them, we are told, were gathered at Jerusalem on the great day of pentecost (Acts ii. 5, 9-11); and, when the seven officers were appointed for the daily ministrations of church-goods, one was a proselyte (vi. 5).

The Jewish writers say that there were two classes of proselytes—proselytes of the gate (from the Old Testament phrase, the 'stranger that is within thy gates,' Exod. xx. 10), and proselytes of righteousness. Of the former the observance of the seven Noachian precepts (as they are called) was required: these were prohibitions against (1) blasphemy, (2) idolatry, (3) murder, (4) incest, (5) theft, (6) disobedience to authority, (7) the eating of flesh with the blood (see Winer, Bibl. EWB., art. 'Proselyten'). But these proselytes were under sundry disabilities, and were not even allowed to study the law. Such proselytes, it is alleged, were the Roman centurions (Luke vii. 5; Acts x. 1, 2), and the 'devout' persons occasionally mentioned (xvii. 4). The proselytes of righteousness were those who were actually incorporated into the Jewish church. These were circumcised: they were afterwards baptized, solemnly promising to keep the law; and then they made an offering, two turtle-doves or pigeons, taking when the temple was destroyed an oath to offer when it should be re-built. In the case of women the baptism and the oblation were sufficient.

But there have been serious doubts entertained on some of these points. Many have questioned whether there were really two classes such as have been described. Perhaps the truth lies between opposite extremes; and, while there may have been some difference, yet probably not any such systematic arrangements as the rabbins assert. The baptism of the proselytes, too, is involved in much uncertainty. It is said to have been of equal importance with circumcision. And yet we find no trace of it in the Old Testament, no mention of it by Josephus, Philo, and the old Targums. Yet from the fact of John's baptism not appearing to be a new ceremony, the chief question being whether he had authority to baptize (John i. 25), and from the predilection of the Jews for divers washings (Mark vii. 4; see also John iii. 5), there is a considerable presumption that a baptism might be used on such an occasion. And when baptism had become the initiatory rite of Christianity we may believe that the use of it would grow among the Jews.

PROSEUCHA. This Greek word is generally rendered 'prayer' in our version. Sometimes, however, it has been supposed to mean a place of prayer, or oratory (Luke vi. 12; Acts xvi. 13). It is certain that there were such places, mostly outside the towns where synagogues could not be built, and near water for the convenience of ablution. And occasionally the name seems to have been applied to large buildings, perhaps even to synagogues. But such an oratory cannot well be meant in the passage first cited above; and it is questionable whether there was any actual structure dedicated to devotional purposes at Philippi. The places to which the Jews under such circumstances resorted appear to have been in the open air, in a grove, and (as before said) near water, by fountains or streams, or on the sea-shore. It was most probably to such an open place that Paul and his companions repaired on the sabbath, for the purpose of instructing those they might meet with there. It would seem (xvii. 1) that there was no synagogue at Philippi.

PROVERB. A short sententious saying which has become popular from its apposite illustration of men or manners. Proverbial expressions are greatly in use among oriental nations; and teachers of morals have often enforced and embellished their instructions by such pithy maxims. A proverb must be short; else it loses its very character: it must have a certain elegant or agreeable turn; else it would not be appreciated. Besides the book of Proverbs, in which a multitude of these excellent moral maxims are contained, we find many others, either entire sentences or proverbial phrases, scattered throughout scripture. Thus the reader may refer to the following places: Gen. x. 9; 1 Sam. x. 12; 1 Kings xx. 11; Job vi. 5; Jer. xiii. 23; Luke iv. 23. Proverbs occurring in scripture will generally be explained by comparison with other passages, or a knowledge of eastern habits. 'Proverb' is sometimes put for parable, or a metaphorical form of expression (John xvi. 29; the ordinary word for parable not being in St. John).

PROVERBS, THE BOOK OF. Of the canonicity of this book there can be no doubt. It is true that one of the Jewish schools is said to have fancied some contradictions in it. But it is in all the Hebrew catalogues; being ranked among the Khethubim or hagiographa. The book of Proverbs bears generally the name of Solomon, and has for the most part been attributed to that prince, who 'spake (we are told) three thousand proverbs' (1 Kings iv. 33). But it is manifest on looking at the book that Solomon did not put it into its present state, and that some, at least, of the wise sayings it contains proceeded from other sources.

We may divide it into four parts. I. This portion comprises Prov. i.—ix., a discourse extolling true wisdom, and specially urging the young, with many arguments, to secure so excellent a possession. To this we find prefixed a title and introduction (i. 1-6), intended, it would seem, to apply to the whole book. II. A collection of maxims generally unconnected, inculcating moral precepts which respect both man's duty towards God, and his behaviour to his fellow-creatures (x. 1—xxii. 16). III. A more connected address, with various admonitions, and a charge to listen to the words of the wise (xxii. 17—xxiv. 34). IV. An appendix (xxv.—xxxii.), comprising (1) a collection of Solomon's proverbs which Hezekiah's servants copied out (xxv.—xxix.); many of those which are comprised in the second part are here repeated: comp. xxv. 24 with xxi. 9; xxvi. 3 with x. 13; xxvi. 13 with xxii. 13; xxvi. 15 with xix. 24; xxvi. 22 with xviii. 8; xxvii. 12 with xxii. 3; xxvii. 13 with xx. 16; xxvii. 15 with xix. 13; xxvii. 21 with xvii. 3; xxviii. 6 with xix. 1; xxviii. 19 with xii. 11; xxix. 13 with xxii. 2; xxix. 22 with xv. 18: there is also one that is nearly the same with a proverb of the third part: comp. xxviii. 21 with xxiv. 23; it has been inferred therefore that Hezekiah's servants used the same sources as the compiler of the second part; (2) the maxims delivered by Agur to Ithiel and Ucal (see AGUR, ITHIEL, UCAL) (xxx.); (3) the admonitions to king Lemuel by his mother (see LEMUEL) (xxxii. 1-9); and (4) the description of a virtuous woman (xxxii. 10-31); where the initial letters of the verses follow the order of the Hebrew alphabet.

There have been doubts as to the authorship of parts of this book. It is of course generally admitted that many of the proverbs contained in it are really by Solomon; but some critics disbelieve that the first part (i.—ix.) was composed by him. The style, and diction, and tone, it has been alleged, conclusively mark a difference from the sententious utterances comprised in the second part. The parallelism is said to vary, and a higher degree of poetic power to be displayed. But these are not sufficient proofs. More poetical power would naturally be developed in a connected piece, such as the description of wisdom, in iii. 13-20, or again in viii., than when pregnant thoughts were to be compressed into brief sentences. And a discourse would be more likely to furnish scope for synonymous or gradational parallels, and a series of maxims for antithetic ones. It is true that the parts of i.—ix. are somewhat loosely connected; but this furnishes no argument against the unity of its authorship, or against its being the work of Solomon. It is natural to believe that, when a collection of moral precepts was made containing some of the acknowledged productions of the wise king, his would be placed first, and those from other writers, as we see in the appendix, come afterwards. The repetition of titles (x. 1, xxv. 1) only shows that the collection was not made all at once. Some hasty critics have tried to make out a difference of authorship from the use of different divine names: God (Elohim) occurs twice in chap. ii.: the Lord (Jehovah) is elsewhere generally used; therefore there were different writers. The fact is that Elohim is found only four times in i. 1—xxix. 27; first in ii. 5, where, as Jehovah had immediately preceded, the repetition of the same word would have been awkward; secondly in ii. 17, where according to the genius of the Hebrew language Elohim must be used because a pronoun had to be joined to it; thirdly in iii. 4, where there is the antithesis of 'God and man;' fourthly in xxv. 2, where there is a similar antithesis, more prominent in the original. It is most probable then, on the whole, that the first and second parts are from the same pen. With regard to the third part, xxii. 17—xxiv. 34, there may perhaps be greater ground for hesitation. It is not unlikely that the moral sayings of others might be appended to those of Solomon; and perhaps this is intimated in xxiv. 23 where a kind of fresh title, 'the words of the wise,' seems prefixed to the section xxiv. 23-34. But some of the most judicious critics ascribe the whole of i.—xxix. to Solomon; and Keil (Einkleitung, § 119) produces a number of characteristic words and phrases frequently used in these chapters and rarely or (some of them) nowhere else occurring. Of the authorship of xxx., xxxi. nothing can be said. We can only suppose that these chapters were added before the captivity.

The book of Proverbs is frequently cited or alluded to in the New Testament; it is, indeed, a treasure-house of ethical wisdom, filled with choice sententious aphorisms, far excelling those of heathen sages, and inculcating all moral duties. Hence may every class of persons in every condition of life derive instructions for the regulation of practice: hence may he who learns be imbued with the teachings of more than earthly wisdom. See WISDOM.

Of commentaries on this book Holden's Improved Translation and Notes, 1819, is valuable. The expositions of Nicholls, 1842, Bridges, 3rd edit., 1850, and M. Stuart, 1852, may be consulted with advantage.

PROVIDENCE. This word occurs but once in our version (Acts xxiv. 2), and there with no reference to the Deity. As ordinarily understood, it means the care which God takes of the universe, the administrative rule he exercises over his dominions for the good of his church and people; of which an eminent example is the training of Israel for their inheritance in Canaan. It cannot be reasonably supposed that he leaves events to themselves. The whole current of scripture teaching is opposed to such a notion. His eye is described as everywhere present (Psal. xxxiii. 18, cxxxix. 2); his ear as open to every voice of his creatures (xciv. 9; Isai. lix. 1); his hand as that which gives effect to every work (1 Cor. iii. 7). God's providence does not constrain men; who act according to their dispositions and wishes (Isai. x. 7); nevertheless, he so rules as that their doings fulfil his purposes (Acts ii. 23; Eph. i. 11). It is sometimes said that, though God's providence may rule in great things, small events must be beneath his notice. Our Lord expressly contradicts such a notion (Matt. x. 29, 30). Besides, the smallest link in the chain is as necessary as the greatest: its failure would disarrange and dislocate the whole. Time, place, and circumstance, minute ingredients, go to make up a given result; and all must be cared for. But, though there is a watchful providence administering the world, persons must beware how they let their conduct be guided by what they call the leadings of providence. These may be only the leadings of their own inclination, or the facilities which Satan offers. The rule of life is to be, not God's supposed secret purpose, but his plainly-declared law.

PROVINCE. For notice of the difference between imperial and senatorial provinces under the Roman rule see PROCONSUL, PROCURATOR. Judea was a subordinate province, the procurator being accountable to the 'governor' of Syria.

PRUNING-HOOK. An implement used by vine-dressers. The word is found in scripture only in the plural (Isai. ii. 4, xviii. 5; Mic. iv. 3; Joel iii. 10; in the margin generally 'scythes'). It appears that the Hebrews were accustomed regularly to prune their vines (Lev. xxv. 3); and some critics believe that the time of this pruning, i.e. the spring, is indicated in Sol. Song ii. 12. But the rendering of our authorized version 'singing,' is preferable (see Ginsburg, The Song of Songs, note on ii. 12). There is a beautiful allusion by our Lord to the practice of pruning (John xv. 2): the barren branches of the symbolical vine are altogether cast away: those that bear fruit are cleansed by cutting off the unsound parts, and shortening the too luxuriant shoots

So dressed the fruit will be more abundant and will ripen better.

PSALMS, THE BOOK OF. This collection has in the Hebrew the title Sépher Tehillim, 'book of hymns' or 'praises, because most of the compositions consist more or less of hymns of praise. To some of the pieces other names are applied; as psallah, 'prayer,' to five (Psalms xvii., lxxxvi., xc., cii., cxlii.), shir, 'song,' to one (xlv.), also mizmôr to forty-five (e.g. iii., iv., v., vi.), rendered 'psalm,' and meaning properly a rhythmical production. Eight are mizmôr-shir, a 'psalm-song' (e.g. xxx., lxxv.); five are shir-mizmôr, 'song-psalm' (e.g. lxviii.); one is tehillah, 'praise' (cxlv.). Other titles are maschil, nichtam, which are explained in the articles under those names. By the Septuagint translators the book was called Psalmoi, whence our name, 'The Psalms.'

This book is placed in the Jewish canon among the khethubim, or hagiographa, the third division of the sacred volume. And, as it is universally acknowledged that many of the psalms were from the pen of David, chronologically prior to most of the prophetic writers, we have in this fact a proof that the khethubim were not collected as fragmentary relics, or as being less valued than other books of scripture. It was because of their peculiar character that they were distributed into a distinct class; and the distribution and the acknowledgment of them as canonical were of extreme antiquity; the Davidical psalms forming a nucleus around which other inspired hymns and didactic poems might gather, and along with which other compositions might be reckoned, apart indeed from the law, distinguished from the former and later prophets, but as precious, as fully the voice of God, books to be the study and the guide of Israel, and to descend through the generations of the church, as part of her prized heritage for ever. The canonical authority of the Psalms cannot be doubted by any one who remembers how the divine Saviour spoke of them (Luke xxiv. 44), including under the name the class of writings just spoken of, of which the Psalms were a principal part, generally placed first in order. Further evidence to their canonicity has been elsewhere produced. See BIBLE, CANON OF SCRIPTURE.

The authorship of the various psalms has occasioned much discussion. Popularly the whole book is termed the Psalms of David; and superficial readers have accustomed themselves to refer to them all as the words of the royal prophet. It is true that several of the Christian fathers adopted this notion; but there were others of greater critical acumen who were well aware of its unsoundness; and certainly no man with any pretensions to critical knowledge—it may really be said to common sense—would now revive the hypothesis. The reader may consult on this point Horne's Introd., vol. ii. pp. 699, 700, edit. Ayre, and the references there given.

The following are the authors to whom the various psalms are usually ascribed: Moses, David, Solomon, Asaph, Heman, Ethan, Jeduthun, and the three sons of Korah. In endeavouring to apportion to these, so far as may be, their respective compositions, some use must be made of the inscriptions or titles, and of the division of the whole into five books, of both which something will be afterwards more particularly said.

To Moses ten (Psalms xc.—xcix.) are assigned by Jewish writers. They have laid it down as a rule that, if one psalm is attributed to a particular author, all the succeeding ones are from his pen, till another name occurs. But for this rule there is no good reason; and it is clear, from the mention of Samuel in xcix. 6, that Moses could not have written that. Moses may very well have been the author of xc. It is thought to correspond in tone and style with his acknowledged hymns in Exod. xv.; Deut. xxxii.; and the objection taken from the limit of human life being placed at seventy or eighty years (Psal. xc. 10) is of no weight. Moses and a few of the elders lived to a great age; but the mass of the nation in his time died far earlier.

David's name is prefixed to seventy-three psalms (ii.—ix., xi.—xxxii., xxxiv.—xli., li.—lxv., lxxviii.—lxx., lxxxvi., ci., ciii., cviii.—cx., cxii., cxxiv., cxviii., cxxxiii., cxxxviii.—cxlv.) in the Hebrew text. In the Septuagint at least eleven others are assigned to him (xxxiii., xliii., xci., xciv.—xcix., civ., cxxxvii.), to which may be added x.; forming part of ix. in that version. Doubtless very many of the psalms thus attributed to David were written by him; some of them, however, must be of later date. But then there are others not so distinguished which in all probability are David's. Several illustrate the events of his history: he may have written some in youth, some when a fugitive from Saul, some when a crowned king. We may expect, therefore, to find his style and thoughts varied. But it may be said generally that softness, tenderness, and pathos characterize the productions of 'the sweet psalmist of Israel,' while there are those which evince a wonderful force and sublimity; and the diction is somewhat rugged and of an archaic cast.

The name of Solomon appears to two psalms (lxxii., cxxxvii.); but the first-named was written rather for him than by him.

Twelve psalms bear the name of Asaph (l., lxxiii.—lxxxiii.). But these cannot all be justly ascribed to the Asaph celebrated in king David's days (1 Chron. vi. 39); some evidently allude to later events. Hence Keil allows only l., lxxiii., lxxvii., lxxviii., lxxx.—lxxxii. to Asaph, and assigns lxxxiii. to the time of Jehoshaphat, lxxv., lxxvi. to the Assyrian period under Hezekiah, and lxxiv., lxxix. to the beginning of the Babylonish captivity (Eintleit., § 114, p. 398). The family of Asaph are prominently mentioned as sacred musicians in 2 Chron. xx. 14; Ezra ii. 41; Neh. vii. 44; some of them possibly might write psalms and prefix their great ancestor's name; for it was very common in Israel for a representative name to distinguish a family for many generations. The psalms that bear the name of Asaph are doctrinal or didactic, less sweet than those of David, but characterized by a deep vein of thought and a lofty tone.

Eleven psalms are described as belonging to 'the sons of Korah' (xlii., xlv.—xlix., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii.), most likely the descendants of the rebel who perished in the wilderness (Numb. xvi., xxvi. 11). A holy line proceeded from him; of whom Heman, grandson of Samuel the prophet, is mentioned as 'a singer' (1 Chron. vi. 33). Of these psalms Keil (ubi supr.) assigns xlii., xlv., lxxxiv. to the time of David, xlv. to that of Solomon, xlvii., xlviii. to Jehoshaphat's reign, xlv., lxxxvii. to the days of Hezekiah. Of xlix., lxxxv. he feels uncertain as to the date; while he attributes lxxxviii. to Heman the Ezrahite (according to the title), who may have been the person mentioned in 1 Chron. ii. 6, or his descendant, and being incorporated into the tribe of Levi may or may not be the same with Heman the singer. Psal. lxxxix. is ascribed to Ethan; but it is probably of the time of the captivity. Ethan has been imagined identical with Jeduthun (comp. 1 Chron. xv. 19 with xxv. 1, 3, 6); and Jeduthun's name appears in the titles to certain psalms (xxxix., lxii., lxxxvii.); but then it is rather as the musician than as the writer. Also it is far from certain that the Korahite psalms are not appropriated to that family as musicians or singers, not as the authors. Be this as it may, those so distinguished are exquisite lyric compositions.

With respect to the fifty anonymous psalms, Keil would ascribe i., ii., x., xxxiii., xliii. to the time of David, lxvi. to the Assyrian period; for lxvii. he can discover no chronological mark; lxxi. is after David's time; xci.—c. may belong to the period between Solomon and the captivity; cii. to the last days of the exile; civ.—cvi. somewhat later; cvii. very likely written for the first celebration of the feast of tabernacles after the return (Ezra iii. 1-6); cxl.—cxvi. belong to the early days after the return; cxvii., cxviii. to the laying of the first stone of the new temple; cxix. composed by Ezra. Of the songs of degrees Keil thinks cxx., cxxi., cxxiii., cxxv., cxxvi., cxxviii.—cxxx., cxxxiv. post-exilian, but is in doubt about cxxxii.: he places cxxxv., cxxxvi. after cxv. and cxviii.: cxxxvii. he thinks of the time of Darius Hystaspis, after the second taking of Babylon; cxlvi. is a summary of the Davidic and exile psalms; while cxlvii.—cl. are probably from the same hand, celebrating the completion of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (ubi supr., § 115).

If we follow other critics, the arrangement will be different; and there are some who would bring down the composition of several of the psalms to Maccabean times. This, however, can by no means be admitted. The facts that the canon of scripture was previously closed, and that the Septuagint translation must have been made prior to that period sufficiently disprove such a notion. Bleek argues strongly that there is no reason to believe that any psalms are later than the time of Nehemiah, and that few comparatively are so late. Doubtless many were composed in the time of the prophets, and may be taken as the complaints of those holy men for the persecutions they had to suffer. Many, too, belong to the exile or the period immediately succeeding. Thus he places cii., cxxxvii. certainly in the exile, probably also cxix., cxiii., cxxiv., and perhaps some others: moreover, cvii., cxxi., cxlii., cxxvi., cxlvii., certainly after at least the partial return and the re-establishment of the polity; probably also lxxxv., cxvi.—cxviii., ciii., clv., cxiii., cxvi., cxxv., cxxvii.—cxxx., cxxxv., cxxxvi., cxliv., cxlvi., cxlviii.—cl., these all, it is to be observed, being in the latter half of the book (Einleit. in das A.T., pp. 619, 620). Thus very many events in Israelitish history are illustrated by these divine songs.

Amid much diversity of opinion it is not easy to form a decided judgment respecting the authorship of several psalms; but the last-cited remark of Bleek may throw some light upon the question.

The whole, as above noted, are distributed into five books. I. Psal. i.—xli.; II. xlii.—lxxii.; III. lxxiii.—lxxxix.; IV. xc.—cvi.; V. cvii.—cl.; at the end of each of the first four there being a doxology. It is questioned when this distribution was made. Most likely it was gradual; and if so there is no reason against the belief that the psalms of the first book were gathered by David himself, most of them being inscribed with his name; and there being none which he might not have written. The objections made to v. 7 that it names the temple, and to xiv. 7 that a return from captivity is desired only to convict the objectors of carelessness. For the tabernacle is called the 'temple' in 1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3; and the use of the phrase 'turned the captivity' in Job xlii. 10 shows that it means generally deliverance from affliction. To this first book a second was afterwards added. Perhaps it was collected in Hezekiah's time. For Psal. xlvii. would seem to point to the Assyrian invasion. And, as we know that the men of Hezekiah wrote out additional proverbs of Solomon (Prov. xxv. 1), so it is no unreasonable thing to believe that they gathered more psalms of David, composed after those which he had himself collected, and that they added thereto other similar inspired poems. Perhaps also they were not aware that any others of David existed; for in Psal. lxxii. 20 there is the note, 'The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.' This at least proves that the collections were gradually made. For no mere divider of a book that was altogether before him would have inserted such a note in the middle. A third book was added, and then a fourth, and a fifth, we can hardly form a conjecture when. But it may be observed that, from the comparison of 1 Chron. xvi. 36 with Psal. cvi. 48, where the same doxology is found, Bleek (ubi supr.) believes that the fourth book was formed before the Chronicle history was written. It has been asserted that no Davidic psalm is to be found in the third, fourth, or fifth books; and it has been conjectured that, as some of those marked Asaph were perhaps composed by late descendants of Asaph, so those marked David in the later books might be the production of some one or more of David's posterity. The conjecture is not happy: it is not even ingenious; and it has the demerit of point-blank opposition to our Saviour's assertion that David in the Spirit uttered Psal. cx.: see Matt. xxii. 43-45. The fact is that, though, as just shown, the five books were gradually collected and arranged, and thus a chronological influence is apparent, yet some other principle helped to govern the arrangement. There is a remarkable diversity in the use of the divine names. It seems that Jehovah occurs 272 times in the first book, Elohim (used absolutely) 15 times; in the second book Jehovah 30 times, Elohim 164 times; in the third Jehovah 44 times, Elohim 43 times; in the fourth and fifth books together Jehovah 339 times, and Elohim 7 times. This fact is variously explained. It has led some to believe that the entire arrangement was the work of a single hand, guided largely by the prevailing use of the sacred name. To this, as already shown, there are objections; but we may well allow the character and the contents to have had some weight in determining the place of various psalms, and we are by no means obliged to suppose the divisions and distribution altogether chronological. More upon this topic cannot here be said; nor can the authorship of each psalm be minutely and at length investigated (see Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. pp. 711, 712). All that can now be added is that it matters not as to the canonical authority by whom any particular psalm was written; we may certainly receive it as from some holy man speaking as he was moved by the Holy Ghost. One word, too, may be said on the allegation that the psalms in which Elohim predominates are the earlier, those in which Jehovah is used the later compositions. Bp. Edw. H. Browne has distinctly disproved this in his Pent. and Elohistical Psalms, lect. iv. pp. 52-67. And indeed a mere inspection of the preponderance of Jehovah in the first book where the earlier psalms are collected is decisive.

It has been already observed that the names of the alleged authors are prefixed to many of the psalms. There are other inscriptions of various kinds, the meaning of which it is sometimes difficult to explain. None of these titles or inscriptions are to be reckoned as canonical or inspired. Many of them are true and to be relied on; but they manifestly express the opinion of a collector, or (so to speak) editor, rather than of the original writer: they are directions as to the mode of singing or chanting the psalms; and there are notices of the occasion on which a psalm is supposed to have been written which are erroneous. They vary, too, in some of the old translations, as the Greek and the Syriac. They are, then, of not much higher authority than the subscriptions to the apostolic epistles. Still there are critics of no mean reputation who maintain these titles to be from the pens of the respective authors.

Besides the titles heretofore mentioned, there are several which probably denote the tunes to which the psalms that bear them were suited. Such are Ajeleth-shahar, 'hind of the morning,' prefixed to Psal.

xxii.; Shoshannim, 'the lilies,' to xlv.; Jonath-elem-rechokim, 'the dumb dove in distant places,' to lvi.; Shoshan-eduth, 'the lily of the testimony,' to lx.; and Shoshannim-eduth, 'the lilies of the testimony,' to lxxx. It was and is still customary in the east to give poems names of this kind. They probably therefore are attached to the psalms to denote well-known melodies. For a notice of the psalms called 'songs of degrees,' see DEGREES, SONGS OF. Ten are styled Hallelujah-psalms (cvi., cxi.—cxliii., cxxxv., cxlvi.—cl.); as beginning with that word, rendered in our version 'Praise the Lord.'

Other words prefixed are Alamoth to xli., to be sung with the female voice; Gittith to viii., lxxxi., lxxxiv., a light joyous air; Mahalah to liii., and Mahalah-jeannoth to lxxxix., perhaps with a vocal accompaniment; Muth-labben to ix., for a chorus of virgins; Neginah or Neginoth to iv., vi., liv., lv., lxi., lxxvii., lxxvi., with an instrumental accompaniment; Nehiloth to v., possibly a wind-instrument; Sheminith to vi., xii., upon the eighth or octave; Shiggaiion to vii., perhaps an elegy. Further observations are made on each of these words in the respective articles upon them. An address, 'To the chief musician,' is prefixed to 55 psalms. Attached to it is sometimes the name of the author, sometimes that of the musician himself, occasionally with the melody, tone or key, or instrument to be used: it cannot be doubted that all these directions signified that the psalms were to be sung, and regulated the manner thereof. See Hävernick, Einleit., § 283, vol. iii. pp. 109-120. We further find 'To bring to remembrance' prefixed to xxxviii., lxx., and 'To teach' to lx. Perhaps the recollection of God's mercy was suggested by the first; while the last might intend that the psalm was to be committed to memory. Al-taschith, Higgaiion, and Selah are explained in the articles under those words.

The number of canonical psalms is 150; and, apart from the five-fold division already noticed, they have been classified by various modern critics. There is little practical advantage in such classifications: it may be enough to say that Hengstenberg, followed by Keil (Einleit., § 112), would arrange them as 1. Psalms of praise and thanksgiving; e.g. viii., xviii., xix., xxiii., xxix., &c.; 2. Psalms expressive of sorrow and complaint; e.g. iii.—vi., &c.; 3. Didactic psalms; e.g. i., xiv., xv., xxxii., xxxvii., &c. In their structure they present almost every form of Hebrew poetical composition. Some are lyric, others elegiac: some exhibit a kind of dramatic form in which speakers are introduced in dialogue; and there are several called alphabetical psalms (xxv., xxxiv., xxxvii., cxi., cxii., cxlv., cxlv.), because the initials of each line or stanza follow the order of the Hebrew alphabet. The Septuagint translators have added one more to the canonical 150: it is certainly spurious, though it is ancient and has been adopted in the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions. Its subject is the combat of David with Goliath. The Septuagint followed by the Vulgate also divides the canonical psalms differently from the Hebrew text. The following table will exhibit the diversity:—

Hebrew.	LXX.
i.—viii.	i.—viii.
ix., x.	ix.
xi.—cxlii.	x.—cxii.
cxiv., cxv.	cxiii.
cxvi.	cxiv., cxv.
cxvii.—cxlvi.	cxvi.—cxlv.
cxlvii.	cxlvi., cxlvii.
cxlviii.—cl.	cxlviii.—cl.
	cli.

Several of the psalms are cited in the New Testament and distinctly applied to Christ (e.g. see Matt. xxii. 43, 44; Acts ii. 25-31, xiii. 33-37). There is indeed a great tendency in some quarters to limit the Messianic character of the psalms, and to argue that when cited it is only by way of accommodation; so that passages are applied to Christ which had no real intended reference to him, and were only so used on account of a certain similarity of circumstances observed or imagined between a psalmist and our Lord. Some observations disproving such a theory will be found in the article QUOTATIONS, which see. But it may be remarked here that we cannot consent to sever the close connection which exists between the Old Testament and the New. The first is introductory to the second: the last is the full development of the first, the maturity of that which before was but a seed. And God has seen fit to describe by his dealings with the earlier church what he intends to do with the later. All things that happened to them were fraught with present lessons of mercy and judgment: they had specially and thoroughly to do with the men of that generation, proving them and guiding them and encouraging them. But yet they were 'our examples' (1 Cor. x. 6, 11); and God teaches us most effectually not by bare words but by living things, in which we may best see his purposes and the path he would have us to walk in. The revelation of the Old Testament was to prepare the world for its Saviour, by the selection of a peculiar people who were to be God's witnesses, by the severing of a particular line in whom the promised One was to descend, by the setting up of men his prototypes who should in one way or other represent the ideal to be afterwards fully realized.

There was a definite relation, then, both between Israel God's first-born and the Only-begotten, and between David the chosen king of the chosen people and the great King of whose dominion there should be neither limit nor end (Luke i. 32, 33). Hence, when the psalmist describes his own griefs, his description is not bounded by them. In the lineaments of the past, the future is depicted; and the sorrows and experience of David, his persecutions and his perils, his trust and his victories, the treachery practised towards him and the establishment of his throne have their intended and higher counterpart in the deeper sorrows and fuller experience and more complete triumphs of a more innocent sufferer, a nobler King.

It is this, its Messianic teaching, which renders the book of Psalms so precious a heritage to the church, and has made it the store-house of devotional thought. There is eternal life therein, because these scriptures testify of Christ (John v. 39). And it is not merely one or two that point to some particular circumstance in Messiah's history, that exhibit some special trait in Messiah's character, but—just as we must read his life in the four evangelists to grasp the full portraiture of him—there is a prophetic tone through the whole collection; one part, one sacred song, illustrating the others and leading on by historical note, by apt comparison, by definite prediction, to that fulness of Messianic doctrine, which renders them even now the best expressions of a soul that needs a Saviour, that is longing for a Saviour, that has found a Saviour, that rejoices in a Saviour's love. They must be taken as a whole; and it is truly wonderful to find that they rise with the growing development of the divine plans, and are yet more adapted to the Christian experience than they were to the experience of earlier, of Jewish believers. Along with this prophetic character there is their moral and doctrinal teaching—the deep views of sin they present, the spiritual character of the divine law, the perfections of God, with the faith, hope, and love, heavenly graces, implanted in the heart of God's people, and the happy prospect of eternal life—in all these points we recognize the same spirit that breathes indeed through all the inspired volume. How well fitted is this book to promote the soul's communion with God!

There is one more topic connected with the Psalms which must be touched on—it can be so but very briefly. In many places there are expressions evincing, it has been said, the stern spirit of revenge far alien from that mild and merciful temper which shines conspicuously in the gospel of love. Attempts have been made to explain these expressions away—they are but eastern forms of speech, they are prophetic of what will happen, embodying and intending no wish for evil—such are some of the modes adopted of solving what has always been felt a serious difficulty. It is fair to say that explanations like these cannot satisfy; neither can they with any propriety be applied to such passages as Psal. cix. 1-20, cxxxvii. 7-9, or to some of the imprecations elsewhere (e.g. Jer. xi. 19, 20).

We must admit, then, that there are wishes for the destruction of God's enemies, of the writer's enemies. But how is this to be accounted for? It is not enough to say that the dispensation of the law was imperfect, that principles were sanctioned and moral feelings indulged by it, which the purer spirit of the gospel condemned and removed. Men under the law might be imperfect, with evil passions; but we cannot conceive of God approving their imperfection, still less instigating to evil. Carnal revenge has always been odious in God's sight; and he has indisputably never read the Hebrew law aright who has not discovered that its provisions went to curb evil and unholy tempers.

We must look higher, therefore, we must understand the infinite demerit of sin with all the vast mischiefs it has inflicted. It is as the exponent of God's hatred of this foul rebellion against his sway, of this dark blot upon the universe, that the sacred writer speaks. It is evident that he does not speak in a spirit of private revenge. For, though David was quick of temper, he was eminently ready to forgive. His conduct towards his ruthless enemy Saul, when he twice had him in his power, is proof enough of this. Besides, the strongest expressions against the ungodly are closely coupled with the highest feelings of devotion to God (e.g. Psal. v. 7-10). It is absolutely inconceivable that he who in ordinary life was clement should be then especially actuated with bitter and malicious thoughts when he had approached nearest in communion with the Holiest. It is not, then, David the man, but David the inspired man who thus speaks—rather David the inspired man, by whom God speaks, thus most impressively making known to the world his hatred of sin. And, as he reveals other great truths by the words and deeds of his servants, so he acts with this. If it is a just thing for God to punish iniquity, it cannot be unjust at his command to denounce that punishment: and, as it is the highest excellence of the creature to be conformed in mind and will to the Creator, so to acquiesce in his dealings with the ungodly, yea to exult that his pure justice is triumphant over evil must be morally good. Besides, it is against men as sinners that these denunciations are uttered (Prov. i. 20-33). Let them repent them of their sins, and forsake their evil ways; and no more shall the curses touch them than the predicted doom uttered by Jonah touched the Ninevites when they repented. Still further, it is to bring man to repentance that these things are recorded, by revealing the vengeance of God upon the impenitent, and the everlasting shame they shall suffer in the sight of angels and of men—'an abhorring unto all flesh' (Isai. lxxvi. 24). The beacon-light which reveals the fatal rocks on which so many noble vessels have been shattered does not lure to destruction, it is the best safeguard against it. More cannot be here said; but the reader may be referred to able discussions on the subject by Profs. B. B. Edwards and Pond in Biblioth. Sacr., Feb. 1844, Jan. 1853.

Commentaries on the book of Psalms are very numerous: it must be sufficient to name here bishop Horne's devotional Commentary, often re-printed, Dr. Wilson's valuable Exposition, 2 vols. 1860, and Hengstenberg's Comm. über die Psalmen, Berlin, 1849-52, 2nd edit.

PSALTERY. A musical instrument often spoken of in scripture. The Hebrew word nebel is generally translated 'psaltery.' This instrument (first mentioned in 1 Sam. x. 5) was used on occasions of religious service (1 Chron. xv. 16, xxv. 1; 2 Chron. v. 12, xxix. 25), also at any kind of festivity (xx. 28; Isai. v. 12, xiv. 11, where in the two last-named places our version has 'viol'). It frequently occurs in conjunction with the harp (Psal. lxxi. 22, cviii. 2, cl. 3), and was, like it, a stringed instrument. But in regard to its figure and size there is little certainty. It has been said to be triangular, like a cone with the vertex downward; and this is in some measure corroborated by the name it bears. For nebel signifies also a bottle; and a bottle, either a skin or a flask, with the mouth lowest would resemble such a figure. Then Josephus (Antiq., lib. vii. 12, §3) says that it was played on with the hand and had twelve strings. We find, however (Psal. xxxiii. 2, cxliv. 9), that anciently it had but ten strings. Perhaps there was some variation at different periods; or nebel might be a generic name comprehending more than one stringed instrument. The psaltery in David's time was made of fir or cypress (2 Sam. vi. 5), but by Solomon of the more precious almus or almus (1 Kings x. 11). In the Egyptian monuments triangular stringed instruments are represented: these might be similar to the Hebrew nebel or psaltery. Another word, pēsantērīn, is rendered 'psaltery' in Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15. This is most probably the Greek term for the Hebrew nebel; or (as it has been also supposed) a kind of lyre played with both hands. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Musikalische Instrumente.'

PTOLEMA'IS (Acts xxi. 7). See ACCHO. It is frequently mentioned in the Macbean wars.

PTOLEMEE, PTOLEME'US. 1 (Rest of Esth. xi. 1). Ptolemy V., king of Egypt.—2. The father of Lysimachus, said to have translated the book of Esther into Greek.—3 (1 Macc. i. 18, x. 51-58, xi. 1-18; 2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 21). Ptolemy VI.—4 (1 Macc. iii. 38; 2 Macc. iv. 45, 46, vi. 8). A courtier of Antiochus Epiphanes.—5. An officer who married the daughter of Simon Maccabeus, and afterwards murdered Simon and his two sons (1 Macc. xvi. 11-21).—6 (2 Macc. viii. 8, x. 11, 12). A governor, first of Cyprus and then of Cœle-syria and Phenice, surnamed Macron.

As several of the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt, were intimately connected with Jewish history, it may be well to give a pedigree of the family: see opposite page.

It was probably Euergetes II. that is mentioned in the second prologue to Ecclesiasticus. Other information respecting this race of kings must be sought in secular histories.

PU'A (mouth) (Numb. xxvi. 23). See PHUVAH.

PU'AH (id.). 1 (1 Chron. vii. 1). See PHUVAH.—2. A descendant of Issachar (Judges x. 1).

PU'AH (mouth, or splendid, one crying out?). One of the midwives who refused to obey Pharaoh's cruel command (Exod. i. 15-21). These midwives must have been superintendents of a class. They were probably Egyptians; and 15 may be better rendered 'who did the office of midwife to the Hebrew women.'

PUBASTUM (Ezek. xxx. 17, marg.). See PI-BESETH.

PUBLICAN. A person who farmed the taxes and public revenues; i.e. who paid a stipulated sum to the government, what he collected being then his own. The office

Ptolemy I. Soter, son of Lagus, 323-284 B.C. 'king of the south' (Dan. xi. 5).

Arsinoe=Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, 284-247 B.C.=Arsinoe.
Under him the LXX. translation was commenced.

Ptolemy III. Euergetes I., 247-221 B.C.
He invaded Syria, and gained great advantages (Dan. xi. 7-9).

Berenice=Antiochus II., king of Syria
(Dan. xi. 6) : see ANTIOCHUS, 1.

Ptolemy IV. Philopator, 221-204 B.C., Arsinoe.
The sons of Seleucus, king of Syria, invaded Egypt. Ptolemy obtained a victory, but did not reap the full fruit of it (Dan. xi. 10-12).

Ptolemy V. Epiphanes 204-180 B.C.=Cleopatra, d. of Antiochus the Great :
Ptolemy was defeated by Antiochus, whom the Romans checked in his career of conquest: Ptolemy's wife, Cleopatra, supported her husband (Dan. xi. 13-11).
see ANTIOCHUS, 2.

Ptolemy VI. Philometor 180-145 B.C.=Cleopatra (a).
Warred with Antiochus Epiphanes (Dan. xi. 21-30) : see ANTIOCHUS, 3.

Ptolemy VII. Euer=Cleopatra (a).
getes II., 170, 145=Cleopatra (b).
116 B.C.

Ptolemy VIII. Soter
II., 116-80 B.C.

Cleopatra=Alexander Balas { kings
=Demetrius II. of Syria.

Ptolemy Eupator.

Cleopatra (b).

The dates are those of Winer.

was held by the Roman knights, who had inferior officers under them. And occasionally a company took the contract, appointing a manager with sub-collectors. Some of these subordinates are called chief publicans, as Zaccheus (Luke xix. 2), probably as receivers-general of districts. Others, like Matthew, styled simply a publican (Matt. x. 3; Luke v. 27), were officers at one particular port or place. The publicans were especially odious to the Jews. Some classes, as the Galileans, i.e. the followers of Judas of Galilee, deemed it unlawful to pay tribute to a foreign power; and by all it was felt to be a mark of subjection and degradation. The publicans, moreover, knowing the estimation in which they were held, were not careful about their modes of proceeding. They were often rapacious and extortioners. And hence the very name became one of reproach (Matt. v. 46, 47); and it was made a matter of complaint against our Lord that he associated with 'publicans and sinners' (ix. 11, xi. 19; Luke xix. 7). It is said that Jews who were publicans were laid under various disabilities. They were repelled from public worship and from judicial posts. A religious man, according to the rabbins, who became a publican was to be ejected from the religious society.

PUB'LIUS. A person in authority at Melita, when St. Paul was shipwrecked there (Acts xxviii. 7, 8). The designation, 'the chief man,' seems to have been an official title: it occurs in inscriptions in Malta. See Alford's note on Acts xxviii. 7.

PU'DENS. A Christian at Rome whose salutation St. Paul sent to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21). He is supposed to be the husband of Claudia mentioned in the same place; and she was, it is likely, of British birth. See the question investigated in Savile's Introd. of Christianity into Britain, chap. ii, pp. 82-91.

PU'HITES. A patronymic given to some of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. ii. 53) : it is not known on what account.

PUL (elephant, or more probably lord, king). An Assyrian monarch who invaded the kingdom of Israel and made Menahem, then upon the throne, tributary (2 Kings xv. 19, 20). Hence resulted the captivity of the trans-Jordan tribes (1 Chron. v. 26). Pul was the first Assyrian sovereign who is mentioned in scripture. He is with much probability identified with Phulukh or Phalukha (Vul-lush, or Iva-lush, Rawlinson calls him), who, according to the deciphered inscriptions, married Sammuramit or Semiramis, a foreign princess, invaded Syria, and received tribute from Samaria, Edom, and Philistia. He also took Damascus, and forced the king who was, it is likely, the son of Ben-hadad and the father of Rezin, to pay him an enormous sum. He marched into Armenia and afterwards to Babylon, received the homage of the Chaldeans, and sacrificed in Babylon, Borsippa, and Cutha, to the deities Bel, Nebo, and Nergal. On a statue of Nebo now in the flame, and then the grains are rubbed out. This is still a favourite article of food.

PUNISHMENT, PUNISHMENTS. There are a variety of penalties prescribed by the Mosaic law to be inflicted upon offenders. There are also others which, though not specially enacted, seem to have grown out of circumstances, or to have been adopted from foreign nations. There are some, moreover, alluded to which were not inflicted by any Hebrew law or custom, but which were used by foreigners with whom the Israelites had been brought into contact Pul. From the Nineveh marbles.

British Museum Phulukh's name is inscribed. He is said to have enlarged the central palace of Nimroud, in the upper chambers of which a part of his history has been found. Pul possibly commenced his reign 774 B.C.; but great uncertainty exists respecting him. Some imagine him the Greek Sardanapalus; and it would certainly seem that his reign was closed by a catastrophe, and that Tiglath-pileser his successor de-throned him. His wife Sammuramit survived him, and is believed to have gone to Babylon, being the wife or mother of Nabonassar. See Vance Smith, Proph. of Nineveh and the Assyrians, pp. 16-24, 66, 67.

PUL (meaning uncertain). A region but once mentioned (Isai. lxxvi. 19). Henderson following Bochart supposed it the island of Philæ, and the surrounding region on the Nile to the south of Elephantine (Isaiah, p. 47); but see Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Phul' l. It may be identical with Put or Phut.

PULPIT (Neh. viii. 4). An elevated stage or scaffold (comp. ix. 4).

PULSE. This word, occurring in Dan. i. 12, 16, denotes seed-herbs, greens, or vegetables, in contradistinction to meats and more delicate kinds of food. 'Pulse' is also introduced into our translation of 2 Sam. xvii. 28. Various kinds of grain are parched. The ears are plucked with the stalk, when not quite ripe, and held in bunches in a Punishments may be distributed into those of a secondary or inferior kind which did not touch the life, and those which were capital.

I. Of the former class may be enumerated:—

1. Whipping. This was specially ordered for certain offences; and, besides, magistrates seem to have had a discretionary power of inflicting it in other cases. The number of stripes was never to exceed forty (Deut. xxv. 1-3). Consequently, as a whip with three thongs was generally used, thirteen strokes were given; so that the actual punishment was 'forty stripes save one' (2 Cor. xi. 24).

2. Retaliation. It was a fitting penalty that he who had done or sought to do his neighbour wrong should suffer the same himself. This, therefore, was frequently ordered, with a particular minuteness of specification, 'breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth,' &c. (Exod. xxi. 23-25; Deut. xix. 18-21). It must be remembered that retaliation was to be only on judicial procedure: it was not to be taken as sanctioning private revenge. It was in this last respect that it was forbidden by our Lord (Matt. v. 38, 39).

3. On a similar principle restitution and compensation were to be made. Injury was to be redressed, and additional payment required. On the like ground it was that the trespass-offering comprised amends and an addition by way of fine (Lev. v. 14-16, vi. 1-7). Under this head may be included the penalty exacted from a thief or fraudulent person, sometimes double, sometimes four or five-fold, the compensation for careless damage, the fine for slander, &c. (Exod. xxi. 33-36, xxii. 1-5; Deut. xxii. 18, 19).

4. Banishment in the form of limiting a person to his own estate, or to some specified locality, or exclusion from the sovereign's presence (2 Sam. xiv. 24; 1 Kings ii. 26, 36, 37),

5. Plucking out hair (Neh. xiii. 25),

6. The stocks (Jer. xx. 2), and

7. Imprisonment (1 Kings xviii. 27; Jer. xxxvii. 15, xxxviii. 6) were kinds of punishment not introduced by the law, but introduced in later times. To these may be added

8. Excommunication, which had more of a religious than a civil aspect. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

Besides these there are other inflictions recorded, which do not exactly come under the notion of legal punishments, but were rather the pains to which the conquered in war were subjected: such were mutilation (Judges i. 6, 7), scourging with thorns (viii. 7, 16), condemnation to hard labour (2 Sam. xii. 31). Blinding and still worse cruelties were practised by the Philistines, Assyrians, and Babylonians (Judges xvi. 21; 2 Kings xxv. 7): see CAPTIVE.

Among the Egyptians imprisonment was usual (Gen. xxxix. 20-23, xl. 2-4). Secondary punishments inflicted by the Romans were whipping, imprisonment, the stocks, also the free custody, as it was called, when a person might dwell in a private house chained to a soldier (Acts xvi. 22-24, xxii. 24, xxviii. 16; 2 Cor. xi. 23, 25; 2 Tim. i. 16). Whipping when there was much more severe than that prescribed by the Jewish law. Rods were used in inflicting it. St. Paul suffered this at least thrice.

II. Of capital punishments.

1. Stoning may be first mentioned. It was the general mode of execution, ordered by the law in most cases of capital crime. There were to be at least two witnesses in order to the condemnation of any accused person; and these witnesses were on the infliction of the sentence to cast the first stones; afterwards the people generally were to join (Deut. xiii. 9, 10, xvii. 5-7). There are very many examples of this punishment, and also of a more tumultuous kind of stoning, when without judicial procedure the people seized stones at once to put to death those whom they deemed guilty of flagrant crime. This is said to have been called the rebels' beating and to have been attempted against our Lord (1 Kings xii. 18; John viii. 59, x. 31; Acts vii. 58, 59).

2. After a criminal had been stoned or otherwise executed, his body was sometimes hung, but not for a longer time than till sun-set (Deut. xxi. 22, 23; Josh. x. 26, 27). Occasionally, however, hanging was the mode of actual execution (Numb. xxv. 4; 2 Sam. iv. 12, the criminals being first mutilated, xxi. 9, 10). In the case last referred to some critics believe that crucifixion was the punishment inflicted; and certainly the bodies were exposed beyond the legal time.

3. There were cases in which burning succeeded stoning (Josh. vii. 25). Burning too, even in the patriarchal times, was the penalty for some kinds of incontinence (Gen. xxxviii. 24; Lev. xx. 14, xxi. 9).

4. Beheading is not mentioned in the law. There were indeed exceptional cases in which it was practised, or a sword or spear in some way used as the instrument of death (Exod. xxxii. 27; Numb. xxv. 7); and in later times we find frequent mention of such modes of execution (Judges viii. 20, 21, ix. 5; 1 Sam. xv. 33, xxii. 18; 2 Sam. i. 15, xx. 22; 1 Kings ii. 25, 34, 46, xviii. 40, xix. 1; 2 Kings vi. 31, 32, x. 6, 7; 2 Chron. xxi. 4; Jer. xxvi. 23; Matt. xiv. 8-11; Acts xii. 2).

Other kinds of capital punishment were inflicted in sudden passion, or, as before said, were practised by foreigners. Such were precipitation from a height, a building or a natural eminence. Instances are recorded in 2 Kings ix. 30-33; 2 Chron. xxv. 12. It was in this way that the people of Nazareth attempted the life of our Lord (Luke iv. 28-30). There were also beating or pounding in a mortar (Prov. xxvii. 22); cutting into pieces, or sawing asunder (Dan. ii. 5, iii. 29; Heb. xi. 37); casting to wild beasts, into their den, or to fight with them (Dan. vi. 7, 12, 16, 24; 1 Cor. xv. 32); drowning (Matt. xviii. 6; Mark ix. 42); strangling, too, is spoken of by the Jewish rabbins as not uncommon. And then there was the most fearful of all, crucifixion, inflicted only upon slaves and the most notorious malefactors. No punishment included more frightful accessories, lingering torture, exposure, disgrace, and open scandal. Well might the sacred writers take occasion hence to magnify the vast love of the Redeemer; for, 'while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us,' and 'for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame' (Rom. v. 8; Heb. xii. 2; Phil. ii. 8). The punishment of the cross, made in our Lord's case of two beams crossing at right angles, is elsewhere described: see CROSS.

Little time used to elapse between sentence and execution. The trial, condemnation, and crucifixion of Christ were compressed into a few hours, an indecency, of haste which would now among ourselves be deemed horrible in the case of the worst malefactor. It is true that there are examples of greater delay. Barabbas, it would seem, was lying in prison probably under sentence; and so perhaps were the two thieves crucified with Christ. So was Peter when seized by Herod, his intended execution being deferred on account of a feast (Acts xii. 3-6). The place of execution was without the camp or city (Lev. xxiv. 14; 1 Kings xxi. 10, 13; Acts vii. 58; Heb. xiii. 12); and there, too, were criminals buried. It was also customary to heap stones over the bodies of those so put to death (Josh. vii. 26, viii. 29; 2 Sam. xviii. 17).

It will not escape the student's notice that there was no recognized executioner. Sometimes indeed some high officer of state was charged with the task of putting criminals to death, as Potiphar in Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 36; comp. marg.), and Benaiah in Solomon's court (1 Kings ii. 25, 29, 30, 34, 46); sometimes soldiers were employed (1 Sam. i. 15, iv. 12; John xix. 23); but there were cases, as we have already seen, in which, while the witnesses were to be first, all the people took a part. And, in case of murder, the revenger of blood inflicted the penalty at his will (Numb. xxxv. 19, 27).

There is one kind of sentence which has not yet been noticed: it occurs frequently in the law, 'he shall be cut off from his people,' denounced against wilful sins, and various breaches of the moral or ritual law, and of covenant engagements (Gen. xvii. 14; Exod. xii. 15, 19, xxx. 33, 38; Lev. vii. 25, xvii. 4, 9, xx. 3, 6; Numb. xv. 30, 31, and elsewhere). It is not agreed whether capital punishment is always hereby meant, or whether, if it is, it is to be inflicted by human hands. Most probably, however, the phrase intends that the transgressor by his crime cuts himself off from the sacred covenant, and thus virtually ceases to belong to the holy people. If his guilt has been of a social kind, affecting the good order of the community, he is amenable to public law. Thus for the sabbath-breaker, who has not only set an evil example, but disturbed the general rest, the human sentence is additionally prescribed (Exod. xxxi. 14, 15); see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 391; otherwise the culprit was left to the judgment of God, who sometimes marvellously interfered, punishing with his own hand the breach of his own law (see Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 74, vol. ii. pp. 298, 299), unless the punishment were averted by humble penitence.

God reveals himself as the just One who must punish obstinate transgressors. And, if he does not make them examples of his justice in this life, it is clear that there must be a time of retribution hereafter. What the vengeance of a righteous almighty Judge may be in its intensity, none but they who suffer it can adequately estimate. On the awful subject of eternal punishment much cannot be said here; but a few of the leading points may be noted.

The scriptures describe it in forcible language. They speak—and it is to be observed that the words are frequently those of Christ himself—of 'everlasting fire,' of 'everlasting punishment,' of a worm that 'dieth not,' of a fire that 'is not quenched' (Matt. xviii. 8, xxv. 41, 46; Mark ix. 43-48; 2 Thess. i. 9; Rev. xiv. 10, 11, xx. 10). The statement, too, that 'it had been good for' the traitor 'if he had not been born' is difficult enough to reconcile with any notion of the final salvation of all the human race. A great deal of ingenuity has been exercised in the endeavour to explain the expressions just cited as meaning but a long time, some great indefinite period. But it is replied that the words are the same which describe the happiness of the saved and the misery of the lost. If the one be not endless, why should the other be? And we may go yet higher. If we hence doubt the eternity of punishment, we must beware that we do not also raise a doubt of the eternity of the divine Son of God.

If we are to take the scripture only as our guide, interpreting its declarations in their obvious sense, we can hardly avoid the conclusion that the punishment of the lost is everlasting—not annihilation, everlasting non-existence is a contradiction in terms—but punishment. And the question will extend farther than to men; for the wicked, we are told, are to share the fiery beds of the devil and his angels. The same arguments, too, against the eternal suffering of human beings will apply against the eternal suffering of fallen angels. These arguments are mainly taken from the supposed benevolence of the Deity incapacitating him from inflicting an endless penalty on his creatures. But men must take care not to confound benevolence with licence, and must not be more concerned for the happiness of sinners than for the righteousness of God. It is maintained that God cannot be pleased with the sufferings of any, and must therefore put an end to them, and, again, that, as he dislikes sin, he will surely not leave any portion of his dominions infected with it. But such arguments appear to go too far. They might be urged against the allowance of any suffering, against the present existence of sin (see Dr. Long on Objections against Endless Punishment in Biblioth. Sac., Jan. 1860, pp. 111-134); and it might be asked, Why does He, the infinitely kind, not spread joy at once into the heart of every sentient creature? Why does not He, the holiest, by the exertion of his infinite power, eradicate every trace of rebellion against his sway? The question might go higher: Why did he ever permit sin and suffering to break in upon the universe? The plain answer is, we cannot tell. We can reason upwards a few steps; but we must soon stop and confess that God's ways are higher than our ways, and his thoughts than our thoughts (Isai. lv. 9): 'he giveth not account of any of his matters' (Job xxxiii. 13). We are not in a position to judge: we do not see far enough: we cannot account for much of what we do see. And therefore we are bound on such a subject as this simply to receive what God has been pleased to reveal in his word. And, if anything we find there be astonishing to us, it is our wisdom to conclude that the Judge of all the earth will do right, and that every attribute of his glorious Being, his holiness, his wisdom, his truth, his mercy, will be exalted to the highest pitch in the sight of all the universe. His very enemies shall acknowledge the righteousness of the hand that subjects them, as well as the saved exult in the love which has redeemed them. On high matters like these we are to be humble.

It is also to be considered that punishment is the natural consequence of sin (see bp. Butler's Analogy, chap. ii.). And, so long as a soul is not purified, it must suffer: it cannot behold the favourable countenance of the holy God: it cannot be meet company for the saints made perfect. Before it can pass into heavenly mansions a vast change must have been wrought. And what should work that change? If the suffering of man were a means of purifying him, why should there have been the precious blood-shedding of the Lord Jesus Christ? Closely is this matter connected with the doctrine of the atonement; and he, that imagines that by penal suffering righteousness will be attained, that after this life is ended a hope is still held out for men's return to God, contradicts most certainly the scripture warning that after wilful sin 'there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins' (Heb. x. 26), and devises a fresh state of probation, where opportunity once lost may be regained. Surely, then, so long as God remains changeless in his detestation of evil, so long as the sinner remains unchanged in his state of sin, the sentence must hold of departure from the Lord's presence: the ungodly one's dwelling must be in that outer darkness, between which and the light of everlasting life a gulf is fixed that is impassable (Luke xvi. 26).

Let it not be said that they who so read the scripture delight in prophesying evil: gladly would they rather, as knowing the terrors of the Lord, persuade men while yet there is the fullest opportunity, the freest invitation, to flee from the wrath to come. Doubtless, it may be added, the joy of any one's salvation is enhanced by the thought of what it is from which he is delivered.

PUNITES. A family of Issachar, descendants of Pua or Phuvah (Numb. xxvi. 23).

PUNON (darkness). A place enumerated among the stations of the Israelites (Numb. xxxiii. 42, 43). It must have been to the east of the mountains of Edom, and was probably the district which the 'duke' mentioned in Gen. xxxv. 41; 1 Chron. i. 52 ruled. See PINON. There are said to have been copper mines here: and here possibly the brazen (copper) serpent was erected: comp. Numb. xxi. 9, 10.

PUR (alot) (Esth. iii. 7, ix. 24). See PURIM.

PURIFICATION, PURIFY. Purifications are repeatedly enjoined in the Mosaic law, for the purpose of cleansing persons and things from ceremonial impurities or defilements. Sometimes water, sometimes blood, or oil was employed for this purpose (Exod. xxx. 25-31; Lev. viii. 10, 11, 15; Numb. xix. 7-10; Heb. ix. 21, 22). And fire was occasionally the means of purification (Numb. xxxi. 22, 23; Isai. i. 25). The Pharisees added many traditions to the rites prescribed by the law (Mark vii. 3, 4). These ordinances had a religious aspect: but they were also especially useful as enforcing cleanliness, and consequently checking those contagious diseases which in hot climates are most likely to spread. They were also full of spiritual meaning, they signified that purifying of the heart which must characterize the servants of God. We find, therefore, perpetual reference to purity of principle and character in the New Testament (Acts xv. 9; Tit. ii. 14; Heb. x. 13, 14). See HOLY, HOLINESS.

PURIM (lots). A festival celebrated by the Jews on the 14th and 15th of the month Adar, in remembrance of their preservation by means of Mordecai and Esther from the destruction prepared for them by Haman (Esth. ix. 20-32). This festival was sometimes called 'Mardocheus' (Mordecai's) day' (2 Macc. xv. 36). It was observed by reading the book of Esther in the synagogue and with general festivity. During the reading as often as the name of Haman occurred the people stamped, and uttered curses: 'Let his name be blotted out.' This custom, however, at least among British Jews, is said to be dying out.

PURPLE (Exod. xxv. 4, xxvi. 1, 31, xxxv. 6, 23, 25, 35, xxxvi. 8, 35, 37, xxxix. 1-3; Numb. iv. 13; Judges viii. 26; 2 Chron. ii. 7, 14, iii. 14; Esth. i. 6, viii. 15; Prov. xxxi. 22; Sol. Song iii. 10, vii. 5; Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 7, 16; Mark xv. 17, 20; Luke xvi. 19; John xix. 2, 5; Acts xvi. 14; Heb. ix. 19, marg.; Rev. xvii. 4, xviii. 12, 16). See COLOURS.

PURSE. See GIRDLE.

PUT (afflicted) (1 Chron. i. 8; Jer. xlvi. 9, marg.; Nah. iii. 9). See PHUT.

PUTE'OLI. The principal port of southern Italy, in the most sheltered part of the bay of Naples. It was the great emporium for the Alexandrian wheat-ships. Seneca (Epist. lxxvii. 1, 2) gives an interesting account of the arrival of a fleet of these. All other vessels when they entered the bay were obliged to strike their topsails. These, therefore, could be distinguished in a crowd of ships as soon as they were in sight. Their proximity was announced by fast-sailing vessels sent forward with the news: all eyes were consequently expecting the welcome sight (see Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, pp. 151, 152). Puteoli is now Puzzuoli, and there are remains of the ancient city. Here St. Paul was permitted to tarry seven days on his way from Malta to Rome (Acts xxviii. 13, 14).

PUTIEL (afflicted of God). The father-in-law of Eleazar, Aaron's son (Exod. vi. 25).

PYGARG. A clean animal, whose flesh the Israelites were permitted to eat (Deut. xiv. 5). It is called in the margin 'bison,' but for this there is no authority. It has been generally supposed to be the Oryz addax, a species of antelope. This is about the size of a large ass, with a heavy head, thick neck and legs, and switch-tail. The horns are round, rather slender in proportion to their length, twisted outward, and describing two turns of a whole spiral. The addax lives in pairs in the deserts of Africa: it is figured on ancient Egyptian monuments, from which it appears to have been a favourite animal of chase. Duns, however, considers the animal in question the common antelope, Antelope cervicapra (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 176): comp. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 978, 979).

PYTHON. The damsel at Philippi who brought gain to her masters by soothsaying is said to have had 'a spirit of divination,' or 'of Python' (Acts xvi. 16, marg.). This was a name given to Apollo, who delivered oracles, because, it is generally said, he had killed a serpent so called. Hence an oracular or familiar spirit was termed Python. The Hebrews were forbidden to have intercourse with such as had familiar spirits (Lev. xix. 31: comp. 1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 7-9). They were supposed to speak from the belly, as ventriloquists. See DIVINATION.

Q

QUAIL. A well-known bird. The genus Coturnix is one of the subdivisions of the Tetraonidae. There are several species, of which may be mentioned the Coturnix dactylisonans, the European quail, which is, there can be little doubt, the quail of scripture. Other conjectures are not worth notice. It is a migratory bird, the ortyx of Aristotle, and is widely spread over Europe, Asia, and North Africa. It is distinguished from the partridge by being of a smaller size, by having a finer bill, a shorter tail, and wanting the red naked eye-brow, and spurs on the legs. Enormous flights of quails pass in the spring and autumn over the southern regions of Europe, making brief halt in various islands and coasts; where sometimes their arrival (frequently by night) is the signal for a general shooting-match. The quails that were supernaturally brought to the camp of the Hebrews had deviated, it is probable, from their ordinary course; else they would have been expected, and the supply of food from them relied upon. It was by the Lord's power that at the very time needed they were made to abound in the locality where the tribes had pitched their tents (Exod. xvi. 13; Numb. xi. 31, 32; Psal. cv. 40). The two recorded occasions on which quails were sent seem to have been in the springs of successive years; as the flight of the birds was from the sea, that is, from that quarter. They had come probably from southern Egypt, and were proceeding northwards. It may be that, fatigued by being long upon the wing, they flew near the surface of the ground, and were thus the more easily caught; and this may be the explanation of the words 'two cubits upon the face of the earth.'

QUARRIES (Judges iii. 19, 26). The marginal rendering here is graven images. Possibly the word signifying 'images' or 'hewn stones' is the proper name of a place, Pesilim, not far from Gilgal.

QUARTUS (fourth). A Christian of Corinth whose salutation St. Paul conveyed to the Romans (Rom. xvi. 23).

QUATERNION. A body of four (Acts xii. 4). Four soldiers were appointed to keep guard during each of the four watches of the night. There were therefore sixteen in all. Of each quaternion two were in the prison, Peter being chained to them (6); and the other two were sentinels before the doors, the first and second guard (10).

QUEEN. As the Hebrews practised polygamy, and the kings heaped together wives and concubines in their harems, there was no lady exactly in the position denoted by our term queen. It is true that we have two instances in the Old Testament of queens regnant, Athaliah, who usurped the throne of Judah (2 Kings xi.), and the foreign queen of Sheba (1 Kings x. 1-10); but, generally speaking, the queen was merely the chief wife who took precedence in her husband's harem, or who was one of his consorts [as distinguished from concubines: comp. xi. 3; 2 Chron. xi. 21]. The mother of the reigning sovereign, however, was in dignity and power superior to any of his wives. Thus Bath-sheba received special honour as the king's mother (1 Kings ii. 13, 19). And Asa found it necessary to depose a queen-mother because her influence was given to idolatry (xv. 13). It is perhaps for this reason that the name of the king's mother is usually given when a king of Judah acceded to the throne. And this consideration may serve to explain a difficulty. Maachah is said to be the mother of Abijam and of Asa (2, 10). The dignity of queen-mother which she held in Abijam's reign she retained in his son Asa's (till, as observed above, Asa deposed her), very probably because Asa's actual mother was dead. We find the same custom to the latest years of the monarchy. Thus Jehoiachin's mother is particularly specified (2 Kings xxiv. 12, 15). Jezebel was a woman of remarkable energy, and her husband conspicuous for his weakness: it is not surprising therefore that she stands out an exception to the general rule (1 Kings xix., xxi.). Yet she is nowhere called queen ('lady' the Hebrew word means, indicating authority) till after Ahab's death (2 Kings x. 13). The following list of kings' mothers through the successive reigns of the monarchs of Judah may not be unacceptable.

Kings.

Queen-mothers.

Solomon.	Bath-sheba.
Rehoboam.	Naamah.
Abijah. }	Maachah or Michal.
Asa. }
Jehoshaphat.	Azubah.
Jehoram.	not mentioned.
Ahaziah.	Athaliah.
Joash.	Zibiah.
Amaziah.	Jehoaddan.
Uzziah.	Jecoliah.
Jotham.	Jerusha.
Ahaz.	not mentioned.
Hezekiah.	Abi or Abijah.
Manasseh.	Hephi-bah.
Amon.	Meshullemeth.
Josiah.	Jedidah.
Jehoahaz.	Hamutal.
Jehoiakim.	Zebudah.
Jehoiachin.	Nehushta.
Zedekiah.	Hamutal.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Jer. vii. 18, xlii. 17, 18, 19, 25). The marginal rendering in the places referred to is 'frame or workmanship of heaven.' Some therefore have believed that the worship of the heavenly bodies generally or some special constellation was intended. But it is better to suppose that the moon, revered by the Phœnicians as Ashtoreth or Astarte, is meant: see Henderson's Jeremiah, pp. 51, 52. The cakes mentioned have been thought to be round and flat like the moon's disk: some Jewish authorities say that the image of the deity was stamped upon them. They were made of fine flour, mixed with honey, raisins, &c. See ASHTORETH.

QUICK, QUICKEN. 'Quick' means living (Numb. xvi. 30). To 'quicken' is to give life, natural or spiritual (Rom. viii. 11; Eph. ii. 1, 5), also to cheer or excite (Psal. lxxx. 18).

QUICKSANDS. Two Syrtes or sand-banks, on the northern coast of Africa, were well-known to the ancients. One of these, called the Syrtis major, lay between Cyrene and Leptis, now the gulf of Sidra, and is no doubt the 'quicksand' alluded to in Acts xxvii. 17. A vessel bound westward, after passing Crete, might easily be driven upon it by a strong north-easterly wind. The other, Syrtis minor, the gulf of Cabes, lay more to the west, near Carthage.

QUINTUS MEMMIUS (2 Macc. xii. 34).

QUIVER. The case for arrows (Gen. xxvii. 3, and elsewhere). See ARMS. The word is sometimes used figuratively (e.g. in Psal. cxxvii. 5; Isai. xlix. 2).

QUOTATIONS. Nothing is more common than to find one writer quoting or referring to another. We might naturally expect, therefore, that the sacred penmen would both cite and be cited. And this, accordingly, is the case. In various books of the bible we have quotations from other books, either as authorities, or for illustration, or for the confirmation of some truth. While in ordinary authors the scriptures are so largely cited that it has been said that, if themselves lost, they might be recovered from the pages of those who have thus re-produced them. The better a book is known, and the more important its contents, the more likely it is to be often and copiously quoted. And so the bible, as being incomparably the most important volume in the world, has been quoted far more frequently than any other. The quotations of scripture and in scripture are both highly instructive. It will be necessary to consider them apart.

I. The quotations of scripture. The bible has been quoted by friends and by enemies, who have thus done the cause of truth incalculable service. Their quotations are among the evidences of religion, and they contribute both to rectify and to interpret the text. It is self-evident that a book must exist before it can be cited. So that, if we see in an author who wrote a thousand years ago a reference to some book, or a quotation from it, we are sure that that book is a thousand years old at least. Now here is a sufficient proof of the great antiquity of the bible. Various books of it are cited, and various events are referred to as delivered in those books, by the earliest Christian authors, by pagan opposers of the gospel while Christianity was struggling into existence, by Jewish writers, as Philo and Josephus in the time of Christ and his apostles. Thus we are sure when we find David, Isaiah, St. Paul, St. John so appealed to that their books were then in the hands of men, and were not the composition of more modern times. Of course testimony of this kind goes higher for the books of the Old Testament than for those of the New, because the Old Testament was of earlier date than the New. But the conclusion is irresistible that the Old Testament was extant in our Lord's time, that it was cited as at that time ancient, and that very soon after the New Testament came into the hands of men also. But this is not all. Quotations show not merely that there were books in early times bearing the same names with those we now have, but that their contents were the same. Words and sentences are quoted as being in those books, and they are the very same which we find in the books now. We have thus proof that generally they have not been tampered with, that they are the identical works, honestly preserved and handed down to us. In the respects just mentioned the later books of scripture bear evidence to the earlier. We shall afterwards look at the quotations we find in scripture under another aspect; but it is quite fair to say that Paul, for instance, when he cites Isaiah, is a competent witness that the book of Isaiah was extant in his time, and that his Isaiah was the same with our Isaiah, because the quotations he makes from it are found in the copies which we possess.

Besides their value as witnesses of the antiquity and safe preservation of scripture, quotations are of service for the rectification of the text. We do not pretend that the bible has come down to us with no mistakes of copyists or printers. Every means is to be used to obtain as nearly as possible the exact words as the authors originally wrote them. And, after making allowance for the alleged habits of citing by memory, of condensing, of accommodating a passage, we may, when on other grounds perplexed, not unfrequently reach hence a fair presumption as to the state of the text at the time the quotation was made. Thus the fact that no early writer quotes the disputed clause (1 John v. 7, 8), even when if it then existed quotation of it would have been most natural, is rightly held a strong additional proof that the clause is not genuine, but was interpolated at some later time. For interpretation, too, quotations are of use. For, though we may not base our belief upon the authority of men, yet it is a valuable corroboration of a doctrine deduced from any passage of scripture to find that the same deduction was made, the same doctrine received, by those who were chronologically far nearer the scripture sources than we are. Thus, whereas Faustus Socinus affirms that 'all things' (John i. 3) mean only the moral world, the Christian church, Irenæus (Adv. Hæc., lib. iii. cap. 8, §§ 2, 3) shows that the interpretation in his time was that 'all things' intended the universe, the worlds, material and immaterial, adding thus very satisfactorily the stamp of antiquity to orthodox truth.

II. The quotations in scripture must also be considered. And it is of chief importance to examine such as are made from the Old Testament by the writers of the New. The number of those that are direct is very large; and there are, besides, many allusions, or cases in which the phraseology of the earlier sacred penmen is adopted by the apostles and evangelists, without any formal citation. A difficulty has been found in regard to them, both as to the words which are sometimes different from those of the original passage, and also as to the way in which they are applied. And, as these points bear particularly upon the question of inspiration, they are of no slight moment. We must, then, consider both the external and internal forms of scripture quotation, how they are cited, and how applied.

1. Tables have been constructed which exhibit fully the citations of the New Testament writers with the corresponding passages of the Old Testament. Such tables are of necessity voluminous; and the reader must be referred for them to works in which they are printed at large (see Horne's Introduct., vol. ii. edit. Ayre, pp. 114-178). It will be evident on inspection that most of the passages are an exact rendering of the original: it will be seen, however, that there are some in which the phraseology, the patent sense indeed, is more or less altered. It will be found, also, that the words of the Septuagint translation are often so exactly or nearly repeated as to make it manifest that it was from that translation that the writer quoted. But sometimes the Septuagint is left and the original Hebrew followed, and sometimes a passage is given not precisely accordant with either the original or the current version.

Hypotheses have been framed to account for all this; one of the most objectionable of which is that the apostles and evangelists quoted from memory, and that unfortunately their memory not infrequently failed. Such an excuse in the case imagined is opposed to common sense: it would hardly be admitted in a good textuary of modern times—much less with men speaking and writing in the face of keen opponents who would have been only too glad to convict them of garbling the ancient scriptures, men, moreover, who had the special promise that in their doctrine the Holy Spirit would bring all needful things to their remembrance (John xiv. 26). But indeed it is contradicted by plain fact. For two different writers, who could hardly be supposed to have had the same lapse of memory at the same place, are found to deviate in the same way. Thus Matthew (xi. 10) and Luke (vii. 27) agree verbatim in citing Mal. iii. 1; both differing from the Septuagint which exactly represents the Hebrew; and there is a similar agreement of Paul in Rom. ix. 33 with Peter in 1 Pet. ii. 6, 8. There must, therefore, have been some higher influence which guided the apostles.

It is not indeed possible to assign a general reason for the variations, or to classify with accuracy the different quotations according to their presumed relation to the Hebrew or the Greek text: each case of difficulty must be looked at independently. But we may say that it was very natural that the apostles should use the Septuagint, a translation well-known to the Greek-speaking communities they addressed, nay, very possibly at the time the common bible of Palestine. It was not, however, likely that they would bind themselves to a translation not always accurate, unless the reason of the case required it; as in Acts viii. 32, 33, where the eunuch read the passage from the Greek version, and accordingly the evangelist accurately copied it. The sacred writers properly used a freedom of expression. They availed themselves of the Septuagint sometimes, where verbally it differed from the Hebrew, provided by any such difference it more fully brought out the meaning of the original: they, again, translated for themselves where the received translation failed to express the true sense: they sometimes also departed from both the Hebrew and the Septuagint, when they wished more thoroughly to develop the idea which lay in the original utterance. It was not misapprehension, it was not caprice which actuated them. For explanation, for bringing into clearer light that which lay at first in shadow, for definitely pointing that which was general, or for enlarging that which was restricted, the New Testament writers, themselves inspired, have sometimes modified the diction, but they have preserved the spirit of the ancient oracle. There is an eminent example in the way in which St. Paul (Eph. iv. 8) cites Psal. lxxviii. 18. The prophetic word describes the triumph of him who went up on high, how he was adorned with gifts: the apostle exhibits the better aspect of the same truth: it was not for his own advantage: these gifts with lavish hand he has bestowed on those that need them. The deeper meaning is thus emphatically unfolded. It was so in the earlier revelation. Compare Gen. xxiv. 2-8 with 37-41; Exod. xx. 8 with Deut. v. 12; Lev. x. 3 with Exod. xix. 22, xxix. 43, 44; and see how there can be perfect substantial agreement accompanied with a variation of expression.

2. We must consider, further, the application of quotations. Here, too, in a vast majority of cases there is no difficulty: the ancient prediction, as of Messiah's birth at Beth-lehem, and the event said to fulfil it, fit exactly in together. But, occasionally, it cannot be denied, the words of the elder scripture are applied in a way which seems foreign to their original purport. We must of course distinguish cases, in which language is merely borrowed, from those in which a prophecy is said to be accomplished, or on which an argument is built. Thus Old Testament phraseology is largely used in the book of Revelation, though there is scarcely a formal citation in it. This is consonant with our own practice. We continually adopt the words of others without meaning to imply that their words had any defined or intended relation to our thoughts. We must see if the same principle holds in formal quotations. Does our Lord, do the sacred writers, mean to accommodate the Old Testament declarations? do they use them apart from their original purpose, merely because there is a chance similitude of circumstances? The answer must be, unhesitatingly, no.

The basis from which we must argue is the real connection between the Old Testament and the New, between that dispensation which, besides its present use to the worshippers under it, was to delineate in shadow the features of that better covenant which was one day to be admired in its full proportions and life-giving power. If we admit at all the correspondence of type with anti-type, if we acknowledge prophecy and its fulfilment, if we allow that God was acting on a definite plan, we cannot hesitate also to allow that there must be a comprehensive significance in the ancient word, a deeper sense to be drawn out at the fitting time. This principle is not to be accused of straining scripture, or of imputing meanings which a man's fancy may suggest. It is not that the obvious signification of the terms may be disregarded, or a discordant sense extracted: it is the same sense they ever bore, but only more profoundly apprehended. For this our Lord opened the understanding of his disciples (Luke xxiv. 45): he showed them what ancient sages had not fully discerned (1 Pet. i. 10-12). But in this respect there was not, properly speaking, a new revelation: it was a diviner light upon that which had been given before. The truth was there; but the eye must be purged from earthly film to perceive it. It is, then, because Christ by his enlightening Spirit qualified his disciples to discern 'the mystery which had been hid from ages and from generations,' that they were made adequate expounders of God's will. Had they known but the letter, had they cited the scriptures as the carnal Jews did, they would have been no fitting ministers of the new dispensation, they would have incurred the censure which their Master pronounced upon those whose earthly minds interpreted scripture so as to conclude from it that carnal ties and sensual gratifications must be fastened for ever upon risen and glorified saints (Matt. xxii. 23-32).

Critics have professed to discover a difference between the modes in which our Lord and his disciples cited and applied the scripture, differences too among the disciples, distinguishing, for example, Matthew from Paul, and Paul from Peter. It is very likely—each acted according to the talent given him. There was none like the Master, whose mind had devised and whose eye comprehended the whole. Inspiration superseded not a man's natural faculties; and one might still have a higher perceptive faculty than another. But every vessel, though of different capacities, was full. It is in the mode, in the extent, not in the truthfulness of the application of ancient scripture that apostles and evangelists vary. The gifts may be of different kinds; 'but all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will' (1 Cor. xii. 11); whether it be Paul or Peter, 'according to the wisdom given unto him' (2 Pet. iii. 15), so he writes.

Lists have been made of the formulæ adopted by different writers of the New Testament in introducing citations. It is impossible to give them here; but the reader will find a very good classification in Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, chap. xi. pp. 451, 452. Many of these formulæ were in common use at the time in which the sacred writers lived: they were employed by the rabbins to introduce their fanciful interpretations. But no exception need be taken to them on that account. Of course the current words and phrases of the day would be adopted by inspired as well as by uninspired writers if they wished to be understood. The only point of importance is to ascertain whether, by the use of a particular phrase and by the course of the argument, the writer intended a real fulfilment of some earlier utterance, or merely to use the words for illustration. Now there is one remarkable formula, found specially in St. Matthew, which must not be unnoticed—'that it might be fulfilled.' The question is, Does this denote final cause or purpose? or may it not in some cases mean only effect or event? The former has been called the telic, the latter the ecbatic usage. This has been keenly discussed. And it is the decision of the most competent theological scholars that the phrase has the former meaning; so that the sense of the formula (see Matt. ii. 15, viii. 17, xii. 17, xiii. 35, xxi. 4, xxvi. 56, xxvii. 35) is that there has been a fulfilment in order to display that truth of God which had been announced in the prophecy.

Taking the New Testament as the key to the Old we can have no difficulty in accepting this conclusion. There is a continuous organic unity in the system of revealed truth, exhibited by direct prophecy, by typical transactions, and by typical and representative predictions. The earlier portion, as a constituent part, and but a part of the same whole, is both the appointed and the fit representative of the later portion and of the whole. The future is thus clothed in forms borrowed from the present and the past; as when the song that celebrates the Lamb's final victory over the church's last foe is connected with and takes its tone from that triumphal strain in which Moses led the joy of the Israelites freed from the Egyptian oppressors (Rev. xv. 2-4). See PROPHECY, TYPE.

It will be well to apply the principles laid down to two or three particular cases. The words of Hos. xi. 1, cited in Matt. ii. 15, are, it is admitted, simply an historical statement. But the application of them by the evangelist is justified by the fact that, though the words were not, properly speaking, prophetic, yet the event they recorded was typical. There was a defined relationship between the literal Israel and the Messiah. It was in this way that great truths had, as it were, at once a body given them; and the marvellous wisdom of God was illustrated in the re-production in a more exalted form of that which he had previously carried through its inferior development. As Christ was the anti-typical or true Israel, so what was done in the type must be done again in the Anti-type. The removal of the infant Saviour for a time to an asylum in Egypt, and his recall thence when the season of danger was over, was substantially doing again what had been done in the infancy of the national Israel, and thereby helping a weak faith to recognize in this remarkable Babe the new Israel, the Child of hope for the world.

There is one case in which a citation of our Lord has been misunderstood: it is when he alleges Exod. iii. 6 in proof of the resurrection (Matt. xxii. 31, 32). Christ's argument goes to the fundamental relationship that must subsist between the Deity and those whom he deigns to admit into his family. He, the Holy, the Eternal God, cannot ally himself with pollution and death. As the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, he was the God, not of those of that had passed away, nor yet of the sentient spirits only, but of the entire men. Their mouldering bodies, therefore, he must reanimate: he will be to them all and do for them all that a God who is their God can be and do. Body and soul apart, there would be imperfection: therefore, made again essentially perfect, body and soul together, they shall live to him. The argument is a conclusive one; and a very blessed truth is illustrated and enforced by it.

Then, again, St. Paul (Gal. iii. 16) lays great stress on the singular number of a word, 'not. . . to seeds. . . but. . . to thy seed' (see Gen. xxii. 18). From Abraham divers nations sprang: he had many sons; but one was the child of promise. In Isaac and his descendants the blessing rested. The promise had a definite posterity in view: it was not to seeds, not to Abraham's offspring at large, to the various lines of the many who called him father; but to that which combined the spiritual with the carnal bond of relationship to Abraham, the seed of which Christ was to be the representative. St. Paul does not mean Christ individually, but Christ collectively—Christ, it is true, personally first and chiefly, but also his body the church as gathered up in him.

One more remark alone, already in some measure anticipated, can be appended here.

The New Testament writers apply to Christ some of the psalms which seem simply without ulterior reference to detail the circumstances of the psalmist. But, as there is a relation (before adverted to) between Christ and Israel, so is there a special relation between Christ and the house of David. It is not a mere resemblance but a defined relation; and the divine Spirit, guiding the utterance of David as to the things which befell him, made that utterance significant for the history of Messiah who was to be born of David's seed. The New Testament writers open out the relation and the significance of it. With this principle in view no difficulty need be felt in respect to the citations from such psalms as xxii., xl., xli., lxi., cix. So the pregnant variation of the Septuagint in Psal. ii. 9 is accepted in Rev. ii. 27; and, whereas in the original text God's judgment alone was expressed, in Messiah's pastoral rule that judgment is shown to be tempered with mercy. For the explanation of Matt. ii. 17, 18 see RAMAH, 1.

There are some other quotations in scripture which may be briefly noticed. St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8) gives the names of Jannes and Jambres as withstanding Moses; and St. Jude (Jude 9, 14) mentions the contention of Michael with the devil, and cites a prophecy of Enoch. It has been imagined that the two apostles quoted apocryphal books. They may, however, have borrowed from oral tradition. But, if they did quote apocryphal books, such quotation no more authorizes those books than the quoting of classical authors authorizes them. Some of the books which we include under the term 'Apocrypha' are possibly alluded to in the New Testament. And there are at least four classical citations in the speeches and letters of St. Paul; three are noted before: see POETRY, p. 711: there is also one of Aristotle, Polit. lib. iii. cap. viii. in Gal. v. 23.

R

RA'AMAH (a trembling). One of the sons of Cush of the posterity of Ham (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9). As Raamah is said to be the father of Sheba and Dedan (see DEDAN), we may well suppose that his descendants settled in Arabia; and accordingly the town Regma on the Arabian shore of the Persian gulf is believed to be the seat of his posterity. A Cushite city, probably this, is mentioned (Ezek. xxvii. 22) as trading with Tyre in spices, precious stones, and gold.

RAAMI'AH (whom Jehovah makes to tremble). One who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 7), probably the same with Reclalah (Ezra ii. 2).

RAAM'SES (son of the sun). The name of a province and city in Egypt, called also Rameses. When it first occurs (Gen. xlvii. 11) it is manifestly the province, identical (4, 6) with Goshen. The city was one of the treasure or store-cities built by the Israelites in their servitude, and perhaps had its name from one of the kings of Egypt so-called (Exod. i. 11), a name afterwards extended to the district round, which naturally the historian designates by the appellation it bore in his day; yet it might even in the life-time of Jacob be so denominated. It was from Raameses or Rameses the province, though they were probably massed about the chief town, that the children of Israel commenced their march (xii. 37; Numb. xxxiii. 3, 5).

There have been different opinions as to the position of Raameses. The Jerusalem Targum identifies Pithom and Raameses with Tanis and Pelusium; but these were beyond the limits of Goshen. Jablonsky fixes on Heliopolis; but the Septuagint translators, by their addition to Exod. i. 11, distinctly show that Heliopolis and Raameses could not be the same. Heroopolis is another conjecture. And there is a village still bearing the name Ramsis between Cairo and Alexandria; but this lies to the west of the Nile. The city must certainly have been in Lower Egypt, to the east of the Nile, which the Israelites had not to cross, and was perhaps in the south of Goshen, the part most exposed to Arab inroads, where therefore fortified cities and magazines would be most required. It may have been in Wady et-Tumeylat, which is formed by the Nile and a parallel chain of mountains near where the canal began. Lepsius thinks it is to be sought in the ruins of Abu Kashed, north-east of Heliopolis. A group of three figures cut out of a granite block has been found there representing Ramses II. (Ramses Miamus, who commenced the canal) between the gods Ra and Tum (Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Eccl., p. 12).

RAB'BAH, RAB'BATH (a great city, metropolis).—1. The metropolis of Ammon (Deut. iii. 11; Josh. xiii. 25). It was besieged and taken by David for the ill-treatment of his ambassadors by the Ammonites; Joab having previously after a long siege stormed one of the divisions of it, probably the lower town, in which was the spring whence a stream of water yet existing flowed (2 Sam. xi. 1, xii. 26-29, xvii. 27; 1 Chron. xx. 1). Afterwards, however, Ammon regained its independence (Jer. xlix. 2, 3; Ezek. xxi. 20, xxv. 5; Amos i. 14); and Rabbah was a strong place. In later times it received the name Philadelphia from Ptolemy Philadelphus, and by this name it is known in Greek and Roman writers and in Josephus. This was in Christian times the see of a bishop. But the original appellation lingered among the inhabitants, preserved as Amman to the present day; and there are now extensive ruins in an elevated valley on the banks of the stream Moiet Amman, after a short course flowing into the Jabbok, or Zurka, which divided the Hebrew territory from that of the Ammonites. Amman is about 22 miles from the Jordan.—2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 60).

RAB'BI (master). A title of honour given to Jewish teachers: it was repeatedly applied to our Lord by his disciples and by the people (Matt. xxiii. 7, 8; John i. 38, 49, iii. 2, 26, vi. 25).

RAB'BITH (multitude). A city of Issachar (Josh. xix. 20).

RABBO'NI (my master) (John xx. 16). The word is found also in Mark x. 51 in the original: it is said to express greater respect than Rabbi.

RAB'MAG (prince magus, i.e. president of the magi). A title given to a great Chaldean officer (Jer. xxxix. 3, 13).

RAB'SACES (Ecclus. xlvi. 18). Rabshakeh.

RAB'SARIS (chief eunuch). The official title of an Assyrian or Babylonian officer (2 Kings xviii. 17; Jer. xxxix. 3, 13). Two or three persons would seem to have borne it in the places referred to.

RAB'SHAKH (chief cup-bearer). One of the principal court-officers of Sennacherib, holding a high command in his army. Some have believed him an apostate Jew, but without sufficient grounds. He was despatched with Tartan and Rab-saris and a strong body of troops from Lachish to Jerusalem to persuade or compel the submission of the city; and his bold blasphemous speech to the Jewish people, in spite of the remonstrances of Hezekiah's officers, is recorded at length (2 Kings xviii. 17-37, xix. 4, 8; Isai. xxxvi. 2-22, xxxvii. 4, 8). The word Rab-shakeh is probably the official title, not the personal name, of this functionary.

RA'CA (empty, worthless). A term of contempt, the application of which to a brother was censured by our Lord (Matt. v. 22). See COUNCIL.

RACE (Eccl. ix. 11; 1 Cor. ix. 24-27; Heb. xii. 1). See GAMES.

RA'CHAB (Matt. i. 5). A Greek form of Rahab. Another form (Greek) occurs in Heb. xi. 31.

RA'CHAL (traffic). A place in Judah, to the inhabitants of which David sent a present (1 Sam. xxx. 29).

RA'CHEL (an ewe). The younger of Laban's two daughters, the beautiful and dearest wife of Jacob, for love of whom he served her father seven years, and they seemed unto him but a few days. A cruel deception was however practised: for Rachel Leah was substituted; and, though she was soon after given Jacob to wife in addition to her sister, seven more years of servitude were imposed upon him (Gen. xxix.). But Rachel had no children, while Leah had borne several sons; and natural impatience breaks out: 'Give me children; or else I die.' Rachel's temper was passionate and hasty, and she was inclined to rest more on the powers real or supposed of nature (see MANDRAKE) than on the love of God. Yet we may see a mother's joy and a believer's trust, when God visited her and gave her Joseph (xxx. 1-25). But we cannot excuse her carrying away her father's images, through some undefined reverence for them (see TERAPHIM), or the deceit she practised to conceal the theft (xxxi. 4, 14-35). The rest of her story is soon told. She was Jacob's cherished treasure (xxxiii. 1-7): another child, her dearest wish, was to be born; but alas! the birth of the child was the mother's death, and in the bitterness of her spirit she named him, as life was ebbing, Benoni, 'the son of my sorrow,' though his father called him Benjamin, 'son of my right hand.' Near Beth-lehem was she buried; and for long her monument remained (xxxv. 16-25, xlv. 19-22, 25, xlviii. 7; Ruth iv. 11; 1 Sam. x. 2). That now shown is but a modern building. Rachel is further mentioned in Jer. xxxi. 15; Matt. ii. 18, as weeping for her children: see for explanation RAMAH, 1.

RAD'DAI (treading down). The fifth son of Jesse (1 Chron. ii. 14).

RA'GAU (Luke iii. 35). Reu.

RA'GAU (Judith i. 5, 15). Some place in Media is intended; the word is perhaps identical with RA'GES (Tob. i. 14, and elsewhere). An important city in the north-east of Media. Its ruins about five or six miles from Teheran are still called Rhey.

RAG'UEL (friend of God). A Midianite, father of Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses (Numb. x. 29). He is called Reuel (the original word being the same) in our version of Exod. ii. 18. See JETHRO.

RAG'UEL (Tob. iii. 7, 17, and elsewhere). The father of Sara whom Tobias is said to have married.

RA'HAB (spacious). A woman of Jericho who received the Israelitish spies into her house, and, when they were sought for by the king concealed them and contrived their escape. She believed that Israel was divinely commissioned to extirpate the Canaanites, and in this faith she acted. She was not forgetful herein of her kindred, for she stipulated that herself and also her family should be spared when Jericho was taken. And, accordingly, she was protected and was still living in Israel when some of the original narrative of the book of Joshua was written (Josh. ii., vi. 17, 23, 25; Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25). She no doubt became a proselyte, and was married to Salmon, prince of Judah (Matt. i. 5). See on this marriage Mill, Myth. Interp. of Gospels, part ii. chap. ii. 1, pp. 161-169. It has been questioned whether Rahab was actually a harlot, or not rather an inn-keeper. But it cannot be assumed that inns existed at that early date. Besides, the spies desiring secrecy were much more likely to be unnoticed if they visited a harlot than if they RA'HAM (the womb). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 44).

RA'HEL (an ewe). One of the forms in which Rachel's name is given in our version (Jer. xxxi. 15). See RACHEL.

RATMENT. See DRESS.

RAIN. It was one of the special promises made to Israel that the Lord would give them rain 'in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain' (Deut. xi. 14; Joel ii. 23). These two seasons of rain, therefore, they specially looked for, in order to the fertility of their land (James v. 7). Sometimes in punishment for their rebellion rain was withheld. This was threatened in Deut. xi. 17; Amos iv. 7; and examples of the judgment are recorded in scripture (2 Sam. xxi. 1; 1 Kings xvii. 1). And it may be that for the sin of his people even to the present day God does not give his land the rains in their season. For the climate of Palestine is now very variable. The former or autumnal rains are said to commence in October or November, and the latter or spring rains in February or March. But there is generally small interval between them. In the rest of the year little falls, just as of old in the harvest rain was most unusual (1 Sam. xii. 17; Prov. xxvi. 1). The following table is given in Bonar's Land of Promise, p. 553. It is extracted from Dr. Macgowan's Register of the fall of rain in inches at Jerusalem, 1846-1856:—

	1846-7	1847-8	1848-9	1849-50	1850-1	1851-2	1852-3	1853-4	1854-5	1855-6
Early rains—
October . . .	4'0	0'0	0'0		0'0	0'0	0'0	0'0	3'8	0'0
November . . .	6'4	0'0	0'2		6'4	0'0	1'8	6'0	0'0	1'0
December . . .	0'0	19'0	16'0		33'8	15'2	9'4	12'4	6'4	3'2
January . . .	9'8	24'6	19'4		14'6	13'6	4'2	13'2	32'6	17'6
Total . . .	20'2	43'6	35'6		54'8	28'8	15'4	31'6	42'8	21'8
Latter rains—
February . . .	32'8	5'8	13'2		24'0	25'0	4'0	20'0	13'0	10'2
March . . .	6'0	0'0	11'8		4'0	8'8	21'4	24'2	8'8	24'8
April . . .	0'0	0'2	0'0		2'2	0'0	1'2	10'8	2'4	0'6
May . . .	0'0	1'4	0'0		0'0	2'4	2'0	0'0	0'0	0'6
Total . . .	38'8	7'4	25'0		30'2	36'2	28'6	55'0	24'2	35'2
Total for the year . . .	59'0	51'0	60'6		85'0	65'0	44'0	86'6	67'0	57'0

Not registered.

went to a place of public resort. Had there been an inn in Jericho, they would rather have avoided it. Further, the house being called Rahab's, though her parents were living, is corroborative proof. We may therefore conclude that the common acceptation is the true one. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Rahab.'

RA'HAB (violence, pride, a sea-monster). A symbolical name for Egypt (Psal. lxxxvii. 4, lxxxix. 10; Isai. li. 9). There is probably an allusion to this name in xxx. 7; which Gesenius translates 'Egypt helpeth in vain; therefore I call her: violence i.e. the violent (Rahab in the original), they sit still,' i.e. boasting and blustering they are yet cowards; probably a proverbial expression.

Dr. Chaplin, however, in a statement lately printed, dividing the rainy season into the early, the winter, and the latter rains, makes the average fall, 1860-1 to 1864-5, less than in the above table, viz. 19'805 inches.

The rains often descend with great violence, and sweep away houses and villages built of mud, and bricks or tiles baked in the sun (Ezek. xiii. 10, 11; Matt. vii. 27).

Rain is sometimes used figuratively (Isai. xxx. 23; Ezek. xxxviii. 22; Hos. x. 12).

RAINBOW. A circular arch of variously-coloured light seen in the heavens when the sun or moon is shining, while at the same time a shower of rain is falling on the opposite side of the spectator. A second bow is often, when the rain is abundant, seen on the exterior of the first and concentric with it. Both consist of concentric bands of the different prismatic colours, arranged as in the solar spectrum; but their order in the first bow is inverted in the second. Thus the lower edge of the interior is violet, and the upper edge red; while the lower edge of the exterior bow is red and the upper violet. The rainbow is caused by the reflection of the sun's rays from the interior concave of the globules of falling water; and the many-hued concentric bands arise from the different degrees of refrangibility of the differently-coloured rays composing a pencil of common light, passing through the water, and back to the spectator's eye. The same natural causes were in action before the flood; so that the rainbow was no new phenomenon. But God saw fit to make it the sign of his covenant with Noah that he would no more destroy mankind by a flood of waters (Gen. ix. 12-17), impressing a new significance on the well-known sight. The rainbow is elsewhere alluded to (Isai. liv. 9, 10; Ezek. i. 28; Rev. iv. 3, x. 1).

RAISINS (1 Sam. xxv. 18, xxx. 12; 2 Sam. xvi. 1; 1 Chron. xii. 40). These appear to have been dried grapes, in bunches, just what we understand by the term.

RA'KEM (variegation, flower-gardening). One of the descendants of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 16).

RAK'KATH (shore). A city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). The rabbins say it stood where Tiberias was afterwards built.

RAK'KON (thinness). A city of Dan (Josh. xix. 46).

RAM (high).—1. A son of Hezron and descendant of Judah (Ruth iv. 19; 1 Chron. ii. 9, 10), called also Aram (Matt. i. 3, 4; Luke iii. 33).—2. Another descendant of Judah, the son of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 25, 27).—3. A person of whose kindred Elihu is said to be (Job xxxii. 2). He has been thought to be the same with Aram (Gen. xxii. 21).

RAM. See SHEEP.

RAM (Ezek. iv. 2, xxi. 22). Battering-rams had their name from their iron head, shaped like a ram's, or because they struck a wall with a motion like the butting of a ram. See ENGINE.

RA'MA (Matt. ii. 18). The Greek form of RA'MAH (a high place). The name of several places which it is not easy to distinguish or identify.—1. A town in the territory of Benjamin, near Gibeah and Geba (Josh. xviii. 25; Judges iv. 5, xix. 13; 1 Sam. xxii. 6, where perhaps the word is not a proper name: comp. marg.; Hos. v. 8). As after the division of the kingdom there was a continual flow of the more piously-disposed Israelites into Judah, Baasha endeavoured to prevent this by fortifying Ramah: Asa in consequence stirred up the Syrian Ben-hadad to invade Israel, and took advantage of his compliance to dismantle Ramah (1 Kings xv. 17-22; 2 Chron. xvi. 1-6). Ramah is afterwards mentioned as in the line of Sennacherib's advance (Isai. x. 29); and it was most probably here that the captives were assembled after the taking of Jerusalem for their melancholy march into exile, in which the prophet inroduces Rachel the ancestral mother of the tribe as bitterly bewailing her children (Jer. xxxi. 15, xl. 1). There was a prospect more dark and grief yet more profound when the wall of the bereaved mothers resounded through the district of Beth-lehem, Herod, a new Nebuchadnezzar, having sought to extinguish in blood the Hope of Israel; and the evangelist sees in the earlier desolation a type of the later (Matt. ii. 16-18). But all was not lost in the first catastrophe: the exiles were cheered by a promise of return. And in the last the main Object of Herod's fury was preserved; hidden for a while in a distant land he returned to re-establish the throne of David on a surer basis for ever. Many of the inhabitants did return from Babylon; and Ramah was re-peopled (Ezra ii. 26; Neh. vii. 30, xi. 33); though it is fair to say that some imagine that another Ramah (perhaps the modern Ramleh) is meant in the last-named place. Ramah is now a poor village on a hill six miles north of Jerusalem: it is called er-Ram.—2. A city described as being in mount Ephraim, the birth-place and residence of the prophet Samuel, erroneously supposed to be Arimathea. It is called more fully Ramathaim-zophim (1 Sam. i. 1, 19, ii. 11, vii. 17, viii. 4, xv. 34, xvi. 13, xix. 18-24, xx. 1, xxv. 1, xxviii. 3). Much difficulty has been felt as to the position of this Ramah: some would place it near Beth-lehem, because Saul on leaving Samuel had to pass Rachel's sepulchre (x. 2). But it is not at all certain that the prophet was at that time in his own city: he might be on circuit. Ramah may have been at Soba, a strong-hold on an extension of the ridge of Neby Samwil, about five miles west of Jerusalem, destroyed by Ibrahim Pacha in 1834; or more probably at Neby Samwil itself.—3. A city on the border of Asher, not far from Tyre (Josh. xix. 29).—4. A town of Naphtali (36), perhaps that still called Rameh on the slope of a hill a few miles to the east of Safed.—5 (2 Kings viii. 29; 2 Chron. xxii. 6). See RAMOTH-GILEAD.

RA'MATH (height). A city in the extreme south of Palestine belonging to the tribe of Simeon (Josh. xix. 8). It is also called Ramoth (1 Sam. xxx. 27); probably identical with BAALATH-BEER, which see.

RA'MATH-LE'HI (the height or hill of Levi, i. e. the jaw-bone, according to our version, marg. the lifting up or casting away of the jaw-bone) (Judges xv. 17). See LEHI.

RA'MATH-MIZ'PEH (the height of Mizpeh, or of the watch-tower). A frontier-town of Gad (Josh. xiii. 26); probably the same with MIZPEH, 3, and RAMOTH-GILEAD, which see.

RAMATHA'IM-ZO'PHIM (the double high place of the watchers) (1 Sam. i. 1). See RAMAH, 2.

RA'MATHEN (1 Macc. x. 30, xi. 28, 34). One of the governments added to Judea from Samaria and Galilee by Demetrius Soter, so confirmed by Demetrius Nicator. The others were Apherema and Lydda.

RA'MATHITE. A native or inhabitant of Ramah, perhaps No. 1 (1 Chron. xxvii. 27).

RAM'ESSES (son of the sun) (Gen. xlvii. 11; Exod. xii. 37; Numb. xxxiii. 3, 5). See RAAMESSES.

RAMESSE (Judith i. 9). Rameses.
RAMI'AH (whom Jehovah hath set). One who married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 25).
RAM'MOTH (heights). Another who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 29).

RA'MOTH (id.). 1. A city frequently called Ramoth-gilead or Ramoth in Gilead, in the territory of Gad, but allotted to the Levites and appointed one of the cities of refuge (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8, xxi. 38; 1 Chron. vi. 80). It was the seat of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 13). It was afterwards occupied by the king of Syria; and it was in the vain attempt to recover it that Ahab perished (xxii. 1-36; 2 Chron. xviii.). King Joram was wounded in a battle here (2 Kings viii. 28, 29; 2 Chron. xxii. 5, 6); yet it seems to have been again in the hands of the Israelites; for Jehu was at Ramoth when he was anointed king (2 Kings ix. 1, 4, 14). It is sometimes (viii. 29; 2 Chron. xxii. 6) called Ramah, and may possibly be identical with Ramath-mizpeh. It has been thought to be the modern es-Salt, or it may be somewhat more to the north.—2 (1 Sam. xxx. 27). See RAMATH—3 (1 Chron. vi. 73). See REMETH.
RA'MOTH (Job xxviii. 18, marg.). See CORAL, probably the right rendering.

RAMS' HORNS (Josh. vi. 4, 5, 6, 8, 13). See TRUMPET.

RAMS' SKINS (Exod. xxv. 5, xxvi. 14, xxxv. 7, xxxvi. 19, xxxix. 34). See DYEING, LEATHER.

RANSOM. The price paid for the freedom of a captive, or compensation made for the remission of punishment. This idea was familiar to the Hebrews (Exod. xxi. 30, xxx. 12; Psal. xlix. 7; see also Numb. xxxv. 31, 32, where the same word is found in the original, though our translators have given it as 'satisfaction'). In all these cases the Septuagint uses that term which has been adopted in the New Testament in connection with our Lord's giving himself to death for mankind (Matt. xx. 28; Mark x. 45; 1 Tim. ii. 6). We hence learn how to interpret these expressions, and see that Christ's death was truly a satisfaction for the sins of the world.

RA'PHA (high, tall, chief?). 1. A word rendered 'giant' in our version, though it appears as a proper name in 2 Sam. xxi. 16, 18, 20, marg.; 1 Chron. xx. 4, 6, marg. Rapha was probably the founder of a family of gigantic men. See GIANT.—2. A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 2).—3. One of Saul's posterity (37): called also Rephaiah (ix. 43).
RAPH'AEI (Tob. iii. 17, xii. 15). The name given to an angel. He was regarded, according to Jewish tradition, as one of the four great angels who stand around the throne of God; Michael, Gabriel, Uriel being the others.

RAPHA'IM (Judith viii. 1). One of the alleged ancestors of Judith.

RA'PHON (1 Macc. v. 37). A city of Gilead.

RA'PHU (healed). The father of the spy selected from Benjamin (Numb. xiii. 9).

RASSES (Judith ii. 23). The children of Rasses were a nation said to have been destroyed by Holofernes on his march to Judea.

RATHUMUS (1 Esdr. ii. 16). A form of RATHU (Ezra iv. 8).

RAVEN. The raven, Corvus corax, a well known bird of the family of the Corvidæ. It is first mentioned in scripture as sent by Noah from the ark to which it did not return (Gen. viii. 7). It was reckoned unclean by the Mosaic law (Lev. xi. 15; Deut. xiv. 14). The raven is of a brilliant iridescent black, alluded to in Sol. Song. v. 11: it is a solitary bird (Isai. xxxiv. 11), and is larger and more sagacious than the crow with which it is sometimes confounded. It is not, however, quite certain that the raven of Palestine is identical with our common species; and the expression of the Mosaic prohibition, 'every raven after his kind,' would seem to imply that a class rather than an individual species was meant (see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Rabe'). Ravens are said to have supplied Elijah with food when he was by the brook Cherith (1 Kings xvii. 4, 6). Various hypotheses have been devised to explain away this statement; but, as Keil well observes, 'whosoever acknowledges the living God will confide in his omnipotence that he can cause his servants to be nourished even by ravens, although . . . they are otherwise the most voracious of birds' (Comm. on Kings, vol. i. p. 270). Ravens are alluded to as illustrating God's kind providence in Job xxxviii. 41; Psal. cxlvii. 9; Luke xii. 24.

RA'ZIS (2 Macc. xiv. 37-46). A Jewish elder who in the Maccabean wars committed suicide; an act which the writer of the history approves. Such approval is one reason why the book cannot be inspired.

RAZOR (Numb. vi. 5; Judges xiii. 5, xvi. 17; 1 Sam. i. 11; Ezek. v. 1). See BEARD, HAIR. The word is also used figuratively with obvious meaning (Psal. liii. 2; Isai. vii. 20).

REAI'A (whom Jehovah cares for). A descendant of Reuben (1 Chron. v. 5). This name is identical with REAI'AH (id.). 1. One of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. iv. 2). Possibly he may be the same with Haroeh (ii. 52).—2. One whose children, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 47; Neh. vii. 50).

REAP, REAPING. See AGRICULTURE. Some kinds of corn were probably reaped by being plucked up by the roots.

RE'BA (a fourth part). One of the kings or chiefs of the Midianites slain by the Israelites (Numb. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21).

REBATEMENTS (1 Kings vi. 6, marg.). Explained as 'narrowings'; 'narrowed rests' in the text; i. e. ledges, reductions being made in the thickness of the walls.

REBEC'CA (Rom. ix. 10). The Greek form of Rebekah.

REBEK'AH (a cord with a noose, enchain- ing). The daughter of Bethuel and sister of Laban. She was a woman of personal attractions and became the wife of Isaac, to whom after twenty years of barrenness she bore Esau and Jacob (Gen. xxii. 23, xxiv. 15-67, xxv. 20-28). Of her sons Jacob was Rebekah's favourite; and she persuaded him to obtain his father's blessing by fraud (xxvi. 7, 8, 35, xxvii.). In consequence Jacob had to flee from his brother's revenge; and it is probable that Rebekah saw her best-loved son no more (xxviii. 5, xxix. 12, xxxv. 8, xlix. 31).

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM (Matt. ix. 9; Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27). See PUBLICAN.

RE'CHAB (a band of riders). 1. One of the captains who assassinated Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 2-12).—2. The ancestor of the Rechabites, who was of a Kenite tribe (2 Kings x. 15, 23; 1 Chron. ii. 55; Jer. xxxv. 6-19).—3. The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 14).

RE'CHABITES. A Kenite tribe descended from Rechab. Jonadab, one of their chiefs, probably on some observed occasion of contamination by intercourse with the luxurious and idolatrous inhabitants of cities, laid an injunction on his posterity to drink no wine, to build no houses, but to dwell in tents. This injunction they obeyed fully for 300 years; but upon the Chaldean invasion they were forced to quit the open country and live in Jerusalem (Jer. xxxv.). Afterwards they probably withdrew into the desert. For their obedience a promise was given them that their family should never be extinct. And accordingly at the present day there is an Arabian tribe, as Dr. Wolff and other travellers report, who claim a descent from Rechab, and profess a modified Judaism.

Of course the opportunity has not been lost of representing the Rechabites as religious ascetics, and of connecting in some degree with them eminent persons—such as Elijah and Elisha, who are supposed to have led a very austere life. But the commendation of asceticism derived from their history must not be pushed too far: it was not so much for the habits themselves as for the Rechabites' obedience to their ancestor's command, showing in strong contrast to the neglect of Israel, that the promise was given. There are other notices in scripture of them which are not very clear. Thus they are spoken of as 'scribes' (1 Chron. ii. 55); some of them devoting themselves, it is likely, to learned pursuits. Whether the person (see RECHAB, 3) who took part in the re-building of Jerusalem was of their tribe we can but conjecture. There is a singular statement in Euseb., Hist. Eccles., lib. ii. 23, that a priest of their race remonstrated against the martyrdom of James the Just. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. ii. pp. 1007, 1008, explains this by supposing that the promise to them in Jeremiah's days implied that they were ever after to be incorporated into the tribe of Levi. But surely this is inconsistent with their rule, and is contradicted by their modern separate existence.

RE'CHAH (the side, utmost part). A place, as it would seem, in Judah (1 Chron. iv. 12). But the notice is very obscure.

RECONCILIATION (Lev. viii. 15; 2 Chron. xxix. 24; Dan. ix. 24; Heb. ii. 17). See ATONEMENT.

RECORDER. A great officer frequently mentioned after the establishment of royalty in Israel (2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 1 Kings iv. 3; 2 Kings xviii. 18, 37; 1 Chron. xviii. 15; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8; Isai. xxxvi. 3, 22). He must have been a trusted councillor; and it was his special duty, as the king's historiographer or annalist, to record or at all events to superintend and preserve the records of the events of the reign. A similar office has existed in Persia, in both ancient and modern times; there was also a magister memorie in the time of the Roman emperors Arcadius and Honorius.

RED (Gen. xxv. 25, 30, xlix. 12; Exod. xxv. 5, xxvi. 14, xxxv. 7, 23, xxxvi. 19, xxxix. 34; Numb. xix. 2; 2 Kings iii. 22; Esth. i. 6; Psal. lxxviii. 23, marg., lxxx. 8; Prov. xxiii. 31; Isai. i. 18, xxvii. 2, lxiii. 2; Nah. ii. 3; Zech. i. 8, vi. 2; Matt. xvi. 2, 3; Rev. vi. 4, xii. 3). Red is also frequently conjoined with sea, the Red sea. Comp. Lev. xiii. 19, 24, 42, 43, 49, xiv. 37. See COLOURS.

RED HEIFER. See HEIFER.

RED SEA. See SEA.

REDEEM, REDEEMER. The Hebrew word gáal, with its particle gôel, signifies to ransom something, as a field sold, by paying back the price (Lev. xxv. 25, 26), or a slave (48, 49). Gôel, therefore, is the designation of the person who accomplishes such a redemption. The right of thus redeeming belonged to the nearest of kin. And, according to what is called the Levirate law, if anyone died childless, his brother or next kinsman was to marry the widow, to raise up children in the deceased's name. The Hebrew word given above is applied to this act and to the person who performed it (Ruth iii. 13). Another duty lay upon the gôel: he was to be the blood-avenger of his kinsman who had been slain (Numb. xxxv. 19-29). From these duties of redemption or avenging falling legally upon the next of kin, the term gôel sometimes signifies, and is in our version rendered, 'kinsman' (Ruth iv. 1, 6, 8; 1 Kings xvi. 11). The same word is often tropically, and with remarkable significance, applied to God as the deliverer of his people, e.g. of Israel from Egypt (Exod. vi. 6). In Job the term is so used (Job xix. 25); and repeatedly by Isaiah (Isai. xliii. 1, where a 'ransom' is said to be given, 3, xlv. 22, xlviii. 20, and elsewhere); and occasionally the blotting out of sins is connected with the idea of redemption. In the New Testament Christ is said to have redeemed men (Gal. iii. 13; Rev. v. 9). The original word used in these places implies paying a ransom, and is the same that is elsewhere rendered 'bought' (1 Cor. vi. 20, vii. 23). A different word is translated 'redeemed' in 1 Pet. i. 18, with the same signification, bought out by a payment. It is very fitting that such words should be applied to Him, who became most nearly allied to us by assuming our flesh, and who, undertaking our cause, ransomed us at his own proper cost, by his precious blood-shedding.

REDEMPTION. This word, occurring in the Old Testament, has frequently reference to the buying back of fields, &c., as explained in the last article; and a kindred word to that there explained is used in Lev. xxv. 24, 51, 52; Jer. xxxii. 7. A different word is employed for the redemption-money (Numb. iii. 49), and for the 'redemption,' intended figuratively, of Psal. xlix. 8, cxi. 9, cxxx. 7. The original idea there is the cutting loose, and then delivering, ransoming, or redeeming. In the New Testament, lutrosís or apolutrosís, the Greek words rendered 'redemption,' signify freeing, a ransom-price being paid for it. This ransom-price (lutron) Christ is said to have given; and it was his life (Matt. xx. 28; Mark x. 45). So we are said to have redemption through Christ's blood; and this redemption is described as being the forgiveness of sins (Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14). The same idea is elsewhere inculcated (as in Rom. iii. 24, 25); where the redemption is from the guilt of sin by the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ's death: comp. 1 Cor. i. 30; Heb. ix. 12, 15.

Redemption is of no incomplete or temporary character: it is for those who have it an entire deliverance from the condemnation of the law, from the guilt of sin, and from the power of death. The very body which returns to its dust shall be raised in immortal glory; the full adoption, for which as yet the faithful have to wait, including 'the redemption of the body' (Rom. viii. 23) from corruption and sin to purity and incorruption. See ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION.

REED. The Hebrew word kaneh is applied to a reed or cane growing in marshy ground (1 Kings xiv. 15; Job xl. 21; Isai. xix. 6, xxxv. 7). Such reeds or canes probably are those which at the present day are abundant at the upper part of the lake Hüleh and on the banks of the Jordan. Dr. Thomson describes the marsh at the extremity of the Hüleh as 'an impenetrable jungle of ordinary cane, mingled with that peculiar kind called babeer, from whose stems the Arabs make coarse mats for the walls and roofs of their huts' (The Land and the Book, p. 259). This cane has a triangular stalk, eight or ten feet high, ending in a tuft. In Psal. lxxviii. 30, the marg. rendering is 'beasts of the reeds'; probably the crocodile is meant. The same original word is applied to the sweet cane or CALAMUS, which see, also to the cultivated cane, Arundo sativa, Arundo donax, which grows to a considerable height, and is used for a walking-staff (Isai. xxxvi. 6; Ezek. xxix. 6) or a measuring-rod. As a measure the reed is said to be six larger cubits, i.e. six cubits and six palms (Ezek. xl. 3, 5-8, xli. 8); but see MEASURES. A reed was used for writing (3 John 13, in our version 'pen'); just as writing-reeds are still common in the east. A 'bruised reed' is figuratively put for a weak and humbled penitent; such a feeble one the merciful Saviour will not break or crush (Isai. xlii. 3; Matt. xii. 20). 'A reed shaken with the wind' (xl. 7; Luke vii. 24) probably alludes to the reeds on the banks of the Jordan, where John had ministered. We find a similar illustration occurring in 1 Kings xiv. 15, on which Duns remarks: 'The force of the figure is in the reed being shaken, until it is smitten, crushed, and bent; so that the weight of its head, made heavier by the water in which it has fallen, drags it to the bottom, where it is lost sight of (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 295).

The paper-reed, göme, is often translated 'bulrush' (e.g. Isai. lviii. 2). This, the Papyrus antiquorum, or Nilotica, was formerly abundant in Egypt. Its uses were various. Boats were made of it: the lower part was eaten, stewed in a hot pan; while from the soft cellular substance of the stem the papyrus was made. This plant is not now found in Egypt; but it exists in Syria, by the lake of Tiberias, and elsewhere. It has an angular stem, and is from three to (sometimes) twelve or fourteen feet high. It has no leaves. The flowers form spikelets like a crown at the end of each stem.

REELATAH (whom Jehovah makes tremble, i.e. who fears Jehovah). One who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2). He is the same with Raamiah (Neh. vii. 7).

REELIUS (1 Esdr. i. 8).

REELAH (1 Esdr. v. 8). Reelalah.

REFINE, REFINER. Metals were smelted in a furnace in order to purify and separate the richer substance from that which was inferior and drossy, as silver from lead (Isai. i. 25; Ezek. xxii. 18-22); a crucible or melting-pot and bellows being necessary. It would seem that alkaline salts were employed in the process, perhaps also lead to make the mass flow more readily (Jer. vi. 29, 30). The heat of the fire must be properly tempered; and in this the skill of the refiner was manifested, who had carefully to keep his eye upon the melted metal. The process of refining is figuratively employed to indicate God's method of purifying his people. He casts them into the furnace: he chastens and corrects; but it is to purge away the dross of evil, to bring them deeply penitent to him, from whom they have wandered. The effect is very blessed: their trials are sanctified for their eventual good (Psal. lxxvi. 10; Prov. xvii. 3; Zech. xiii. 9; Mal. iii. 2, 3; 1 Pet. i. 6, 7). The allusion just referred to in Malachi is well illustrated in Napier's Ancient Workers and Artificers in Metal, pp. 24, 25: 'When the alloy is melted . . . the surface of the melted metals has a deep orange-red colour, with a kind of flickering wave constantly passing over the surface . . . the heat is increased . . . and . . . the colour . . . becomes lighter. . . . At this stage the refiner watches the operation, either standing or sitting, with the greatest earnestness, until all the orange colour and shading disappears, and the metal has the appearance of a highly-polished mirror, reflecting every object around it: even the refiner, as he looks upon the mass of metal, may see himself as in a looking-glass, and thus he can form a very correct judgment respecting the purity of the metal. If he is satisfied, the fire is withdrawn.' So the heavenly Refiner, when he sees his own image in his people, is satisfied: trial sanctified has done its work: it is withdrawn.

REFUGE. See CITIES OF REFUGE.

RE'GEM (friend). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 47).

RE'GEM-ME'LECH (friend of the king). One of the persons sent in the reign of Darius to the house of God (Zech. vii. 2). Henderson regards 'the house of God' as a proper name, Beth-el, and supposes that Regem-melech and Sherez were messengers from Beth-el (Minor Prophets, p. 398).

REGENERATION. The translation of a Greek word implying a fresh birth or renewal, a restoration from a degenerate state to a state of pristine excellence. The word occurs but twice in holy scripture; first in a declaration of our Lord, 'in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory' (Matt. xix. 28), i.e. in that kingdom of grace and power, which was designed for the repairing of the ruin of the fall, peopled by the preaching of the everlasting gospel, and destined to have its perfect consummation in the 'new heavens and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness' (2 Pet. iii. 13). The word is found again in reference to baptism (Tit. iii. 5); whereon Dr. Alford says, contrasting the two passages, that in the former 'it is the great second birth of heaven and earth in the latter days; here the second birth of the individual man.' 'The laver of regeneration' and 'the renewal of the Holy Spirit' are both mentioned — 'that complete baptism by water and the Holy Ghost, whereby the first cleansing by water is indeed the ordinary sign and seal, but whereof the glorious in-dwelling Spirit of God is the only efficient cause and continuous agent.' Into the controversial question, which has grown out of the use of the term 'regeneration' in connection with baptism, this work cannot enter.

REGISTER (Ezra ii. 62; Neh. vii. 5, 64). See GENEALOGY.

REHABI'AH (whom Jehovah enlarges). A descendant of Moses (1 Chron. xxiii. 17).

REHO'B (street, broad place).—1. The father of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (2 Sam. viii. 3, 12).—2. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 11).

REHO'B (id.).—1. 2. Two towns in the territory of Asher (Josh. xix. 28, 30). One of these is mentioned as being at the extreme north of Palestine (Numb. xiii. 21). One, too, was allotted to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 31; 1 Chron. vi. 75). Also the original inhabitants retained possession of one after the conquest (Judges i. 31).—3 (2 Sam. x. 8). For BETH-REHOB, which see.

REHOBAM (he enlarges the people). The son of Solomon (the only one mentioned) by Naamah an Ammonitess (1 Kings xiv. 21). He succeeded his father at the age of forty-one years, and reigned seventeen, 975-957 B.C.

It appears that the great works carried on by Solomon had become oppressive to the people: also the jealousy which had before occasionally manifested itself between the imperial tribe of Judah and the other tribes (2 Sam. xix. 11-15, 40-43, xx. 1-2) revived. It was therefore thought expedient, perhaps after some little delay, that Rehoboam should go for inauguration to Shechem, in the heart of the territory of Ephraim, the great rival of Judah. And there the people resolved, ere they established Rehoboam on the throne, to have pledges for a more constitutional government in future. Rehoboam behaved with most consummate folly, as if he had hitherto been shut up in a harem, totally ignorant of men and things. He demanded three days for consideration, thereby destroying the grace of the concession if it had been made, and allowing the discontented tribes, who had given proof of their resolution by placing Jeroboam at their head as spokesman, time to organize their plans, if their demand should be refused. Rehoboam rejected the prudent advice of his more aged counsellors, and placed himself in the hands of the rash courtiers who thought to carry everything by violent measures and threats. And the consequence, as every man of common sense must have foreseen, was the unanimous determination of ten tribes to cast off his authority. But then the foolish king sent the worst person he could have selected, Adoram, the collector of the taxes that were so burdensome. He thought, perhaps, that the appearance of this officer would awe the malcontents. However, Adoram was soon stoned; and then Rehoboam, alive to the real state of affairs, went off as fast as he could to Jerusalem. Yet he would strike one stroke for his dominion. He assembled a great body of troops; but the prophet Shemaiah was directed to announce that the expedition should not prosper; and, after this, even if Rehoboam had been inclined to proceed, it is clear that his army would not have followed him (1 Kings xii. 1-24; 2 Chron. x. xi. 1-4). He was still master of a powerful state: Judah and Benjamin obeyed him; and some of the towns of Simeon and Dan seem to have been added to his territories: Edom also continued tributary. Besides, the priests and the Levites, disgusted with Jeroboam's idolatry, resorted to Judah. Rehoboam, therefore, had he learned wisdom by his calamity, might have reigned in peace and prosperity. He did take the precaution of fortifying several of his cities, and furnished them with stores; and he had eighteen wives and sixty concubines, who bore him many children; and these children he placed, no doubt with faithful governors, in various cities to secure their allegiance (5-23). But this prudence lasted a very little while. Rehoboam, who should have reflected that the riches of Jerusalem would make it a coveted prize for neighbouring monarchs, forsook the Lord, his only effectual defender, and with the mass of his people began to commit abominations and seek after idol-gods. Their punishment was prompt and severe. Shishak (Sheshonk I.), king of Egypt, invaded Judah (possibly invited by Jeroboam); and, though, on the humiliation of the king and his princes, Shemaiah was instructed to promise some remission, yet the rich spoil of Jerusalem was entirely carried off (1 Kings xiv. 22-28; 2 Chron. xii. 1-12); see SHISHAK.

Rehoboam? From sculptures at Karnak, commemorating Shishak's successes. The inscription has been interpreted 'Kingdom of Judah.'

Little remains to be said of this king. He was always, though not actually at war, in a hostile attitude towards Jeroboam. His favourite son and successor was Abijah or Abijam, whom Maachah, the daughter or granddaughter of Absalom, bore him (1 Kings xiv. 29-31; 2 Chron. xi. 21, 22, xii. 13-16).

REHO'BOTH (streets or wide places).—1. An Assyrian city (Gen. x. 11) of which nothing definite is known. Kalisch conjectures that the extensive ruins still bearing the name Rahabeh-malik on the east bank of the Euphrates, about four miles south-west of the town of Mayadin, may mark the site (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 261).—2. The name given by Isaac to the well in the possession of which he was unmolested (Gen. xxvi. 22). This is possibly Br er-Ruheibeh: see Wilton's Negeb, pp. 242, 243.—3. The native city of one of the early Edomitish kings (Gen. xxxvi. 37; 1 Chron. i. 48). This probably lay on the west bank of the Euphrates, between Circesium and Anah: it is now called er-Rahabeh.

RE'HUM (compassionate).—1. One who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2), called also Nebum (Neh. vii. 7).—2. A Persian governor, or chancellor, who obstructed the Jews in re-building their temple and city (Ezra iv. 8, 9, 17, 23).—3. A Levite who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 17).—4. One who sealed the covenant (x. 25).—5. A priest who returned from captivity (xii. 3), called also Harim (15); possibly the same with No. 1.

RET (friendly). A person who adhered to David, when Adonijah made his attempt upon the crown (1 Kings i. 8). He is not elsewhere mentioned. Some conjecture him to be Raddai, David's brother.

REINS. The Hebrews regarded the reins or kidneys as the seat of various affections and emotions, such as we for the most part ascribe in common parlance to the heart. Thus God is said to try the heart and reins (Psal. vii. 9; Jer. xvii. 10, xx. 12). Hence the psalmist says his reins instructed him (Psal. xvi. 7), referring to the serious thought he had. See also lxxiii. 21; Jer. xii. 2, and elsewhere.

RE'KEM (variegation, flower-gardening). 1. One of the kings or chiefs of Midian slain by the Israelites (Numb. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21). 2. A name in the genealogies of Judah; where it is not clear whether a person or a place is intended (1 Chron. ii. 43, 44).

RE'KEM (id.). A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27).

RELIGION. This word as generally used in our version refers rather to the services or mode of worship than to godliness or piety of the heart; which is the sense it now ordinarily bears. Thus we find 'the Jews' religion' (Acts xxvi. 5; Gal. i. 13, 14), i.e. the Jewish religious principles and forms. Religious service is meant in James i. 26, 27. So 'religious' in the former of these verses indicates the observance of God's external ordinances, the outward manifestation of the principle, i.e. piety, within. The original word rendered 'religious' in Acts xiii. 43 is that below translated, perhaps more properly, 'devout' (50).

REMALIAH (whom Jehovah decks). The father of Pekah, king of Israel (2 Kings xv. 25, 27, 30, 32, 37, xvi. 1, 5; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6; Isal. vii. 1, 4, 5, 9, viii. 6).

RE'METH (height). A city of Issachar (Josh. xix. 21). It is possibly the same with Ramoth (1 Chron. vi. 73).

REM'MON (pomegranate). A city of Simeon (Josh. xix. 7). See RIMMON, 1.

REM'MON-METHO'AR (id.) (Josh. xix. 13). See RIMMON, 3; Methoar is not part of the proper name.

REMPHAN or RE'PHAN. This word occurs only in the speech of Stephen (Acts vii. 43), when citing Amos v. 26. Stephen follows the Septuagint version, in which the Hebrew Chiuu is rendered 'Παράν'. It is not easy to explain how this change of name was made. Hengstenberg, with other critics, thinks that it originated in mistake, one letter being substituted for another; but Winer opposes such a notion and adopts the opinion previously entertained by many that Rephan is a Coptic word indicating the planet Saturn (Bibl. RWE, art. 'Saturn'). The question is the more intricate, because the idolatry referred to would seem to have been committed in the wilderness; and there is no mention of Chiuu or Remphan in the Mosaic narrative. Hence De Wette regards the word as an appellative instead of a proper name, and translates 'das Gestell eurer Bilder,' 'the frame' or 'basis of your images,' i.e. the pedestal on which they were placed or carried. Henderson, identifying Chiuu with the Moloch of scripture, Saturn, renders, 'the Chiuu of your images, the star of your god,' and explains 'Chiuu of your images,' i.e. represented by them; the model after which they were made. While the idol so called, which the Hebrews carried about in a sacred shrine, was itself a symbol or representative of one of the heavenly bodies, it was in its turn represented by a number of copies, or smaller images, which they used as penates or house-hold gods in the practice of astrology, (worship of the stars)—Minor Prophets, pp. 161, 162. Fresh light has, however, of late been thrown upon the subject. There is an Egyptian tablet in the British Museum, on which are represented a group of gods. Of these, two bear the names of Renpu, pronounced Rempu, and Ken. These Mr. R. S. Poole (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp 1027-1029) believes to be the deities of some eastern tribe introduced into Egypt, their worship being perhaps similar to that of Baal and Ashtoreth. These deities might become known to the Israelites from the stranger population at the time existing in Egypt. But for fuller information the reader must consult the article referred to.

REPENT, REPENTANCE. There are different original words rendered thus in our version of the New Testament. The Greek metamelomai implies generally the changing of one's care, mind, or purpose, after having done or resolved on anything (e.g. Matt. xxi. 29, 32; Heb. vii. 21), also with the idea of regret or discomfort superadded (e.g. Matt. xxvii. 3; 2 Cor. vii. 8). Another word, metanoō, is to have an after-view, that is, to alter one's views, or mind, with a feeling of sorrow for them. It is used generally (e.g. Luke xvii. 3); and in an evangelical sense to indicate pious sorrow for unbelief and sin, and the turning from these to God and the gospel of Christ (Matt. iii. 2; Acts xxvi. 20). Genuine repentance is attended with external acts (Matt. xi. 21), and evidenced by suitable fruit (iii. 8). For this true repentance (wrought in the heart by the divine Spirit) is not mere remorse, or dread of the consequences of transgression, but an ingenuous sense of the error, the shamefulness, the guilt of sin. It cannot satisfy for or expiate evil; but he who truly repents is well disposed to welcome and avail himself of the satisfaction and atonement made by the Lord Jesus Christ. Hence the gospel message is compendiously described as 'repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ' (Acts xx. 21: comp. ii. 38, iii. 19).

The Lord is sometimes said to repent (Gen. vi. 6; 1 Sam. xv. 11), not as though he felt regret as if he had taken a false step; he is incapable of any such emotion or alteration of mind (Numb. xxiii. 19), but because he appears to change his course of conduct towards those who disobey and are unfaithful to his command.

REPHE'EL (whom God heals). One of the Levite porters (1 Chron. xxvi. 7).

RE'PHAH (riches). A descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 25).

REPHE'AH (whom Jehovah healed).—1. One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 21).—2. A captain of the Simeonites (iv. 42).—3. A descendant of Issachar (vii. 2).—4. A person of the line of Saul (ix. 43), called also Rapha (viii. 37).—5. 'The ruler of the half part of Jerusalem,' who helped to repair the wall (Neh. iii. 9).

REPHE'IM, REPHE'IMS (giants? healers? chiefs?) A great and mighty people who, though not Canaanites, once held large dominion over Canaan and elsewhere, but who were wasted and overcome; so that at the time when the Israelites passed into the promised land there were but some remnants of them, who were for the most part without difficulty subdued and eradicated. The origin of the Rephaim is variously described. Kalisch believes them Japhethites (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 351). The first mention we have of them is in connection with the history of Abraham. They are said to have been defeated by the eastern kings (Gen. xiv. 5); and again their territories were to be the possession of Abraham's descendants (xv. 20). Branches of them were the Anakims of whom we have special mention, the Zuzims, and the Emims, whose country was subsequently occupied by the children of Lot (Deut. ii. 9-11, 19-21). There were other tribes belonging to the same great stock: perhaps the Philistines were one of these. Miss Corboux in her elaborate memoir of this people (Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Oct. 1851, Jan.-Oct. 1852) would identify them with the shepherd race who held at one time dominion in Egypt. She believes them of the stock of Mizraim, and traces from Egyptian monuments the enmity and devastating wars between them and Egyptian monarchs. She supposes that their supreme metropolis in Palestine was Salem, afterwards Jerusalem, where the feudal head of the nation resided, and received after Abraham's victory a tenth part of all; his supremacy being acknowledged equally by the Hebrew sojourner and by the Emim king of Sodom (Gen. xiv. 20). It is impossible to give here even an outline of Miss Corboux's memoir. Doubtless some positions in it are open to objection; but it must yet be admitted that her theory throws light on many geographical and ethnological questions closely connected with the sacred story. In our translation some obscurity is occasioned by the word being sometimes rendered 'giants' (e.g. Deut. iii. 11). Og was one of the last remnants of the Rephaim race, though some men of great stature lived in after ages, who probably were of the same stock.

REPHE'IM, VALLEY OF. A valley near Beth-lehem where David twice defeated the Philistines (2 Sam. v. 17-25, xxiii. 13; 1 Chron. xi. 15, 16, xiv. 9-16). This valley, noted for its fertility (Isa. xvii. 5), is thought to be the plain a little south-west of Jerusalem. This however hardly answers to the word used in the original for valley, emek: see VALLEY. Yet it must have been in this immediate neighbourhood; for the boundary-line of Judah and Benjamin ran by, and it was close upon the valley of Hinnom (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16, where 'valley of the giants').

REPHE'IDIM (refreshments, rests). A station of the Israelites in their way to Sinai (Exod. xvii. 1, 8, xix. 2; Numb. xxxiii. 14, 15). It was here that the people murmured against Moses because there was no water; and Moses was commanded to go with some of the elders, and smite the rock that was in Horeb, from which there should then flow waters in abundance. The proximity of Rephidim to Horeb is thus evident. Travellers are not, indeed, agreed as to its exact position; Robinson placing it at some point in the Wady es-Sheikh, 'not far from the skirts of Horeb, and about a day's march from the particular mountain of Sinai' (Bibl. Res., vol. i. p. 121), and Stanley imagining it to have been in the Wady Feiran (Sinai and Palestine, p. 40), a valley south-west of the Wady es-Sheikh. But, if there is a doubt of the exact locality of Rephidim, there is none as to the fact that it was very near the place where soon afterwards the law was delivered. The rock that was smitten was some distance from the camp: the miracle was performed in the sight not of all the people, but of chosen elders who went with Moses to the spot. And there is no improbability in supposing that this was higher ground, and that the stream, miraculously produced, flowed down to the encampment, and along with the march, so as for a considerable time to have supplied drink to the tribes. The Jews have a legend that the very rock in some supernatural manner attended the Israelites through the whole of their wanderings; and Dr. Alford insists that St. Paul adopted this legend (1 Cor. x. 4): see Alford's note on this text. But surely Bloomfield's exposition is more reasonable: 'Christ, who is typified by that rock, everywhere accompanied and was present with them, supplying water miraculously furnished, which, as it never failed them, might be said popularly to follow them, as Christ who supplied it did, either really, though invisibly, or figuratively and spiritually, by his perpetual and present help and protection' (Greek Test., note on 1 Cor. x. 4). There is a singular rock still to be seen in the neighbourhood, high up in the Wady Leja, which tradition declares to be that very identical one which Moses struck. There are fissures in it, from which water might have flowed. Dr. Robinson believes them to 'belong' 'to the nature of the seam,' some of them possibly enlarged by art (ubi supr., p. 113). But Dr. Olin (Travels in the East, vol. i. p. 417) and Dr. Durbin (Observations on the East, vol. i. p. 149) think them natural. The last-named traveller, who came to the spot possessed with a conviction that the tradition was baseless, had his mind changed by examination. 'This stone,' says he, 'made more impression upon me than any natural object claiming to attest a miracle ever did.' See Kitto, Daily Bible Readings, First Series, Seventeenth week, Second day. In Rephidim Amalek fought with Israel, not improbably for the water with which the tribes were supplied. And in the battle as Moses held up his hands Israel prevailed. Hither it was, too, that Jethro came to visit his son-in-law, bringing Zipporah and her two sons.

REPROBATE. This word occurs in Jer. vi. 30; where the idea is that of base metal, which will not endure the trial of the fire. And so the general meaning, wherever the term is found, is of one who cannot abide the test to which he may be put, that is worthless, and consequently rejected (Rom. i. 28; 2 Cor. xiii. 5, 6, 7; 2 Tim. iii. 8; Tit. i. 26). The passage most obscure to the mere English reader is 2 Cor. xiii. 5, 6, 7. It may be paraphrased: You are seeking a proof of Christ speaking in me. . . . nay, rather prove yourselves, whether you maintain your own place and standing. This will be shown by Christ's presence in you; and if you cannot stand this trial you are but worthless. But I am persuaded you shall find that we can bear the trial. We pray, however, that you may require no such demonstration (of power exercised by us in correction], but rather that you should do no evil: our desire is not that we should gain credit, but that you may do that which is good, for your own advantage, even though we lose in reputation by not having to exhibit our apostolic power. Comp. Alford, note on the place.

The words 'reprobate' and 'reprobation' have in later theological discussion been taken to imply a condemnatory decree of God against certain persons. But this meaning does not appear in scripture.

RE'SEN (a bride). A great Assyrian city between Nineveh and Calah (Gen. x. 12). It is by some identified with Nimroud. See NINEVEH, pp. 632, 634. Or it is likely that the site of Resen may be Selamiyeh. It is hardly possible to arrive at absolute certainty.

RE'SHEPH (flame, lightning). One of Ephraim's descendants (1 Chron. vii. 25).

RESTITUTION. An act of justice in which that is restored to a man of which he had been unjustly deprived. It was provided in the Mosaic law that for actual theft restitution should be four or five-fold; for trespass, carelessness, misadventure the amount was graduated according to the culpability (Exod. xxii. 1-15). Hence the sentence of David against the supposed robber of the poor man's lamb was exact, according to statute (2 Sam. xii. 6: comp. Luke xix. 8).

RESURRECTION. The rising again of Jesus after he had been crucified and buried is one of the cardinal points of Christian faith (1 Cor. xv. 14-18). It has been embodied in the standard creeds of the church (Apostles', Nicene, Athanasian), and has always been maintained by orthodox believers. Ancient prophecy appeared to foreshadow it (Psal. xvi. 10), and ancient history to typify it (Jonah i. 17; Matt. xii. 40). And our Lord himself in his teaching repeatedly told his disciples that he should be put to death and be raised again the third day (xvi. 21, xvii. 9). It is true that they did not understand his words: they could not bring themselves to believe that their Master would be so despitely treated and slain—and the less, the higher the view they took of his personal dignity—so that they puzzled themselves in vain to discover what the rising from the dead was, of which he spoke (Mark ix. 10; Luke xviii. 34).

The career of Jesus seemed to worldly eyes a failure. He had performed many wonderful works, and had awakened vast curiosity throughout the country. A few attached followers accompanied him from place to place; but he had arrayed no great interest on his side: he had failed to rouse the powerful masses. His conduct must have seemed inexplicable to the calm keen observers of the world; so that those who naturally would have wished him success could not forbear their sarcastic comments on his proceedings (John vii. 3-5). He had denounced the ruling classes; and his doctrine was utterly distasteful to them because it involved a project of thorough reform. Rejected by the heads of the nation, he addressed himself to the poor and despised and uninfluential class; to whom he discoursed in lofty language of a coming kingdom of righteousness. But, when they were moved and would have rallied round him, he strangely shrunk away (vi. 15). He seemed afraid to strike a decisive blow. He would not claim openly the Messiahship: he forbade his disciples to proclaim it (Matt. xvi. 20), and tried to hush even the grateful acknowledgments of those he had benefited (ix. 30, xii. 15, 16). 'The multitudes did not understand this: they forsook him: his doings were to them unintelligible: they affected them no longer. And yet this state of things could not continue. He himself hastened to bring it to a close. For a long time the corners of Galilee had protected him against the fierce hatred of the mighty. Now he disregarded it: he appeared in Jerusalem no more as a private individual, or as a rabbi accompanied by a few scholars, but at the head of a huzzaing multitude who hailed him as the Messiah, to the astonishment of the capital, which was deeply agitated by the sight. Retreat was now no more possible: the fear of his opponents was excited: he could only escape their rage by relinquishing his exertions, and seeking to save his life in some secluded solitude. If he was not disposed to do that, he must now organize a party, and attack before he was attacked. He did it not: instead of that, he pronounced woes over the scribes and Pharisees, disclosed before the whole people their unfaithful hypocritical conduct, roused their malice, and, defenceless and alone, stood before them with no other protection than the truth which proceeded from his mouth, and the patent purity of his life and actions. But truth and innocence are, upon the battle-field of history, poor weapons against malice and artifice, against treachery and power. And, consequently, Jesus Christ fell in the decisive moment: he died as a criminal; and with him the work he commenced fell into ruin, and the Hope of Israel was extinguished' (Hoffman, Christianity in First Cent., transl., chap. iii. p. 61).

Never was the discomfiture of a party more complete: the very embers were crushed out. There were only a few women left to lament the dead one; while two or three of the better class had the charity to give him burial. There was evidently no thought—in the circumstances there could be none—of taking up the work which Jesus had failed to accomplish; for the strange rumour, three days after, of his having been seen alive was altogether disbelieved by those who had been his disciples, and mocked as a idle story. They were far too disheartened to concoct any plan of bearding the rulers whose power had just been so fatally displayed.

And yet in six or seven weeks these men, of the peasant class for the most part, appear again in public, in the heart of Jerusalem, and, in the presence of the multitudes who were thronging to a great national feast, begin to preach, not just some fragments of their dead Master's doctrine, not the crude speculations which men devising an imposture generally commence with, but a matured system, complete in all its necessary parts, the Christian religion in such shape, and form, and consistency, and fulness, that the accumulated wisdom of eighteen centuries, the acutest and most subtle minds of the long line of later theologians, have been able only to illustrate that which they received, and have not made any real addition to it. And this system these unlearned men open out and maintain with the most remarkable boldness, and the most astonishing skill in applying the ancient and venerated scriptures of the nation to its support, basing the whole of their doctrine on this great fact, that Jesus, the crucified, was risen again. They were men of no political weight: all the authority was in the hands of those whom they confronted: why did not the rulers, if it were a falsehood, immediately expose it? Besides, the fact insisted on was not just that a dead man was living again; it was a life of a different kind that they said had appeared, the revelation of a new world, a life of immortality existing in a mortal body. And the apprehension of this gave the disciples perfectly new ideas. All in the scriptures heretofore obscure had now a flood of light on it, testifying the importance of the truth made known to them.

So that this was not merely a tale of wonder which they insisted on for a temporary purpose. They persuaded thousands that they spoke the truth; and Christianity, based upon the fact of the death and resurrection of Jesus, whose work was thus seen to be no failure, began at once to exercise that extraordinary influence which even its enemies allow it, of refining and purifying those who embraced its doctrines and obeyed its precepts, gaining ground continually, in the face of the most cruel and continued persecutions, till, as our own eyes behold, it is accepted by the most enlightened nations; its tendency being everywhere to ameliorate the condition of men, to foster the charities of domestic life, to establish a standard of morals, to which if the world were really conformed, certainly the greatest amount of happiness of which in our mortal state we are capable would be attained.

Now let an unbeliever account for these results, if he can. Could the fact on which the gospel teaching is based be a mistake? Could it be a concerted lie? We have contemporary evidence. Setting apart the narrative of the four evangelists, let us look for a moment at the testimony of St. Paul. His first epistle to the Corinthians is acknowledged on all hands to be a genuine production. It was written within about twenty-five years of the occurrence of the alleged resurrection; and it contains deliberate statements of the facts, a narration of Christ's several appearances to Peter, to the twelve, to five hundred brethren most of whom were still alive, to James, to all the apostles. Let it be remembered that Paul was speaking of what happened in his own life-time, when he was grown up, that if not at Jerusalem at the juncture he was there soon after, that he was on intimate terms with the rulers, and must have heard from them their explanations, for at first with their authority be violently persecuted Christianity. No delusion could be palmed on such a man. So that there is no fact in history authenticated by better evidence.

But suppose it false; and what follows? Literally that you have the most remarkable results—those which have been touched on above—results lasting to our own days, proceeding from no adequate cause. We shall take the liberty to remind unbelievers that there are certain laws of nature which cannot be transgressed; that causes are related to and commensurate with their effects; that events flow on in definite sequence. If they are credulous enough to suppose that the mighty superstructure is destitute of any foundation, that the whole was the hurried invention of a few enthusiastic men, we shall ask, How came they to be enthusiastic in such a matter?—how came they, utterly disheartened as we have seen they were, dispersed, and ready to return to their former humble occupations (John xxi. 2, 3)—how came they after their Master's death to take up the notion which they would not listen to in their Master's life, and to propound the gospel system, as before noted, all at once in its breadth and power; when it must have been clear to their minds that, whatever the ultimate success, to them there could be only shame and discredit, a miserable life, and a hopeless death? Never was prostration at first so complete: never was confidence afterwards so certain and successful. And why? There must have been an adequate cause, I repeat. Common sense, the ordinary laws of reasoning and of nature, assure us that it could have been only fact, stern fact, neither deliberate fraud nor deluded folly, that compelled them to accept the truth of the miracle of Christ's resurrection. Yes, indeed, 'now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept' (1 Cor. xv. 20). 'I have been used for many years,' said Dr. Arnold (Sermons on the Christian Life, p. 14), 'to study the history of other times, and to examine and weigh the evidence of those who have written about them; and I know of no one fact, in the history of mankind, which is proved by better and fuller evidence of every sort, to the understanding of a fair enquirer, than the great sign which God has given us, that Christ died and rose again from the dead.' The argument can of course be but slightly touched on here, but it is earnestly recommended to every thoughtful mind. Let it be coupled with what is elsewhere said under CHRISTIANITY, MIRACLES, PROPHECY, REVELATION, SCRIPTURE; and the result, confirmed on all hands, is the same: 'We have not followed cunningly-devised fables.'

Of the nature of Christ's resurrection-body we know very little. He took again the flesh that died; and there were still the marks of suffering on it (John xx. 20, 27). But yet there was a change: the mortal had put on immortality. He was sometimes hardly recognized by his friends, till the well-known tones and well-remembered actions assured them that it was the Lord (Luke xxiv. 16, 30, 31, 37; John xx. 15, 16).

And he passed strangely in and out among them. It was not, perhaps, till his ascension that his body assumed that glorious port which for a while it had on the mount of transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 2; Mark ix. 2, 3, Luke ix. 29), and which John beheld in Patmos (Rev. i. 13-16). But this it is impossible for us to decide: sufficient that Christ's resurrection put the seal upon his death, and proved that his sacrifice was adequate and accepted. Man's mighty debt was cancelled; and therefore the prison of the grave was opened. So that, as the apostle declares, Christ 'was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification' (Rom. iv. 25).

Scripture always links the resurrection of Christ with that of his believing people: 'Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming' (1 Cor. xv. 23). Indeed, if he is the head and his servants the members of one mystical body (xii. 27), life cannot reign in the one and corruption in the other. Rather the life from the head will be communicated to all the subordinate parts; and body as well as soul shall be quickened into immortality (John xiv. 19; Rom. viii. 11; Phil. iii. 20, 21). Nor shall the resurrection comprise only the faithful. Our Lord has told us that 'all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth' (John v. 28, 29). The divine power has heretofore raised men from the dead; for he who could at first create could as easily restore the life that had perished. Some examples we have in the Old Testament (1 Kings xvii. 17-23; 2 Kings iv. 18-37, xiii. 20, 21); and, in the New, Christ both raised the dead himself and also gave the same power to his apostles (Matt. ix. 18-26; Luke vii. 11-16; John xi. 33-44; Acts ix. 36, 41, xx. 9-12). There can be no doubt that those so raised died again in the course of nature. But it is probable that the saints who came out of their graves after Christ's resurrection received then their incorruptible bodies, a part of the train of the mighty Lord of life and immortality (Matt. xxvii. 52, 53).

To the worldly-wise the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead has always appeared incredible. Our Lord taught it from the Pentateuch to the sneering Sadducees (xxii. 31, 32); and Paul preached it to the mocking philosophers of Athens (Acts xvii. 18, 32). The special objection was, 'How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?' (1 Cor. xv. 35). And this is the objection which is still urged. The body of a living man is continually changing, it is said, so that the particles which belonged to it a few years ago are now dispersed and belong to it no more, nay, may help to constitute the body of some one else. With what body, then, shall the dead come? What particles shall be gathered to form the resurrection-body? The apostle indignantly answers such a question by pointing to the natural growth of the corn: it 'is not quickened except it die.' And it springs up changed but yet the same, yielding the counterpart of that which was sown (36-38). So shall be the resurrection of the dead: buried in corruption they rise incorruptible

And, just as, though the particles of our living bodies are in perpetual flux, we yet lose not our personal identity, so doubtless, by the mighty power of God, the changed and glorified body will be felt to be the same; with new powers and fresh capabilities, with vigour expanded and shape (it may be, we know not) altered, the development of eternal life shall not affect the man's personal identity—in body as well as soul he shall have his perfect consummation and bliss (see some good observations on this topic in Niven's Victory over Death, chap. xii.; and, for the nature of the risen body, Bickersteth's The Risen Saints).

It will indeed be a wondrous exercise of divine power; and vain man, instead of foolishly questioning his Maker's purpose, might better be grateful for the high destiny revealed for those who shall be conformed to the risen Saviour. Well were it if each one longed and laboured like the apostle to 'know Christ, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable to his death, if by any means' he 'might attain unto the resurrection of the dead' (Phil. iii. 10, 11). A noble hope: why will any one disown it?

RE'U (friend, i.e. of God). One of the patriarchs in the line of Shem (Gen. xi. 18-21; 1 Chron. i. 25). His name in the Greek form is Ragau (Luke iii. 35).

REUBEN (behold a son). The first-born of Jacob by his wife Leah, who hoped that on the birth of a son she should secure her husband's affection (Gen. xxix. 31, 32). There is a singular incident related of Reuben's youth. He had found some mandrakes in the field during wheat-harvest, and brought them to his mother. Rachel coveted them; and they were given to her on condition of her yielding up her husband's bed that night (xxx. 14-16). The next notice we have of him is a disgraceful one: he defiled his father's bed (xxxv. 22). Reuben was weak and impulsive; yet he had some commendable qualities. He would not join with his wicked brethren in their cruel plot against Joseph. It would seem that he was not present when they first devised it; and when he knew that they intended to kill Joseph he persuaded them to cast him into a pit, resolving at a favourable opportunity to take him up and restore him to his father. This plan was defeated by Judah's proposal to sell the lad to the Ishmeelites, when again Reuben was absent. His grief on discovering that Joseph was gone, killed as he believed, is creditable to his fraternal feelings; and he was able afterwards to remind his brothers that, if they had listened to his counsel, they might have been spared their present trouble (xxxvii. 21, 22, 29, 30, xlii. 22). We next find Reuben endeavouring to persuade his father to let Benjamin accompany his brethren when they went a second time to Egypt for corn. But his arguments were coarse: 'Slay my two sons,' he said, 'if I bring him not to thee' (xlii. 37). Jacob was not likely to be prevailed on by such a mode of speaking. Four sons, however, of Reuben are named in the list of Israel's nouse at the descent into Egypt (xvi. 9:

comp. Numb. xxvi. 5-7). Some difficulty has been felt in consequence of this: it has been supposed that two of the sons were born in Egypt. But it does not necessarily follow that such was the case. The sons might have been but two when Reuben addressed his father; and two more might have been born in the weeks or months which intervened before the family migrated into Egypt. Or the two eldest sons might have been about Benjamin's age, and thus have been specially offered as fit pledges for his safe return: see Birks, The Exodus of Israel, pp. 7, 8.

In Jacob's prophetic blessing of his sons Reuben's incest is alluded to, and an intimation dropped that he should not have the prerogative of his birth-right (Gen. xlix. 3, 4). Accordingly, though Reuben is usually named first in genealogical lists, yet the birth-right was transferred to Joseph, the progenitor of two tribes, and the imperial power given to Judah (1 Chron. v. 1, 2).

At the first census in the wilderness the number of Reubenites was 46,500 (Numb. i. 20, 21); their encampment was to the south of the tabernacle; and on march they were to head the second division of the host, Simeon and Gad being joined with them (ii. 10-16). At the second census they had decreased to 43,730; for of their tribe many had rebelled and fallen with Dathan and Abiram (xvi. xxvi. 5-11). In the last year of the wandering in the wilderness, when the kingdoms of Og and of Sihon had been conquered, the tribes of Reuben and Gad requested that they might be allowed to settle east of the Jordan. It was a pasture-land; and they had very much cattle. Moses was at first disposed to refuse; but, when they professed their readiness to aid their brethren in the conquest of Canaan westward, he consented. And accordingly they at once occupied their cities and placed there their wives and children, forming with half the tribe of Manasseh a large division of the whole people, cut off in some measure from the rest of the nation.

The territory of Reuben, in the region now called the Belka, was divided from Moab on the south by the Arnon, and bounded on the west by the Dead sea and the Jordan (Josh. xiii. 16, 23). To the east it extended to the Arabian deserts and the country of Ammon, while on the north it bordered upon the possession of Gad. But it does not seem as if the frontier of these two tribes was very exactly defined; or rather the population, feeders of sheep and cattle, were migratory in their habits and occupied at different times different districts. For we find some of the towns, as Heshbon (Numb. xxxii. 37; Josh. xiii. 17, xxi. 39) and Dibon (Numb. xxxii. 34; Josh. xiii. 17), ascribed sometimes to Reuben and sometimes to Gad. Generally speaking, the towns of Reuben are noted in Numb. xxxii. 37, 38; Josh. xiii. 15-21; four of them being assigned to the Merarite Levites (xxi. 36, 37; 1 Chron. vi. 78, 79); and one, Bezer, was a refuge-city (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8).

The prophetic blessing of Moses upon Reuben expressed a hope of life and population for the tribe (Deut. xxxiii. 6): no brilliant future was anticipated. And this was just their history. 'Their abodes abounded,' says Dr. Kalisch, 'in excellent pasture-land, forests, and meadows; and many became wealthy proprietors of cattle; but they were by these very blessings alienated from the spirit of war and conquest, and almost from a progressive political life; and in the time of the judges they could not even by long discussions be roused to abandon for a while their herds and villages, and to take part in the glorious national war immortalized by the song of Deborah, Judges v. 15, 16' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 780).

The Reubenites with the other trans-Jordanic settlers despatched a large body of troops to aid their brethren in the conquest of Canaan (Josh. iv. 12, 13). On their return they erected an altar of memorial by the Jordan, which seemed at first likely to cause dissension among the tribes (xxii.). We afterwards hear little of them. In the days of Saul they in conjunction with their neighbours made some successful forays on the Hagarites, and extended their pastures even to the Euphrates; the army of the confederate tribes being 44,760 (1 Chron. v. 1-10, 18-22). Large numbers of them joined David at Hebron (xii. 37), who appointed a separate ruler over them (xxvii. 16); Solomon, however, included them with Gad in one of his commissariat departments (1 Kings iv. 19). On the division of the kingdom they attached themselves to the northern state, and were ultimately for their sins carried away captive by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chron. v. 6, 25, 26); when their country seems to have been occupied by Moab (comp. Josh. xiii. 16-21 with Isai. xv.).

REUBENITES (Numb. xxvi. 7; Deut. iii. 12, 16, iv. 43, xxix. 8; Josh. i. 12, xii. 6, xiii. 8, xxii. 1; 2 Kings x. 33; 1 Chron. v. 6, 26, xi. 42, xii. 37, xxvi. 32, xxvii. 16). The descendants of Reuben.

REUEL (friend of God).—1. One of the sons of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 4, 10, 13, 17; 1 Chron. i. 35, 37).—2 (Exod. ii. 18). See JETHRO, RAGUEL.—3 (Numb. ii. 14). See DEUEL.—4. A Benjamite chief (1 Chron. ix. 8).

REU'MAH (exalted). A concubine of Nabor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 24).

REVELATION. Revelation is the uncovering and displaying of that which before was hidden. In a theological sense it is a disclosure by the Deity to his creatures of truths which they could not have known by the contemplation of his works or the deductions of their natural reason.

The possibility of such a revelation can hardly be denied by those who admit the existence of a God and the formation of the universe by his fiat. He who could create beings with powers of intelligence could surely act upon these powers and make such beings conscious of the communications they were receiving. And, if we are to regard God as the moral Governor of the world, there is a high probability that he would make his subjects acquainted with those salutary laws by which he intended to rule. To provide them with faculties which might be rightly or wrongly used, and yet to withhold that knowledge which would sufficiently influence them to take the right path can hardly be thought befitting the character of a beneficent Father. There is a limit by its natural constitution to the powers of a finite creature. He cannot reach, unaided, to the necessary knowledge of the Infinite. It is impossible fully to argue this here. It must be sufficient to assert that just reasoning corroborates the fact that man never does 'by searching find out God.' But there is the argument from experience and history to be briefly adverted to. Left to themselves men have, confessedly, become debased. Philosophy and reason have not proved adequate guides to virtue. Heathen nations, who may be supposed to have had the light of reason, have not improved it; and those who have most diligently cultivated philosophic enquiry have ingenuously confessed that they needed some higher guide. The state of morals in countries, both ancient and modern, where revelation is not known, is proof sufficient that man by himself is unable to apprehend and to attain the chief good. The whole evidence of this cannot be produced. The fearful state of common social life—known well to classical scholars—even in such centres of civilization as Athens and Rome, must not be opened forth to general Christian gaze. All that can be said is that St. Paul's picture of it in Rom. i. is far from an exaggeration of the truth. And yet men generally have had some faint lingering gleam of a revelation made to their remote ancestors. If even with this assistance they have fallen, how much more if left without any divine instruction? If, then, God is to be adequately known to his creatures, if his will is to be the rule of their rational obedience, if a standard of right and wrong is to be established, some communication from the Deity must be made for the good order of the world.

As to the mode of such communication or the way in which the Eternal Spirit acts upon the human spirit, and brings men into a definite conscious relation to himself, nothing need be said here. Neither is it requisite to argue the question whether, the necessity of a revelation being presupposed, it would be more desirable that it should be made to every individual, or committed to a few with sufficient credentials to establish it to the satisfaction of the rest. Observations bearing on this topic will follow. We have at present rather to do with a question of fact. It is alleged that such a revelation has been made, that teachers specially commissioned by the Deity have appeared to make known his will. The matter of chiefest import is to ascertain whether these teachers have possessed the knowledge and held the commission to which they pretended; or have they been deceivers or self-deceived?

That impostors and fanatics have advanced the largest claims is sufficiently evident. There must therefore be some criteria which may distinguish fact from fiction. And it is simply reasonable that, if teachers who profess to come from God possess knowledge greater than men can reach, and exercise powers greater than men can wield, they must have received these from above: to such men we may properly conclude that a revelation has been made. This knowledge and this power are evinced by prophecy and by miracles, which have been fairly considered adequate proofs of revelation. They are appealed to in support of the revelation which we maintain. The Deity challenges the world to declare, as he can, the future (Isai. xli. 22, 23, 26, xlii. 9, xliii. 7, 8); and the great Teacher who appeared nearly 2,000 years ago in Judea pointed to the mighty works he wrought as evidence sufficient of his divine mission (John x. 37, 38, xiv. 10, 11).

If, then, it can be established that events in the far future have been long before proclaimed, if it can be shown on sufficient evidence that miracles have been performed, we are justified in the conclusion that the finger of God is here. See MIRACLE, PROPHECY, where these topics are discussed.

In estimating the truthfulness of alleged revelation we have certain checks. God cannot contradict himself. He lets us draw various plain deductions from what we see in the book of nature. These have sometimes been thought inconsistent with the book of revelation. They may be inconsistent with the glosses put upon that book. But the genuine voice of revelation has nothing to fear from investigations in any other field of knowledge. Sooner or later all that really proceeds from God will be found in admirable harmony. Truth will not suffer by large enquiry.

The preceding observations tend to show the possibility and the necessity of a divine revelation, and point out some of the criteria by which to try the pretensions of that which professes to come from God. To us it presents itself in a written form. The communications which are said to have been made by the Deity, by means of several persons and repeated through successive ages, are embodied for our use in the bible. Some notice therefore must be taken of the shape which, so far as it regards ourselves, they have assumed. Inspiration was necessary to preserve these, and to present them truthfully to us. Here is the distinction to be made between revelation and inspiration—the one the supernatural communication from God, the other the spiritual influence through which the communication is officially proclaimed by word of mouth or by writing, that is, the transference of the communicated truth to the spoken or written word. For revelations may be given which he who receives them is neither authorized nor empowered to declare (2 Cor. xii. 1-4); and record may be made under spiritual guidance of that which has been learned merely by the use of the ordinary senses (John xix. 35).

The structure of such a record must be looked at. It is reasonable to believe that God would act towards his creatures on an intelligent plan, his object in our world being to manifest his glory in the restoration of those who had wandered from his obedience. This plan would be apparent through all the parts of a revelation proceeding from him. If then we can perceive through the bible, the books of which were composed at widely-different periods, the same general plan, we have a strong presumption in favour of its being a revelation from God. Now a revelation must not only disclose that which could not (as above noted) otherwise be known—such as the doctrines respecting the nature, attributes, and character of God, the sin and condemnation of man, the mode of salvation through Christ, and the work of the Holy Spirit—but must involve a moral probation. Else men would be treated as machines, and human responsibility would be destroyed. But, if the great purpose of probation is to be answered, there must be preparation, a training, so to speak, of individuals and of the world. Revelation could not in this view be entire at once. No single period in the world's history could be fixed on in which the whole divine plan might be propounded, without violating the condition of moral probation to most of the generations of mankind. There must be a gradual development, if the graces of faith and hope are to be exercised with practical effect upon human conduct. This is just the nature of the bible revelation, propounding truth by degrees, human language and human instruments being employed for this, so as to give the probationary purpose its fullest effect; sufficient being made known for the age to which any part of the revelation was made, and further developments coming after, not contrary to but illustrative and confirmatory of that which had preceded, modelled after such a manner that, while each, as just said, was thoroughly suitable to its own time, the whole should when completed be of perfect consistency, and continue to serve its purpose of probation through the rest of the generations of the earth. The revelation must be co-extensive with those who were to be benefited by it, and must therefore travel along the course of man's history. And to answer its end it must be shaped, without derogation from God's holiness, so as to meet man's ignorance, weakness, and sin.

Now the revelation of the bible, the more closely it is examined, will be more evidently seen to answer to the conditions adverted to. Its forms of history, biography, and prophecy, instead of a series of abstract propositions, its divine side and its human side adapting it as the teacher and the touchstone of sinful men, and above all the marvellous unity of it, the later portions being the natural full growth of the earlier germ—these considerations, taken together with the evidence and criteria previously noted, may well convince us that the scripture revelation proceeds from God in mercy to his creatures.

REVELATION, THE BOOK OF. The closing book of the New Testament, the only one therein which can strictly be called prophetic. It has its name as the translation of a Greek word, which is sometimes (slightly Anglicized) used as its designation—Apocalypse.

It can hardly be doubted that the writer wished to identify himself with the apostle John. For no other eminent man of the name is said to have been in the early times of the gospel banished to Patmos (Rev. i. 9), and the expression used in i. 2 certainly points to the same hand that penned John i. 14, xix. 35. Accordingly, we find evidence, as soon as we could reasonably look for it, that this book was regarded in the church as the work of the apostle. At first the voice of ecclesiastical writers seems to be unanimous. It commences with those who actually knew St. John. Thus there is the evidence, more or less direct, of Justin Martyr, of Melito of Sardis, of Theophilus of Antioch, of Irenæus—a most important witness, who, having given an interpretation of the mystical number of the beast, appeals thereon to the testimony of those who had seen the apostle. Tertullian and others might also be adduced. But by-and-bye the unanimity is disturbed; and Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria 248-265 A.D., a pupil of Origen, expresses his disbelief that St. John was the author of the book. He does not deny its high authority; but he thinks, from the way in which the name of the writer is put forward, and especially from the diction, so inferior in accuracy to that of the Gospel and of the first epistle, that it could not have proceeded from the same pen with them, but must, as there were many Johns, have been the work of another of the same name. The testimony of Dionysius is by far the most weighty of early times. Doubts however increased; and the result may be generally stated that in the eastern church the authorship of the apostle was questioned or denied, while after the fifth century it was almost universally allowed by the western church. Internal evidence has been carefully examined. The faults of the diction have been exaggerated; nevertheless it is certainly a problem how the same individual could have at various times expressed himself so differently. Other arguments taken from the subject-matter may be satisfactorily explained. Dr. Alford has elaborately examined the whole question, and—observing that the external evidence 'is of the highest and most satisfactory kind: it was unanimous in very early times. It came from those who knew and had heard St. John himself: it only began to be impugned by those who had doctrinal objections to the book: the doubt was taken up by more reasonable men on internal and critical grounds; but no real substantive counter-claimant was ever produced'—he expresses his conviction, in spite of certain difficulties arising from the style and other phenomena of the book, 'that the author was the apostle and evangelist St. John' (Proleg., sect. i.). The reader may be referred also to an able disquisition in the Bibliotheca Sacra, April 1864, pp. 319-347.

With regard to the place where this work was composed, St. John distinctly declares that he was in Patmos when he had the apocalyptic visions (Rev. i. 9): the only question is whether he recorded them immediately, or not till after his liberation and return to Ephesus. In favour of the first branch of the alternative is x. 4, where he describes himself as at once beginning to write. But we can scarcely come to a certain conclusion on this point. As to the date, critics are not agreed whether St. John was banished under Nero or under Domitian. The testimony of Irenæus is distinct for the last-named emperor. It has been thought, however, that some passages (as i. 7, ii. 9, iii. 9, vi. 12, 16, xi. 1) were composed before the destruction of Jerusalem; and expositors who interpret the seven kings (xvii. 10) of Roman emperors cannot afford to go so far as Domitian. But there is little force in the supposition referred to; and the application of the prophecy to individual monarchs is not to be allowed. Besides, it is very doubtful whether Nero's persecution extended to the east. The only reason of any weight is taken from the language, more rough, as has been noted above, than that of the other works of St. John. Indisputably, if the Revelation were written early, we might well imagine the apostle using his Galilean Greek in it; while his long residence in Asia Minor would refine his speech, and enable him to compose his Gospel in a much better style. It must be allowed that there is force in this; but it can hardly overbalance the positive testimony before referred to. We may venture therefore to place the date in 95 or 96 A.D.

The scope of this book is indicated in i. 19: it was to make known the existing state of the Asiatic churches, 'the things which are,' and to reveal the future history of the Christian church through its long pilgrimage to its eternal resting-place, 'the things which shall be hereafter.' Hence we may thus distribute the contents:

After the title (i. 1-3) and introduction (4-9) we have—

- I. The first vision, in which epistles with suitable warnings, exhortations, reproofs, and promises are dictated to the seven churches in Asia (10—iii. 22).
- II. Other visions, unfolding the mystery of God in the future fortunes of the church, and the downfall of all her enemies, till the final glorious triumph (iv. 1—xxii. 5).
- III. In conclusion there is a solemn asseveration of the truth of what had been spoken, a blessing on those who keep the sayings of this prophecy, corresponding to that in i. 3, and a warning to expect their speedy accomplishment, with a final benediction (xxii. 6-21).

Of course no interpretation of this book can be given here; and the reader must be referred to the works of professed commentators. It can only be said that there have been three main schools of expositors:—

1. The historical, who interpret according to the course of events from the earliest age to the present time, marking fulfilments in the successive facts of history.
2. The præterists, who consider that the whole or nearly all was long ago fulfilled in the victory of Christianity over heathenism and Judaism.
3. The futurists, who believe that, with the exception of the seven epistles, the prophecy refers exclusively to things which have not yet come to pass.

But every devout reader, even though he may be unable fully to unravel the symbolic visions of the book, will find enough in it for profit. He cannot fail to see somewhat of the conflict in which the Christian church has to contend, and to learn the glorious rewards of victory. He will be stirred up therefore to a circumspect and holy walk, and will be encouraged by the gracious invitations and remarkable promises abounding herein to press onwards in holy hope towards the blessed end. An historical interpretation by no means excludes a higher spiritual fulfilment.

Commentaries on the Revelation are almost innumerable. Newton's Dissertations on the Prophecies, the expositions of Woodhouse (1805), and Gauntlett (1821), and Elliott's Horæ Apocalyptice, of which several editions have been published, are valuable works.

REVENUE. It does not appear that there was any stated public revenue in the earlier times of the Hebrew polity. Imposts there were for religious purposes, as, besides the ordinary offerings, the census-money (Exod. xxx. 11-16); but we read of none of a political cast. Great works—as the erection of the tabernacle—were completed from free-will contributions (xxxvi. 3-7). But, when the people desired kingly rule, Samuel warned them that a king must have a revenue (1 Sam. viii. 10-18); whereas he, as a judge, and most probably the judges who preceded him, had not only oppressed no man, but had not even received anything from the community (xii. 3-5). Of course, unprincipled men, as Samuel's own sons, had plundered and oppressed them (viii. 3). But these were discreditable exceptions. Under the monarchy there were stated revenues. They arose from various sources. Such were the customary presents, which oriental sovereigns expect (x. 27, xvi. 20), and the tenth part of the produce of fields and vineyards, flocks, &c. (viii. 15, 17). It was probably in the collection and management of these dues that the officers mentioned in 1 Kings iv. 7; 1 Chron. xxvii. 25-31, were employed. Other items of public revenue in the Hebrew commonwealth have been elsewhere specified. See KING, p. 511. In later times, under Persian and Roman rule, various taxes and duties were collected (Ezra vi. 8; Neh. v. 18; Matt. xxii. 17-21). See PUBLICAN, TAX.

RE'ZEPH (a stone, heated to roast meat or bake bread upon). A place which was destroyed by the Assyrian kings (2 Kings xix. 12; Isai. xxxvii. 12). Nine cities still bearing a similar name are enumerated. Possibly the ancient Rezepf may be identified with that between Racca and Emesa (Hums), a day's journey west of the Euphrates; see Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. ii. p. 96.

REZ'IA (delight). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 39).

RE'ZIN (stable, firm).—1. A king of Damascus who made alliance with Pekah king of Israel against Judah. He was slain by the king of Assyria (2 Kings xv. 37, xvi. 5, 6, 9; Isai. vii. 1, 4, 8, viii. 6, ix. 11).—2. One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 48; Neh. vii. 50).

RE'ZON (prince). An officer of Hadadezer king of Zobah, who fled from him when David subdued the Syrians, and collected a band, at the head of which he led a predatory life, till at length he seized Damascus, and established himself as sovereign there, possibly at the end of Solomon's reign, to whom he was a bitter enemy (1 Kings xi. 23-25).

RHEG'TUM (a breach, broken off). An Italian city on the south-west coast over-against Sicily (Acts xxviii. 13). It was a colony of Chalcis in Eubœa, and was in the territory of the Brutti. It is now a town of Calabria and called Reggio.

RHE'SA (head). A name found in the genealogy of our Lord (Luke iii. 27). There is great probability that this is not a personal name, but the title given to the princes of the captivity. Accordingly Dr. Mill (Myth. Interp. of Gospels, 2nd edit. p. 178) suggests that the Rhesa of St. Luke may be the Hananiah of 1 Chron. iii. 19; Hananiah being the head or prince after his father Zerubbabel. Lord A. Hervey supposes Rhesa to designate Zerubbabel himself; the title, originally a gloss against his name, having slipped into the text. See Genealogies of Jesus Christ, chap. iv. § 5, pp. 110-114.

RHINOCEROS (Isai. xxxiv. 7, marg.) See UNICORN.

RHO'DA (rose, rose-tree). A damsel in the house of Mary mother of John Mark (Acts xii. 12-15).

RHODES. A well-known island off the coast of Asia Minor, over-against Caria. It was very fertile, enjoyed a delightful climate, and as it lay convenient for commerce was well-peopled at an early period. It was in the fifth century before Christ that the city of Rhodes was built. The Rhodians were skilful sailors; and for a long time their fleets ruled the seas. They retained a degree of liberty under Roman supremacy; and it was not till the reign of Vespasian that Rhodes became a Roman province. There was a Jewish population there in Maccabean times (1 Macc. xv. 23); and the more modern history of Rhodes, as the strong-hold of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, is very interesting. The present population of the island is about 20,000. St. Paul touched there on his voyage from Miletus to Palestine (Acts xxi. 1).

RHOD'OCUS (2 Macc. xii. 21). A Jewish traitor.

RHO'DUS (1 Macc. xv. 23). Rhodes.

RI'BAI (for whom Jehovah pleads). The father of Ittai one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 29; 1 Chron. xi. 31).

RIBAND (Numb. xv. 38). See HEM OF GARMENT.

RIB'LAH (fertility). A city on the north-east frontier of Palestine, in the territory of Hamath, on the great line of road which led from Babylonia into Judea. It was here that Jehoahaz was put in bonds by Pharaoh-nechoh; and here afterwards were the Chaldean head-quarters in Nebuchadnezzar's Invasion (Numb. xxxiv. 11; 2 Kings xxiii. 33, xxv. 6, 20, 21; Jer. xxxix. 5, 6, lii. 9, 10, 26, 27). Traces of this city exist about twenty miles south-west of Hums on the Orontes, still called Ribleh. It is, however, questionable whether the Riblah of Nebuchadnezzar's time is identical with that designated by Moses as a boundary-place of the Israelitish territory. Mr. Grove thinks that this last must have been near Banias (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1041, 1042).

RIDDLE. The Hebrew word so rendered means properly something intricate, i.e. hard to be disentangled or guessed. There is an instance of a riddle in our sense of the term in Judges xiv. 12-19. That so called in Ezek. xvii. 2-10 has more of an allegorical cast. The same original word is rendered 'hard questions' in 1 Kings x. 1. The number of the beast (Rev. xiii. 18) is a scripture riddle on which innumerable expositors have tried their ingenuity. Eastern nations have always been fond of puzzles and sententious expressions; for an account of the books of them which they possess see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., vol. i. p. 172, art. 'Algaz.'

RIGHTEOUS, RIGHTEOUSNESS. Righteousness is moral perfection; and that being is righteous who possesses such perfection. God therefore is righteous, as having righteousness in the highest sense of the word (Psal. cxix. 137; Isai. xlv. 19). But man, created upright, is 'very far gone from original righteousness'; and it is the most interesting question that can be propounded, How are those who have committed sin to be accepted by a righteous God? As the observations made here upon this topic must necessarily be brief, it may be well to present the reader with the substance of De Wette's note, cited with approval by Dr. Alford (The Greek Test., note on Rom. i. 17), where the expression 'the righteousness of God' does not designate his attribute of righteousness, but the righteousness which flows from and is acceptable to him:—

'The Greek dikaionē and the Hebrew tzē-dākh are taken sometimes for "virtue" and "piety" which men possess or strive after; sometimes, imputatively, for "freedom from blame," or "justification." The latter meaning is most usual with Paul: dikaionē is that which is so in the sight of God (Rom. ii. 13), the result of his justifying forensic judgment, or of "imputation" (iv. 5). It may certainly be imagined that a man might obtain justification by fulfilling the law: in that case his righteousness is an "own righteousness" (x. 3), a "righteousness of the law" (Phil. iii. 9). But it is impossible for him to obtain a "righteousness of his own" which at the same time shall avail before God (Gal. ii. 16). The Jews not only have not fulfilled the law (Rom. iii. 9-19), but could not fulfil it (vii. 7-25): the Gentiles likewise have rendered themselves obnoxious to the divine wrath (i. 24-32). God has ordained that the whole race should be included in disobedience. Now, if man is to become righteous from being unrighteous, this can happen only by God's grace, because God declares him righteous (iii. 24; Gal. iii.

8), the word signifying not only negatively to acquit (as in Exod. xxiii. 7; Isai. v. 23; Rom. ii. 13), but positively to declare righteous; never, however, "to make righteous" by transformation, or imparting of moral strength by which moral perfection may be attained. Justification must be taken, as the old protestant dogmatists rightly took it, in a forensic sense, i.e. imputatively: God justifies for Christ's sake (iii. 22-28), on condition of faith in him as Mediator: the result of his justification is "righteousness of faith"; and, as he imparts it freely, it is "righteousness of God." . . . This justification is certainly an objective act of God; but it must also be subjectively apprehended, as its condition is subjective. It is the acquittal from guilt, and cheerfulness of conscience, attained through faith in God's grace in Christ, the very frame of mind which would be proper to a perfectly-righteous man, if such there were—the harmony of the spirit with God, peace with God. All interpretations which overlook the fact of imputation are erroneous.'

It may be added in the words of Hooker (Disc. on Justification, 3): 'There is a glorifying righteousness of men in the world to come, as there is a justifying and sanctifying righteousness here. The righteousness wherewith we shall be clothed in the world to come is both perfect and inherent. That whereby here we are justified is perfect but not inherent. That whereby we are sanctified is inherent but not perfect.'

RIMMON (perhaps the exalted). A Syrian idol-god (2 Kings v. 18). A trace of this deity is found in the name Tabrimon, one of the royal line of Syria (1 Kings xv. 18). It is possible that the word may signify (as Rimmon, the city, below) a pomegranate, the symbol of generative power; or the name may be an abbreviated form of Hadarimmon, and the god be kindred with Adonis, so styled after the pomegranate, which was sacred to him. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Rimmon, 5'; Kell, Comm. on Kings, vol. i. p. 186.

RIMMON (id.). A Benjamite of the town of Beeroth, father of the two men who assassinated Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 2, 5, 9).

RIMMON (a pomegranate).—1. A city in the south of Palestine, originally allotted to Judah, afterwards to Simeon (Josh. xv. 32, xix. 7, in the last place called Remmon; 1 Chron. iv. 32). It is the town mentioned in Zech. xiv. 10. There can be little doubt that this is the En-rimmon of Neh. xi. 29, that in Joshua and Chronicles Ain and Rimmon should not be separated, and that this Rimmon may be identified with Um er-Rumāmin: see Wilton's Negeb, pp. 229-233.—2. A rock or peak north-east of Goba and Michmash, near the desert, to which the remnant of the Benjamites retreated after the destruction of their tribe (Judges xx. 45, 47, xxi. 13). This is now called Rimmon: it is a conspicuous conical hill. There was probably a town on it like the present village, or close at hand.—3. A town in the territory of Zebulun, but assigned to the Merarite Levites (1 Chron. vi. 77). It is called in our translation of Josh.

xix. 13 Remmon-methoar; but 'methoar' is no part of the name; the words of the clause should be rendered 'it (the border) passed on to Rimmon, and stretched to Neah.' This place is the modern Rimmaneh, in the neighbourhood of picturesque hills crowded with ruins.

RIM'MON-PA'REZ (pomegranate of the breach). A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 19, 20).

RING. The orientals have always been fond of ornamenting themselves with rings. There are two Hebrew words which are ren-

1

2

3

Rings and signets, Egyptian. From originals in British Museum.

1. With name of a king, successor to Amenoph III.
2. I am the servant of Bast (Pasht).
3. Gold and lapis-lazuli, with title of Queen Hatasu, Thebes.

dered 'ring:' of these hwhtham signifies a seal or signet-ring (Exod. xxviii. 11, 21; Job xxxviii. 14, xli. 15; Jer. xxii. 24); tabbaath, a signet-ring (Exod. xxxv. 22; Esth. iii. 10; Isai. iii. 21), or a ring of any kind (Exod. xxv. 12, xxvi. 24, xxviii. 28). The signet-ring was worn by the Hebrews on the right hand (Jer. xxii. 24; comp. Eccles. xlix. 11). Sometimes however, as it is in Persia at the present day, it was suspended on the breast by a string (Gen. xxxviii. 18; comp. Sol. Song viii. 6). Many rings of which specimens have been preserved were worn by the Egyptians. A king committing his signet-ring to any one created him thereby prime minister (Gen. xli. 42; Esth. iii. 10, viii. 2; comp. 1 Macc. vi. 15). Possibly the giving of a ring in Luke xv. 22 may imply the reinvestment of the returned son with authority, at least dignity, in the household.

Egyptian rings.

Porcelain rings.

RIN'NAH (a shout). One of Judah's prosperity (1 Chron. iv. 20).

RIP'HATH (a crusher?). A son of Gomer (Gen. x. 3), the location of whose descendants it is not easy to trace. Gomer however being probably Bactria, Riphath may designate the colonists of the Bactrian empire, who extended themselves among the Riphæan or Ripæan mountains. These may be supposed to be that western branch of the Uralian chain in which the Don rises: they stretch away southward to the Caspian, towards the mountains of Circassia; though some would have them the Carpathian range. In 1 Chron. i. 6 certain copies have Diphath.

RIS'SAH (a ruin). One of the stations of the Israelites while passing through the desert (Numb. xxxiii. 21, 22).

RITH'MAH (broom). Another of the stations of the Israelites, as it appears, in the wilderness of Paran (Numb. xii. 16, xxxiii. 18, 19).

RIVER. Many streams are termed in our version rivers which are really but brooks or winter-torrents: see BROOK. The only river of Palestine deserving the name is the Jordan. But of course the rivers of other countries are often named in scripture.

The word in general use has commonly the proper name of the river added to it, as 'the river Euphrates' (Gen. xv. 18), 'the river Chebar' (Ezek. i. 1, 3). Sometimes it has the name of the region through which the stream flows, as 'the river of Egypt (Gen. xv. 18), 'the river of Gozan' (2 Kings xvii. 6). In the plural it is thus found, 'the rivers of Damascus' (v.12), 'the rivers of Babylon,' i.e. the Euphrates and its canals (Psal. cxxxvii. 1), 'the rivers of Ethiopia' (Isai. xviii. 1; Zeph. iii. 10). 'The river' generally signifies the Euphrates (Gen. xxxi. 21; Exod. xxiii. 31), but in Isai. xix. 5 the Nile. There is another word, of Egyptian origin, always applied to the Nile (Gen. xli. 1; Exod. i. 22, ii. 3, vii. 15, 18), except in Dan. xii. 5, 6, 7. In the plural it means the canals through which Nile water was distributed through the country. There are other words which cannot be here noticed. 'The Hebrew language has a wonderful copiousness of expression for rivers, brooks, and springs. For these three words of our own language it has not less than eight or ten, each of which conveyed its proper distinctive sense to the Hebrew ear' (Dr. Lyman's Palestine and the Desert, in Biblioth. Sac., Oct. 1864, pp. 752, &c.). The 'river of Egypt' was generally, though perhaps not always, the Nile: see EGYPT, RIVER OF. A writer, however, in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible (vol. iii. pp. 1046-1048), believing that the Egyptian kingdom was bounded by the eastern branch of the Nile, regards the Nile as invariably designated by the phrase, whether nâhâr or nâhhal be the Hebrew word used.

A river is often figuratively put for abundance and prosperity (Isai. xlvi. 18, lxxvi. 12).

RIZ'PAH (a coal, a hot stone for baking). A concubine of Saul whom Abner was accused for appropriating, as if thereby aiming at the crown (2 Sam. iii. 7). This caused a breach between him and Ish-bosheth. Her two sons were delivered to the Gibeonites to be hanged; and the story of her affliction as she watched her dead is peculiarly touching (2 Sam. xxi. 8-11).

ROAD. See HIGH-WAY. The word is used in 1 Sam. xxvii. 10 in the sense of raid or inroad.

ROBBERY (Exod. xxii. 1-13). See PUNISHMENTS, p. 741, THEIF. On Phil. ii. 6, where the word occurs, commentaries may be consulted. Probably the meaning is 'not a thing to be caught at,' i.e. Christ, in the days of his humiliation, waived, did not grasp, his rightful supremacy. See E. H. Bickersteth's Comment., note on the place. Alford translates 'regarded not as self-enrichment his equality with God.'

ROBE. See DRESS. Robes (1 Kings xxii. 10, 30). Royal apparel.

ROBO'AM (Matt. i. 7). The Greek form of Rehoboam.

ROCK. Besides the ordinary meaning of the term 'rock' it is frequently used in a figurative way, or for illustration in a parable; as for a firm basis (Matt. vii. 24, 25, xvi. 18), for a strong-hold (Numb. xxiv. 21), to indicate a hard, careless, and obstinate disposition (Jer. v. 3; Luke viii. 6). And by an easy metaphor the term is applied to God as being immovable, a strong defence to those that trust in him (Deut. xxxii. 4, 15; Psal. xviii. 2, 31).

ROD. This, the frequent rendering of two Hebrew words, ordinarily means a common stick, or a shepherd's staff (Exod. iv. 2, 4, 20; Lev. xxvii. 32, and elsewhere). Sometimes it signifies a staff of office, hence rule or stern authority (Psal. ii. 9, cxxxv. 3). It is also a support (xxiii. 4), or a rod for chastising (Prov. x. 13; Isai. x. 5); and thus it comes to denote the fatherly correction with which God visits his people (Mic. vi. 9).

RODA'NIM. This word occurs in 1 Chron. i. 7 in some copies. If it could be proved to be the right reading, the Rhodians would most probably be meant; but it is more accurately, as in the text of Gen. x. 41, DODANIM, which see.

ROE or ROE-BUCK. An animal belonging to the Cervidæ, a family of solid-horned ruminants. The roe-buck, Capreolus dorcas, is one of the most agile and beautiful of European deer. It is shy and cautious, not herding in troops, but living singly or in small companies, consisting of the male, female, and young. It is skilful in avoiding the hunters. But the word so rendered in our version does not designate a single species, but comprises generally gazelles and antelopes. They were prized for their elegance (Sol. Song ii. 7, iii. 5), were fleet (2 Sam. ii. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 8; Prov. vi. 5), timid (Isai. xiii. 14), and were among the animals whose flesh might be eaten (Deut. xii. 15, 22, xiv. 5, xv. 22). It was and is still regarded as a delicacy (1 Kings iv. 23).

RO'GEL (a fuller) (1 Kings i. 9, marg.). See EN-ROGEL.

RO'GELIM (fullers' place). A town in Gilead (2 Sam. xvii. 27, xix. 31), perhaps within the territory of Gad.

ROH'GAH (outcry). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 34).

RO'IMUS (1 Esdr. v. 8). Rehum (Ezra ii. 2).

ROLL (Ezra vi. 1, 2; Isai. viii. 1; Jer. xxxvi. 2, 6, 20, 21, 23, 25, 28, 29, 32; Ezek. ii. 9, iii. 1, 2, 3; Zech. v. 1, 2). See MANUSCRIPTS, WRITING.

ROLLING THING (Isai. xvii. 13). See WHEEL.

ROMAM'TI-E'ZER (I have exalted his help). A chief of one of the courses of singers (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 31).

ROMAN. This word is used in two senses: 1. Nationally (John xi. 48). 2. With reference to civil privileges (Acts xv. 37, 38, xxii. 25-27). St. Paul was not a native of Rome, or born in Italy, but he had by birth the rights of a Roman citizen.

ROMANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE. We are not informed in scripture how or when the gospel was first preached in Rome. But, as we find in the assemblage whom Peter addressed on the day of pentecost 'strangers of Rome,' that is, Roman Jews who were then at Jerusalem (Acts ii. 10), we may very well conceive that some would carry back the glad tidings to their people in the great city, and that thus the religion of Jesus would be known there. In no long time the word of God would increase; and disciples would be gathered into the church. We have every reason to believe this to be a fact, because St. Paul writing to them declares that they had gained a noble reputation; for their 'faith' was 'spoken of throughout the whole world' (Rom. i. 8). And this was no recent burst of Christian teaching and Christian zeal: for years there had been believers in Rome. Again and again the apostle had purposed visiting them (13): it was his desire, he expressly says, 'for many years' (xv. 23). This church was made up mainly of Gentile converts; for, when St. Paul, some years after his letter was despatched, was actually in Rome, and had called together the chief Jews there, neither their language nor behaviour was that of a community out of whom members had joined the Christian church (Acts xxviii. 17-29). They seem rather to have kept aloof from the movement: see Dr. Alford's note on Acts xxviii. 21. And perhaps the greater number of converts in Rome were of Greek origin. No great stress indeed is to be laid on the fact that the apostle wrote to them in Greek; Greek being then almost an universal language throughout the empire. But on examining the names of those whom he salutes (Rom. xvi. 3-15) we discover but two or three that were really Roman: the great majority were Jewish or Greek. And the epistle itself confirms this view. From the topics urged and the course of arguing we may reasonably conclude that the Roman church included some Jews but more Gentiles—Gentiles, however, not unacquainted with Jewish modes of thought.

Little need be said as to the genuineness of this epistle: from the earliest times the evidence is plain and continuous, that it was written by Paul. Bleek would find allusions to it in the epistle to the Hebrews and in the first of St. Peter (Einleit. in N. T., p. 215). More certainly may such be discovered in the epistles of Clement of Rome and Polycarp; and somewhat later the testimonies of Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian are distinct enough (see Alford, Proleg., sect. 1). But, though no one has denied the Pauline origin of this letter generally, yet certain modern critics, imitating in some respect the ancient heretic Marcion, have questioned Rom. xv., xvi., and some other portions, not so much denying that they were written by Paul as supposing that they were separate compositions adjoined to the epistle. It is not worth while to notice such theories.

The date and place of writing may be readily ascertained. The apostle was then on his way to Jerusalem (xv. 25), and was lodging with Gaius (xvi. 23). But Gaius belonged to the Corinthian church (1 Cor. i. 14); and Paul, we are told (having left Ephesus), 'abode three months in Greece,' just before he proceeded to Jerusalem which he hoped to reach by pentecost (Acts xx. 1-3, 16). Putting these notices together and observing that prior to his quitting Ephesus he had expressed his intention of going to Rome (xix. 21), and that he commends to the Christians there the deaconess Phebe of Cenchrea (a port of Corinth) who appears to have been the bearer of the letter (Rom. xvi. 1), we cannot doubt that it was written at Corinth about the beginning of 58 A.D.

The object with which the apostle wrote is evident from the epistle itself. He had heard much of the Roman Christians (i. 8), of their faith, and of the difficulties with which they were beset from the mixed character of their body, and their peculiar position in the capital. Moreover, it was specially fitting that he, the apostle of the Gentiles, should have his mind directed to that mainly Gentile community, and the Gentile population around them. Yet further, from the salutations already noticed, it would seem that many of Paul's helpers and probably disciples were the most prominent of the Roman believers, and had been the instruments, if not of first planting the gospel there, yet certainly of guiding and adding to the converts at Rome. Yet again, they had never been visited by an apostle. For else Paul would not, according to his maxim (xv. 20), have been so anxious to see them. Spiritual gifts, therefore, for their establishment (i. 11) were needed. And it is a noteworthy remark of Bleek that there could not have been at the time a regularly-constituted church at Rome. For he does not address the 'church' (7) as he so generally does, or speak of 'bishops and deacons' (comp. Phil. i. 1), appointed ministers; some of his expressions importing that there were only private communities (Rom. xvi. 5, 14, 15) instead of a public body' (ubi supr., p. 412). We may well understand, then, how necessary it was to lay down and enforce the great principles of Christian doctrine, exhibiting the relative position of Jew and Gentile, and leading them to realize their union in Christ (Rom. xv. 5-9). The epistle to the Galatian church had been written—it is probable—not very long before. The apostle had had his mind filled with that great gospel truth, justification by faith, which he had expounded to them, to correct the errors introduced by a Judaizing party. He would surely feel that a still more elaborate exposition of the doctrine was needed for the Romans in their position, not indeed meant for them only but to form that magnificent body of Christian teaching which should be for all time the standard of truth as far as the word of the gospel should extend. Here was a noble object: the opportunity was offered during the stay at Corinth; and we have the result in these precious words, not alone of man's wisdom, but according to the mind of the Spirit; the particular directions of other epistles appearing here in their most expanded form.

As to the style much cannot be here said. It is full and energetic. The zeal of the apostle's character appears in his writings. He hurries on regardless of nicely-accurate and formal expression, placing in the strongest light the idea he wishes to illustrate, propounding and answering objections, and frequently involving himself in long parentheses, which yet he marvelously succeeds in making to forward his main argument. He evinces much rhetorical power; and, with a fondness for antithesis and play upon words, he soars occasionally into the highest flights of eloquent demonstration, and invests his great subject with such a glow of divine radiance that the reader takes no note of the roughness of language. But it is not always rough; it is moulded by a skilful hand, and made thoroughly expressive, while sometimes it flows on in long-drawn harmony with cadences of grandeur which no ear will willingly forget. Even had not Paul been an inspired apostle, he would have stood in a very prominent rank among the mighty masters of speech: see Rom. vii. 7-25, viii. 22-59, xi. 25-36.

Various divisions of this epistle have been proposed. Bleek would distribute it into three parts, and Bengel into five. Perhaps the more natural arrangement is to regard it as having:

I. An introduction (Rom. i. 1-15).

II. Doctrinal teaching (16-xi. 36); comprising the general statement that salvation to Jew and Gentile comes by faith (i. 16, 17). This proposition is proved by showing, 1. that all are under condemnation (18-iii. 20), 2. that the righteousness revealed by the gospel being of faith is universal (21-v. 19). 3. The moral consequences of justification are exhibited (20-viii. 39). 4. The rejection of the Jews is discussed, the reason of it stated, while it is shown not to be final (ix. 1-xi. 36).

III. The hortatory or practical part (xii. 1-xv. 13). 1. Inculcating holiness of life (xii., xiii.). 2. With instructions how to behave towards the weaker brethren (xiv. 1-xv. 13).

IV. The conclusion (14-xvi. 27), includes, 1. Personal explanations (xv. 14-33), 2. Salutations (xvi. 1-23), 3. Benediction and doxology (24-27).

Among the numerous commentaries on this epistle that by Calvin may be specially mentioned. Of modern commentators Stuart and Vaughan deserve notice. They have been repeatedly printed.

ROME, CITY AND EMPIRE OF, OR ROMAN EMPIRE. Little can here be said of 'that great city which reigned over the kings of the earth' (Rev. xvii. 18). It is not mentioned in the Old Testament. Its name first appears in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. i. 10, and elsewhere). Of course we find it in the New Testament, first in Acts ii. 10. Descriptions of ancient Rome and of its modern representative must be sought in other books: see Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul, chap. xxiv.; and Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Geogr. The population has been variously estimated from half a million to four, eight, or even fourteen millions. Gibbon's calculation is reasonable and probably (400 A.D.) near the truth, 1,200,000 (Decl. and Fall, chap. xxxi. vol. v. pp. 275-278, edit. 1838).

The Roman empire was raised to its highest pitch by Augustus; a few additions to its provinces being subsequently made, as Britain under Claudius, and Dacia under Trajan. Gibbon observes 'that the empire was above 2000 miles in breadth from the wall of Antoninus and the northern limits of Dacia to mount Atlas and the tropic of Cancer; that it extended in length more than 3000 miles from the western ocean to the Euphrates; that it was situated in the finest part of the temperate zone, between 24° and 56° north lat.; and that it was supposed to contain above 1,600,000 square miles, for the most part of fertile and well-cultivated land' (ubi sup., vol. i. p. 46). The population he puts at 120,000,000 (ibid., p. 75).

The condition of the Roman world was in God's providence well suited for the introduction and spread of the gospel at the time of our Lord's appearance. The more civilized nations of the earth were under one government; and by means of one or two languages, Greek in the east and Latin in the west, men might make themselves everywhere understood. Through all the provinces there was ready communication, facilitated by the peace which generally prevailed in the whole extent of the empire. Moreover, the despotism which reduced all subjects to the same level, and the corruption which had grown through the long night of heathenism, and the felt insufficiency of the popular mythology and the refinements of philosophers for the requirements and happiness of men, gave free scope to a religion which taught that there was a beneficent Creator, who was no respecter of persons, and who in pity for the ignorance of man had sent a divine Teacher, to procure and bestow a higher happiness than reason ever had conceived. At the fitting moment the proper remedy was applied to the world's need (Gal. iv. 4). It was a wise providence that selected the days of this empire for the setting up of 'a kingdom which shall never be destroyed' (Dan. ii. 44).

ROOF (Deut. xxii. 8, and frequently elsewhere). See HOUSE, p. 397.

ROOM. The word, as used ('uppermost' or 'chief room') in Matt. xxiii. 6; Mark xii. 39; Luke xiv. 7, 8, 9, xx. 46, implies the highest place on the first couch, on which men reclined at meals, that being as we say, the seat of honour. For 'upper room' as an apartment (xxii. 12) see HOUSE, p. 397.

ROOT. The Hebrew word so translated besides its literal signification is often used figuratively. Individuals and communities are poetically likened to a tree: the root then designates the chief part mentioned, as of the wicked (Isai. v. 24), of Ephraim (Hos. ix. 16). It also implies the lowest part of anything, and so a stock, race (Isai. xiv. 29), the seat or dwelling of a people (Judges v. 14), ground of a dispute (Job xix. 28). The same word signifies a sprout; and thus is used metaphorically of the Messiah (Isai. xi. 10).

ROSE. The original word thus translated occurs twice (Sol. Song ii. 1; Isai. xxxv. 1). It is not clear what flower is meant. Gesenius is inclined to believe it the meadow saffron, Colchicum autumnale; and this is favoured by the etymology, as it is compounded of two words signifying 'acid' and 'bulb.' Dr. Thomson imagines it may be the mallow, malva, the Arabic name of which resembles the Hebrew word. He says that this flower abounds in Sharon, and is found large, double, and variegated; some being perennial and growing into a prettily-shaped bush (The Land and the Book, pp. 112, 513). Dr. Kalisch thinks the Cistus roseus the rose of Sharon; for this plant is plentiful there (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 614). But roses certainly have flourished in Palestine; and the names of several species are known; as the white garden rose, Rosa alba, the damask rose, R. damascena, the evergreen rose, R. sempervirens; and in many parts of western Asia the rose is highly fragrant and much cultivated. See a notice of the different flowers supposed by Ginsburg, The Song of Songs, note on ii, 1, p. 141.

ROSH (head, chief).—1. One of the sons of Benjamin (Gen. xlv. 21).—2. The word occurs in Ezek. xxxviii. 2, 3, xxxix. 1, where in our version it is translated; but it is probably a proper name: 'the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal.' Gesenius is disposed to believe that the Russians are intended. A Scythian people are described by Byzantine writers as in the tenth century under the name of Rhôs inhabiting the northern part of Taurus, and, by an Arabian author, as Rûs dwelling on the Volga. Others imagine that they find the nation of Rosh in the Roxalani, or by the Caucasus. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Ros'; 'D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., art. 'Rous,' vol. iii, pp. 137, 138.

ROSH (Deut. xxix. 18, marg.). See GALL.
ROSIN (Ezek. xxvii. 17, marg.). Here balsam is meant, as in the text. See BALM. But the 'rosin' of the Apocrypha (Song of the Three Child. 23) was probably naphtha; which is a natural product of Babylonia and other parts. The springs of it in Kurdistan are described as yielding abundantly.

RUBY. A precious gem of a rose-red colour, belonging to the class corundum. The word occurs in several places in our version (Job xxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 15, viii. 11, xx. 15, xxxi. 10; Lam. iv. 7); but it is not probable that the ruby is meant. Some critics are disposed to understand pearls. Pearls, however, would ill suit the last-cited passage. Mr. Carey endeavours to meet the difficulty by observing that pearls are sometimes of a slightly-reddish hue (The Book of Job, note on xxviii. 18, pp. 328, 329). But it seems more reasonable to understand, with other critics, red coral. For the sardius (Exod. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10; Ezek. xxviii. 13) the margin gives 'ruby.' See SARDIUS. Perhaps the word translated agate really means ruby. See AGATE.

RUDIMENTS (Col. ii. 8, 20). See ELEMENTS.

RUE. A plant on which the Pharisees were careful to pay tithe (Luke xi. 42). Ruta graveolens, common rue, is a native of the south of Europe, a half-shrubby plant of a peculiar yellowish-green colour. Every part of it is marked by transparent dots, filled with volatile oil. Rue possesses powerful stimulant, anti-spasmodic, and tonic properties. The odour is peculiar and strong, the taste of the leaves intensely bitter and aromatic. Rue is sometimes called 'herb of grace,' and cultivated as an ornamental plant.

RUFUS (red). A Christian whom St. Paul saluted, possibly the son of Simon the Cyrenian on whom was laid our Lord's cross (Mark xv. 21; Rom. xvi. 13).

RUHA'MAH (compassionated, having obtained mercy). A word symbolically used (Hos. ii. 1) to indicate the restoration of Israel and admission of Gentiles to God's favour.

RULER. See PRINCE. Ruler of the synagogue (Mark v. 22). See SYNAGOGUE.

RU'MAH (lofty). A place named as the habitation of the father of Jehoiakim's mother (2 Kings xxiii. 36). It may be the same with Arumah.

RUSH (Job viii. 11; Isai. ix. 14, xix. 15, xxxv. 7). See BULRUSH, REED. In the proverbial phrase 'branch and rush,' the word for branch signifies the palm-branch, compared with which the rush or reed growing in low marshy tracts is very humble.

RUST (Matt. vi. 19, 20; James v. 3). Two different Greek words are rendered 'rust.' The first has a more general meaning, perhaps equivalent to our 'wear and tear.' 'Tarnish' might better express the sense in the last-named passage.

RUTH (female friend). A Moabitish damsel who was married to Mahlon, the son of Elimelech of Beth-lehem-Judah, who with his family had retired into Moab during the pressure of famine on his own country. Elimelech and his two sons died in Moab; and Naomi his widow after an absence of ten years prepared to return into the land of Israel, having learned that the famine had ceased. Her daughters-in-law were inclined to accompany her; but she kindly remonstrated with them; and Ruth alone, who had probably become a proselyte to the Hebrew faith, held to her resolution of abiding with Naomi. It was a great sacrifice; for Ruth was childless: she was quitting, it would seem, her own mother (Ruth i. 8): she was going into a strange land with one who was now desolate and in poverty. But her character is beautifully exhibited by those most touching words in which she declared her fixed determination: 'Entreat me not to leave thee,' &c. (16, 17). It was the beginning of barley-harvest when the two reached Beth-lehem; and Ruth went to glean in the fields of Boaz. Her blameless conduct attracted notice; and after harvest (barley and wheat) was over, she was desired by Naomi to claim marriage with Boaz as a near relative of her late husband, according to the levirate law (Deut. xxv. 5-10). A still nearer kinsman having waived his prior right, Boaz married Ruth, and she bore him a son, Obed, who was the grandfather of David.

It is not easy to fix the time of these occurrences: it is simply said (Ruth i. 1) that they were 'when the judges ruled.' Neither does the genealogy (iv. 18-22) help us much, because, as Boaz was the son of Salmon by Rachab (generally believed to be Rahab of Jericho) (Matt. i. 5), we have but three persons intervening between Rahab and David, a period of about 360 years. Various explanations have been suggested; as that David's ancestors were peculiarly blessed with length of days: Boaz certainly was in years at the time of his marriage (Ruth iii. 10); and Jesse was far advanced in life when David was a lad (1 Sam. xvii. 12); or that certain names were omitted in the public genealogical tables; or that the sacred writer mentions the most eminent of the series. Laying various considerations together, perhaps we may reasonably believe that Elimelech was contemporary with Gideon; in whose days we know there was a famine caused by the ravages of the Midianites (Judges vi. 1-6), about 1240 B.C. The time of Eli fixed by Josephus is obviously too low.

RUTH, THE BOOK OF. This book is a kind of appendix to that of Judges, and introduction to that of Samuel. Critics have amused themselves by conjecturing that it is a tale written to enforce the duty of a man, according to the levirate law, to marry his kinswoman, or that it is intended to moderate the dislike entertained in Israel to alliances with foreigners. It is unnecessary to argue seriously against such notions. The book is not a fragmentary episode which might have been spared: it has its special object, to illustrate the source of David's line; and without it the divine purpose would have appeared incomplete. It seemed good to the Holy Spirit to place on record this history of the ancestors of David, who were ancestors of Christ, that the line which had the promise might be distinguished; teaching also that, as there were some of his ancestry introduced from foreign nations into Israel, so Messiah's kingdom should embrace not alone the literal seed of Jacob, but Gentiles too.

The narrative is given with beautiful simplicity; and the spirit of piety evinced in the principal persons of this history is remarkably instructive. We cannot ascertain who the writer of the book was. It has been attributed to Samuel, to Hezekiah, to Ezra. But these are guesses, and not very happy ones. Critics have examined the diction; and some have thought they detected Chaldaisms; so that the book, they say, must have been written very late. Others have endeavoured to explain away this alleged proof by saying that peculiarities of language might have been provincialisms, modes of speech in use at Beth-lehem; and some have gone farther and imagined they were imported from Moab. There is little in all this. The custom originally observed in regard to the levirate law seems at the period of writing to have been well-nigh obsolete: it is described as prevailing in former times (Ruth iv. 7): therefore the history was not composed till a while after the events. The judges are spoken of, as if that kind of government had ceased (i. 1): therefore the composition was probably during the monarchy. But David's name is the last in the pedigree (iv. 22). We shall perhaps not greatly err, then, if we believe that the book of Ruth was written in David's reign or shortly after.

It comprises three sections: I. The account of Naomi's sojourn in Moab (i.). II. The transactions at Beth-lehem (ii., iii., iv. 1-17). III. The pedigree (iv. 18-22).

RYE. The word, so rendered in Exod. ix. 32; Isai. xxviii. 25, is translated 'fiches' in Ezek. iv. 9, 'spelt' in the margin. Rye is a plant of the family of the Gramineæ, bearing naked seeds on a flat ear furnished with awns like barley. It grows on light soils unfit for wheat. But there is little doubt that the plant intended by the Hebrew word is not rye, but SPELT, which see.

S

SABACH'THANI (thou hast forsaken me). One of the words uttered by our Lord on the cross (Matt. xxvii. 46; Mark xv. 34). See ELL, ELL.

SABA'OTH (hosts). The word is left untranslated in Rom. ix. 29; James v. 4. The Lord of Sabaoth is therefore equivalent to the Lord or Jehovah of Hosts, i.e. of the armies of heaven.

SA'BAT (1 Esdr. v. 34). A person not identified.

SA'BAT (1 Macc. xvi. 14). Sebat. See MONTHS.

SABATEAS (1 Esdr. ix. 48). Shabbethal (Neh. viii. 7).

SAB'ATUS (1 Esdr. ix. 28). Zabad (Ezra x. 27).

SAB'BAN (1 Esdr. viii. 63). A strange corruption for Binnui (Ezra viii. 33).

SABBATH. A Hebrew word signifying rest, generally applied to the seventh day of the week observed as a sacred season of cessation from labour, but used also to designate other days or times set apart and sanctified in a similar way (Lev. xxv. 4). The original term sometimes denotes a week (Matt. xxviii. 1; Luke xxiv. 1; Acts xx. 7).

It is first mentioned when, the work of creation through six successive periods being completed, God is said to have rested on the seventh day and to have sanctified it (Gen. ii. 2, 3). We do not find in the records of the ante-diluvian world or in the histories of the early patriarchs any notice of the observance of this day. We do, however, find the division of weeks (viii. 10, 12, xxix. 27, 28); and, as this is an artificial division, it has been argued not without probable reason that the distribution of time into periods of seven days shows that the seven-fold alternation of creative work and rest was acknowledged, and that, following out the analogy, one day in seven must in those early times have been regarded as sacred. The first distinct mention, however, of a weekly sabbath is at the giving of the manna, when the Israelites were commanded to gather on the sixth day as much as would suffice them for two days, seeing that it would not fall on the seventh; and, while ordinarily that which was reserved became corrupt, yet the additional quantity collected and kept according to the divine command would continue wholesome on the sabbath (Exod. xvi. 22-30). There would seem proof from this account that the weekly sabbath was not then first instituted. For, though there were some who went out curiously to see if there were really any fresh deposit of manna on the sabbath, yet the mass of the people gathered a double portion spontaneously on the sixth day

This is inferred from the report carried by the rulers to Moses, as if hardly knowing whether the right course was taken or not. Such a half-questioning report would not have been made, if an order had just before been specially proclaimed through the camp. And, if the people acted spontaneously, they must have been in the habit previously of observing the sabbath: at all events, the observance existed before the giving of the moral law.

Into that law it was solemnly incorporated, with great particularity of detail, reference being made both to the six days' work of creation and the seventh day's rest, and also to the deliverance of Israel from bondage (xx. 8-11; Deut. v. 12-15). They were to remember that they had been bondmen, and to grant their bondmen that rest which they had not been able to enjoy till their deliverance; which thus became to them a fresh inauguration of the weekly sabbath. These two references are not contradictory. It is no uncommon thing for an event or ordinance to be connected with some display of God's power or mercy, and to have afterwards an additional significance imparted. Thus the rainbow must have been a natural phenomenon from the beginning; but it was invested with a special meaning after the flood, when it was taken as a sign of God's covenant with man that he would no more destroy the world by a flood of waters (Gen. ix. 12-17). The passover, again, commemorated the sparing of the first-born of Israel (Exod. xii. 3-23), but subsequently, when the tribes were settled in the promised land, it became also one of the agricultural festivals, to mark the progress of God's bounty in giving them the productions of the earth (Lev. xxiii. 9-14). The new aspect was perfectly consistent with the older one. It may also be remarked that the six days of creative work and the seventh day of rest noted in the commandment by no means define the length of the periods spoken of. Nor does the command for its binding efficacy require that all, be they longer or shorter, should be identically the same in duration. It is enough that there was a seven-fold distribution of working and of rest: that was the point seized on and fitly applied to the seven-fold week of ordinary human life.

The sabbath thus commanded was observed from sunset on one day to sunset on the next (Matt. viii. 16; Mark i. 21-32; Luke iv. 31-40), with great strictness by the Hebrews. They were to abstain from all servile work (Exod. xxiii. 12). The violation of its sanctity was rebellion against God, and punishable with death (xxxv. 2; Numb. xv. 32-36). In the wilderness, as we have seen, they were not to gather manna; and generally they were not to light a fire for culinary purposes, neither to sow nor reap (Exod. xxxiv. 21, xxxv. 3; Numb. xv. 32-36). Neither were they to make a journey. This restriction seems to be based upon Exod. xvi. 29: it was afterwards more precisely defined to intend that only a short specified distance, a sabbath-day's journey, about 2,000 paces or five or six furlongs—grounded on the space prescribed between the ark and the people (Josh. iii. 4), the same being perhaps between the tabernacle and the tents in the wilderness encampment—might be traversed on the sabbath. Yet religious services, though involving labour, such as those of the tabernacle or temple, might be performed. Thus sacrifices might be prepared (Lev. vi. 8-13; Numb. xxviii. 3-10; Matt. xii. 5), and persons be circumcised on the sabbath (John vii. 22, 23). We have little information from the law as to ritual observances or special worship on the sabbath. There was to be an additional burnt-offering of two lambs (Numb. xxviii. 9, 10); and the shew-bread was then to be changed (Lev. xxiv. 8). But in later times it was indisputably the practice to meet in the synagogues, when the sacred writings were read and expounded, and no doubt public prayers offered (Luke iv. 16; Acts xiii. 14, 15, xv. 21). And perhaps the psalms which were composed for the sabbath-day may be taken as testimony that, still earlier, assemblies were held for praise and thanksgiving (see Psal. xcii.: comp. 2 Kings iv. 23; Isai. lvi. 6, 7). Sabbath-observance, like obedience to other laws, would seem in times of national declension to have been little regarded. We find the prophets frequently rebuking the people for their profanation or merely-formal respect of it (i. 13, lviii. 13, 14; Jer. xvii. 21-27; Ezek. xx. 12-24). The neglect of the sabbath was sure to lead to other sins. For the system of recurring festivals and observances was very much based upon the sabbath, or at least on the seven-fold distribution of time. Thus seven weeks were to elapse between the passover and pentecost; and, as the seventh day was to be kept holy, so was the seventh year to be a time of rest, and, when seven weeks of years had passed, then the trumpet of jubilee was to sound through the land.

On the return from the captivity there was a more rigid sanctifying of the sabbath. Nehemiah's exertions probably contributed to it (Neh. xiii. 15-22). In the Maccabean wars the Jews would not at first defend themselves on the sacred day; and, when the necessity of doing so became apparent, they still refrained from attack (1 Macc. ii. 32-41). No trace of such scrupulousness is found in the Old Testament. But gradually Pharisaic tradition overlaid the divine command (see Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 76, vol. ii. pp. 308-310), and observances were insisted on, which made the salutary provision a yoke of bondage. Our Lord rectified this: he showed that 'the sabbath was made for man,' for his welfare and spiritual training, 'not man for the sabbath,' just to be tied to a hard oppressive rule (Mark ii. 27). And by his own example he maintained the liberty of God's children. The Jews accused him of breaking the sabbath (23-26; John ix. 16). He did not break the sabbath: he disregarded indeed the human gloss: he never violated the divine law; just as he repeatedly in other respects made the clear distinction between God's command and human superstition, censuring the formal religionists of the day for making void the commandment of God by their traditions (Matt. xv. 1-9). And similar warnings were given by the apostles (e.g. Col. ii. 16).

It would occupy a large space to enumerate all the observances insisted on by the Jewish rabbins: some brief notice, however, shall be given of the mode in which the sabbath is at present hallowed by that nation. It commences ordinarily at sunset on the Friday, but not later in summer-time than seven p.m.; preparation by cleansing the house, providing the necessary meals, &c., &c., having previously been made. The males of a family attend the synagogue-service and on their return bless their children; after which a hymn to the angels, who are supposed to remain in the dwelling till the sabbath is over, is recited, Prov. xxxi. 10-31 read; and then comes what is termed the sanctification of the sabbath. Two small oblong loaves or twists called chaloth are placed on a table, to represent the two-fold portion of manna, and also wine. After a blessing this bread and wine are distributed; and the evening is closed with supper and a special grace. The next day certain private rites are performed in the family, and the synagogue-services are attended; and the close of the sabbath is marked by the reciting of certain sentences from scripture with a blessing, and the sprinkling of some wine. These are the religious ceremonies. Besides, it is to be noted that they have three meals. Fish is generally procured for the first: they have also a dish called shalit, 'meat, peas, rice, &c. put into a pot, and placed on Friday afternoon in an oven heated for that purpose, or under the ashes, and there left until Saturday noon, when, on being drawn out, it is found still quite warm.' As to work, there are thirty-nine principal occupations which are forbidden, and, moreover, all that are analogous to these; but by certain regulations called 'commixtures' the extreme strictness of sabbath-observance is modified. Thus 'to carry anything from one house to another is unlawful; but, if the householders in a court should join in some article of food, and deposit it in a certain place, the whole court becomes virtually one dwelling, and the inmates are entitled to carry from house to house whatever they please. Also any public place, inclosed on three sides, is made private by means of a wire or rope. It is unlawful to carry a handkerchief loose in the pocket; but, if they pin it to the pocket, or tie it round the waist as a girdle, they may carry it anywhere.' Some of the more burdensome customs are observed by only the very scrupulous; but there is one command obeyed by all: they never light fire, lamp, or candle on the sabbath. Consequently the wealthier Jews employ Gentile servants; and among the humbler classes several families club together to secure the help of a Gentile neighbour. 'Nothing could wound the conscience of a Jew more than to be under the necessity of putting fuel on his fire or snuffing his candles on the sabbath.' Places of amusement may be visited; and, generally speaking, all but the very strict spend the time in recreation and pleasure-seeking (Mills, The British Jews, part ii. chap. iv. pp. 137-146).

There are many questions connected with this subject which have given rise to discussion. Some of them must be briefly noticed.

It is doubted whether the sabbath was merely an Israelitish observance or whether it was intended to apply to the whole human family. In some passages already referred to it is connected with the deliverance from Egypt, and is termed a sign or covenant-symbol of God's promises to Israel. But this reference, it has been shown, was intended for a special purpose; and, if the sabbath was a sign of the Hebrew covenant, that by no means interferes with its higher object. And, when it is stated just after the narrative of creation that God sanctified the seventh day, and when this is alleged in the commandment, and when that commandment is enshrined in the decalogue, confessedly standing in the highest position of the earlier revelation, it does seem hard to conclude that the sabbath was merely a Mosaic rite. Little stress need be laid on the patriarchal division of weeks, or on the traces of such division to be detected in the history of various nations. Rather let it be asked whether this was a salutary observance. Did it tell—not in the minute details with which superstition overloaded it, but in its grand principle and its practical working—for the good of man and beast? Was it a suspension, for the time, of the original destiny, consequent on Adam's sin, of grinding toil? Was it held out rather as a privilege to be welcomed than a burdensome duty uneasily to be discharged? If so, we can hardly imagine that the blessing of the earlier church would be withheld from the later. If the worshipping of God is incumbent on his creatures, and the assembling of themselves together necessary for instruction, and for the fostering of piety, we should naturally expect that provision would be made for this, some time be marked out when worldly cares might be laid aside, and God approached with calm serenity of spirit, and the employment be begun in which saved men shall rejoice for ever in the world above. If it be said that it was typical, that it was a shadow which was to pass away, we must ask, Of what was it typical? and to what was it to give place? No good thing or observance of the earlier covenant was removed except to be replaced by something better, more spiritual, of higher privilege—as legal sacrifice by the oblation of Christ, circumcision by baptism: to what, then, was the sabbath to give place? Surely not to unremitting earthly labour, not to those sensuous enjoyments which debase instead of elevating, which enervate instead of strengthening for renewed duties? If the Hebrew sabbath-rest was typical, it was typical mainly of the rest of eternity; and, as we have not yet entered that rest, we still need in our earthly course some figure of it.

It can hardly be denied that considerations of this kind have their weight; and, seeing that the profanation of the sabbath is always treated as a great moral fault, and that a blessing is pronounced on those, not literally of the seed of Israel, who hallowed it (Isal. lvi. 3-8), it is reasonable to conclude that the command touches, in some measure at least, the inhabitants of the world generally.

There then arises another question: Is it to apply to mankind at large with the same strictness as that with which it bound the Hebrews? This may be answered in the negative. So far as it is part of the ceremonial law it has ceased. We are not prohibited from light and fire, or confined to a narrow space. But as a moral precept of the decalogue, in its spiritual application, it stands unrepealed, to operate with benignant influence upon mankind.

Along with the Jewish sabbath there began to grow up the observance of another day from the time of our Lord's resurrection. And we read in the Christian church of assemblies held on the first day of the week (John xx. 1, 19, 26), and of Christ's presence there, and of the breaking of bread on that day (Acts xx. 7, 8; 1 Cor. xvi. 2), and of a day—we cannot doubt that it was the same—called 'the Lord's-day' (Rev. i. 10). Early Christian writers soon begin to mention it. Justin Martyr repeatedly speaks of it, showing that Christian assemblies were held on the Sunday (Apolog. i. 67), which was observed on account of both the creation and our Lord's resurrection: comp. Dial. cum Tryph., 41. Many other ancient references to the observance of the Lord's day might be produced; but this part of the subject can be only touched on here.

We do not find full cessation of work on this day. But we must remember how impossible under the circumstances this was. The Christian church, like the Israelitish in Egypt, were under the ban of the mighty of the world, compelled for long to hold their very assemblies for worship in private, with doors closed, many of them being the poor of the world—how could they withdraw themselves from their employments, till the gospel had so far prevailed and penetrated that law-makers professed it, and sovereigns gave it free scope? No argument must be pressed against Christian Lord's-day observance, taken from times when, if observed at all, it could only be by stealth. Many things, then, may be unlawful or inexpedient now, many regulations proper, with which heretofore the pressure of persecution interfered. The reason of the thing, guided by general scripture principles, would seem to point out very clearly the due observance of the sacred day. The question being settled for what it was appointed, viz., for rest from worldly cares, and the special service of God, all that may promote such objects becomes imperative, and all that would nullify them forbidden. Physiologists have told us that the human frame requires repose, and that, if one seventh part of time be given to repose from toil, it is a fitting proportion, and the strength will be better kept up. But, laying such a consideration out of question, it seems clear that for God's special worship the thoughts should be collected, the harassing cares of business be laid aside, the dissipation of mere pleasure be foregone. Hence, and not for motives of sour austerity, such business and such pleasure should cease as would indispose mind or body for cheerful engagement in sacred duties. These present higher business than that of the world; and the pleasure of a rightly-ordered mind is greater in them than it can be in worldly gaiety. Still further, we have no right to impose labour on others from which we would free ourselves. And therefore a Christian man's employment ought to be regulated, not only by that which he feels just for himself, but so as not to make others work for his pleasure, others labour that he may repose. Here may properly come in the restraints of human law. Thoughtless persons object that the law of the land can never make men religious. No one is so foolish as to imagine that it can: no one is so fanatical as to attempt it. But the law of a Christian state ought to protect the religious from the pressure of the irreligious, and to provide for the entire freedom of him that will worship God from the encroachments of any business-worker or pleasure-seeker that would interfere with this his rightful freedom.

The day of Christian rest is the first in the week: the Hebrew sabbath was the seventh. It has been urged that there ought to be a special enactment in scripture for the change of day, and that, failing such enactment, the obligation cannot be supposed to be transferred. Some learned men have endeavoured to show that the day originally sanctified after the creation was the first of the human week, that a change occurred on the deliverance of Israel from bondage, and that we now in keeping the day of the Lord's resurrection have reverted to the original observance, and are therefore under the original command. All that could be said for such a theory was produced by the late Prof. Lee in his Duty of observing the Christian Sabbath, 2nd. edit. 1834; but his conclusion may be thought doubtful. Our Lord and his apostles taught by example quite as precisely as by precept; and their practice is enough to sanction the observance of the Lord's day. Besides, the dispensation changing, it was but fitting that there should be a change in this; else the bondage of the law might have attempted to restrain the liberty of the gospel.

And indeed an observance of the Jewish sabbath did for some time prevail in the Christian church, in connection with the observance of the Lord's day. Probably this might be, at least at first, to conciliate the Jews. Care was, however, taken not to hallow it after the Jewish fashion; and censures were passed on those that so acted (see Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xx. chap. 3). The same author shows how the Lord's day or Sunday was observed from ancient times, in some degree even from the beginning of the gospel, more specially when the authorities of the empire became Christian. Thus proceedings at law were suspended, save such a blessed work as the manumitting of a slave: all secular business was forbidden, except such as necessity or charity compelled men to do: all public games and shows also were regarded as unlawful. Fasting, even in Lent, was prohibited, because Sunday is a joyous festival; and customarily did the faithful throng the churches, to pay their holy service in the Lord's courts (ibid., chap. 2).

It has been already said that the rest-observance of the sabbath had a typical meaning. It pre-figured in some degree, no doubt, the gospel dispensation, more perhaps the millennial state, but in its highest and most assured intention the eternal rest of that glorious state into which God's church will finally enter—a rest not of idleness but of active fulfilment of the divine will, not of constraint but of delightful freedom from all that can grieve or injure or annoy, so that every faculty of the restored man has its highest and most fitting employment and therefore its perfect bliss. The apprehension of this, its final object, will furnish no uncertain guide to the right mode of hallowing now the day of rest.

It may be added that St. Paul's caution (Col. ii. 16) by no means precludes the consecrated service of the Lord's day: it had to do with the Jewish ritual, which, it has been already said, is not binding upon the Christian church. Besides, the term 'sabbath' is not restricted to the weekly observance: it was applied (as above noted) to days in various festivals (e.g. Lev. xvi. 29-31) when ordinary work was prohibited.

The treatment of this important topic has necessarily been brief; the reader may be referred to Dr. Barrow, Exposition of the Decalogue, Works, vol. 1. pp. 504-509. A plain and excellent book, The Divine Authority and Perpetual Observance of the Lord's Day, was published in 1831 by bp. Wilson (of Calcutta).

SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY. See JOURNEY, SABBATH.

SABBATH, THE SECOND AFTER THE FIRST (Luke vi. 1). Perhaps the first sabbath of a year that stood second in the sabbatical cycle: see Ellicott's Hist. Lect., lect. iv. pp. 173, 174.

SABBATHE'US (1 Esdr. ix. 14). Shab-bethai (Ezra x. 15).

SABBATICAL YEAR. See YEAR, SABBATICAL.

SABBE'US (1 Esdr. ix. 32). Shemaiah (Ezra x. 31).

SABE'ANS. There were at least two tribes of the name.—1. Descendants of Seba (Isai. xlv. 14).—2. Those of Sheba, son of Joktan, and the tribes associated with his posterity (Joel iii. 8). See SEBA, SHEBA. Possibly the Sabeans mentioned in Job i. 15 were a marauding race, to be distinguished from the other two. The word rendered 'Sabeans' in Ezek. xxiii. 42 is not a proper name: it should be translated 'drunkards.'

SA'BI (1 Esdr. v. 34). Probably a corruption of Zebaim (Ezra ii. 57).

SAB'TA, SAB'TAH (striking, i. e. terror to foes?). A son of Cush of the family of Ham (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9). From him descended a tribe of Cushites, located probably in the Ethiopian city Saba, or Sabat, on the south-west coast of the Red sea, not far from the present Arkiko. But Kalisch decidedly prefers the statement of Josephus, who interprets Sabbath of the Astabori, or tribes dwelling near the stream, Astaboras (Tocazze), which forms the eastern river of the land Meroe, where there might formerly be a town Sabtah (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., p. 250).

SAB'TECHA, SAB'TECHAN (id. ?). The youngest son of Cush (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9), the founder of an Ethiopian or Cushite tribe. On Egyptian monuments the word SBTK, or Sabatoca, appears as the proper name of the Ethiopians; but the precise locality of this tribe has not been ascertained. The Targum of Jonathan renders Zingetani, Zanguebar?

SA'CAR (hire, reward).—1. The father of Ahiham, one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 35). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 33 he is called Sharar.—2. A Levite porter (1 Chron. xxvi. 4).

SACKBUT. A musical instrument. The word thus (no doubt erroneously) translated, sabbea, occurs only in Daniel (Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15). It seems to have really been a triangular instrument with four or more strings, played on with the fingers, and emitting a sharp clear sound. It probably resembled the nebel, rendered 'psaltery.' LAVY complains of minstrels, sambucistrie, who used such an instrument, flocking into Rome from the east, Hist., lib. xxxix. 6. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Mus. Instrumente.'

SACKCLOTH. A coarse black cloth commonly made of hair (Rev. vi. 12), such as that of goats or camels. It was used for straining liquids, for sacks, and for mourning garments. Sometimes we find it under the ordinary clothes, bound upon the loins, or worn instead of any other kind of dress: occasionally it was spread on the ground to be lain upon (Gen. xxxvii. 34; 1 Kings xxi. 27; 2 Kings vi. 30; Isai. lviii. 5; Joel i. 8; Jonah iii. 5, 6, 8). Deep sorrow was hence denoted by sackcloth and ashes (Matt. xi. 21). Such garments were sometimes the dress of prophets and ascetics (Isai. xx. 2; Zech. xiii. 4). See MOURNING.

SACRIFICE. That the practice of offering sacrifice has been widely prevalent through the world is a fact sufficiently obvious. It is a reasonable inference that it was derived from a single source; for it is not very likely that unconnected nations would have separately hit upon this mode of pleasing or propitiating the objects of their worship. The scripture account is very natural. Noah, the second father of the human race, offered sacrifice (Gen. viii. 20); and hence we may suppose the rite continued, as we find it practised by the patriarchs (xii. 7, xiii. 18, xxii. 13, xxvi. 25, xxxiii. 20; Job i. 5), until it was embodied in the Mosaic law; continued, too, by those who lapsed into idolatry. For both sacred and profane history testify the prevalence of sacrifice among heathens, and the offering of human victims, an abomination most displeasing to the true God (Psal. cvi. 37, 38).

Sacrifice, however, is much earlier than the time of Noah; and a remarkable history is given of those offered respectively by Cain and by Abel (Gen. iv. 3, 5). It has been questioned whether the institution was by divine command, or whether it was devised by the first family of man. Now, without laying any stress on the skins supplied to Adam and Eve for clothing (iii. 21), we may observe that there was a difference recorded between the two sacrifices of Cain and of Abel. One, that of the firstlings of the flock, was graciously accepted; the other, of the fruits of the ground, was rejected. Why, if both were devised of the offerer's mind, was one approved, the other disapproved? God is not accustomed to approve that which a man devises according to his own will; and it is not likely that he would adopt and perpetuate an ordinance grounded on a mere human fancy. Besides, Abel is said to have sacrificed in faith (Heb. xi. 4). But faith must have some word of instruction or promise by which to hold; else it is not faith, it is presumption. Therefore it seems more reasonable to suppose that some divine intimation, if not in express words yet such as to show God's will, was at first given, to which Abel paid exact obedience, while Cain thought himself at liberty to modify and alter it. Corroborative proof is the fact that prior to the deluge animals were distinguished into clean and unclean (Gen. vii. 2, 8). This could not have had reference to diet: the reasonable inference is that it was to define the victims that might be offered in sacrifice. And surely, if sacrifice had been but a human notion, God, before whom all his creatures are on a level, would not have recognized the distinction. See Fairbairn, Typology of Script., book ii. chap. 4, vol. i. pp. 248-260.

There is a further question, whether sacrifice was merely an offering of gratitude, the presentation to the Deity of that which was most highly valued, or whether it was to be deemed by the slaying of the victim to possess any propitiatory virtue. But certainly, in the Mosaic ritual, sacrifice was understood to be a propitiation—not that the blood of bulls and goats had power to cleanse the conscience, but rather because in this appointed mode of worship the offerer acknowledged his guilt as deserving death and appealed to the Lord's mercy, and above all because in these sacrifices as types there was a purposed foreshadowing of the great effectual sacrifice to be made by the incarnate Son of God for the sins of mankind. The sacrifices of the law did away ceremonial pollution: they sanctified to the purifying of the flesh: the blood of Christ was the true propitiation for the guilt of the world (Heb. ix. 13-15). He was at once the priest, the offerer, and the victim. And in this view the acceptance of Abel's offering is better understood. He brought a victim, a sacrifice for sin: Cain brought a thank-offering, as if already in the condition of righteousness before God. For further information the reader must be referred to other works; and for a notice of the legal sacrifices see OFFERINGS.

Christians were not to eat meat sacrificed to idols. But this might involve in a heathen city entire abstinence from flesh-meat; for animals slaughtered were commonly so offered; inasmuch that the words for 'to kill' and 'to sacrifice' were identical. St. Paul therefore gives the reasonable rule that meat exposed in the public shambles might be freely purchased and eaten, provided it was not specially declared to have been offered to an idol (Acts xv. 29; 1 Cor. viii. x. 25-31).

SACRILEGE (Rom. ii. 22). The crime of profaning sacred things. The Jews were often guilty of it, though the word is not found except in the place noted. It was a sacrilegious act to introduce bargaining and trade into the temple (Matt. xxi. 12, 13).

SADAMPAS (2 Esdr. i. 1). A corruption of Shallum (Ezra vii. 2).

SAD'AS (1 Esdr. v. 13). Azgad (Ezra ii. 12).

SADDE'US (1 Esdr. viii. 45). This name, apparently identical with Daddeus (46), is a corrupt form of Iddo (Ezra viii. 17).

SADDLE. The ancient saddles were no doubt very simple (Gen. xxii. 3; Numb. xxii. 21), like the saddles of the asses at present in Egypt and Syria, a mat or a quilted cloth; a pad being sometimes used. Hence the garments placed upon the ass on which our Saviour rode (Matt. xxi. 7). The common pack-saddle of the camel is high and made of wood: the camel's hump fills the cavity; and carpets, cloaks, &c. are heaped upon this saddle to form a comfortable seat. But ladies and sick persons sometimes ride in a sort of covered chair or cradle thrown across the back of the camel. It was probably in the hollow of the framework of the pack-saddle that Rachel concealed her father's images (Gen. xxxi. 34).

SAD'DUO (1 Esdr. viii. 2). Zadok (Ezra vii. 2).

SAD'DUCEES. One of the Jewish sects of which we read in the New Testament, doctrinally in sharp opposition to the Pharisees, but ready to work with them against the person and teaching of Jesus. Their origin is involved in some obscurity. They are said to have derived their name from Zadok a scholar of Antigonus Socho, president of the sanhedrim, who was himself a disciple of Simon the Just, and died 263 B.C. But this is a very questionable account. It was natural, when the Pharisaic tendency was developing itself, that an antagonistic mode of thought would grow and, as time ran on, assume the form of a distinct school. And it may be that, when the name Pharisees had been appropriated by the one body, their rivals might assume that of Sadducees, as deduced from a word signifying just or righteous. If, however, it was an individual from whom the name was derived, it is not improbable that it was Zadok, the eminent high priest in the time of David and Solomon. A body of persons regarding themselves as more enlightened than others may well have formed a kind of sacerdotal aristocracy, and have called themselves the company or party of Zadok.

The tenets of the Sadducees may be gathered from the notices we have of them in the New Testament, illustrated by the account given by Josephus (Antiq., lib. xiii. 5, § 9, 10, § 6, lib. xviii. 1, § 4). They disregarded the traditions and unwritten laws which the Pharisees prized so highly, and professed to take the scriptures as the sole authoritative guide of religion. Not perhaps that they practically threw away all observance of tradition, but they denied its divine authority. Some have asserted that they did not receive more than the five books of Moses. But this appears to be a mistake: they did not disagree with the rest of the nation in regard to the acceptance of the whole sacred canon (see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Sadducæer'). They denied the existence of angels and spirits, and maintained that there was no resurrection (Matt. xxii. 23; Acts xxiii. 8), the soul according to them dying with the body, so that there could be no future state of reward or punishment. It was their maxim therefore that actions to be virtuous must not be done in hope of recompence. Another great principle of their belief was the absolute freedom of man's will, so that he had full power of himself to do good or evil as he chose; and then only could his actions have a moral value. But this tenet was pushed so far as almost entirely to exclude the divine interposition in the government of the world.

The Sadducees were by no means so numerous as the Pharisees; nor were their tenets so acceptable to the bulk of the people. Yet many of their body were men of wealth and influence. They were found in the supreme council; and it was sometimes a Sadducee who filled the office of high priest (iv. 1, v. 17, xxiii. 6). Their party had, moreover, a political complexion: they were austere, it may be added, in their habits, and severe in the administration of justice. After the first century of the Christian era they disappear from history.

SADOC (just). A person in the line of our Lord's ancestry (Matt. i. 14).

SADOC (2 Esdr. i. 1). Zadok (Ezra vii. 2).

SAFFRON. This substance is mentioned in conjunction with various perfumes and spices (Sol. Song iv. 14). It consists of the dried stigmas of the Orocus sativus, a plant which is a native of Greece and Asia Minor, and extensively cultivated in various parts of Europe. There are three stigmas in the flower; and these with a portion of one style are plucked out when the calyx is fully expanded, spread upon paper, and dried by kilns or the heat of the sun. They are narrow, thread-like, and of an orange-yellow colour. They have a penetrating aromatic odour, with a bitter taste, tinging the mouth and saliva yellow. The stigmas of nine flowers are required for a grain of saffron. This is what is called hay-saffron; the cake-saffron being a compound of safflower, or bastard saffron, gum, &c. Saffron was formerly in high esteem as a medical stimulant: it is still used in the east medicinally, and as a condiment.

SAINT. The word is applied to persons holy by profession and covenant (Psal. xvi. 3; Phil. i. 1; Heb. vi. 10); to the angels (Deut. xxxiii. 2; Jude 14); to the holy dead (Matt. xxvii. 52; Rev. xviii. 24). See HOLINESS.

SA'LA (Luke iii. 35). The Greek form of SA'LAH (shoot, sprout, extension). One of the patriarchs in the line of Shem (Gen. x. 24, where marg. Shelah, xi. 12-15). In 1 Chron. i. 18, 24 the name is given as Shelah.

SAL'AMIS. A sea-port town on the eastern coast of Cyprus with a good harbour.

It had anciently been the residence of a king, and was always one of the principal places in the island. It was at Salamis that Paul and Barnabas landed, being the nearest point to Seleucia (Acts xiii. 4, 5). Many Jews appear to have been residents there, as they had more than one synagogue. Ruined by an earthquake under Constantine the Great, Salamis was when re-built called Constantia, the remains of which are yet to be seen near the modern Famagosta.

SALASADA'I (Judith viii. 1). An ancestor of Judith.

SALA'THIEL (I have asked him of God). The name of a descendant of the royal house of David (1 Chron. iii. 17). He is more frequently called Shealtiel in the Old Testament. Salathiel seems to have been the son of Nerl (Luke iii. 27), and he was placed in the line of succession to the throne (Matt. i. 12) on the failure of heirs through Jehoia chin. He was the father or grandfather of Zerubbabel. See GENEALOGY.

SAL'CAH, SAL'CHAH (a pilgrimage?) A city on the eastern frontier of Bashan, taken by the Israelites, and assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iii. 10; Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 11; comp. Deut. iii. 13); the border of Gad coming close up to it (1 Chron. v. 11). It has been identified as the modern Sukhad, on the southern spur of the Jebel Hauran, seven hours south-east of Busrah, and is said to abound in vineyards.

SA'LEM (peace, peaceful). The city of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv. 18). It has been questioned whether the name was really that of a city, or rather a title of the king (Heb. vii. 2); and then, assuming it was a place, whether this Salem was Jerusalem, or whether it was not rather the town a few miles south of Beth-shean, which we afterwards meet with under the name of Salim. Certainly Jerusalem was anciently called Jebus; but Kalisch is of opinion that Melchizedek and his subjects were not Jebusites; that it is reasonable to suppose that the city afterwards so distinguished would be the scene of Abram's solemnly receiving a blessing; that Jerusalem would be in the line of march as Abram returned from his victory; and it was indubitably called Salem by the Psalmist (Psal. lxxvi. 2), poetry often adopting archaisms to enhance artistic effect (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 360, 361). See MELCHIZEDEK.

SA'LEM (Judith iv. 4). It is not quite certain what place is intended, perhaps one near Jezreel.

SA'LIM (peace). A place mentioned to indicate the locality where John Baptist was baptizing (John iii. 23). It may be the Salim said to be about eight miles south of Scythopolis or Beth-shean; but we can hardly believe it yet exactly identified. See ÆNON.

SAL'LAI (basket-maker?).—1. A Benjamite (Neh. xi. 8).—2. A priest (xii. 20): he is most likely the same with Sallu (7).

SALLU (weighed).—1. A Benjamite (1 Chron. ix. 7; Neh. xi. 7).—2. A priest in the days of Jeshua (xii. 7): the representative of his family in the time of Joiakim was Kallai (20).

SALLUMUS (1 Esdr. ix. 25). Shallum (Ezra x. 24).

SAL'MA, SAL'MAH (garment). The son of of Nahshon, and father of Boaz (Ruth iv. 20, marg.; 1 Chron. ii. 11). He is also called Salmon (Ruth iv. 20, 21; Matt. i. 4, 5).—2. A son of Caleb the son of Hur, called the 'father,' i.e. founder, of Beth-lehem (1 Chron. ii. 51). But there is reason to believe that this Salma was identical with the first-named, and that he was adopted by Caleb, or called his son because his inheritance, Beth-lehem, was part of Caleb's territory. See Mill, Myth. Interp. of Gosp., part ii. chap. ii. 1, pp. 163-165.

SALMANA'SAR (2 Esdr. xiii. 40) Shalmaneser.

SALMANAS'SER (Hos. xi. 5, marg.). See SIALMANESER.

SAL'MON (clothed) (Ruth iv. 20, 21). See SALMA.

SAL'MON (shady) (Psal. lxxviii. 14). See ZALMON.

SALMO'NE. A promontory at the eastern extremity of Crete, which still retains its ancient name (Acts xxvii. 7). See Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, chap. ii. pp. 73-75, for a curious illustration of St. Luke's accuracy in describing the weathering of this cape.

SAL'OM.—1 (Bar. i. 7). Shallum, father of Hilkiah the high priest.—2 (1 Macc. ii. 26). Salu (Numb. xxv. 14).

SALOME (pacific).—1. The wife of Zebedee, and mother of the two apostles John and James (Matt. xx. 20, 21). Some imagine her to be the sister of the Virgin; but this is not probable. She was one of the women that ministered to our Lord, and must, it is clear, have been a person of substance (xxvii. 55, 56; Mark xv. 40, 41, xvi. 1). For the legends concerning her see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Salome.'—2. The 'daughter of Herodias,' though her name is not given in scripture (Matt. xiv. 6), was called Salome. She was the daughter of Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great and Marianne: she was married to the tetrarch Philip, her father's brother, and after his death to Aristobulus, son of Herod king of Chalcis, to whom she bore three children.

SALT. This substance is procured in Palestine from the rock-salt at the south end of the Dead sea, and also from the salt deposits on the shores of that lake (see Zeph. ii. 9), and from various marshes. From this last source Dr. Thomson tells us that most of the salt now used is procured. 'It is not manufactured by boiling clean salt-water, nor quarried from mines, but is obtained from marshes along the sea-shore . . . or from salt-lakes in the interior, which dry up in summer, as the one in the desert north of Palmyra, and the great lake of Jebbûl, south-east of Aleppo' (The Land and the Book, p. 382). Much earth and impurity is collected with this salt; and with the chloride of sodium, which easily dissolves in water, much insoluble sulphate of lime is mixed; so that there is an insipid residuum, the salt which has 'lost its savour,' and which travellers assure us they have seen literally 'trodden under foot' (Matt. v. 13). Salt was used for rubbing the bodies of new-born children (Ezek. xvi. 4), for the purpose of hardening the skin; also for seasoning food (Job vi. 6). It was mixed with the provender of cattle (Isai. xxx. 24: see Henderson's note. Meat-offerings were to be seasoned with salt (Lev. ii. 13: comp. Ezek. xliv. 24, where it is prescribed for burnt-offerings); and it has been thought that the sacred perfume was to have it as one of the ingredients (Exod. xxx. 35, marg.). Perhaps its preserving quality was the reason of these directions; or it might be that what man found savoury was regarded as most fit to be offered to God. Salt, therefore, was largely required; and there seems to have been a chamber in the temple in which it was stored.

Salt, however, destroys vegetation. Cities when demolished were sown with salt (Judges ix. 45), as devoted to perpetual sterility. Hence the word is figuratively employed to denote barrenness (Deut. xxix. 23; Job xxxix. 6, marg.; Jer. xvii. 6). For 'covenant of salt' see COVENANT. The eating of bread and salt together is an Arab custom in making a covenant: comp. Ezra iv. 24, marg.

SALT, CITY OF. A town in the wilderness of Judah. It must have been near to the southern extremity of the Dead sea, as it is mentioned in conjunction with En-gedi (Josh. xv. 62). Perhaps it was in or close by the valley of Salt.

SALT, PILLAR OF (Gen. xix. 26). See LOT.

SALT SEA (Gen. xiv. 3; Numb. xxxiv. 12; Deut. iii. 17; Josh. iii. 16, xii. 3, xv. 2, 5, xviii. 19). See SEA, DEAD SEA.

SALT, VALLEY OF. A place where David gained a victory (2 Sam. viii. 13) over the Syrians. It is, however, stated (1 Chron. xviii. 12) that Abishai smote the Edomites here. Some have supposed that a slight error has crept into the first-named passage (Aram for Edom: the difference in Hebrew is but a single letter). But it is evident that the Syrians were seeking allies from all the neighbouring nations: if they obtained help from Edom, their combined army might be called indifferently Syrian or Edomite; and such help given by Edom would furnish the reason, which does not otherwise appear, why David immediately after attacked and subdued it. Gesenius, however, suggests that the valley of Salt, where David smote the Syrians, might be that near Aleppo. With respect to the person in command, Abishai might be at the head of a corps under the direction of Joab as commander-in-chief (comp. Psal. ix. title); and, if Abishai's corps was that which bore the brunt of the battle, the victory might with equal propriety be ascribed to him, to Joab his immediate superior, or to the sovereign whom both of them served, and who evidently was directing generally the operations of his forces (See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'David'; Keil, Comm. on Kings, with Bertheau, Comm. on Chronicles, vol. ii. pp. 264-266). In this locality Amaziah gained a victory over Edom (2 Kings xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11). This salt vale is most likely the Ghor, to the south of the Dead sea, adjacent to the great salt hill, 'two-and-a-half hours long,' Khashm' Usdûm: it separated the territories of Judah and Edom.

SAL'LU (weighed). A Simconite chief (Numb. xxv. 14).

SALUM.—1 (1 Esdr. v. 28). Shallum (Ezra ii. 42).—2 (1 Esdr. viii. 1). Shallum the father of the high priest Hilkiah.

SALUTATION. There were various phrases in use when a Hebrew saluted another, at meeting and at parting; such as 'The Lord be with thee,' 'The Lord bless thee' (Ruth. ii. 4), 'Blessed be thou of the Lord' (Gen. xxiv. 31; 1 Sam. xxiii. 21, xxv. 33; Luke i. 42), 'Peace be with thee' (Judges xix. 20; 1 Sam. xxv. 6). To a monarch a very common address was, 'Let the king live for ever' (1 Kings i. 31; Neh. ii. 3; Dan. ii. 4, iii. 9). In the New Testament, 'Hail,' i.e. health or joy to thee, is a common address (Luke i. 28; John xix. 3). At this day 'Peace be to you' is the commonest salutation in the east. The gestures varied with the dignity of the person saluted. Sometimes the right hand was laid upon the breast with an inclination of the body; but before any one of high rank the inferior repeatedly prostrated himself (Gen. xxxiii. 3; 2 Sam. xiv. 22). Sometimes a man bent his hand to the ground, and then applied it to his lips and forehead. Probably this custom may illustrate Job xxxi. 27, where it is the gesture of adoration. The hand of the superior, too, is kissed, this being now the usual mark of respect shown by a wife to her husband, by a son to his father, by a servant to his master. Or, if the superior does not allow this, but merely touches the hand of the other, the latter puts the hand so touched to his own lips and forehead. Kissing the hem or skirt of the garment, or even the dust before a superior, was also practised (Psal. lxxii. 9; Zech. viii. 23). The custom of kissing the beard is still preserved, usually on meeting after some time of absence. The right hand of the person so saluting is put under the beard, to support it while the kiss is imprinted on it (2 Sam. xx. 9). Sometimes the Arabs lay the right sides of their cheeks together. In Persia the kiss is given on the lips, or, if one of the parties is of high rank, on the cheek: see Gen. xxix. 11, 13, xxxiii. 4; Exod. iv. 27, xviii. 7.

It is worthy of notice that Christians were forbidden to salute those who had denied the faith (2 John 9-11). Indeed generally, as among the Mahomedans of the present day, salutation was given by the Jews only to 'brethren.' The followers of Christ were to have larger charity than this (Matt. v. 47). The prohibitions against saluting by the way (2 Kings iv. 29; Luke x. 4) were directed against the delay which the formal courtesies of the east were likely to cause to a journey on pressing business.

Salutations were also conveyed in letters. See for examples Ezra iv. 17, v. 7; Acts xxiii. 26, 30; Rom. i. 1-7, xv. 33, xvi. St. Paul, who usually employed an amanuensis, added the salutation with his own hand (1 Cor. xvi. 21; Col. iv. 18; 2 Thess. iii. 17).

SALVATION. This word is sometimes used generally for any deliverance or preservation (Exod. xiv. 13; 1 Sam. xiv. 45), but more frequently and particularly for the deliverance of mankind from the power of sin and Satan, by the Lord Jesus Christ (Zech. ix. 9; Luke i. 69, 77; Rom. i. 16; Heb.

v. 9, and elsewhere). Hence it comprises all the blessings of the new covenant, having their fulness and consummation in the life of everlasting glory (1 Pet. i. 5, 9). So that the gospel is termed 'the gospel of salvation' (Eph. i. 13). And, as God is the author of salvation, he is sometimes said to be the 'salvation' of his people (Psal. xxvii. 1). Similarly salvation is ascribed to him (Rev. xix. 1), because it is his gift: comp. Eph. ii. 8, 9. Christ has procured this salvation and therefore it is that emphatically he is called the Saviour (Matt. i. 21).

SAM'ÆEL (Judith viii. 1). An ancestor of Judith, perhaps Shelumiel (Numb. i. 6).

SAMARIAH.—1 (1 Esdr. i. 9). Shemaiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 9).—2 (1 Esdr. viii. 39). Shemaiah (Ezra viii. 13).—3 (Tob. v. 13).

SAMARIA (waich-post). A celebrated city of Palestine, founded by Omri king of Israel. The palace at Tirzah, where the preceding monarch had resided, was burnt by Zimri. So when Omri, after the death of his rival Tibni, found himself firmly seated on the throne, he soon began to cast about for a fresh capital for his dominions. A hill admirably adapted for the site of a great city belonged to Shemer. And of him Omri purchased it for two talents of silver; and the city that he built thereon he called Samaria, after the name of the former owner (1 Kings xvi. 18, 23, 24). Thenceforth it was the metropolis of the northern kingdom, the rival of Jerusalem, and generally the residence of the Israelitish monarchs (29, xx. 43; 2 Kings i. 2) though they had also a palace at Jezreel (1 Kings xxi. 1; 2 Kings viii. 29). The worship of Baal was set up in Samaria by Ahab, who built there an altar and a temple to the idol-god (1 Kings xvi. 32), which were destroyed by Jehu (2 Kings x. 18-28).

Samaria was unsuccessfully besieged by the Syrians in the reigns of Ahab and Joram (1 Kings xx. 1-21; 2 Kings vi. 24-33, vii.) It was ultimately taken by the Assyrians after a siege of three years in the reign of Hoshea (xvii. 5, 6, xviii. 9, 10). The inhabitants were carried into captivity, and colonists put in their place (xvii. 24; Ezra iv. 9, 10). This city continued a place of importance for some time after the Babylonish exile: then it was taken by Alexander the Great, who placed a body of Syro-Macedonians in it. Subsequently Samaria was utterly destroyed by John Hyrcanus. It must, however, have been ere long re-built; for in the time of Alexander Jannæus it was reckoned one of the cities possessed by the Jews. Pompey assigned it to the province of Syria; Gabinius fortified it afresh: Augustus gave it to Herod the Great, who embellished it, settled a colony of veterans there, and strengthened its defences. He also gave it the name of Sebaste in honour of the emperor; Sebastos being the Greek equivalent of Augustus. But it began to decay, overshadowed by its neighbour Nablous, and it is now but a mass of ruins, adjacent to the modern village of Sebastieh (see Winer, Bibl. EWB. art. 'Samaria').

Samaria was gloriously beautiful, 'a crown of pride' (Isai. xxviii. 1) upon its fruitful hill. 'The site of this celebrated capital, says Dr. Thomson, 'is delightful, by universal consent. It is a very large isolated hill, rising by successive terraces at least 600 feet above the valleys which surround it. In its shape it is oval; and the smaller and lower end unites it to the neighbouring mountain on the east. . . . The view from the topmost terrace of Samaria over the rich plains and hills around it, and far away to the blue Mediterranean, is truly magnificent. The remains of the ancient city consist mainly of colonnades, which certainly date back to the time of the Herods; and perhaps many of the columns are much older. There is a group of sixteen standing in a recess low down on the north-east side of the hill, and a similar group of sixteen on the top, though these last are larger; and there are many lying prostrate. The grand colonnade, however, runs along the south side of the hill, down a broad terrace, which descends rapidly toward the present village. The number of columns, whole or broken, along this line is nearly one hundred; and many others lie scattered about on lower terraces. They are of various sizes, and quite irregularly arranged: but when perfect it must have been a splendid colonnade. The entire hill is covered with rubbish, indicating the existence and repeated destruction of a large city. The modern village is on the south-eastern slope, adjacent to the ruined church of St. John. . . . The church . . . is an interesting specimen of mediæval architecture' (The Land and the Book, p. 468).

SAMARIA FROM S. E.

J. Orphan in photo.

H. Allon

The name Samaria often occurs in a more extended sense not only as the capital of the northern kingdom, but as that kingdom itself. Thus the sovereigns are called kings of Samaria as well as of Israel (1 Kings xxi. 1; 2 Kings i. 3); and we also read of 'the cities of Samaria' (xvii. 24). In New Testament times Samaria was one of the great divisions of Palestine lying between Galilee and Judea; so that any one who would pass straight from one of these provinces to the other 'must needs go through Samaria' (John iv. 4). It occupied the ancient territories of the tribes of Ephraim and western Manasseh.

SAMA'RIA (1 Macc. v. 66). This can hardly be the celebrated city of the name. An error has been supposed for Marissa, i.e. Mareshah.

SAMAR'ITAN. This name must have originally and properly designated an inhabitant of the city Samaria. But afterwards Samaria acquired a more enlarged signification, and sometimes was taken to include the whole of the northern state (1 Kings xiii. 32, xxi. 1; Ezek. xvi. 46, 51, 53, 55, xxiii. 4; Hos. viii. 5, 6; Amos iii. 9). Hence the term Samaritan might also be extended. It is very questionable, however, whether it ever was applied to the inhabitants generally of the kingdom; and indeed it is used in the Old Testament but once (2 Kings xvii. 29), and there it signifies the population introduced by the king of Assyria into the cities of Samaria. By these 'cities of Samaria' of course can be understood only those in the centre of Palestine, north of Judah, and excluding the trans-Jordanic territory, and also that of Galilee, both which appear to have been previously over-run by the Assyrian kings (xv. 29; 1 Chron. v. 26). It was the posterity of this population, intermixed with the Israelites who had been left, that bore afterwards the name Samaritans, as we find it in the New Testament.

Some writers indeed have amused themselves with the fancy that the Israelites were bodily and entirely carried off into the east (2 Kings xvii. 6, 18, 23), first overlooking the extreme improbability of such an utter deportation, and then forgetting in their hurry that Josiah long after made a progress through the cities of Samaria, putting down the idolatrous high places and exterminating the priests (xxiii. 19, 20), and actually gathered offerings from those who are expressly called 'Manasseh and Ephraim and all the remnant of Israel' (2 Chron. xxxiv. 9). No doubt the heathen element predominated; but there was an intermixture of Israelitish blood; and accordingly the Samaritans never ceased to claim descent from Jacob (John iv. 12). The question is well argued by Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. ii. pp. 69-71.

The introduction of the eastern tribes was probably effected by Esar-haddon or one of his generals (Ezra iv. 2, 10); and they were brought from Babylonia and other neighbouring provinces (2 Kings xvii. 24; Ezra iv. 9): see the articles under the respective names. These tribes were utterly ignorant of the true God, and worshipped their own false deities; and the remnant of Israel were but too ready to unite with them in their idolatry. But this gross conduct in the Lord's land was not to remain unpunished. He sent lions among them: for the beasts of the field had doubtless increased after the desolation occasioned by the Assyrian invasions. Then application was made to the king; and one of the priests who had been carried away was brought back to teach the people 'the manner of the God of the land.' The result was that though Jehovah was nominally worshipped, it was but as one deity among many, the idols of each respective tribe being equally honoured by them (2 Kings xvii. 25-41). And thus they continued, the mixed population of Hebrews and Gentiles, their religion a miserable medley in which the false and foul far overbore the pure and true.

We read nothing more of them till after the Jews' return from Babylon. Then they desired to take part with Zerubbabel in rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem. They must have relied on the Hebrew element among them. But of course they were refused; and then filled with envy and bitter malice they represented to the Persian kings the danger of allowing Jerusalem to rise again to honour and influence; and of course in this representation they laid as much stress as possible on their being mainly composed of eastern nations. Their opposition was successful. For several years the work was forbidden at Jerusalem (Ezra iv.).

Later we find the same enmity (Neh. iv., vi.)

It was brought to a head by the erection of a rival temple on mount Gerizim. Manasseh, a priest who had been expelled from Jerusalem for an unlawful marriage, obtained leave from Darius Nothus, king of Persia, to build this temple about 409 B.C. (Prideaux, Connection, vol. i. pp. 357-359). And, as various Jewish apostates from time to time resorted to them, the Samaritans possessed additional claims to Hebrew descent, and, holding superstitiously to their copy of the Pentateuch, professed to observe the law more strictly than the Jews themselves. The most intense hatred thenceforward subsisted between the Jews and the Samaritans. All kind of communication was forbidden. The productions of Samaria, and all articles of diet among them, were pronounced as unclean as swine's flesh. The Samaritans were never to be received as proselytes to the Jews' religion, and they were declared incapable of partaking of the resurrection to eternal life. The religious differences between the two peoples are largely explained by Prideaux, ubi supra, pp. 361-363.

The history of the Samaritans illustrates many circumstances in the gospel narrative. The charge our Lord gave first to his apostles was not to go into the way of the Gentiles, nor to enter into any city of the Samaritans (Matt. x. 5). There they would be little likely to be listened to. And, when he himself was intending to pass through a Samaritan village, and was inhospitably rejected there because it was seen that he was journeying to Jerusalem, the old hatred readily flamed out in James and John who desired nothing less than the utter destruction of such a people. Their compassionate Master rebuked their fiery zeal: he was come 'not to destroy men's lives, but to save them' (Luke ix. 52-56). He himself once made a deep impression on a Samaritan town. It was matter of surprise indeed that a Jew should ask drink of a woman of Samaria; but his loving discourse taught her her error, and his weighty words overcame all national prejudice, so that many Samaritans believed on him and besought him to tarry with them; nor did he refuse their request (John iv. 1-41). We may from all this understand the point of some of the events and parables which are related. See, for example, how forcible the lesson of brotherly-kindness is, when, after the priest and the Levite had passed heartlessly away from the wounded traveller, the man who tenderly relieved him was declared to be a Samaritan. Even the carping lawyer was obliged to acknowledge that the one who showed mercy, Samaritan as he was, was 'neighbour unto him that fell among the thieves.' And with searching power must the final admonition have rung in his ears, 'Go and do thou likewise' (Luke x. 25-37). So, again, of the ten lepers that were cleansed. The nine ungrateful ones were Jews: the one that glorified God and gave the great Healer thanks was a Samaritan (xvii. 11-19). After his resurrection the Lord commanded that his gospel should be preached in Samaria as well as in Judea (Acts i. 8); and very joyful ere long, we are expressly told, was Samaria when the glad tidings of salvation were proclaimed in her streets, and miracles were wrought there, and by the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was conferred (viii. 5-25). And there was joy in heaven too, that the wanderers, the despised, and the outcast were received into the flock of Christ.

It need not be supposed that Samaritans, properly so called, occupied all the cities and villages of Samaria. It is likely indeed that the number of their settlements had gradually diminished, so that in our Lord's time they were most chiefly congregated in the central part of this district. Yet they were by no means an unimportant people. It was through their complaints of the treatment they had received from Pilate that that governor was displaced. Vespasian had to deal severely with them (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xviii. 5, §§ 1, 2; Bell. Jud., lib. iii. 7, § 32): still they continued numerous, and were considered to be determined enemies of Christianity. Little need be said of their later history. They have dwindled down to about 200, who still at Nablous tenaciously cling to their law, and to the sepulchres of their fathers, celebrating the passover, with minute attention to the prescribed rites, on mount Gerizim.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH, THE. The Pentateuch exists in the Samaritan, or the ancient Hebrew character: that is, the language is Hebrew but written with letters varying from those in which for many centuries Hebrew has been expressed. Yet this Pentateuch is not a mere servile copy of Hebrew made by only a change of character: it is an independent edition, preserved with jealous care among the Samaritans, and presenting several readings different from those in the Hebrew Pentateuch.

Biblical critics are by no means agreed upon its origin. Many imagine that it is not older than the establishment, some time after the Babylonish captivity, of independent Samaritan worship and of a temple on Gerizim. But there are good reasons for believing its prior existence. There must have been copies of the law among the ten tribes at the time of the disruption. For it was Jeroboam's great anxiety to prevent his people from resorting to Jerusalem for sacrifice according to the law, that induced him to set up the golden calves at Beth-el and Dan (1 Kings xii. 26-33). And we cannot suppose Israelitish prophets like Elijah and Elisha ignorant of the Pentateuch. That there are traces of it in the writings of Hosea and Amos who prophesied chiefly in the northern kingdom has been proved. Copies, no doubt, were rare; and in a time of almost-universal apostasy the law would be little regarded; but yet the existence of the book—of course in the old character—in Israel before the Assyrian deportation is most probable. When the Assyrian king sent back one of the priests to teach the mixed people 'the manner of the God of the land,' though the worship continued of a debased kind, yet the teachings given were surely based on some written document. And then we find Josiah, in his reformation, which extended over Samaria, rather appealing to 'the book of the covenant,' as Hezekiah had done before him, than introducing it afresh (2 Kings xxiii. 21; 2 Chron. xxx. 5-9). It is less likely that, after the Babylonish captivity when the Samaritans were violently opposed to the Jews, they would have adopted the sacred book from their enemies. And it may be added that we have in the existence of the Samaritan Pentateuch a strong argument for the antiquity of the whole. Had any portion of it, as some have imagined, been composed and introduced in the later times of the kingdom of Judah, surely we should never have had a Samaritan Pentateuch; never would the Samaritans have cared to preserve what their adversaries had lately concocted and attributed to Moses.

This Pentateuch was known to and cited by many ancient Christian fathers; but it fell into oblivion for many centuries, till Joseph Scaliger drew attention to it. Pietro della Valle obtained in 1616 a complete copy from Damascus. Archbishop Ussher procured six more manuscript copies from the east; other copies also were obtained; and it was printed for the first time by Morinus in the Paris polyglott: it was re-printed in Walton's London polyglott; and a convenient edition in Hebrew characters was published by Dr. Blayney at Oxford in 1790.

Scholars have differed respecting the critical value of the Samaritan Pentateuch. Some have regarded its readings as preferable very frequently to those of the Hebrew copies. Gesenius, however, is of a different opinion. He admits only four readings (Gen. iv. 8, xiv. 14, xxii. 13, xlix. 14) to be superior to the Hebrew (De Pent. Sam. Orig. Ind. et Auct., Halle, 1815, § 17, pp. 61-64). And the first of these is the only one of any consequence; and the words, 'Let us go into the field,' as Cain's address to his brother, being introduced. But a writer in the Journ. of Sac. Lit. (July 1853, pp. 298-327) questions Gesenius's conclusions. He has not succeeded in overthrowing them; and the Samaritan Pentateuch is critically of little value. It may be added that there is a remarkable similarity, not yet fully accounted for, between the Samaritan and the Septuagint text.

The Samaritan Pentateuch has been translated into the Samaritan dialect, which is a mixture of Hebrew and Aramaean. There is also an Arabic version extant in Samaritan characters (see Horne's Introduct., vol. ii. pp. 29-33, edit. Ayre). For an elaborate account of the Samaritan Pentateuch and of Samaritan literature the reader must be referred to Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1106-1116.

SAM'ATUS (1 Esdr. ix. 34).

SAME'US (1 Esdr. ix. 21). Shemalah (Ezra x. 21).

SAM'GAR-NE'BO (sword or warrior of Nebo). One of the king of Babylon's princes (Jer. xxxix. 3).

SAM'I (1 Esdr. v. 28). Shobai (Ezra ii. 42).

SAM'IS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Shimai (Ezra x. 38).

SAM'LAH (garment). One of the ancient kings who reigned in Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 36, 37; 1 Chron. i. 47, 48).

SAM'MUS (1 Esdr. ix. 43). Shema (Neh. viii. 4).

SAM'OS. An island in the Ægean sea, off the coast of Ionia, about 40 stadia (5 miles) from the promontory of Trogyllium, over-against Miletus. It was celebrated as the seat of Juno-worship, and as the birth-place of Pythagoras. It was a fruitful island: see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Samos.' St. Paul put in there when on his voyage towards Jerusalem (Acts xx. 15). Many Jews were settled in Samos (1 Macc. xv. 23).

SAMOTHRACIA. A lofty and conspicuous island north of Lemnos, in the Ægean sea, off the coast of Thrace, where the Hebrus disembogues itself. It was formerly celebrated for the mysteries of Ceres and Proserpine. Originally called Dardania, it was afterwards occupied by the Thracians and also at a later period by Samians, whence its compound name. It is now called Samo-traki or Samandraki. St. Paul touched at Samothracia on his first voyage to Europe (Acts xvi. 11).

SAMP'SAMES (1 Macc. xv. 23). Probably a place, thought to be on the coast of the Black sea.

SAM'SON (sun-like). One of the most noted judges of Israel. His birth was foretold by an angel of the Lord, who commanded that the child should be 'a Nazarite unto God from the womb.' Samson was of the tribe of Dan and a native of Zorah, where his father Manoah dwelt (Judges xiii.). The general features of the district in which his youth was passed remain unchanged. Dr. Thomson was pleased to find his home still in existence, a secluded mountain-village above 'Ain Shemsh, and notices the accuracy of the sacred narrative. Samson is said to have gone down to Timnath. And 'Timnath still exists on the plain; and to reach it from Zorah you must descend through wild rocky gorges, just where one would expect to find a lion in those days when wild beasts were far more common than at present' (The Land and the Book, pp. 565, 566).

Samson of unsurpassed bodily strength was also a man of ungovernable will. He resolved contrary to his parents' wish to contract a marriage with a Philistine female. God, however, can overrule even the most unbridled actions of men for the furtherance of his own wise purposes; and it was this alliance which first of all inflamed the Israelitish champion against the oppressors of his countrymen. The marriage at Timnath was celebrated pretty much after the fashion in which weddings are now celebrated in the same region. There was jollity and feasting for seven days; and riddles were put forth for the amusement of the company. Samson had his riddle, from his discovery of honey in the carcass of a lion he had slain; but none of the guests could solve it. And so quarrels arose; and Samson plundered the Philistines, and left his wife, who was given to another (Judges xiv.). When his anger was appeased, Samson was desirous of being reconciled to his wife; but, discovering what had been done with her, he resolved to destroy the Philistine's corn. So, having collected 300 foxes or jackals, he tied them in pairs, fastened a fire-brand to each pair, and turned them loose. He had become in a degree sensible of his mission, to plague the enemies of Israel, and he intended to inflict a wide-spread desolation. Standing corn, shocks, vines, and olives were to be destroyed throughout the whole district; hence the number of the jackals employed (see Thomson, ubi sup., p. 552). A train of consequences followed. The Philistines maddened with the injury they had received burnt Samson's wife and her father as the original cause of their disasters. And Samson took vengeance by a slaughter of the Philistines. This people were now convinced of the necessity of securing so dangerous a foe: they therefore entered the territory of Judah in force and demanded that he should be given up to them. The men of Judah, cowed and fearful, agreed to this; and Samson permitted himself to be bound. But he was no sooner among the Philistines, who were delighted to see him a captive, than he burst his bonds, and, seizing the jaw-bone of an ass, no doubt a heavy implement, he fell upon his enemies and destroyed 1000 of them. And, when he was exhausted by this achievement, ready to faint with thirst, he cried unto the Lord; and a spring of water gushed forth from a hollow, not in the jaw-bone, but in the place called Lehi, or 'jaw,' from the wonderful event which had just occurred there. This fountain, 'the spring of the caller,' would seem to have been still flowing at the time the sacred penman wrote, a standing witness of the truth of the record (Judges xv. 1-19). Of course sceptics have found much to ridicule in this narrative; but he who admits the power of God to interfere supernaturally in the affairs of men will not be perplexed by such objections.

Samson was now an acknowledged chief. He 'judged Israel' (20); not perhaps as an ordinary magistrate in peaceful times, or as a commander heading the hosts of Israel in battle; but rather as a single warrior of unequalled strength and activity, dealing fearful blows, and preparing for that more regular national struggle wherein the Philistine yoke in the days of Samuel, Saul, and David would be ultimately broken.

The next incident in Samson's life was an illicit connection with a harlot at Gaza. The Gazites beset the gates, and thought that they should trap and kill him. But with his marvellous arms he tore down the gates, and carried them and the posts and the bar to the top of an eminence looking towards Hebron (xvi. 1-3). Winer calculates the distance from Gaza to Hebron; as though Samson bore the gates all the way between the two cities (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Simson'); but Dr. Thomson more sensibly believes that the hill was one he saw at Gaza, 'yonder hill toward Hebron' (p. 551).

Untaught by experience Samson yielded again to the lures of a Philistine woman, told her the secret of his strength, and was consequently seized and blinded, and made like a slave to work at a mill, such as those, no doubt, the sound of which is yet heard ringing in Gaza (Judges xvi. 4-21). In his misery thoughts of repentant sorrow filled the fallen champion's heart. And his hair began to grow again, and his strength to return; and he had one more opportunity of destroying the Philistines. It was the feast of their god Dagon; and they were holding festival, and brought out Samson to amuse them. Multitudes were congregated in Dagon's temple, common people and lords of high degree; and 3,000 were on the flat roof; when Samson, having lifted his voice in prayer to God, bore down the two pillars he had been permitted to clasp, and died with the vast assembly in the ruin that ensued. He thus slew more in his death than he had done in his life. He was buried in the tomb of Manoah his father (22-31).

There has been much discussion as to the form and size of the temple destroyed by the breaking of two columns. See HOUSE, p. 397. It may be sufficient here to cite the remarks of Dr. Thomson: 'The roofs in Gaza were then flat as they are now; and it does not require a very large space for 3,000 people, who stand as close as they can be packed. So much for the size of the building. A further explanation may be found in the peculiar topography of Gaza. Most of it is built on hills, which, though comparatively low, have declivities exceedingly steep. The temple was erected over one of these, beyond a doubt, for such was and is the custom of the east; and in such a position, if the central columns were taken out, the whole edifice would be precipitated down the hill in ruinous confusion. There is such a steep declivity on the northeast corner of the present city, near the old dilapidated castle and palace; and the houses in that vicinity have fragments of columns wrought into the walls, and laid down as sills for their gates. Somewhere in that neighbourhood, I suppose, the temple stood; and it coincides with this conjecture that the willy (station, tomb) of Samson is in a garden a little east of it' (pp. 553, 554).

Samson is reckoned among the worthies whose faith is celebrated (Heb. xi. 32). The date of his story cannot be accurately determined: perhaps it coincided with the priesthood of Eli; and the festival in the house of Dagon might be on occasion of the capture of the sacred ark (1 Sam. iv.).

SAMUEL (heard of God). A great prophet, the last judge of Israel before the monarchy, which he inaugurated, from whom too the succession of the prophets downwards continued without interruption till after the captivity. He was son of Elkanah a Levite, descended from that Korah who perished in the wilderness (Numb. xvi., xxvi. 11).

It was at Ramathaim-zophim that Elkanah lived. His best-loved wife Hannah was for some time childless; but on her prayer and vow at Shiloh, confirmed by Eli's blessing, God granted her this boy, whom, when she had weaned him, she carried, as she had vowed, to Shiloh, that he might minister there before the Lord. He was a Nazarite from his birth, and seems to have been a child of gracious temper attracting general favour (1 Sam. i., ii. 26). A remarkable revelation was made to him while yet young of the punishment which God would inflict on Eli's house for the profligacy of his sons; and it would seem that after this, such revelation being continued, his fame as a seer or prophet was established through the whole country. The catastrophe followed in which the sacred ark was taken; and Eli died. Afterwards, it is difficult to say how long, the people were gathered at Mizpah, when a great victory was gained over the Philistines, and Samuel's authority as a judge was confirmed. Little is recorded in detail of his administration. For a number of years he judged Israel—this is the sum of what is told—though whether his authority was recognized by all the tribes may admit of question. The places to which he is said to have gone on circuit were all in the south of Palestine (vii.); and when he appointed his sons to office it was in Beer-sheba, the extreme south.

Samuel was now advancing in years; and his sons did not follow the pattern of his integrity. Public affairs were therefore in an unsettled state; and it would seem that an invasion by the king of Ammon was apprehended (xii. 12). Hence the elders of Israel proposed the establishment of a monarchy. The proposal was very distasteful to the prophet, who appears to have viewed it as a reflection on his own administration (viii. 6). But, laying the matter before the Lord, he was directed to inaugurate a king; and Saul was accordingly appointed. As a prophet, however, and possibly as administering justice, Samuel retained all his influence (vii. 15). He was authorized to convey God's commands to Saul, to rebuke him for disobedience, and to pronounce sentence on him at last, that for his sin his kingdom should be transferred to another. That other he was commissioned to anoint; though Saul's suspicions were now aroused, and it was clear that he would not hesitate in revenge to commit any atrocious crime (xvi. 1, 2). The person anointed was David; after which Samuel dwelt quietly at Ramah, where he had gathered prophetic schools, and whither David subsequently fled to him (xix. 18-24). Here, too, Samuel died, and here he was buried, amid the general lamentation of the people (xxv. 1), who when the kingdom was established were obliged to acknowledge that his conduct had been without a stain (xii. 1-5). It is nowhere stated at what age Samuel died. He lived, it is evident, through the greater part of Saul's reign; for David had come into public life some time before the prophet's death, and David was but thirty when Saul fell on Gilboa. Winer imagines that Samuel died but two years before the king (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Samuel').

He was mourned by all Israel and buried in Ramah (1 Sam. xxv. 1, xxviii. 3), at the place, according to an ancient tradition, still known as Neby Samuil.

The appearance to Saul at En-dor has much perplexed commentators. Some are disposed to believe that it was produced by an evil spirit; and some suspect deception. In the scripture narrative, however, the appearance is called Samuel; and the threatened prediction was fulfilled (xxviii.): who shall say, then, that, for wise and sufficient reasons, as Moses and Elijah once again revisited the earth (Matt. xvii. 3), God did not permit the awful warning to come even from the dead Samuel to the sinful king?

Samuel is said by the Jews to have been the author of several of the sacred books. Probably part of the first book which bears his name might be compiled from annals which he wrote. The books of Judges and Ruth have also, but on no very sufficient grounds, been ascribed to him. For legendary stories about this prophet see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., art. 'Aschmouil.' Christian expositors, too, have amused themselves with fanciful notions (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1123), as that he had a peculiarly loud cry in prayer, &c. &c.

SAMUEL, THE BOOKS OF. The two books of Samuel were by the Jews considered one. They bear the name of Samuel, because the earlier part is occupied with the history of that prophet. In the LXX and Vulgate versions they are called 'books of Kings' or 'Kingdoms;' and hence in our bibles we find added to the titles, 'otherwise called the first (or the second) book of the Kings.'

It has been sometimes imagined that the books of Samuel and of Kings are parts of the same work, by the same author; but there are sufficient reasons for rejecting such a theory. Thus in Kings authorities are perpetually cited: it is otherwise in Samuel. In Kings are many express references to the law; in Samuel none. In Kings the exile is often alluded to; it is not so in Samuel. The plans of the two works vary: Samuel has more of a biographical cast—Kings more the character of annals. Moreover, the modes of expression are not the same: there are in Kings later forms of language, of which few occur in Samuel. The only real difficulty is that the books of Samuel do not conclude David's reign, for the end of which we have to consult Kings. Some have consequently supposed that the first two chapters of Kings ought to be attached to Samuel. But it is replied that there is particular mention of the law of Moses in 1 Kings ii. 3, which as above remarked is not found in Samuel. Bleek suggests (Einleitung in das A. T., pp. 358-361) that the compiler of Kings, intending to carry on the history, detached the concluding portion of Samuel, augmented it from additional sources, and prefixed it to his own work. This is possible, but hardly probable. It is, however, of little moment to decide the point.

The books of Samuel present three large sections: we have—I. The history and administration of Samuel (1 Sam. i.—vii.). II. The establishment of a monarchy, and the history of Saul's reign (viii.—xxxi.), including (1) Saul's advancement and administration till his rejection (viii.—xv.), (2) his downward course till his death (xvi.—xxxi.). III. The reign of David (2 Sam. i.—xxiv.). This, too, divides itself into two parts: (1) David's career of conquest and prosperity (i.—ix.); (2), his great sin, and the troubles which afterwards afflicted his house (x.—xxiv.). In all this narrative is shown the manifold wisdom of God, delivering his people, carrying on and developing the blessing long ago promised, and designating a family whose royalty should last on, till in the Son of that house an everlasting dominion should be inaugurated. The narratives, the foreshadowings, of Samuel, are eminently instructive and profitable.

It is freely acknowledged that the author, like most other historians, had documents before him from which he gathered his matter. The song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1-10), the psalm which David composed (2 Sam. xxii.), the list of his worthies xxiii. 8-39, &c., were doubtless previously in writing. But some critics choose to impute to the sacred penman an unskilful use of these materials, discrepancies and contradictions, and the recording twice, from different sources, of events which happened only once. There is no great weight in such charges. For to substantiate them they must prove that the writer was not only not inspired, but careless, ignorant, wanting in common sense. Thus there are two expeditions of Saul related in which he is in David's power, and is spared by him (1 Sam. xxiii. 19—xxiv. 22, xxvi.); and these, it is said, are but two traditional forms of one event. It is improbable, we are told, that circumstances so nearly the same, and so singular, should have occurred twice. But surely it is much more improbable that a historian possessed of any qualifications for his task should have been so blind as not to discern one fact at the bottom of two traditions, so careless as not to try to sift out the truth, so unfortunate as by sticking in the discrepant accounts to make his history a caricature of truth? With all deference to the deeply-learned men who deem Israelitish story a not very harmonious mixture of two threads of narrative, it is too large a demand upon the world's credulity to require assent to a theory which pre-supposes that Hebrew historians one after another (for from the Pentateuch the notion begins) found always two traditions ready to their hand, and one after another made the same blunder of giving a double account of almost every great event which befel their most noted ancestors.

Chronological sequence is another difficulty urged. Critics find a summary of facts: they find afterwards some of those facts given in fuller detail, and then they accuse the writer of inaccuracy, as if he intended to place these facts chronologically after the point reached in the summary. No history can be written in exact chronological order. When an event has been mentioned, the writer must return to give some of the details, to gather up the threads of contemporaneous occurrences, to amplify and explain what he had stated. Granting this obvious principle very many difficulties will disappear. It is in this way that the perplexities attending the account of David's combat with Goliath have been removed. See DAVID.

It is, however, said, further, that there are contradictions in the books of Samuel. Two or three of these may be examined here. It is alleged that the assertion in 1 Sam. vii. 13 is in opposition to ix. 16, x. 5, xiii. 3, 19, 20. But the victory of Mizpeh was gained in the early part, perhaps at the beginning, of Samuel's administration. It is not till years after that we hear again of the Philistines; so that the expression may be most fairly used of a deliverance which lasted till Samuel had grown old, and his sons were unpopular, and when advantage was probably taken of these circumstances once more to plunder Israel. It is alleged, again, that two modes of Saul's appointment as king are narrated—by a special revelation from God (ix. 1—x. 16), and by a public assembly of the people in which he was chosen by lot (x. 17-27). But to call these inconsistent is to deny the divine government of the world. To the reverent mind Prov. xvii. 33 is a sufficient explanation. It is further objected that there is an inconsistency in the narrative in regard to Saul's not waiting for Samuel at Gilgal: xiii. 8, it is urged, must refer back to x. 8; though there had certainly been a meeting of the people with Samuel and Saul at Gilgal in the interval (xi. 14, 15). But much stress need not be laid on this. We may fairly suppose that Samuel's charge was intended for a general direction, or that, having been obeyed once, it was reiterated on a fresh occasion. And, if we are not able precisely to determine the exact order of events, surely it is but reasonable to impute the difficulty to our want of information, instead of charging the historian with mis-statement. Only one more alleged contradiction can be noticed. The two passages, 1 Sam. xviii. 27 and 2 Sam. iii. 14, it is said, do not agree. But all appearance of disagreement is removed by a reference to 1 Sam. xviii. 25. The number which the king prescribed was 100; and this was the price which David naturally names to Ish-bosheth, though in fact he had doubled Saul's demand.

It is, moreover, said that the whole work is a thing of shreds and patches; that there are summings up, as in 1 Sam. vii. 15-17, xiv. 47-52; 2 Sam. viii. 15-18, xx. 23-26, so that the narrative begins again when it seemed to be concluded; and that therefore it is altogether a heterogeneous compilation. Even if this were true, it would not affect the authority of the record; but the charge has little to support it. Till the breaking of the Philistine yoke on the great day of Mizpeh Samuel's authority, if he really previously exercised any, was not consolidated; what more natural than at such a crisis to give an account of his ordinary administration of justice? And at the end of chap. xiv. we reach the turning-point of Saul's reign. He had been hitherto successful, regardless it is true of Samuel's charge in one instance, but not altogether rejected, and always victorious in external war. Here was the place, then, to give a statement of his family and household. Immediately after, when proved again with a fresh command, he recklessly disobeyed, and ran with ever-increasing celerity the miserable course which conducted him to utter ruin. There was a somewhat-similar crisis in David's reign. With 2 Sam. x. begins the story of that series of events which led to his great sin, and embittered his closing years. And chap. ix. the account of his kindness to Jonathan's son, is an apt adjunct to the enumeration of the officers of his kingdom. The list, too, xx. 23-26, is appropriately placed, because David had just been restored to his throne; and the chaps. xxi.—xxiv. are but a kind of appendix, describing the last scenes of his reign and life. We may see, then, really the careful hand of a single compiler in these arrangements.

As to the author little can be said with certainty. Some have concluded, from 1 Chron. xxix. 29, that Samuel, Gad, and Nathan recorded the events of their times, and that to them therefore these books must be ascribed. But we have just seen that, though previously-existing documents may have been used, the probability is that a single writer composed the whole. And he seems to have been somewhat removed in point of time from the events he chronicles. The expression 'unto this day' (1 Sam. v. 5, vi. 18, xxx. 25; 2 Sam. iv. 3, vi. 8, xviii. 18) may be taken to imply this: so may 1 Sam. ix. 9; 2 Sam. xiii. 18. Perhaps we may not unreasonably assign the composition to the time of Rehoboam. Commentaries on the books of Samuel are included in those which expound generally the Old Testament.

SANABAS'SAR (1 Esdr. ii. 12, 15). Sheshbazzar (Ezra ii. 8, 11).

SANABAS'SARUS (1 Esdr. vi. 18, 20). Sheshbazzar (Ezra v. 14, 16).

SAN'ASIB (1 Esdr. v. 24).

SANBALL'AT (lauded by the army, giving strength to the army?) A Horonite, that is, a native of Horonaim in Moab. It is not stated whether he was governor under the Persian rule over Moab or Samaria; but he seems to have held some post of authority. He stirred up the Samaritans to impede the purpose of Nehemiah to re-build the walls of Jerusalem, and imputed rebellion to the Jews (Neh. ii. 10, 19, 20, iv. vi.). When Nehemiah returned to the Persian court, Sanballat gained great influence in Jerusalem; and a son of Jolada the son of Eliashib the high priest became his son-in-law; which provoked Nehemiah's anger, when he heard it on resuming his government (xiii. 28). Sanballat afterwards obtained leave from Darius Nothus to erect a temple on Gerizim, where he placed his son-in-law as high priest. Josephus mistakenly attributes this to the time of Darius Codomannus.

SANCTIFICATION, SANCTIFY. To sanctify is spoken sometimes of God and sometimes of men.

Of God, when he manifests his glory, and vindicates his high perfections: thus he is said to 'sanctify' his great name (Ezek. xxxvi. 23). Or when he sets apart some person or thing to a holy office or use: thus the Father is said to 'sanctify' Messiah (John x. 36): God 'sanctified' the seventh day (Gen. ii. 3); and so the first-born of Israel were sanctified by his command (Exod. xiii. 2). Also when he frees anything from pollution, imparting holiness or rendering clean and fit for holy use and service. Hence believers in Christ who had entered on a new life were said to be 'sanctified' (1 Cor. vi. 11), and creatures of God, such as meats, to be 'sanctified by the word of God and prayer' 1 Tim. iv. 5).

Again, the term is used of men, when they pay fitting honour to the Deity. Thus they are commanded to 'sanctify' the Lord of hosts (Isai. viii. 13); and Moses and Aaron were censured because they did not so 'sanctify' the Lord in the eyes of the children of Israel (Numb. xx. 12). Also when they prepare or purify themselves for some sacred employment, or seek to show the fitting temper for some work or office. We find the word so introduced in various places (e.g. Exod. xix. 10, 14, 22; Numb. xi. 18; Josh. iii. 5): it is used also of ceremonial purification (2 Chron. xxx. 17), of observing a sacred day, as the sabbath (Deut. v. 12), of consecrating to a religious charge (Exod. xxviii. 41). So the altar was sanctified (xxix. 36), the offering (27); and the vestments of the priests, the utensils of the tabernacle, &c. &c. were regarded as sanctified or holy (xxx. 26, 29, xxxi. 10).

Of sanctification, or the sanctifying righteousness of the Christian, it may be said in the words of Hooker: 'Now, concerning the righteousness of sanctification, we deny it not to be inherent: we grant that, unless we work, we have it not: only we distinguish it as a thing different in nature from the righteousness of justification: we are righteous, the one way, by the faith of Abraham: the other way, except we do the works of Abraham, we are not righteous. Of the one St. Paul, "To him that worketh not, but believeth, faith is counted for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 5). Of the other St. John, "He is righteous which worketh righteousness." Of the one St. Paul doth prove, by Abraham's example, that we have it of faith without works. Of the other St. James, by Abraham's example, that by works we have it, and not only by faith. St. Paul doth plainly sever these two parts of Christian righteousness one from the other. For in the sixth to the Romans thus he writeth, "Being freed from sin, and made servants to God, ye have your fruit in holiness, and the end everlasting life." Ye are made free from sin, and made servants unto God: this is the righteousness of justification. Ye have your fruit in holiness: this is the righteousness of sanctification. By the one we are interested in the right of inheriting: by the other we are brought to the actual possession of eternal bliss; and so the end of both is everlasting life' (Disc. on Justification, 6).

SANCTUARY. A holy or sanctified place, used apparently for the holy land in which God would plant his people (Exod. xv. 17: comp. Psal. cxiv. 2); more generally for the tabernacle (Exod. xxv. 8; Lev. xii. 4, xxi. 12), and the temple (1 Chron. xxii. 19; 2 Chron. xxix. 21); sometimes for the holy place exclusive of the court of the tabernacle (Lev. iv. 6; Numb. x. 21). The word is also applied to God's holy habitation in heaven (Psal. cii. 19). And, as the sacred places had the privilege of an asylum, the term 'sanctuary' sometimes signifies a place of refuge or protection (Isai. viii. 14; Ezek. xi. 16).

SAND. The sand of the sea is often used as the symbol of multitude (Gen. xxii. 17, xxxii. 12), or abundance (xli. 49); also of intolerable weight (Job vi. 3; Prov. xxvii. 3)

There is a passage in which Job speaks of multiplying his days like the sand (Job xxix. 18). Jewish tradition, adopted by some modern critics, Ewald, De Wette, and others, would translate, 'the phoenix'; as if it were a reference to the well-known legendary story. But we may rather abide by Gesenius's opinion: 'Sand is the frequent emblem of numerous days; nor is there any reason to depart from the common signification.' Comp. Torshell on Mal. iv. 2, p. 300, edit. 1865.

SANDAL. A covering for the foot. The word 'sandal' occurs only twice in our version (Mark vi. 9; Acts xii. 8); but the same article unquestionably must often be understood when we meet with the term 'shoe.' The sandal worn by oriental nations, and also by the Greeks and Romans, consisted of a sole, of leather or wood, fastened with thongs round the upper part of the foot. The untying of these thongs or latches was usually performed by an inferior or a slave: hence the expression of Mark i. 7; Luke iii. 16; John i. 27; Acts xiii. 25 denotes humble subservience. So also the carrying of the shoes after another (Matt. iii. 11). The sandals worn by the Israelites were probably very similar to those of the Egyptians; specimens and representations of which have been preserved. Some of these were woven of palm-leaves, papyrus-stalks, &c., others of leather: they were often lined with cloth, on which the figure of a captive was painted, illustrating the idea of treading enemies under foot (comp. Josh. x. 24; Mal. iv. 3). The upper classes and the women wore them pointed and turned up at the end, as is frequently the custom in the east to the present day. Ladies appear to have had their sandals highly ornamented (Sol. Song vii. 1; Ezek. xvi. 10: comp. Judith xvi. 9). Sandals from their lightness were well suited to a warm climate; and the common sort must have been cheap (Amos ii. 6, viii. 6); but in later times the Hebrews used also shoes more nearly resembling our own. The Romans put on shoes when they went abroad, and wore slippers or sandals in the house; it being regarded as effeminate for a man to appear in public in slippers. At present both shoes and boots are common in Palestine.

Shoes. Assyrian. From the marbles.

In wearing sandals the feet were of course soiled by a journey; hence the custom of offering water to wash the feet of travellers (Gen. xviii. 4, xix. 2; Luke vii. 44). In the house and at meals the shoes or sandals were laid aside. And, therefore, since the Israelites were to celebrate the passover as fully prepared for a march, it was specially commanded that they should have their shoes on their feet (Exod. xii. 11).

Sandals and shoes. Egyptian. From specimens in the British Museum.

The modern Syrian practice is thus described by Dr. Thomson: 'They scrupulously drop their slippers, shoes, or boots, at the door when they enter a room, and keep on their head-dress. . . . As they sit on the mat, rug, or divan, with their feet under them, shoes would soil both couch and clothes, and, besides, would make a very uncomfortable seat. The demands of decency and the calls of comfort introduced and enforced the custom of dropping the shoe at the entrance into the sitting-room; and it was thence extended to every place entitled to respect. From this to the idea of defilement from the shoe was but a step, and certain to be taken. Hence the strict requisition to put it off on entering temples and sacred places of every kind. Mohammedans have preserved this idea in all its force; and you cannot enter any of their mosques or holy shrines with your shoes on' (The Land and the Book, p. 121). So we have instances in scripture in which the shoe was to be put off in the divine presence (Exod. iii. 5; Josh. v. 15). According to Jewish tradition the priests performed their sacred services barefoot. And to go barefoot was not only a mark of respect, but also a sign of mourning (2 Sam. xv. 30; Isai. xx. 2, 4; Ezek. xxiv. 17, 23). In transferring a possession a shoe or sandal was delivered (Ruth iv. 7); a practice derived from or nearly connected with the provisions of the levirate law, by which, if a man unduly refused to take his brother's wife, a stigma was infixed upon him (Deut. xxv. 5-10). Of course this stigma could not attach in a case like that of Ruth, where all parties were anxious that the nearest of kin should forego his privilege, and no claim was made by Ruth upon the kinsman who was so passed over. See some good observations in R. Bernard's Comm. on Ruth, pp. 103, 104, edit. 1865. It seems, further, to have been an eastern custom to cast a shoe upon anything, as a token that the ownership of it was claimed. See Psal. lx. 8, cviii. 9. It may be added that shoemakers are mentioned in the Talmud (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Schuhe').

SAN'HEDRIM or SAN'HEDRIN. The highest council of the Jews, who attribute its origin to the appointment of the seventy elders on whom the divine Spirit was poured, that they might assist Moses in the administration of affairs (Numb. xi. 16, 17, 24, 25). See Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. et Talm., cols. 1513-1515. There is, however, no further notice of such a body in Old Testament history; and it is probable that the appointment was but temporary. But, if this council did not continue, it might well serve as the model of that which we find afterwards in authority; and both the number, and in some respect the powers, might be defined according to the ancient type. The earliest mention we have of a council likely to be the sanhedrim is in the Apocrypha. It there appears with some prominence as taking part in public business and recognized by foreign potentates (2 Macc. i. 10, iv. 44, xi. 27). It is probable, therefore, that it was constituted after the return from Babylon; and as some corroboration of this it may be remarked that the name is of Greek derivation, implying a body of assessors. In the Mishna it is called Beth-din, 'house of judgment.' See Westcott, Introd. to Gospels, chap. i. p. 54, note.

In the New Testament we have various notices of the sanhedrim. It would seem to have comprised chief priests (perhaps the heads of the twenty-four courses, and those who had borne the office of high-priest), elders, and scribes (Matt. xxvi. 57, 59, xxvii. 1; Mark xiv. 53, 55, xv. 1; Luke xxii. 66; John vii. 45-52, xl. 47; Acts iv. 5-21, v. 21, 27-41, vi. 12-vii. 60, xxii. 30, xxiii. 1-9). The 'servants' (Matt. xxvi. 51, 58; Mark xiv. 47, 54) very probably were the officers or bailiffs of the council who were in waiting during its session. The power of this body was considerable. It was the highest judicial court, taking special charge of offences against the sacred law, but exercising also other jurisdiction. For Herod, when governor of Galilee, was summoned before the sanhedrim on the charge of having put persons to death without competent authority (Josephus, Antiq., lib. xiv. 9, § 4). Its power was acknowledged even by those Jews who lived beyond the boundaries of Palestine; for Paul had commission from it to arrest Christians at Damascus, and carry them for trial to Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 5). According to the Talmud the right of punishing capitally was taken from the sanhedrim about forty years before the downfall of the Jewish polity; and this may be supposed to explain John xviii. 31. Still it condemned Stephen (Acts vii. 57, 58). And, though this is said to have been a hurried rush and illegal, yet, so far as we read, no censure for it was ever conveyed to the sanhedrim by the higher Roman authorities. It may be, therefore, that, as at last the charge against Jesus was treason against the emperor (John xix. 12)—a crime clearly beyond the sanhedrim's cognizance, the want of power was alleged on this account. See, however, Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Synedrium.'

As to the number of this council authorities differ: it is variously said to be 70, 71, and 72. But the Jews generally hold that 71 is the true number, on the ground that 70 elders were appointed to assist Moses, who with Moses himself would make up the 71. The president, very generally the high priest (Matt. xxvi. 62), was designated nāsī, the elevated one. There was a vice-president, styled 'father of the house of judgment,' who sat at the president's right hand. The other councillors were ranged in front of these two in the form of a semicircle. Two scribes attended to register the votes, one for acquittal, the other for condemnation.

The place where this council met seems to have varied. A hall called gazzith, at the south-east of one of the temple courts, and another at no great distance, are said to have been successively used. Certainly sometimes the sanhedrim met in the high priest's palace (3). It was subsequently settled at Tiberias.

According to the Talmud smaller councils with the same name were constituted in provincial towns where the inhabitant householders numbered upwards of 120. These consisted of twenty-three members, and sat on the second and fifth days of the week. Some have supposed them alluded to in Matt. v. 21, x. 17; Mark xiii. 9.

SANHE'RIB (2 Kings xviii. 13, marg.). Sennacherib.

SANSAN'NAH (palm-branch). A city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 31). Mr. Wilton conceives it identical with Hazar-susah (xix. 5), or Hazar-susim (1 Chron. iv. 31), and locates it in the modern Wady es-Suny or Sumieh (The Negeb, pp. 212-215).

SAPH (threshold, tall?). A Philistine giant slain by Sibbechai (2 Sam. xxi. 18). He is called Sippai in 1 Chron. xx. 4.

SAPHAT (1 Esdr. v. 9). Shephatiah (Ezra ii. 4).

SAPHATHAS (1 Esdr. viii. 34). Shephatiah (Ezra viii. 8).

SAPHETH (1 Esdr. v. 33). Shephatiah (Ezra ii. 57).

SAPHIR (fair). A place mentioned only in Mic. i. 11. From the connection in which we find it we may suppose it in the Philistine plain. Robinson found three villages bearing nearly the name, between Askalon and Eleutheropolis.

SAPPHIRA (sapphire, or, more probably, from the Aramaic, beautiful). The wife of Ananias, who with her husband sold land and falsely professed to give the whole price to the apostles. Her sin was punished with death (Acts v. 1-11).

SAPPHIRE. A precious stone, one of the gems in the high priest's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 18, xxxix. 11). The Hebrew name, which is similar to ours, implies beauty, splendour. Sapphire, being clear bright blue in colour, aptly describes the pavement beneath the feet of the Divine Being in the manifestation vouchsafed to Moses, Aaron, and the elders of Israel (xxiv. 10), as also the tint of the throne Ezekiel saw (Ezek. i. 26). The sapphire is alluded to by Job (Job xxviii. 6), and is said to have formed one of the foundations of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19). There can be no doubt that the true sapphire is intended in these places. Pliny, indeed, describes lapis-lazuli under the name; but the mention of that stone would be inapplicable in several of the texts in which 'sapphire' occurs: moreover, it is not adapted for engraving on (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Edelsteine'). The oriental sapphire is one of the varieties of corundum: it is transparent or translucent, generally sky-blue in colour: it occurs in rolled masses and crystallized: it possesses double refraction, and is inferior in hardness to the diamond only.

SARA (Rom. iv. 19; Heb. xi. 11). Sarah.

SARA (Tob. iii. 7, and elsewhere). The person whom Tobias is said to have married.

SARABIAS (1 Esdr. ix. 48). Sherebiah (Neh. viii. 7).

SARAH (princess).—1. The wife of Abraham, whose half-sister she appears to have been (Gen. xx. 12). The tradition that she was the same with Iscah (xi. 29) is without sufficient foundation. Her name was originally Sarai; and it was changed by divine command at the time when Abram was changed to Abraham. Sarah was a beautiful woman, as is sufficiently shown by Abraham's apprehension that she would be coveted for the harem of the monarch in Egypt, and again at Gerar. She was, however, barren. And, though promises were made that Abraham should have a son, and that Sarah should bear, she manifested some incredulity. In Sarah's character we see traits of impatience and jealousy; but her history is so interwoven with that of her husband whom she accompanied from Ur of the Chaldees, that little need here be said of her: see ABRAHAM. Sarah was 90 at Isaac's birth, and died at Hebron aged 127. She was buried in the cave of Machpelah (xii. xvi., xvii., xviii., xx., xxi., xxiii.). In the New Testament she is called Sara, and is commended as the spiritual mother of the children of promise (Gal. iv. 22-31): her faith, too, spite of temporary wavering, is noted (Heb. x. 11), and her example as an obedient wife propounded to Christian females (1 Pet. iii. 5, 6).—2 (Numb. xxvi. 46). See SERAI.

SARA'I (my princess, contentious?). The original name of Abraham's wife Sarah (Gen. xi. 29, 30, 31, xii. 5, 11, 17, xvi. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 8, xvii. 15).

SARAIAS (1 Esdr. v. 5). Seraiah, the high priest (Ezra ii. 2). In 1 Esdr. viii. 1; 2 Esdr. i. 1 the same person is doubtless meant; the term 'son' implying descendant.

SARAMEL (1 Macc. xiv. 28). A place unknown. Some believe it an honorary appellation of Simon the high priest.

SARAPH (burning, venomous). A descendant of Judah, one of those who are said to have had dominion in Moab (1 Chron. iv. 22).

SARCHE'DONUS (Tob. i. 21). Esar-haddon.

SARDE'US (1 Esdr. ix. 28). A strange corruption of Aziza (Ezra x. 27).

SARDINE (Rev. iv. 3). See SARDIUS.

SARDIS. An ancient city, the capital of Lydia, where Croesus reigned, seated on the river Pactolus, by the side of mount Tmolus, in a fruitful plain. It was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius, but was re-built by the emperor's assistance. To the church there one of the apocalyptic epistles was addressed (Rev. i. 11, iii. 1-6); in which earnest reproof was conveyed for its declining state. Sardis was wasted by the Turks, and was destroyed by Tamerlane in the thirteenth century: it is now a miserable village, called Sart, or Sart-Kalassi, amid the ruins of the ancient city.

SARDITES. A family of Zebulun descended from Sered (Numb. xxvi. 26).

SARDIUS. A precious stone; one of those in the high priest's breast-plate (Exod. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10): it is also mentioned as one of the gems in the adornment of the king of Tyre (Ezek. xxviii. 13): in all these places the marginal rendering is 'ruby'. The Hebrew name odem implies redness; so that Gesenius imagines that ruby or garnet is meant. The LXX. render this by 'sardius,' the word which occurs in Rev. xxi. 20: in iv. 3 it is 'sardine.' And this is commonly taken to mean cornelian, one of the varieties of agate, which derives its name from caro, carnis, 'flesh,' as having, the red variety at least, a fleshy colour. Fine red cornelian is found in Yemen, to which the Arabs attribute the property of checking hæmorrhage when laid on a fresh wound. The name 'sardius' is variously derived from Sardis in Lydia, from the island Sardinia, where it is said to be found, and from a fish.

SARDONYX (Rev. xxi. 20). A variety of the onyx, in which the opaque white alternates with translucent rich deep orange brown. See ONYX.

SARE'A (2 Esdr. xiv. 24). A scribe whom it was said Esdras was to take.

SAREP'TA (Luke iv. 36). Zarephath.

SARGON (prince of the sun). An Assyrian king mentioned by name but once in scripture (Isai. xx. 1), where he is said to have sent his general Tartan to Ashdod. We may infer, from the prophet's symbolical behaviour and consequent prediction (2-6), that the monarch was victorious over Egypt and Ethiopia. The deciphered inscriptions give us some further information. It would seem that Sargon or Sargina usurped the Assyrian throne, succeeding Shalmaneser, and reigning from 721 to 703 B.C. It was he who took Samaria, and carried away captive many thousand Israelites, whom he re-placed by Assyrian colonists. He built much in Nineveh; and in the palace of Khorsabad, his chief residence, the annals of the earlier fifteen years of his reign are detailed. He prosecuted wars with Merodach-baladan, king of Babylon, exacted tribute from the king of Egypt, the queen of Arabia, and the chief of Sheba; he extended his conquests eastward and westward, warring with Medes and Armenians, with cities of Palestine, and African tribes, and even made an expedition to Cyprus, where a memorial tablet of him was discovered, which is now in the Museum at Berlin. Sargon was succeeded by his son Sennacherib.

SAR'ID (a survivor). A place on the border of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 10, 12).

SAR'ON (Acts ix. 35). Sharon.

SAR'OTHE (1 Esdr. v. 34).

SAR'SECHIM (perhaps chief of the eunuchs). A Babylonian prince (Jer. xxxix. 3).

SAR'UCH (Luke iii. 35). Serug.

SAT'AN (adversary). This word used with the article (except in 1 Chron. xxi. 1) indicates the evil spirit, the devil (Job i. 6; Zech. iii. 1, 2, and elsewhere). See DEVIL.

SATHRABU'ZANES (1 Esdr. vi. 3, 7, 27). Shethar-boznai (Ezra v. 3, 6, vi. 6, 13).

SATYR. The Hebrew word so rendered (Isai. xlii. 21, xxxiv. 14), means he-goat, and according to rabbinical tradition must be taken here to represent the wood-demons, said popularly to resemble goats, which haunt desolate places. The same word is rendered 'devils' in Lev. xvii. 7; 2 Chron. xi. 15, the objects of idolatrous worship. But there the images of such false deities are meant, which were literally fashioned in the shape of brute animals; so that a better word than 'devils' might have been found in our version. And we can scarcely imagine the prophet Isaiah giving countenance to popular superstition, or confirming the notion that demons inhabited the ruined cities. It seems better, therefore, with Henderson to translate literally, 'wild goats.'

SAUL (asked for, desired).—1. An early king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 37, 38); he is also called Shaul (1 Chron. i. 48, 49).

2. The first in the regular establishment of the Israelitish monarchy. He was the son of Kish a Benjamite, a man of no great estimation in his tribe, but of considerable property (1 Sam. ix. 1), originally settled at Zelah. Saul's pedigree is given in two or three different places, with some variations (1 Chron. viii. 29-40, ix. 35-44). These, however, may be reconciled by the very natural supposition that there were two of the family who bore the name of Kish. The exact descent would then be:—

Or there might be two named Ner.

When Samuel was advanced in life, and his sons by their corrupt and feeble administration had disgusted the people, the elders came to him to Ramah with a demand that he would appoint a king (1 Sam. viii. 1-5). The demand was the more urgent, because an apprehension (realized not long after) was felt of invasion by Nahash king of the Ammonites (20, xii. 12). Samuel was displeased at what he deemed a personal slight, but was directed by Jehovah to comply with the people's request (viii. 7-22). It happened about this time that the asses of Kish had strayed away; and Saul was desired by his father to go and search for them. He went attended by a servant; but, as after a weary journey they were unsuccessful, and they had wandered near Samuel's residence, the servant proposed that they should consult the seer. They therefore proceeded to the city, and met Samuel going out to the neighbouring high place. Samuel had been before secretly monished by God that a Benjamite would come to him who should be chosen king. Accordingly on seeing Saul he invited him to his house, apprised him of his destiny, placed him in the most honourable seat, and before he dismissed him the next day anointed him, and told him to return home, describing certain occurrences that would befall him by the way. These all happened as foretold; and as Saul went God gave him a new heart, endowed him with the spirit of kingly rule and political wisdom. Samuel now called the people together at Mizpeh; and there the king was chosen by lot. 'The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord' (Prov. xvi. 33). He therefore who in his secret counsel had selected Saul could easily by his over-ruling providence make the public decision fall upon the same individual. Saul had modestly on the announcement hid himself among the baggage of the assembled tribes; but, when he was produced, he was found to be the goodliest person present, of commanding stature and noble deportment. He might be, perhaps, thirty-five years old at the time; as we subsequently find, after the second year of his reign, that he had a son Jonathan grown to man's estate (1 Sam. xiii. 1, 2). His appearance was the signal of general applause. The constitution was formally settled. Presents were offered: a band of men held themselves in ready attendance on their new sovereign; though there were some who took exception at the appointment. Saul then—and it is a singular feature in the narrative—returned quietly to his own city Gibeah, his usual residence and probably his birth-place, and there resumed for a while his ordinary occupations (ix., x.).

Soon the apprehended Ammonitish invasion occurred. Nahash invested Jabesh-gilead, and would grant the inhabitants only ignominious terms. These they were obliged to accept, if no relief reached them in a week. The intelligence was carried to Gilboah; and Saul as he was returning from his pastoral employments heard the wail of the people. On being informed of the cause, he sent, like a king, a hasty imperative summons through the coasts of Israel, collected in a few days a force of 330,000 men, and within the stipulated time defeated Nahash and delivered Jabesh. Now indeed his name stood high; and the people would have put to death those who had formerly objected to him. But he nobly declared: 'There shall not a man be put to death this day; for to-day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel.' There was then another rejoicing assembly at Gilgal: a fresh solemn inauguration of Saul took place; and from this time he took upon him the government of the kingdom (xi.).

Ingenious men who write in haste have fancied a special connection between Jabesh-gilead and Benjamin, arising from the event narrated in Judges xxi. 8-14, which the rather influenced, they think, Saul and the Benjaminites to hurry to the relief of Jabesh. But two important particulars are overlooked in such a fancy: first, the marriage of the 400 young women from Jabesh occurred at least three centuries before, for Phinehas, Eleazar's son, was then alive (xx. 28); and, next, as all their relatives were put to death in the fury of the Israelites, Jabesh must have been subsequently peopled by other families, whose descendants in the time of Saul were not more closely related to the Benjaminites than the tribes generally, as the posterity of a common ancestor. It may be added here that, whereas objections have been made to the possibility of raising and setting on march a large army in so short a time, these objections have been very satisfactorily disposed of by Dr. Kitto in his Daily Bible Readings, thirty-first week, third and fourth days.

Saul had now a noble career before him; and, had he but answered his early promise, had he been obedient to the word of the Lord, his name might have shone with holy brilliancy, and his throne have been inherited in honourable succession from age to age by the long line of his descendants.

He appears to have first turned his attention to the relations of Israel with the Philistines. Philistine garrisons occupied many Israelitish strong holds; and, besides, so far as arms went, the Israelites were utterly unable to cope with their foes: there was scarce an armourer or smith in the land—the southern part of Palestine we must suppose—so that not merely for weapons, but even for agricultural implements, resort must be made to Philistine artizans. When Saul therefore raised a small body of men in the second year of his reign, and Jonathan his son at the head of a detachment had overthrown a Philistine pillar, which was taken as a signal for war, and Philistine thousands poured forth to avenge the dishonour done them, and to ravage the country, Saul was almost literally defenceless. Here was a trial of the king's faith. He had been charged generally not to offer sacrifice till Samuel came to him. He might have known that only as the Lord was with him could he hope to prevail in the coming struggle, and that he could not expect the Lord's aid if he disregarded the solemn charge of the prophet. But his impatient temper broke out. He could not bear delay. He offered his sacrifice; and just afterwards Samuel appeared, and warned him that he had failed on trial, and that he must not imagine with such a disobedient mind that his kingdom would be established. Yet after this, by means of Jonathan, the Lord wrought a great deliverance for Israel. A victory was gained, which would have been far more complete had it not been for a rash and foolish execration under which the king laid the people, and to which he would actually have made his son a victim, had not the army, with infinitely-better feeling, interposed. As it was, Saul had succeeded in defeating the Philistines, and he had received a solemn warning, to which if he had attended, and curbed his rash folly thereafter, his reign might still have been glorious (1 Sam. xiii., xiv.).

Saul was essentially a warrior king. In the course of his reign he fought against various surrounding nations, generally it would seem with success (xiv. 47); he consequently enriched his people with spoil (2 Sam. i. 24). He does not appear himself to have indulged in the luxurious splendour of a court. He was distinguished indeed of course by the royal diadem and bracelet (10), and on festivals he entertained his high officers (1 Sam. xx. 5, 18, 24, 25); but he is almost always described with his weapon in his hand or at his side, the ready soldier rather than the peaceful sovereign (xviii. 10, 11, xix. 9, 10, xx. 33, xxii. 6, xxvi. 7).

He was now to be tried again: a crisis had arrived; and the Lord would see whether or no the hot will would yield itself to his command. Saul had a commission given him quite in accordance with his temper. He was to put himself at the head of his troops and smite the Amalekites, a nation that had been the earliest enemy of Israel (Exod. xvii. 8-16), and that had again and again vexed them when settled in Canaan (Judges iii. 13, vi. 3). His partial fulfilment of the charge, and his mean defence of his conduct to Samuel, are detailed in the painful narrative of 1 Sam. xv.; and he was solemnly told that his kingdom should be given to another better than himself. Grievous was the humiliation to the proud and fiery king. He clutched at Samuel's garment as the prophet moved mournfully away, and begged him to turn with him once more. But this was not the genuine sorrow of true repentance: it was the fear of being dishonoured in the presence of his subjects. Samuel complied in pity for the moment; and then he left him, to visit him no more in this world; and sadly did he grieve for one who was so fallen.

The rest of Saul's history must be briefly told. His mind preyed upon itself. On every man of note in his kingdom his eye would rest with an unquiet suspicion that he might be the one to take his throne. The Spirit of the Lord was departed from him; and an evil demon mastered him. His ancient valour was well-nigh extinguished. He, almost a giant himself, was like his subjects cowed at the very shout of Goliath (xvii. 11). Relieved sometimes by minstrelsy (xvi. 14-23), he began to have a new terror. The minstrel, the shepherd-boy who so marvellously defeated the monstrous Philistine, and was gaining a name, perhaps he was the destined future king (xviii. 6-9). Saul's moodiness had now an object. It was the more bitter to him because at first he had loved David (xvi. 21), the only one who seemed able to procure him relief; and now to find in him a rival! Henceforth the king's life was but a series of insane attempts to entrap and to destroy David. Thwarted in this by his son Jonathan, and imagining that the high priest had leagued against him, his passion boiled over: he cruelly ordered the slaughter of the priests, and scoured the country in search of David. Twice was his life in David's power; and twice he melted at David's remonstrances, and at the remembrance of the love he had once borne him. There is no character in history more pitiable than this wretched king, swayed by evil impulse, tormented by his own conscience, powerless as it seemed for everything but mischief. His better thoughts, if temporarily awakened, were stings and scourges to him (xviii.—xxiv., xxvi.).

Little chronological information is given us of Saul's reign. He is commonly said to have reigned forty years. But perhaps the text relied on in support of this view (Acts xiii. 21) included the administration, wholly or partially, of Samuel. For Samuel was an old man, not able to bear the weight of government, before a king was made (1 Sam. viii. 1, 5, xii. 2). And yet he lived till nearly the end of Saul's reign, certainly till David had been some time a fugitive, apparently almost to the period when David took refuge at the court of Achish, which was less than a year and a-half before Saul's death (xxv. 1, xxvii. 1, 2, 7, xxviii. 3). Besides, we have seen reason to suppose that Saul might be thirty-five at his accession: his last actions are not like those of a man of seventy-five. Mr. Browne has discussed the matter in his Ordo Sæctor., part i. chap. v. sect. 1. pp. 260-263. He is unable to fix any precise period, but concludes that Saul reigned not less than seven years. Winer is inclined to suppose twenty years, 1075-1055 B.C. (Bibl. RWB., art. 'Saul').

We are unable, then, to say exactly how long a time had passed from that triumphal day when, victor over Nahash, Saul was hailed the mighty king of the Lord's people, to the last sad catastrophe. But it came soon enough. A dark cloud hangs over the closing scene. Occupied with his vain attempts to seize David, with his cruelties to the priests and the Gibeonites (2 Sam. xxi. 2), the king appears to have neglected to secure his dominions against foreign invasion. Accordingly the Philistines took their opportunity, and poured in their troops into the very heart of the country. Saul was terribly alarmed. In vain he sought to enquire of God; and Samuel was gone. He took the very worst course he could have chosen. He had in his better days put down those that had familiar spirits; but now he must needs find one. And he crossed the country disguised, we are told, at night, and desired the woman to whom he was conducted at En-dor to raise him up Samuel. We can hardly doubt that some supernatural appearance there was; and Saul heard again the tale of his evil deeds, and the sentence that a few brief hours more and he should be in the eternal world. He threw himself on the ground in dismay, and was with difficulty roused to take some sustenance. But who can conceive the thoughts of the unhappy man as he rode back to his camp? The battle was fought: the Hebrews were worsted; and Saul, miserably wounded, fell upon his own sword. Three of his sons fell with him. And the Philistines cut off his head, and stripped him of his arms, sending these into their own land to be placed in their idol-temples, and in bitter scorn suspended his body to the wall of Bethshan. But the men of Jabesh-gilead, mindful of his early deliverance of them, made a bold expedition by night, took down the bodies, burnt them, and buried their bones, fasting seven days (1 Sam. xxviii., xxix. 1, xxxi.; 2 Sam. ii. 5, 6). David uttered a noble lament over Saul and Jonathan (i. 19-27), and subsequently removed the ashes to the tomb of Kish, Saul's father (xxi. 12-14).

3. Saul of Tarsus (Acts vii. 58, viii. 1). See PAUL.

SA'ARAN (1 Macc. vi. 43). An appellation given to Eleazar of the Maccabean family, perhaps corrupted from Avaran (ii. 5).

SAV'AS (1 Esdr. viii. 2). Uzzi, one in the line of high-priests (Ezra vii. 4).

SAVIOUR. This word, implying a deliverer, one generally who saves, is used of any who preserved or rescued others (Judges iii. 9, marg.; 2 Kings xiii. 5; Neh. ix. 27; Obad. 21). But, inasmuch as such deliverers are but instruments in the divine hand, God is more especially called the Saviour, and that not merely because he delivers from temporal calamities, but from those which are more fearful and more lasting (Psal. cvi. 21; Isai. xliii. 3, 11, xlv. 21; Jer. xiv. 8; Hos. xiii. 4). Sin is the great evil of creation; and the penalty and consequences of sin the heavy burden which presses on the human race. To be delivered from sin and all that sin entails is to be saved indeed; and he that so delivers is emphatically 'the Saviour.' God effects such deliverance by his Son, who came into the world for this purpose, and bore a name expressive of this power, Jesus, for he was to 'save his people from their sins' (Matt. i. 21). In the New Testament therefore the word is appropriated (Luke i. 47 being in a degree an exception) to the Lord Jesus Christ (ii. 11; John iv. 42; Acts v. 31, and elsewhere). And it is a doctrine full of unspeakable comfort that 'he is able to save them to the uttermost that come to God by him' (Heb. vii. 25).

Christ is a Saviour because he became a sacrifice for sin. This is the cardinal doctrine of the gospel, perpetually illustrated and enforced throughout the New Testament. Archbishop Thomson well shows the agreement in teaching between the apostles and their Master on this great matter, and sums up his view of the salvation wrought by Christ, as follows:—'1. God sent his Son into the world to redeem lost and ruined men from sin and death; and the Son willingly took upon him the form of a servant for this purpose; and thus the Father and the Son manifested their love for us. 2. God the Father laid upon his Son the weight of the sins of the whole world; so that he bare in his own body the wrath which men must else have borne, because there was no other way of escape for them; and thus the atonement was a manifestation of divine justice. 3. The effect of the atonement thus wrought is that man is placed in a new position, freed from the dominion of sin, and able to follow holiness; and thus the doctrine of the atonement ought to work in all the hearers a sense of love, of obedience, and of self-sacrifice. In shorter words, the sacrifice of the death of Christ is a proof of divine love and of divine justice, and is for us a document of obedience' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1159). See ATONEMENT.

SAW. This instrument was used by the Hebrews for sawing both wood and stone (1 Kings vii. 9). Ancient saws have been discovered, as a double-handed iron one at Nimroud. Egyptian saws appear to have been only single-handed; the teeth inclining, as is now customary in the east, towards the handle, and not from it like ours. It is not quite clear whether David's putting the subdued Ammonites under saws (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chron. xx. 3) implied torture: the last-named place would certainly favour the notion that it did. Sawing asunder was a punishment, still practised in the east. According to Jewish tradition Isaiah was so put to death (Heb. xi. 37).

SCAPE-GOAT. One of the two goats presented 'before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation' (Lev. xvi. 7) on the day of atonement. Lots were cast upon them; one to be 'for the Lord,' the other 'for the scape-goat,' or 'for Azazel' (8: comp. marg.). The ceremonies and typical meaning of the service have been already described: see ATONEMENT, DAY OF: it is proposed here briefly to enquire into the meaning of 'scape-goat' or 'Azazel.' Various interpretations have been given to the word 'Azazel,' which is used only in connection with this goat. Some writers would understand the name of a place, as a precipice—one not far from Jerusalem has been supposed—from which the goat was to be thrown, or a desert in which he was to be left. But there is little to recommend this view. Others translating 'the averter' imagine it originally the name of an idol, applied to some evil demon, supposed to dwell in the desert and to be appeased with sacrifices, or even to Satan himself. This, however, is a most untenable notion. Dr. Fairbairn thinks that a kind of personification of oblivion is meant, as we sometimes find of Hades, in our version 'hell' (Isai.

xiv.). The sins being 'atoned,' he says, are dismissed, 'by a symbolical bearer, to the realms of the ideal prince of separation and oblivion, that they may never more appear among the living' (Typology of Script., Append. C. vol. ii.). But such a personification, apposite in poetry, would hardly find place in a legal ceremony. Perhaps the sense put upon 'Azazel' 'for complete sending away' is preferable, with a nearly-similar indication, that, as the goat was altogether removed, so the sins it symbolically bore were carried out of sight. The application of the term to the goat itself, as in our version 'scape-goat,' i.e. goat sent out, is now generally deemed untenable.

SCARLET (Gen. xxxviii. 28, 30; Exod. xxv. 4, xxvi. 1, 31, 36, xxvii. 16, xxviii. 5, 6, 8, 15, xxxv. 6, 23, 25, xxxviii. 18, 23, xxxix. 3, 5, 8, 29; Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 49, 51, 52; Numb. iv. 8, xix. 6; Josh. ii. 18, 21; 2 Sam. i. 24; Prov. xxxi. 21; Sol. Song iv. 3; Isai. i. 18; Lam. iv. 5; Dan. v. 7, 16, 29; Nah. ii. 3; Matt. xxvii. 28; Heb. ix. 19; Rev. xvii. 3, 4, xviii. 12, 16). See COLOURS.

SCEPTRE. A rod or staff of authority, often richly decorated (Ezek. xix. 11). Hence a king is designated as one that 'holdeth the sceptre' (Amos i. 5). At the Persian court the holding-out of the sceptre to a person was a mark of the king's grace and favour to him (Esth. iv. 11, v. 2, viii. 4). A carved ivory staff found at Nimroud is supposed to be a sceptre. The word is often used figuratively as denoting authority or dominion (Gen. xlix. 10; Numb. xxiv. 17; Psal. xiv. 6; Isai. xiv. 5; Heb. i. 8).

SCE'VA (fitted, prepared). A Jewish priest whose sons were exorcists (Acts xix. 14).

SCHISM (1 Cor. i. 10, marg., xi. 18, marg., xii. 25). The word so translated means properly a 'rent' (Matt. ix. 16; Mark ii. 21); hence, figuratively, division of opinion, dissension (John vii. 43, ix. 16, x. 19). Schism, as now understood among us, is a separation in the church for external things as distinguished from heresy, which is a false opinion on some doctrine or article of faith.

SCHOOL. The education of the young, i.e. the training of them in useful (especially religious) knowledge, is often referred to in scripture and made incumbent upon parents (Gen. xviii. 19; Exod. xii. 26, 27; Deut. vi. 6, 7; Psal. lxxviii. 4-8; Prov. xxii. 6); and parents are censured for the neglect of this duty, and of the salutary restraint under which they should keep their families (1 Sam. iii. 13). The principle laid down, it is natural to suppose that special instructors would be employed, and that children would be gathered into institutions, or associated for the purpose of acquiring knowledge. And so, according to Jewish writers, schools were established from the earliest ages. We read, however, nothing of them in the sacred volume, prior to the notice of those academies which were termed 'schools of the prophets.' That in later times there were eminent teachers around whom pupils flocked is evident enough. Gamaliel was such a teacher; and it was at his feet that St. Paul was brought up (Acts xxii. 3). And this phrase expresses very clearly the mode in which instructions were delivered: the scholars were literally at their masters' feet. The pseudo-Ambrose, describing such a school, says that the elders occupied chairs, those next to them benches, while the juniors were on hassocks on the floor (Ambros. Op., edit. Bened., tom. ii. App. col. 159). But according to the Talmud the masters sat, while the scholars stood. The 'school of Tyrannus' (Acts xix. 19) may have been the lecture-room of a Greek sophist, or, if Tyrannus were a Jew, a private synagogue. The schoolmaster (Gal. iii. 24, 25) was the tutor, the trusty slave, appointed to exercise a general care over his youthful master, attending to his studies and his recreations.

SCHOOLS OF THE PROPHETS. See PROPHET, p. 729.

SCIENCE (Dan. i. 4; 1 Tim. vi. 20). See PHILOSOPHY.

SCORPION. Scorpio is a genus of the class Arachnida, order Pulmonaria, section Pedipalpi. This genus is distinguished from other groups of spiders, by having the abdomen articulated and terminated by a curved spur: the palpi are large; and the terminal segment assumes the form of the lobster's claw, being in like manner provided with pincers. The scorpion properly so called has six eyes. These creatures inhabit hot countries, and lurk under stones and among ruins. They run swiftly, curving the tail over the back: this they can turn in any direction, and use for attack or defence, as it is provided with a sting. Scorpions are common in Palestine and the neighbouring countries (Deut. viii. 15; Luke x. 19); but their sting, though painful, is not fatal. The word 'scorpion' is sometimes used figuratively to describe wicked and injurious men (Ezek. ii. 6; Rev. ix. 3, 5, 10). Some have imagined a resemblance between an egg and a scorpion (Luke xi. 12); but Dr. Thomson assures us that this is a mistake. The ordinary scorpion is black, though a white scorpion is spoken of by old writers (The Land and the Book, pp. 246, 247). The 'scorpions' of 1 Kings xii. 11, 14 denoted a kind of loaded whip.

SCOURGE. Two modes of scourging are mentioned in scripture. One was under the Hebrew law. The Roman mode of whipping was with rods; and this punishment could not legally be inflicted on a Roman citizen (Acts xvi. 22, 23, 37-39, xxii. 24-29; 2 Cor. xi. 25). See PUNISHMENTS, pp. 740, 741.

SCREECH-OWL. See OWL.

SCRIBE. There are two words in Hebrew, both implying 'writers,' which designate certain classes of men. We find the first of these, shōterim, used at an early period for the officers of the Israelites in Egypt (Exod. v. 6, 10, 14, 15, 19). Persons to whom this appellation is given are mentioned in the later history of the nation, and are distinguished from other office-bearers, such as elders or judges (Numb. xi. 16; Deut. xx. 5, 8, 9; Josh. viii. 33; 1 Chron. xxiii. 4). They seem to have acted in both a civil and a military capacity. The duties of such persons must have required writing for taking account of those under them, administering justice, mustering an army, &c.; hence the name. In our version the word is almost exclusively translated 'officers.' The other title is sōpherim, usually rendered 'scribes.' Some of these were high functionaries (1 Kings iv. 3). The 'king's scribe' or secretary (2 Kings xii. 10) was probably the officer who wrote down the edicts of the sovereign. The 'scribe of the host' (Jer. lli. 25) may be supposed to have had charge of the muster-rolls of the army. In 2 Chron. xxvi. 11 one of the sōpherim and one of the shōterim (in our version 'ruler') are spoken of as numbering the troops under a superior officer. In the later books the name sōpherim is given to a class of persons skilled in the law and the sacred writings. Thus Ezra is called 'a ready scribe in the law of Moses' (Ezra vii. 6); Baruch, too, was a scribe (Jer. xxxvi. 32).

The scribes of the New Testament were of this class; which no doubt multiplied after the return from Babylon. They were held in great respect among the people; and this they courted (Luke xx. 46); and their position was acknowledged by our Lord himself while he censured their conduct (Matt. xxiii. 2, 3). They are mentioned with the chief priests in the temple (xxi. 15; Luke xx. 1), and as a class had more authority than the hereditary priesthood: they made part of the great council or sanhedrim with the chief priests and elders (Matt. xxvi. 3; Mark xiv. 53, xv. 1; Luke xxii. 66). They were very numerous, a special body found in Jerusalem and in the country districts (v. 17), and according to Josephus also in Rome (Antiq., lib. xviii. 3, § 5). Besides the position which some of them occupied as councillors, they had schools in which they taught their disciples (Luke ii. 46; Acts v. 34, xxii. 3), and they gave advice to those who consulted them more privately. For the term 'scribes' seems to have included those who were 'lawyers' or 'doctors of the law': it was a comprehensive word; while the 'lawyers,' specially, were the jurists whose duty it was to interpret the law. It may be added that, though the scribes appear most closely and frequently connected with the Pharisees (e.g. Matt. v. 20), yet some of them must have been Sadducees (Acts xxiii. 9).

In their teachings and expositions the scribes had overlaid the scripture with tradition. It is no marvel, therefore, that we find them in determined opposition to our Lord, and pointed at by his severest censures. They were continually trying to embarrass and entangle him by subtle questions: they watched him to find matter of accusation against him, and frequently perverted his words and deeds (Matt. ix. 3, xii. 38, xxii. 35; Luke v. 30, vi. 7, x. 25, xi. 53, 54, xv. 2, xx. 19-22). With reason, therefore, did he pronounce them hypocrites, blind and unfaithful guides, and ask how, such being their character, they expected to escape a terrible judgment (Matt. xxiii. 13-33). See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Schreiber,' 'Schriftgelehrte.' But yet the name was honourable; and the gravity and learning of the conscientious scribe were to be imitated by those who would advance the kingdom of God (Matt. xiii. 52, xxiii. 34).

SCRIP. A bag or wallet, often made of hair-cloth (1 Sam. xvii. 40; Matt. x. 10). Dr Thomson describes a leathern bag hanging from the shoulders of the modern labourers in Syria, which he thinks identical with the 'scrip' of the bible. It is made of the skin of a kid stripped off whole and tanned by a simple process (The Land and the Book, p. 345). The injunction to the apostles to carry neither money nor scrip (Matt. x. 9, 10) was to facilitate their gaining the confidence of those among whom they went. In the east at the present day the hearts of the people are won by those who freely throw themselves on their hospitality.

SCRIPTURE. The word by which we specially designate the contents of the bible. It does not appear in the Old Testament in our sense of it; the expression of Dan. x. 21 probably meaning a true writing; but the idea is not unfamiliar in the later books, where reference is made to a written standard (e.g. 2 Chron. xxx. 5, 18). In the New Testament the word graphē frequently occurs, with some variation of form, applied exclusively to the sacred writings, sometimes with a narrower (as to a single composition, e.g. Acts viii. 32), sometimes with a more extended meaning. When in the plural number the collected inspired books are of course more particularly intended (e.g. Matt. xxi. 42, xxii. 29; Luke xxiv. 27; John v. 39; 1 Cor. xv. 3).

There have been already several articles in this volume relating to the scripture, indicating its divisions and arrangement, the books which have a right to be included in it, the reason there is for believing it God's word, &c: see BIBLE, CANON, INSPIRATION: it is proposed in the present article to discuss as fully as the allotted space may permit the credibility of the scripture; the grounds being succinctly stated on which we receive it as containing truth. The investigation must, of course, be mainly directed to the historical parts. The prophecies in it have a confirmation of their own. For, if it can be shown that many of them have been remarkably fulfilled long after they were delivered, it can hardly be alleged that they were the happy guesses of sagacious men: they must have proceeded from One who could declare 'the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done' (Isai. xlv. 10). The doctrines, also, taught in scripture have other authentication: their sublimity, the mighty power by which they have been enforced, the revolution they have effected in the world, are proofs that they are not the mere devices of the human brain. See CHRISTIANITY.

Historically, then, we want to see if we may rely upon the narratives of scripture, if it is what it professes to be—a genuine record of past events, if the persons of whom we read in it really lived and acted as we are told they did, if the picture of human life it gives is a faithful representation which we may accept without misgiving. The proofs of all this may be taken from various sources: we may examine the character and position of the writers of scripture, and judge of the little likelihood there was of their combining to deceive. We may lay together the different books, and perceive their admirable consistency, quite incompatible with fraud. We test the scripture by other histories and yet-existing monuments, and we shall find that there is singular collateral and external evidence that we have truth in the revered volume. Let us sift some of these proofs.

That the scripture has come down to us uncorrupted and substantially the same as when its several parts were originally written is sufficiently clear. It has always been watched over with jealousy; and endeavours to tamper with it have been checked at once. Manuscripts of the New Testament have been preserved, dating but three or four hundred years after our Lord's time; and the numerous citations by the very earliest authors, Christian, heretic, and even pagan, carry up the proof still higher. With regard to the scriptures of the Old Testament, they have the sanction of Christ himself; and, besides, we have a translation of them made into Greek between two and three centuries before the Christian era. All this, however, has been argued elsewhere (see CANON OF SCRIPTURE, pp. 134, 135); and therefore we may fairly assume that we are dealing with works of the most remote antiquity, composed, as can be distinctly proved of many of them, by those who witnessed or took part in the events they describe. In estimating the credibility of a book, we must ascertain whether the writer was well-informed, and whether he would be likely to tell the truth. Now, as it has been just observed, several of the scripture writers claim to be eye-witnesses of what they record. Paul, in some respects the most eminent and active of the first Christian teachers, was, it is acknowledged on all hands, the author of several of the letters which have come down to us. Some of the earlier books of scripture were—there is the strongest reason for believing—at least in part, from the pen of Moses the great Hebrew lawgiver. Some of the psalms were composed by David the renowned king. Ezra, the restorer of the Jewish polity, has left annals. And, though there are anonymous books in the volume, yet the absence of the name by no means, when the fact is properly explained, detracts from the value of the documents preserved. There are in every country annals and state-papers: the hand that penned them has never been identified; and yet no man on that account impeaches their authority.

We cannot then impute want of information to the scripture writers. They must have known whether Israel was in servitude in Egypt and was delivered thence. They must have known whether a royal line reigned in Judea, and whether God was worshipped with magnificent rites in Jerusalem. They must have known how the country was ruined, and what were the calamities inflicted by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. They must have had perfect knowledge of the life of Jesus, of his teaching, his rejection, his death, and the promulgation and success of his gospel. They were not—this succession of writers—the mere collectors of old legends, obliged to a painful search amid half-obliterated records: they lived among the men and scenes which they described. So that, if they have misrepresented matters, if they have given a false colouring, they must have acted on design, they must have had some purpose to serve, for which they were content to disregard truth, and were anxious to deceive the world. They were Hebrews. Had the history they composed been a panegyric on their nation, had it even been flattering to their own vanity, or served the purpose of advancing them in the world, we might have viewed their productions with suspicion. But what do we really find? There is no glossing-over of the faults of their most renowned ancestors: the national history is exhibited in dark tints; and we know that it was at the risk of life or at least of losing all that could render life desirable, that several of these writers gave their testimony. If any book, therefore, comes to us with fair presumption of truthfulness from the character and circumstances of the writer, the scripture has the strongest claim of the kind to be believed.

It must not be forgotten that it proceeds from a succession of authors in various ranks of life, extending in a lengthened chain over fifteen centuries. Some of these were contemporary; so that we have the same things from different pens. Some took up the thread where earlier labourers left it, and carrying it on for a while devolved it on those that came after. When ordinary historians write, they begin with correcting their predecessors. They have detected partiality or misapprehension: they have obtained access to fresh sources of information. And so they give a perfectly-new face to things; and it is not uncommon to find a statesman, a warrior, a monarch stigmatized by one writer, highly lauded by another. Bind up all the modern histories of any century or reign together, and see if you will have a consistent whole. By the binding together of the scripture records into a single volume, you subject their credibility to the severest test.

In examining the internal structure of a book, the first element of credibility is the consistency of one part with the rest. Faithful history does not contradict itself. It is true that such is the imperfection of human knowledge, that the most trustworthy writers are occasionally in error, and the most impartial let their own opinions colour the narrative they deliver. But we do not for small variations impeach any one's general credibility, nor, if we are unable exactly to reconcile different statements in regard to some event, do we at once throw aside the whole as a mere figment. On the contrary, when we see different writers agreeing in the main, though differing in particulars, we receive them as independent witnesses, and place the more reliance on the facts to which each after his special manner gives satisfactory testimony. Now the scripture, though subjected, as noted above, to a severe test, is seen to be throughout consistent. The events recorded in the earlier books are assumed as true and confirmed in the later. Thus the creation, the flood, the call of Abraham, the bondage of Israel in Egypt with the deliverance, the histories of David and Solomon, the Babylonish captivity, &c. &c. appear again and again; the later authors never treating these events as legendary or mythical, but basing argument and admonition upon them as acknowledged facts. In the parallel histories, too, of the Kings and Chronicles, and of the Gospels, we find the same things repeated, with additional circumstances doubtless, but yet without essential variation. And it is worth notice that the more remarkable stories, which in themselves might give rise to question, receive in this way strong confirmation. For example, the history of Balaam, and the portent of the dumb ass speaking with intelligent tongue, recorded in the Pentateuch (Numb. xxii. 21-35), are referred to by an apostle (2 Pet. ii. 15, 16); and the swallowing of Jonah by a fish, and his mission to Nineveh (Jonah i. 17, iii.), reappear in the Gospels with the solemn sanction of our Lord himself (Matt. xii. 40, xvi. 4; Luke xi. 29-32). There are yet more particular proofs of consistency. Theological writers, as Paley in his Horæ Paulinæ, and Blunt in his Undesigned Coincidences, have used a kind of cross-examination, and have thus produced most satisfactory and really-marvellous evidence of the credibility of scripture. Had there been fraud, it would have come out under such a process. And to add to the weight of the argument it must be always borne in mind that fraud if committed must have been carried on for centuries. If the scripture, consistent in its various parts as we have seen it to be, be untruthful, there must have been a combination, not of a knot of men at one particular juncture, not of the members of a sect which flourished for a while, but of persons living in widely-separated ages and in distant lands, of persons in all grades of society, with jarring interests and dissimilar objects, of hostile principles, Jews and Christians, opposed in everything else but accordant in this—to palm upon the world as facts events which never happened, annals life-like but of no authority, chronicles of kings, accounts of revolutions, and religions testified to by all of them, but yet baseless and imaginary. Such a combination the world never has heard of: it is contrary to all experience: the 'verifying faculty' of reasonable men's minds must reject it.

It is true that objections have been taken to scripture as exhibiting discrepancies. We are not concerned to discuss these here. For, even if we admit them, they do not shake the general credibility of the book. But yet we may reply that very many of these disappear on more careful examination, that the advance of general knowledge has tended to unravel difficulties heretofore considered inexplicable, and that it is but fair to conclude that, if we had fuller acquaintance with all the circumstances, many more perplexities would disappear. Such discrepancies have been considered by various biblical critics; and to their works the reader must be referred. Among these may be named Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, chap. xii. pp. 516-611; Horne's Introd., vol. ii. pp. 432-489. But it is necessary and fair to add that the great mass of the alleged discrepancies are of trivial moment, concerning dates and numbers and names, where especially transcribers were liable to error; and that minute accordance is the rule, the instances of discrepancy but exceptional.

The credibility of scripture has been argued on the ground of its internal consistency: we may also notice the moral phenomena of which, if true, it offers a satisfactory solution. There is much apparent in the present state of the world to perplex the most acute minds; and philosophers of the highest name, sensible of their own inability to grasp all that they desired to know, have expressed their ardent longing for some divine teacher. The state of man, the prevalence of disease and death, offer problems which mere reason finds it very hard to solve; the existence of an all-wise, all-merciful, and all-powerful Being being pre-supposed, the Creator and Sustainer of the world. The scripture pours a flood of light upon such topics. Herein it stands apart from all other books. It contains the highest philosophy, and has taken a hold upon mankind which no other has ever done. It fits in with all the existing phenomena of the world. If it does not reduce that which is infinite to the level of finite comprehension, it does at least deliver that rational history of man's formation and man's duties, of his responsibilities and the penalties of failure, which is sufficient for all practical guidance. There is philosophy in it most pure, there is intelligence most exalted, there is a key to mysteries which other theories and other books have left in their darkness. The preservation of the Jews, again, as a separate people, diffused everywhere yet not amalgamated with other nations, is accounted for in scripture. The spread and prevalence of Christianity cease to be strange, if we accept the narratives which we find in scripture. A multitude of particular examples might be produced: it must suffice to say that, when we find here adequate reasons for what we see, we have no contemptible proof that the record which supplies them is truthful—more especially when we remember that this record was produced among a people whom the rest of the world have disliked and contemned, and that it is the only record which is in consistency with the moral condition of mankind. Can such a book be untrue? We should then have the marvel of mighty effects flowing from no adequate cause.

But, still further, we have collateral evidence of the truth of scripture. Such collateral evidence, indeed, in regard to many parts of the bible it was hard to find. For several of the books comprised in it are, or at least profess to be, the most ancient in existence. Where there are no contemporary histories, we cannot look for that full authentication which is readily forthcoming in an age of books. The earliest facts of scripture then, are to be confirmed by traditions, by ritual observances, by inscriptions and monuments, all fragmentary in their nature, and such as it requires diligent research to collect and marshal. But the labours of archæologists have not been unrewarded. There are in various parts of the world traditions of the creation, the flood, the dispersion of mankind, the destruction of Sodom, &c. &c., which, though distorted, must be taken to point to facts—the very facts which are detailed in scripture. Writers have done good service in collecting these traditions; and the reader may find abundance of them in Rawlinson's Historical Evidences of the Truth of the Scripture Records, 1859: comp. Horne's Introd., edit. 1856, vol. i. pp. 143-199. As we proceed down the stream of time, such corroborative evidence is more abundant and precise. The histories of Egypt, of Assyria, of Babylon, of Persia, of Rome furnish much weighty attestation. We know from these independent sources how the Assyrian power extended itself, how great was the magnificence of Babylon, how that mighty city was captured by Cyrus, and how Judea was reduced to a Roman province—the very facts that we find narrated in scripture. There is Josephus, also, the Jewish historian, living in the apostolic age, who draws out in his works the ancient fortunes of his people, and describes events passing before his eyes. The names of personages mentioned in scripture repeatedly occur there: their actions are commemorated: their characters are described; and thus a general corroboration is given to the record. We must be prepared to find differences. Thus Tacitus the Roman writer (Hist., lib. v. 2-8) strangely misrepresents the origin of the Hebrew nation. Yet his narrative, warped as it was, goes to confirm the fact of the deliverance from Egypt, preserves the name of Moses, and exhibits some of those peculiar usages which the law, as we have it in the Pentateuch, distinctly specifies. There is also the testimony of writers immediately subsequent to the apostles, Christian, heretic, and pagan; who concur for the most part in facts, however they may differ in interpretation or in the doctrines to be deduced from them. It is not too much to say that no history is so largely corroborated as the scripture history in all those ways which contribute to the settling of belief; so that, if we are to discredit the scripture, to believe it a romance rather than a history, we are much more bound to discredit every history, of Greece or Rome or England, which exists in literature.

It may be fairly supposed that there are now few persons—so strong is the confirmatory evidence—who do not admit the general credibility of the scripture. But it has been alleged that with true history there is much mixed up that cannot be literally received, that a supernatural colouring has been given, a mythical or legendary element introduced, for which allowance must be made in sifting out real facts. These objections are directed almost exclusively against the miraculous parts of the scripture narrative; and it is held that a writer, whose grave account of kings and of the events in common life may be implicitly trusted, must be set down as a mere enthusiast, or as adopting pious fraud, when in the same paragraph he details with equal gravity the occurrence of a wonder or a sign. The subject of miracles has already been briefly discussed; and to the article upon them the reader must be referred. But it may be well to remark here that supernatural relations are so closely interwoven with the rest, that the events most objected to are so earnestly insisted on, being those in which the essence of scripture teaching consists, that if you reject these as 'unhistoric' there is little if anything that you can retain. Take, for example, the New Testament history: strip it of its supernatural character: suppose Jesus a mere man, born in a natural way, only living a peaceable, beneficent, and philosophic life: suppose that he was put to death unjustly, but that his memory was fragrant among his followers, and that hence they endeavoured to dignify him by attributing to him divine power and maintaining that he was restored to life after his execution: denude his story of all that shows the direct interference of God; and what have you? The disciples contending, suffering, dying for a phantom. The whole is a mere episode. It is a foolish attempt to strain very ordinary occurrences into something marvellous. So that you cannot, if you set aside the wonderful, have anything worth preserving. All left the scripture must stand or fall together.

Besides, very many of the supernatural accounts in scripture were written by those who profess to have been eye-witnesses of them. Even if we were to allow—which yet is by no means to be allowed—that those wrought at the deliverance from Egypt, in Babylon, &c., were chronicled only by later writers, yet we have unquestionably in the New Testament the evidence of contemporaries. It cannot be said, then, that these extraordinary recitals are just the exaggerations with which credulous men or poets are wont to deck out events imperfectly known, dimmed with the haze of vast antiquity. They stand upon the same ground with the records of common occurrences; so that the fair inference is that the writers, if credible in the one class of narrative, are credible also for the other: if they can be convicted of untruthfulness in what they relate of supernatural events, it is useless to contend for their veracity as to other matters. This is the plain rule continually acted on in judicial enquiries. If a witness is corroborated so far as to gain credit for his statements generally, he is believed when he charges home a crime upon a culprit. The business of life could hardly otherwise go on.

But, in addition to the more vague corroborations of scripture which have been already referred to, there are other testimonies of a more particular kind, which may be properly introduced here. They are the rather valuable, because they are independent: they are continually gaining force; and they apply to some of those statements which have been most keenly contested. It is true that we cannot point to a modern confirmation of miracle; but we can exhibit existing proofs of the fulfilment of scripture prophecies. The present state of Babylon, of Tyre, of Jerusalem, of Judea generally witnesses most forcibly to the credibility of scripture. It is proved to demonstration that the threatenings against these countries and cities were uttered while they were prosperous and populous, at a time when no political foresight could have discovered the fate that was in reserve for them. It is proved to demonstration that the desolations occurred just as they had been long before described; and there they are at this very day, patent to all who will journey thither, testifying that the scripture is true and its declarations to be relied on. For the full exhibition of this proof see PROPHECY, and works there noted.

Another branch of particular evidence is to be found in the relations travellers give us of the geography, the botany, the manners and customs of biblical countries. The scripture is still the best guide-book to Palestine, which others can only illustrate. Towns and villages are found where scripture places them; hills and mountains and springs and brooks are just as scripture has described them: articles of food are still used such as scripture mentions. And it is a general remark that men who have travelled in scripture lands, even if they had their doubts before, have been convinced by what they saw of the credibility of scripture writers. To those who have not had the advantage of visiting Palestine the published works of accomplished travellers have furnished nearly the same amount of testimony. Among such may be named Dr. Robinson's Biblical Researches, and Dr. Thomson's The Land and the Book, so often referred to in this volume. It would be perfectly useless to argue with any one who in studying these works did not find in them evidence not to be gainsaid that the authors of scripture wrote in good faith and are deserving of confidence. Such researches have furnished a full answer to innumerable objections. Thus for instance, when it is said that in one small district of Bashan there were three-score great cities 'fenced with high walls, gates, and bars' (Deut. iii. 4, 5; 1 Kings iv. 13), sceptics have been ready to deride the credulity of such as would receive the statement as a literal fact. But travellers have visited the region, and have found the cities, desolate it is true, but still standing in their extraordinary grandeur, the massive walls there, the streets with their ancient pavement unbroken, the houses complete and habitable, as if finished only yesterday, and even the very doors and window-shutters in their places. See Porter's Historico-geographical Sketch of Bashan, in Journ. of Sac. Lit., July 1854, pp. 281, 282, also his lately-published Giant Cities of Bashan.

Take again the account of St. Paul's voyage and shipwreck (Acts xxvii.). Mr. James Smith of Jordanhill, in his work repeatedly cited in these pages, has carefully investigated the localities: he has ascertained the character of the prevalent winds: he has calculated, after communication with experienced naval officers, the rate of drift and the direction a vessel would naturally take, and he finds the statement of scripture minutely accurate. 'A searching comparison of the narrative with the localities where the events, so circumstantially related, are said to have taken place, with the aids which recent advances in our knowledge of the geography and the navigation of the eastern part of the Mediterranean supply, accounts for every transaction, clears up every difficulty, and exhibits an agreement so perfect in all its parts as to admit of but one explanation, namely, that it is a narrative of real events, written by one personally engaged in them' (Introd., p. xviii.).

The explorations made of late years in Nineveh and Babylon have tended to confirm the credibility of scripture in many disputed points. It is true that we must receive the evidence so produced with caution. Inscriptions and monumental records are more likely to exaggerate the successes than to chronicle the disasters of the people by whom they were made. We could not reasonably expect to find in Egyptian monuments any detail of the judgments which forced the release of Israel. Neither was it likely that Sennacherib would record the fatal overthrow, when by God's immediate power his vast army perished in Judea. But much information may be and has been obtained by incidental notices. Thus it had been questioned whether such a king as Nebuchadnezzar ever reigned. His name, it was said, did not appear in Herodotus; and objectors, ready to avail themselves of every opportunity of carping at the sacred volume, if they did not deny the existence of the conqueror, at least insinuated that a petty satrap had been magnified into a great king. But now bricks in abundance have been disinterred, inscribed with the mighty Nebuchadnezzar's name, and proving that there was indeed foundation for the boast that it was he that had built and adorned his magnificent capital (Dan. iv. 30). Yet more serious doubt was expressed in regard to Belshazzar; and consequently the narrative of his feast and the awful sign which interrupted it was pronounced a fable. But it is now distinctly proved by the discovery of unquestionable records that a sovereign of that name was associated in power with his father during the last days of Babylon's independence. See BEL-SHAZZAR.

It would be easy to fill pages with particular examples of corroborative testimony to the truthfulness of scripture, derived from coins, tombs, ancient seals, from the thousand particular monuments and existing proofs which God's providence has uncovered to give living testimony of what occurred in ancient times. We have therefore the strongest reason to affirm that the scripture writers were truthful, that the facts they chronicle really occurred, that the histories they deliver are credible. Nor is this evidence set aside by the assertion not unfrequently now made, that the later books of scripture were the work of earnest conscientious men, who have given us indeed truly the facts of their own times, but who ignorantly attributed to the earlier books, the writings of a more remote age, that authority which they do not really possess, and who based much of their teaching upon fragments which are now found to crumble beneath the pressure. The credibility of the early part of scripture has been elsewhere touched (see PENTATEUCH); and the way in which Christ used the oldest portions of the scriptures may well be taken as guiding us to a right estimation of their value. To those indeed who regard Him as a mere man an appeal to his authority will seem of little weight. But with such the present argument does not deal. To men, however, who admit that Christ was a divinely-commissioned teacher, his sanction not merely to the ordinary facts of scripture history, but to the supernatural occurrences therein narrated, is of infinite importance. He, the founder of the new dispensation, besides assuming, as the accounts we have of him testify, the power of working miracles himself, admitted without question the miracles of the Old Testament (e.g. Matt. xxiv. 37-39; Luke iv. 25-27), and threw no doubt upon the narrative which embodied in it such wonders. The only alternative which remains is, if the credit of these facts is denied, to deny the competency of our Lord as a public instructor, imputing to him—with reverence be it spoken—ignorance and imperfection of judgment which would place him far behind the doctors of the present age. It is trusted that no reader of the present work is prepared for this awful alternative.

In scripture, then, we must acknowledge a book credible and of the highest authority, proceeding, it has been elsewhere shown, from persons commissioned by the living God. Whether a work so inspired is necessarily in all minute particulars infallible need not be here argued. We are not concerned therefore in this place to unravel every apparent difficulty. Such difficulties are not greater than nor of kind different from those we find in God's works of creation and providence. It may therefore be, in conclusion, said that the objections which have in modern times been urged against revelation and scripture truth, do not really meet, much less disprove, the positive arguments by which its authority is affirmatively attested. 'Not a proposition of them has been overthrown: not an argument has been weakened; not a fact changed; not a conclusion even involved in doubt.' Such is the deliberate judgment of Mr. Garbett in his Divine Plan of Revelation, p. 7; and the reasoning of his book, to which the reader may usefully refer, amply vindicates his statement, and adds from the orderly development, as he traces it, of the whole a fresh corroboration to the authority of holy scripture.

SCROLL (Isai. xxxiv. 4; Rev. vi. 14). The allusion is to the roll of a book. See MANUSCRIPTS, WRITING.

SCURVY. A disease (Lev. xxi. 20, xxii. 22). The original term conveys the idea of scratching or scraping. It is thought to be scurvy of a malignant kind. The same is also translated 'the scab' (Deut. xxviii. 27).

SCYTHIAN. The Scythians were the wild nomadic tribes who, like the more modern Tartars, roamed over the regions of Asia north of the Black and Caspian seas. They were most probably the descendants of Magog, and were known to the Israelites under that name. See MAGOG. The term is used by St. Paul (Col. iii. 11) to illustrate the large mercy of God, free to every nation. Comp. 2 Macc. iv. 47. For a disquisition on the Scythian dominion in Asia in connection with Josiah's exercise of sovereignty in the territory of the ten tribes, see Journ. of Sac. Lit., April 1853, pp. 1-34.

SCYTHO'POLIS (2 Macc. xii. 29). See BETH-SHEAN.

SCYTHOPOLITANS (2 Macc. xii. 30). Inhabitants of Scythopolis.

SEA. This word is used in scripture with considerable latitude. Besides designating seas properly so called, and that 'gathering together of the waters' (Gen. i. 10) which we regard as the ocean, it is applied to any considerable mass of water, salt or fresh, as to lakes, e.g. 'the salt sea' (xiv. 3); or even rivers, as the Nile (Isai. xix. 5; Nah. iii. 8) and the Euphrates (Isai. xxi. 1; Jer. li. 36). The following 'seas' are specially mentioned by the sacred writers:—

1. The 'sea of Chinnereth' (Numb. xxxiv. 11), termed also the lake or 'sea of Galilee' (Matt. iv. 18), of 'Gennesaret' (Luke v. 1), and of 'Tiberias' (John xxi. 1). See GENNESARET, SEA OF.

2. The Mediterranean sea washed the western coast of Palestine. This was generally called the 'great sea' (Numb. xxxiv. 6, 7; Josh. i. 4, ix. 1, xv. 47; Ezek. xlvii. 10, 15, 20); sometimes simply the 'sea' (Josh. xv. 46; Acts xvii. 14); also the 'utmost,' 'utmost,' or 'hinder sea' (Deut. xi. 24, xxxiv. 2; Joel i. 20; Zech. xiv. 8), because the east was considered geographically as in front of any one; and the 'sea of the Philistines' (Exod. xxiii. 31), because the Philistine territory lay along the coast of the Mediterranean. This sea, extending from the straits of Gibraltar to Asia Minor, and washing Spain and France, Italy and Greece, Syria and Palestine, Egypt and Libya, is of course frequently alluded to in scripture. The Tyrian commerce traversed it: the apostle Paul repeatedly crossed it. But a description of it belongs more particularly to a work on geography: let it be enough to add here the striking words of Johnson: 'The grand object of travelling is to see the shores of the Mediterranean. On those shores were the four great empires of the world, the Assyrian, the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman. All our religion, almost all our law, almost all our arts, almost all that sets us above savages has come to us from the shores of the Mediterranean' (Life, anno 1776).

3. The Red sea, in places where there could be no danger of confounding it with the Mediterranean, is not unfrequently called simply the 'sea' (e.g. Exod. xiv. 2; Josh. xxiv. 6). But its special name in Hebrew is sāph; the word signifying a woolly kind of sea-weed which is to this day plentifully found on the shores of the Red sea: it has been thought also to include a fluvial rush, such as the papyrus (see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1010). The Greeks gave the name of the Erythraean or Red sea not only to that Arabian gulf which we now so denominate, but also to the wide sweep of the ocean between the Indian and Arabian peninsulas. Whence that name was derived is not very certain. Some would have it taken from the red colour of the mountains on the western shores, some from the red coral, or the red appearance of the water occasioned by certain zoophytes: others again think that, as the Edomitish territory reached down to this gulf, it might be the sea of Edom, Edom meaning red; while it has been maintained, perhaps with greater reason, as the Himyaric tribes of southern Arabia bear a name implying red, that the sea was denominated from these red men.

The Red sea from the straits of Bab el-Mandeb to its most northerly point at Suez is about 1400 miles in length, from 12° 40' to 30° N. lat., its greatest width being about 200 miles: it is divided at Ras Mohammed by the Sinaitic peninsula into two large arms or gulfs, the easternmost, or Sinus Ælaniticus, now Bahr el-Akabah, running north-east or northerly about 100 miles, with an average width of 15 miles, while the westernmost, Sinus Heroopoliticus, now Bahr el-Suez, runs north-west near 180 miles, with an average width of 20. There is reason to believe that anciently this last gulf extended much farther northward to the lake of Heroopolis, now Birket el-Timsah; and it was connected by a canal with the Nile. Now the country at the head of the gulf is a waste and desert region, which may be a fulfilment of Isai. xi. 15, xix. 5; but, when the Red sea extended through it, it was irrigated and fertile.

The superficial area of this sea is about 180,000 square miles. It is of great depth; its deepest soundings being upwards of 1000 fathoms. The navigation is rendered difficult by groups of islands, coral-reefs, sand-banks, and the prevailing winds. The coral is abundant: some of it is red; but more generally it is white, occasionally beautifully variegated. The African coast is for the most part barren and sandy, with but a scanty population; the Arabian plains are parched; but the uplands are fertile. On both sides of the sea chains of mountains rise at some distance from the shore to a considerable height; many peaks being upwards of 6000 or 7000 feet.

The principal scriptural interest of the Red sea centres in the gulfs of Suez and Akabah. It was through some part of the former that the passage of the Israelites was made on their deliverance from Egypt (Exod. xiv.). When at last Pharaoh, compelled by the destruction of the first-born of Egypt, had thrust them out, the tribes proceeded, we are told, from Rameses, doubtless in Goshen, to Succoth, where they made their first encampment (xii. 37). Their journey was not along the ordinary road to Canaan, through the Philistine territory (xiii. 17), by which we may suppose they would have rounded the head of the gulf; but they were directed to turn, most probably southward, by Etham, in the edge of the wilderness, to Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over-against Baal-zephon (18, 20, xiv. 1). After their departure Pharaoh, who had been affrighted but not really humbled, determined to pursue them. He had information that they had quitted the regular route; they were entangled among mountains; and their further progress was barred by the sea. It seemed as if the mighty arm that had hitherto defended them was now withdrawn. The standing force of six hundred chariots, with all the other chariots of Egypt that could be hastily collected, were at once in motion. There are no infantry mentioned; and the 'horsemen' must have been those who rode in the chariots, each of which usually held two persons, now perhaps three. This formidable body speedily overtook the Israelites, whose retreat it was evidently Pharaoh's object to cut off. He encamped therefore between them and the head of the sea; while they, utterly dispirited at the sight of their former masters, could not, it is clear, have made any resistance. Perhaps it was evening when the Egyptian army took up their position. And the guiding cloud which had hitherto preceded changed its place, stood between the two hosts, a pillar of fire to give light to Israel, while it cast additional gloom upon the Egyptians. Then, on the cry of Moses to the Lord, the signal was given, at the lifting of his rod, for the Israelites to move on. Their column must have been a very broad one; and as they marched all night the sea was probably some miles wide. The Egyptians soon perceived that the tribes were gone, and ignorant, it may be thought, of the miracle, they pursued. In vain: they could not come up with Israel: disasters overtook them: their chariots could make no way on the unsound ground: perhaps there were storms which beat against them (Psal. lxxvii. 15-20); and, when the morning dawned and Israel was saved, at the lifting up again of the wonder-working rod, the sea returned to its strength, and the Egyptians perished. Ever after was this great deliverance cited as the most marvelous interference of God for his people.

Various conjectures have been formed, with greater or less probability, as to the point where this stupendous miracle was wrought. It may have been below the modern Suez. But many of these conjectures are based on the presumption that the localities continue nearly the same as they were in the days of Moses. Considering that the gulf extended anciently, as above remarked, much farther than it now does, it is not unreasonable to believe that the passage was where there is at present a sandy waste. Possibly the Israelites marched through what is now the Wady et-Tumeylat, or it may be along the Wady et-Teah, which leads to the Red sea from opposite Memphis. But we cannot presume to suppose the route certainly discovered. Some have chosen to imagine that there were fords; and that Moses took advantage of low water, which the Egyptians disregarding were overwhelmed. Even if we were to concede this, the transaction would not be reduced to an ordinary event. Whence, it might still be asked, the knowledge that Moses had of the right time to cross, and the skill with which he carried his vast multitudes safely through? Whence, too, the strange blindness which made the Egyptians, who must have been well acquainted with the fords and the tides, rush on to inevitable destruction? To explain away the miracle renders the whole account unnatural and incredible. And how, if it were mere skilful management, could that profound impression have been made upon the Canaanitish nations, which we find years afterwards paralyzing them when the people so wonderfully appeared before their cities? (Josh. ii. 10).

The gulf of Akabah also claims some notice. It is as if it were a continuation of the Arabah running down from the Dead sea. It is enclosed by barren mountains; and violent winds and strong currents render its navigation very dangerous. Yet at its head were the ancient ports of Elath and Ezion-geber, where ships were prepared for the voyage to Ophir (1 Kings ix. 26, xxii. 48). Here, too, the hand of God was displayed (2 Chron. xx. 35-37).

4. The Salt sea bears a variety of names in scripture. It is sometimes simply 'the sea,' where misconception is impossible (Ezek. xlvii. 8); it is more frequently the 'salt sea' (Gen. xiv. 3; Numb. xxxiv. 3, 12; Josh. xv. 2, 5, xviii. 19): it is also the 'sea of the plain,' i.e. of the Arabah (Deut. iv. 49; 2 Kings xiv. 25); and sometimes the last two appellations are used together, the one as explanatory of the other (Deut. iii. 17; Josh. iii. 16, xii. 3): it is, besides, termed the 'east sea' and the 'former sea,' i.e. the sea in front, an observer being supposed to look towards the east (Ezek. xlvii. 18; Joel ii. 20; Zech. xiv. 8). By later writers it was distinguished as the Asphaltic lake, and sea of Sodom; but it is now generally known as the Dead sea, from the belief that neither animal nor vegetable life subsisted in it, or indeed near it. The Arabs term it Bahr Lâit, the 'sea of Lot.'

This remarkable expanse of water is of an elongated oval shape; save that the regularity of the figure is broken by a large peninsula projecting from the eastern shore near to the southern end, dividing the whole into two reaches which communicate by a somewhat-narrow channel. The extreme length is about 46 miles, the greatest breadth above 10 miles. The superficial area has been estimated at about 300 square miles; but, as it would seem that the water does not constantly stand at the same level, that carried off by evaporation not always balancing that brought in by streams, the dimensions of the lake are subject to not-inconsiderable variation. It is bounded east and west by lines of bare mountains broken by clefts and ravines, and indented by remarkable terraces. The eastern chain is the loftier, and is brown or red in colour, while the western heights are grey and white. There is little vegetation except where a spring gushes forth; and then around it are reeds and thorn-bushes and palm-trees, with other plants; but the general aspect is burnt and barren, presenting often scenes of rugged and utter desolation. At the south-western end is a ridge of rock salt, dislocated and furrowed; detached pieces of which look like pillars. On the margin on the western side is a beach of varying width, of shingle, sometimes intermixed with marl, chalk, and gypsum, and various kinds of débris. Mr. Grove mentions three parallel beaches along a considerable part of the western shore: they are one above the other, the highest 50 feet above the water. A line of drift-wood encircles the lake, branches and limbs of trees, brought down by the Jordan and other torrents, and marking the highest level of the water. There is a salt and stony plain at the north-east corner, but of the eastern side little has been explored. To the south is a plain called el-Ghôr, part of which is salt and barren and muddy, part fertile, well-wooded and watered. The Ghôr is closed by hills to the south, beyond which is the great Arabah, extending to the eastern gulf of the Red sea; and, as the Arabah is higher than the Ghôr, most of its waters drain off into the lake.

The Jordan, also, and various streams east and west empty themselves into it. And, as there is no outlet, the waters are intensely salt, and combined with much earthy matter. Many philosophers have analyzed them; but the results by no means agree, perhaps from the water experimented upon being obtained at different seasons, places, and depths. A curious table of these results may be seen in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1183 c. One thing is certain, that the solid matter in the Dead sea water is far greater than that in the ocean: its specific gravity is therefore higher; so that persons unable to swim elsewhere cannot sink in this lake. It was once imagined, as above noticed, that life could not subsist here: the waters were said to be almost motionless, of a dull leaden hue, and their steam pernicious. Such notions are now proved unfounded. Wild as are some of the surrounding heights, the view, generally speaking, of the lake is beautiful. The colour of its waters may change according to circumstances; but they often are seen as blue as in other lakes. Living creatures, though of a low type, have been found in them; and animals, birds, and especially reptiles, throng the neighbouring thickets, while ducks and other aquatic birds have been observed swimming and diving in the water. Most of these are said to be of a stone colour, so as easily to escape notice. Lighted up by the rising or setting sun the tints of the mountains are often gorgeous. Still, as Mr. Grove remarks in the article just referred to, 'with all the brilliancy of its illumination, its frequent beauty of colouring, the fantastic grandeur of its enclosing mountains, and the tranquil charm afforded by the reflection of that unequalled sky on the no-less-unequalled mirror of the surface—with all these there is something in the prevalent sterility, and the dry burnt look of the shores, the overpowering heat, the occasional smell of sulphur, the dreary salt marsh at the southern end, and the fringe of dead drift-wood round the margin, which must go far to excuse the title which so many ages have attached to the lake, and which we may be sure it will never lose' (p. 1185).

The most extraordinary fact in regard to the Dead sea has yet to be mentioned. It lies in so deep a cleft among its mountains that its surface is, according to lieut. Lynch, 13167 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, but, according to the report of the Royal Engineers who lately surveyed the country, 1289 feet. The Jordan, as has been elsewhere mentioned, flows through a sunken valley, the fall along its course being rapid and considerable, till it reaches its lowest point in this lake. Whether the whole line of country was once far more elevated, and whether by some great catastrophe it descended to its present position, we cannot tell. But it is clear from its conformation that the most extraordinary changes would have to be made before the Jordan could, as was once a plausible supposition, flow on through the Arabah into the Red sea. Moreover, the depth of the water of the lake is very great, 1308 feet, at a point one-third of the length from the northern end; while south of the peninsula it is very shallow.

It was long the received opinion that the doomed cities of the plain lay engulfed beneath the waters of the Dead sea. It is now generally asserted that at least the northern portion of the lake must have existed prior to the time of Abraham. Some are disposed to imagine that by the catastrophe of Sodom the lake was enlarged, the southern or more shallow part being the site of the four cities. But, besides other objections, the fact that Lot saw and chose the fertile vale from the mount of Beth-el would seem conclusive against the notion that it was the south of the lake on which he fixed; so that if submerged at all the cities must lie under the northern part. There also seems reason to believe that instead of anciently being dry land the southern part of the lake was much deeper than at present. See SODOM.

The whole question of the origin of the Dead sea is large, and cannot be argued here; but the remarks of Mr. Tristram in his lately published Land of Israel, on the supposed volcanic agencies, will be read with interest. 'I think there can be no question,' he says, 'but that the old notions of volcanic agencies about the Dead sea were erroneous, and that many writers, like De Sauley, have been misled by endeavouring to square their pre-conceived interpretation of scripture with the facts they saw around them. . . Such traces are not to be found. . . the whole region has been slowly and gradually formed through a succession of ages; and . . . its peculiar phenomena are similar to those of other salt lakes in Africa, or referable to its unique and depressed position. But, setting aside all pre-conceived notions, and taking the simple record of Gen. xix. as we find it, let us see whether the existing condition of the country throws any light upon the biblical narrative. Certainly we do observe by the lake sulphur and bitumen in abundance. Sulphur-springs stud the shores: sulphur is strewn, whether in layers or in fragments, over the desolate plains; and bitumen is ejected, in great floating masses, from the bottom of the sea, oozes through the fissures of the rocks, is deposited with gravel on the beach, or, as in the Wady Mahawat, appears with sulphur to have been precipitated during some convulsion. We know that at the times of earthquakes in the north the bitumen seems even in our own day to be detached from the bottom of the lake, and that floating islets of that substance have been evolved coincident with the convulsions so frequent in north-eastern Palestine. Everything leads to the conclusion that the agency of fire was at work, though not the overflowing of an ordinary volcano. The materials were at hand, at whichever end of the lake we placed the doomed cities, and may probably have been accumulated then to a much greater extent than at present. The kindling of such a mass of combustible material, either by lightning from heaven or by other electrical agency, combined with an earthquake ejecting the bitumen or sulphur from the lake, would soon spread devastation over the plain, so that the smoke of the country would go up as the smoke of a furnace. There is no authority whatever in the biblical record for the popular notion that the site of the cities has been submerged; and Mr. Grove (in his able and exhaustive article in the Bibl. Dict., 'Sodom') has justly stated "that there is no warrant for imagining that the catastrophe was a geological one, and in any other case all traces of action must at this distance of time have vanished." The simple and natural explanation seems—when stripped of all the wild traditions and strange horrors with which the mysterious sea has been invested—to be this—that during some earthquake, or without its direct agency, showers of sulphur, and probably bitumen, ejected from the lake or thrown up from its shores, and ignited perhaps by the lightning which would accompany such phenomena, fell upon the cities and destroyed them. The history of the catastrophe has not only remained in the inspired record, but is inscribed in the memory of the surrounding tribes by many a local tradition and significant name.

5. A 'sea' of Jazer is spoken of in Jer. xlviii. 32. For a conjectural notice of it, see JAZZER.

The term 'sea' is sometimes used symbolically. Thus in Isai. ix. 5, 'The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee': here we may understand the maritime nations of the west. So in Dan. vii. 3; Rev. xiii. 1 the prophetic seers beheld emblematic beasts coming forth from the sea, rising we may suppose from tumultuous changes of the world. Further, 'a sea of glass mingled with fire' is spoken of (iv. 6, xv. 2), betokening perhaps the calm majesty of the divine administration, with which, too, judgments are intermingled. 'The sand which is upon the sea-shore is taken to illustrate the greatness of a multitude (Gen. xxii. 17); and the phrase 'from sea to sea' describes unlimited extent (Psal. lxxii. 8). The shores, waves, creeks, &c. of the sea are occasionally mentioned (e.g. Exod. xiv. 30; Psal. xciii. 3, 4; Acts xxvii. 39, 41).

SEA-CALVES (Lam. iv. 3, marg.). The original word, rendered 'sea-monsters' in the text, probably denotes jackals.

SEA, THE MOLTEN. A large brazen (copper or bronze) laver which Solomon made for the use of the priests in the temple. It was to supply the place of the 'laver' of the tabernacle. It was five cubits in height, ten in diameter, and thirty in circumference; the thickness of the metal being one hand-breadth. The brim was of lily-work, ornamented with flowers like lilies; and just underneath was a double border of knobs, said to be shaped like gourds. The whole was placed upon twelve oxen, in allusion to the twelve tribes, standing with their faces outwards (1 Kings vii. 23-26; 2 Chron. iv. 2-5). This great basin contained 2000 or 3000 (the number varies, perhaps owing to a copyist's error) baths. It was set at the south-east corner of the court of the priests (1 Kings vii. 39; 2 Chron. iv. 10): it was not for them to bathe in, but contained water for their ablutions. Ahaz removed the oxen from under the sea and fixed it upon a stone pavement (2 Kings xvi. 17): it was finally broken up by the Chaldeans (xxv. 13).

Some difficulty has been expressed in regard to the capacity of this sea; and it has been calculated that if hemispherical it could not hold so much water as is stated. But we do not know its exact shape: it probably bulged out below the brim.

The water is said to have been originally supplied by the Gibeonites, but afterwards from the pools of Beth-lehem by means of a conduit.

SEAL. The use of seals is of very great antiquity. Thus we find Judah's signet spoken of (Gen. xxxviii. 18), worn suspended (as is now customary in Persia) by a cord or lace upon the breast. Sometimes, however, the signet was in a finger-ring placed on the right hand (xli. 42; Jer. xxii. 24). As these seals were indispensable articles for use, and also were prized as ornaments, they became the symbol of anything particularly precious: see Sol. Song viii. 6; Hagg. ii. 23. The art of graving upon seals was early known (Exod. xxviii. 11). Modern oriental seals have usually the name of the owner on them, and often a sentence from the koran. An impression of the seal, made perhaps by means of a kind of Indian ink, serves for the signature of the individual. In scripture seals were used to authenticate documents (1 Kings xxi. 8), for the security of deeds or writings which were put in sealed bags (Deut. xxxii. 34; Job xiv. 17; Jer. xxxii. 11, 14), and for the fastening of doors or gates, which were first secured by some ligament, over which properly-prepared clay was put, and the seal impressed (Dan. vi. 17; Matt. xxvii. 66; comp. Bel and Dr. 11, 14). According to Jewish writers the Hebrew women used seal rings. The delivery of such a ring by a sovereign to a courtier invested him with authority (Gen. xli. 42; Esth. iii. 10, viii. 2).

Among the Assyrian and Egyptian dis-

Assyrian seal or cylinder of Sennacherib.

coveries not the least interesting are many pieces of fine clay with impressions, seals Impression of seal on clay. Assyrian. From original in British Museum.

which had been attached to documents. On one there is the seal of Sabaco or So, king of Impression of a seal of Sabaco the Ethiopian, 25th dynasty. From original, in clay.

Egypt (2 Kings xvii. 4), a figure about to strike, with hieroglyphic inscriptions. On Phœnician seal.

the same piece of clay is the impression of an Assyrian seal, possibly that of Sennacherib. This may have been the authentication of a treaty between Assyria and Egypt. Cylindrical seals made of jasper, crystal, and other substances have also been found. These are pierced, and no doubt were furnished with a metal axis, and thus, being rolled on moist clay, left the impression of the devices and inscriptions upon them. Hence the allusion in Job: 'It is turned as clay to the seal' (Job xxxviii. 14).

Babylonian cylinder, with title of Rabut-tsim.

Impressions of seals in clay. Assyrian. From originals in British Museum.

Such a seal is probably alluded to in 2 Tim. ii. 19. The clay impressed was sometimes afterwards baked.

We find seals or sealing used metaphorically to signify that which was to be preserved or permanent (Isai. viii. 16), or which was secret (Dan. xii. 4, 9; Rev. ix. 4), ownership (vii. 2-8, &c.; comp. John iii. 33, vi. 27).

SEAR (1 Tim. iv. 2). The original word means literally to brand-in a mark with a hot iron branding-instrument. When a hot iron is applied to the skin, it makes it hard and dead to sensibility. So the conscience may be hardened to bear delusion unconcernedly, not wincing at a system of fraud. But perhaps this explanation does not fully reach the apostle's meaning, which is rather that ignominious marks were burnt in and left there. 'They knew,' says bishop Ellicott, 'the brand they bore, and yet with a show of outward sanctity they strove to beguile and seduce others, and make them as bad as themselves.'

SEASON. There are six several seasons of the year indicated in scripture, 'seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter' (Gen. viii. 22). These may be thus arranged:—

1. Seed-time	{ Tisri, latter half Marchesvan Chisleu or Kisleu, former half	{ beginning of October to beginning of December	{ early rain due
2. Winter	{ Chisleu, latter half Tebeth Sebat, former half Sebat, latter half	{ beginning of December to beginning of February
3. Coldseason	{ Adar Nisan, former half Nisan, latter half	{ beginning of February to beginning of April	{ latter rain due
4. Harvest	{ Jyar, or Zif Sivan, former half Sivan, latter half	{ beginning of April to beginning of June
5. Summer	{ Tammuz Ab, former half Ab, latter half	{ beginning of June to beginning of August
6. Hot season	{ Elul Tisri, former half	{ beginning of August to beginning of October

SEAT. The ancient Egyptians used chairs; which very probably were customary among the Hebrews. But in later times the practice was introduced of reclining at meals. The orientals now sit on low sofas or divans, or on mats or carpets, with the legs bent under them. See MEALS.

SEBA' (man?). A son of Cush of the family of Ham (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9). His descendants appear to have formed a nation in the distant south (Psal. lxxii. 10): they are mentioned as of equal importance with Egypt and Ethiopia (Isai. xliii. 3): they were a strong people, and of imposing stature; their land (if xviii. 2, 7 may be applied to them) was intersected with streams; and it is described as a blessed triumph when Seba is subdued to God (xlv. 14). Now Josephus (Antiq., lib. ii. 10, § 2) says that Cambyses gave to Seba, the royal city of Ethiopia, the name of Meroe, after his sister. Meroe was an extensive region enclosed by the rivers Astapus (Bahr el-Azrak) and Astaboras (Tacazze), extending to the narrow tract where the latter river joins the Nile. And this country answers all the conditions required for the identification of Seba. It was rich and fertile, with forests and productive fields. The capital city, Meroe, was about ninety miles south of the junction of the Nile and the Astaboras: the extensive ruins of this place have been discovered about twenty miles north-east of the Nubian town Shendy. See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 248, 249.

SEBA'T (a sprout?) (Zech. i. 7). See MONTH.

SECA'CAH (enclosure). A town in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv. 61).

SECHENIAS.—1, 2 (1 Esdr. viii. 29, 32). Shechaniah (Ezra viii. 3, 5).

SE'CHER (watch-tower). A place near to Ramah, where there was a well (1 Sam. xix. 22). This has not been satisfactorily ascertained: possibly it may be the Bir Neballa.

SECT. The original word so translated signifies a choice, and in the New Testament generally a chosen or adopted way of life, i.e. a school or party (Acts v. 17, xv. 5, xxiv. 5, xxvi. 5, xxviii. 22; 1 Cor. xi. 19, marg.). See HERESY.

SECUND'US (second, or fortunate). A Christian of Thessalonica (Acts xx. 4).

SEDECI'AS.—1 (Bar. i. 1). One of Baruch's ancestors.—2 (i. 8). Zedekiah the king.

SEED. By this term is generally to be understood offspring or descendants. The seed of the woman (Gen. iii. 15), the seed of Abraham (xxii. 18; Acts iii. 25), the seed of David (Rom. i. 4), specially designate Messiah. St. Paul lays great stress (Gal. iii. 16) on the singular number of the word 'seed' in Gen. xxii. 18; and objection has been taken to his reasoning. But the objection is founded on misconception. Divers nations sprang from Abraham; for he had many sons; but one alone was the child of promise. In Isaac and his descendants the blessing rested. The promise was not to seeds, not to Abraham's offspring indiscriminately, not to the various lines of the many who called him father, but to that one which combined the spiritual with the carnal bond of relationship to Abraham, the seed of which Christ was to be the representative. The prophecy had a definite posterity in view, a believing posterity. And so St. Paul does not mean Christ individually, but Christ collectively—Christ, it is true, personally first and chiefly, but also his body the church as gathered up in him.

SEED-TIME (Gen. viii. 22). See SEASON.

SEER (1 Sam. ix. 9). See PROPHET.

SEETHE (Exod. xvi. 22). To boil.

SEGU'B (elevated).—1. The youngest son of Hiel (1 Kings xvi. 34). See HIEL.—2. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22).

SEIR (hairy, bristly). A Horite chief who probably gave name to the mountainous district in which he dwelt (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 21; 1 Chron. i. 38). See HORI, 1, HORITES.

SEIR (id.).—1. A mountain range anciently inhabited by the Horites (Gen. xiv. 6; Deut. ii. 12): it was afterwards the possession of Esau and his posterity (Gen. xxxii. 3, xxxiii. 14, 16, xxxvi. 8, 9; Deut. ii. 4, 22; 2 Chron. xx. 10). Hence Seir is sometimes put for Edom, or the Edomites (Ezek. xxv. 8). This range runs from the south of Palestine near the extremity of the Dead sea in a southerly direction to the head of the Elanitic gulf. The high-land itself spreads, moreover, westward to the south-eastern frontier of Palestine, and to the borders of the territory of the Amorites, and of the tribe of Judah, so that, according to the Greek division, it would form a part of Arabia Petraea (comp. Deut. i. 2, ii. 8; Josh. xi. 16, 17, xv. 1; 1 Kings ix. 26) Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 352, 353. The northern part of Seir is now called Jebel, and the southern esh-Sherah. It is a rugged and well-wooded chain, intersected by fruitful valleys and watered by various streams, which, however, in summer often fail. But vegetation is abundant, and much of the land well-cultivated and fertile, far different from the ridge on the opposite side of the Arabah, which is less elevated and utterly desolate. The promise, then, was fulfilled to Esau that his 'dwelling should be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above' (Gen. xxvii. 39). Existing remains show that some parts of the district were once densely peopled.

Wilton would distinguish between 'the land of Seir' (xxxii. 3) immediately contiguous to the south of Palestine and afterwards occupied by the Amalekites, in which Esau dwelt at first, and 'mount Seir' subsequently the territory of Edom (The Negeb, p. 73, note). He also draws attention to the fulfilment of Obad. 19. The inhabitants of the south were to possess mount Seir; and that the Simeonites, who were intermingled with Judah in the south country, did possess Seir is positively stated in 1 Chron. iv. 38-43.

2. A mountain named in describing the limits of the territory of Judah (Josh. xv. 10).

SEI'RATH (a she-goat, shaggy?). A place or district to which Ehud fled after killing Eglon (Judges iii. 26). It was perhaps in the mountains of Ephraim (27).

SE'LA or SE'LAH (rock). A city in the territory of Edom, probably the capital, taken by Amaziah king of Judah and named by him Joktheel, i.e. subdued of God, in memory of his conquest (2 Kings xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12). It afterwards passed under the dominion of Moab (Isai. xvi. 1). It would seem that this place is meant in two or three places, where in our version the word is translated 'rock' (Judges i. 36; Obad. 3). There can hardly be a doubt that Sela is identical with the Petra of later times, celebrated as the chief city of the Nabathæans in the fourth century B.C., and as a central station for the commerce of the east. It was afterwards the residence of the Arabian princes who bore the name of Aretas, and was subjected to the Roman power by Trajan: from Adrian it received the name of Adriana.

The remains of the city lie in the Wady Mousa about two days' journey to the north of the gulf of Akabah, and somewhat farther to the south of the Dead sea. It is enclosed by rugged cliffs of red sandstone, and rocky ravines from 50 to 250 feet in depth, and surrounded by a dry and barren desert. The plain on which it stands is on a high level, and is not more than about a mile square. The ravine of Wady Mousa varies in breadth from 12 to 150 feet; and the overhanging rocks almost shut out the sun's rays. But it was through this ravine that an artificial passage was made, about a mile long, the only way of access to the town. Along it ran a little river, supplying it with water, over which bridges were thrown, and by the sides of which quays were constructed. The traveller, who penetrates through the surrounding dry and desert country to Petra, finds piles of tombs excavated in the rocks, with colonnades, obelisks, &c. &c. of imposing dimensions.

These remarkable ruins were first in modern times visited and described by Burckhardt. Various writers have seen in their present state the fulfilment of prophetic denunciation against Edom (e.g. Isai. xxxiv.). To a certain extent this may be admitted: still it must be remembered that Petra attained its chief importance after the Edomites had ceased to inhabit the country, and that the buildings the wrecks of which we now wonder at were for the most part of the Roman age. 'It was, no doubt, during this period that Petra was adorned with those magnificent architectural works which render that town one of singular interest for the antiquarian and the traveller. The tombs in the ravine leading to the city . . . then received their comparatively-modern additions of Ionic columns and other Roman-Greek ornaments: in another ravine-like but broader valley is that astounding structure, el-Khuzneh, probably used as a temple, one of the wonders of the east; the façade of which consists of "two rows of six columns over one another, with statues between, with capitals and sculptured pediments, the upper one of which is divided by a little round temple crowned with an urn." This edifice shines still in all the freshness of colour, and attracts notice by the elaborate

Sela or Petra. El-Khuzneh.

Detail of sculptural ornaments; but its interior is merely a lofty hall with a chamber on each of its three sides. Behind the el-Khuzneh the eye is struck by many beautiful and varied façades, leading to apartments excavated in the cliffs, used either as tombs or as temples, and, later, as churches; but in a wider part of the valley, on its left side, is the splendid Greek theatre, entirely hewn out of the rock, 120 feet in diameter at the base, with more than thirty rows of seats, in the native rock, red and purple alternately, and holding upwards of 3000 spectators, surrounded with tombs, and overgrown on the sides with the wild fig-tree and the tamarisk. In the ancient site of Petra itself, every variety of ruins, of streets, houses, temples, and palaces, bespeaks the vanished glory of a town once splendid and wealthy—the palace of Pharaoh though not uniformly bright, colours, equalling in softness those of flowers or of the plumage of birds, and exhibiting a gorgeous crimson, streaked with purple, and often intermixed, ribbon-like, with yellow and blue: they are of the most various dimensions, and serve the most manifold purposes. Some are small niches, perhaps intended for votive offerings: others are designed for tombs, and exhibit an endless variety in size, workmanship, and style: they consist of spacious chambers with recesses, sometimes near the ceiling, at the height of eight or ten feet, and often adorned in the front with architectural embellishments of astonishing richness and striking beauty. The cloister (deir) at the north-western extremity of the cliffs (see Stanley's Sinai and Palestine, 4th edit., pp. 96, 97), also hewn out of the rock, with Petra. General view, looking towards the theatre.

(Kasr Faron); the isolated column likewise bearing the name of the Egyptian monarch (Zub Faron), and indicating the former site of a large pillared temple; the remains of triumphal arches; the colossal columns of a depraved Corinthian or Doric order, hewn out of the solid rock, and still forming part of the native mass; and majestic colonnades, giving the whole base of the mountain the appearance of a vast pile of grand architecture. Astounding and almost-numberless excavations are everywhere wrought in the front of the mountain, in its ravines and recesses, and even in the precipitous rocks around it, in many cases one rising over the other, and sometimes several hundred feet above the level of the valley, with steps cut in the solid rocks; some widely conspicuous, others hidden in the most inaccessible cliffs. These excavations shine in all the magic of variegated, a most splendid façade, and a vast urn on the summit, is accessible through a long and tortuous ravine, by a path five or six feet broad, and steps cut in the stone with immense exertion; is surrounded by ruins, covered with inscriptions in the Sinaitic character, crosses, and figures of the wild goat or ibex, indicating its sacred character; but rather modern in effect. All this engages and deserves the research of the historian' (Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 479, 480).

Stanley believes that Sela was the site of some primeval shrine, and fixes on the 'Deir' as the special point, the innermost sanctuary of the holy place of Kadesh.

SE'LA-HAMMAH'LEKOTH (rock of escapes). A rock in the wilderness of Maon, whence Saul was summoned from pursuing David by the news of a Philistine incursion (1 Sam. xxiii. 27, 28).

SE'LAH. A word which occurs seventy-one times in thirty-nine psalms, also in Habak. iii. 3, 9, 13. There are various opinions as to the meaning. Thus Gesenius tells us that some think it is an abbreviation; the letters of which it is composed each standing for a word. By some it is derived from a verb signifying 'to raise up'; the meaning therefore being a raising of the voice, in response to the instruments: this Gesenius himself prefers. But others, adopting the same derivation, understand 'suspend the voice,' i.e. rest, pause. Sommer has minutely investigated the matter. And Keil has adopted and illustrated his opinion. They suppose that it directs the falling-in of the sound of the priests' trumpets into the Levites' psalm-singing and playing on stringed instruments. It occurs therefore where very warm emotions have been expressed (Keil, Einleitung, § 113, p. 385). Perhaps the word rather implied that the music was to be loud and clear. Higgaion joined with Selah (Psal. ix. 16) is supposed by Gesenius to signify 'a louder strain'; whilst Keil believes that it means 'piano.'

SE'LED (exultation). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 30).

SELEMTA (2 Esdr. xiv. 24). A scribe whom Esdras was to employ.

SELEMI'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Shelemiah (Ezra x. 39).

SELEUCIA. A strong sea-port town on the Mediterranean, about five miles north of the mouth of the Orontes. It was built by Seleucus Nicator, who was buried there, and was called Seleucia Pieria, from mount Pierius close by, and Seleucia ad Mare to distinguish it from other cities of the same name. Under the Syrian kings it was the capital of the province Seleucia; from the time of Pompey it was a free city. From this port Paul and Barnabas embarked for Cyprus (Acts xiii. 4); it is mentioned also in 1 Macc. xi. 8. Some ruins of Seleucia still exist by the modern village Kepse.

SELEUCUS (1 Macc. vii. 1; 2 Macc. iii. 3, and elsewhere). This king, the fourth of the name, entitled Philopator, succeeded his father Antiochus the Great, and reigned over Syria twelve years, 187-175 B.C. He was sometimes called king of Asia. Having need of large sums of money to pay the tribute imposed by the Romans, he sent his officer Heliodorus to plunder the temple at Jerusalem—an attempt which is said to have been supernaturally defeated (7-40). Seleucus was afterwards murdered by this same Heliodorus, and was succeeded by Antiochus Epiphanes (comp. Dan. xi. 20, 21).

SEM (Luke iii. 36). Shem; a Greek form.

SEMACHI'AH (Jehovah sustains him). A Levite porter (1 Chron. xxvi. 7).

SEMEI (renowned). A person named in our Lord's genealogy (Luke iii. 26).

SEMEI—1 (1 Esdr. ix. 33). Shimei (Ezra x. 33)—2 (Rest of Esth. xi. 2). Shimei, an ancestor of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).

SEMEL'LIUS (1 Esdr. ii. 16, 17, 25, 30). Shimshai (Ezra iv. 8, 9, 17, 23).

SEMY'S (1 Esdr. ix. 23). Shimei (Ezra x. 23).

SENA'AH (thorny). A place, the inhabitants of which returned in large numbers from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 35; Neh. vii. 38). These are meant in Neh. iii. 3, the article being prefixed, so as to form the word Hassenaah.

SENATE (Acts v. 21). The body of elders. SE'NEH (thorn-rock) (1 Sam. xiv. 4). See BOZEZ.

SENI'R (coat of mail, or cataract). Mount Hermon, or a part of it (1 Chron. v. 23; Ezek. xxvii. 5). See HERMON.

SENNACHERIB (conqueror of armies, or Sin (the moon) has multiplied brethren). The son and successor of Sargon king of Assyria. Besides the scriptural accounts which we have of this monarch, and notices in profane historians, some of the deciphered Nineveh inscriptions narrate the principal events of his reign. The chief discrepancy between these and the sacred record as we now have it is in the arrangement of dates; and various modes have been proposed of reconciliation.

It is probable Sennacherib's elder brother was made by his father viceroy of Babylon; but, that city having been recovered by Merodach-baladan, Sennacherib's first expedition after he mounted the throne was against Chaldea. He was successful; and, having left Bilib, or Belibus, one of his officers, governor of Babylon, he directed his arms against the Arameans on the Tigris and Euphrates, and then against the Median and other northern tribes. In his third year he crossed the Euphrates, made the Phœnician cities tributary, took Ashkelon, also Libnah and Lachish, defeated the Egyptians, and then, having concluded a treaty with them, turned upon Hezekiah king of Judah. It was in this expedition that he came up 'against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them,' imposed a heavy tax on the Jewish king, and carried off a number of captives into Assyria (2 Kings xviii. 13-16; Isai. xxxvi. 1). Hezekiah had offended by throwing off his allegiance to the Assyrian throne, and also by having conquered the Philistine country (2 Kings xviii. 8). In the fourth year of his reign Sennacherib invaded Babylonia a second time, and substituted one of his own sons for Bilib, whom he had formerly placed in authority there. After this it has been imagined that he again marched into Judea, and suffered the terrible calamity which deprived him of his army. But this is questionable; and those who admit but one Palestinian campaign think that it was its disastrous result that encouraged the partisans of Merodach-baladan, and also incited Bilib to renounce his dependence on the Assyrian king. It is difficult to decide. But leading facts are sufficiently proved. We know that Sennacherib was in Judea attacking Libnah and Lachish, some think unsuccessfully; that, desirous of capturing Jerusalem, he sent first envoys, and afterwards a letter, to the king; that he was alarmed by the approach of Tirhakah king of Ethiopia; and that then his career was stopped by the supernatural destruction of 185,000 of his forces (17-37, xix. 1-35; 2 Chron. xxxii. 1-23; Isai. xxxvi. 2-22, xxxvii. 1-36); but the exact distribution of these events is uncertain. Nothing of course is reported of the great catastrophe in the Assyrian inscriptions but Sennacherib, so far as we can learn, during the rest of his reign after it, which lasted in all twenty-two years, warred in Susiana and other regions of the east without venturing again into Judea. He was at length assassinated by two of his sons, and succeeded by another of them, Esarhaddon (2 Kings xix. 37; 2 Chron. xxxii. 21; Isai. xxxvii. 37, 38).

The chronological difficulty above alluded to is this. Sennacherib reigned from 703 to 680 B.C.; while Hezekiah's reign extended from 726-697 B.C. Consequently, if these dates be accurate, Sennacherib's invasion could not have occurred in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, but rather in his twenty-sixth or twenty-seventh. Dr. Hincks, in an elaborate paper in the Journ. of Sac. Lit., July 1854, pp. 393-410, maintains that there is a copyist's error in the received Hebrew text; and perhaps this is the most reasonable supposition. Additional research may throw more light upon the matter.

Sennacherib. From Nineveh marbles.

It was Sennacherib who erected the magnificent palace at the southern side of Kouyunjik, opposite Mosul on the Tigris. The slabs of each chamber here—and seventy-one apartments have been excavated—exhibit different historical events.

Public archives, too, and seals have been discovered. Sennacherib also founded another palace (perhaps completed by Esarhaddon) on the mound called Nebi Yunus at the south-west angle of the same ruins of Kouyunjik, and carried on many other noble works, contributing greatly to the splendour of Nineveh. He left monuments of his deeds in various distant countries; one of which is said still to exist on the Syrian coast, near the mouth of the Nahr el-Kelb, close to an inscription of a far earlier date, of Rameses the Great of Egypt.

The history of Sennacherib is highly instructive. The mighty conqueror was humbled by the blasting of the breath of God's displeasure; and the holy city and temple, apparently defenceless, were fully protected by an almighty arm.

SENUAH (bristling). A Benjamite (Neh. xi. 9), probably Hasenuah (1 Chron. ii. 7).

SEO'RIM (barley). The chief of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 8).

SEPHAR (a numbering, census). A city mentioned to indicate the extent of the territories inhabited by the descendants of Joktan (Gen. x. 30). Between the port of Mirbat and cape Sadjir, a little inland from the Indian ocean, belonging to the province of Hadramaut, are a number of villages called Tsafar or Isfar; and near one of them, in Belid or Harikam, are the ruins of an ancient city. This was Sephar, once the seat of Himyaritic kings.

SEPHARAD (separation, boundary?). A country or district where there were Hebrew exiles (Obad. 20). Some regard it as Spain, others as Sparta, or as Sardis. Dr. Pusey adopts this last supposition: see his Minor Prophets, p. 292.

SEPHARVA'IM (the two Sipparas, one being on each bank of the river). A city of the Assyrian empire, whence colonists were brought into the territory of Samaria (2 Kings xvii. 24, 31). It would seem to have been, probably not very long before, an independent power (viii. 34, xix. 13; Isai. xxxvi. 19, xxxvii. 13). It is probably Sippara, the most southern city of Mesopotamia, on the east bank of the Euphrates. Some with less likelihood place it in Syria.

SEPHARVITES (2 Kings xvii. 31). The inhabitants of Sefharvaim.

SEPH'ELA (1 Macc. xii. 38). The low fertile district of Judah, lying between the central hill-country and the Mediterranean. The cities and towns in it are enumerated in Josh. xv. 33-47; but, as some of these stood in the highlands, the district was probably not defined with much exactness. See JUDAH.

SEPTUAGINT. The name of the ancient Greek version of the Old Testament. For an account of it, see VERSIONS, pp. 903-905.

SEPTULCHRE. Sepulchres have been already noticed in the article BURIAL, which see. It will be sufficient here just to mention some of those sepulchres named in scripture to which particular interest attaches. The first is that purchased for Sarah by Abraham from Ephron the Hittite, called 'the cave of the field of Machpelah' (Gen. xxiii. 20). There Abraham also was buried, and Isaac and Rebekah, and Jacob and Leah (xlix. 29-32). A Mohammedan mosque at this day covers the site in Hebron; and generally Christians are not allowed to examine it; but see MACHPELAH. The sepulchre where Joseph was interred was at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 32): that of the old prophet of Beth-el, in which the body of the disobedient prophet from Judah was laid, was at Beth-el (1 Kings xlii. 30, 31; 2 Kings xxiii. 17, 18). The kings of Judah had a sepulchre in the city of David (ix. 28): at that of Elisha a miracle was wrought (xiii. 20, 21). The sepulchre of Lazarus was a cave at Bethany (John xi. 38): for that of our Lord see JERUSALEM, pp. 459, 460.

Many excavations and erections yet remain near Jerusalem, which were ancient sepulchres: such are the 'tombs of the kings' (perhaps really of the Herods), 'of the judges,' and 'of the prophets:' the last are thought to be the oldest, but generally speaking these sepulchres do not date earlier than the Roman occupation of Judea.

SE'RAH (princess). A daughter of Asher (Gen. xli. 17; 1 Chron. vii. 30): she is also called Sarah (Numb. xxvi. 46).

SERAI'AH (warrior of Jehovah).—1. A scribe or secretary to king David (2 Sam. viii. 17). He is also called Sheva (xx. 25), Shisha (1 Kings iv. 3), and Shavsha (1 Chron. xviii. 16).—2. The high priest in the reign of Zedekiah, slain by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kings xxv. 18-21; 1 Chron. vi. 14; Ezra vii. 1; Jer. lii. 24-27).—3. One of the chiefs who joined Gedaliah after the capture of Jerusalem (2 Kings xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8): he is called a Netophathite.—4. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 13, 14).—5. One of the tribe of Simeon (35).—6. A priest who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. xii. 1, 12): he, or probably his representative, sealed the covenant (x. 2): he is also called Azariah (vii. 7).—7. A priest (xi. 11): possibly the high priest is meant, no. 2: he too is called Azariah in the corresponding list (1 Chron. ix. 11).—8. An officer commanded by Jehoiakim to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. xxxvi. 26).—9. A son of Neriah, and brother of Baruch, who was sent to Babylon in the fourth year of Zedekiah (ii. 59, 61). He is called 'a quiet prince,' in the margin 'prince of Menucha,' or 'chief chamberlain.' Opinions vary as to the exact position of this officer. He belonged to the Jewish court, and perhaps took charge of the royal suite in the progress to Babylon, a charge somewhat similar to that of quarter-master-general with us.

SER'APHIM (lofty ones, princes). This word is used to denote some attendants on the Divine Majesty, probably an order of angels. They are described as having six wings, with twain of which in reverent adoration they covered their faces, with twain their feet, and with twain they flew to perform the Lord's commands (Isai. vi. 2, 3, 6, 7). See ANGELS.

SE'RED (fear). One of the sons of Zebulun (Gen. xli. 14; Numb. xxvi. 26).

SERGIUS PAULUS. The Roman proconsul of Cyprus, who believed on the preaching of Barnabas and Paul, after witnessing the discomfiture of the sorcerer Elymas (Acts xiii. 6-12). Cyprus had been an imperial province, and was therefore governed by a propretor, or procurator; but Augustus gave it up to the people in exchange for Dalmatia; and then a pro-consul was the supreme officer: this title is found on Cyprian coins. See Alford on Acts xiii. 7.

SERJEANTS (Acts xvi. 35, 38). The Greek word is literally 'rod-bearers,' i.e. the lictors who bore the rods, not the fascies, but bacilli, which were carried before such magistrates as had authority at Philippi. See MAGISTRATES.

SER'ON (1 Macc. iii. 13, 23, 24). A general of Antiochus Epiphanes, routed by Judas Maccabeus.

SERPENT. There are several special names given in our translation to various kinds of serpents, as 'adder,' 'asp,' 'cockatrice,' 'dragon,' 'viper': see the articles under those heads respectively. But there is also a Hebrew word in the Old Testament, and a Greek one in the New, of more general meaning, corresponding with our own term 'serpent.' And there are matters of high interest to which this general word is applied.

Thus we are told that it was by the instrumentality of a serpent that our first parents were tempted to commit the sin which forfeited their happy state (Gen. iii.). Many strange speculations have been broached in regard to the serpent of Eden. Some critics have amused themselves by supposing that another animal was intended: some say that prior to the fall the serpent had feet, and was deprived of them as a part of his sentence, 'Upon thy belly shalt thou go;' and some would attribute to it naturally the gift of speech; while almost all descent upon the peculiar subtlety of a serpent, as if in power of instinct it was superior to all other brute creatures.

But such reasoning is beside the mark. Let us take a more comprehensive view. We find repeated instances in scripture of God's making use of inferior creatures and their natural organs, to teach great lessons to men. It was by giving voice to the ass that Balaam's rashness was reproved (Numb. xxii. 22-35). It was by means of a fish that Jonah's disobedience was punished (Jonah i. 17, ii. 10). Other examples also are to be found (Matt. xvii. 27; Luke v. 4-9; John xxi. 3-8). And the devils, who by God's permission exercise a marvellous power in the world, have not only possessed and become identified, as it were, with men, but have also instigated animals to strange unnatural deeds (Matt. viii. 28-34). Quite analogous, therefore, is Satan's using the serpent as the means of his machinations in Eden. And the subtlety attributed to it and the judgment pronounced upon it, though having some ground-work in the creature, pointed far more to the evil agent who had used that creature for his own purposes. The serpent was 'full of all subtlety, and all mischief,' just as St. Paul addressed a 'child of the devil' (Acts xiii. 10), because there was a higher and more venomous influence working in it.

Then as to the curse: there was no change wrought in the constitution of the serpent. Geological research has demonstrated the existence of serpents in serpent form, and (we may conclude) with the same habits and propensities, in the earlier periods of the world's history. But it is not by any means a strange thing for a natural object to have a new significance given to it. Doubtless from ordinary causes the rainbow had been seen long before it was made the sign of God's covenant to Noah (Gen. ix. 12-17). The curse on Cain wrought no physical change in him (iv. 11). So there was no change in the physical conformation of the literal serpent. But the serpent's habits, trailing on its belly amid the dust, venomous, and loathsome to the eye of man, read to every age a striking lesson, and expose the tempter, whose vehicle of mischief it was, as cursed and to be hated. Mischief indeed he has done and can still do: he can bite the heel; but it will always be to the bruising and crushing of his own head. The facts of the fall, as narrated by the sacred historian, must not be explained away, or regarded as of a mythic character. Other parts of scripture bear testimony to their literal truth (2 Cor. xi. 3); but yet to comprehend their whole significancy we must look beyond the reptile to the dark power who for a time identified himself with it (see Biblioth. Sacra, Jan. 1864, pp. 163-179). Hence it was that the serpent was feared, and thought a being to be profligated. And hence that strange worship which in so many ages and so many lands was offered to it. It was from this well-known practice, true in the main but not true in the particular instance, that part of the apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon was constructed (Bel and Dr. 23-28).

We frequently find references in scripture to serpent-charming (Psal. lviii. 4, 5; Eccles. x. 11; Jer. viii. 17; James iii. 7). This practice is still common in the east. 'I have seen,' says Dr. Thomson, 'many serpent-charmers who do really exercise some extraordinary power over these reptiles. They carry enormous snakes, generally black, about them, allow them to crawl all over their persons and into their bosoms—always, however, with certain precautions, either necessary or pretended to be so. They repeatedly breathe strongly into the face of the serpent, and occasionally blow spittle or some medicated composition upon them. It is needless to describe the mountebank tricks which they perform. That which I am least able to account for is the power of detecting the presence of serpents in a house, and of enjoining or "charming" them out of it. The thing is far too common to be made a matter of scepticism. . . . In Psal. lviii. 4, 5, 6 there is evidently an allusion to certain kinds of serpents which cannot be charmed. . . . Such serpents there still are, which the charmer cannot subdue; and instances are related in which they have fallen victims to their daring attempts' (The Land and the Book, pp. 154, 155).

Of the particular kind of serpents called 'fiery serpents,' by whose bite the Israelites were plagued at Punon or Zalmonah (Numb. xxi. 4-10, xxiii. 41-43), little satisfactory can be gleaned. Some have thought that they were called fiery from their colour: others, with more reason, believe that allusion is made to the burning pain of the venomous bite. Forskål mentions a snake which he calls Baten, of small size and spotted black and white: its bite, he says, is almost instant death (Descript. Animal. &c., p. 15): this may have been the serpent in question. The remedy provided was remarkable. A serpent was to be made of copper or bronze, and placed upon a pole. It might be thought that this could be of no service. But it was a trial of faith: whoso looked thereon lived.

Besides the immediate relief, here was a divinely-intended historical type. God purposed that it should illustrate the doctrine of the gospel to be afterwards fully revealed. 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life' (John iii. 14, 15). And never was this more signally illustrated than at the very time when Christ was 'lifted up.' There was the thief suffering worthily the punishment of his misdeeds: how should he obtain forgiveness and life? Little likely did it seem that one hanging crucified in weakness beside him could be his Saviour. Yet he looked to Him. He discovered in that innocent sufferer the divinely-appointed means of his salvation. He looked, and with new-born faith exclaimed, 'Lord, remember me.' The answer was immediate; the cure perfect, 'To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise' (Luke xxiii. 39-43). So mighty is the effect of a believing look to Jesus! And so still: the sinner is healed of the deadly wound of sin by faith in Christ. He looks and lives. Some writers have tried to find fanciful resemblances; as if the material and all the circumstantial details of the brazen serpent had their typical purport. It is enough to say with Fairbairn: 'In the two related transactions there is a fitting correspondence as to the relations maintained; in both alike a wounded and dying condition in the first instance, then the elevation of an object apparently inadequate, yet really effectual, to accomplish the cure; and this through no other medium on the part of the affected, than their simply looking to the object so presented to their view. But, with this pervading correspondence, what marked and distinctive characteristics! In the one case a dying body; in the other a perishing soul. There an uplifted serpent, of all instruments of healing from a serpent's bite the most unpromising; here the exhibition of one condemned and crucified as a malefactor, of all conceivable persons apparently the most impotent to save. There, once more, the fleshly eye of nature deriving, from the outward object visibly presented to it, the healing virtue it was ordained to impart; and here the spiritual eye of the soul looking in stedfast faith to the exalted Redeemer, and getting the needed supplies of his life-giving and regenerating grace. In both the same elements of truth, the same modes of dealing, but in the one developing them selves on a lower, in the other on a higher territory; in the former having immediate respect only to things seen and temporal, and in the latter to what is unseen, spiritual, and eternal' (Typol. of Script., book i. chap. lii. vol. i. p. 82.) It only remains to say that the brazen serpent, having become an object of superstitious veneration to the Jews, was broken up by Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 4). See NEHUSHTAN.

One word may be added on 'flying' serpents (Isai. xxx. 6). Niebuhr describes a species so called by the Arabs, because they spring by means of their tail from one tree to another (Description de l'Arabie, 1774, p. 156).

SERUG (shoot, branch). One of the patriarchs in the line of Shem (Gen. xi. 20, 23; 1 Chron. i. 26); in Luke iii. 35 Saruch.

SERVANT. This word is frequently used in our version of both Testaments, when 'slave' would have been much more fitting. There are terms, indeed, which imply attendance or confidential service, but these are generally rendered 'minister' or 'young man.' So Joshua was Moses' attendant (Exod. xxiv. 13, xxxiii. 11)—clerk or secretary we might in modern language say—it being understood that the designation in the last-named passage does not define Joshua's age. But the words 'ebed (implying 'labourer') in Hebrew, and doulos in Greek, are spoken of slaves.

It does not at all follow, because the Mosaic law and the Christian dispensation found slavery existing in the world, and made regulations for it, that the divine sanction was thereby given to the system of one man's holding another as his property. Laws have to deal with persons as they are, in order to make them what they ought to be; and those enactments are the best which are fitted to the existing state of society, and inculcate principles which tend to its amelioration and exaltation. You cannot force imperfect creatures at once into perfection. See LAW. And it may be remarked that the kidnapping or unlawful stealing of men for slavery was branded as a capital crime (Exod. xxi. 16; Deut. xxiv. 7; 1 Tim. i. 10); the object being to confine slavery within as narrow limits as possible.

In the brief sketch to be here given of Hebrew servitude, it may be well to distinguish between native and foreign slaves.

There were various ways in which a Hebrew might be reduced to servitude—as by impoverishment, by theft for which he could not make restitution, and, in the case of a female, by exercise of parental authority. Every man had a certain inheritance which he could not legally altogether alienate. He might mortgage it, but only for a term of years: at the jubilee it would return into his possession. But, if he had mortgaged his land, and the jubilee was distant, he would naturally be in a destitute position: he might contract debts, and have no present ability of discharging them; and in either case his only resource might be the selling of himself to a master (Lev. xxv. 39). Examples, however, in the sacred history occur where the law seems to have been overstrained (e.g. 2 Kings iv. 1; Neh. v. 4, 5). Further, a thief was compelled on detection to restore double the value of that which he had fraudulently acquired. But, if he was unable to do this, he might be sold, to pay in person what he could not in property (Exod. xxii. 3, 4). These regulations probably applied to women as well as to men (Deut. xv. 12), though according to the rabbins a woman could not be sold for theft, or be obliged by the boring of the ear (to be afterwards described) to perpetual servitude. Moreover, a father might sell his daughter. Still this seems to have been with special reference to her being married; and the purchase-money which the father received would be equivalent to a dowry ordinarily given by one who took a wife (Gen. xxxiv. 12). A daughter so sold was the property of him who had bought her: she was not to go out at the usual time, as men would. But her master was either to marry her, and if he took another wife to preserve to her her rights, or if he did not espouse her himself to give her in marriage to his son, dealing with her as a daughter. If he failed in these respects, he must let her go free without money (Exod. xxi. 7-11).

The treatment of those in servitude was to be kind and brotherly. It was specially commanded that they were not to be rigorously dealt with, but regarded as if they were hired servants and sojourners (Lev. xxv. 39, 40, 43, 46). This servitude was to be only for a limited time. In the case of one sold for theft, as soon as the amount of his dishonesty was worked out, he was free. And, generally, servitude ended in six years, not at the sabbatical year, but six years from the commencement; the wife, if the man was married, being freed with her husband (Exod. xxi. 2, 3). If, however, the master had given his slave a wife—that is, as we must suppose, not a Hebrew—the man alone was freed at the six years' end: his wife and children still belonged to the master. Then, if the slave was unwilling to leave his family, and was attached to his master, public examination being had before the magistrates, he had his ear pierced with an awl, and became his master's property for ever (4-6; Deut. xv. 16, 17). It has been questioned whether such a slave continued in servitude to the end of his life, or whether he was free at the jubilee. Saalschütz, taking into consideration the fact that the expression occurs in a similar connection in Lev. xxv. 46, where it is evident the jubilee release does not apply, is of opinion that it was perpetual servitude to which the man whose ear is bored subjected himself (Treatise on Mosaic Law, translated in Biblioth. Sacr., Jan. 1862, p. 35). In ordinary cases, when the six years' servitude expired, the freed slave was not to be sent away empty: he was to be liberally furnished out of his master's flock, and floor, and wine-press (Deut. xv. 13-15), so that he might not return to a condition of poverty. We see that this kind of servitude involved no degradation; no one, though temporarily a slave, lost thereby his rights as a man: rather he was deemed a brother, towards whom kindness must specially be shown.

But sometimes a Hebrew might be enslaved to a stranger, that is, to one not of Israelitish stock but yet dwelling in Israel. To such freedom after six years' servitude did not apply: the slave was released only at the jubilee, unless he sooner redeemed himself or a near relative could redeem him. But care was taken that the yoke on such persons was not galling: the slave was to be treated by his master as if he were a hired servant. And, though a stranger might not be supposed to pay that reverent obedience to the law of the Lord which a true Israelite would show, doubtless the civil power would interfere on complaint of any one ill-used: 'The other shall not rule with rigour over him in thy sight' (Lev. xxv. 47-55).

Of course laws would sometimes be broken. We have a notable example in later Jewish history of the ill-treatment by Hebrews of Hebrew slaves. After freedom had been proclaimed, through fear, during the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, the servitude having lasted beyond the legal time, when the siege was raised, those who had been freed were forced back again into bondage; and a heavy judgment the prophet Jeremiah was instructed to denounce for this (Jer. xxxiv. 7-22).

The law was different in regard to slaves not Hebrews. These were captives taken in war, or else bought with money; and, as they were the property of the master, their children were his also; and so there were slaves born in the house. Thus the household of Abraham, privileged like him to receive circumcision, the symbol of God's covenant, are described as 'men of his house, born in the house, and bought with money of the stranger' (Gen. xvii. 27). A large number of such slaves (females) were made in the war on Midian (Numb. xxxi. 18, 35). The Gibeonites were reduced to servitude, not to individual masters, but for public labours and work in the sanctuary (Josh. ix. 23, 27). And Solomon numbered the remnant of the old inhabitants of Canaan and made them labourers on his works, specially (it is noted) exempting Israelites from such service (2 Chron. ii. 17, 18, viii. 7-9).

These, whose servitude was perpetual (unless freed by their masters' pleasure), were to be treated kindly. They were to enjoy the sabbath-rest (Exod. xx. 10; Deut. v. 14, 15). They were to share in the national festivities (xii. 12, 18, xvi. 11, 14); circumcision of course being necessary for religious privileges; but to this we may suppose, as in the case above-mentioned of Abraham's household, those born in the family were entitled. There were enactments to secure them from ill-usage. The wilful murder of a slave was in the eye of the law a crime as great as that of a freeman: the penalty was death (Lev. xxiv. 17, 22). Lesser punishments were to be inflicted in cases of what we should call manslaughter. Thus, if by severity of correction a man killed his slave, he was according to the circumstances to be amerced: if death did not immediately ensue, the loss of the slave was considered a sufficient penalty (Exod.

xxi. 20, 21). In these cases it is clear that the death was by misadventure, not being intentional: the master might be highly blameworthy, but he was not a murderer. If permanent injury was done to a slave—such as the loss of an eye, or a tooth—he was to have his freedom in recompence (26, 27). These regulations, imperfect no doubt as delivered for an imperfect state of society, must have tended to secure gentle treatment for the slave. And the whole charge was enforced by the continual remembrance that Israel was once a slave in Egypt. The effect seems to have been produced: we rarely read in scripture of slaves running away from their masters (1 Sam. xxv. 10; 1 Kings ii. 39). We get the estimated value of a slave from the sum of money to be paid by the owner of an ox which had gored a bondman: it was thirty shekels (Exod. xxi. 32). And it is curious to compare this with the price fixed for redemption (certainly for native Hebrews) of a vow, which varied according to age and sex from three to fifty shekels (Lev. xxvii. 1-7). The thirty shekels for the slave, being as we should say an average price, was by no means low.

There was a remarkable provision in respect to a female captive, something analogous to that already noted of a Hebrew girl sold by her father. If a man wished to marry such a captive, she was to be allowed a month to bewail her parents, and to shave her head: he might then take her for his wife. But, if he had no pleasure in her, he must let her go free: he must not sell her (Deut. xxi. 10-14).

Slaves might, it would seem, acquire property. Ziba was a hereditary bondman to the house of Saul—probably therefore not an Israelite. But he possessed twenty slaves himself (2 Sam. ix. 2, 10). Similarly the Jews who had been captive in Babylon carried with them back to their country servants of their own, 7,337 among 42,360 freemen (Ezra ii. 64, 65).

The occupations in which slaves were employed must have been various; though, if Hebrews, they were not to be put to the servile work of hereditary bondmen (Lev. xxv. 39, 44). But the more faithful of these were occasionally elevated to places of trust (Gen. xxiv. 2), and sometimes they were permitted to ally with their master's family (1 Chron. ii. 34, 35); just as Jacob served for his wives (Gen. xxix. 18, 20, 27). This fact will help to explain the great increase of Israel in Egypt. Jacob went down thither with a large establishment, with whom we cannot doubt his own descendants intermarried. Female slaves were employed at the mill (Exod. xi. 5). More on the subject of Hebrew servitude cannot be told here; but much information may be obtained, and many difficulties will be found solved, in the dissertation of Saalschütz already referred to, with Prof. Barrow's annotations, pp. 32-75.

With regard to hired servants little need be said. They were free to engage or not at their pleasure. The main provision of the law for them was that their wages should be duly paid at the specified time (Deut. xxiv. 14, 15).

In the New Testament the kind of slavery we read of was far worse than that of the Hebrews. A Roman master had absolute authority over his bondman, and regarded and often treated him as a chattel. Christianity did not interfere with the relations it found subsisting. But it had its word of admonition for every class. Remembering what the bondage of those times was, we cannot help observing the wisdom as well as humanity of the apostolic injunctions (1 Cor. vii. 20-24; Eph. vi. 5-9; Col. iii. 22-25, iv. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 18-25).

It may be added that among the heavy judgments threatened against Israel for disobedience was the being reduced to bondage (Deut. xxviii. 48, 68). How exactly this was fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem every one knows.

SEGIS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Shashai (Ezra x. 40).

SESTHEL (1 Esdr. ix. 31). Bezaleel (Ezra x. 30).

SETH (compensation). A son of Adam and Eve, born after the death of Abel, and regarded as re-placing him. Through Seth the line of ante-diluvian patriarchs was continued to Noah (Gen. iv. 25, 26, v. 3, 4, 6, 7, 8; Luke iii. 38). He is called Sheth in 1 Chron. i. 1.

SETHUR (hidden). The spy selected from the tribe of Asher (Numb. xiii. 13).

SEVEN. This word is used in scripture not only in its literal sense, but as expressing completeness: indeed, it seems to be the covenant-number, the sign and signature of God's covenant-relation to mankind, more especially to his church. Abp. Trench has illustrated this fact very fully (Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, pp. 53-59); and from him the following sentences are borrowed:—"The evidences . . . reach back to the very beginning. We meet them first in the hallowing of the seventh day (Gen. ii. 3: comp. Ezek. xx. 12). So too circumcision, being the sign of a covenant, is accomplished on the eighth, or after seven days (Gen. xvii. 12; Lev. xii. 3). And, as seven is the signature of God's covenant with man, so of all man's covenants with his fellows, resting, as these do and must, on the anterior covenant with God; thus of treaties of peace (Gen. xxi. 30), of marriages (Judges xiv. 12). Nor should it be left unnoticed that the word 'seven' is bound up in the Hebrew word signifying an oath, or a covenant confirmed with an oath. Seven is the number of sacrifice . . . (2 Chron. xxix. 21; Job xlii. 8: comp. Numb. xxiii. 1, 14, 29) . . . of purification and consecration . . . (Lev. iv. 6, 17, viii. 11, 33, xiv. 9, 51, xvi. 14, 19; Numb. xix. 12, 19), of forgiveness (Matt. xviii. 21, 22; Luke xvii. 4) . . . of every grace or benefit bestowed on Israel . . . (Josh. vi. 4, 15, 16) . . . of reward . . . (Deut. xxviii. 7; 1 Sam. ii. 5; Prov. xxiv. 16), of punishment . . . (Lev. xxvi. 21, 24, 28; Deut. xxviii. 25; 2 Sam. xii. 18, xxiv. 13) . . . All the feasts are ordered by seven, or else by seven multiplied into seven. . . . Thus . . . it is with the passover (Exod. xii. 15, 16), the feast of weeks (Deut. xvi. 9), of tabernacles (13, 15), the sabbath-year (Lev. xxv. 2-4; Deut. xv. 1), and the jubilee (Lev. xxv. 8). Also the number seems to have an universal reference, as in Naaman's washing seven times (2 Kings v. 10), and seven 'times' passing over Nebuchadnezzar Dan. iv. 16, 23, 25). Then there are seven beatitudes, seven clauses in the Lord's prayer, seven words from the cross, &c. &c. And the whole structure of the book of Revelation is arranged by this number. As to the reason of the fact, three is the signature of God, in the ever-blessed Trinity, four of the world—four elements, four seasons, four winds, &c. &c. 'There are reasons then, amply sufficient, why seven, being thus, as it is, made up of three and four, should be itself the signature of the covenant. No mere accident or caprice dictated the selection of it.'

SEVENEH (Ezek. xxix. 10, marg.). See SEVENE.

SEXTARIUS (Mark vii. 4, marg.). See MEASURES.

SHAALAB'BIN (city of foxes or jackals). A city of Dan (Josh. xix. 42); identical with SHA'ALBIM (id.). This place was on the hills not far from Ajalon: the Amorites for a while continued to hold it (Judges i. 35); but it was at length subdued, and included in Solomon's reign in one of the commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 9).

SHAAL'BONITE. An inhabitant or native of Shaalbib (2 Sam. xxiii. 32; 1 Chron. xi. 33).

SHA'APHI (division). 1, 2. Two names in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 47, 49).

SHAARA'IM (two gates, barley).—1. A city in the plain country of Judah (1 Sam. xvii. 52), called Sharaim in Josh. xv. 36. Perhaps it is the modern Sa'rah.—2 (1 Chron. iv. 31). See SRIIHM.

SHAASH'GAZ (beauty's servant?). A chamberlain or chief eunuch in the harem of Ahasuerus (Esth. ii. 14).

SHAB'BETHAI (sabbath-born). A Levite who assisted in expounding the law and in investigating the marriages of Jews with strange wives (Ezra x. 15; Neh. viii. 7, xi. 16).

SHACH'IA (accusation). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 10).

SHAD'DAI (the omnipotent). An appellation of the Deity, originally used, it may be, in invocation, but afterwards as a name generally. It is translated 'Almighty' (Gen. xvii. 1; Exod. vi. 3, and elsewhere).

SHADOW. The effect produced by an opaque body intercepting the rays of light flowing from a luminous object. A beautiful illustration is hence taken to describe the Deity, the Father of the lights, of the glorious orbs which sparkle on high, as being subject to no change, touched with no shadow which arises from the revolution of created things (James i. 17). On earthly beings a shadow falls: there are those who 'dwell in the land of the shadow of death' (Isai. ix. 2; Luke i. 79), in the death-shade of ignorance and sin. Sometimes, however, shadow is used in a better sense. In summer-heat it is pleasant to be sheltered from the sun's scorching rays (Isai. iv. 6, xxv. 4, xxxii. 2: comp. Sol. Song ii. 3; Isai. xxx. 2, xlix. 2). And then, as there is a resemblance between the shadow and the substance which casts it, and a connection, though the first is unsubstantial, the last a solid reality, the Jewish rites related to and typical of Christian truth are called 'the shadow of things to come' (Col. ii. 17; Heb. viii. 5, x. 1). A shadow, once more, is evanescent; it depends upon the light, upon the object which casts it: it is now visible, now it is gone: how graphically does this illustrate the fleeting character of human life! (Job xiv. 2.)

SHAD'RACH (rejoicing in the way? royal?). The name given to Hananiah, a young Hebrew captive at the court of Babylon (Dan. i. 7, ii. 49). He was one of the three cast into the furnace for refusing to worship the image Nebuchadnezzar set up (iii.).

SHA'GE (erring). The father of one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 34).

SHAHARA'IM (the two dawns). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 8).

SHAHAZI'MAH (heights). A border-place in the territory of Issachar (Josh. xix. 22).

SHA'LEM (safe, peaceful). A town to which, according to our version, Jacob came after his return from Padan-aram (Gen. xxxiii. 18). A village has been discovered near Nablous bearing almost the same name. But the best interpreters believe that no town is meant; that, as Jacob had prayed that he might be brought back in peace (xxviii. 21), so here the sacred writer notes that he did return safely.

SHA'LIM (jackals' region). A district, it would seem, in the territory of Ephraim (1 Sam. ix. 4). Possibly it may be the same with the land of Shual (xiii. 17).

SHA'LISHA (triad, triangular). A district bordering on mount Ephraim (1 Sam. ix. 4). Baal-shalisha (2 Kings iv. 42) might have been in this district.

SHALLE'CHETH (a casting-down). A gate of the temple (1 Chron. xxvi. 16), supposed to be that which led to the king's house by a way formed by filling up the valley between. It has been thought to be on the spot where the present Bab Silsilah stands.

SHAL'LUM (retribution, recompensed one).

—1. The murderer and successor of Zachariah king of Israel. He reigned a month 771 B.C., and then was slain by Menahem (2 Kings xv. 10-15).—2. The husband of the prophetess Huldah (xxii. 14; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22).—3. One of the posterity of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 40, 41).—4. A son of Josiah, who reigned on his father's death three months in Jerusalem (iii. 15; Jer. xxii. 11). He seems to have been popular; but he was carried into Egypt, whence he was not to return. He is also called Jehoahaz (2 Kings xxiii. 31-34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1-4). See JEHOAHAZ, 2.—5. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 25).—6. One of the line of the high priests (vi. 12, 13; Ezra vii. 2); most likely the Meshullam of 1 Chron. ix. 11.—7 (vii. 13). See SHILLEM.—8. A chief Levite porter (ix. 17, 19, 31); his descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45). Possibly the Shallum of 1 Chron. ix. 19, 31 was a different person from him of 17; and perhaps he may be the Meshelemiah of xxvi. 1.—9. An Ephraimite chief (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).—10. A Levite porter who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 24).—11. Another person who had transgressed in like manner (42).—12. One who with his daughters helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 12).

13. The uncle of the prophet Jeremiah

(Jer. xxxii. 7).—14. A door-keeper of the temple (xxxv. 4).

SHAL'LUN (id.). One who assisted in repairing the gates and wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 15).

SHAL'MAI (my thanks). One whose children, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 46; Neh. vii. 48).

SHAL'MAN (Hos. x. 14). Probably an abbreviation for SHALMANE'SER (worshipper of fire?) A king of Assyria. It would seem that he succeeded Tiglath-pileser, and probably reigned 729-721 B.C. He made war against Hoshea king of Israel, subdued him, and forced him to pay tribute. Hoshea, however, negotiated with So, the king of Egypt, and in dependence on help from him rebelled against his Assyrian master. Shalmaneser, therefore, marched against Samaria and besieged it for three years (2 Kings xvii. 3-5, xviii. 9). Hoshea was captured—whether in a battle before the siege, or whether when Samaria was taken, as it ultimately was, is not clear. It is observable that scripture does not affirm that Shalmaneser took Samaria: the conqueror is simply said to have been 'the king of Assyria' (xvii. 6, xviii. 10: comp. Isal. x. 5-11). There is reason to believe that a revolutionary change occurred at this time in the Assyrian dynasty, and that Sargon, Shalmaneser's successor, usurped his throne and brought to a successful issue those western wars in which Shalmaneser had been engaged. The monuments of Shalmaneser are mutilated; and one of the inscriptions ascribes the conquest of Samaria to Sargon. With regard to the Shalman of Hos. x. 14 we can only conjecture. The exploit referred to might have occurred in the march to Samaria. Shalmaneser is thought to have founded the palace at Khorsabad, which, however, was built principally by Sargon. See NINEVEH, pp. 630, 631, 633, 634.

SHA'MA (hearing, obedient). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 44).

SHAMARI'AH (whom Jehovah keeps). A son of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 19).

SHAMBLES. The flesh-market, the place where provisions were sold (1 Cor. x. 25). But meats bought in the shambles might have been offered to idols. For, when a poor man sacrificed a beast, after the priest and altar had received their shares, the rest was likely to be carried to the market. St. Paul lays down the reasonable rule that a Christian might readily purchase without asking questions. But, if information were given him that the meat had been offered to an idol, then he must abstain from it.

SHA'MED (a destroyer). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 12). In the Hebrew text, in many copies, the name is Shamer.

SHA'MER (a keeper, or thing kept).—1. A Levite (1 Chron. vi. 46).—2. A chief of Asher (vii. 34), called also Shomer (32).

SHAM'GAR (the etymology can be only conjectured, possibly warrior). One of the judges of Israel. He was the son of Anath; and in his days the people were grievously oppressed. But he slew six hundred Philistines with an ox-goad, and delivered Israel (Judges iii. 31, v. 6). We have no further account of him; but he may be supposed prior to or contemporary with Barak. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Samgar.'

SHAM'HUTH (desolation). One of David's captains (1 Chron. xxvii. 8). The name is perhaps corrupted from Shammah: see SHAMMAH, 4.

SHAM'MIR (a sharp point, a thorn). A Levite (1 Chron. xxiv. 24).

SHAM'MIR (id.).—1. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. xv. 48).—2. A place in mount Ephraim where Tola the judge resided and was buried (Judges x. 1, 2).

SHAM'LAI (Ezra ii. 46, marg.; Neh. vii. 48, marg.). See SHALMAI.

SHAM'MA (desolation). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 37).

SHAM'MAH (astonishment).—1. A descendant of Esau and 'duke' of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 13, 17; 1 Chron. i. 37).—2. The third son of Jesse (1 Sam. xvi. 9, xvii. 13), called also Shimeah (2 Sam. xiii. 3, 32, xxi. 21), Shinnai (1 Chron. ii. 13), and Shinea (xx. 7).

—3. One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 11, 33). Or two different persons may be here intended.—4. Another mentioned in the list of warriors (25), called also Shammoth (1 Chron. xi. 27: comp. Shambuth (xxvii. 8).

SHAM'MAI (desolated). 1, 2, 3. Three descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 28, 32, 44, 45, iv. 17).

SHAM'MOTH (desolations) (1 Chron. xi. 27). See SHAMMAH, 4.

SHAMMU'A, SHAMMU'AH (rumour).—1. A Reubenite selected as one of the spies (Numb. xiii. 4).—2. One of David's sons born at Jerusalem, Shammua in 1 Chron. xiv. 4, Shammuah in 2 Sam. v. 14, and Shimea in 1 Chron. iii. 5.—3. A Levite (Neh. xi. 17), called also Shemaiah (1 Chron. ix. 16).—4. A priest in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 18).

SHAM'SHERAI (perhaps formed from an union of Shushai and Shimri). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 26).

SHA'PHAM (bald, shaven). A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 12).

SHA'PHAN (coney).—1. An eminent person, the royal scribe, in the reign of Josiah. It is doubtful whether he or another of the name was the father of Ahikam, the friend and protector of the prophet Jeremiah (2 Kings xxii. 3-14, xxv. 22; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8-20; Jer. xxvi. 24, xxxvi. 10-12, xxxix. 14, xl. 5, 9, 11, xli. 2, xliii. 6).—2, 3. Twice the name Shaphan is mentioned again (xxix. 3; Ezek. viii. 11): it is uncertain whether one person is meant, or whether either is identical with the preceding.

SHA'PHAT (judge).—1. A Simeonite selected as one of the spies (Numb. xiii. 5).—2. The father of the prophet Elisha (1 Kings xix. 16, 19; 2 Kings iii. 11, vi. 31).—3. One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 22).—4. A Gadite (v. 12).—5. One of David's principal herdmen (xxvii. 29).

SHA'PHER (pleasantness). A mountain in the Arabian desert, one of the stations of the Israelites (Numb. xxxiii. 23, 24).

SHA'RAI (Jehovah frees him). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 40).

SHARA'IM (two gates) (Josh. xv. 36). See SHAARAIM.

SHA'RAR (twisted, a cord, or, according to some, muscular). The father of one of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 33). He is called Saacir in 1 Chron. xi. 35.

SHARE'ZER (prince of fre). One of the sons of Sennacherib, who with his brother Adrammelech murdered their father (3 Kings xix. 37; Isai. xxxvii. 38).

SHA'RON (the plain).—1. A district in Palestine lying upon the sea-coast. It appears to be a continuation of the plain country of Judah, the Shefelah, and to have extended from Joppa to Cæsarea (whence it is frequently in scripture coupled with Carmel), and from the central hills to the Mediterranean. It was a region well adapted for pasture (1 Chron. xxvii. 29; Isai. lxx. 10), very fertile (xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 2), and celebrated for its roses (Sol. Song ii. 1). Its locality is further indicated as being in the neighbourhood of Lydda (Acts ix. 35, where it is called Saron). The plain of Sharon, Dr. Thomson tells us, is not 'a flat dead level,' but is 'agreeably varied by long swells, growing into sandy ridges, and even rocky tells and hills, which afford slightly positions for villages. Of these there are more than in other plains, more populous also, and surrounded often by olive and fruit orchards, which impart an air of cheerfulness not seen elsewhere in Palestine' (The Land and the Book, p. 523). The same writer, regarding the rose as a species of mallow, says: 'I have seen thousands of Solomon's roses on Sharon' (p. 513). See ROSE.

2. There is another Sharon mentioned, on the west of the Jordan. It is coupled with Gilead (1 Chron. v. 16); but its exact situation, and whether it was a district or a town, can only be conjectured.

SHA'RONITE. An inhabitant of Sharon (1 Chron. xxvii. 29).

SHARU'HEN (pleasant dwelling-place). A city in the territory of Simeon (Josh. xix. 6). See SHILHIM.

SHA'SHAI (whitish?). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 40).

SHA'SHAK (eagerness). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 14, 25).

SHA'UL (asked for, desired).—1. A son of Simeon by a Canaanitish woman (Gen. xli. 10; Exod. vi. 15; Numb. xxvi. 13; 1 Chron. iv. 24).—2. An Edomite king (i. 48, 49), called Saul in Gen. xxxvi. 37, 38.—3. A Kohathite Levite (1 Chron. vi. 24), the Joel of 36?

SHA'ULITES. A family of Simeon, descendants of Shaul (Numb. xxvi. 13).

SHA'VEH (a plain). A plain or valley, called also 'the king's dale,' where the king of Sodom met Abram returning from his victory (Gen. xiv. 17: comp. 2 Sam. xviii. 18). Some place this to the east of the Jordan: it is more probably near Jerusalem to the north.

SHA'VEH-KIRIATHA'IM (plain of Kiriat-haim). A plain near the city of Kiriat-haim (Gen. xiv. 5). See KIRIATHAIM.

SHAV'SHA (perhaps a corruption of Seraiah). The scribe, an officer in David's kingdom (1 Chron. xviii. 16). He is called Seraiah in 2 Sam. viii. 17, Sheva in xx. 25, and Shisha in 1 Kings iv. 3.

SHEA'L (an asking). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 29).

SHEAL'TIEL (I have asked him of God) (1 Chron. iii. 17, marg.; Ezra iii. 2, 8, v. 2; Neh.

xii. 1; Hagg. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 2, 23). See SALATHIEL.

SHEAR. See SHEEP. The 'shearing-house' (2 Kings x. 12, 14) was probably some town or village, Beth-eked-harolim (house of the shepherd's hamlet).

SHEARI'AH (whom Jehovah estimates). A descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 38, ix. 44).

SHEAR'-JA'SHUB (the remnant shall return). A symbolical name given to a son of the prophet Isaiah, intended to show that, though the people should be carried captive, yet a remnant should return to their own land (Isai. vii. 3: comp. x. 21, 22).

SHEBA' (man?).—1. One of the descendants of Cush, of the family of Ham (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9).—2. A son of Joktan of the family of Shem (Gen. x. 28; 1 Chron. i. 22).—3. A son of Jokshan, Abraham's son by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 3; 1 Chron. i. 32). For their descendants see the next article.

SHEBA' (id.). There is a difficulty not so much in determining what country was inhabited by descendants of Sheba, as in distinguishing whether there were more tribes than one which bore the name, and whether, if so, any line of demarcation could be found between their respective localities. Gesenius, comparing the three names, believes that the Sabæans of Arabia Felix adjacent to Sanaa are the posterity of Joktan. The other two names of Sheba he refers to one and the same people. He assumes therefore two tribes—one, Joktan's descendants, the more powerful of the two, in Arabia Felix; the other dwelling towards the Persian gulf not far from the mouth of the Euphrates. This latter tribe is not mentioned, he thinks, except in the passages of Genesis and Chronicles. Winzer sees no occasion for Gesenius's division into two tribes (Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Sebeba'). The view, however, taken by Kalisch seems most satisfactory. Sheba, he believes, is Saba, the chief city of Yemen, the leading province of Arabia. The inhabitants of this country were a powerful race, receiving fresh accessions, and throwing out many colonies. Their land was bordered on the west by the Red sea, on the south by the Indian ocean; to the north it reached nearly to Idumea; but on the east its boundaries varied at different times. Among the immigrants into this country, occupied by Cushites, were the descendants of Joktan; so that it was peopled by both Hamites and Shemites, the former in the south-west adjoining Africa, the latter to the east and the north. And then a portion of the tribes of Jokshan, the descendants of Abraham, settled in the territories of older nations—occupied, in fact, some of the country Sheba (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 250, 251). It is no strange thing for colonists from different lands to settle at various times in the same region, and there to amalgamate and bear a common name. Sheba, so peopled, was long regarded as the most southern country of the habitable earth: it was very wealthy and luxurious, its commerce most extended, its capital, Sabas or Mariaba, a splendid city. From this land came that queen who visited Solomon, respecting whom the Jews have many legends (1 Kings x. 1-13; 2 Chron. ix. 1-12; Job vi. 10; Psal. lxxii. 10, 15; Isai. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20; Ezek. xxvii. 22, 23, xxxviii. 13; Matt. xii. 42; Luke xi. 31).

A writer in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1232, supposes that the descendants of the Cushite Sheba settled on the shores of the Persian gulf, where, on the island of Awâl, are the ruins of an ancient city called Sebâ. He thinks it was this tribe that, in conjunction with the Jokshanite Sheba, carried on the Indian traffic with Palestine.

SHE'BA (seven, or an oath).—1. A Benjamite, who, after the suppression of Absalom's rebellion, headed a fresh insurrection, fostered by the rising jealousy between Judah and the other tribes. He was pursued by David's troops, but occupied the city of Abel. A wise woman there persuaded the people to deliver Sheba's head to Joab; and the revolt was immediately crushed (2 Sam. xx. 1-22).—2. A Gadite chieftain (1 Chron. v. 13).

SHE'BA (id.). A city in the territory of Simeon (Josh. xix. 2). But Gesenius suggests that the name may here designate the well: 'Beer-sheba with the well Sheba.' Otherwise the number of cities would be fourteen, whereas they are stated to be thirteen: comp. Wilton's Negeb, p. 107.

SHEB'AH (id. feminine). The name of the well at Beer-sheba (Gen. xxvi. 33).

SHEBA'M (fragrance) (Numb. xxxii. 3). See SIBMAH.

SHEBANI'AH (whom Jehovah has made grow up).—1. A priest who took part in the bringing-up of the ark by David (1 Chron. xv. 24).—2. A Levite at the time that Ezra read the book of the law (Neh. ix. 4, 5); probably the same who sealed the covenant (x. 10).—3. A priest who sealed the covenant (4); very likely the one mentioned in xii. 14, identical with Shechaniah (3).—4. Another Levite who sealed the covenant (x. 12).

SHEBA'RIM (breaches, ruins). A place or spot near Ai, to which the Israelites were pursued (Josh. vii. 5).

SHE'BER (a breaking, or corn). A son of Caleb the son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 48).

SHEB'NA (youth?). An officer of state in the reign of Hezekiah, described as treasurer over the house. A terrible denunciation was uttered against him for his pride, evinced in preparing himself a gorgeous sepulchre. He was told that he should be ejected from his office, which should be conferred on Eliakim, and that he should be carried captive to a foreign country, where he should die (Isai. xxii. 15-25). As an aggravation of his fault it has been supposed that Shebna rose from a low station; and some imagine that he was a foreigner. This, however, can only be conjecture. It is generally said that the denunciation began to be fulfilled when we read again of Shebna as scribe, and Eliakim as over the house (2 Kings xviii. 18, 26, 37, xix. 2; Isai. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22, xxxvii. 2). But it is altogether inconceivable, if Shebna were then in disgrace, that he should be commissioned to confer with the Assyrian ambassadors, and above all be sent to the prophet who had so censured him. We seem reduced, therefore, to the alternative of supposing, either that the prophecy was uttered at a later period, or that Shebna the treasurer was distinct from Shebna the scribe.

SHEBU'EL (captivity of God).—1. A descendant of Moses (1 Chron. xxiii. 16, xxvi. 24): he is also called Shubael (xxiv. 20).—2. One of the Levite singers (xxv. 4): he too is called Shubael (20).

SHECANIAH (familiar with Jehovah).—1. The chief of one of the courses of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 11; probably identical with Shebannah (Neh. x. 4, xii. 14) and Shechaniah (xii. 3).—2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 15).

SHECHANI'AH (id.).—1. One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 21, 22).—2, 3. Two men, whose descendants returned from captivity with Ezra (Ezra viii. 3, 5).—4. One who joined with Ezra in the covenant to put away foreign wives (x. 2).—5. A person (Shecaniah in some copies) whose son repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 29).—6. Father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (vi. 18).—7 (xii. 3). See SHECANIAH, 1.

SHECH'EM (the shoulder-blade).—1. The son of Hamor the Hivite, who, having defiled Dinah, Jacob's daughter, was slain by her brothers Simeon and Levi (Gen. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv.).—2. A descendant of Gilead of the tribe of Manasseh (Numb. xxvi. 31; Josh. xvii. 2).—3. Another descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 19).

SHECH'EM (id.). A celebrated city of Palestine; called also Sichern (Gen. xli. 6), Sychar (John iv. 5), and Sychem (Acts vii. 16). It was of great antiquity, for it was in existence when Abram entered Canaan. It was occupied by Hivites when Jacob pitched his tent before it, and purchased some ground, where he built an altar; and it was plundered, and the inhabitants put to the sword by Simeon and Levi, because the chief's son had defiled their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiii. 18-20, xxxiv.).

Shechem was after the conquest territorially in the tribe of Ephraim, but was assigned to the Levites of the family of Kohath, and appointed a city of refuge (Josh. xvii. 7, xx. 7, xxi. 21; 1 Chron. vi. 67, vii. 28). There the bones of Joseph were buried; and, as a central point, it was the place where Joshua gathered Israel to receive his last instructions (Josh. xxiv. 1-23, 32). Its history in the time of the judges, so far as we find it recorded, was disgraceful and disastrous. Idolatrous worship appears to have been introduced; and the inhabitants were persuaded to make Abimelech, Gideon's son by a woman of their town, king (Judges viii. 31). Then followed the massacre of Gideon's other sons; and, as power gotten by such means was not likely to be permanent, dissension soon arose between the Shechemites and their king; and the result was the destruction of the city and the death of Abimelech (ix.). It was afterwards re-built, and regained its importance. For we find that Rehoboam went thither to be inaugurated king; it was there that in consequence of his folly the revolution broke out; and at Shechem, fortified by Jeroboam, was at first the seat of the new monarchy (1 Kings xii. 1-19, 25; 2 Chron. x.). It was standing after the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. xli. 5); and after the return of the Jews from captivity it became the centre of Samaritan worship; a temple being erected on Gerizim, which was ultimately destroyed by John Hyrcanus, 129 B.C. See GERIZIM. On or near the ancient site a town was built, probably by Vespasian, called Flavia Neapolis: it was the birth-place of Justin Martyr, and the see of Christian bishops (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Sichern').

Shechem was situated in a beautiful valley, in the range of the mountains of Ephraim, on the borders of Ephraim and Manasseh, between Ebal and Gerizim, about seven miles south of Samaria. The modern town is called Nablous, or Nablús, from Neapolis: it contains about 8,000 inhabitants, but not more than from fifteen to twenty Samaritan families. It has a tolerable trade, and is noted for the manufacture of soap. The following is Dr. Thomson's description of the vale and town of Nablús: 'Nothing in Palestine surpasses it (the vale) in fertility and natural beauty; and this is mainly due to the fine mill-stream which flows through it. The whole country is thickly studded with villages, the plains clothed with grass or grain, and the rounded hills with orchards of olive, fig, pomegranate, and other trees. . . . Nablús is a queer old place. The streets are narrow, and vaulted over; and in the winter-time it is difficult to pass along many of them on account of brooks, which rush over the pavement with deafening roar. In this respect I know no city with which to compare it except Brusa; and, like that city, it has mulberry, orange, pomegranate, and other trees, mingled in with the houses, whose odoriferous flowers load the air with delicious perfume during the months of April and May. Here the biblú delights to sit and sing; and thousands of other birds unite to swell the chorus' (The Land and the Book, p. 470).

Almost two miles to the east lies a small village, Baláta, where Joseph's tomb is believed to be (Josh. xxiv. 32), and at a little distance south-east Jacob's well. See JACOB'S WELL, SYCHAR.

SHECH'EMITES. A family of Gilead, of the tribe of Manasseh, descended from Shechem (Numb. xxvi. 31).

SHECHIN'AH (resting-place). A name (not occurring in scripture) applied to the visible symbol of God's glory which anciently dwelt in the tabernacle and in Solomon's temple.

'No man hath seen God at any time' (John i. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 16): his glorious essence cannot be gazed on by the eye of men (Exod. xxxiii. 20). But yet there have been manifestations of his near presence, some symbolical appearance, adapted to impress the beholder with a sense of his majesty, and illustrating some of those attributes in which he best loves to be known to his people. Examples may be found in the cherubic guard in Eden (Gen. iii. 24), in the mysterious fire with which the bush on Horeb burned and was not consumed (Exod. iii. 2), and in that strange brightness above the sapphire pavement, 'the body of heaven in his clearness,' which Moses and Aaron and the elders of Israel beheld when they ascended the holy mount (xxiv. 10).

When the Lord led forth Israel from Egypt, he went before them, we are told, 'in a pillar of a cloud' (xiii. 21, 22). Such at least it appeared by day; but in the dark night a fire seemed to burn within it, a cheering lamp to his people, a lurid omen to their foes (xiv. 20). This cloudy pillar when the tabernacle was set up covered it; and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. Its being taken up was the signal of marching for the tribes; its quiescence a proof that they were to tarry in their tents (xl. 34-38). It would seem that from time to time there was some special manifestation of the divine glory in this pillar. Fire burst out from it when the sacrifices were offered at the consecration of the priests (Lev. ix. 23, 24). Again, when the infuriated people were about to stone Joshua and Caleb, because they would not countenance the evil report of the unfaithful spies, 'the glory of the Lord appeared in the tabernacle' (Numb. xiv. 10). So, also, in the rebellion of Korah (xvi. 19, 42). We read no more of this leading cloud after the Israelites had entered Canaan; and it is probable that it then settled in the most holy place in the tabernacle upon the ark of the covenant. Perhaps during the religious degeneracy which followed, especially while the ark was removed from place to place, separated from the tabernacle, it ceased to appear. But, whether this were so or not, it was present in the temple, filling the whole house at its consecration with its glory, so that the priests could not stand to minister (1 Kings viii. 10-13; 2 Chron. v. 13, 14, vii. 1-3; comp. 1 Sam. iv. 21; Rom. ix. 4). Most probably while the first temple stood the shechinah was there. But we have no reason to believe that it dwelt in the second: that temple was, however, more honoured by the personal presence of the incarnate Son of God. And he dwells spiritually in his church and people for ever. This the ancient symbol typified. Not in visible manifestation but with effectual power is the Lord present. So that the bodies of believers are the temples of the Holy Ghost (1 Cor. vi. 19; 2 Cor. vi. 16).

See for much information on this subject Buxtorf, Lex. Talmud. &c., cols. 2394-2398.

SHEDE'UR (darting of fire). The father of the prince of Reuben (Numb. i. 5, ii. 10, vii. 30, 35, x. 18).

SHEEP. The Hebrew word signifying 'a sheep' is also applied to a goat; and that which corresponds with our word 'flock' includes goats as well as sheep. The wealth of the patriarchs and early inhabitants of Palestine consisted largely in their numerous flocks (Gen. xxx. 31-43; 1 Sam. xxv. 2; Job i. 3, xlii. 12); and at the present day considerable flocks are sometimes seen in an Arab encampment. Dr. Thomson speaks of the numbers passing along the sea-board of Palestine in 1853: 'During the months of November and December the whole line of coast was covered with them: they came from northern Syria and from Mesopotamia; and their shepherds, in dress, manners, and language, closely resemble those of Abraham and Job, as I believe' (The Land and the Book, p. 331). The necessity of finding pasturage for their cattle directed the journeys of the elder fathers (Gen. xxxvii. 12-17); and many of the incidents in their lives occurred at wells whither they brought (the females being often so employed) their flocks to water (xxix. 1-12; Exod. ii. 16-21). The animal from which most of the western domestic sheep are thought to be descended is still (Kitto's Cycl. of Bibl. Lit.) found wild in the mountain regions of Persia. There are two kinds of sheep now in Syria—the Bedouin or common horned white sheep, similar to our own, Ovis aries, except that the tail is somewhat longer and thicker; and the broad-tailed variety, Ovis laticaudatus, which when fattened have tails of an enormous size. 'I have seen many in Lebanon so heavy,' says Dr. Thomson, 'that the owners could not carry them without difficulty. . . . The cooks use this mass of fat instead of Arab butter. . . . No doubt this is the "rump" so often mentioned in the Levitical sacrifices, which was to be taken off hard by the back-bone (Exod. xxix. 22; Lev. iii. 9, vii. 3, ix. 19). It is, in fact, not properly a tail, but a mass of marrow-like fat, which spreads over the whole rump of the sheep, and down the caudal extremity, till near the end' (p. 97). The shearing of the sheep was celebrated anciently, as often now, with much festivity (Gen. xxxi. 19, xxxviii. 12, 13; 1 Sam. xxv. 4-8, 36; 2 Sam. xiii. 23-28).

Sheep furnish many illustrations in scripture, symbolizing patient meekness (Isai. liii. 7); and the beautiful relation between the careful shepherd and his flock is used to illustrate God's care over his people (Psal. xxiii. 1, 2, lxxiv. 1, lxxvii. 20, c. 3; Isai. xl. 11, liii. 6; John x. 1-5, 7-16). It is observable, further, that, though a flock may contain indifferently sheep and goats, yet, when a division is made, the sheep represent the godly (Matt. xxv. 32, 33).

SHEEP-FOLD. An inclosure or shelter for sheep. Sheep-cotes or sheep-folds are often mentioned in scripture (e.g. Numb. xxxii. 24, 36; 1 Sam. xxiv. 3; 2 Chron. xxxii. 28). The word is sometimes used figuratively (e.g. John. x. 1). Modern sheep-folds in Syria are described as low flat buildings, in which when the nights are cold the sheep are shut. There is a yard attached where they are kept in milder weather. This is fenced with a stone wall crowned with sharp thorns: see illustration on opposite page.

SHEEP-GATE, SHEEP-MARKET (Neh. iii. 1, 32, xii. 39; John v. 2). This gate (market is a mistake) must have stood between the tower of Meah and the prison-gate, to the north-east. Mr. Grove imagines it at or near the present Bab el-Kattânin, and would identify the 'pool' with the modern Ham-mâm esh-Shefa (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vcl. iii. p. 1244).

SHEHARI'AH (Jehovah seeks him). A Benjaminite chief (1 Chron. viii. 26).

SHEKEL. A Hebrew word which implies plying or weighing. It is commonly used in the untranslated form in our version, and hence comes to be a naturalized English term. A shekel was originally a certain weight; for purchases were made by weighing out so much precious metal: then naturally it grew to be the recognized name of a definite value as money; and stamped pieces of the weight were used as coins. The first mention of a shekel in scripture is in the time of Abraham (Gen. xxiii. 15, 16). It soon occurs again as denoting weight (xxiv. 22); and subsequently the use of the term is frequent. Often, as in 2 Sam. xviii. 11, the word shekel, as perfectly understood, is omitted; as we say five hundred (i. e. pounds) a year. There were golden and silver shekels. See MONEY, WEIGHTS.

SHE'LAH (petition). The third son of Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 5, 11, 14, 26, xlv. 12; Numb. xxvi. 20; 1 Chron. ii. 3, iv. 21).

SHE'LAH (shoot, sprout) (Gen. x. 24, marg.; 1 Chron. i. 18, 24). See SALAH.

SHE'LANITES. A family of Judah, descendants of Shelah (Numb. xxvi. 20). See SHILONI.

SHELEMI'AH (whom Jehovah repays, or

Yemen called Sulaf or Sulafstych, sixty miles south of Sanaa (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1247).

SHE'LESII (tribe). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 35).

SHELO'MI (pacific). The father of the chief of Asher appointed to superintend the division of the land (Numb. xxxiv. 27).

SHELO'MITH (id.).—1. A Danite woman, mother of a blasphemer who was stoned in the wilderness (Lev. xxiv. 11).—2. A daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 19).—3. A Gershonite Levite (xxiii. 9).—4. A Kohathite Levite (18): called also Shelomoth (xxiv. 22).

—5. A Levite, descended from Moses, placed with his brethren over David's dedicated things (xxvi. 25, 26).—6. A child of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 20).—7. One whose descendants joined Ezra's caravan (Ezra viii. 10).

SHELO'MOTH (id.). See SHELOMITH, 4.

SHELU'MIEL (friend of God). The prince of Simeon in the wilderness (Numb. i. 6, ii. 12, vii. 36, 41, x. 19).

Sheep-fold.

treats as a friend).—1 (1 Chron. xxvi. 14). See MESHELEMI'AH.—2, 3. Two persons who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 39, 41).—4. Father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 30).—5. A priest whom Nehemiah made one of the treasurers of the offerings and tithes (xiii. 13).—6. The grandfather of a messenger sent by the princes of Judah to Baruch (Jer. xxxvi. 14).—7. One of the officers ordered by Jehoiakim to apprehend Jeremiah and Baruch (26).—8. Father of one of those who accused Jeremiah to Zedekiah (xxxvii. 3, xxxviii. 1): he is perhaps identical with No. 7.—9. Father of a captain of the ward (xxxvii. 13).

SHE'LEPH (drawn out, selected). A son of Joktan (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chron. i. 20). His descendants perhaps were the Salapeni, a tribe of Arabia Felix, south-east of the present Medina. Mr. Poole, apparently acknowledging this identification, finds the settlements of Sheleph in a district of the

SHEM (name). One of the three sons of Noah (Gen. v. 32, vi. 10, vii. 13; 1 Chron. i. 4). He was preserved in the ark during the flood; and afterwards his dutiful conduct to his father, and the blessing pronounced upon him are recorded (Gen. ix. 20-27). Shem was the eldest of Noah's three sons; for the translation, 'the brother of Japheth the elder' (x. 21), cannot be sustained: it is really 'the elder brother of Japheth.' This patriarch was the father of one of the three great divisions of mankind: the nations called Shemitic, including the Hebrews, Aramæans, Persians, Assyrians, &c., occupying the central parts of the ancient world, were descended from him (21-31; 1 Chron. i. 17-23). In the direct line from Shem we have the genealogy of the Israelitish nation (Gen. xi. 10-26; 1 Chron. i. 24-27). He lived 600 years, and, if the ordinary chronology is to be depended on, he must have been many years contemporary with Abraham. In Luke iii. 36 he is called Sem. See EARTH, LANGUAGE.

SHE'MA (rumour).—1. One of Judah's descendants (1 Chron. ii. 43, 44).—2. A Reubenite (v. 8), who appears to be the same with Shemaiah (4).—3. A Benjamite chief (viii. 13), possibly the Shimhi of 21.—4. One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the law (Neh. viii. 4).

SHEMA' (id.). A city in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 26). Mr. Wilton supposes, from a comparison with the Septuagint version, that the name is properly Salma or Shalma, and identifies it with a mound and ruins styled Rujeim Selameh, in a favourite camping-place of the Jehâlin Arabs (The Negeb, pp. 106-109).

SHEMA'AH (id.). A Benjamite, father of two chiefs who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 3).

SHEMAI'AH (Jehovah heareth him).—1. A prophet and chronicler in the time of Rehoboam (1 Kings xii. 22-24; 2 Chron. xi. 2-4, xii. 5-8, 15).—2. One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 22); he was probably identical with that Shemaiah, who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 29).—3. A Simeonite (1 Chron. iv. 37), possibly the Shimel of 26, 27.—4. A descendant of Reuben (v. 4), called also Shema (8).—5, 6. Two Levites (ix. 14, 16) : the first of these is mentioned in Neh. xi. 15; the second may be identical with Shamua (17).—7. One of the chief Levites (1 Chron. xv. 8, 11).—8. A Levite scribe (xxiv. 6).—9. The first-born of Obed-edom (xxvi. 4, 6, 7).—10. A Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 8).—11. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (xxix. 14); most probably identical with the person mentioned in xxxi. 15.—12. A chief Levite in Josiah's reign (xxxv. 9).—13. A prudent man whom Ezra sent to summon some of the Levites to his caravan (Ezra vii. 13, 16).—14. A priest who had married a foreign wife (x. 21).—15. Another person who had committed the same act (31).—16. One hired by Tobiah and Sanballat to induce Nehemiah to conceal himself (Neh. vi. 10-13).—17. A priest who sealed the covenant (x. 8). He was probably the representative of one who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (xii. 6, 18). The name occurs four times more in the same chapter : it is not easy to say how many individuals are meant, or to identify them with any before named (34, 35, 36, 42).—18. The father of Urijah the prophet whom Jehoiakim put to death (Jer. xxvi. 12).—19. A false prophet called the Nehelamite (xxix. 24-32).—20. The father of Delaiah, who was one of the princes in Jehoiakim's reign (xxxvi. 12).

SHEMARI'AH (whom Jehovah keeps).—1. A Benjamite warrior who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5).—2, 3. Two who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 32, 41).

SHEME'BER (lofty flight). The king of Zebulun, one of the five cities of the plain (Gen. xiv. 2).

SHE'MER (a guardian, lees, dregs). The person from whom king Omri bought the hill of Samaria, on which he built a city called after the former owner's name (1 Kings xvi. 24).

SHEMI'DA, SHEMI'DAH (fame of wis- dom). A descendant of Manasseh through Gilead (Numb. xxvi. 32; Josh. xvii. 2; 1 Chron. vii. 19).

SHEMIDA'ITES. A family of Manasseh descended from Shemida (Numb. xxvi. 32).

SHEMI'NITH (eighth). A technical musical term of which the signification is doubtful (1 Chron. xv. 21; Psal. vi., xii., titles). It may have been a harp of eight strings; or it may rather refer to the time—upon the eighth or octave.

SHEMI'RAMOTH (name most high, or heaven most high).—1. One of the Levites, porters, who played on the psaltery (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).—2. A Levite in Jehoshaphat's reign (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

SHEM'UEL (heard of God).—1. One of the persons selected from the tribe of Simeon, to superintend the division of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 20).—2 (1 Chron. vi. 33). See SAMUEL.—3. A chieftain of Issachar (vii. 2).

SHEN (tooth). A place not far from Mizpeh, mentioned to denote the site of Eben-ezer (1 Sam. vii. 12). It was probably a rock or peak, shaped like a tooth.

SHENA'ZAR (fiery tooth). One of David's posterity (1 Chron. iii. 18).

SHEM'R (coat of mail, or cataract). A name of mount Hermon or a part of it (Deut. iii. 9; Sol. Song iv. 8). See HERMON.

SHEPHA'M (bareness, spot naked of trees). A place on the north-eastern border of Palestine (Numb. xxxiv. 10, 11).

SHEPHATHI'AH (id.). A Benjamite (1 Chron. ix. 8); in some editions of our version this is Shephathiah.

SHEPHATI'AH (whom Jehovah defends).—1. David's fifth son, by Abital, born in Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Chron. iii. 3).—2. (ix. 8). See SHEPHATHI'AH.—3. A warrior, designated the Harupthite, who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 5).—4. The ruler of the Simeonites in David's time (xxvii. 16).—5. One of the sons of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi. 2).—6, 7. Two persons whose descendants, the last called Solomon's servants, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 4, 57; Neh. vii. 9, 59).—8. One of the posterity of Judah (xi. 4).—9. An eminent man who desired that king Zedekiah would agree to put Jeremiah to death (Jer. xxxviii. 1-4).

SHEPHERD. The occupation of a shepherd is one of the earliest of which we read. Abel was a keeper of sheep (Gen. iv. 2); and many of the most eminent patriarchs were similarly employed (xxx. 31, xxxi. 38, 39, xxxvii. 12, 13, 16, xlvi. 32, 34; Exod. iii. 1). The king's daughters also tended the flocks (Gen. xxix. 6, 9, 10; Exod. ii. 16-19). And the first introduction of David is in the character of a shepherd (1 Sam. xvi. 11). A chief herdsman was still later a man of importance (xxi. 7; 1 Chron. xxvii. 31).

The various duties of shepherds are frequently alluded to in scripture. They constantly watched their flocks, for which they were responsible (Gen. xxxi. 39, 40; Ezek. xxxiv. 9, 10; Luke ii. 8), and which they had to defend from wild beasts (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 35). The dress of the shepherd is alluded to in Jer. xliii. 12; probably it was a sheepskin cloak. They carried slings, and a scrip or bag for their food (1 Sam. xvii. 40), with a staff, used for defence, and as a crook (Psal. xxiii. 4; Zech. xi. 7, 15), and had tents, when it was necessary to abide long in the fields (Sol. Song i. 8; Isai. xxxviii. 12); towers being sometimes built to secure their ordinary pasture-grounds (Gen. xxxv. 21; Mic. iv. 8). They were attended by dogs (Job xxx. 1); 'a mean, sinister, ill-conditioned generation' (says Dr. Thomson), 'kept at a distance, knocked about, and half-starved, with nothing noble or attractive about them. Still, they lag lazily behind the flocks, making a furious barking at any intruder among their charge, and thus give warning of approaching danger' (The Land and the Book, p. 202).

Metaphorically the name shepherds is given to chiefs and kings (Isai. xlv. 28; Mic. v. 5; comp. Psal. lxxviii. 71, 72), also to teachers and ministers (Ezek. xxxiv. 2; comp. Acts xx. 28; 1 Pet. v. 2). More particularly the Lord is called the shepherd of his people (Psal. xxiii. 1; Isai. xl. 11); and Christ's tender care for his flock and laying down his life for them is thus beautifully illustrated (John x. 1-18; Heb. xiii. 20; 1 Pet. v. 4; comp. Luke xv. 3-7). The modern habits of oriental shepherds are quite in accordance with these and other allusions. They have flocks composed of sheep and goats, which they water at the wells; they go before the sheep, which follow them and know their voice; they give names to them, which the sheep recognize, and will flee from the call of a stranger. The shepherds, too, still carry the lambs in their bosom, and carefully lead the mothers; they invariably carry a staff or rod, hooked at one end; they guard against wild beasts; and amid predatory tribes cases occur in which the shepherd loses his life in defending his charge (ibid. pp. 201-205).

SHEPHI' (a naked hill). A descendant of Seir (1 Chron. i. 40). He is also called

SHEPHO' (smoothness) (Gen. xxxvi. 23).

SHEPHU'PHAN (serpent, horned snake or cerastes). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 5); but in the marg. Shupham.

SHE'RAH (blood-kindred). A daughter of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 24).

SHEREBIAH (heat of Jehovah?). One of the chief among the Levites or priests who assisted Ezra, and sealed the covenant (Ezra viii. 18, 24; Neh. viii. 7, ix. 4, 5, x. 12, xii. 8, 24). Possibly in these places more than one individual may be included.

SHE'RESH (root). A descendant of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 16).

SHERE'ZER (prince of fire). One of the persons sent in the reign of Darius to the house of God (Zech. vii. 2). See REGEM-MELECH.

SHE'SHACH. A symbolical name of Babylon (Jer. xxv. 26, li. 41). It has been a puzzle to account for Babylon's being so called. Some critics believe that it is written according to the cabalistic plan of putting the last letter of the alphabet for the first, the last but one for the second, and so forth. Sheshach would then be Babel or Babylon. But, according to Sir H. Rawlinson, Shishaki is, in one of the ancient Babylonian dialects, the name of the moongod, and is supposed to designate the city Ur (Herod., vol. i. p. 616).

SHE'SHAI (whitish?). One of the sons of Anak (Numb. xiii. 22; Josh. xv. 14; Judges 1. 10); or perhaps the name of a family of Anakim.

SHE'SHAN (illy). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 31, 34, 35).

SHESHBAZ'ZAR (fire-worshipper). The name apparently borne in Persia by Zerubabel (Ezra i. 8, 11, v. 14, 16).

SHETH (compensation, tumult?). — 1 (Numb. xxiv. 17). Here the word is probably not a proper name; we may translate 'the sons of tumult'; comp. Jer. xlviii. 45. But see SHITTIM.—2 (1 Chron. i. 1). See SETH.

SHE'THAR (a star). One of the seven princes of Persia (Esth. i. 14).

SHETHAR-BOZNAI' (shining star). A Persian officer in Syria (Ezra v. 3, 6, vi. 6, 13).

SHEVA' (perhaps habitation, or it may be corrupted from Seralah). — 1 (2 Sam. xx. 25). See SHAVSHA, SERAIAH, 1.—2. A son of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 49).

SHEW-BREAD. The expression used in our version for what is literally 'bread of faces' or 'bread of the presence,' so called because it was set before Jehovah in the holy place (Exod. xxv. 30). Later it was termed 'bread of ordering' or 'arrangement' (1 Chron. ix. 32, marg.; Neh. x. 33). The shew-bread consisted of twelve loaves or cakes, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, fresh every sabbath-day, placed in two rows or piles, with frankincense on each row. The frankincense was burnt as an offering made by fire; and the bread taken away to make room for the fresh loaves was to be eaten by the priests in the holy place (Lev. xxiv. 5-9). It was with respect to this shew-bread that the incident occurred of its being given to David (1 Sam. xxi. 2-6), referred to by our Lord (Matt. xii. 3, 4). This bread was placed upon a table made of shittim-wood overlaid with gold (Exod. xxv. 23-30) set in the sanctuary (xxxix. 36; Heb. ix. 2). On this table were, besides the 'continual bread,' as it was sometimes termed, bowls and cups in which there was, probably, wine for libations (Exod. xxv. 29, 30, xxxvii. 10-16, xl. 4, 22-24; Numb. iv. 7). The shew-bread was an offering, placed before the Lord, whose ever-watchful eye looked thereon with complacency, a portion of their substance consecrated by the people for God's honour; and as incense was put upon it the lesson was taught that the spiritual sacrifice symbolized by the bread was to be ever presented with supplication, and could only so meet with the divine favour. See Fairbairn, Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. 6, vol. ii. pp. 322-328.

Table of shew-bread. From the Arch of Titus.

SHIB'BOLETH (stream, ear of grain). A word propounded by the Gileadites to the fugitive Ephraimites, in order to detect by their pronunciation whether or no they were really of that tribe (Judges xii. 4-6). It appears from this circumstance that there were variations of dialect in the spoken language of Palestine.

SHIB'MAH (fragrance). (Numb. xxxii. 38). See SIBMAH.

SHIC'RON (drunkenness). A place on the northern border of Judah (Josh. xv. 11).

SHIELD. See ARMS. Besides its literal signification the word is sometimes used tropically, as applied to God (Gen. xv. 1; Psal. iii. 3, lxxxiv. 9, 11), and to warriors or rulers (xlvi. 9; Hos. iv. 18, marg.).

SHIGGA'ION (Psal. vii., title). A wandering song, according to some critics, because it was composed when David was a fugitive. More likely it signifies a dithyrambic ode, erratic, that is, wild and mournful.

SHIG'ONOTH (Habak. iii. 1). Probably in the manner of dithyrambic songs.

SHI'HON (a ruin). A city of Issachar (Josh. xix. 19); in some copies Shion.

SHI'HOR (black, turbid). (1 Chron. xiii. 5). See SHOR.

SHI'HOR-LIB'NATH (dark river of glass?). A stream mentioned as one of the boundaries of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 26). It is said to be the ancient Belus, from the sands of which glass was first made by the Phœnicians, the modern name being Nahr Naamân. But Winer thinks that the Belus does not exactly answer to the position indicated in Joshua, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Sichor.' Perhaps therefore the stream may be the Zerka. But in truth it is doubtful whether Shihor-libnath was a river at all.

SHIL'HI (armed, a missile?). The father of king Jehoshaphat's mother (1 Kings xxii. 42; - Chron. xx. 31).

SHIL'HIM (armed men: Wilton would connect the word with the idea of waters sent or flowing forth). A city in the southern part of Judah (Josh. xv. 32). This would seem to be the Sharuhén of xix. 6, and the Shara'im of 1 Chron. iv. 31. Mr. Wilton fully examines the notices we have of this place, and comes to the probable conclusion that some ruins now styled Khirbet es-Serâm, close to el-Birein, mark the site (The Negeb, pp. 217-229).

SHIL'LEM (requital). One of the sons of Naphtali (Gen. xli. 24; Numb. xxvi. 49). He is called Shallum in 1 Chron. vii. 13.

SHIL'LEMITES. A family of Naphtali descended from Shillem or Shallum (Numb. xxvi. 49).

SHILO'AH (a sending of water, i.e. a conduit) (Isai. viii. 6). See SILOAM.

SHILOH (place of rest, peace). A city in the territory of Ephraim, to the north of Beth-el, where the tabernacle was set up (Josh. xviii. 1). It was thus considered as the ecclesiastical metropolis, in which solemn assemblies were held and theocratic acts performed (8-10, xix. 51, xxi. 2, xxii. 12), not, however, to the entire exclusion of other places (xxiv. 1, 25, 26). Through the period of the judges' administration the tabernacle seems to have remained at Shiloh (Judges xviii. 31, xxi. 12, 19, 21). It was there in the priesthood of Eli; so that it was at Shiloh that Samuel was called to be a prophet; and there it continued till, possibly, the early years of Saul's reign (1 Sam. i. 3, 9, 24, ii. 14, iii. 21, iv. 3, 4, 12; 1 Kings ii. 27). After the ark of God had been taken by the Philistines we do not find that it was ever restored to the tabernacle at Shiloh. It was sometimes with the army (1 Sam. xiv. 18); but its resting-place was with Abinadab at Kirjath-jearim (vii. 1, 2). And then we hear little more of Shiloh: the tabernacle itself was removed (2 Chron. i. 3); and Jerusalem became ultimately the city which the Lord chose, to place his name there. Ahijah the prophet, indeed, resided at Shiloh (1 Kings xiv. 2, 4); but for the idolatry of Israel this once-favoured city was forsaken and brought to ruin (Psal. lxxviii. 60; Jer. vii. 12, 14, xxvi. 6, 9, xli. 5). The name Seilan survives; and a description of it is given by Dr. Bonar (The Land of Promise, pt. 361, 362): 'It lies on a small hill, or rather eminence, above which rise higher hills, like an amphitheatre, with undulations all around, save to the southward, in which direction it looks down upon a fine plain or valley, which stretching for miles away, seems like a great avenue between hills leading up to the mountain sanctuary. . . . The ruins scattered over the undulations of this eminence are very extensive. There are no remains of tower or gateway, of porch or colonnade: the stones which lie on such heaps around are not of large size, and show no carving: there are, indeed, broken walls, lines of streets, traces of house-foundations, and the like; but nothing to intimate grandeur. The situation is very noble, commanding, not only the plain immediately below, but the openings of several valleys which shoot off in different directions, and up which the multitudes of Israel, flocking to the feasts of the Lord, must have seen the sanctuary afar off, and been seen as they joined their several streams in the valley below, and poured upward to the holy place. I wandered over the ruins, from mound to mound and wall to wall; then, gathering some of the wild flowers that grew around, I sat down on a broken wall to look round upon the scene, and to read the passages of scripture referring to the place. Such stony desolation I had not yet seen. . . . How that passage of Jeremiah rung in our ears, "Go ye now unto my place which was in Shiloh, where I set my name as the first, and see what I did to it for the wickedness of my people Israel" (Jer. vii. 12).'

SHILOH (pacifcator, the abstract being put for the concrete). This word occurs in Jacob's prophetic blessing (Gen. xlix. 10). Various and most diverse have been the interpretations of the passage. The full investigation of it belongs rather to a commentary. It must be sufficient here to give an outline of some of the views maintained. Gesenius would translate, 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah . . . until he (Judah) shall come to Shiloh, and the nations obey him.' And he supposes that the prediction meant that Judah would lead the tribes in the conquest of Canaan (Judges i. 1, 2), till, the central regions being subdued and the tabernacle set up there in Shiloh, Judah's leadership would cease, the different tribes enjoying each independently its own inheritance. An obvious and fatal objection to this interpretation is that it does not reach to that highest point of Judah's supremacy when a family of the tribe sat upon the throne of Israel. And, besides, as Kalisch has shown, the words we render 'sceptre' and 'lawgiver' must indicate regal dignity and not mere leadership in the field. Kalisch himself translates, 'The sceptre shall not depart . . . even when they come to Shiloh; and to him shall be submission of nations,' and interprets that Judah's royalty should not be extinguished, even when by proclamation at Shiloh where Ahijah lived, who predicted the disruption, the ten tribes set up a rival sovereignty (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 746, 747). To this also there is a fatal objection. Shiloh had ceased to be the gathering-place and sanctuary of the nation years before; and, besides, it was not at Shiloh but at Shechem that the revolt occurred and was consummated (1 Kings xii.). Hengstenberg's explanation is far preferable. He maintains that the prediction had a Messianic reference. This has been held from the earliest times, and even by Jewish writers. Hengstenberg therefore translates, 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor the lawgiver from between his feet (i.e. from him), until the Peace-maker comes; and him shall the nations obey.' And he believes the meaning to be, not that the tribe of Judah should not cease to subsist as a people, and have a government of their own till the coming of Messiah, when they should lose their dominion, but that Judah should not cease to exist as a tribe, or lose its superiority, until it was exalted to higher honour and glory through the great Redeemer who was to spring from it, and whom not only the Jews, but all the nations of the earth should obey. Hengstenberg supports his position with great ability, and shows how Judah, eminently, was carried through the temporary exile at Babylon, the ten tribes never recovering, after their deportation, a national existence (Christology of Old Test., Arnold, pp. 27-33). Whatever the shades of difference, then, in the modes of application, the Messianic view of the prophecy must be maintained.

SH'LONI (a Shilonite, or, possibly, a descendant of Shelah). The name occurs in Neh. xi. 5. The descendants of Perez were noted just before: it is probable that here we have the posterity of Shelah, another son of Judah. So also in 1 Chron. ix. 5).

SH'LOHITE.—1. A native or inhabitant of Shiloh (1 Kings xi. 29, xii. 15, xv. 29; 2 Chron. ix. 29, x. 15).—2. The word is used to designate the descendants of Shelah (1 Chron. ix. 5), otherwise called Shelanites.

SHIL'SHAH (triad, i.e. the third son). A chief of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 37).

SHIM'EA (rumour, fame).—1. One of the sons of David (1 Chron. iii. 5): he is called Shammuah in 2 Sam. v. 14, and Shammua in 1 Chron. xiv. 4.—2. A Levite of the family of Merari (vi. 30).—3. Another, of the family of Gershon (39).—4. A brother of David (xx. 7): he is called Shammah in 1 Sam. xvi. 9, xvii. 13, Shimeah in 2 Sam. xiii. 3, 32, xxi. 21, and Shimma in 1 Chron. ii. 13.

SHIM'EAH (id.).—1. A brother of David: see SHIMEA, 4.—2. A Benjamite, with slight difference of spelling in the original (1 Chron. viii. 32): he is called SHIM'EAM (id., or, according to some, astonishment) in 1 Chron. ix. 38.

SHIM'EATH (rumour). An Ammonitess, mother of one of the assassins of Joash king of Judah (2 Kings xii. 21; 2 Chron. xxiv. 26).

SHIM'EATHITES. A family who dwelt at Jabez: they seem to be reckoned among the Kenites (1 Chron. ii. 55).

SHIM'EI (renowned).—1. A son or grandson of Gershon, and descendant of Levi (Numb. iii. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 17, 42; xxiii. 7, 10): he is also called Shimi (Exod. vi. 17). It is questionable whether this Shimei is intended in 1 Chron. xxiii. 9: possibly there may be some error of transcription.—2. A Benjamite called the son of Gera, of the house of Saul, who reviled and cast stones at David as he fled from Absalom. Abishai desired to punish him on the spot, but was restrained by the king (2 Sam. xvi. 5-13). When David returned after Absalom's defeat, Shimei submitted and craved forgiveness, which he obtained in spite of the reclamation of Abishai (xix. 16-23). Nevertheless David thought fit to caution Solomon against him; and Solomon compelled him to reside in Jerusalem, and told him his life would be forfeited if he quitted the city. Shimei agreed to the condition; but after three years, having chosen to go to Gath, he was on his return charged with his disobedience and put to death (1 Kings ii. 8, 9, 36-46). David forgave Shimei the personal injury; but his crime against the state was not so lightly to be passed over. And yet after all it was his own disregard of Solomon's mandate that sealed his fate. He had only himself to blame. See Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. i. pp. 47, 48, 54-56.—3. One of David's mighty men (1 Kings i. 8); probably the same with the superintendent of the commissariat district in Benjamin (iv. 18).—4. A descendant of the royal house of David (1 Chron. iii. 19): it has been thought that he is identical with the head of the family mentioned in Zech. xii. 13.—5. A person of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 26, 27), perhaps the same with Shemaiah, 3.—6. A Reubenite (v. 4).—7. A Levite of the family of Merari (vi. 29).—8. The head of one of the courses of the singers (xxv. 17).—9. One called a Ramathite, superintendent of David's vineyards (xxvii. 27).—10. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 14); perhaps identical with the one named in xxxi. 12, 13.—11. A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 23).—12, 13. Two other persons who had acted similarly (33, 38).—14. A Benjamite, one of the ancestors of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).

SHIM'EON (a hearkening). One who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 31).

SHIM'HI (renowned). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 21). He is supposed (marg. note) to be the same with Shema (13); but this is questionable.

SHIM'I (id.). A Levite, son of Gershon (Exod. vi. 17); he is identical with Shimei, 1.

SHIM'ITES. A family of Gershonite Levites descended from Shimi or Shimei (Numb. iii. 21).

SHIM'MA (rumour). A brother of David (1 Chron. ii. 13); he is also called Shammah, Shimea, and Shimeah; see SHAMMAH, 2.

SHI'MON (desert). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

SHIM'RATH (watch, guard). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 21).

SHIM'RI (watchful).—1. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 37).—2. The father of one of David's warriors (xi. 45).—3. One of the Levites in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 13).

SHIM'RITE (1 Chron. xi. 45, marg.). An appellation of Jediael, son of Shimri, 2.

SHIM'RITH (watchful). A Moabitess, mother of Jehozabab one of the murderers of Joash king of Judah (2 Chron. xxiv. 26). The name is also given (2 Kings xii. 21) as Shomer.

SHIM'ROM. Found in some copies of the English version (1 Chron. vii. 1), for SHIM'RON (watch-post). A son of Issachar (Gen. xlv. 13; Numb. xxvi. 24).

SHIM'RON (id.). A Canaanitish city, assigned to the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xi. 1, xix. 15). It is identical with Shimron-meron (xii. 20), and is now Semānieh, four or five miles south-west of Nazareth.

SHIM'RONITES. A family of Issachar, descended from Shimron (Numb. xxvi. 24).

SHIM'RON-ME'RON (watch-post of Meron, watch-height?) (Josh. xii. 20). See SHIM'RON.

SHIMSHA'I (sunny). A officer or scribe in Samaria who resisted the re-building of Jerusalem (Ezra iv. 8, 9, 17, 23).

SHIN'AB (father's tooth). The king of Admah, one of the five cities of the plain (Gen. xiv. 2).

SHIN'AR (casting out? country of two rivers?) The proper name of the country around Babylon, the plain in which lay the cities of Erech, Accad, and Calneh. It also embraced the province of Babylon as distinguished from Assyria and Elam, and may be said to have been 'the southern district of Mesopotamia from the Persian gulf to the so-called Median wall, which separated it from Mesopotamia proper, and which ran from the Tigris a little north of Sittace, across the plain to the Euphrates: in the west and south-west, however, Shinar extended beyond the Euphrates to the tracts of Arabia. These were the original boundaries of Babylonia, or Shinar, or the land of the Chaldees.' See Kalisch, Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., pp. 259, 260. Shinar is often mentioned in scripture (Gen. x. 10, xi. 2, xiv. 1; Isal. xl. 11; Dan. i. 2; Zech. v. 11).

SHIP. In the earlier history of the Israelites there is very little mention of shipping or maritime affairs. It is true that the territory of some of the tribes was assigned them along the sea-coast; and we find Dan censured for not joining other tribes in a patriotic struggle, but abiding in ships (Judges v. 17), that is, engaged in commercial pursuits. But the habits of the Hebrews were essentially agricultural, and, while in their wars they were anxious to extend their territory inland and towards the Euphrates (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 3; 1 Chron. v. 9, 10, 18-24), they cared little about securing the ports of their own coast which remained in the hands of the Phœnicians; and even Zebulun and Asher, who might by their position have advantageously followed maritime pursuits (Gen. xlix. 13; Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19, 24, 25; Josh. xix. 10-16, 24-31), seem to have been content that trade should pass to them through Tyre and Sidon. It might have been thought that David would make Joppa the port of Jerusalem; but this he neglected; and it was the Tyrians who in Solomon's time brought thither floats of timber from Lebanon (1 Kings v. 9; 2 Chron. ii. 16). Much later, too, when Jonah took shipping there, the vessel belonged not to Israelites but to heathens (Jonah 1). Solomon, indeed, had ports on the Red sea (2 Chron. viii. 17, 18); yet even this might be due to the enterprise of Phœnicians, glad to use the advantage which alliance with the Hebrew monarch afforded for extending their commerce in the east. Jehoshaphat also, in conjunction with king Ahaziah of Israel, fitted out ships at Ezion-geber; but they were wrecked; and Jehoshaphat refused any further joint-expedition with the ungodly Ahaziah (1 Kings xviii. 48, 49; 2 Chron. xx. 35-37). The ships that had been built were called 'ships of Tarshish,' because large merchant-vessels generally bore that name, as 'Indiamen' with us: in the last-named passage, however, it is said that the ships built in a Red sea port were 'to go to Tarshish.' The meaning is not clear; but the slightest change of reading would obviate the difficulty; and it is not impossible that, built in the dock-yards of Ezion-geber, the vessels might be (in pieces) carried overland to the Mediterranean. When Edom revolted from Jehoram of Judah (xxi. 8-10), the territory on the coast of the Red sea was lost. Eloth was recovered by Uzziab and again lost under Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 6; 2 Chron. xxvi. 2); but during this renewed occupation by Judah we read of no maritime expeditions. In later times, after the Hebrew kingdoms had come to an end, Joppa, Ptolemais, and Cæsarea were sea-port towns.

It will be seen from these notices that little can be gathered from the Old Testament as to the construction or management of ships. It may, however, be said that there were vessels, as just explained, used for commerce, and vessels used for war (Numb. xxiv. 24; Dan. xi. 40). From Jonah's history we learn something. The vessel in which he took his passage and paid his fare must have been a decked vessel; as in the storm the prophet was asleep below; the cargo, too, we find was cast over to lighten the ship (Jonah i.). Some interesting particulars in the fittings of Phœnician vessels are given by Ezekiel (xxvii. 3-9); and this passage is well illustrated by Dr. Thomson, who says that the calkers and mariners are still found in their ancient places of resort (The Land and the Book, p. 185). The Psalmist describes the perils of a sea-faring life (Psal. cvii. 23-30); and there are a few other notices of ships and parts of them (civ. 26; Prov. xxiii. 34, xxx. 19, xxxi. 14; Isai. xxxiii. 21, 23): see Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., vol. i. cap. xvi. pp. 167-172.

Of ships in the New Testament we have more precise information. The subject has been carefully investigated by Mr. Smith of Jordanhill in his valuable work, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, diss. iii. pp. 173-235, from which the following observations are almost exclusively derived.

The Alexandrian corn-ships were evidently of considerable magnitude. That in which St. Paul sailed had 276 persons on board; and the cargo, no doubt, was large (Acts xxvi. 37). Josephus was wrecked in one of these vessels with 600 men on board. Such ships may, therefore, be supposed to be of 1,100 or 1,200 tons. They were the largest of their class; and of course there were many of inferior size.

The account of the officers and crew can be but vague. The master (or steersman) and the owner are mentioned in xxvii., the latter being evidently not merely a supercargo but a nautical man, whose judgment was worth taking. The 'governor' in James iii. 4 was a steersman. In vessels of war which were propelled by oars, of which there were two, three, or more tiers (hence some ships were biremes or triremes, some quinqueremes), there must have been a large number of persons to work these oars, probably sometimes more than one to each; and then there were soldiers in addition. A bireme of the ninth century is described as having 25 oars in each tier: one man to each, and as many soldiers as oarsmen, made the crew 100.

The build of an ancient ship did not differ greatly from that of a modern one, save that both ends were alike, and the stem and stern posts rose to a considerable height, terminated by ornaments, which were often the head and neck of a water-fowl bent backwards. The 'sign' (xxviii. 11) was probably painted on each side the bow. The bulwarks round the deck were open rails; and there were projecting galleries at the bow and stern: the latter was often covered with an awning. They were steered not by rudders hinged to the stern-post, but by two large oars or paddles, one on each side the stern. These, like other oars, rested in a rowlock, being secured by a thong or iron clamp; or, if the ship had stern galleries, the oars were usually passed through them. This mode of steering was customary till the end of the thirteenth or beginning of the fourteenth century. Small boats and river craft were steered by a single oar. Ancient vessels were rigged with great simplicity. There was, generally speaking, but a single mast, on which was one great square sail fastened to a long yard: there was also a small sail at the bow. It was this fore-sail which was set, and not the 'main-sail' as in our version (xxvii. 40), when St. Paul's ship was to be run ashore. Sometimes there were more masts similarly rigged as the single one; and there were supernumerary sails. Sails were strengthened by bands of rope sewed across them. The anchors were nearly the same as those of the present day, excepting that they had not flukes attached to the extremities of the arms. The reason why the vessel anchored by the stern was that the crew were afraid of drifting on the rocks to leeward (29); and, besides, the intention was to cut the cables and beach the ship as soon as it was daylight. It must also be remembered (as above observed) that the stem and stern were alike, and the rudders were lifted out of the water or unshipped, so that the rudder-port or rudder-case answered the purpose of a hawse-hole. A ship was, further, furnished with a boat. This at first was towed along behind in St. Paul's vessel, but was hoisted aboard (with some difficulty) when the foul weather came on (16). In this boat afterwards the sailors intended to quit the ship; but, on St. Paul's hint to the centurion and his men, these last cut the ropes and let the boat fall away (30-32).

Ancient navigation was practised under great disadvantages. Without a compass it was necessary to keep as near the land as possible; and ships were often anchored at night (xx. 15, 16, xxi. 1), and laid up for the winter (xxvii. 12). Still they ventured across the sea, out of sight of land: the mariners were skilful in handling a vessel in bad weather: they could sail within seven points of the wind: they seem to have had some mode of keeping the log: they used soundings (28); and it has been supposed that with a fair breeze they could go seven knots an hour. Undergirding a ship (17) is occasionally practised in modern times; and Mr. Smith gives instances in which it has been done by passing a stream-cable under the bottom (pp. 104-106).

It must further be noticed that in our Lord's time fishermen's boats, called 'ships' in our version, abounded on the sea of Galilee: now, Dr. Thomson tells us, there is but a single crazy skiff upon the lake (ubi supr., p. 403). The 'pillow' on which Christ was on one occasion sleeping in the stern (Mark iv. 38) was the boatman's cushion.

Many sea-phrases and nautical words occur in scripture, not only in the parts where voyages are described, but elsewhere, as when St. Paul, who knew perfectly well the horrors of shipwreck (2 Cor. xi. 25), describes some heretics as having, 'concerning faith, made shipwreck' (1 Tim. i. 19).

SHIPH'I (abundant). A Simeonite chief (1 Chron. iv. 37).

SHIPH'MITE. An inhabitant probably of Siphmoth (1 Chron. xxvii. 27).

SHIPH'RAH (beauty). One of the midwives in Egypt who refused to execute Pharaoh's command (Exod. i. 15).

SHIP'TAN (Judicial). The father of the Ephraimite chief appointed to assist in the division of Canaan (Numb. xxxiv. 24).

SHI'SHA (habitation, or perhaps a corruption of Seraiah) (1 Kings iv. 3). See SERALAH, 1.

SHI'SHAK (the meaning is very uncertain). A king of Egypt to whom, at the close of Solomon's reign, Jeroboam fled (1 Kings xi. 40). In the fifth year of Rehoboam Shishak invaded Judah with a vast army, capturing the fenced cities in his way and occupying Jerusalem. He plundered the temple and the royal treasury, and probably made the Judean kingdom for a while dependent upon Egypt (xiv. 25, 26; 2 Chron. xii. 2-9). There can hardly be a doubt that this Egyptian monarch was Sheshonk I., the first of dynasty XXI. of Tanite-Bubastites (or XXII.). His accession has been assigned to the year 978 B.C.; and he is supposed to have reigned twenty-one years. But it is probable that he had reigned some time in Lower Egypt before he became master of Thebes (see Palmer's Egypt. Chronicles, pp. 241-245, 899). The monuments at Karnak represent Sheshonk as presenting to the Theban trinity the chiefs of a great number of conquered nations. Among them may be observed one with a remarkably Jewish physiognomy, and an inscription Judah-malek. This may mean 'the kingdom of Judah'; and Rehoboam probably is intended (see REHOBOAM, p. 755; and comp. Wilkinson's Anc. Egyptians, vol. i. pp. 136, 137).

SHITRA'I (scribe). One of David's chief herdmen (1 Chron. xxvii. 29).

SHIT'TAH-TREE. By this term the acacia is generally understood. Shittim is the Hebrew plural form; consequently shittim-wood is the wood of the shittah-tree. Offerings were made of this for the construction of the tabernacle (Exod. xxv. 5, xxxv. 7, 24); and it was evidently considered of value, as a gospel promise was given that it should be planted in the wilderness (Isai. xli. 19). But there are several species of acacia; and it is doubtful which of them was meant. The Acacia seyal grows abundantly in the Sinaitic peninsula; and a good deal of gum-arabic is obtained from it. But it would hardly yield boards of the size required for the tabernacle. The wild acacia, Mimosa Nilotica, or Acacia vera, is also found in the mountains of Sinai; and this, now called sumt, is popularly identified in the east with the burning-bush. Its bark is covered with large black thorns; the wood though light is hard, resembling ebony when old; and the kernels of its fruit are said to be used in dyeing leather red. Another species, Acacia serissa, grows to a considerable size. It is found in Egypt, but is not known to occur in the peninsula of Sinai. Dr. Livingstone suggests that the tree in question might be the Acacia giraffa, camel-thorn. But a writer in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1295, 1296, believes that the tabernacle boards were not necessarily each of a single plank. They might then be supplied from the Acacia seyal.

SHIT'TIM (acacias).—1 (Numb. xxv. 1; Josh. ii. 1, iii. 1; Mic. vi. 5). See ABEL-

SHITTIM.—2. A valley of Shittim is mentioned in Joel iii. 18. It was most likely on the western side of Jordan: some interpreters believe it the valley of the Kidron. It may be simply meant that a dry valley—acacias love a dry soil—shall become well-watered.

Miss Corboux, in her interesting discussion on the Rephaim, speaks of Sheth as an Egyptian deity, brother of Osiris, represented on the monuments with the head of a fabulous long-snouted animal, whose ears are square at the top. His peculiar office was to help by teaching; and he appears to have been identified with Thoth. Eventually Sheth was considered as the foe of Osiris: his figure became an object of aversion, and was erased from the sacred edifices (Journ. of Sacr. Lit., Oct. 1852, pp. 98-103). The reason of this is to be found in the fact that Sheth was the tutelary-god of the Emim (enemies to the Egyptians); and from him their land and tribe took their name, Shittim, or Shet'tan, the land of Shet, not merely a city but a large region. Miss Corboux refers to Egyptian documents which record the wars between the Shas'u and the Shet'ta and various Egyptian kings, at a period probably anterior to the time of Moses; but her own account must be consulted for the details (ubi supr., Jan. pp. 367-384, Apr. 1852, pp. 55-80). Bonar adopts the same view (The Land of Promise, pp. 286, 287). Certainly Numb. xxiv. 17 may so be best explained.

SHIT'TIM-WOOD. See SHITTAH-TREE.

SHI'ZA (beloved). A Reubenite, father of one of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 42).

SHO'A (opulent). Probably used to signify the wealth of the Babylonians (Ezek. xxiii. 23). See PEKOD. Palmer regards it as a place on the confines of Babylon, Tsukha (Egypt. Chron., vol. ii. app. p. 1001).

SHO'BAB (apostate).—1. One of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 14; 1 Chron. iii. 5, xiv. 4).—2. A descendant of Judah, son of Caleb, Hezron's son (ii. 18).

SHO'BACH (pouring). The commander of the forces of Hadarezer, king of Zobah. He was defeated and slain by David (2 Sam. x. 16, 18). He is also called Shophach (1 Chron. xix. 16, 18).

SHOBA'I (taking captive). One whose descendants, porters, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).

SHO'BAL (flowing, or a shoot?).—1. One of the sons of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 23, 29; 1 Chron. i. 38, 40).—2. A descendant of Judah, said to be 'father' or founder of Kirjath-jearim (ii. 50, 52).—3. Also a descendant of Judah, probably identical with No. 2 (iv. 1, 2).

SHO'BEK (forsaking). One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 24).

SHO'BI (taking captive). A distinguished Ammonite, son of Nahash (apparently the king), who aided David in Absalom's rebellion with supplies (2 Sam. xvii. 27).

SHO'CHO, SHO'CHOH, SHO'CO (branches, hedge) (1 Sam. xvii. 1; 2 Chron. xi. 7, xxviii. 18). See SOCOH.

SHOE. In transferring a possession it was customary to deliver a shoe (Ruth iv. 7), hence the action of throwing down a shoe upon a territory implied its occupation and lordship; the expression therefore (Psal. lx. 8, cviii. 9) may be explained: 'I have taken possession of Edom.' See SANDAL.

SHO'HAM (onyx or sardonyx). A Merarite Levite (1 Chron. xxiv. 27).

SHOMER (a keeper).—1. The father of one of the assassins of king Joash (2 Kings xii. 21). In 2 Chron. xxiv. 26 the mother is called Shimrih.—2. A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 32), given also as Shamer (34).

SHOMERON (1 Kings xvi. 24, marg.). Samaria.

SHO'PHACH (pouring) (1 Chron. xix. 16, 18). See SHO'BACH.

SHO'PHAN. This word should be joined with the preceding word (Numb. xxxii. 35). See ATROTH.

SHOSHAN'NIM (lilies). An expression found in the titles of Psalms xlv., lxix. Most probably it implies a direction that those psalms should be sung to the tune or melody of some well-known poem, entitled 'The Lilies.'

SHOSHAN'NIM-E'DUTH (lilies of the covenant) (Psal. lxxx., title). A similar direction is implied with that noted above.

SHOVEL (Isai. xxx. 24). See FAN.

SHRINES (Acts xix. 24). Small models of the celebrated temple of the Ephesian Artemis, with her statue, which it was the custom to carry on journeys, and place in houses as a charm (Alford).

SHU'A (wealth).—1. The father-in-law of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 3), called also Shuah (Gen. xxxviii. 2, 12).—2. A daughter of the house of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 32).

SHU'AH (a pit).—1. One of the sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2). Possibly his descendants occupied the district called Sakkæa, eastward of Batanea.—2. See SHUA, 1.—3. A name in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 11): it has been supposed the same with Hushah (4).

SHU'AL (a fox or jackal). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 36).

SHU'AL (id.). A district (1 Sam. xiii. 17), possibly the same as Shalim (ix. 4).

SHU'BAEL (captive of God).—1 (1 Chron. xxiv. 20). See SHEBUEL, 1.—2 (xxv. 20). See SHEBUEL, 2.

SHU'HAM (pit-digger?). A son of Dan (Numb. xxvi. 42): he is called Hushim in Gen. xvi. 23.

SHU'HAMITES. A family of Dan, descended from Shuham (Numb. xxvi. 42).

SHU'HITE. Probably a descendant of Shuah, son of Abraham by Keturah (Job ii. 11, viii. 1, xvii. 1, xxv. 1, xlii. 9). Rawlinson is inclined to identify the Shuhites with the Tsukhi, a people on both sides of the Euphrates above Hit: see SHOA.

SHU'LAMITE (pacifist). A symbolical name given to a maiden in Solomon's Song (Sol. Song vi. 13). It is considered by some critics equivalent to Shunammite, i.e. a native of Shunem. See SOLOMON, SONG OF.

SHU'MATHITES. The designation of a family or tribe, derived from a word signifying 'garlic' (1 Chron. ii. 53): nothing is known of it.

SHU'NAMMITE. An inhabitant of Shunem (1 Kings i. 3, 15, ii. 17, 21, 22; 2 Kings iv. 12, 25, 36).

SHU'NEM (two resting-places). A city in the territory of Issachar (Josh. xix. 18; 1 Sam. xxviii. 4; 2 Kings iv. 8). It was the native place of Abishag, David's concubine, and of the wealthy lady who built a room for Elisha, and whose son the prophet restored to life. It is now a village called Sulam, on a declivity at the western extremity of Jebel ed-Dûhy (Little Hermon, over against Zer'in).

SHU'NI (quiet). A son of Gad (Gen. xlv. 16; Numb. xxvi. 15).

SHU'NITES. A family of the Gadites, descended from Shuni (Numb. xxvi. 15).

SHU'PHAM (serpent?). A son or grandson of Benjamin (Numb. xxvi. 39). He is called Muppim (Gen. xlv. 21) and Shephuphan (1 Chron. viii. 5). See SHUPPIM, 1.

SHU'PHAMITES. A family of Benjamin, descended from Shupham (Numb. xxvi. 39).

SHUP'PIM (serpents).—1. A Benjamite (1 Chron. vii. 12), possibly the same with Shupham. It is not quite clear in what degree of relationship he stood to Benjamin. Lord A. Hervey believes that he was Benjamin's son, but that his family were afterwards reckoned with that of which Ir, Benjamin's grandson, was chief.—2. A Levite porter (xxvi. 16).

SHUR (a fort). A desert on the southwest of Palestine (Gen. xvi. 7) bordering upon Gerar and Kadesh (xx. 1), extending to the boundaries of Egypt (xxv. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 7, xxvii. 8). It was peopled by Arabian tribes, and was partially traversed by the Israelites in their march from the point where they crossed the Red sea to Marah and Elim (Exod. xv. 22). This appears to be the modern wilderness el Dshifâr, extending between the Mediterranean and the Red sea, on the west and north-west of et-Tih from Pelusium to the south-west frontier of Palestine. Wilton thinks that 'the well or station of Shur may be looked for in the direction of the Jebel es-Sur, east of Suez, while the wilderness of Shur appears to have been identical with the present pasture-grounds of the Arab tribe Terâbin, extending from the mountains near Suez to the region of Gaza' (The Negeb, p. 6). This desert consists of white shifting sand, with few towns in it, and is seven days' journey in length. It does not, however, extend so far southward as the ancient Shur. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Schur.'

SHU'SHAN (a lily). A very celebrated city, called by the Greeks Susa, in the province of Elam or Elymais, a portion of the ancient Susiana. There are various accounts of its origin, sufficiently showing, by the very diversity, that it must have existed at an early period. It appears to have been taken by Ashur-bani-pal, who filled the Assyrian throne about 650 B.C. Afterwards 625, Nabopolassar possessed himself of Susiana. Abradates, the king of Susa, joined Cyrus, who occupied it after the death of Abradates. But it seems to have been restored to Babylon—Mr. Loftus suggests by trace—at the time of Cyrus's marriage. For Daniel was there in Belshazzar's reign, apparently in some post of authority, possibly governor (Dan. viii. 1, 2, 27). Some, however, have thought that there were two places of the name; but this is improbable. Under the Persian monarchy Susa was one of the royal cities; the sovereign usually residing there three months in the early part of the year. Shushan or Susa is frequently mentioned in scripture. Nehemiah was in waiting on Artaxerxes there when he learned the sad story of the desolation of Jerusalem (Neh. i.). It was at Shushan that most of the events recorded in the book of Esther occurred. See AHASUERUS, 2. Alexander the Great found vast wealth in Susa after the battle of Arbela. It subsequently often changed hands: it was one of the chief cities of the Parthian Arsacidae, and of the Sassanian kings of Persia: it was taken by the Mohammedans, 640 A.D. It afterwards decayed; and its site is now but a mass of ruinous mounds, called Shush.

Mr. Loftus has examined these mounds, and described the results of his investigation. Two considerable rivers, the Kerkhah (Choespes, the left branch of which was called the Eutæus, the Ulai of Dan. viii. 2: see ULAI), and that of Dizful (Coprates) approach at right-angles, nearly meet, and then recede. At the spot of their closest approximation stand the mounds of Shush, three quarters of a mile from the river Kerkhah, and a mile and half from that of Dizful: they occupy an area of three and a-half miles in circumference, on the eastern side of a small stream, the Shaour (Shapur), which falls into the river of Dizful. On the verge of the Shaour, at the western base of the ruins, is the tomb as it is called of the prophet Daniel, who, according to Josephus (Antiq., lib. x. 12, § 7), did build a castle at Ecbatana, which has been supposed an error for Susa. Be this as it may, the structure here is of a much later date.

The principal remains consist of four large platforms or masses distinctly separated from each other. That most to the west is the smallest in extent. It is in the shape of an irregular triangle, composed of gravel, earth, and sun-dried bricks. There is a depression in the centre, and traces of brickwork may be perceived. The measurement round the summit is 2,850 feet: the northern point, the highest in the ruins, is 119 feet above the Shaour. On the south-west slope is a limestone fragment, part it would seem of an obelisk on which are inscriptions. This mound, called kāfa, or castle, has been supposed to be the citadel. East of this is the central great platform, about 60 acres in extent: its eastern face extends 3000 feet. More to the east are ruins, probably of the general mass of the city, sinking gradually to the level of the plain.

Besides these three masses there is a considerable square mound to the north, indicating a large and important quarter. Excavations made here have disclosed an extraordinary structure—a noble palace, erected, there is reason to believe, by Darius Hystaspis and his successors. To this, possibly, the phrase 'Shushan the palace' may specially apply. In this palace was a great hall, consisting of several magnificent groups of columns, with a frontage of 343 feet 9 inches, and a depth of 244 feet. The groups are arranged into a central phalanx of six rows of six columns, thirty-six in all, flanked (at a distance of 64 feet 2 inches) west, north, and east by three double rows of six columns in each row. Those in the central group have square bases, the others have them bell-shaped. Many, if not all, of the columns had double bull capitals; and on some of the pedestals were inscriptions with trilingual cuneiform records of Artaxerxes Mnemon. It is not unreasonable to believe that these colonnades were 'the court of the garden of the king's palace' with its 'pillars of marble' (Esth. i. 5, 6), where Ahasuerus held his feast (Chaldea, chap. xxviii. pp. 364-380).

There are no traces discoverable of the walls of Shushan. Wild beasts and game (lions, wolves, foxes, red-legged partridges, &c., &c.) abound; and in the heats of summer everything is dry and parched; but at the beginning of the year there is rich vegetation. 'It is difficult to conceive,' says Mr. Loftus, 'anything more imposing than Susa as it stood in the days of its Kayanian splendour—its great citadel and columnar edifices raising their stately heads above groves of date, konar, and lemon-trees, surrounded by rich pastures and golden seas of corn, and backed by the distant snow-clad mountains. Neither Babylon nor Persepolis could compare with Susa in position, watered by her noble rivers, producing crops without irrigation, clothed with grass in spring, and within a moderate journey of a delightful summer clime. Susa vied with Babylon in the riches which the Euphrates conveyed to her stores; while Persepolis must have been inferior both in point of commercial position and picturesque appearance' (ibid., p. 347: see chap. xxvi. pp. 335-348).

SHU'SHANE'DUTH (city of the testimony). The name of some ode or poem, according to the tune of which the psalm (ix., title), to which these words are prefixed, was to be sung.

SHU'THALHITES. A family of Ephraim, descendants of Shuthelah (Numb. xxvi. 35).

SHUTHELAH (noise of breaking). One of the sons of Ephraim (Numb. xxvi. 35, 36; 1 Chron. vii. 20, 21). See EPHRAIM, p. 269.

SHUTTLE (Job vii. 6). See WEAVING.

SI'A, SI'AH (congregation). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 44; Neh. vii. 47).

SIB'BECAI, SIB'BECHAI (thicket of Jehovah). One of David's warriors who killed Saph a Philistine giant (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chron. xi. 29, xx. 4, xxvii. 11). In the list of 2 Sam. xxiii. 27 he is called Mebunnai.

SIB'BOLETH (ear of grain) (Judges xii. 6). See SHIBBOLETH.

SIB'MAH (coolness or fragrance). A city on the east of the Jordan assigned to the Reubenites, by whom it was built or fortified (Josh. xiii. 19). At a later period it seems to have been possessed by the Moabites (Isai. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. lviii. 32). Sibmah was close to Heshbon, and was noted for the excellence of its grapes. The vine is still cultivated in those parts. It is also called Shebam (Numb. xxxii. 3) and Shibmah (39)

SIBRA'IM (two-fold hope). A city between Damascus and Hamath (Ezek. xviii. 16); nothing is known of it.

SIC'UTH (a tent). A tabernacle which the idolatrous Israelites are thought to have constructed in the desert for the worship of an idol, like the tabernacle of the covenant according to the command of Jehovah (Amos v. 26, marg.). See REMPHAN.

SICHEM (the shoulder-blade) (Gen. xii. 6). See SICHEM.

SICKLE (Deut. xvi. 9, xxiii. 25; Jer. 1.16; Joel iii. 13; Mark iv. 29; Rev. xiv. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19). See AGRICULTURE.

SIC'YON (1 Macc. xv. 23). A city of Peloponnesus on the south coast of the gulf of Corinth, near the eastern extremity. The old town was on the coast, and became the port to the new city built a short distance inland.

SID'DIM (a depression full of stones?). A valley in which probably stood the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah: it was certainly the scene of the defeat of the five kings by their eastern foes: it is said to have been full of asphalt-pits, and has generally been believed to be partially if not wholly occupied by the Dead sea (Gen. xiv. 3, 8, 10). This belief, however, is most probably erroneous; and the vale of Siddim may yet exist near the sea, perhaps to the north of it; but the district once so fertile is now barren and desolate. See SODOM, ZOAR. It may be added that Miss Corbux would identify Siddim with Shittim, the land of the Emim (Journal of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1852, p. 379).

S'IDE (1 Macc. xv. 23). A city on the coast of Pamphylia. It was a place of importance; and there are now considerable remains.

SID'ON (Asking, fishery). Sidon, Tsidon, or Sidon, is said to have been the first-born of Canaan (Gen. x. 15; 1 Chron. 1.13). But it is questionable whether the name was borne by any individual.

SID'ON (id.). An ancient and most noted Phœnician town, with a good haven (Acts xxvii. 3), situated on the coast of the Mediterranean, on the northern slope of a small promontory which juts out into the sea from a low plain, not two miles broad, between the Lebanon and the sea. On the hill behind, on the south, stood the citadel. It is not quite twenty miles north of Tyre, and about twice that distance south of Berytus or Beirût. Sidon is very generally associated in the sacred writings with Tyre; and it has been believed to be the more ancient of the two, and also thought that the younger city was a colony from the older. In corroboration of this are the facts that Sidon is said to have been the first-born of Canaan (Gen. x. 15), and is referred to as 'great,' implying then its superiority to Tyre (Josh. xi. 8, xix. 23). We find the Phœnicians called Sidonians (xiii. 6; Judges xviii. 7), and the distant town of Laish reckoned as dependent not on Tyre but upon Sidon (28). Possibly also the expression of Isalah may be interpreted as confirming this view (Isai. xxiii. 2).

On the division of Canaan among the Israelites, the inheritance of Asher is described as reaching up to Sidon (Josh. xix.

28). That tribe, however, never possessed it (Judges 1. 31): indeed, the Sidonians rather kept the Hebrews in subjection (iii. 3, x. 12). They were luxurious in their habits (xviii. 7), celebrated for their manufactures and works of art and also for their commerce (1 Kings v. 6; 1 Chron. xxii. 4, Ezra iii. 7). It seems clear from the passages last referred to, and others, that in David's time Sidon was subordinate to Tyre; and frequently when the Sidonians are mentioned we must suppose that the word (as above noted) is used generally, in consequence of Sidon's earlier supremacy, for Phœnicians (1 Kings xi. 1, 5, 33, xvi. 31; 2 Kings xxiii. 13), including, at all events, the residents not merely of the town but in the district; and it seems to have furnished mariners to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 8). When the Assyrian king Salmaneser invaded Phœnicia, Sidon, it is likely, freed itself from the yoke of Tyre; and thenceforward we read of kings of Sidon (Jer. xxv. 22, xxvii. 3). They could hardly, however, have been independent; and perhaps by submitting to Nebuchadnezzar the Sidonians were enriched at the expense of Tyre. Indisputably Sidon flourished under the Chaldean and Persian dominion; and secular writers speak highly of its prosperity. It revolted against Artaxerxes Ochus, and was well-nigh destroyed. It arose, however, from its ruins, subsequently took part with Alexander the Great against Persia, had its vassal princes, and after Alexander's death was subject sometimes to the Syrian, sometimes to the Egyptian kings, but flourished as a place of trade till both Sidon and Tyre (the old rivalry not quite extinct) fell under the Roman power. In New Testament times we find it mentioned. Our Lord approached it (Matt. xv. 21; Mark vii. 24); though we have no reason to believe that he ever actually entered the city. He also held up Tyre and Sidon as likely to have repented, had the mighty works done in Chorazin and Bethsaida been done in them (Luke x. 13, 14). Doubtless ultimately the gospel was preached there. For we find Paul, when the vessel in which he was sailing touched at Sidon, visiting friends, that is, Christians in the city (Acts xxvii. 3). Sidon still exists under the name of Saida, and looks beautiful among her fruitful orchards. Dr. Thomson estimates the population at about 10,000, and says that they export tobacco, oil, fruit, and silk (The Land and the Book, pp. 108, 109).

The language of the Sidonians is mentioned in Deut. iii. 9: it must have been Phœnician: their worship was idolatry, Ashtoreth being called, in some of the passages referred to above, their 'goddess.' Both these points have lately received remarkable confirmation. On Jan. 20, 1855, a sarcophagus was discovered near Sidon. It had an inscription in Phœnician, which has been translated: from this it appears that the body deposited there was that of Ashmunazer king of the Sidonians, whose mother was a priestess of Ashtoreth. This king, it seems, possessed Dor and Joppa, and some of the corn-lands of Dan, having extended his authority along the coast of the Mediteranean. This prince lived perhaps in the eleventh century B.C. Dr. Thomson, who was in Sidon when the sarcophagus was discovered, has described it (pp. 137-140). It is now in the Louvre.

SIDO'NIANS (Deut. iii. 9; Josh. xiii. 4, 6; Judges iii. 3; 1 Kings v. 6; 2 Kings xxiii. 13). The inhabitants of Sidon. Zidonians (Judges x. 12, xviii. 7; 1 Kings xi. 1, 5, 33, xvi. 31; 1 Chron. xxii. 4; Ezek. xxxii. 30).

SIEGE. See WAR.

SIGN. A 'sign' or a 'wonder' was often given to authenticate the commission of a prophet (Exod. vii. 3). Of the two Hebrew words used, oth and mopheth, the last, if a distinction is made, has a more restricted meaning, referring only to something future, while the former applies also to the past or present. A 'sign' sometimes betokens the fulfilment of a prediction (1 Kings xiii. 3, 5), or is just the prediction itself (Exod. iii. 12); sometimes it signifies an extraordinary appearance, the forerunner of a great event (Luke xxi. 11, 25).

SIGNET (Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25; Exod. xxviii. 11, 21, 36, xxxix. 6, 14, 30; Jer. xlii. 24; Dan. vi. 17; Hagg. ii. 23). See SEAL.

SI'HON (sweeping away). An Amoritic king who reigned at Heshbon, over a territory (conquered from Moab) to the east of the Jordan, extending from the Arnon to the Jabbok. He had established himself also in the country formerly occupied by Rephaim tribes, subdued and broken by wars with Egypt. The Israelites proposed in vain to pass peaceably through his dominions. Sihon was consequently defeated and slain, and his land taken possession of (Numb. xxi. 21-30; Deut. i. 4, ii. 24-32), and assigned to the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Josh. xiii. 15-29). Comp. Jer. xlvi. 45.

SI'HOR (black, turbid). This word, spelt also Shihor, occurs in but a few places of scripture; in some it is without any adjunct (Isai. xxiii. 3; Jer. ii. 18), in others with the addition, 'which is before Egypt,' or 'of Egypt' (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Chron. xiii. 5). In all these places a river is meant; and it has been supposed that this river must always be the Nile. But it can hardly be believed that Joshua meant to tell the Israelites that they were to occupy the country so far westward as to the eastern branch of the Nile. Nor is there a shadow of proof that David's dominions were of such extent that his subjects had to be summoned to a national solemnity from the banks of the Nile. His conquests—most of them made at a later date—were chiefly in other directions. It is a more rational belief that by the 'Sihor which is before Egypt' and the 'Shihor of Egypt' we are to understand a more easterly stream, the modern Wady el-Arish, as the south-western boundary of Canaan. But, where Sihor is used absolutely, it is the Nile.

There are other words and expressions employed in scripture for the same great stream. Thus yēôr, which appears to be an Egyptian word, probably that in early common use, almost always when in the singular denotes the Nile (e. g. Gen. xli. 1; Exod. i. 22, ii. 3, vii. 1, 15, 18; Isai. xxiii. 3; Amos viii. 8; where in our translation it is usually 'river,' sometimes 'flood'). In Dan. xii. 5, 6, 7, however, this word designates some other river, possibly the Tigris. In the plural (Isai. vii. 18, xix. 6, where 'brooks of defence') the canals of Egypt or branches of the Nile are meant. But the common interpretation of yēôr is questioned by a writer in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1010, 1011: he would understand rather the Red sea. The 'river (nahar) of Egypt' in Gen. xv. 18 is very probably the Nile: see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 371; and Abraham's posterity including other tribes than those of Israel reached to it; but the same expression elsewhere in our version (Numb. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4, 47; 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xxiv. 7; Isai. xxvii. 12, 'stream'), where a different word, nahhal, occurs in the original, is perhaps always identical with the 'Sihor of Egypt,' the Wady el-Arish. 'The rivers of Ethiopia' (Isai. xviii. 1) must be the tributaries of the Nile in the upper part of its course.

There are references to the Nile in various parts of scripture. They are frequent in the Pentateuch. The Nile-water is generally drunk by the Egyptians, and is considered peculiarly delicious: the plague of turning the water of the river into blood must, therefore, have been grievously felt (Exod. vii. 20, 21). And, as the Nile abounded with fish, the destruction of them was a severe visitation (Psal. cv. 29). These fish were regretted by the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xi. 5). The crocodile, now found only in the upper part of the Nile, was formerly common in Lower Egypt. Hence Ezekiel denounced judgments against Pharaoh 'the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers' (Ezek. xxix. 3). The inundations of the Nile are also referred to (Jer. xli. 7, 8; Amos viii. 8, ix. 5). Perhaps it might have been better to retain the term 'Nile' in these and other passages: 'Who is this that cometh up as the Nile?' &c. These are but specimens of the numerous allusions to this celebrated stream. In the New Testament it is not mentioned; though, as Jesus was carried down into Egypt (Matt. ii. 13-15), he probably dwelt on its bank.

Any account here given of it must be brief. It flows out of the lakes Albert and Victoria Nyanza. This, the main stream, is the Bahr-el-Abiad or White Nile. At Khartoom it is joined by the Bahr-el-Azrak or Blue Nile, which rises in the mountains of Abyssinia and brings down much alluvial soil. It receives other streams, flows over cataracts or rapids, and entering Egypt is divided a short distance below Cairo into two great branches, which water what is called the Delta and empty themselves into the Mediterranean. It is named by the Egyptians Bahr or 'the river,' while the inundation is en-Nil: by the Arabs it is termed Bahr-en-Nil.

A statement respecting the source of the Nile was made, Feb. 2, 1866, at the Royal Institution, by Mr. (now Sir) S. W. Baker. The substance of it is that Speke and Grant discovered an outlet from Victoria lake—the Somerset river, which flows into lake Albert, a great reservoir for the rivers generally of equatorial Africa. From this the Nile starts, receiving only two important tributaries before it reaches Khartoum. A rainfall of ten months in the interior enables lake Albert to send down to Egypt a continuous volume of water: else, without the White Nile, no water would reach Egypt from the Blue Nile in the dry season. But the Abyssinian rainy season in June floods the Blue Nile and the Atbara: hence the rush of water in these streams in June, July, and August, added suddenly to the increased volume of the White Nile at that season, causes the inundation in Lower Egypt. Compare Sir S. Baker's statement in his Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia, 1867.

The annual inundation of the Nile is necessary for the fertility of the soil. If the inundation fails, scarcity or famine is the consequence: if it is excessive, great injury is done to the crops, and disease produced. The amount of rise is different at different points: at Cairo from 24 to 27 feet is good. Anciently, there were seven principal branches of the river, two of these being said to be artificial: now these two, the Damietta and Rosetta branches, are the only ones navigable. Anciently the Nile was bordered by flags and papyrus reeds, and abounded in water-plants; now these are almost extinct; and the fisheries are decayed. Here, surely, is the accomplishment of prophecy (Isa. xix. 5-8).

SI'HOR-LIB'NATH. See SHIHOR-LIB-NATH.

SILAS (contracted from Silvanus). An eminent person of the church at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 22), who had the right of Roman citizenship. Silas in the Acts, he is Silvanus in St. Paul's epistles. He was a prophet (32), and accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey through Asia Minor to Macedonia (xv. 40-xvii. 4). He remained at Berea after Paul had left (10, 14, 15), but rejoined him at Corinth (xviii. 5; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1), where he probably continued a while preaching the gospel (2 Cor. i. 19). Whether the Silvanus by whom Peter sent his first epistle to the churches of Asia Minor (1 Pet. v. 12) was Silas has been doubted (Winer, Bibl. R. W. B., art. 'Silas'), but with no great reason. Some vainly wish to identify Silas with Luke.

SILK. The substance procured from the cocoons of the Bombyx mori, a moth to which the silkworm turns. Silk was first used in China. But it was not known in Europe, for many hundred years after the raw material was imported, whence it came. In the sixth century after Christ, however, two Nestorian monks, having visited China, unravelled the mystery. Silkworms then were long bred only in the Greek empire, subsequently in Sicily, Italy, and other countries. In England the eggs are hatched early in May. The caterpillar, at first dark, is subsequently light. It arrives at maturity in about eight weeks, changing its skin several times. Its proper food is the mulberry-leaf; though it will eat lettuce and a few other plants. Silk occurs in our version (Gen. xli. 42, marg.; Prov. xxxi. 22); but the word so rendered is elsewhere rightly translated 'fine linen.' There is another word used in Ezek. xvi. 10, 13; and the Hebrew interpreters understand by it a silken garment; but according to Gesenius it must mean fine thread, stuff composed of fine threads. In New Testament times, however, silk was certainly known, and is the substance intended in Rev. xviii. 12.

SIL'LA (twig basket). Some place near the castle of Millo (2 Kings xii. 20).

SILO'AH (sent; Neh. iii. 15). See SILOAM.

SILO'AM (id.). A pool close by Jerusalem (John ix. 7). Perhaps the neighbouring district bore the same name; and the tower which fell might be in that district (Luke xiii. 4): at present there is a village of Siloam, or Silwan, east of the Kidron. This pool is called Shiloah (Isa. viii. 6); and its waters are taken to represent the house of David, then humbled and of little power, whom Judah despised, preferring the mightier kings of Israel or Syria; therefore a mighty stream (it was predicted) should overwhelm them, 'the king of Assyria and all his glory' (7). The site of Siloam is described (Neh. iii. 15) as 'by the king's garden,' which no doubt owed its fertility to these waters. Besides irrigating the neighbourhood, Siloam was connected with the sacred offices: water was drawn from it at the feast of tabernacles: see Isa. xii. 3; John vii. 37. Of this Lightfoot says: 'When the parts of the sacrifice were laid on the altar, then was there this pouring-out of water upon the altar, but mingled with wine; and the manner thus: one of the priests with a golden tankard went to the fountain or pool of Siloam, and filled it there with water. He returned back again into the court, through that which is called the water-gate; and when he came there the trumpets sounded. He goeth up to the side of the altar, where stood two basins, one with wine in it, and into the other he puts the water; and he pours either the wine into the water, or the water into the wine, and then he pours them out by way of libation. . . . At the time of this libation did the music and the song begin; and that song which they sung all the days of the feast was hallel; that being renewed daily as their lulabh or branches were renewed daily. When they came to the beginning of Psal. cxviii., 'O give thanks unto the Lord,' all the company shook their branches. . . . Towards night they began 'the rejoicing for the drawing of the water,' which mirth they continued far in the night; and this their rejoicing was of so high a jollity, that they say that he that never saw the rejoicing for the drawing of water never saw rejoicing all his life. . . . Remarkable is that passage in the Jerusalem Talmud upon this question: Rabbi Levi saith: "Why is the name of it called the drawing of water? Because of the pouring-out of the Holy Ghost, according to what is said, With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation" (Temple Service, pp. 182-186).

Siloam was not a fountain or a well: it was a reservoir supplied by an aqueduct from a higher source. It is likely that this source was to the north of the city, perhaps that which Hezekiah stopped (2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 4), conducting its stream to the reservoirs under the temple area, whence channels have been discovered leading to the fountain of the Virgin, and thence to the pool of Siloam. Wilton draws attention from this fact to the expression of Isai. viii. 6. "The waters of Shiloah that go softly," or more correctly that go secretly, or by a covered way, i.e. by subterraneous conduits' (The Negeb, p. 219).

At present this pool, of the identity of which there can be no doubt, is at the foot of Zion to the south-east of Jerusalem. It is a small deep parallelogram, into which the water flows from under the rocks out of a smaller basin hewn out of the rock a few feet higher up. There is a kind of ebb and flow sometimes observable; and the taste of the water is sweetish and slightly brackish. Dr. Bonar thus describes it: 'It has been a well-built oblong tank, some fifty feet long, nearly twenty deep, and somewhat less than this wide. Its crumbling walls, broken pillars, falling arches, wasted steps, and ruinous-looking aspect give no idea of what it may have been in days when it was better cared for. On the one side I observed the fragments of six pillars, from which may have sprung five arches to form a porch or porches, not unlike what Bethesda must have been (John v. 2). It was empty when we saw it. Its supply is chiefly from an upper fountain, which finds its way into this lower one by a well-cut conduit, more than a quarter of a mile long. The tunnelling and boring of this passage must have been a work of great cost and toil' (The Land of Promise, pp. 163, 164). Dr. Robinson explored this conduit or passage to the fountain of the Virgin, which is about 1100 feet from Siloam, and is on the west side of the valley of Jehoshaphat. The passage is about two feet wide, with many sinuosities, so that the distance along it is 1750 feet. The waters of Siloam drain off into the neighbouring gardens. Dr. Thomson describes the appearance of the locality as by no means prepossessing (The Land and the Book, pp. 359, 360).

SILVANUS (woody) (2 Cor. i. 19; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1; 1 Pet. v. 12). See SILAS.

SILVER. A well-known precious metal, accounted next to gold in value. We do not find it mentioned in scripture till the time of Abraham, who is said to have returned from Egypt 'rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold' (Gen. xiii. 2). Later in his life it is noted as a medium of exchange, not as coined into money, but as weighed out by the buyer to the seller (xxiii. 15, 16, xxxvii. 28). It was manufactured into various kinds of utensils (xlv. 2, 8), ornaments (Exod. xii. 35), vessels and instruments for sacred use (Numb. vii. 13, 84, x. 2; 1 Chron. xxviii. 14-17), &c. Idols also were made of it (Judges xvii. 2-4). In the prosperous days of the Hebrew kingdom, when riches flowed in from tributary states, and by Solomon's foreign commerce, silver, we are told, was little accounted of; gold being so plentiful (1 Kings x. 21; 2 Chron. ix. 20). This metal appears to have been procured from Tarsish (viii. 21; Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 12), perhaps also from Arabia (Job xxviii. 1): it was purified from dross by a repeated process (Psal. xii. 6, lxvi. 10; Prov. viii. 19, xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; Ezek. xxii. 22; Zech. xiii. 9; Mal. iii. 3). In later times it was the common material of ordinary money; and Hebrew, Greek, and Roman silver coins were in general use.

SILVERLING (Isai. vii. 23). A piece of silver, probably a shekel.

SIMILOU'E. An Arabian who brought up Antiochus VI. (1 Macc. xi. 39).

SIM'EON (a hearkening).—1. The second son of Jacob by Leah, so called because, as the mother said, the Lord had hearkened to her in her trouble (Gen. xxix. 33). In personal character Simeon seems to have been one of the most unamiable of the patriarchs. It was he who in conjunction with Levi took so bloody a revenge upon the people of Shechem for the dishonour done to their sister Dinah (xxxiv.). Perhaps also he had been prominent in the outrage committed upon Joseph; as we find that he was the one selected as a hostage, to be detained in bonds in Egypt, to secure the return of the rest of the brethren (xlii. 19, 24). When Jacob pronounced on his death-bed his prophetic blessing, he did not forget the evil deeds of Simeon and Levi. Joined as they had been in an act of atrocity, joined they were in the reprobation with which their father stigmatized it; and their subsequent history is summed up in the words, 'I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel' (xlix. 5-7). Of the fulfilment of this augury in regard to Levi nothing need be here said: see LEVI; but in respect to Simeon we shall soon see how events confirmed it. By Moses in his blessing Simeon was omitted.

At the descent into Egypt Simeon is said to have had six sons, probably by two wives (xvi. 10); but five only of these sons appear to have been progenitors of families (Numb. xxvi. 12, 13). The tribe had increased very much during the bondage, being at the first census 59,300 (i. 22, 23): their place in the encampment was on the south side of the tabernacle, and their order of march in the second division, under the banner of Reuben (ii. 12, 13). They probably were involved deeply in some of the crimes committed in the wilderness: that one of their princes perpetrated a shameless act of sin in the matter of Baal-peor is distinctly recorded (xxv. 6-8, 14). And this may account for the extraordinary decrease of the tribe—for at the second census they were but 22,200 (xxvi. 14)—and also for the omission of it (noticed above) by Moses.

In the division of the promised land the lot of Simeon was assigned 'within the inheritance of the children of Judah,' seventeen cities in the south-east of Palestine (Josh. xix. 1-9). It is questionable whether Simeon had ever a distinctly-marked territory: no frontier-line is traced; we may rather believe that their cities and villages were scattered through districts of Judah, and surrounded generally by the territories of the superior tribe. A kind of alliance subsisted between the two: Simeon went with Judah to subdue his lot (Judges i. 3, 17); and Judah no doubt subdued, according to promise, some towns for Simeon. But we hear little of the Simeonites for a long time. They dwelt, it is true, in the same quarters till the reign of David (1 Chron. iv. 24-33); but they were not able to hold all their towns. Hormah and Beer-sheba, noted as belonging to them, were afterwards possessed by Judah (1 Sam. xxx. 30; 1 Kings xix. 3); Ziklag became first a Philistine then a Judean city (1 Sam. xxvii. 6); and subsequently the Simeonites seem to have been well-nigh absorbed in Judah (2 Chron. xv. 9). Only one independent expedition is recorded of them. It was in the days of Hezekiah, when a body of the tribe, cramped and requiring more room for the pasture of their flocks, attacked some neighbouring clans and established themselves in their seats, occupying a portion of mount Seir (1 Chron. iv. 34-43); see SEIR, 1.

No eminent person is recorded as of this tribe; though the Jews have a tradition that it furnished schoolmasters to the rest of the nation. A corps of 7100 Simeonites joined David at Hebron (xii. 25). And Simeon retains its place in the enumeration of the tribes by Ezekiel and St. John (Ezek. xlviii. 24, 25; Rev. vii. 7).

2. The aged saint who received the Lord into his arms at the time of the presentation in the temple. He uttered an inspired song, which has almost ever since been used as one of the most precious canticles in the services of the Christian church (Luke ii. 25-35). It has been conjectured, but on no sure grounds, that this Simeon was son of the famous doctor Hillel, and father of the no less famous Gamaliel.—3. One in the line of our Lord's ancestry (iii. 30).—4. A Christian teacher at Antioch called Niger, 'the black' (Acts xiii. 1). Nothing more is known of him.—5 (xv. 14). Peter.

SIMEON. Ancestor of Mattathias, founder of the Maccabean family (1 Macc. ii. 1).

SIMEONITES. The descendants of Simeon (Numb. xxv. 14, xxvi. 14; 1 Chron. xxvii. 16).

SIMON (contracted from Simeon).—1 (Matt. iv. 18, and elsewhere). See PETER.

—2. An apostle, sometimes called 'Simon the Canaanite,' and sometimes 'Simon Zelotes' (x. 4; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). We are not to suppose that the designation 'Canaanite' is derived from Canaan: it is most likely the Hebrew equivalent to Zelotes, indicating that Simon had been one of the party called Zealots; see ZEALOTS. 'Canaanite' should be spelt Kananite. Of the history and acts of this apostle the New Testament gives no information. He has been thought—but this is very uncertain—the same with Simon, one of the 'brethren' of the Lord, believed to be the sons of Alpheus and Mary the Virgin's sister (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3). That Simon, however, is said to be the person (called also Symeon) who succeeded James as bishop of Jerusalem (Euseb., Hist. Eccl., lib. iii. cap. 11), and if so cannot have been an apostle. The various countries in which Simon Zelotes is said to have preached are briefly noted by Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Simon 5.'—3. One called 'the leper,' in whose house our Lord was entertained at Bethany, shortly before his passion (Matt. xxvi. 6-13; Mark xiv. 3-9; John xii. 1-8). Some perplexity has been felt at the statement that Martha was one of those that 'served' on the occasion. And it has been supposed, by way of explanation, that Simon was the father of Lazarus, or the husband of Martha. If he were still living, he had doubtless been cleansed of his leprosy by the Lord's power.—4. A Cyrenian who was coming out of the country or out of the fields on the day of the crucifixion, and was compelled to carry Christ's cross. From the way in which his sons, Alexander and Rufus, are spoken of, we may deem them disciples (Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26; comp. Rom. xvi. 13).—5. A Pharisee at whose house the woman that was a sinner anointed the feet of Jesus (Luke vii. 36-50).—6. The father of Judas Iscariot (John vi. 71, xii. 4, xiii. 2, 26).—7. A sorcerer at Samaria who believed at Philip's preaching, and was baptized. He afterwards offered Peter and John money to purchase the power of bestowing the Holy Ghost. His presumption was severely rebuked by Peter (Acts viii. 9-24). He is said afterwards to have again met and opposed Peter at Rome (Euseb., ubi supr., lib. ii. capp. 13, 14). This story is very dubious; and Justin Martyr has made, as most critics think, a mistake in reporting that divine honours were paid to Simon at Rome (Just. Mart., Apolog., i. 26, p. 59, edit. Bened.).—8. A tanner at Joppa, at whose house St. Peter lodged (Acts ix. 43, x. 6, 17, 32). This house, it is pretended, is still to be seen at Jaffa.

SIMON.—1. Simon Chosameus (1 Esdr. ix. 32), perhaps a corrupted form of Shimeon (Ezra x. 31).—2. A Jewish high priest, the son of Onias, highly commended for his care of the temple and faithful discharge of the duties of his office (Ecclus. i.). There is some difficulty in determining which Simon was meant in this place. For a Simon, called the Just, succeeded his father Onias in the high-priesthood in the time of Ptolemy the son of Lagus; and another Simon succeeded another Onias in the time of Ptolemy Philopator. It is most probable that the former is meant. His pontificate is variously reckoned, 310 or 300-292 B.C. See Prideaux, Connection, vol. i. pp. 478, 491, 492; Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Simon 1.'—3. One of the brothers of Judas Maccabeus, surnamed Thassi (1 Macc. ii. 3, 65). He conducted a successful campaign in Galilee in the life-time of his brother Judas (v. 17-23), and with Jonathan avenged the death of Judas (ix. 33-42). He was advanced to the government and high-priesthood when Jonathan was slain, was confirmed in his authority by Demetrius, allowed to coin money by Antiochus the son of Demetrius, acknowledged prince and high priest of the Jews by the Romans, but was ultimately murdered with two of his sons by Ptolemy son of Abubus, 135 or 136 B.C. His son John Hyrcanus succeeded him (xiii. xvi.). See MACCABEES, THE FAMILY OF MACCABEUS.—4. A Benjamite, made governor of the temple under Seleucus Philopator king of Syria. His evil conduct and slander of the high priest Onias is related in 2 Macc. iii. 1-12, iv. 1-6. Some have denied that Simon was a Benjamite.

SIMRI (watchful). A Levite, one of the chief porters (1 Chron. xxvi. 10). The name is identical with Shimri.

SIN. Sin is defined in scripture to be 'the transgression of the law' (1 John iii. 4). Of course an intelligent understanding of the law is pre-supposed; for, 'where no law is, there is no transgression' (Rom. iv. 15). The scripture teaches us that, since and in consequence of the fall, men are born with a sinful nature, 'the children of wrath' (Eph. ii. 3). This is called 'original sin,' and is described in Art. ix. of the Anglican church as 'the fault and corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original righteousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil.' As a result of this original imperfection, men commit actual sin not indeed that they are compelled to transgress, but of their own fault, and according to their own perverted will. There is no man without sin (1 John i. 8, 10); and therefore, as 'the wages of sin is death' (Rom. vi. 23), men stand exposed to the just judgment of eternal death. But God has graciously provided a means whereby sin may be forgiven: he 'made him, who knew no sin, to be sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him' (2 Cor. v. 21). Christ by his precious blood-shedding hath atoned for sin; and the benefits of his atonement are freely offered to mankind. So that the blood of Christ 'cleanseth from all sin' (1 John i. 7). The guilt of it is remitted to those that believe in Jesus (John iii. 16, 18); and the power of it is broken by the mighty working of the Spirit (Rom. vi. 14, viii. 1-4; 1 Cor. vi. 11).

All sins are not equal in intensity. There are some committed with that daring defiance of God which seems to shut up the soul in impenitence, and disable it from application to that fountain wherein guilt may be washed away (Mark iii. 28-30). And there are sins which, though they must have their desert of death if disregarded and unrepented of, yet are brought to the Saviour's cross and are forgiven (1 John. v. 16, 17).

The word 'sin' appears to be sometimes put for sin-offering' (2 Cor. v. 21).

SIN (miré, clay). A fortified city on the north-eastern frontier of Egypt, on the eastern bank of the eastern stream of the Nile, two or three miles from the sea, amid marshes (Ezek. xxx. 15, 16). In consequence of its position and its strong fortifications it was regarded as the key of Egypt; and every invader first attempted to capture this place. Sin was the Pelusium of the Greeks: it no longer exists; its site being covered by the sea. But not far off is el-Tineh, where are some ruins, called now Farameh, or el-Farma. Tineh, an Arabic word, signifies, like Sin, 'a miry place'; and Pelusium, of Greek derivation, is also 'muddy

SIN-OFFERING. See OFFERINGS.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF. A wilderness between Elim and Sinai, or more accurately between Elim and Rephidim or Dophkah (Exod. xvi. 1, xvii. 1; Numb. xxxiii. 11, 12). It was here that the manna was first given. It is thought to be the desert-plain el-Kâa, which, beginning at el-Murkhal, extends with varying breadth almost to the southern extremity of the Sinaitic peninsula.

SINA (Acts vii. 30, 38; Gal. iv. 24, 25). The Greek form of Sinai. As illustrating St Paul's symbolical language, it may be said that, according to some authorities, Hagar, signifying 'a rock,' is the name given by the Arabs to Sinai.

SINAI (bush of the Lord?). The mountain or mountain-district where the law was delivered to Israel. The Sinaitic mountains are situated in the peninsula between the two arms of the Red sea. They consist of a mass of granite, porphyry, and greenstone rocks, somewhat triangular in shape, faced towards the two gulfs by strips of red sandstone running south-east and south-west till they meet. The whole forms a huge plateau, which is intersected by wadis, and from which rise various cliffs and peaks, some of them to a height of 8000 or 9000 feet above the level of the sea. Dr. Stanley distributes these mountains into three principal clusters—one to the north-west near Wady Feiran: here is Serbâl, 6342 feet in altitude; then the eastern and central mass, including Jebel Katherin about 8000 feet, and Jebel Mûsa about 7000 feet high; and thirdly the south-eastern, of which the highest peak is Um Shaumer (Sinai and Palestine, p. 11).

The opinions of travellers differ widely as to the identification of that particular 'mount,' whereupon 'the Lord descended in fire,' while the people 'stood at the nether part of the mount' (Exod. xix. 16-20). Some—and early traditions favour their view—imagine that Serbâl was the very Sinai. It is described as a magnificent mountain, crowned with five peaks, well-fitted, we may therefore suppose, for the display of the divine glory upon it. But then there is no plain in the immediate neighbourhood in which the tribes could have been gathered to hear the voice of God. And, though Rephidim was not far distant from Sinai, yet, so far as it can be identified, it must have been too close upon Serbâl to allow for two separate encampments, with a march between them, at Rephidim and the wilderness of Sinai (xvii. 1, xix. 2; Numb. xxxiii. 15). Other writers identify the mount with Râs Sasâfeh, a high peak to the north-east of the central cluster overlooking the plain er-Rahah, which afforded opportunity for the people to remove and stand afar off (Exod. xx. 18), lateral valleys running into it. Dr. Durbin, who ascended this peak, observes: 'No one who has not seen them can conceive the ruggedness of these vast piles of granite rocks, rent into chasms, rounded into smooth summits, or splintered into countless peaks, all in the wildest confusion, as they appear to the eye of an observer from any of the heights. But, when we did arrive at the summit . . . and cast our eyes over the wide plain, we were more than repaid for all our toil. One glance was enough. We were satisfied that here, and here only, could the wondrous displays of Sinai have been visible to the assembled host of Israel, that here the Lord spoke with Moses, that here was the mount that trembled and smoked in the presence of its manifested Creator! We gazed for some time in silence; and, when we spoke, it was with a reverence that even the most thoughtless of our company could not shake off. I read on the very spot, with what feelings I need not say, the passage in Exodus which relates the wonders of which this mountain was the theatre. We felt its truth, and could almost see the lightnings, and hear the thunders, and the "trumpet waxing loud" (Observations in the East, vol. i. pp. 143, 144).

Still there are some objections to this identification. To persons in the plain er-Rahah the Râs Sasâfeh is not the most conspicuous summit. Besides the special name, Jebel Mûsa, mount of Moses, has always been given to the tall southern peak of the same mountain-mass. The difficulty, however, was to find any plain at its base where the people might have been stationed. Late researches have discovered such a plain, larger and more commodious than that of er-Rahah. This, Wady Sebâfeh, was explored about twenty years ago; though since that time its existence, or at least its adequate extent, has been doubted. The following account of it is from the journal of Mr. Drew, who visited the east in 1856-57: 'The Wady Sebâfeh, for a considerable distance—indeed almost as far as it is laid down in some of the maps, which I found it too early with Wady Rahabeh—looks very unpromising, as the scene of Israel's encampment . . . and I do not wonder, if Stanley did not pursue his "afternoon's walk" very far, that he felt it had no claim to be regarded as that scene. . . . We went on, however, and we were then quite astonished at the scene which opened out before us. The plain widens and enlarges towards the south into a most magnificent area for a much larger encampment than could be placed in er-Rahah . . . at no point was the view of Jebel Mûsa interrupted. It rose every where before us, through the three miles over which Sebâfeh extends, as THE MOUNT. In the broadest part, near the south end, and along a line bearing north-west and south-east, we found the plain was a mile and three quarters broad. . . . The wady meets all the requirements of the scene of the encampment. It is well supplied with water, and is even now, with its gently-sloping sides, filled with vegetation. Jebel Mûsa is the object visible at every part: the spurs from the mountain come down along it on the east side, so as to form a clearly-defined boundary: water is abundant. . . . There is abundant room in it and in the adjacent wadys for the Israelites to have been placed as the narrative describes during the giving of the law; and, after going over the conditions that must have been fulfilled by the actual scene of that event, we came, deliberately and strongly, to the conclusion that it had far greater claims to be received in that character than er-Rahah.' Mr. Drew and his party, in order to form a right judgment, went from Sebâfeh to er-Rahah to make a fresh examination there; and he says, 'our conclusion . . . was in the strongest manner sustained' (Scripture Lands in Connect. with their History, app. B. pp. 393-395). We may, therefore, fairly conclude that the Sinai on which the Lord descended in fire is most probably the present Jebel Mûsa.

We find the name Horeb in use as well as that of Sinai; and, indeed, it has been urged as an argument against the belief that the book of Deuteronomy proceeded from the same pen as the rest of the Pentateuch, that the writer of Deuteronomy uses the word Horeb exclusively, while in the preceding books the place where the law was given is with but two or three exceptions called Sinai. Sinai does occur in Deuteronomy (Deut. xxxiii. 2); but there is sufficient reason why generally Horeb is used. 'Never,' says Dr. Hengstenberg, 'does Horeb appear as a single mountain, in contrast to Sinai Sinai, on the other hand, is always a single mountain. Before the children of Israel reached the district, and after they left it, the general name of the mountain Horeb always stands in contrast to Egypt, the plains of Moab, &c. During their stay there, the particular is made a distinct object from the general: the mountain of Sinai and its wilderness are distinguished as the theatre of events that took place in the district of Horeb. But in Exod. xviii. 5 the general term is used: the whole of Horeb is still the mountain of God; which designation, nevertheless, is only applicable to the whole on account of what occurred on part of it, Sinai' (Dissertations on the Genuineness of the Pentateuch, diss. vii. vol. ii. pp. 325-327). The name Horeb, it may be added, signifying 'dry,' 'desert,' is very naturally given to places presenting the same physical features if not identically the same spot; and, in reference to the giving of the law, it seems rather to describe the position of the people than the spot on which the Lord descended. In later times the designation, as was natural, had a more extended meaning. Thus it was to Horeb that Elijah fled, clearly the region (1 Kings xix. 8). Legendary tradition has fixed on a particular cave as that where he lodged (9); and on Jebel Mûsa is the so-called chapel of St. Elias.

SINCERITY. This term is opposed to hypocrisy or dissimulation. The Greek word which we render 'sincerity' denotes the being judged of in sunshine, so as to bear minute investigation; hence pureness, clearness (1 Cor. v. 8; 2 Cor. i. 12, ii. 17).

SING, SINGING. See HYMN, MUSIC.

SINIM. The name of a land or people mentioned only once in scripture (Isai. xlix. 12). It is not easy to say what country is intended. Some critics are disposed to look to Egypt. But the prophet would seem rather to point to some distant eastern nation. Accordingly it may be believed that the Chinese, Sinenses, were meant. It is true that the Chinese, though acquainted with this term, do not apply it to themselves. But it is the appellation given to them by the other Asiatics; and there is nothing improbable in supposing it to be known to the Hebrews at an early date. There was a dynasty called Tshin which reigned in China 249-206 B.C.; and Gesenius is inclined to believe that, as the name of this dynasty might have become widely known among foreign nations before it acquired the sovereign power over all China, the word Sinim is derived from it. And, indeed, it was the name of a great tributary kingdom to the west, the first chief of which began his reign 897 B.C. See Henderson, Isaiah, p. 377.

SINITE. A tribe descended from Canaan (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chron. i. 15). In the immediate neighbourhood of Arca (see ARKITE) was a mountain-fortress called Sinnas, inhabited by marauders of Lebanon: it was destroyed, but the site was still named Sini; and so late as the fifteenth century a village of Syn still existed near the river Arca. Here was the seat of the Sinites.

SION (lofty).—1 (Deut. iv. 48). See HERMON.—2 (Matt. xxi. 5; John xi. 15; Rom. ix. 33, xl. 26; Heb. xii. 22; 1 Pet. ii. 6; Rev. xiv. 1). The Greek form of Zion.

SIPH'MOTH (bare places). A town, probably in the south of Judah, to which David sent presents (1 Sam. xxx. 28).

SIPPA'I (threshold?). A Philistine giant (1 Chron. xx. 4); he is also called Saph.

SIRACH (Prol. Eccclus., Eccclus. i. 27). The father of Jesus, author of the apocryphal book called Ecclesiasticus.

SIRAH (retreat). The name of a well (2 Sam. iii. 26), at the place from which Abner was recalled by Joab. Possibly it may have been 'Ain Sara, a spring and reservoir a short distance from Hebron.

SIR'ION (breast-plate). A name given by the Sidonians to mount Hermon (Deut. iii. 9; Psal. xxix. 6), perhaps from a fancied resemblance to a breast-plate. See HERMON.

SISAMA'I (leapers?) but the meaning is very uncertain. One of Judah's posterity (1 Chron. ii. 40).

SISERA (battle-array).—1. The commander-in-chief of the army of Jabin king of Canaan. When Barak adventured to encamp with his 10,000 on Tabor, Sisera marched out to attack him, expecting very likely an easy victory. But Barak rapidly descending fell upon the Canaanitish host, probably when not expected, and threw them into disorder and flight. And, when they endeavoured to regain Harosheth, as they hurried along the narrowing valley with Kishon in flood by their side, no wonder that horses, chariots, footmen were mixed together in disastrous medley. See BARAK. Sisera imagined he could more easily force his way on foot: he quitted his chariot, therefore, and made for the tents of Heber, his master's ally. He was received with apparent respect and cordiality by Jael, Heber's wife, his thirst assuaged, and himself secreted in the women's tent. But, when wearied he had fallen asleep, Jael stole up to him with a hammer and a tent-nail, which she drove through his forehead and pinned him, a corpse, to the ground (Judges iv., v.; 1 Sam. xii. 9; Psal. lxxxiii. 9).—2. One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 53; Neh. vii. 55).

SISIN'NES (1 Esdr. vi. 3, 7, vii. 1). The name of a governor of Syria and Phœnicia under the Persian rule. It answers to Tatnai in the bible (Ezra v. 3).

SISTER. This word, like 'father,' 'mother,' 'son,' 'daughter,' is frequently used to express relationship more distant than that which it literally implies. Thus it signifies a step or half-sister (2 Sam. xiii. 2), a cousin (Matt. xiii. 56), also a sister in the faith (Rom. xvi. 1). Comp. Matt. xii. 50, where the names of natural kindred allude to the spiritual union of Christ's faithful servants with himself.

SIT'NAH (accusation, hatred). One of the wells which Isaac's servants dug, and for which the herdmen of Gerar strove; on account of which Isaac removed (Gen. xxvi. 21). Its exact site has not been ascertained.

SI'VAN (bright?) (Esth. viii. 9). See MONTH.

SKIN. See LEATHER. Skin of the teeth. See TOOTH.

SLAVE, SLAVERY. See SERVANT.

SLEEP. The word literally taken means the repose of the body (Psal. iv. 8; Jonah i. 5, 6; Matt. viii. 24; Acts xx. 9). Used typically it signifies death (Jer. li. 39; Dan. xii. 2; John xi. 11, 13; Acts vii. 60; 1 Cor. xv. 51; 1 Thess. iv. 13, 14), or sometimes the lethargy of sin and ignorance (Rom. xiii. 11; Eph. v. 14).

SLIME (Gen. xi. 3, xiv. 10; Exod. ii. 3). Asphalt or bitumen, which boils up like pitch from subterranean fountains at Hit, near Babylon, described by various travellers; also, according to the Arabs, from the bottom of the Dead sea. Shafts are sunk; and in a semi-fluid state the bitumen exudes from crevices in the strata. It hardens in the sun, and as by itself it is brittle it must be mixed with tar in melting. It was employed for mortar by builders in the plain of Shinar; but this use of it seems to have been confined to Babylonia.

SLING, SLINGER. The sling was anciently a very common and effective weapon of offence. See ARMOUR, pp. 55, 56. Slingers are mentioned as light-armed troops (Judges xx. 16; 1 Sam. xvii. 40-50; 2 Kings iii. 25; 2 Chron. xxvi. 14; Zeck. ix. 15).

SMITH. See HANDICRAFT, IRON.

SMYR'NA (myrrh). An ancient commercial city of Ionia, about 40 miles north of Ephesus, at the mouth of the little river Meles. It was destroyed by the Lydians, and lay in ruins 400 years, till Alexander, or Antigonus after the great conqueror's death, re-built it not far from its original site; and then it again flourished. One of the apocalyptic epistles was addressed to the church of Smyrna (Rev. i. 11, ii. 8-11), forewarning them of persecution; and some of the expressions are thought to refer to rites practised by pagan inhabitants of the city. Thus a crown was presented to the priest who had superintended the sacred ceremonies when his year of office expired (comp. 10). It was here that Polycarp, martyred 166 A.D., was bishop. Smyrna, now called Ismtr, is a large city, containing 120,000 inhabitants, and is the centre of the trade of the Levant.

SNAIL. The 'snail,' so termed in our version of Lev. xi. 30, was probably a species, not exactly identified, of lizard. See LIZARD. The original word in Psal. lviii. 8 signifies a snail, especially without the shell. It is derived from a verb meaning 'to moisten'; and the name is given because of the snail's slime and moisture. The wicked shall pass away as a snail, which leaves a slimy trail, that is, seems to melt as it goes.

SNOW. Snow occasionally falls to some depth in Palestine, though it does not lie long (2 Sam. xxii. 20; 1 Chron. xi. 22). On the higher points of Lebanon, however, it continues throughout the year (Jer. xviii. 14). Snow is frequently mentioned for illustration, as to describe the whiteness of a leper (Exod. iv. 6; Numb. xii. 10; 2 Kings v. 27), or the purity of the raiment of a divine Person or of an angel (Dan. vii. 9; Matt. xxviii. 3; Mark ix. 3), or the perfect cleansing which a sinner has by the forgiving mercy of God (Psal. li. 7; Isai. i. 18). See for other uses of the word Job vi. 16, ix. 30, xxiv. 19; Prov. xxv. 13, xxxi. 21.

SNUFFERS, SNUFF-DISHES (Exod. xxv. 38, xxxvii. 23). See CANDLESTICK.

SO (The Hebrew form of an Egyptian word Sevech or Savak, the crocodile-headed god). An Egyptian king, contemporary with Hoshea king of Israel (2 Kings xvii. 4). It is doubted whether he was identical with Sabaco, the first king of the Ethiopian dynasty in Upper Egypt, or with Sevechus, his son and successor, who immediately preceded Tirhakah: the more probable opinion is that he was Sevechus, who reigned twelve or fourteen years. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'So.' A writer in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1336, 1337, is inclined rather to identify So with Sabaco (Shebek).

SOAP. The Hebrew bôr, or bôrith, implying that which cleanses, would seem to include any cleansing substance, as salt of lye, vegetable salt, alkali, obtained from the ashes of various plants of salt or alkaline nature. This was used in conjunction with oil for washing and scouring garments (Jer. ii. 22); also in refining metals (Mal. iii. 2). The word bôr occurs in Job ix. 30, the last clause of which Carey translates 'and had cleansed my hands with soap;' observing upon it that 'there is no evidence that the ancient Egyptians were acquainted with soap (properly so called); they were probably acquainted, however, with some absorbent substitutes, such as steatite or the argillaceous earths; or—from the circumstance of a preparation of pounded lupins, used by the modern Egyptians for washing the hands and called dogâq, having been long adopted in the country—we may infer that it may be an old invention, handed down to, and imitated by, the present inhabitants' (The Book of Job, p. 442). There is another word, netzer, translated 'nitre,' the modern natron or Egyptian nitre, a mineral alkali gathered from the well-known natron-lakes. This mixed with oil is still used as soap (Jer. ii. 22). It effevesces with an acid and loses its strength (Prov. xxv. 20).

SO'CHO, SO'CHOH (branches, hedge). (1 Kings iv. 10; 1 Chron. iv. 18). See next article.

SO'COH (id.).—1. A city in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 35). This (Shochoh) was the place where the Philistines were gathered for the campaign in which Goliath was slain (1 Sam. xvii. 1): it (Sochoh) is mentioned as included in one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 10): it (Shoco) was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 7), but (Shocho) was seized by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). Its site appears to be at esh-Shuweikeh, in ruins, on the road from Eleutheropolis to Jerusalem, on the southern slope of the Wady es-Sunt (Elah). The Socho of 1 Chron. iv. 18 may be supposed the name of a place, and is most probably this Socoh. The orthography, it will be observed, varies in our translation: there are also slight variations in the Hebrew.—2. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 48). This also has been identified under the same name, esh-Shuweikeh, about a mile to the north of Jattir, now Attir.

SO'DI (confidant of Jehovah). The father of the spy selected from Zebulun (Numb. xiii. 10).

SOD'OM (burning, conflagration? vineyard?). The principal city of the district destroyed on account of the wickedness of the inhabitants, generally thought to be covered by the waters of the Dead sea, that lake being enlarged at the time of the catastrophe. But this notion is not borne out by facts.

Sodom is first mentioned in describing the Canaanitish border (Gen. x. 19): it was afterwards selected by Lot as a place of residence; the country around being highly fertile, well watered everywhere, 'even as the garden of the Lord' (xiii. 10-13). He first pitched his tent close by, and at a later period dwelt in the city. It was plundered by Chedor-laomer and his associate kings; but the captives and booty were recovered by Abram (xiv.). The history of its great sinfulness and fearful ruin, with Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, is next related (xviii. 16-38, xix. 1-29); and ever after Sodom is mentioned but as a name of horror, a warning of the terrible vengeance of God upon sinners (Deut. xxix. 23, xxxii. 32; Isai. i. 9, 10, iii. 9, xlii. 19; Jer. xlii. 14, xlix. 18, l. 40; Lam. iv. 6; Ezek. xvi. 49, 50; Hos. xi. 8; Amos iv. 11; Zeph. ii. 9; Matt. x. 15, xi. 23, 24; 2 Pet. ii. 6-8; Jude 7; Rev. xi. 8). See DEAD SEA, pp. 802-804.

Sodom is usually supposed to have stood at the south-west of the Dead sea; and M. de Sauley imagined that he had discovered its remains on the western shore to the north of Jebel Usdum, 'mountain of Sodom.' The more accurate researches of other travellers, however, have not confirmed M. de Sauley's supposition: he was probably imposed on by his Arab guides, and led to believe that the stones he saw scattered about were the ruins of an ancient city. Besides, the 'plain of Jordan' must have been to the north of the lake, the southern part of which is not visible from the point by Beth-el where Abram and Lot surveyed the then-fertile vale. See ZOAR.

SOD'OM, VINE OF. See VINE.

SOD'OMA (Rom. ix. 29) Sodom.

SOD'OMITES (2 Esdr. vii. 36). Inhabitants of Sodom. The word in the bible has a different meaning.

SOD'OMITISH SEA (2 Esdr. v. 7). The Dead sea.

SOLDIER. See ARMY.

SOL'OMON (pacific). The second son of David and Bath-sheba; the first having been stricken in infancy for the sin of its parents (2 Kings xii. 14-25). Solomon was the child of promise and of happy augury. Designated as the heir of David's wide empire, placed probably under the tuition of the prophet Nathan, selected as the peaceful prince, under whose rule the splendid temple of Jehovah should be built, it was a yet higher preference that he was called the Lord's dear one (2 Sam. vii. 12-16, xii. 24, 25). And yet his childhood was not a calm. Dark clouds were gathering from time to time; and specially, when after Tamar's dishonour and Amnon's murder Absalom seized the throne, Solomon, whose life as David's known heir the usurper would above all desire to take, must have been a fugitive with his father. He was restored to his place; but again, when David's end was evidently near, a bold attempt was made by his elder brother Adonijah to secure the succession to himself. Of course, had the plan prospered, Solomon, as Nathan and Bath-sheba saw, would have been a victim (1 Kings i. 12, 21). But David was aroused by the intelligence, and resolved at once to commit the government to him. He was accordingly anointed king by Nathan the prophet and Zadok the priest, and placed on David's throne; and the news of the event was sufficient to stifle the conspiracy (32-53). Solomon must have been young at this time, perhaps not more than eighteen. His father did not long survive; but in one more assembly the aged king appeared, explained his purpose of building a temple, and how the work was devolved on Solomon, made large offerings for the cost of it, and solemnly blessed his people and his successor. And then again was there a royal ceremonial of inauguration (1 Chron. xxviii., xxix.). David afterwards, just before his death, gave his son another special charge, how to act towards Joab and Shimei, men who had deserved punishment yet had hitherto been treated with lenity.

Thus Solomon began his reign. But Adonijah was evidently restless, and, encouraged perhaps by some of those who had previously declared for him, he endeavoured to possess himself of one of the women of his father's harem. Had he succeeded, he would have obtained in the eyes of the nation an acknowledgment of his claim to the crown. Solomon saw this at a glance, and immediately issued orders for the execution of Adonijah and of Joab, removed Abiathar from the high priesthood, and confined Shimei to a residence in the metropolis, for violating which injunction he was afterwards put to death (1 Kings ii.).

Solomon married Pharaoh's daughter (iii. 1). But, if this alliance was contracted, as is most likely, after his accession, he must have previously married the Ammonitess, Rehoboam's mother (xiv. 21). There is then related the Lord's appearance to the king. He offered a great sacrifice at Gibeon; and in a vision by night God said to him, 'Ask what I shall give thee.' A wonderful permission! Surely his youthful mind will be fired with ambition; and he will ask vast riches, and imperial power, and warlike renown. Nay: he asks a gift much greater. Sensible of his own weakness, calling himself a little child, oppressed with the responsibility of governing the Lord's people, he asks for wisdom. Happy choice! The Lord, who doubtless prompted the desire, will largely gratify it. Solomon was to have wisdom and understanding, and, besides, riches and honour in abundance.

In the fourth year of his reign began the building of the temple, which was completed in seven years and solemnly dedicated, the ark of God being deposited in it. And then there was great joy: the promise that the Lord would choose him a place to dwell in among his people was fulfilled, and the typical priesthood of the law had its largest development and honour (vi.-viii.). Now did God appear to Solomon again, confirming his promises and kindly warning the king against declension. Riches and honour indeed flowed in upon him. He fortified Jerusalem and adorned it with sumptuous palaces: he built many cities and stored them with his chariots and his horsemen: he thoroughly subjugated the remnant of the Canaanites that were in the land: he had a navy on the Red sea, and in conjunction with Hiram king of Tyre carried on a lucrative trade. Gold and the precious things of distant countries were brought to his marts; and sages and sovereigns came out of all nations to hear his wisdom and admire his magnificence (iv. 34, ix., x.). Whether the policy of Solomon was in all respects that which would commend itself to modern statesmen may be a question; suffice it that in his position it was eminently successful; and had he trod on in the right ways of the Lord his prosperity would doubtless have been solid and stable.

But Solomon's prosperity was a snare to him. He lived in luxury, and, after the fashion of eastern princes, he multiplied wives and concubines. His harem was filled with women of various countries who knew not the Lord; and they turned away his heart. And Solomon—the wise and understanding king, to whom God had twice appeared, who reared the magnificent temple of Jehovah—Solomon, enslaved by the love of strange women, sunk so low as to build a high place for Chemosh on the hill before Jerusalem, audaciously confronting the holy house, and for Moloch, that the foul sacrifices to idols might be offered there (xi. 1-8; Neh. xiii. 26). Sentence was then pronounced that ten tribes should be wrested from his house; and the man was designated who should rule them. In vain did Solomon strive to defeat the prediction, Jeroboam whom he sought to slay escaped, and found a refuge in Egypt; and other adversaries there were who troubled Israel; and the vast works the king had undertaken seem to have been felt as burdens by his subjects, so that discontent was beginning to prevail; and Solomon, whose youth had been so auspicious, and whose meridian so splendid, sunk, after reigning forty years, with a heavy cloud upon him to the grave (1 Kings xi. 9-43). No mention is made in scripture of his repentance: no word drops from the inspired penman to show that he humbled himself and sought forgiveness. The name of this most renowned Israelitish king is a warning to succeeding ages to beware of listening to the blandishments of evil.

That Solomon did repent is traditionally believed, and that the book of Ecclesiastes was composed by him after he had trod the paths of vanity and sensual indulgence and found earthly pleasures unsatisfying. But it is an inference, a hope, rather than a certainty. Some imagine that Ecclesiastes is not from his pen. This, however, scarcely affects the inference. Had Solomon been known to die impenitent, no future writer would have assumed to speak in his name. Though we can but hope, therefore, still we may hope that he found mercy.

Solomon was a voluminous author. 'He spake three thousand proverbs,' many of which are preserved in the book of Proverbs; 'and his songs were a thousand and five' (iv. 32). Two psalms bear his name, Psal. lxxii., which most probably is not his, and cxxvii., which may have been written on occasion of building the temple.

For notice of oriental legends respecting Solomon see D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., art. 'Soliman Ben Daoud.'

SOLOMON'S PORCH (John x. 23; Acts iii. 11, v. 12). One of the colonnades or cloisters of the temple, affording shelter from the weather in winter-time. It was in the eastern side, or, as some understand, at the eastern end of the south side of the building. According to Josephus it was an original work of Solomon, which had remained from the former temple (Antiq., lib. xx. 8, § 7). See TEMPLE.

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS (Ezra ii. 55, 58; Neh. vii. 57, 60). A certain class of the returned exiles, enumerated after the Levites and the Nethinim. They had probably some very subordinate connection with the temple-services, and may be supposed the descendants of those Canaanites whom Solomon, carrying out his father's policy, employed as slave-labourers in his works (1 Kings ix. 20, 21; 1 Chron. xxii. 2; 2 Chron. viii. 7, 8). If performing any sacred office, they must have become proselytes to the true religion.

SOLOMON, THE SONG OF. This book, called also Canticles, and according to its Hebrew appellation 'the Song of Songs,' always had a place in the Jewish canon, and has consequently been received into that of the Christian church. It was reckoned among the khethubim or hagiographa: it was included in the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament: it was enumerated by Josephus as one of the Hebrew sacred books. Its canonicity is affirmed in the Mishna: it appears in the Christian catalogue of Melito (about 170 A.D.); and indeed, as it is clear from what has just been said, that it was in the canon of scripture in our Lord's time, any doubts which have since been entertained have been only partial, confined to individuals.

Before proceeding to enquire into the author and the date of this book, it may be well to consider its form and object. Some have called it a mere collection of fragments: others have deemed it a regular drama. The fragmentary theory certainly cannot be sustained. For it is clear that the subject is the same from the beginning to the end: the same persons are introduced; and, though, after the eastern manner, the transitions are abrupt, yet a connecting thread of thought and purpose runs through the whole, in the highest degree improbable if independent pieces had just been strung together. Still it is not constructed with sufficient nicety of adaptation to claim the appellation of a drama. There are interlocutors, doubtless, and so far portions of it may be termed dramatic, but not more so than many other ancient poems, in which characters occasionally speak, but which no man on this account regards as dramas. The impassioned mind of the poet is by no means inclined always formally to describe and introduce his persons: he assumes at once their character, and speaks in their name, knowing that no sensible reader will misunderstand him. We must hold, then, this composition to be a single poem, with a definite plan, conversations being intermingled with description. Whether it be called idyllic with some, or pastoral with others, is of little moment.

Most probably it had an historic basis. The scripture poems and prophecies were suggested generally by some passing event, on which the mind of the seer—like that of Elisha, composed and fixed by the strain of music he asked for (2 Kings iii. 15)—brooded for a while. And then the mental picture was constructed; the events which gave occasion to it being the foreground, while fancy added in other lineaments, and, under the guidance of the informing Spirit, from the present the future was traced, receiving its shape, and conveying its lessons in agreement therewith. Thus see how Hannah, in her joyful offering of her first-born at the sanctuary, with kindling ardour describes the wondrous dealings of the Lord, and travels on till she sees in vision his strength displayed in the exalting of the horn of the great anointed King (1 Sam. ii. 1-10). Examples of the kind are innumerable. So it must have been here. There was some story of pure earthly affection, in which obstacles for a while disunited two loving hearts. This the writer seizes on: he takes up the steps of it; and he converts it to a higher purpose.

Many indeed deny that there was a higher purpose. They see in the Song literal love, and no more. Their reasons are not without weight, and deserve calm consideration. But it is submitted that there are other reasons more weighty which go to prove that in the literal words there is an allegorical meaning, so that through allegory a mystical or spiritual sense is conveyed embodying and inculcating sublime truth. How else should the book have had a place in the sacred canon?

Dr. Stowe has argued the question very sensibly (Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp. 320-339, re-printed from Amer. Bibl. Repos., Apr. 1847); and his views have been adopted by Dr. Kitto (Daily Bible Illustrations). He urges (1). The names of the two principal characters, namely Shelomoh and Shulamith, are in the original quite as significant as John Bunyan's Christian and Christiana, Obstinate and Pliable, Faithful and Hopeful, &c. (2). The sudden changes from the singular to the plural number in the part of the dialogue sustained by Shulamith indicate that her name is to be taken in a collective sense, "Draw me: we will run after thee. The king hath brought me into his chambers: we will be glad," &c. (Sol. Song i. 4, and many other places). (3). Shulamith is put into situations and made to utter expressions which, if literally understood, are so entirely abhorrent to oriental manners, that no sane writer, certainly no writer so skilful as the author of this poem shows himself to be, would ever put into a literal love-song; though they are all very beautiful and appropriate when understood allegorically. Such are iii. 1-4, v. 7, viii. 1, 2. Such scenes and expressions are not uncommon in the allegorical poetry of the east, but in their literal amatory songs they can never occur. Literally understood they would doom their heroines to everlasting infamy; and certainly no poet ever thus treats his favourites. (4). The entire absence of every thing like jealousy, in situations where that passion must appear in a literal love-song, is proof of the allegorical character of the piece. See i. 4, v. 1, vi. 8, 9. (5). The dreamy and fanciful and even impossible character of many of the scenes shows that they cannot be understood literally (ii. 14-17). Shulamith is in the cleft of the rocks, in the concealments of the precipices; and Shelomoh wishes to see her and hear her speak. He is in the garden at night; and she tells him to catch the jackals that are destroying the vines. She sees him feeding his flocks in a distant field of anemones. She sees him beyond the mountains which separate them, and calls upon him to leap over them like the gazelle and the fleeting fawn, to rejoice her at evening. All these things occur at the same time and place (iv. 8). Shelomoh calls upon Shulamith to go with him to the snowy peaks of Lebanon and Hermon, among the lions' dens and the leopards' lairs, and enjoy the fine prospect over the plains of Damascus. Numerous impossibilities of this kind will occur to every intelligent reader of the poem.

In addition to these reasons there is the fact that poems of the kind are common in the east, having an allegorical character; inasmuch that men well acquainted with oriental literature, and familiar from their residence in those parts of the world with oriental habits and feelings, such as Dr. Kitto, Mr. Laue, Major Scott Waring, not only produce examples, but unhesitatingly tell us that no oriental doubts of the allegorical intention of Solomon's Song. Would not then the ancient Hebrews have the same feeling? On such a point surely the impressions made on those to whom the book is addressed or among whom it is first published ought to be specially regarded.

This book, according to its spiritual meaning, is understood to delineate the mutual love of God and his people, in which there are vicissitudes and trials, and backslidings and repentance, and finally a perfect union betwixt the Redeemer and his ransomed church. The same similitude, not indeed wrought out with such particularity, is to be found in other parts of scripture. God frequently condescends to take the marriage-tie as illustrative of the close fellowship of himself with his chosen. Departure from him is spiritual adultery. His kindness is pre-eminent in receiving back the polluted one. And the last glorious triumph is called the marriage-supper of the Lamb, where the bride is presented pure and undefiled, every stain obliterated, resplendent in glistening robes, the meet consort of a royal spouse. The idea is repeated in both the Old and New Testaments. See, for example, Psal. xiv.; Isai. liv. 4-6, lxii. 4, 5; Jer. ii. 2, iii. 1, 20; Ezek. xvi.; Hos. ii. 16, 19, 20; Matt. ix. 15; John iii. 29; 2 Cor. xi. 2; Eph. v. 23, 29, 30, 32; Rev. xix. 7-9, xxi. 2. Such passages as these show how familiarly the idea was used even in prose composition: we need not be surprised to find it expanded in impassioned poetry.

But this interpretation depends on the Song being supposed to exhibit nuptial love. If such a supposition be erroneous, of course there will be a much greater difficulty in establishing the allegorical meaning. Now Mr. Ginsburg, a late and able expositor, maintains (Song of Solomon, with Commentary, Lond. 1857) that we have in it an example of virtue in a young woman who overcame great temptations to become a royal favourite, and remained faithful to a humble suitor. A shepherdess, he thinks, is described, whom Solomon admires and carries to his palace, till, wrought upon by her constancy, he dismisses her to happiness with the shepherd to whom she had been betrothed. It would be hard certainly to put a spiritual meaning on such a story. But after the fullest consideration of Mr. Ginsburg's theory it appears untenable. The parts do not hang well together. And, seeing that he admits only a literal exposition, the extreme improbabilities of the story as he interprets it are difficulties which one really cannot see how to surmount. See Horne's Introd., vol. ii. edit. Ayre, pp. 751, 752. On the whole, then, the allegorical interpretation described above appears most reasonable. Nor are the objections urged against it insuperable. It is said that no hint is given in the book itself that it is allegorical. But no such hint would be needed, especially to readers prepared by habit and feeling, as it has been noted the orientals were, to recognize its inner meaning. It is also urged that, if it was a sacred allegory, it is marvellous that our Lord or his apostles did not cite it. They would have been more likely to put the church on her guard against it, if not being allegorical it was so understood, as we can hardly doubt it was in their time.

The date and authorship must now be briefly noticed. In the title, which even if not original is of extreme antiquity, the Song is expressly declared to be Solomon's. And to him generally, both in the Jewish church and the Christian, it has been ascribed. There is no reason to doubt that it was produced about his time. The diction is evidence of it. And, whereas some trace of Aramaic or Chaldean expression has been imagined, such may readily be explained without resorting to the conjecture of a later date. It has been suggested that it was composed in Northern Palestine. There is little ground for the conjecture; a reason of Hitzig, that Tirzah is named before Jerusalem (Sol. Song vi. 4), being one of the silliest that ever entered a critic's brain. But, if written in Solomon's age, may we regard that prince as the author? If Mr. Ginsburg's exposition be established, unquestionably he was not; he never would have recorded his own disappointment. But that exposition, it has been said above, cannot be adopted. Some particular expressions are alleged as not likely to have fallen from Solomon's pen: it is needless to dwell upon them: they prove little one way or the other. The gravest objection, certainly, to the Solomonic authorship arises from the character and habits of that prince. Wise, indeed, he was, gifted in many respects above the sons of men; but the licence of his harem, independently of the miserable fact that his wives turned away his heart from God, so that he was led to build high places for the deities of those idolatrous women (1 Kings xi. 4-8) shows how far he was from realizing that purity of mind and conduct which one would think must mark the man to whom were revealed, on the supposition of the Song having a spiritual meaning, the deepest things of God. Truly they are earthen imperfect vessels to whom any of the inspired treasure is committed; nevertheless we look for some reasonable correspondence; and it would seem more likely that one of high seraphic virtue would have been the man to depict the tender affection of the Lord and his church, instead of the sensuous monarch of Israel. Yet the objection is by no means pressed as unanswerable; and the weight of external evidence will be thought perhaps by most decisive for Solomon. If he was the author, it is impossible to tell at what period of his life he wrote this book; some say in youth, some in his elder days. This, however, we may confidently conclude: the fair one was not Pharaoh's daughter, but rather a native of Palestine, or the child of some neighbouring prince. Some identifying Shunem and Shulem would have her a Shunamite, and—whither will not fancy lead!—have guessed that she was Abishag.

It is well to note that a proper examination of the Song proves the baselessness of some of the objections to it. Thus Dr. Stowe shows that Sol. Song v. 10-16, often taken to describe the unclothed person, has really reference to the dress. 'Those parts . . . which custom exposes to view are indeed described; but, as to those parts which custom conceals, it is the dress and not the skin which is intended. For example, "His head is as the most fine gold; and his hair is curled, and black as the raven!" What is this but the turban, gold-coloured or ornamented with gold, and the raven-black ringlets appearing below it? How else could his head be yellow and his hair black? . . . Again, "His belly is as bright ivory girded with sapphires." How admirably this corresponds with the snow-white robe, and girdle set full of jewels, as we see it in Sir R. K. Porter's portrait of the late king of Persia! But what is there, I pray you, in the unclothed body that looks like a girdle of sapphires? The same principle will apply to vii. 1-5; with regard to which Dr. Kitto says, 'There can be no impropriety in describing those parts of the person which are always exposed to view, as the face, hands, &c. Now all the monuments and pictures of ancient Egypt show us that the ancient oriental ladies dressed so as to leave the busts fully open to view; and of course there could then be no impropriety in alluding to or describing that part of the person. It may be added that this is the custom of modern oriental as well as of ancient oriental dress; and we have ourselves seen women who would sooner die than allow their faces to be viewed by strangers, and sooner be flayed alive than be seen with the top of the head uncovered, who would at the same time be perfectly indifferent to a display of a part of their persons which is in Europe more carefully veiled' (Daily Bibl. Illust., Sec. Ser. Thirteenth Week, Sixth Day).

Almost every expositor divides this book in his own way. The following is one of the many modes of distributing it. There are two parts, each with three subdivisions; I. (i.-vi.), comprising, besides the title (i. 1), 1. The aspiration of reciprocal love (i. 2—ii. 7).—2. The mutual search and finding of the beloved object (ii. 8—iii. 5).—3. The espousals (iii. 6—v. 1). II. (v. 2—viii. 14), including, 1. The separation and re-union (v. 2—vi. 9). 2. The commendation of the beloved object (vi. 10—viii. 4).—3. The cementing of the alliance for inviolable fidelity (viii. 5-14).

Among the useful commentaries on this book are Mason Good's Translation with Notes, 1803, and Withington's Solomon's Song translated and explained, Boston, U.S., 1861.

SOL'OMON, THE WISDOM OF. See WISDOM OF SOLOMON, THE BOOK OF.

SON. This word is used with an extended meaning for grandson (Gen. xxix. 5; 2 Kings ix. 14) and for more remote descendants (Ezra viii. 15; Matt. xxii. 42; Luke xix. 9). In a tropical sense we have it denoting vassalage or subjection, as of a child to his parent (2 Kings xvi. 7). Hence 'son of death' (1 Sam. xx. 31, marg.) for devoted to death; so 'child' or son 'of hell' (Matt. xxiii. 15), 'son of perdition' (John xvii. 12). It also signifies a 'foster-son,' or one adopted (Exod. ii. 10), and a disciple, a teacher being regarded as a father; thus 'sons of the prophets,' those who were trained in the prophetic schools (1 Kings xx. 35; 2 Kings ii. 3, 5, 7; Amos vii. 14). In relation to a place, 'son' denotes a native of it; thus 'children' or sons 'of Zion' (Psal. cxlix. 2), so 'children of the east' (Judges vi. 3), 'children of the people' (Jer. xvii. 19), meaning the common people or the public. Similarly we find 'sons of his quiver' (Lam. iii. 13, marg.) for his arrows. Used with reference to time we have 'son of old age' (Gen. xxxvii. 3) for one born in old age, 'children' or sons 'of youth' (Psal. cxxvii. 4) for those born in their fathers' youth, 'son of a year' (Exod. xii. 5, marg.) for one a year old, 'the son of the night' (Jonah iv. 10, marg.) for that which came up in a night. The word is also expressive of quality or condition. Thus 'sons of Belial' or wickedness (1 Sam. ii. 12) for wicked men, 'sons of affliction' (Prov. xxxi. 5, marg.) the afflicted, 'sons of thunder' (Mark iii. 17) impetuous, 'children' or sons 'of disobedience' (Eph. ii. 2) disobedient persons. Poetically the word is used for any kind of relationship or similarity; thus we have 'son of the morning' (Isai. xiv. 12) the morning-star, 'sons of the burning coal' (Job v. 7) sparks (though some would interpret here of birds), swift as lightning, 'son of oil' (Isai. v. 1, marg.) fat, fertile, 'sons of oil' (Zech. iv. 14) anointed, 'children' or sons 'of the resurrection' (Luke xx. 36) those who shall rise again. Many similar phrases occur, easy to be understood.

SON OF GOD. This title is continually given to the Lord Jesus Christ, and as appropriated by him it is a full proof of his divinity (Luke i. 32, xxii. 70, 71; Rom. i. 4).

The title was applied to Adam, who had no human father (Luke iii. 38). And there is a sense in which other men, as the creatures of God's hand, and still more as received into his reconciled family by adoption, may be called God's sons (Hos. i. 10; John i. 12; Acts vi. 23, 29; Rom. viii. 14; Gal. iii. 26, iv. 5-7; 1 John iii. 1, 2). But it was evidently with a much higher meaning that our Lord is termed 'The Son of God.' For the Jews rightly judged that by the assumption of this title he laid claim to equality with God, and, regarding it as blasphemy, and a breach of the first commandment, they determined to put him to death (John v. 17, 18): in fact it was on this charge that ultimately they condemned him. And that it was not in the lower and common sense that Christ claimed God as his Father is evident from the fact that he did not correct the Jews' opinion; which most unquestionably he would have done, had they been under a mistake in supposing him to have broken the great commandment of the law.

Whitby well observes in his note on Luke xxii. 70, 71 that the Jews did not expect Messiah to be more than man. The title, therefore, 'Son of God' was not recognized by them as appropriate to the Messiah; as

Wilson has largely proved in his Illustr. of Method of Expl. the N. T. by early Opinions of Jews and Christians, chap. iii. pp. 56-76. However clear to us may be the proofs deducible from the Old Testament of the plurality of Persons in the unity of the Godhead, the Jews generally did not appreciate their force. And at a time especially when they were purged from their former tendencies to idolatry they maintained in the strongest way the unity of the Most High God. Now it was no offence against the law for any one to proclaim himself the Messiah. The evidences of his claim were to be looked at; and according as they were trustworthy or not the claim would be admitted or disallowed; but simply to have made it roused no indignation among his countrymen, although in case of an individual obnoxious on other grounds they might make it a ground of accusation before their Gentile rulers, that the claim was an act of treason against the Roman Cæsar (Luke xxiii. 2; John xix. 12). But this was not the charge on which our Lord was arraigned before the high priest, and which the Jewish law made capital. 'We have a law,' they said; 'and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God' (7). It was impossible to deny the reality of the miracles wrought. They were acknowledged by the people, who still doubted whether they were sufficient to establish the truth of his Messiahship (vii. 31); they could not be gainsaid by the very rulers (xi. 47). But then the case was provided for in the law that, if a sign or a wonder was exhibited by any one who transgressed the fundamental principles of that law, he was to be dealt with as a false prophet (Deut. xiii. 1-5). Hence the keenness of the Jews to convict Jesus of what they supposed a denial of the first great truth of their religion. And with all their admixture of lower motives we may fairly admit that they believed he was committing a grave crime and deserved the punishment of death. This the words of St. Peter (Acts iii. 17) and of St. Paul (1 Cor. ii. 8) imply. Hence their dissatisfaction on his trial with the false witness urged against him. It did not, if admitted, involve a capital offence. So that the high priest had to put him to the proof (Luke xxii. 70, 71). And in his judges' mind he was convicted by his own words in open court of the grossest blasphemy, when he declared in answer to the adjuration made to him that he was the Son of God. The whole of this proceeding would be unintelligible, if we did not allow that to Jewish ears this declaration distinctly claimed equality with God. And, if we were for argument's sake to imagine that in the heat of discussion more was advanced than would in cooler moments be maintained, we cannot for an instant suppose that on this solemn occasion, on trial before the highest court of the nation, at a crisis on which so much depended, Jesus would let himself be misconceived and condemned to death for an assumption he did not really intend to make. The inference, then, cannot be evaded. Our Lord claimed to be one with the Father in a way in which no mere man could be; and the apostles in propagating his religion meant to claim for him this divine pre-eminence (Mark i. 1; John i. 18; Acts iii. 13, 26; Heb. i. 2; 1 John i. 3). And here was the great mystery of godliness. He that was the Highest stooped to be the lowest for the salvation of men.

We may hence see the force of the acknowledgments made by the devils whom Jesus cast out: they knew him, we are told, not merely that he was the Messiah, but that he was the Son of God (Matt. viii. 29; Mark ii. 24; Luke iv. 34, 41). Hence, too, the declaration to Peter that such a recognition could not have been made except by the gracious instruction of the Father (Matt. xvi. 16, 17), and the special commendation of Nathanael (John i. 49, 50). It is no sufficient objection that the disciples wavered in their faith: they were the rather likely to waver when they saw One, whom they had begun to believe more than human, apparently unable to deliver himself from a shameful death. It may be added that the peculiar difficulty of the Jews is thus quite evident when Jesus questioned them, 'Whose Son is Christ?' they said at once, David's. But, when he further enquired, how David then called him Lord, they from their ignorance of Messiah's divine nature could not answer (Matt. xxii. 41-46). The reader may advantageously consult Wilson's work already referred to, chap. ii, pp. 10-55.

SON OF MAN. A phrase used to signify man generally (Numb. xxiii. 19; Job xxv. 6, xxxv. 8; Psal. viii. 4, cxliv. 3; Heb. ii. 6). It was the ordinary designation of the prophet Ezekiel, when God addressed him (e.g. Ezek. i. 1, 3, 6, 8). It was also once given to Daniel (Dan. viii. 17). It seems to have been an Aramaic idiom, equivalent to 'man,' in common use in the region where Ezekiel and Daniel resided. Thus we find it perpetually occurring in the Syriac version: as for example, 'The first son of man, Adam, was a living soul;' 'The first son of man earthy of the earth, the second son of man the Lord from heaven' (1 Cor. xv. 45, 47). It is, further, the phrase used in that remarkable vision in which Daniel saw One, 'the Son of Man,' brought to the Ancient of Days, and invested with a sovereignty that should include all nations and that should never be destroyed (Dan. vii. 13, 14). That this had a Messianic reference cannot be doubted. And therefore, when our Lord so designated himself (Matt. viii. 20, ix. 6, and elsewhere) he announced himself as the Messiah, the Son of God manifested in human form, revealing the mystery of the two natures in one Person. The Jews seem fully to have understood what he meant: they saw that he claimed an identity as 'Son of man' with the Deity, the 'Son of God' (Luke xxii. 69, 70; comp. John xii. 34). Stephen uses this title of Christ (Acts vii. 56); with this exception, in the Gospels and apostolic history it is applied to him only by himself.

SONS OF GOD. A designation given in the Old Testament to angels (Job i. 6, ii. 1, xxxviii. 7). There cannot be a doubt of the beings intended in these places; but there is considerable doubt in regard to another place where the same phrase is employed (Gen. vi. 2, 4). It is very frequently interpreted of the descendants of Seth, supposed to be a godly race, intermarrying with the posterity of Cain regarded as degenerate. And this notion is corroborated by the fact that the Israelites, God's chosen family, are called his children (Deut. xiv. 1). It is supposed again that the sons of eminent persons, to whom the name 'gods' is sometimes given (Exod. xxii. 28), allied themselves with females of inferior rank. Little, however, can be said in favour of such an interpretation. Many respectable writers are dissatisfied with both these notions. Dr. Kitto, in an ingenious paper (Daily Bible Illustr., Fifth Week, Fourth Day), argues that elsewhere the phrase signifies beings non-human, that we know too little of the nature of such beings to decide that the intermixture was impossible, and that, if thus we suppose an intrusive race more powerful than men generated upon earth, the absolute necessity of such a judgment as the flood is better seen, wherein all were swept away, one family of pure descent being preserved. And Noah, it is said, was 'perfect in his generations' (Gen. vi. 9). Dr. Kalisch is more decided still against the application of the phrase to human beings: he refers to the many wild legends which may have had their origin from this passage, but which he supposes to have obtained currency before the narrative was written, and which he seems to believe were here referred to. 'The Hebrew historian,' says he, 'admits for one moment the existence of a superstition, in order for ever to subvert and to eradicate it' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 170-176). No general consent, probably, will ever be arrived at in the exposition of the sacred writer's statement.

SONG (1 Kings iv. 32). See HYMN, MUSIC, POETRY.

SONG OF SOLOMON. See SOLOMON, THE SONG OF.

SONG OF THE THREE CHILDREN. See DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO.

SOOTHSAYER (Isai. ii. 6). See DIVINATION.

SOP (John xiii. 26, 27, 30). A piece of the unleavened bread dipped in the broth of bitter herbs. See MEALS, PASSOVER.

SO'PATER (father saved). A Christian of Berea who accompanied St. Paul into Asia (Acts xx. 4). This name may possibly be a contracted form of Sosipater.

SO'PHERETH (scribe). One whose descendants, Solomon's servants, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 55; Neh. vii. 57).

SO'PHONIAS (2 Esdr. i. 40). The prophet Zephaniah.

SORCERER, SORCERY (Acts viii. 9, and elsewhere). See DIVINATION.

SO'REK (choice vine). The valley in which Delilah lived (Judges xvi. 4). It was probably to the north of Eleutheropolis, not far from Zorah.

SOSIP'ATER (preservation of a father). A Christian from whom St. Paul sends a salutation to the church at Rome, calling him his kinsman, i.e., fellow-tribesman (Rom xvi. 21). Some have believed him the same with Sopater.

SOSIPATER. A captain in the Maccabean wars (2 Macc. xii. 19, 24).

SOS'THENES (safe in strength). A ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Acts xviii. 17). Whether he became a Christian, and was the person whom St. Paul joins in his address to the Corinthians (1 Cor. i. 1), is uncertain.

SOS'TRATUS (2 Macc. iv. 27, 29). An officer in Jerusalem under Antiochus Epiphanes.

SO'TAI (a deviator). One whose descendants, called Solomon's servants, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 55; Neh. vii. 57).

SOUL. That sentient, rational, conscious, accountable part or principle in man which distinguishes his life from mere animal existence. Thus God formed the body of our first parent from the dust of the ground, and then 'breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul' (Gen. ii. 7).

There are many curious questions on the nature, origin, powers, and mode of existence of the soul, which have been debated with much earnestness by ingenious men. Discussion on these would be out of place in the present work. Neither need the pantheistic notion be dwelt on that the soul is 'a mere attribute of the universal substance and a correlate of extension,' or 'a vanishing point in the eternal process of the evolution of the absolute.' It is enough to say that the pantheistic theory is opposed to our consciousness, because it denies our individual personality, and does not admit the freedom of the will, and, still worse, it is opposed to our moral and religious consciousness, for it denies moral distinctions, or, if it at all recognizes a difference between good and evil, it really ascribes to God all the error and crime under which men suffer. It must be sufficient to say here that such a theory contradicts not only scripture, but the plain principles of reason.

There are other questions more nearly connected with scripture, which may very briefly be touched. It is doubted how far the earlier fathers of mankind understood the immortality or separate existence of the soul. Unquestionably the later revelation disclosed much which had previously been veiled, so that Christ may most properly be said to have 'brought life and immortality to light through the gospel' (2 Tim. i. 10). But surely the ancients were not in perfect darkness on such a matter. The translation of Enoch, even if there had been no other kind of teaching, must have read thoughtful men a striking lesson (Gen. v. 24). And certainly, if 'the sacrifices of the dead' were eaten, some notion must have been entertained of the conscious state of the dead (Psal. cvi. 28). Another question relates to the pre-existence of souls; and it is inferred that the disciples believed this, by their enquiry, 'Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?' (John ix. 2: comp. Alford's note on the place.) The subject of the pre-existence of the soul has been learnedly discussed by Bruch in a late work (Die Lehre von der Präexistenz der Mensch. Seelen, 1859; a valuable condensation of it being given in the American Biblioth. Sacra., Oct. 1863, pp. 1682-1733), in which he utterly disproves the notion.

Leaving these matters, it may be observed that when the body dies the soul still lives: it has not immediately its final and complete position; for body and soul must be again united, in order that the whole man may have his suitable life. What the scripture reveals of the separate state of the faithful is very interesting. This is described as 'a state of rest, a state of consciously living to God, a state of being with Christ, a state of paradisaical bliss, a state of mutual recognition and of holy fellowship, a state of victory and of assurance of reward, a state of earnest expectation' (E. H. Bickersteth's The Blessed Dead). The condition of those who have lived in ungodliness may be gathered from the awful parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi. 19-31).

At the Lord's coming all men shall rise again with their bodies, 'some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt' (Dan. xii. 2; Matt. xxv. 46). The practical conclusion, and one of the weightiest importance, therefore, is that all care must be exercised, all means used, for 'the salvation of the soul' (Matt. xvi. 26).

The term 'soul' is sometimes used for person (e.g. Acts xxvii. 37; 1 Pet. iii. 20).

SOUTH. The Hebrews had several words of expressive derivation, as one implying dryness, another brightness (opposed to which was region 'covered,' i.e., with darkness, for the north), to indicate the south. Also, as in respect to the points of the compass, a man was supposed to have his face to the east, and consequently the south was on his right, it was often designated by 'the right hand' (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, marg.; Job xxiii. 9). The south is put for countries or districts lying to the south of Palestine, such as Idumea, parts of Arabia, the desert of Paran, &c., and more particularly that which was afterwards distinguished as 'the south country.' Hence, though Abram leaving Egypt journeyed in a north-east direction, he is said to have gone 'into the south' (Gen. xiii. 1). Egypt is sometimes intended (probably in Isai. xxx. 6; Dan. xi. 5, 15), and Arabia (Matt. xii. 42). But, in Ezek. xx. 46, 47, Judea seems to be meant, perhaps in reference to the position of the prophet in Babylonia. See NORTH.

The region called the 'south country' has been admirably illustrated by Mr. Wilton in his Negeb, often cited in these pages. He shows that it was a recognized district of Palestine, and was divided into the Negeb (i.) of the Cherethites or Philistines, (ii.) of the Kenites adjoining Arad, (iii.) of Judah, subdivided into the Negeb (1) of Caleb, (2) of the Jerahmeelites. He describes its physical characteristics, its ravines and defiles, its exposure to the sirocco, its deficiency in springs, so that it is chiefly dependent for water on the rainy season, and its consequent unsuitableness for horses and horned cattle. He speaks of it as the resort of lions, deer, and gazelles, wild goats, doves, and noxious reptiles; the domestic animals in it being the camel, the ass, sheep, and goats. He draws attention to the fulfillment of prophecy respecting it: its cities stand unoccupied (Jer. xiii. 19); there being not even a single inhabited village, as the population is entirely nomadic. See SEIR, 1, p. 807.

SOUTH-RA'MOTH (1 Sam. xxx. 27). See BAALATH-BEER.

SOW (2 Pet. ii. 22). See SWINE.

SOW, SOWER, SOWING (Lev. xix. 19). Several of our Lord's parables are grounded upon sowing (Matt. xiii. 3-8, 18-32, 36-43; Mark iv. 26-32; Luke viii. 5-15). See AGRICULTURE, SEASON.

SPAIN. A well-known country in the south-west of Europe. The whole peninsula, including modern Spain and Portugal, was, in the apostolic age, a province, named Hispania, of the Roman empire. St. Paul proposed to visit Spain (Rom. xv. 24, 28); but it is uncertain whether he ever fulfilled his intention: see PAUL, p. 670; yet doubtless the gospel was carried thither at an early date, perhaps by Hellenistic Jews, who would naturally be found in the country for purposes of commerce. Before the Roman dominion, Spain had been colonized or occupied by various tribes. The Greeks founded cities therein. The Phœnicians had much commercial intercourse with the peninsula. Tarshish, so frequently mentioned in scripture, appears to have been a place in Spain. See TARSHISH. The Carthaginians formed Spanish settlements. After the breaking up of the Roman empire there was a Gothic monarchy in this country, which was overturned by the Arab invasion in the beginning of the eighth century; nor were the Arabs finally expelled for nearly 800 years. Many oriental customs still exist in Spain. Thus oxen may be seen treading out the corn, which is winnowed by being cast up against the wind.

SPAN (Exod. xxviii. 16, and elsewhere). See MEASURES.

SPARROW. The Hebrew word so rendered (meaning twittering, chirping) applies to small birds, generally of the sparrow genus, or similar to the sparrow, thus including, Dr. Kitto thinks, thrushes, starlings, finches, larks, &c. The common sparrow, Passer domesticus, is the attendant of civilized man, everywhere before our eyes, even in the modern populous cities. There are many accidental varieties, and kindred species. Upwards of one hundred are said to occur in the Holy Land. The sparrow mentioned in Psal. cii. 7 is described as a solitary bird, and is thought by Waterton to be a species of thrush. But Dr. Thomson, who notices the abundance of house-sparrows and field-sparrows in Palestine (though according to Tristram the common sparrow does not occur in the country), says, 'They are a tame, troublesome, and impertinent generation, and nestle just where you don't want them. They stop up your stove and water-pipes with their rubbish, build in the windows and under the beams of the roof, and would stuff your hat full of stubble in half a day, if they found it hanging in a place to suit them. They are extremely pertinacious in asserting their right of possession, and have not the least reverence for any place or thing. David alludes to these characteristics of the sparrow in Psal. lxxxiv., where he complains that they had appropriated even the altars of God for their nests. Concerning himself he says "I watch, and am as a sparrow upon the house-top" (cii. 7). When one of them has lost his mate—a matter of every-day occurrence—he will sit on the house-top alone, and lament by the hour his sad bereavement. These birds are snared and caught in great numbers; but, as they are small and not much relished for food, five sparrows may still be sold for two farthings; and, when we see their countless numbers, and the eagerness with which they are destroyed as a worthless nuisance, we can better appreciate the assurance that our heavenly Father, who takes care of them, so that not one can fall to the ground without his notice, will surely take care of us, who are of more value than many sparrows (Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6, 7)' (The Land and the Book, p. 43; comp. Mr. Tristram's article in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1364-1367).

SPARTA (1 Macc. xiv. 16). A celebrated city of Greece, in the Peloponnesus. The history of it must be sought from other sources. But it may be said here that, in Maccabean times, a relationship was believed to subsist between the Jews and Spartans, or Lacedæmonians (as they were also called); and a correspondence ensued between the two nations (xii. 1-23). The first letters passed probably in the time of the high-priest Onias III., but this is somewhat doubtful.

SPEAR. See ARMS, pp. 53, 54.

SPEARMEN (Acts xxiii. 23). These were probably light-armed troops.

SPELT (Isai. xxviii. 25, marg.; Ezek. iv. 9, marg.). In our version the Hebrew word is variously rendered 'rye' (Exod. ix. 32; Isai. xxviii. 25), 'fitches' (Ezek. iv. 9); the word 'spelt' being in two places added in the margin. The grain meant is probably spelt, Triticum spelta, a variety of wheat with a smooth or bald ear.

SPICE, SPICERY. The word is generally used among us in a comprehensive sense, including a variety of aromatic productions. Some of the Hebrew terms rendered 'spices' in our version appear to have similarly a wide meaning. The word néoth (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11) perhaps implies confusion, a breaking in pieces. It may therefore indicate some aromatic powder. But probably the general name was transferred to a certain kind of spice. And from the resemblance of the Arabic term it has been supposed to be the gum tragacanth, which exudes from the Astragalus tragacantha, a thorny shrub with lanceolate leaves found in Persia, Syria, and adjacent regions. This gum is generally white, sometimes brown or yellow, inodorous and tasteless, highly valued for its medicinal properties. A similar word occurs, rendered 'spicery' in 2 Kings xx. 13, marg.; Isai. xxxix. 2, marg.; but the meaning there is rather treasures.

Besem (with some variations of form), plur. besāmīm, is another word frequently translated 'spices' (e.g. Exod. xxv. 6, xxx. 23; 1 Kings x. 2, 10, 25): it would seem to imply aromatics, substances diffusing fragrance. The same word is joined with cinnamon (Exod. xxx. 23), indicating 'sweet cinnamon.' Among the aromatics thus designated was probably Arabic balsam, or balm of Gilead, Amyris (or Balsamodendron Gileadensis); and this may be the meaning in Sol. Song v. 13, vi. 2. There is another Hebrew term sammēm. This, like besem, denotes fragrance, and is coupled with incense (Exod. xxx. 7, marg.). It is probably a generic name for aromatic productions (34). The Greek word arōmata (Mark xvi. 1; Luke xxiii. 56, xxiv. 1; John xix. 40) seems to have been used in the same comprehensive way. The Hebrews were accustomed to season or flavour food and wine with spice (Sol. Song viii. 2; Ezek. xxiv. 10); the primary idea of the word rekahh, here used, being that of heating or boiling; and spices were employed for funeral burnings (2 Chron. xvi. 14). Apartments were also perfumed with aromatics (Prov. vii. 17).

SPIDER. The word rendered 'spider' in Prov. xxx. 28 was a species of poisonous lizard, perhaps one of the geckos. See LIZARD. But in Job viii. 14; Isai. lix. 5 the spider is really meant. The original term is compounded of two signifying respectively 'agile' and 'to weave:' it denotes, therefore, a swift weaver. The spider's web is most delicate and frail: hence the propriety of the illustration.

SPIKENARD. A substance highly valued from ancient times for its fragrance. The Hebrew word is nērd, probably akin to the Sanscrit narda, expressive of its fragrant qualities. It is mentioned in Sol. Song i. 12, iv. 13, 14, and appears to have been procured from an Indian plant of the family of the Valerianææ, known as the Nardostachys jatamansi. It must have been imported from India by way of Arabia. Spikenard is also noted as the precious perfume with which Mary of Bethany anointed our Lord (Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 3). It is there coupled with an epithet, pistike, occurring nowhere else, in regard to which critics have not been able to make up their minds. It has been supposed to designate the place from which the ointment came, to express its purity or genuineness, to signify that it was liquid or potable. One can only conjecture in such a diversity of opinions; but perhaps 'liquid' is the most probable interpretation. See Alford's note on Mark xiv. 3; Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Narde.'

SPIN, SPINNING. The Israelitish women are mentioned (Exod. xxxv. 25, 26) as spinning materials for the tabernacle. Spinning also is alluded to by our Lord (Matt. vi. 28; Luke xii. 27). The implements used are noted in Prov. xxxi. 19; whence we learn that distaff-spinning was the mode practised by the Hebrews. And this mode is represented in ancient Egyptian monuments, there being no trace of the use of a spinning-wheel. Distaff-spinning is still common in the east. Dr. Thomson observed it on Zion (The Land and the Book, p. 681); though he strangely confounds the distaff with the spindle. The wool or yarn is fastened upon the distaff, or sometimes without a distaff fixed to the girdle: the spindle is furnished with a whirl, most conveniently placed in the middle, by which it is twirled, and which steadies it as it descends drawing out and twisting the thread. Distaff-spinning was practised in England in the memory of many now living.

SPIRIT. The original words ruahh, Hebrew, and pneuma, Greek, rendered 'spirit' in our version, imply a breathing or blowing: the primary sense, therefore, is wind. Hence it is used for breath (2 Thess. ii. 8); the vital principle (Eccles. viii. 8); the rational immortal soul, by the possession of which man is distinguished from brute animals (Acts vii. 59; 1 Cor. v. 5, vi. 20, vii. 34): so it occurs in 1 Thess. v. 23, where it denotes the highest part of man, 'soul' in the same place being the 'animal soul, containing the passions and desires, which we have in common with the brutes, but which in us is ennobled and drawn up by the pneuma' (Alford). Further, the word 'spirit' implies the soul in its separate state (Heb. xii. 23); and hence a spectre or apparition (Job iv. 15; Luke xxiv. 37, 39). It is, moreover, used for super-human created beings, for angels (Heb. i. 14), and demons (Luke iv. 36, x. 20); and in fine for the Deity, the high uncreated Spirit (John iv. 24); but here specifically for the Holy Ghost (2 Cor. iii. 8). By a figure of speech the word 'spirit' often implies the disposition, mode of feeling, understanding, &c. (Isai. xix. 14, xxix. 24); and occasionally it is put in opposition to flesh (xxxi. 3). There can be little difficulty in comprehending such a use of the word.

SPIRIT, HOLY. See HOLY GHOST.

SPIRITUAL BODY (1 Cor. xv. 44). See RESURRECTION.

SPIRITUAL GIFT (Rom. i. 11). See GIFT.

SPIT (Numb. xii. 14; Deut. xxv. 9; Job xxx. 10; Isai. i. 6; Matt. xxvi. 67, xxvii. 30; Mark x. 34, xiv. 65, xv. 19; Luke xviii. 32). To spit on any one was a mark of rude contempt.

SPOIL. See BOOTY.

SPONGE, or SPUNGE. This is mentioned only in connection with our Lord's crucifixion (Matt. xxviii. 43; Mark xv. 36; John xix. 29). This substance is just upon the boundary of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, but is usually classed among zoophytes. The use of sponge is well known.

SPOUSE. See MARRIAGE.

SPRING. See SEASON.

SPRING, SPRINGS. See FOUNTAIN.

SPRINKLE, SPRINKLING. The words are often used symbolically, reference being made to the sprinklings prescribed by the Mosaic law (Heb. ix. 13, 19, 21, x. 22; 1 Pet. i. 2). See ATONEMENT, DAY OF, HEIFER, PURIFICATION.

STA'CHYS (an ear of corn). A Christian at Rome whom Paul salutes (Rom. xvi. 9).

STACTE. An aromatic gum or resin used for making the sacred perfume (Exod. xxx. 34). Its Hebrew name, nāṭaph, signifies a 'drop'; and it is so called because it flows out in drops. Stacte is a Greek word with a similar derivation. It is probably the resin of the Styrax officinale, or the Populus alba, white poplar. Duns says that 'the tree which produces stacte is the amyris, or Balsamodendron kataf of botanists. It was found by Prof. Ehrenberg on the borders of Arabia Felix' (Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. ii. p. 64).

STANDARD. It seems probable that the Hebrews had military standards or banners, under which their respective tribes or divisions were marshalled. These, if we may judge by the description of the encamping and marches in the wilderness, were of two kinds. Three tribes had a ensign, oth, for each particular tribe. (Numb. ii. 2). Of a standard-bearer the scripture says nothing: the passage (Isai. x. 18) where the word occurs in our version is rendered standard, degel, around which the tribesmen were to pitch, and under which they were to march; the four respectively being called the standards of the camps of Judah, of Reuben, of Ephraim, and of Dan, as those were the leading tribes of each division (Numb. i. 52, ii. 2, 3, 10, 18, 25, 34, x. 14, 18, 22, 25). Whether these standards were distinguished by any insignia or devices can only be matter of conjecture: according to the rabbins, the device of Judah was a lion; that for Reuben a man; for Ephraim an ox; and for Dan an eagle. The 'banner' of Sol. Song 1. 4 would seem to be a covering; but bannered hosts are also referred to (vi. 4, 10). Besides the divisional standards there was an by Gesenius 'as the sick man pineth away.' Egyptian standards consisted of some sacred emblem: Roman standards bore an eagle on a spear. This may illustrate Deut.

Standards, Assyrian. From the Nineveh marbles.

Standards, Egyptian. From Champollion.

Standards, Roman.

xxviii. 49; Matt. xxiv. 28; Luke xvii. 37, yet such application is doubtful.

STAR. The scientific knowledge of the stars, expressed by the term astronomy, was little cultivated by the Hebrews. The notices that we find of them in the Old Testament respect merely their numbers, the view they give of the glorious power of the Creator, and the perversion, to which the magnificent spectacle of the starry heavens led untutored men, of ascribing some influence over the world to those shining bodies, to which in consequence idolatrous reverence was paid. Some other ancient nations, as the Chaldeans, observed celestial phenomena; but their knowledge does not seem to have extended into Judea. In the New Testament there is reference to the use of the stars in navigation (Acts xxvii. 20).

The stars are mentioned in the history of creation but without a special note of time (Gen. i. 16). By 'stars' we are doubtless to understand here the heavenly bodies, whether planets or fixed stars; just as we frequently class them together in ordinary speech or writing. It is observable that more than once the stars are said in scripture to be innumerable by human calculation (xv. 5; Jer. xxxiii. 22). Now before the invention of the telescope the stars, so many of them as the naked eye could perceive, were to be numbered; and catalogues of them were formed. It would seem that a higher wisdom—that indeed of him who alone 'tellecth the' whole 'number of the stars, and calleth them all by their names' (Psal. cxlvii. 4), must have dictated such expressions. Of constellations, or 'seven stars,' occur in our version (Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31, 32; Amos v. 8): see the articles under those names, also MAZZAROTH. It was necessary to caution the Israelites against any worship of the starry host (Deut. iv. 19), a caution which their subsequent history showed they grievously disregarded (2 Kings xvii. 16, xxi. 3, xxxiii. 5).

Stars are sometimes symbolically put for rulers and princes (Dan. viii. 10); sometimes also for pastors and ministers (Rev. i. 16, 20). The angels, too, appear to be intended occasionally by the term (Job xxxviii. 7); and sometimes it points prophetically to the Lord of angels (Numb. xxiv. 17).

STAR IN THE EAST. One very remarkable incident of our Lord's early life is the visit of the eastern sages to him at Bethlehem. They had seen, they said, his star, and were come to worship him. And, when they had found him with his mother, they offered him gifts, gold, frankincense, and myrrh (Matt. ii. 1-12). This visit would seem to have been not before the purification of Mary; else she would not, as a very poor person, have offered only a pair of turtle-doves (Luke ii. 24). Some, laying stress on the expression of Herod's command for the slaughter of the children, 'from two years old and under,' place it considerably after the presentation. But Herod would be sure to take a large margin; and perhaps the star was first observed at the time of the miraculous conception. There can, however, be no certainty on points such as these.

It is a question why the sages came to connect the appearance of a star with the birth of a Jewish king. Possibly the words of Balaam's prophecy (Numb. xxiv. 17) might have lingered in the eastern mind. We are told, too, that there was at the time a special belief that some new dynasty would proceed from Judea. And it is most in accordance with the narrative that the sages received themselves some divine communication which led them when they perceived the signal to understand its meaning (see Mill's Myth. Interp. of the Gospels, part ii. chap. iii. sect. 1, pp. 303, 304).

Opinions differ as to the nature of the appearance: was it supernatural or of an ordinary character? It is asserted that there was at or near the time a remarkable conjunction of planets. On May 20, in the year of Rome 747, Jupiter and Saturn were in conjunction in the twentieth degree of the constellation Pisces. This, it has been thought, first arrested the attention of the sages, and incited them to commence their journey. The planets separated; but in a few months' time they closed again in a second and third conjunction, Oct. 27, in the sixteenth degree of Pisces, and Nov. 12, in the fifteenth degree. On these two last occasions to an ordinary eye they seemed to have become a single glorious star. And one of these last conjunctions, it has been thought, was that re-appearance so welcomed by the sages at Jerusalem, which directed them on to Beth-lehem. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Stern der Weisen.' This view has been adopted by Dr. Alford, note on Matt. ii. 2, who thinks that a force is put on the inspired narrative if it is regarded as implying a miracle. And the fact is insisted on that, May 20, the planets would appear together 'in the east' before sunrise, and that, Nov. 12, they would be at eight in the evening on the meridian, that is, looking from Jerusalem, in the direction of Beth-lehem. Stress has also been laid on the supposed association of the constellation Pisces with the land of Judea.

Still later calculations have modified the dates assigned, and have shown that the conjunctions were not so close as had been imagined. And, other considerations laid aside, there is one fatal objection to this theory. The star is said to have gone before the sages, 'till it came and stood over where the young child was' (Matt. ii. 9). Such language cannot be satisfied by a planetary conjunction, or the ordinary motion of a heavenly body. It certainly therefore seems more reasonable to believe that the 'star' was some luminous appearance, probably meteoric, extraordinarily appointed by the Deity for a special purpose. See Mill, ubi supr., pp. 304-306; Ellicott, Hist. Lect., lect. ii. pp. 72, 73.

STAR, MORNING. The Lord promises that he will bestow 'the morning star' (Rev. ii. 28). He is also himself 'the bright and morning star' (xxii. 16: comp. 2 Pet. i. 19). So he claims, says abb. Trench, 'all that is fairest and loveliest in creation as the faint shadow and image of his perfections. A comparison with that other passage . . . (xxii. 16) conclusively proves that, when Christ promises that he will give to his faithful ones the morning-star, he promises that he will give to them himself, that he will impart to them his own glory, and a share in his own royal dominion (comp. iii. 21); for the star . . . is evermore the symbol of royalty (Matt. ii. 2), being therefore linked with the sceptre (Numb. xxiv. 17). All the glory of the world shall end in being the glory of the church, if only this abide faithful to its Lord' (Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, 1861, pp. 142, 143).

STAR-GAZERS (Isai. xlvii. 13). The Chaldean astrologers 'divined by the rising and setting, the motions, aspects, colour, degree of light, &c. of the stars. They maintained that the stars had an influence over the natiivities of men.' They 'published a monthly table of the leading events that might be expected to happen' (Henderson, Isaiah, p. 368). See DIVINATION.

STAR (Matt. xvii. 27, marg.). A silver tetradrachm, a coin then common in the currency of Palestine. See MONEY.

STATUTE. See LAW.

STEEL (2 Sam. xxii. 35; Job xx. 24; Psal. xviii. 34; Jer. xv. 12). It cannot be doubted that the Egyptians were acquainted with steel; as existing monuments show. But it is questioned whether the Hebrews used it. The words so rendered in our version imply rather copper. But perhaps the 'northern iron' in the passage last cited may intend iron hardened by some process which would make it nearly analogous to our steel. And there is a word occurring in Nah. ii. 3, translated 'torches,' which is thought to signify steel. See IRON.

STEPHANAS (crown). A Corinthian Christian whose house or family St. Paul baptized (1 Cor. i. 16). His household is afterwards mentioned with commendation, and his coming to the apostle with Fortunatus and Achaicus, perhaps members of the household, is noted (xvi. 15-17).

STEPHEN (id.). An eminent early disciple. His personal history is soon told. He was of the seven chosen to superintend the ministrations to the necessitous of the church. He was 'full of faith and power,' and 'did great wonders and miracles among the people.' He disputed successfully with many opposers, who, being utterly unable 'to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake,' seized him and placed him before the council on an accusation of blasphemy. Stephen nobly defended himself, and charged home upon the Jews their sin in murdering the Messiah. Maddened they rushed upon him, cast him out of the city, and stoned him—the first martyr for his Master's cause, whose eye he caught, whose spirit he evinced in praying for his murderers, and to whose blissful presence he was speedily welcomed. The witnesses had laid their clothes at the feet of Saul, then one of the most eager of the persecutors, but afterwards the great apostle Paul. And, as, on the persecution thus raised against the infant church, the disciples were scattered, the gospel was more widely preached through Judea and Samaria, and many believed (Acts vi., vii., viii. 1-4, xi. 19, xxii. 20). It has been said that Stephen was one of the seventy, but there is no proof of this; and nothing more is certainly known of the protomartyr; whose death, variously dated, probably occurred about 36 A.D.

But his speech before the council requires some consideration. It has been asserted that there are demonstrable errors in it. Even if there were, the Christian believer would have no ground for uneasiness: the credit of the sacred record, faithfully delivering what Stephen said, would not be in the slightest measure impeached. But it is a bold charge to bring against such a disputant. And, if Stephen did make glaring mistakes, it is a marvel that his opponents, most learned Jews, did not detect and expose them. To prove the champion of the gospel but meanly acquainted with the Old Testament scriptures would have been a mighty argument against him. The almost-inevitable conclusion is that the Jews could perceive no flaw in Stephen's reasoning, that they could not gainsay his facts. It would seem safer, then, to doubt whether we have not misapprehended Stephen's expressions than hastily to believe him in error (see Davidson, Sacr. Hermeneutics, chap. xii. pp. 586, 587).

It is first objected that Stephen places Abraham's call while he was yet in Mesopotamia, the land of the Chaldeans (Acts vii. 2-4); whereas in the original history it is represented as given when he dwelt in Haran (Gen. xii. 1-4). It might be replied that very likely there were two calls, two divine monitions—one to leave the original seat of his family, the other to proceed on from Haran, where he had settled for awhile, into Canaan the land of promise. But it seems most probable that the call mentioned in Gen. xii. 1 was prior to the arrival at Haran. For it required Abraham to quit his 'country;' and his country was certainly Ur of the Chaldees. Our version therefore rightly reads, 'Now the Lord had said.' The heavenly voice had sounded to the patriarch in his original seat; and he had obeyed it. Part of the way his family had accompanied him; and they had taken up their abode in Haran. But Abraham knew that that was not his ultimate destination. He would not quit his aged father; but he felt that he was to journey onwards. And so when Terah was dead, though few of his kindred would travel on with him, carrying fully out the divine command he entered Canaan.

Another objection is that Stephen reckons Jacob's family at 75 (Acts vii. 14); while the Old Testament narrative speaks of but 70 (Gen. xlv. 27). Perhaps the simplest solution is the best. The Septuagint version of the original passage has 75: Stephen, therefore, was satisfied to cite a translation which was in every one's hands, and generally esteemed of authority. Other explanations have been given. That of Dr. Hales is approved by many. Slightly modifying the theory of bishop Kidder, he thinks that 66 of Jacob's seed went down into Egypt (26), and adds nine wives; for Judah's was dead, and Simeon's he supposes dead also. Thus the sum of 75 is obtained (A New Analysis of Chronol., vol. ii. p. 144, edit. 1830). But this is manifestly faulty. There would be more than nine wives. Tamar cannot be excluded. Simeon most probably had two wives; for one of his sons is said to be by a Canaanitish woman, which by no means implies that the mother of his other children was dead. And, as Asher had grandsons, his son Berlah was married. Dr. Wordsworth's explanation is in some respects preferable: 'The number 75 which St. Stephen specifies consists of the 70 mentioned Genesis xvi. 27, together with the issue of the sons of Joseph's own sons, Ephraim and Manasseh—Machir (son of Manasseh), Galaad (son of Machir) Satalaim, Taam (sons of Ephraim), Edom (son of Satalaim)' (N. Test., 1861, Acts of the Apostles, p. 32). There is, however, an objection to this hypothesis. If great-grandsons of Joseph are to be reckoned, as it is manifest that they were born long after Jacob's descent into Egypt, it is not clear why other descendants of the other patriarchs should not be reckoned also. The 'kindred' of Joseph are spoken of (Acts vii. 14); and, if an exact computation is to be made of those whom Joseph called to him, we have hardly sufficient information from Genesis to decide who must and who must not be included. So it is more likely as observed above, that Stephen was content to cite the Septuagint. The Jewish rulers could not fairly charge him with mistake for this.

There is yet another objection made. Stephen, it is urged, wrongly asserts that Jacob was buried at Sychem, and that Abraham bought a sepulchre of the sons of Emmor (Hamor) (15, 16; comp. Gen. xxiii. 16-18, xxxiii. 18, 19, 1. 13; Josh. xxiv. 32). But this difficulty may be satisfactorily explained if we attend to the peculiar mode in which reference is made to the Old Testament. Stephen was speaking to those who knew the law, who were quick to catch an allusion, to whom therefore a word was sufficient to indicate the speaker's meaning and the facts intended. To men unacquainted with the sacred history a longer explanation would have been needful. 'Two facts'—the purchase of the sepulchre near Mamre by Abraham, where Jacob was buried, and the purchase of a field at Sychem, where Joseph was buried—'these two facts,' says Dr. Lee, 'St. Stephen combines in a single phrase; and this same system of combination is constantly repeated throughout his address: e.g. cf. ver. 7 with Gen. xv. 13, 14 and Exod. iii. 12; add, too, the statement of ver. 9. Compare, especially, the reference of ver. 43, "I will carry you away beyond Babylon," with the denunciation of Amos (v. 27) against the ten tribes: "Therefore will I cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus;" in which words the deportation to Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 6) is alone spoken of. Babylon, however, as the prophets declared, was to be the exile of disobedient Judah; and both denunciations are here combined by St. Stephen. So also, in the passage before us, it is with similar brevity implied that Jacob was laid in the grave which Abraham had purchased in Hebron, Gen. xxiii. 19, 1. 13, and Joseph in the possession which Jacob had purchased at Sychem, xxxiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32' (The Inspiration of Holy Scripture, App.

H. pp. 533, 534; see also Dr. Fairbairn, Herm. Man., pp. 100-103; and some sensible observations in Birks, The Bible and Modern Thought, 1862, pp. 303-305).

STEWARDS. An officer of trust, having charge of his master's establishment and property (Gen. xv. 2; Luke xii. 42). Hence ministers, as bearing a weighty charge, are called 'stewards of the mysteries of God' (1 Cor. iv. 1, 2; Tit. i. 7); and the appellation is extended to Christians generally (1 Pet. iv. 10).

STOCKS. A wooden frame in which the feet, hands, and neck of a person were so fastened, that his body was held bent (Jer. xx. 2, 3, xxix. 26). The 'prison-house' of 2 Chron. xvi. 10 would seem to have been a place where this instrument of punishment stood. A different word occurs in Job xiii. 27, xxxiii. 11: it signifies stocks like ours, in which the feet alone were confined. And such were the 'stocks' of Acts xvi. 24. But the sufferer might be tortured in these by having his legs drawn far apart.

STOICS. A sect of Grecian philosophers who derived their name from stoa, 'a porch,' because Zeno their founder in the fourth century before Christ, and succeeding leaders, as Cleanthes and Chrysippus, used to teach in the painted porch or colonnade at Athens. In their physical doctrines they maintained two first principles, the active and the passive: the passive was matter: the active was God, who was one, though called by many names. Of him they pantheistically believed that all souls were emanations. They held the entire independence of man, the truly-wise being sufficient in himself, but subject equally with the Deity to inexorable fate. Each person was to live according to the nature of things in general; while as to a future life their notions varied. Some held that all souls were re-absorbed into the Deity; others held the separate existence of all, or of only the good, till the general conflagration. The humbling doctrines of the cross, the preaching of Jesus and the resurrection would, it is clear, be distasteful to such philosophers (Acts xvii. 18). Epictetus and the emperor Marcus Aurelius were Stoics. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Stoiker'; Alfred, note on Acts xvii. 18.

STOMACHER (Isai. iii. 24). Probably a kind of wide mantle, or holiday dress.

STONE. A material largely used in building. Rude heaps were sometimes raised to preserve the memory of any noticeable event, as upon the place where Achan was executed (Josh. vii. 26), and in the pit where Absalom's corpse was cast (2 Sam. xviii. 17). These were like the cairns on the tops of mountains or in celebrated places in our own country. Sometimes these monuments appear to have been more carefully constructed, as the two erections of twelve stones each, which were set up in the bed of the Jordan, and at the first encampment in Canaan, to commemorate the passage of the river (Josh. iv. 2-9). Single stones were occasionally placed as memorials; and these were sometimes anointed or consecrated. Examples are that of Jacob at Beth-el (Gen. xxviii. 18), that set by Joshua under the oak at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26, 27), and that which Samuel called Eben-ezer (1 Sam. vii. 12). Heaps of stones were also made at the ratification of a covenant, as at that between Jacob and Laban (Gen. xxxi. 46-52). And a remarkable stone was sometimes a boundary-mark (Josh. xv. 6). Large hewn stones were employed in the erection of the temple and other splendid structures (1 Kings v. 17; Ezra vi. 4; Amos v. 11; Mark xiii. 1, 2). The stones of an altar were not to be hewn (Exod. xx. 25): those of the temple were cut and squared (1 Kings vi. 18), all prepared before they were actually built into the walls (vii. 7), very probably in the quarries which may yet be seen under part of Jerusalem (Buchanan's Notes of a Cler. Furlough, chap. v. pp. 196, 197). These stones were of huge size, many of them yet remaining—not so much bevelled, as travellers often describe them, as panelled, a border round the edges being slightly depressed or cut out.

Stones had to be gathered from cultivated ground (Isa. v. 2): hence enemies tried to destroy fertile plots by casting stones thereon (2 Kings iii. 19, 25). For the 'burdensome stone' of Zech. xii. 3, see GAMES, p. 312; and for the striking fire by means of stones, see 2 Macc. x. 3.

The term is often used figuratively or in symbol, as of Messiah (Psal. cxviii. 22; Isa. xxviii. 16; Matt. xxi. 42; Acts iv. 11; Rom. ix. 38; Eph. ii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 6-8), of his church or kingdom (Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44, 45), of believers built up into a holy temple (1 Pet. ii. 4, 5), also to denote hardness or insensibility (1 Sam. xxv. 37). There is a remarkable promise given to the church in Pergamos, that to him that overcame the Lord would give 'a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it' (Rev. ii. 17). Various interpretations may be seen in Dr. Alford's note on the place. Perhaps the most satisfactory is that proposed by abp. Trench. He regards this stone as the diamond, not dead-white but lustrous, with an allusion to Urim and Thummim, which the high priest alone saw, and which might have the incommunicable name graven thereupon. The faithful victor who received the stone (not the name) was privileged to look upon that name, an emblem this of a full fruition of the Godhead by those who enter his glorious paradise (Comm. on Epistles to Sev. Churches, pp. 119-127). See URIM. For mill-stone see MILL.

STONE, STONING. See PUNISHMENTS.

STONES, PRECIOUS. Many gems or precious stones are mentioned in scripture, used as ornaments of dress or for sacred purposes, as in the high priest's breast-plate. The art of engraving upon them was known to the Hebrews. An endeavour is made, so far as possible, to identify these precious stones in the articles under their respective headings. The following are the names as they occur in our version:—

Agate (Exod. xxxix. 12)

Amethyst (Exod. xxxix. 12; Rev. xxi. 20)

Beryl (Exod. xxxix. 13; Ezek. xxviii. 13; Rev. xxi. 20)

Carbuncle (Exod. xxxix. 10; Ezek. xxviii. 13)

Chalcedony (Rev. xxi. 19)

Chrysolite (Ezek. xxviii. 13, marg.; Rev. xxi. 20)

Chrysope, or Chrysoprasus (Ezek. xxviii. 13, marg.; Rev. xxi. 20)

Diamond (Exod. xxxix. 11; Ezek. xxviii. 13)

Emerald (Exod. xxxix. 11; Ezek. xxviii. 13; Rev. iv. 3, xxi. 19)

Jacinth (Rev. xxi. 20)

Jasper (Exod. xxxix. 13; Ezek. xxviii. 13; Rev. iv. 3, xxi. 18, 19)

Ligure (Exod. xxxix. 12)

Onyx (Gen. ii. 12; Exod. xxxix. 6, 13; Ezek. xxviii. 13)

Ruby (Job xxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 15)

Sapphire (Exod. xxxix. 11; Ezek. xxviii. 13; Rev. xxi. 19)

Sardine, or Sardius (Exod. xxxix. 10; Ezek. xxviii. 13; Rev. iv. 3, xxi. 20)

Sardonyx (Rev. xxi. 20)

Topaz (Exod. xxxix. 10; Ezek. xxviii. 13; Rev. xxi. 20)

Precious stones are figuratively introduced to express value, beauty, continuance, &c. (e.g. Isa. liv. 11, 12; Lam. iv. 7).

STORAX (Ecclus. xxiv. 15). Perhaps the Styrax officinale.

STORK. A well-known bird, of which one of the most common species is the white stork, Ciconia alba: the eating of it was forbidden to the Hebrews (Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18). Its habits are alluded to in Psal. civ. 17; Jer. viii. 7; Zech. v. 9. The Hebrew name signifies 'affectionate,' expressive of the tenderness subsisting between the parent-birds and the offspring. The stork is migratory, arriving in Palestine in the latter part of March: it feeds on frogs, snakes, eels, &c., and has in many countries been regarded as sacred, and not to be molested. It builds its nest in cedars, pines, and firs, and in towers and old ruins. The black stork, Ciconia nigra, is as common in Palestine as the white species. It builds in trees, and in the marshy places in forests. In Job xxxix. 13 the word occurs in the margin of our version; but Gesenius would translate, 'the wing of the ostrich exults; but are her pinions and feathers plious?' i.e. she is not affectionate towards her young: comp. Carey's version, under OSTRICH, p. 652.

STRAIN AT (Matt. xxiii. 24). See GNAT.

STRAKES (Ezek. i. 18). A word used for both the tire and the nave of a wheel.

STRANGER. See ALIEN, HOSPITALITY.

STRAW. The Egyptians anciently reaped their corn close to the ear, and then cut off the straw close upon the ground. This was the straw that was chopped up and mixed with clay to make bricks more compact and tenacious. When it was refused by Pharaoh to the Israelites, they had to gather stubble, probably the short straw still left (Exod. v. 6-18). This useless stubble was often burnt (Isa. v. 24). Straw, perhaps sometimes mingled with beans, &c., was generally used in Palestine as fodder or provender (Gen. xxiv. 25; 1 Kings iv. 28; Isa. xi. 7).

STRAW (Sol. Song ii. 5, marg.; Matt. xxv 24, 26) An old form of strew.

STREET. See CITIES.

SUAH (sweepings). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 36).

SUBA (1 Esdr. v. 34).

SUBAI (1 Esdr. v. 30). Shalmal or Sham-lai (Ezra ii. 46).

SUBURBS. See CITIES.

SUC'COTH (booths).—1. A place in the neighbourhood of the Jordan, where Jacob, after his interview with Esau, constructed a habitation for himself, and made booths for his cattle (Gen. xxxiii. 17). It was evidently to the south of the Jabbok, and as it was assigned to the tribe of Gad (Josh. xiii. 27) it must have been to the east of the Jordan. The inhabitants of this city churlishly refused assistance to Gideon when pursuing the Midianites: they were therefore on his triumphant return severely punished (Judges viii. 5-8, 14-16). Succoth is afterwards mentioned in 1 Kings vii. 46; 2 Chron. iv. 17; Psal. lx. 6, cviii. 7. Some critics identify it with Sukkot or Sakat, not far from Beth-shan; but this must be an error, as it would then have been on the west of the Jordan. See Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. i. p. 135. Dr. Thomson appears to adopt the same view (The Land and the Book, p. 456).—2. The first encampment of the Israelites as they were departing from Egypt (Exod. xii. 37, xiii. 20; Numb. xxxiii. 5, 6). Nothing is known of this place: most probably it was merely a station where caravans were accustomed to halt, and where the Hebrews sheltered themselves as well as they could, for the short time they remained there, in booths or temporary sheds.

SUC'COTH-BENO'TH (tabernacles of daughters). The Babylonians who were brought to colonize Samaria are said to have made Succoth-benoth, that is, it is usually explained, booths, in which the women prostituted themselves in honour of the Babylonian Mylitta, or Mulla (2 Kings xvii. 30). But possibly they were only little tent-temples, which were regarded as holy and worshipped with the gods they contained. See Keil, Comm. on Books of Kings, vol. ii. pp. 72, 73. Sir H. Rawlinson believes that Succoth-benoth represents the Chaldean goddess Zir-banit, worshipped (with her husband Bel-merodach) at Babylon, and called queen of the place (Rawlinson's Herod., vol. i. p. 630).

SUCHA'THITES. The inhabitants of some place not ascertained (1 Chron. ii. 55).

SUD (1 Esdr. v. 29). Siaha, or Sia (Ezra ii. 44; Neh. vii. 47).

SUD (Bar. i. 4). A river, of which nothing is known.

SU'DIAS (1 Esdr. v. 26). Perhaps Hoda-viah, or Hodevah (Ezra ii. 40; Neh. vii. 43).

SUET (Lev. iii. 3). See FAT.

SUK'KIIMS (dwellers in tents). An African people mentioned in the Lubim (Lybians) and Ethiopians as forming a portion of Shishak's host when he marched against Jerusalem (2 Chron. xii. 3). They were perhaps the Troglodytes of the mountains along the western coast of the Red sea. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Suchim.'

SUMMER (Gen. viii. 22). See SEASON.

SUN. The sun and the moon are first mentioned in Gen. i. 14-16, as being the great visible light-bearers of the heaven. By their motions and their influence upon the earth the days and nights would be marked and divided, the seasons distinguished, and the years measured. Some have imagined that, when it is said also that these luminaries are to be for 'signs,' meteorological phenomena like eclipses are intended, as in Jer. x. 2; Luke xxi. 25 (see Bush, Notes on Gen., p. 32); but the notion is far-fetched and groundless.

The worship of the sun was probably one of the earliest forms of idolatry. In the clear eastern sky the heavenly bodies make their influence more sensibly felt. Among these the sun shines pre-eminent, the great quickener of nature, the source of light and heat, the central power of the visible universe. And it was hardly to be wondered at when men, who had strayed from original teaching, followed the debased notions of their own hearts, and adored the created glory instead of the great Creator (see Job xxxi. 26, 27). Perhaps at first sun-worship was practised with less grossness than in subsequent times. It was the luminary itself, or rather the principle of life and generation signified by it, that attracted reverence. Thus among the Persians it was the eye of Ormuzd, darting forth its rays of light and heat, and purifying creatures and matter; and three times a day was prayer addressed to it. No temple was erected, no images formed of that which, as its manifestation was ever visible, required no symbolic representation. So, though in Greece statues were sometimes erected, yet frequently, as at Corinth in the Acropolis, and elsewhere, there were only altars to the sun. And so in Rome: altars were built to it in the open air. This kind of veneration prevailed for a long time. The Essenes had a peculiar reverence for the sun: they would not say a word on profane matters before sunrise; and they studiously kept out of his sight whatever they supposed unclean or offensive (see Döllinger, The Gentile and the Jew, transl., book x. 1, vol. ii. p. 314). But the worship of the sun-god assumed grosser forms. In Lydia it was Sandon, probably corresponding to the Greek Heracles: at Emesa in Syria as Elagabal it was imaged by a round black stone running to a point and honoured with abominable rites: in Egypt it was Ra or Re the king and father of gods, whose principal seat was at Heliopolis or On; the daily rising of the sun representing the eternal and divine generation of Ra (ibid., book vi. 1, 4, 5, vol. i. pp. 379, 431, 438, 439).

Many of the various forms of idolatry with which the Hebrews were brought into contact had their origin in sun-worship, as that of Baal and others. But, though these false deities were honoured among them, it is not clear that they practised literal sun-worship till the later periods of their history. They had been warned against it (Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3); but we find that such kings as Manasseh and Amon dedicated horses (a custom received through Assyria) and chariots, and burnt incense on the house-tops to the sun (2 Kings xxiii.

11; Jer. xix. 13). Possibly the expression 'putting the branch to the nose' (Ezek. viii. 17) may refer to a Persian rite in sun-worship; this, however, is doubtful. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Sonne.'

Various symbolical notices of the sun are found in scripture. The glory of God is displayed in the sun's daily course (Psal. xix. 4-6); whence the psalmist takes occasion to illustrate the purity and power of the divine law. Sometimes God himself is described as a sun (lxxxiv. 11); and sometimes Messiah is so designated (Mal. iv. 2); the reference of the words 'with healing in his wings' being to the healthful breeze which at sunrise is felt on the Mediterranean coast (see HEAL, HEALING). Occasionally the sun-light illustrates the glory of heavenly beings or mansions (Isai. lx. 20; Matt. xvii. 2; Rev. i. 16, x. 1); and sometimes its darkening betokens the fall of the civil state of kingdoms (vi. 12).

SUPERSTITION, SUPERSTITIOUS (Acts xvii. 22, xxv. 19). The words are not used in a bad sense—properly 'demon-fearing' in the first place, i.e. carrying your religious reverence too far.

SUP'PHAH (Numb. xxi. 14, marg.). See VAHEB.

SUPPER. See MEALS, LORD'S SUPPER.

SUR (removed, driven out). A gate at which Jehoiada stationed guards, when Joash was to be placed on the throne (2 Kings xi. 6). The same gate is called 'of the foundation' (1 Chron. xxiii. 5). It is questioned whether it was a gate of the temple or of the palace. But the connection decides that it must have been a temple-gate. The rabbins say it was the eastern gate of the court, and explain its name, because the unclean were there commanded to depart. See Lam. iv. 15.

SUR (Judith ii. 23). It is not known what place is here meant.

SURETY. One who becomes responsible for another. Solomon gives many emphatic warnings against unadvised suretiship (Prov. vi. 1-5, xi. 15, xvii. 18, xx. 16, xxii. 26, 27). In Heb. vii. 22 our Lord is said to be the 'surety of a better testament': 'in his person' says dean Alford, 'security and certainty is given to men that a better covenant' than that of the Mosaic dispensation 'is made and sanctioned by God.'

SUS'A (Rest of Esth. xi. 3, xvi. 18). Shushan.

SUSAN'CHITES. The inhabitants of Shushan or Susa, who had been placed as colonists in Samaria (Ezra iv. 9).

SUSAN'NA (lily). One of the women who ministered to our Lord (Luke viii. 3).

SUSAN'NA (Hist. Sus.). The heroine of an apocryphal story.

SUSAN'NA, HISTORY OF. See DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO.

SU'SI (horseman). Father of the spy chosen from the tribe of Manasseh (Numb. xiii. 11).

SWALLOW. A bird belonging to the Hirundinidae, an insectivorous family, in which the powers of flight are highly developed, while the feet are little adapted for progression on the ground. The Hirundinidae are widely diffused, and are migratory, especially in latitudes where the supply of insect-food, taken on the wing, fails in the autumn. Various species frequent Syria and Palestine identical with those we have, as the swift, Cypselus apus, the Egyptian dururi; the chimney-swallow, Hirundo rustica; the martin, Hirundo or Chelidon urbica; and the sand-martin, Hirundo or Cotyle riparia. The Hebrew word deror (Psal. lxxxiv. 3; Prov. xxvi. 2) implies 'gyration'; another, 'agor (Isai. xxxviii. 14; Jer. viii. 7), 'twittering'; both words sufficiently appropriate. Some, however, render the last 'a crane.' And this is probably the true meaning.

SWAN. An unclean aquatic bird (Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 16). The Hebrew term so translated is derived from a verb signifying 'to respire': it probably means the pelican, Pelecanus onocrotalus, receiving the name from its pouch, which it can extend by inflation. Mr. Tristram, however, thinks that the original points to some water-fowl, and is inclined to identify the bird in question with the purple water-hen, Porphyrio antiquorum, which frequents marshes and the sedge by the banks of rivers in the regions bordering on the Mediterranean, and abounds in Lower Egypt (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1392).

SWEAR, SWEARING. See OATH.

SWEAT, BLOODY (Luke xxii. 44). See AGONY.

SWINE. The flesh of this animal was strictly forbidden to the Hebrews (Lev. xi. 7; Deut. xiv. 8). Perhaps the prohibition was medically advisable. But, though to a conscientious Jew swine's flesh was abominable, yet it seems to have been offered in idol-worship, and the worshipper no doubt feasted on the sacrifice (Isai. lv. 4, lxvi. 3, 17). Wild hogs (Sus scrofa) are now common on the Syrian hills; perhaps they were equally common in ancient times (Psal. lxxx. 13). And certainly in our Lord's days the breeding of swine was usual (Matt. vii. 6, viii. 30-32; Luke xv. 15, 16; 2 Pet. ii. 22). The permission given by him to the devils he had cast out from a man to enter a herd of swine, which speedily precipitated themselves into the water, has been much canvassed: commentaries must be consulted by those who desire a full explanation; but see DEMONIAK, p. 212. Also it may be observed here that it is not clear that Christ intended a punishment on those who kept the swine as transgressors of the law. The inhabitants of that region were mainly Gentile.

SWORD. See ARMS, pp. 52, 53. The word is often used typically, as the ensign of power (Rom. xiii. 4), and the symbol of the divine judgments (Deut. xxxii. 41; Ezek. xiv. 14, 17, xxi. 3, 9, 11). The word of God is called 'the sword of the Spirit' (Eph. vi. 17).

SYCAMINE-TREE. This must be carefully distinguished from the sycamore. It is mentioned but once (Luke xvii. 6); and there can be little doubt that the mulberry-tree, Morus nigra, is intended. It is a native of Persia; and its indigenous range is extensive. It is abundant at present in Palestine. Dr. Thomson thus describes the tât shamý, or Damascus mulberry, near Ramleh: 'It is grown for its fruit, not for the silkworm. Pass this way in the middle of May, and you will find these trees bending under a load of berries so exactly resembling our largest blackberries in America that you cannot distinguish them from each other. There are more of these Damascus mulberry-trees here than all I have seen elsewhere in my life; and they yield their glossy black fruit more abundantly than in other places. It has a sharper acid than that of the ripe blackberry, and when eaten in large quantities is unhealthy' (The Land and the Book, p. 528).

SYCAMORE-TREE. The tree so called in scripture is not the sycamore of this country, which is a species of maple: it rather belongs to the genus Ficus, and may be identified with the Ficus sycamoros or sycamore-fig. It is common both in Egypt and Syria. It is a tender tree, flourishing in sandy plains and warm valleys, but is not hardy enough for the mountain, and would be killed by a sharp frost (Psal. lxxviii. 47). It is lofty and wide-spreading, often planted by the wayside over which its arms extend, just adapted to the purpose for which Zaccheus selected it (Luke xix. 4). The sycamore yields several crops of figs in the year; which grow on short stems along the trunk and large branches. These figs are generally small and insipid, and are eaten by only the humbler classes (Amos vii. 14). It is easily propagated by planting a branch in the ground and watering it till it has struck out roots into the soil. The roots are thick and numerous, spreading deeply in the earth; and the tree itself is large and solid. Hence, Dr. Thomson imagines that our Lord's words (Luke xvii. 6) refer to the sycamore. But see SYCAMINE-TREE. Though of great size and apparent solidity, the wood is soft and of little value (1 Kings x. 27; Isai. ix. 10): in Egypt, however, where other trees were not common, it has been used for making mummy-cases, and it is said to be durable. See The Land and the Book, pp. 22-24.

SYCHAR (drunken). A name given, probably in opprobrium, by the Jews to Shechem (John iv. 5): see SHECHEM. But Dr. Thomson, observing that Shechem possesses abundance of water, considers it unlikely that the Samaritan woman would have gone to a distance to draw out of an immensely-deep well. He therefore believes that Sychar was a place a little way off, and says there is now a village called Aschâr, which he identifies with it (The Land and the Book, pp. 472, 473).

SYCHEM (Acts vii. 16). Shechem.

SYCHEMITE (Judith v. 16). An inhabitant of Sychem or Shechem.

SYELUS (1 Esdr. i. 8). Jehiel (2 Chron. xxxv. 8).

SYENE (opening or key, sc. of Egypt). A city in the southern extremity of Egypt, on the eastern bank of the Nile, just under the tropic of Cancer. This place is mentioned when the whole extent of Egypt is described, 'from Migdol to Syene' (Ezek. xxix. 10, marg., xxx. 6, marg.; the marginal version being preferable). The modern Assuan or Assouan lies to the north-east of Syene. It was a place of considerable note in the middle ages, and is still of some consequence. There are various remains, some of the ancient Egyptian town. The Arab ruins are grouped on a rock to the east; while below Roman monuments may be distinguished.

SYMEON (2 Pet. i. 1, marg.). A form of Simon: comp. Acts xv. 14.

SYMPHONY (Dan. iii. 5, marg.). See DULCIMER.

SYNAGOGUE. A name applied generally in the New Testament to the Jewish places of ordinary worship. It is a Greek word signifying 'an assemblage' or gathered meeting.

We can discover little proof of the existence of such assemblies in Old Testament times. The sanctuary or the temple was the recognized place of the solemn services of the law; there alone according to the strict letter of the command were sacrifices to be offered. It is true that the history furnishes us with many exceptions, apparently not disapproved by God; and there was always a disposition among the people to have local centres of worship; whence the sacrifices and incense-burning in the high places. But such worship often degenerated into idolatry. We cannot suppose that there were in those times no gatherings for religious instruction and prayer, though they may not have assumed the regular form in which we find them in later days. The Jews indeed hold this form to be of extreme antiquity. Without accepting their belief we may observe that the instruction given in the schools of the prophets was to a certain extent public (1 Sam. xix. 20-24), that the new-moons and sabbaths were distinguished at least by social gatherings (xx. 5, 24-27), or by resort to some prophetic man (2 Kings iv. 23), that households were sometimes collected for solemn blessing (2 Sam. vi. 20)—a king's household must have formed a congregation—that occasionally special missionaries were appointed to traverse the country, reading the law and teaching the people (2 Chron. xvii. 7-9), and that this teaching appears to have been the recognized office of the Levites (xxx. 22, xxxv. 3), even though in times of degeneracy the duty was neglected by them. All these notices certainly imply that there were occasional gatherings; and consequently there must have been places where such gatherings could be held. But yet it must be fairly conceded that of synagogue-worship in its ordinary meaning as an established regular institution we do not hear till after the exile. The mention of synagogues in Psal. lxxiv. 8 tells little. The psalm could not have been written before the captivity—perhaps it might be even posterior to the return. During the abode at Babylon, certainly, religious assemblies were held. The elders were in the habit of resorting to the prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. viii. 1, xiv. 1, xx. 1, xxxiii. 31). Such assemblies were then the more necessary, because, with the temple in ruins and the people in captivity, the sacrifices of the law could not be offered. And we may believe that the custom was carried back by the exiles when they returned into Judea. Some have imagined that they observe traces of synagogue-worship in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah: the passages, however, relied on are not very appropriate. Possibly in 1 Macc. iii. 46 there may be a reference to a synagogue; and indisputably long before our Lord's time the system must have been matured; for we not only see it in full operation then, but we find it noticed by St. James as of old-established authority, not alone in Palestine, but wherever else the Jews were dispersed (Acts xv. 21). And thus a most effective means was provided for imbuing the Jewish mind with scripture-knowledge, and disseminating some at least of that knowledge among the Gentiles. The way of the Lord Messiah was being prepared.

The services of the synagogue consisted of three parts—prayer, reading the scriptures, and exposition of them, or preaching.

1. There is every reason to believe that forms of prayers were used in very early times; and nineteen collects still exist and are found in Jewish liturgies, which are considered of great antiquity. There were originally eighteen; to which another was subsequently added. Probably some of them were in use in the time of Christ. These nineteen prayers are translated and printed in Prideaux' Connection, vol. i. pp. 327-329; and in Horne's Introd., vol. iii. pp. 285-288. 2. The law and the prophets were read in distinct portions; the law being divided into fifty-three or fifty-four perashioth or sections, and certain lessons or haphtharoth being appointed from the prophets: these also may be seen in Horne, ubi supr., pp. 281, 282. Prior to these lessons the following passages were read: Deut. vi. 4-9, xi. 13-21; Numb. xv. 37-41 (see Westcott, Introd. to the Gospels, chap. i. p. 53, note 2). 3. The third part of the service was exposition, or preaching to the people. It would seem that sometimes this exposition accompanied the reading of the scripture; for our Lord while officiating in the synagogue at Nazareth began to speak immediately after he had read the lesson (Luke iv. 16-27). Sometimes the address was not till after the reading of the law and the prophets was finished, and the ruler had invited persons, strangers it might be, if they had any word of exhortation for the people, to give it (Acts xiii. 14, 15). A certain precedence, moreover, seems to have been allowed to the priests, whose peculiar functions were at an end on the destruction of the temple. They alone pronounced the benediction of Numb. vi. 24-26.

The officers of the synagogue were the following: the 'ruler,' of whom in considerable places there seem to have been several, a kind of college of elders: they were to be men of age and station; and one of their number presided over the rest (Mark v. 22; Luke xiii. 14; Acts xiii. 15): these rulers of course exercised the principal authority. The next in place was the angel or messenger of the congregation: he is not mentioned in scripture, unless there be an allusion to his name in Rev. i. 20, ii. 1, 8, 12, 18, iii. 1, 7, 14: he was so termed because he was the delegate who offered the prayers in the name of the people. The reader was sometimes a stated officer, more usually called on for the time. This office our Lord exercised on the occasion already referred to at Nazareth. And there was a minister or servant (Luke iv. 20), who had duties of a lower kind: he prepared the synagogue for service, took charge of the books, &c. There were collectors of alms, and probably also several assistants, ten they are said to have been; but their functions have been much questioned. The chief seats were coveted (Matt. xxiii. 6) by the scribes and Pharisees (see Winer, Bibl. RWB, art. 'Synagogen'; and Alford, note on Matt. iv. 23-25). It has been thought that the organization of the Christian church, with its presiding bishop, a body of elders or presbyters, and deacons was influenced by the forms of the synagogue-establishment.

The days on which worship was performed in the synagogue were the second, fifth, and seventh or sabbath: the hours of prayer were the third, sixth, and ninth, in conformity with the temple-worship. Synagogues of course varied in size. In the larger towns they were numerous. In Jerusalem there are said to have been 460 or 480; some being appropriated to particular classes of persons (Acts vii. 9). In Damascus it is evident that there were many (ix. 2, 20). It is noted in the Talmud, from a perverted exposition of Numb. xiii. 27, as if the ten unfaithful spies formed a congregation, that wherever there were ten free adult Jews a synagogue ought to be erected. It was to stand in the most public part of a town; or its locality was to be indicated by a lofty pole. It was to be so constructed that the worshippers while entering and in their devotions might look towards Jerusalem. The interior arrangements were probably similar to those yet observed, which will shortly be described. It was a good work to build a synagogue; and we find it noted of a Gentile (probably a proselyte) that he loved the Jews and had built them a synagogue (Luke vii. 5). The places 'where prayer was wont to be made' (Acts xvi. 13) do not appear to have been synagogues, but proseuchae, in the open air near water, for the convenience of ablution.

A certain judicial power was exercised by the authorities in a synagogue; and the punishment of scourging was sometimes inflicted there (Matt. x. 17; Mark xiii. 9; Luke xii. 11, xxi. 12); but critics are not agreed upon the powers of such tribunals. It is thought by some that the ordinary councils had their sittings in the synagogues. For a notice of casting out of the synagogue (John ix. 22, 34, xii. 42, xvi. 2) see EXCOMMUNICATION.

Mr. Mills, in his British Jews, part ii. chap. ii. pp. 78-130, has given a full account of the modern synagogues, and services therein. From his work the following particulars are taken.

A synagogue is divided into two parts. The floor is appropriated to the males, who sit in open seats, each having a box beneath for the prayer-book and talith or scarf of the occupier. The gallery, in the front of which is lattice-work, is appropriated to females, who are not considered part of the congregation. At the east end is the heichel, or ark. It is a large wooden chest, placed in a recess, beautified according to the means of the congregation, and screened from the general gaze by a rich and costly veil; several of which often belong to a single synagogue. In this ark or holy repository the roll of the law is placed. The most honourable part of the floor of the building is that near the ark; and in the gallery the front seats from which the ark may be seen are considered the places of honour: the rabbi has his seat close by the ark. At the west end a lamp continually burns, a kind of representation of the Shechinah. In the centre is the tevah or reading-desk, a raised circular platform, but this is of modern introduction. When a new synagogue is built, or an old one repaired, there is a dedication-service; but no special form is prescribed.

The officers are governing, clerical, and lay. Of the first class are the parnassim or wardens, generally three, but sometimes two in number: one of these is chief or president, and exercises considerable power over the affairs of the congregation. Then comes the gobah or treasurer, and the gobai tzedakah or overseer, who dispenses charity to the poor. Sometimes these two offices are united. There are, further, the tove hangeer or elders. Of these different officers various committees are formed, as the vestry, auditors, and building-committee. The clerical officers are the chazanim or readers, of whom there are generally two, and sometimes a third inferior one. Next is the shamas or clerk, who, in conjunction with the secretary, has charge of the rolls of the law. The duties of the readers are sometimes discharged by the clerks, and vice versa. One of these officers on misbehaviour may be suspended by the parnassim. The lay officers are a secretary, collector, and beadle.

In the synagogue Jews wear their hats, and put on the tailith or scarf with fringes. There are three daily services; but those for the afternoon and evening are united in such a way as that one may conclude and the other commence at sunset. Practically therefore the services are two. The eighteen or nineteen prayers before mentioned are part of the daily worship. On Mondays and Thursdays certain penitential prayers are added; because, such is the tradition, Moses ascended the mount after the idolatry of the golden calf on a Thursday and returned on a Monday. On these days pious Jews fast, and portions of the law are read. On the sabbath there are four services, in the eve (i.e. Friday evening), in the morning, afternoon, and evening, the two last on this day being kept separate. Besides the ordinary daily prayers, the law and the prophets—the specified portions before mentioned—are read; and there is what is called the musaph, or additional prayers. The most important of these various parts of the service is that connected with the reading of the law. The roll is brought with much ceremony from the ark; and different persons are appointed for the time to take a share in the rites. The afternoon and evening services are similar to those in daily use, with some additions. There is, moreover, much cantillation or chanting, and regular melodies are introduced on various occasions. Comp. notice of synagogue-services in Ayer's The Jews of the Nineteenth Century, pp. 15, 16.

It may be added that specified persons, such as those who have just attained the age of thirteen, the husbands of women returning thanks after child-birth, &c. &c., are called to the reading of the law on particular sabbaths, when they make money-offerings; but some change has of late been introduced in this system.

By the 'great synagogue' is meant that council, said to be formed after the return from captivity, which settled the Old Testament canon of scripture. According to Jewish story there were 120 members under the presidency of Ezra, and they are said to have organized the ritual, and made various regulations, ever after held in the highest honour. The accounts given of this body are uncertain; but there is very likely some substance of fact; and the existence of a recognized council which was succeeded in some of its functions by the sanhedrim may fairly be admitted. Neh. viii. 13 gives some countenance to it. See Prideaux, Connection, vol. i. pp. 281, 282.

SYNTYCHE (affable or fortunate). A Christian female at Philippi, who had probably had some disagreement with another, Euodias; since St. Paul exhorts them to be of the same mind (Phil. iv. 2).

SYRACUSE. A very celebrated city of Sicily, consisting of five different quarters or towns united into one. It was the native place of Archimedes, who was killed when the city was taken by the Romans, 212 B.C. St. Paul was three days at Syracuse (Acts xxviii. 12); which was a convenient port for the Alexandrian corn-ships to touch at. There are considerable ruins of the ancient town by the modern Siragosa.

SYRIA. The name of a country known to the Hebrews as ARAM, which see.

The term Syria has been very loosely employed, so as at different times to comprehend different ranges of territory. The Aram of earlier times stretched from Palestine and the Mediterranean to the Taurus on the north, and the Euphrates or even beyond the Euphrates on the east. The Greeks gave a much wider signification to Syria. They extended it to Egypt on the one side and to the Euxine on the other. Their ideas seem, however, to have been confused and not always consistent. In New Testament times Syria pretty nearly corresponded with the more ancient Aram.

Syria is for the most part mountainous. The lofty chains of Lebanon and Antilibanus traverse it in the south-west, running nearly parallel to the coast. Between them is the great valley of COELE-SYRIA, which see, now called el-Buka'a, down which flows the Litány, falling into the Mediterranean near to Tyre. But the valley is continued as far north as Antioch. For the ridge of mount Bargylus, separated from Lebanon by a narrow space of lower ground, runs on northward for 100 miles; and Anti-libanus is similarly continued. The Orontes (el-Asy) flows down this part of the valley, and pours itself into the Mediterranean a little below Antioch. To the north of the longitudinal ranges is the chain of Amanus with rugged peaks, which joins the Taurus and separates Syria from Cilicia. The Syrian coast is hot and is said to be unwholesome: the most pleasant and fertile tract is the great valley, particularly the southern portion of it, or Coele-syria: the eastern flank of the Anti-libanus is sterile, save in the district about Damascus. In the Syrian desert stretching to the east, generally dry and scarcely habitable except by a few nomad tribes, are some verdant oases; in the most noted of these is Palmyra.

Syria, when we first hear of it in scripture, seems to be broken up into petty states or sovereignties: these are enumerated in the article under ARAM. They were subdued by David, and continued subject to Solomon (1 Kings iv. 21). Afterwards, however, probably in the later days of Solomon, an independent kingdom was formed at Damascus (xi. 23-25). This monarchy, we may suppose, absorbed the other Syrian districts; and a succession of its kings were formidable enemies to Israel, sometimes being in alliance with the southern state of Judah (xv. 18-20, xx., xxii. 1-38; 2 Kings vi. 8-33, vii., ix. 14, 15, x. 32, 33, xiii. 3, 14-25). There were indeed occasional gleams of success to Israel in these contests, particularly in the reign of Jeroboam II. (xiv. 27, 28); and ultimately the king of Syria leagued with the king of Israel to overthrow Judah. But this was a fatal step. Ahaz invoked the assistance of the Assyrian monarch; and Syria sank before the might of the great king (xv. 37, xvi. 5-10; Isai. vii. 1-16). Syria passed under the dominion successively of Babylon and Persia, and was afterwards subdued by Alexander the Great. After his death it fell with other territories to one of his generals, Seleucus Nicator, who founded Antioch 300 B.C., and made it the capital of his wide dominions. A long line of kings succeeded, more or less successful in maintaining or extending their power. Of these Antiochus Epiphanes was the most cruel oppressor of the Jews; by the valour, however, of the Asmonean princes they established their independence. Syria became ultimately a Roman province 64 B.C. But under the Roman dominion were many free cities, and petty sovereignties assigned from time to time to subject princes, such as Chalcis, Abilene, Damascus, and others. Palmyra maintained its independence till a late period. Sometimes Judea was attached to Syria; its procurator being subordinate to the president or governor of Syria. It is at present subject to the sultan of Turkey.

An interesting account of its modern state and capabilities is given in Risk Allah Effendi's The Thistle and the Cedar of Lebanon, 2nd edit., 1854, chapp. xiv.—xxii. pp. 233, &c.

SYR'IA-MA'ACHAH (1 Chron. xix. 6). See ARAM, MAACAII.

SYR'IANS (Gen. xxv. 20, xxviii. 5, xxxi. 20, 24; Deut. xxvi. 5; 2 Kings v. 20, viii. 28, 29, ix. 15; Luke iv. 27). Inhabitants of Syria.

SY'RO-PHŒNIC'IAN (Mark vii. 26). There were Phœnicians of Lybia or Carthaginians: in order therefore to distinguish those of Phœnicia itself, included in the Roman province of Syria, they are said to have been called Syro-phœnicians. The woman so designated is called 'of Canaan' (Matt. xv. 22); because the descendants of the ancient Canaanites peopled the coasts of Tyre and Sidon.

T

TAA'ANACH (sandy soil). A city of Canaan, whose king Joshua destroyed (Josh. xii. 21). It was assigned to Manasseh, though not locally within the borders of that tribe, and then allotted to the Levites; but the Canaanites were not expelled (xvii. 11, xxi. 25; Judges i. 27). It was near Taanach that Barak's victory was gained (v. 19); and in later times it formed a part, with Megiddo and other places, of one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 Kings iv. 12). Aner (1 Chron. vi. 70) is probably the same town with Taanach: the difference in Hebrew is far less than it appears in our version. It still exists as Te'ennâkh, a small village on the south-west border of Esdraelon.

TAA'ANATH-SHI'LOH (approach to Shiloh). A place marking the boundary of the territory of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 6), Tâna?

TAB'AOOTH (1 Esdr. v. 29). Identical with TAB'BAOTH (rings). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 43; Neh. vii. 46).

TAB'BATH (celebrated). A place probably in the northern part of the Jordan valley, near Abel-meholah, to which the Midianites fled from Gideon (Judges vii. 22). Mr. Grove suggests its identity with the modern Tubukhat-Fahil, a striking natural bank, 600 feet high, with a long and flat top descending with a steep front to the river.

TAB'EAL (God is good). A person mentioned only in Isai. vii. 6. The Syrians and Israelites desired to deprive the dynasty of David of the sovereignty of Judah; and their futile purpose was to place a son of this Tabeal upon the throne.

TAB'EEL (id.). One of those officers who wrote to the Persian king against the Jews after the return from captivity (Ezra iv. 7).

TABEL'LIOUS (1 Esdr. ii. 16). Tabeel.

TAB'ERAH (a burning). A place in the wilderness, where a judgment by fire was inflicted on the Israelites for their murmuring (Numb. xi. 1-3; Deut. ix. 22).

TABERING (Nah. ii. 7). Beating as on an instrument.

TABERNACLE. The sanctuary where in the earlier times of the Hebrew theocracy the most sacred rites of their religion were performed. The command to erect a tabernacle is recorded in Exod. xxv. 8; and in that place, and in xxix. 42, 43, 45, the special purpose is declared for which it was to be made: God would there meet with Israel, for, according to his covenant, he would dwell among them and be their God. And so we find the various names of it, the 'tent' (xxvi. 11, 12), the 'tabernacle,' dwelling or habitation (13), the 'tent of meetings' (xxix. 43), for so the words should be rendered, the 'tent of the testimony,' or 'tabernacle of witness' (Numb. ix. 15, xvii. 7, xviii. 2), the 'house of the Lord' (Deut. xxxiii. 18; Josh. ix. 23; Judges xviii. 31)—all these appellations pointing to the covenant-purpose of God. It is not improbable that from the earliest times there had been a sanctuary or sacred tent, before the erection of that for Israel was specially commanded; just as there were priests, and sacrifices, and altars, and sabbath-observance, and other rites before the law, which the law more exactly prescribed and amplified. Thus we find such a tabernacle in the camp of Israel no long time after their departure from Egypt (Exod. xxxiii. 7-11). But a more special tabernacle was to be constructed, of more costly materials and more finished proportions, which should travel with the tribes through their pilgrim-life, and be afterwards re-placed, when they had been awhile settled in the good land of their possession, by a more gorgeous structure, a glorious temple in the city which the Lord should choose.

The command began by inviting the people to contribute suitable materials. They were to be offered with a willing heart: the Lord would accept only what came from a cheerful giver. These materials are described in xxv. 3-7. And the tabernacle was to be built according to the pattern prescribed by God. It was as to its general plan like an ordinary tent, which is usually divided into two compartments, the inner lighted by a lamp and closed against strangers. Such tents are longer than they are broad. And so the tabernacle was an oblong square or rectangle, thirty cubits (fifty-two feet six inches or perhaps forty-five feet) long, ten cubits in breadth and in height. The frame-work on these sides was perpendicular boards of shittim-wood, that is acacia, overlaid with gold, kept together by means of transverse bars passing through golden rings, and each with two tenons, fitting into silver sockets on which they stood. The sockets have by some been supposed to taper towards a point, so that they could be driven into the ground. There were twenty boards a cubit and a half broad on each side, north and south, at the west end eight; but the two boards at the corners were probably of a different size or shape; else they would have projected beyond the sides. There were four coverings, the first of byss, or fine linen, blue, purple, and scarlet, with cherubim embroidered on it. It was made in ten curtains each twenty-eight cubits long and four wide, coupled together by loops and gold hooks. The second covering was of goats' hair in eleven curtains, each thirty cubits long and four wide, coupled by loops and brass or copper hooks. It has been doubted whether these coverings came down over the boards outside: it is probable that the first after forming the interior roof was then made to fall inside, and that the second entirely covered the tabernacle outside; the tent-like appearance would thus be preserved. The third covering was of rams' skins dyed red, like our morocco-leather; and the fourth of 'badgers' skins, more probably a kind of seal-skin. These were to protect the tabernacle from the weather. The inner apartment or most holy place was a cube of ten cubits, the outer apartment twenty cubits in length and ten in breadth. They were separated by a veil of the same kind as the innermost covering, suspended on four gilded acacia pillars reared upon silver sockets. The east end or entrance of the tabernacle had also a large curtain suspended from five gilded acacia pillars set in sockets of brass or copper. In the most holy place, which the high priest alone entered, was the ark of the covenant; in the holy place, where the priests ministered—to the north the table of shew-bread, to the south the golden candlestick, in the centre the altar of incense. Round about the tabernacle was an open court into which the people were admitted, one hundred cubits in length and fifty broad. It was formed by columns twenty on each side, ten at each end, raised on brazen or copper sockets. Hangings fastened to the pillars formed three sides and part of the fourth: on the east the breadth of four pillars was reserved for a central entrance, where was an embroidered curtain suspended from the four pillars. Immediately opposite the entrance was the great altar of burnt-offering; and between that and the door of the tabernacle was the laver (xxvi. xxvii. xxxviii. xl). There are some parts of the description of the pillars and hangings of the court, which it is not easy to understand: for a notice of these, see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Stiftshütte.'

But Mr. Fergusson's most ingenious theory must not be left unnoticed (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1453-1455). He supposes that, instead of being flat at the top as usually represented, the tabernacle had a ridge like tents in general, the angle formed at the ridge by the sloping sides being a right-angle. He believes that these sides were fourteen cubits each—the curtains of twenty-eight cubits just covering them, that the roof extended five cubits beyond the walls, thus forming a kind of verandah all round, and that the height of the ridge was fifteen cubits from the ground. The middle bar (Exod. xxvi. 28) would be the ridge-pole; and the five pillars at the entrance (37) are thus accounted for, one being in the centre to support the ridge. But for details Mr. Fergusson's own account must be referred to. Several difficulties certainly are thus solved.

The tabernacle was completed in about nine months; and, as the people offered most liberally (xxxvi. 5) it was a costly structure; the value of the materials being estimated at £250,000. It was erected on the first day of the first month of the second year after leaving Egypt. It was carried by the Israelites into Canaan, and there set up, possibly first at Gilgal, then, when the land was subdued, at Shiloh (Josh. xviii. 1), and also at Beth-el (see BETH-EL), perhaps afterwards at Nob, and then at Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi. 39, xxi. 29). And it may be, in this migratory character of the tabernacle, left sometimes without the ark, thereby showing that a definite place was not yet selected for God's abiding presence, that we have the solution of the offering of sacrifice even by prophetic men after an anomalous fashion. It was removed when the temple was built to Jerusalem, and possibly deposited in the temple (1 Kings viii. 4; 2 Chron. v. 5). For the regulations about its removal, see Numb. iv. It may be added here that David seems to have constructed another tabernacle to receive the ark when it was brought to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chron. xv. 1): perhaps it was this which was taken to the temple.

Objections have been found to the Mosaic narrative of the making and erection of the tabernacle in the wilderness: it is urged that the Israelites could not have possessed the necessary skill, that the costly materials could not have been procured, that the setting-up and transport from place to place of such a structure would have required means which they did not possess, and that the time allowed for the work is too short. It may briefly be replied that the Israelites, engaged so long as labourers for the Egyptians, by whom the arts were cultivated, may readily be supposed to have had the necessary skill, that when they left Egypt they were supplied by their former taskmasters with gold and jewels, that they could not be far out of the track of caravans, from which they could doubtless obtain any merchandise they needed, that the boards, pillars, and curtains of the tabernacle would pack into small compass—and not long after wagons were specially provided for the conveyance (Numb. vii. 4-9)—and that the rapidity of the execution of the work is not surprising, when we recollect that there was a whole nation with little other employment from whom to select labourers. These objections will be found more fully answered by Häyernick, Einleitung, § 129, vol. i. 2, pp. 397, &c.

The typical design of the tabernacle has been variously interpreted: thus Philo regarded it as symbolical of the universe; and different expositors have seen a spiritual meaning in the intrinsic qualities of the materials, and the very colours of the fabrics. But this is not to interpret soberly; though the arrangements were, doubtless, not without their signification to the worshippers in the tabernacle. Fairbairn would regard it as a type of Christ, as God manifest in the flesh, and reconciling flesh to God. He appeals in corroboration to our Lord's calling his body a temple (John ii. 19, 21). See Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. i. ii. sect. ii. vol. ii. pp. 231, &c.; Winer, ubi supr. But the ordinary reader will find a flood of light shed upon the purpose of the tabernacle and its utensils by a perusal of Heb. ix., x.

TABERNACLES, THE FEAST OF. One of the three greater festivals to be observed by Israel. It was instituted to commemorate the dwelling of the people in tents while in the desert (Lev. xxiii. 34-43). And, as these feasts additionally marked the epochs of the agricultural year—at the passover or feast of unleavened bread the first ripe ears of corn being offered, the feast of weeks or pentecost being also the feast of harvest—so the feast of tabernacles was called also the feast of in-gathering at the year's end, when all the labours of the field were consummated (Exod. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22; Deut. xvi. 13-15). It was to be a time of holy joy, of grateful remembrance of the past, of hopeful trust for future blessings.

The feast commenced on the fifteenth of the seventh month and was to last seven days. It was commanded in one of the passages already cited that the people should dwell in booths or tents, which were anciently pitched on the terrace-like roofs of the houses, in the courts of the temple, and in the streets or wide places of the city. They were to cut down boughs of various trees, and to carry (it is said) the fruit and branches in their hands, so long as the festival lasted. The particular sacrifices to be offered are detailed in Numb. xxix. 1-38; and, though the feast is described as of seven days, there was an eighth day added, which was to be a sabbath of rest, and a holy convocation. Also every sabbatical year the law was to be read at the feast of tabernacles to the assembled people (Deut. xxxi. 10-13). Whether this command had relation to the whole Pentateuch, or to the book of Deuteronomy, or selections has been keenly debated. The principal objection against the belief that it was the entire Pentateuch is really childish, though gravely urged by various learned men, viz., that there was not time! And yet the reading was continued through all the days of the festival. Notices of the observance of this holy season are to be found in Neh. viii. 13-18; Hos. xii. 9; Zech. xiv. 16-19; John vii. 2, 37-39. It seems that in later days it was customary to draw water from the pool of Siloam and carry it in a golden vessel to the altar. It was there poured into a silver basin, from which it was conducted by pipes to the Kidron. To this usage our Lord may perhaps allude in the place last referred to. He has been supposed further to allude (viii. 12) to the practice of lighting two large chandeliers in the court of the women, by the light of which they held a festal dance. But it is doubtful whether either of these customs were observed on the last, i.e. eighth day of the feast, when it was that Christ referred to the water (vii. 37): see Alford's notes on vii. 37, 38, viii. 12.

Several minute specifications are given by Jewish writers of the size and materials of the huts, of the time of living in them, &c. &c., which need not be here dwelt on. But the account of the way in which this feast is still observed by the Jews among us may be interesting.

'Immediately after the day of atonement . . . on the morrow of that day they rise early, and drive a peg into the ground as a mark where the booths are to be erected, should it be on an open ground. . . This day and the four following are employed in preparing the booths. The rule is that it should be erected in the open air, and not within doors or under the shelter of a tree: three sides must be of substantial wood; the top not to be covered with any kind of material but with loose boughs, so that the stars may be seen, and the rain descend through them. This is their proper dwelling, in which they are to eat, drink, and sleep during the seven days of the festival. But in this country, where the climate at that time of the year is so unfavourable, these rules are never strictly observed. . . . On the evening of the fourteenth day . . . the feast commences. They go to synagogue, and after the service, which is similar to that of other evenings, with the addition of some prayers peculiar to the occasion, they return to their homes to celebrate the feast. This is done in the same general manner as on the sabbath, and other feasts, when the master of the family takes a glass of wine in his right hand, and repeats the kidush or sanctification, as follows: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, the Creator of the fruit of the vine, &c. &c." Agreeably to the command in Lev. xxiii. 40, they prepare themselves with ethrog or citron, lulabh or branches of palm-trees, hadassim or branches of the three-leaved myrtle, and ngaravoth or willows of the brook. These are made use of in the synagogue during the seven days of the festival, when the hallel is said. . . . On the first morning of the feast they go to synagogue as on the sabbata [and, when the time for saying the hallel comes, the ceremony of the branch and citron is performed in the following manner. A branch of the palm-tree, of about a yard long, is taken, to which branches of the myrtle and willow are fastened. The reader being provided with one holds it in his right hand, a citron in the left, when the following blessing is pronounced: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who sanctified us with thy commandments, and commanded us to take the palm-branch. Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast maintained us and preserved us to enjoy this season." While singing the hallel the reader continually waves the branch in all directions—now to the east, again to the west, and anon upwards towards the heavens, not unlike a soldier brandishing his sword. Several members are also furnished with similar branches, who, at certain points of the service, respond to the reader by shaking theirs also.' After reading a portion of the law, and of the prophets, and prayer, 'a procession is formed. A scroll of the law is taken out of the ark and brought to the reading-desk. The officers of the synagogue, together with a few others . . . being provided with branches . . . form themselves into a procession: one in front carrying the scroll in his arms, and all holding the branches in their right hand, walk around the reading-desk repeating hosanna. The law is then re-placed; and, after a few more prayers, the morning service is over.' The ceremonies on the next day are nearly the same, these two days being held sacred. The succeeding five days are called common, as work is then lawful: the synagogue-services are almost exact repetitions of those of the first. But the last of these, or seventh of the feast, is termed the 'Great Hosanna.' 'Every one has a branch of the willow—a willow that grows near a running stream. These are procured under the superintendence of the officers of the synagogue; and the head of every family must purchase sufficient that each member has a bunch. Each bunch must contain five sprigs, and seven leaves on each sprig. In this manner all—male and female, great and small—repair to synagogue with their branches in their hands.' After a procession and prayers, 'Every one beats the leaves from off his willow-branch; and, if they fall off easily, it is held as a good omen—if not, as a bad one. . . . The use made of the booths, branches, &c. is now over; and the afternoon closes the feast of tabernacles, properly so called. According to the Talmudists, the following evening is the time when the destinies, that were recorded on the new year and sealed on the day of atonement, are distributed. Therefore the most strict assemble in the synagogue, and remain there all night reading a certain work which contains the book of Deuteronomy, portions of the Zohar, and the book of Psalms. After this they go to the bath adjoining the synagogue, and dip their bodies three times in a kind of underground pond, called mikvah, generally provided in every bath. They must descend and ascend without any light; for, as the legend asserts, in so doing if they are doomed to die they will see their own shadow having no head.' Two more days are observed as feast-days, though properly no part of the feast of tabernacles (Mills, The British Jews, part ii. chap. vi. pp. 174-184). Wanderers, however, as the Jews now are, the celebration of this feast is eminently unsuited to them.

On the symbolical meaning of the festival critics are not agreed. But surely, viewing the circumstances under which it was instituted, and regarding its historical and agricultural character, we can hardly be at a loss in regard to the divine purpose. It commemorated not like the passover a single event, but the habits of a period, the tent-residence of the nation's wilderness-life. And it was celebrated at the completion of the year's labour, the joyous acknowledgment of abundant provision, when the fruits of the field had all been gathered into the garner, when, too, at this feast the temple was consecrated (2 Chron. v. 3), where Jehovah would dwell among his people. Can we fail to see depicted here the church's repose, the long wearisome work accomplished, the rest of her everlasting joy in a land where, a sojourner no more, she dwells in a settled habitation, and looks back to her pilgrimage-state only as contrasting with it the happy possession to which she has been brought, where the fruits of prior toil are now completely gathered? It is in the view of what this feast pre-signifies that the prophet Zechariah, in a passage already referred to (Zech. xiv. 16), when describing the result of Jerusalem's last victory, represents all nations resorting thither to keep the feast of tabernacles—a festival in prophetic language not abrogated by the ceasing of the legal dispensation. The matter is well treated by a writer in the Christian Observer, Feb. 1863, pp. 79-89, who concludes: "If it is interesting to dwell upon those (ordinances) which time has already interpreted, there is in some sense a superior interest in one which has yet to be fulfilled. We are still sojourning in tabernacles, and travelling in the wilderness; and our souls from time to time are discouraged because of the way. But it is pleasant to read, in the last ordinance given to "the fathers," the pledge and promise of that coming day "when in sure dwellings and quiet resting-places" we shall "remember all the way by which the Lord our God led us these many years in the wilderness." Then, when the journey is over and the rest attained, when the labours are ended and the harvest secured, the kingdom of God shall keep its feast of tabernacles. In the prospect of that day both writer and reader may lift up their hearts and cry: "O remember me with the favour that thou bearest unto thy chosen, and visit me with thy salvation, that I may see the felicity of thy chosen, and rejoice in the gladness of thy people, and give thanks with thine inheritance."

TAB'ITHA (gazelle). The Aramaic name of a Christian female dwelling at Joppa. She was also called by the Greek name Dorcas, having the same signification; and hence, possibly, was a Hellenist. She was remarkable for her charity and good works; and, having died, was miraculously restored to life by St. Peter (Acts ix. 36-42).

TABLE. See MEALS.

TABLET. An ornament mentioned in Exod. xxxv. 22; Num. xxxi. 50. It was probably a string of gold drops or beads, worn round the neck or arm. But the 'tablets' of Isai. iii. 20 are literally 'receptacles of odour,' i.e. perfume-boxes or smelling-bottles. They were suspended to a lace or sash tied round the waist.

TAB'OR (mound, mountain-height).—1. A noted mountain of Palestine on the borders of Issachar and Zebulun, apparently within the district of the first-named tribe (Josh. xix. 22). It is an insulated hill of cretaceous limestone, rising 1900 feet above the sea. Its figure is an elongated oval, the principal diameter running nearly east and west. Seen from different points it presents a different appearance. From the south or north its outline is nearly the arc of a great circle: from the east it is a broad truncated cone, rounded off at the top, while from the west it is wedge-shaped. Its southern face is almost naked limestone rock; but the northern slope is covered with forests of oak, terebinth, and syringa to the very summit. Tabor has been the scene of many a notable event. It was to Tabor that Barak collected his troops, and from it they poured down like a rushing torrent upon Sisera (Judges iv. 6, 12, 14). It is again mentioned in the wars of Gideon (viii. 18); and in other parts of the sacred volume (Psal. lxxxix. 12; Jer. xlvi. 18; Hos. v. 1). The name does not occur in the New Testament; but it has been from the fourth century traditionally believed to be the scene of our Lord's transfiguration. This, however, is very improbable. For Christ was a little before far away from Tabor, near Cæsarea Philippi (Matt. xvi. 13); and the summit of Tabor was at the time occupied by a fortified town. The place was more likely to be one of the spurs or recesses of Hermon. Down to our own times Tabor, now called Jebel el-Târ, has been the scene of note-worthy events. In 1799 Napoleon I. gained a great victory there over a Turkish army. This mountain can be ascended on horseback. The views from it are very glorious. Esdraelon is like a vast carpet; the Mediterranean and the lake of Tiberias can both be seen. On the top is 'a confused mass of broken walls, towers, vaults, cisterns, and houses, some of which indicate the sites of the convents and churches erected by the crusaders' (The Land and the Book, p. 433). Two or three of these vaults have been fitted up as a Greek chapel with a residence for the priest: the Latins have also an altar here.—2. An oak or grove of oaks in the territory of Benjamin (1 Sam. x. 3).—3. A Levitical city in the tribe of Zebulun (1 Chron. vi. 77). Perhaps an abbreviation for Chisloth-tabor.

TABRET (Gen. xxxi. 27; 1 Sam. x. 5, xviii. 6; Job xvii. 6; Isai. v. 12, xxiv. 8, xxx. 32; Jer. xxxi. 4; Ezek. xxviii. 13). See TIMBREL.

TAB'RIMON (good is Rimmon). The father of Ben-hadad, king of Syria (1 Kings xv. 18).

TACHES. Hooks, to which loops were fitted (Exod. xxvi. 6, 11, 33, xxxv. 11, xxxvi. 13, 18, xxxix. 33).

TACH-MONITE (2 Sam. xxiii. 8). See HACHMONITE, JASHOBEAM.

TAD'MOR (city of palms). A city which Solomon built in the wilderness (1 Kings ix. 18; 2 Chron. viii. 4). According to Arabic tradition it existed at an earlier age; and Solomon re-built and fortified it as a barrier-fortress. The wise monarch's eye also, no doubt, perceived the favourable position of this city for commerce. It was at a convenient distance from both the Mediterranean sea and the Persian gulf, and was sure to secure the advantages of caravan-traffic. Tadmor is almost-universally identified with the Palmyra of the Greeks and Romans, the history of which fills a brilliant page in the world's annals. In its earlier fortunes Palmyra was dependent on one or other of the great empires which rose and fell around; but under Odenathus and his martial queen Zenobia it expanded into a mighty sovereignty, rivalling and defying for a time the Roman power. In 273 A.D. the emperor Aurelian succeeded, after obstinately-contested battles, in taking the city and securing the person of Zenobia (see Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, chap. xi.).

Palmyra is seated in an oasis of the Syrian desert midway between the Orontes and the Euphrates, about one hundred and forty miles ENE. from Damascus. It is sheltered by hills to the west and north-west, and is well supplied with water. It has dwindled down to a mean place, now inhabited by a few Arabs. But magnificent ruins give proof of its ancient splendour. The most remarkable of these is the great temple of the sun; which was inclosed in a court one hundred and seventy-nine feet square, surrounded by a double row of columns. Sixty of the original three hundred and ninety are still standing; and of the sanctuary itself there are massive remains: of the columns which adorned it about twenty mutilated ones now exist. But no description can be here attempted of the grandeur, the vastness, of the ruins of this metropolis: the account of them must be sought elsewhere, as in Porter's Handbook for Syria.

TA'HAN (station, camp).—1. A son of Ephraim (Numb. xxvi. 35).—2. A descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 25). Perhaps the two are identical: see EPHRAIM, p. 269.

TA'HANITES. A family of Ephraim descended from Tahan, 1 (Numb. xxvi. 35).

TAHA'PANES (Jer. ii. 16). See TAHAPANES.

TA'HATH (place, station).—1. A Levite, of the line of Kohath (1 Chron. vi. 24, 37).—2, 3. Two descendants of Ephraim (vii. 20).

TA'HATH (id.). One of the stations of the Israelites in the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 26, 27).

TAH'PANHES (head, or beginning, of the world?). An Egyptian city, receiving, it has been thought, this name because it was the beginning of the Egyptian world—that is, placed on the frontier at the north-eastern extremity of the country. It appears to be identical with the Daphne of the Greeks, a strong place on the Tanitic branch of the Nile, near Pelusium. There was a royal palace here, and brick-kilns; and, as a colony of Jews came hither, it was naturally a prominent place in the Jewish mind, and is put with Noph or Memphis for the country generally (Jer. ii. 16, where it is called Tahapanes, xlvi. 14). It was to this city that, after the murder of Gedaliah, Johanan and the Jewish leaders repaired taking with them the prophet Jeremiah, who was directed to give a symbol here of the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar (xliii. 7-13, xlv. 1). It is called Tehaphnehes in Ezek. xxx. 18, and appears in the contracted form of Hanes in Isai. xxx. 4. A mound called Tel Defenneh in a direct line between the modern Zân (or Sân) and Pelusium, may mark the site of Tahapanes.

TAH'PENES (id.). The queen of Pharaoh, a king of Egypt contemporary with David or Solomon. Her sister was given in marriage to Hadad the Edomite (1 Kings xi. 19, 20).

TAHRE'A (cunning). A descendant of Saul (1 Chron. ix. 41); called Tarea in viii. 35.

TAH'TIM-HOD'SHI (nether land newly inhabited?). A place or district near upon Gilead (2 Sam. xxiv. 6).

TALENT. See MONEY, WEIGHTS.

TALI'THA CUMI (damsel arise). The Aramaic words uttered by our Lord when raising the ruler's daughter (Mark v. 41).

TAL'MAI (furrowed).—1. One of the sons of Anak (Numb. xiii. 22; Josh. xv. 14; Judges i. 10).—2. A king of Geshur, whose daughter Maacah was David's wife and Absalom's mother (2 Sam. iii. 3, xiii. 37; 1 Chron. iii. 2).

TAL'MON (oppressed).—1. A Levite porter (1 Chron. ix. 17; Neh. xi. 19, xii. 25).—2. A Levite porter whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45). Possibly there was only one of the name; so that in the latter case Talmon denotes the representative of No. 1.

TAL'MUD, THE. This is a body of Jewish laws, comprising doctrines and precepts, relative to religion and morals. The Talmud (the name literally signifying doctrine) consists of two parts, viz., the Mishna, or text, and the Gemara, or commentary.

The Mishna, the meaning of which is repetition, includes 6 books or orders, 63 treatises, and 524 chapters. Four tracts were afterwards appended. It is a collection of various Jewish traditions, with expositions of scripture-texts: these, the Jews pretend, were delivered to Moses on the mount, and were transmitted from him, through Aaron, Eleazar, and Joshua, to the prophets, and by them to the men of the great synagogue, from whom they passed in succession to Simeon, Gamaliel, and ultimately to rabbi Jehudah, surnamed Hakkodesh, 'the holy.' By him this digest of oral law and traditions is said to have been completed towards the close of the second century, after forty years' labour. It has been since handed down among the Jews, from generation to generation, regarded with the highest reverence, and even sometimes esteemed above the written law itself.

The Gemara is two-fold: viz. the Gemara of Jerusalem, compiled between the third and fifth centuries, and not much esteemed by the Jews, and the Gemara of Babylon, compiled in the fifth century. This is filled with absurd fables; but the Jews highly value it. The name Gemara implies perfection, and is assumed because these commentaries are regarded as an explanation of the whole law, to which no further additions can be made, and after which nothing more can be desired. The Mishna, together with the commentary compiled at Jerusalem, is called the Jerusalem Talmud, with that made at Babylon it is the Babylonian Talmud.

The Mishna is useful, as being a digest of the traditions held by the Pharisees in our Lord's time; and biblical critics and commentators have often drawn from it explanations of various passages in the Old Testament, and have illustrated thereby the narratives and allusions of the New. A compendious account of the Talmud by the late rev. Dr. McCaul is prefixed to Pridcaux's Connection, edit. 1858; also see Westcott, Introd. to Gosp., chap. 1, pp. 62, 63.

TAL'SAS (1 Esdr. ix. 22). Elalah (Ezra x. 22).

TAMAH (laughter). One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 55). In Ezra ii. 53 the name is Tamah.

TAMAR (palm-tree).—1. The wife of Er and Onan, a daughter-in-law of Judah, with whom he committed incest (Gen. xxxviii. 6-30; Ruth iv. 12; 1 Chron. ii. 4). She is called Tamah in Matt. i. 3.—2. A daughter of David and sister of Absalom, remarkable for her beauty, whom Amnon her half-brother defiled (2 Sam. xiii.; 1 Chron. iii. 9). We may gather from this miserable story some incidents in relation to the homeliness of the duties performed in those times by the ladies of highest rank, and to the dress of unmarried princesses.—3. A daughter of Absalom (2 Sam. xiv. 27).

TAMAR (id.). A town on the south-eastern border of Palestine (Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28). Dr. Robinson supposes that the site is marked by the ruins now called Kurnub, about a day's journey south of el-Mih (Malatha or Moladah) on the ancient road between Hebron and Elath. But Wilton identifies it with Hazar-gaddah (The Negeb, pp. 94-97, 117, 118).

TAMMUZ (terror?). See MONTH.

TAMMUZ (id.). The name of a Phœnician deity, probably the Adonis of the Greeks; who is said to have lived in the Lebanon, near the source of the river which bears his name. He was killed, the legend goes on, by a wild boar; but through the influence of Venus, who was enamoured of him, he was permitted to spend six months of the year on earth, the other six being passed in the lower world. His death was annually celebrated: Byblos, where the river Adonis, red it was imagined with his blood, flowed into the sea, being the chief seat of the solemnity. The fact is that the river, now Nahr Ibrahim, brings down after storms some of the red soil of Lebanon. The Syrian women first mourned the death, and then gave way to frantic joy for the return, of Adonis. A similar festival was held in Egypt in honour of Osiris, of whom a story of almost the same kind is told. This worship may have been symbolical of the course of the sun, and his influence upon vegetation. One of the abominations which Ezekiel beheld was the weeping of the Jewish women for Tammuz on the north side of the temple (Ezek. viii. 14). The feast began with the new moon of July; whence the month in which it fell received the name of Tammuz.

TA'NACH (sandy soil) (Josh. xxi. 25). See TAANACH.

TANHU'METH (comfort). The father of one of the captains who joined Gedaliah (2 Kings xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8).

TA'NIS (Ezek. xxx. 14, marg.). See ZOAN. This name is also found in the Apocrypha (Judith i. 10).

TANNER (Acts ix. 43, x. 6, 32). See HANDICRAFT, p. 353.

TAPESTRY (Prov. vii. 16, xxxi. 22). The 'coverings of tapestry' may simply mean 'coverlets' as spread upon beds. Perhaps they were embroidered. See EMBROIDERY.

TA'PHATH (drop). One of Solomon's daughters (1 Kings iv. 11).

TAPH'NES (Judith i. 9). Tahpanhes.

TA'PHON (1 Macc. ix. 50). A city fortified in Maccabean times, perhaps Beth-tappuah.

TAP'PUAH (apple-region). The name of a person among the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 43).

TAP'PUAH (id.).—1. A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 34).—2. A city on the border of Ephraim and Manasseh: the city belonged to Ephraim, the land or district named from it to Manasseh (xvi. 8, xvii. 8). This was no doubt identical with En-tappuah (?). It is not certain which of these two places is intended in xii. 17.

TA'RAH (station). One of the stations of the Israelites in the desert (Numb. xxxiii. 27, 28).

TAR'ALAH (a reeling). A city in Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27).

TARE'A (cunning) (1 Chron. viii. 35). See TAHREA.

TARES. Darnel, the Lolium temulentum (Matt. xiii. 24-30, 36-40). The common Arabic name of this plant is zowan: it is of a noxious character, producing dizziness and sickness. Grain-growers in Palestine believe that in wet seasons and in marshy ground the wheat itself turns to tares. See Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 420-422.

TARGET (1 Sam. xvii. 6; 1 Kings x. 16; 2 Chron. ix. 15, xiv. 8). See ARMS, pp. 53, 57, 58.

TAR'GUM. See VERSIONS.

TAR'PELITES. A people from whom the Assyrian kings sent colonists to Samaria (Ezra iv. 9): possibly they may be the Tapyri on the east of Elymais. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Tarpelaje.'

TAR'SHISH (perhaps a breaking, subjection, i.e. subdued country).—1. A son of Javan of the posterity of Japheth (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chron. i. 7). See TARSHISH, below.—2. One of the seven princes of Persia (Esth. i. 14).

TAR'SHISH (hard, i.e. rocky ground?). A city or country respecting the position of which much variety of opinion, especially among earlier writers, has prevailed. But the scripture notices of it, if carefully compared, lead with tolerable certainty to its identification. Dr. Kailsch thus sums them up: 'Tarshish is represented as a rich country, governed by its own independent kings and able to send valuable presents (Psal. lxxii. 10; Isai. lxvi. 19, 20), abounding especially in silver, iron, tin, and lead (Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 12, 25): a precious stone, probably the chrysolite, chiefly found in those districts, bore the name of tarshish (Exod. xxviii. 20; in our version 'beryl': see BERYL): 'it was situated near other renowned islands, and was itself washed by the waves of the sea (Isai. lx. 9); it was, therefore, accessible by navigation, which was extensively carried on by the Phœnicians and other nations, in large famous ships, which were the models for the vessels of commerce in general, and were therefore known under the name of "vessels of Tarshish" (1 Kings x. 22, xxii. 48; Isai. ii. 16): the port from which they started was Joppa, on the coast of Palestine (Jonah i. 3, iv. 2), not from Ezion-geber, a port of the gulf of Akabah' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 243). It is true that once (2 Chron. xx. 36) 'ships to go to Tarshish' are said to have been made at Ezion-geber. And it has been supposed hence that there must have been a Tarshish (there being two of the name) in India. Keil imagines that built on the Red sea the ships were to be conveyed overland to a Mediterranean port, and refers to examples of such land-carriage of ships (Comm. on Kings, transl., vol. i. p. 329; comp. Horne's Introduc., vol. i. p. 655, edit. Ayre). All these indications show that Tarshish was neither in India, nor Ethiopia, nor on the African coast, as some have imagined. Neither could it have been Tarsus: thither certainly Jonah would not have fled to avoid the journey to Nineveh. Besides, Tarsus was never celebrated as Tarshish was. There can be little doubt, therefore, that Tartessus in the south of Spain, or the surrounding district, was intended by Tarshish. And it is well known that the Phœnicians had much commercial intercourse with Spain. The mention of Tarshish as derived from Javan (Gen. x. 4), corroborates this opinion. It is true that Tartessus has been sometimes represented as a Phœnician colony; and Kalisch interprets Isai. xxiii. 1, 6, 10 as countenancing a Phœnician origin for Tarshish; but this interpretation cannot be supported: 'daughter of Tarshish' is simply Tarshish, or the inhabitants thereof, as 'daughter of Zion,' 'daughter of Jerusalem' (i. 8, xxxvii. 22). And of the close intercourse (and probably colonization) of the Greeks with Tartessus and its neighbourhood there is strong evidence: see Herodotus, lib. i. 163. The exact site of this celebrated city is unknown: it has been believed to be between the two outlets of the modern Guadalquivir. Other places on the Spanish coast have had their advocates. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Tharschisch.'

TARSUS (possibly connected with Tarshish, or with a root signifying hard). A large and populous city of Cilicia, the capital of the Roman province of that name, situated in a fruitful plain on the river Cydnus which flowed through the midst of it. It was a place of considerable trade; and the inhabitants, of Greek descent, applied themselves with much success to the study of philosophy, so that their city acquired great celebrity as a school of learning. Many Jews appear to have settled here; and the most distinguished citizen of Tarsus was Saul, afterwards the apostle Paul (Acts ix. 11, 30, xi. 25, xxi. 39, xxii. 3). Tarsus was one of those called free cities, and, though under Roman dominion, enjoyed the right of choosing its own magistrates, and was governed by its own laws. This freedom was granted it by Mark Antony; but it did not convey any right as a Roman colony of Roman citizenship to the natives—so that Paul was a citizen of Rome by virtue of some other franchise. In later times, indeed, Tarsus was made a Roman colony.

It still exists, as Tersous, with a population of about 20,000, but is described as filthy and ruinous: see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Tarsus.'

TAR'TAK (hero of darkness). The name of an idol of the Avites (2 Kings xvii. 31). According to the rabbins it had the figure of an ass. Perhaps one of those planets whose influence is thought unfavourable, Saturn or Mars, might be intended.

TAR'TAN (military chief). A general of Sargon and Sennacherib (2 Kings xviii. 17; Isai. xx. 1). The word is an official title.

TAT'NAI (gift). A Persian governor in Palestine (Ezra v. 3, 6, vi. 6, 13).

TAVERNS, THE THREE. A place of entertainment for persons of a better class than those who frequented the Appii Forum. It was on the Appian road, about 33 Roman miles from the city, near the modern Cisterna. Two parties of brethren went to meet St. Paul (Acts xxviii. 15), when he was brought a prisoner to Rome: some proceeded as far as Appii Forum, others to the Three Taverns.

TAX, TAXING, TAXATION. Notice has been elsewhere taken of different imposts to which, from time to time the Hebrews were subjected. It may be proper here briefly to sum up these particular taxes, and to indicate the changes made at various times.

One great department, all indeed that the Israelites were expected to pay in their earlier history, comprised those sacred offerings which were connected with their religious services. From them the priests and Levites, and in a measure the poor, were to be maintained. See PRIEST, p. 719. To these must be added the capitation-tax to be paid when a census of the people was taken (Exod. xxx. 11-16). This, however, was but occasional (yet see perhaps some traces of it in 2 Kings xii. 4; 2 Chron. xxiv. 6-9); but it formed the basis of the annual impost agreed to after the captivity (Neh. x. 32, 33), then the third of a shekel, but afterwards a half-shekel (Matt. xvii. 24, 27), levied on all Jews wheresoever they resided.

On the establishment of kingly government additional burdens were necessarily laid upon the nation: see KING, p. 511. REVENUE. Sometimes in addition money was to be raised, as for Solomon's great works (1 Kings xii. 4), and when foreign enemies required large sums as fines or annual tribute (2 Kings xv. 19, 20, xvii. 4, xxiii. 33-35).

Under the Persian government after the return from Babylon there was a regular system of taxation, to which doubtless the provinces of the empire generally were subjected. Three branches are enumerated, from which, however, the priests and sacred classes were specially exempted, 'toll, tribute, and custom' (Ezra iv. 13, vii. 24), probably implying direct money-payments, excise, and tolls by travellers at bridges, fords, &c. The Jews had also to defray the charges of the governor by supplying his table, and by a money-payment. This Nehemiah when in office did not exact (Neh. v.

14, 15). The Egyptian and Syrian kings imposed yet more oppressive taxes. It must be sufficient to refer to 1 Macc. x. 29-31, xi. 34, 35, xiii. 39, whence it appears that, though relief was sometimes granted, direct tribute, duties on salt, crown-taxes, and a certain proportion of the produce of fruit-trees, and corn-land, with a tax on cattle, were ordinarily required. And the burden was the more heavy because the system of farming the revenue would seem to have been then practised.

Much was exacted by the Romans: Pompey, Cassius, and others levied large sums. For the magnificence of Herod his subjects had to pay. And, when Judea was made formally a Roman province, the taxes were systematically farmed; and publicans were stationed through the country: see PUBLICAN. There were the duties (telē) to be paid at harbours, and the gates of cities, a poll-tax (kēnsos), and perhaps (phoros) a kind of property-tax (Mark xii. 14, 15; Rom. xiii. 6, 7). These imposts were regarded with great jealousy, as paid to a foreign power. There was also a house-tax in Jerusalem, remitted by Agrippa I. (Joseph., Antiq., lib. xix. 6, § 3).

For the 'taxing' or registration in order to taxation, said to be conducted by Cyrenius (Luke ii. 1, 2), see CYRENIUS. There was another at a later period (Acts v. 37).

TEACH, TEACHER, TEACHING. These words may be used with reference to the communication of religious knowledge: see MINISTER, PREACH, PREACHER; and as implying ordinary instruction: see EDUCATION, SCHOOL.

TEATS (Isai. xxxii. 12). A better translation is: 'they (the women) smite upon the breasts'—a sign of grief: comp. Nah. ii. 7.

TE'BAH (slaughter, executioner). One of the sons of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 24).

TEBALI'AH (whom Jehovah has immersed, purified). A Levite (1 Chron. xxvi. 11).

TEB'ETH (the etymology is unknown) (Esth. ii. 16). See MONTH.

TEHAPH'NEHES (Ezek. xxx. 18). See TAPANHES.

TEHIN'NAH (cry for mercy). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 12).

TEIL-TREE (Isai. vi. 13). Possibly the terebinth, Pistachia terebinthus. The original word is frequently elsewhere rendered 'oak': see OAK.

TE'KEL (weighed) (Dan. v. 25, 27). See MENE.

TEKO'A or TEKO'AH (a pitching of tents, or trumpet-clang?). A city of Judah, about twelve miles to the south of Jerusalem. It stood on an eminence, and was visible from Beth-lehem, from which it was about six miles distant; in the neighbourhood of Beth-haccerem (the Frank mountain). It was colonized by Ashur of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 24, iv. 5). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Chron. xi. 6); and it was here that the prophet Amos resided as a herdman when he was visited by the prophetic word (Amos i. 1). Other notices of it may be found in 2 Sam. xiv. 2, 4, 9; 2 Chron. xx. 20; Jer. vi. 1; and it would seem that the neighbouring wilderness bore its name.

It still retains its ancient appellation, Tekoa, but it is no more than a ruined site on the north-eastern slope of a high ridge, where the Arabs pasture their flocks.

TEKO'ITES (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chron. xi. 28, xxvii. 9; Neh. iii. 5, 27). The inhabitants of Tekoah.

TELA'ABIB (corn-hill). A place in Babylonia where some of the Jewish captives were stationed. It was by the river of Chebar; but its precise site is doubtful (Ezek. iii. 15).

TE'LAH (breach). A descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 25).

TELA'IM (young lambs). A place, probably not far from the Amalekitish frontier (1 Sam. xv. 4). Wilton identifies it with Telem, and supposes it at el-Kuseir, where there are some ruins, in the region of the Dhullām Arabs (The Negeb, pp. 86-89).

TELAS'SAR (hill of Asshur?). The name of a district in which the children of Eden conquered by the Assyrians are said to have dwelt (Isai. xxxvii. 12). It is also called Thelasar (2 Kings xix. 12). Some critics have believed it identical with Ellasar (Gen. xiv. 1, 9); but there is no sufficient ground for this. Dr. Layard is inclined to identify Telassar with Tel Afer, in the Mesopotamian plain, thirty miles distant from the Sinjar. This is still an important place, the inhabitants being of Turcoman origin. A considerable eminence, partly artificial, is crowned by an imposing castle; and at the foot of this mound lies the town, containing some well-built houses, and partly surrounded by gardens stocked with fruit-trees, beyond which expands the desert.

TE'LEM (oppression). One of the Levite singers who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 24).

TE'LEM (id.). A city of Judah, far to the south on the Edomitish frontier (Josh. xv. 24). See TELAIM.

TEL-HAR'ESHA or TEL-HAR'SA (forest hill). A place in Babylonia, from which several persons who could not prove their pedigree as Israelites went with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61).

TEL-ME'LAH (salt-hill). A place in Babylonia, from which also persons of doubtful pedigree returned (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61).

TE'MA (south, desert). One of the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 30); whose descendants are called collectively by this name, and peopled a district of Arabia. Tema is coupled with Sheba (Job vi. 16) and with Dedan (Isai. xxi. 14; Jer. xxv. 23), and appears to have furnished caravans for commerce through the desert. A fortress, Thaima or Themna, is mentioned by Ptolemy and said to be a few miles east of the road from Damascus to Mecca. This may be the same with Teymā, a small town on the confines of Syria, which there is reason to believe corresponds with the ancient Tema.

TE'MAN (id.). The eldest son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, 42; 1 Chron. i. 36). His descendants were called Temani, or Temanites: they were noted for their wisdom and their valour, and formed the strong-hold of Idumean power: they are therefore specially mentioned in the predictions against Edom (Jer. xlix. 7; Ezek. xxv. 13; Amos i. 12).

Obad. 9). Little information is supplied in scripture as to the locality of Teman's descendants; except that once indeed it is mentioned in parallelism with Paran (Habak. iii. 3). There was a little town, Teman, five miles from Petra in Jerome's time: it had then a Roman garrison: perhaps it may indicate the district occupied by the Temanites. Wilton would place Teman at the northern extremity of Edom, among the mountains of the 'Azázimeh (The Negeb, pp. 123, 124).

TE'MANI (Gen. xxxvi. 34). See TEMAN.

TE'MANITE. An inhabitant of Teman (1 Chron. i. 45). The designation is given to Eliphaz, one of Job's friends (Job ii. 11, iv. 1, xv. 1, xxii. 1, xlii. 7, 9).

TE'MENI (Temenite? one from the south?) A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 6).

TEMPLE. A building dedicated to divine worship, where the presence of the Deity was expected peculiarly to manifest itself.

We read of no such buildings in the times of the early patriarchs. They erected altars; which were apparently under trees, or on hills; and the service at them was performed in the open air. But one of the first commands to the Israelites after they had quitted Egypt was to raise a tabernacle or tent, to be the seat of the Lord's presence among them. This was made, and was carried into Canaan, and was set up in various places successively (see TABERNACLE), being occasionally called 'the house of the Lord' and 'the temple of the Lord' (1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3, 15). Perhaps, as years ran on, and the riches of the nation increased, the notion of a fixed more magnificent temple instead of the movable plainer tent, might be cherished in many a pious Israelite's heart, who longed to offer to his King that with which his bounty had blessed him. But there were wars and rumours of wars: there were national sins and national disasters. And it could be only in a settled time of security that the idea would ever be realized. Such a time, it would seem, was come, when the Lord had given David a noble empire and 'rest round about from all his enemies.' Accordingly the grateful monarch, contrasting his own palace with the abode of the sacred ark, resolved upon building a temple. The prophet Nathan commended the design, but was soon instructed to tell David that, though it was a righteous purpose, such a house must not be built by hands that had been engaged in bloody war. He might prepare the materials, and he should have the plan. But his son, a man of peace, with whom God would make a gracious covenant, should build a habitation where the Presence would abide. Large preparations, therefore, did David make, and he charged his son Solomon to do worthily the work so graciously entrusted to him (2 Sam. vii.; 1 Chron. xxviii.).

Solomon received the riches and materials collected by his father, with the offerings of the princes and the people (xxix. 1-9), and soon after he began to reign he had timber cut in Lebanon, and engaged Tyrian artizans to work with his own subjects. The progress of the building, the plan after which it was fashioned, the utensils with which it was furnished, and the time consumed upon it, from Solomon's fourth year to his eleventh, seven years and a half, are detailed in 1 Kings v.—vii.; 2 Chron. ii.—iv.

Much labour has been spent upon the description of this magnificent building; but great differences of opinion exist. One of the latest works upon it is Comte M. de Vogüé's Le Temple de Jerusalem, 1865.

It was constructed generally after the similitude of the tabernacle (Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 29, vol. i. pp. 303, 304). The temple itself consisted of two apartments, the holy place, and the most holy place, with a porch in front; while around were chambers and an external court or enclosure. The dimensions were double those of the tabernacle. The length was sixty cubits and the breadth twenty cubits, perhaps ninety feet by thirty. The most holy place was twenty cubits in breadth and length, and the same in height; consequently for the outer sanctuary there remained a length of forty cubits with the same breadth of twenty. The porch extended the whole breadth of the building; its ground-plan being twenty cubits by ten: it was one hundred and twenty cubits high, the height being specially noted as attracting peculiar attention (1 Kings ix. 8). Along the sides and probably the end were chambers, abutting upon the walls. These—and there were three storeys of them, five, six, and seven cubits in width respectively, reached by winding stairs—were doubtless lodging-places for the priests whose duty of ministrations required their attendance on the spot. Similar apartments there must have been attached to the tabernacle (1 Sam. iii. 1-15). The sanctuary is said to have been twenty cubits high; but the entire height of the structure is stated at thirty cubits. Either then there was some superstructure, or possibly there was a ridged roof, the thirty cubits being the height of the ridge from the ground.

This house was built of stone cut and made ready before it was brought thither. Much of it would seem to have been quarried under Jerusalem; and excavations have been discovered where stone was obtained and wrought, the traces of the workmen's tools being still visible (see Buchanan's Notes of a Cler. Furlough, chap. v. pp. 196, 197). But in the interior the stone-work was lined with cedar-boards, richly carved. The walls and the ceilings are said to have been of cedar and the flooring of fir. The inner sanctuary was of peculiar richness: it was overlaid with gold: the cherubim of olive-wood with their wings stretching—each five cubits long—from one extremity of the holy apartment to the other, bending perhaps over the ark, were plated with gold: so also were the floor and the doors of olive-wood carved with cherubim and palm-trees and budding flowers, and the partition, moreover, dividing it from the outer sanctuary, ornamented with gold chain-work, and the carved fir folding-doors of the outer sanctuary.

In the porch were two noticeable pillars, called Jachin and Boaz. These were probably of bronze, eighteen cubits in height with a chapter or capital of five cubits, and twelve cubits in circumference. The different accounts we have of these pillars do not agree in measurement: possibly one reckoned in the capital and pediment which others omit: see BOAZ. The pillars were curiously ornamented with lily-work, net-work or chequer-work, chain-work, and pomegranates. It is impossible exactly to describe this beautiful work. Keil's explanation will give probably as good an idea of it as can be obtained: There were seven laces, so to call them, plaited like a chain placed on the urn-shaped capitals in such a manner that winding across one another in festoons they appeared to the eye as a net-formed lattice, bordered above and beneath by a row of pomegranates encircling the capitals. Above this for an entablature the capitals were bellied and then bent out and adorned with lily stalks, leaves, and blossoms, so that the whole upper part resembled a bunch of lilies. Work of this kind appears to have been not uncommon; and Keil notices pillars, specially those of Persepolis, which may be taken as nearly resembling it. These pillars were set up in front of the porch; Jachin on the right or south; Boaz on the left or north. Some have considered them as merely ornamental, and have regarded exclusively the symbolical meaning, indicating 'the stability and strength, which were possessed not so much by the temple as an external building, as the kingdom of God in Israel incorporated in the temple by the Lord, who had chosen the temple for his dwelling-place among his people, and their emblems point to the beauty and glory of the dwelling of God.' But it would be quite contrary to general practice, as we trace it in scripture, to teach an emblematical lesson by that which had no present use. And, besides, the names, implying 'stability' and 'strength,' would be meaningless unless the pillars contributed to the stability and strength of the structure. It is most probable, therefore, that they were placed to support the lofty porch. Whether any other pillars were used in the body of the temple, we are not told: had there been such, they would most likely have been mentioned.

The overlaying of many parts with gold has been already noted. But there was still more of the precious metal used. The 'upper chambers' are said to have been so overlaid, and indeed the 'whole house'—not that we are to suppose a continuous gold casing, but that everywhere, where for beauty and glory gold was needed, it was unsparingly employed. The hinges and the nails were gold; and there were garnishments of costly gems; and the vessels and the furniture were gold. Such were the ten candlesticks, each probably like that made by Moses in the wilderness, five placed before the oracle on the right and five on the left: there were ten tables, too, similarly placed, and a hundred golden bowls and golden spoons and censers and basins. And the incense altar, put close before the oracle, made of cedar was overlaid with gold. There were also brazen or bronze articles, as the molten sea, ten lavers, and the great altar, and various utensils. And then there was the costly veil of blue, and purple, and crimson, and fine linen, with embroidery of cherubim, to hang at the entrance of the most holy place. So multitudinous and rich were all the things that pertained to the temple and the temple-services that we cease to wonder at the vast sums which are said to have been expended. How much was expended it is impossible to tell. Calculations of the treasure accumulated by David vary from seven millions of our money to a thousand millions. It is useless therefore to conjecture. The reader may find a curious discussion, and tables in Kitto's Pict. Bible, note on 1 Chron. xxix. 16.

The temple properly so called was of but small dimensions; but there was a court surrounding it in several divisions. For an inner court is mentioned, built with three courses of large stones and a row of cedar-beams. This was most probably the court of the priests; and there was the great court, with doors or gates overlaid with brass. The dimensions of these courts are not given, but doubtless the whole enclosure was large. And there must have been conveniences in it, such as excavations, and channels, and pipes, for the conveyance of water, and the removal of the blood of the sacrifices; some of which modern research has discovered. And there was an ascent by which Solomon went up to the house of the Lord, a bridge perhaps, for the remains of an arch belonging at least to the latest temple may still be seen. Portions of a causeway have also been lately found. See ALTAR, CANDLESTICK, LAVER, SEA, THE MOLTEN.

These great works were completed by Hebrew and Tyrian artificers, under the superintendance of Hiram, Israelitish by the mother's, Tyrian by the father's side, who like Bezaleel and Aholiab of old produced all that the Lord had commanded with rare and perfect skill—a house with its furniture more rich, it is likely, in noble magnificence than the world has elsewhere possessed; (see Keil's Comm. on Kings, vol. i. pp. 92-137).

It was a glorious purpose to which it was consecrated. Therein the Lord was specially to dwell, the Sovereign and Defence of Israel. The solemn dedication was at the feast of tabernacles. There was a vast assemblage. The holy ark was brought from Zion, the city of David, and placed by the priests in the inner sanctuary; and the mysterious cloud of Jehovah's presence filled the house. Solomon uttered an impressive prayer, and blessed the people; and so many were the sacrifices, which fire from heaven consumed, that the court was hallowed that they might be offered there, the great altar being far too small. The ancient tabernacle, too, with its vessels was conveyed to the temple. Glad were those sacred days; and joyful were the people as they returned to their own abodes: who would have thought that they would ever again have forsaken their own God, the living and true God, for false and foul idols?

After the solemnity God appeared a second time to the king, renewing his gracious pro-mines, and uttering warnings against disobedience (1 Kings viii. ix.; 2 Chron. vi. vii.). The warning was but too much needed; and the history of the temple is one of humiliation and sadness. Over-against it Solomon himself built idol-shrines. It was plundered during the reign of Solomon's foolish son Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 25, 26). Again and again it was neglected, spoiled, shut up, idol-altars were built in its two courts, and perhaps upon its chambers; so that generally the first step of a godly king was to cleanse and repair it (2 Kings xii. 4-18, xiv. 14, xvi. 8, 10-18, xviii. 15, 16, xxi. 4, 5, 7, xxiii. 11, 12; 2 Chron. xxiv. 4-14, xxix. 3-36, xxxiii. 4, 5, xxxiv.). Certain additions were occasionally made. Thus we find in the reign of Jehoshaphat a new court spoken of (xx. 5); but generally, as just said, the history is of deterioration and decay. And then came the final catastrophe. The 'holy and beautiful house' was burnt by the Chaldeans, and its treasures conveyed to Babylon (2 Kings xxv. 8, 9, 13-17; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 18, 19; Jer. lii. 12, 13, 17-23).

But God had still mercy upon Zion. He disposed the heart of Cyrus to issue a decree that the captives might return and rebuild their temple. And, though there was much opposition by the Jews' enemies, yet in twenty-one years, in the sixth of Darius Hystaspis, a second house was completed, and dedicated (Ezra i. iii.-vi.) at the feast of the passover. Little need be said of this. It was to be sixty cubits in height, and sixty in breadth (larger than Solomon's), with three rows (probably storeys) of stone and a superstructure of timber. But such were the deficiencies, the holy ark especially being wanting (for which a kind of substitute was devised, see ARK, p. 51), so inferior this temple was likely to be that which had preceded it, that, while the younger part of the assemblage rejoiced that they were again to have a sacred house, the elders who remembered that which had been destroyed wept with almost-unmitigated sorrow. Yet this—for, though, as described below, it was re-built magnificently by Herod, there was but in effect one second temple—was to be more highly honoured than the first. The incarnate Son of God would walk and teach therein (Hagg. ii. 9). Of Ezekiel's description no particular notice can be taken (Ezek. xl.-xlii.). It is doubtless symbolical: see EZEKIEL, THE BOOK OF: at all events that erected by Zerubbabel was not modelled on its plan; though it has been supposed that some hints were borrowed from it by Herod and his architects.

Herod had a taste for magnificence. He adorned various cities with sumptuous buildings; and, as the greatest of his works, he resolved to repair or rather to re-build the temple at Jerusalem. It had suffered much: it had been repeatedly desecrated, especially by Epiphanes, and, never a very splendid structure, it was probably dilapidated and forlorn. Herod designed to conciliate the Jews; but his want of religious concern is patent; for at the same time he re-built the temple at Samaria, and provided for heathen rites in Cæsarea. It has indeed been suggested that one of the reasons for his rebuilding the Jewish temple was to take the opportunity of destroying the genealogical records kept there. Be this as it may, the work was commenced 20 B.C.: the temple itself was finished in about a year and a-half; and the adjoining buildings in eight years. But additions were being continually made; so that the final completion was not till years after Herod's death, in 64 A.D. (Joseph., Antiq., lib. xv. 11, §§ 5, 6, lib. xx. 8, § 7). When, therefore, the Jews spoke to our Lord of forty-and-six years, they meant that the works had been so long in progress, not intending to imply that all was then completed (John ii. 20): see Alford's note on this place.

A larger space seems to have been enclosed for this building than had previously been occupied. It was extended on the east to the city-wall; and additions were probably made on the north and south. The whole was a square of about four hundred cubits. This was surrounded on every side by a range of porticoes or cloisters, composed on the north, east, and west of double rows of Corinthian columns, that to the east being called 'Solomon's porch' (x. 23; Acts iii. 11, v. 12), which, according to Josephus, had been originally built by that monarch. The cloister on the south of the enclosure was far larger and more magnificent than the rest. This, the stoa basilica, or royal porch, was formed by three rows or columns (one hundred and sixty-two in all) into three divisions, the centre forty-five feet broad and one hundred high, each of the others thirty feet broad and fifty in height, the length of all being six hundred feet: at the western extremity was the bridge leading from the temple to the palace. Into these cloisters, and the margin of the court within, all, even Gentiles, might pass. There was then a marble wall or partition three cubits high with inscriptions in Greek and Latin, forbidding any alien to overstep the boundary. To this partition the allusion is made in Eph. ii. 13, 14. It was in the court of the Gentiles that the buyers and sellers congregated (Matt. xxi. 12, 13; John ii. 13-17). Within the partition-wall was a flight of fourteen steps leading to an elevated platform, from which five more steps led through gate-ways into the court of the men. On the east, however, five steps led to the women's court, and fifteen more through the most magnificent of all the gates, probably the 'beautiful gate' (Acts iii. 2), up to the inner court. Chambers appear to have lined the north and south sides of this court; and within it stood the actual temple, with the great altar at its eastern front just within the gate-way. Both were fenced off by a low wall a cubit high, which separated the people from the priests. In one of the cloistered courts, probably that of the women, it may be added, before the pillars stood thirteen chests to receive the various offerings: it was when sitting here (no one might sit in the court of Israel) that Jesus saw the offerers casting in their gifts (Mark xii. 41-44). The temple was composed as before of a portico, the sanctuary, and the most holy place, the latter twenty cubits square, the sanctuary twenty by forty, and the portico extending on each side beyond the house itself one hundred cubits in breadth. The form of the whole, therefore, was like a T, and it was, as Josephus says, one hundred cubits in length, breadth, and height respectively, and yet not a cube. It stood most likely on the site of the original sanctuary, and it may have been the actual sanctuary of Zerubbabel, or merely that repaired.

More particulars cannot be here given: they must all in fact be to a certain extent conjectural. This, however, we know, that all kinds of ornamentation were lavished on the structure and its massive gates (see GATE). And glorious it must have been, its external walls and pinnacles overhanging the deep valley down which the eye of the spectator feared to look, its magnificent terraces and cloisters, its inner courts on their elevated platform, and the central sanctuary rising white and glistening—well might the disciples call their Master's attention to the pile and bid him mark the huge stones of which it was compacted. Mournfully must his response have fallen upon their ears: 'There shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down' (Matt. xxiv. 1, 2; Mark xiii. 1, 2; Luke xxi. 5, 6). It was the pride of the Jewish heart; and a word against their temple, or the supposed intrusion of strangers into it, constituted a deadly crime (Matt. xxvi. 61; Acts v. 13, 14, xxi. 28). And yet it was often a place of conflict and bloodshed; and the fortress of Antonia was raised at the north-western corner, from which by a stair-case and subterranean communication the Roman garrison might enter to quell a tumult.

At length the end came, 70 A.D. The cup of Judah's iniquity was full. Various portents are said to have betokened the approaching ruin; and the spontaneous movement of the great gates which required twenty men to close them, and the awful voice which resounded through the fane, 'Let us depart,' be they real or only gathered from the exaggerated reports of frightened men, yet bear their testimony to the profound conviction everywhere felt that ruin, irreparable ruin, the whisper of which should cause every ear to tingle, was at hand. It was, indeed, The Roman legions invested the rebellious city; and, though Titus used every means to save the temple, it was destroyed by consuming fire, and the Saviour's words were literally fulfilled. O grievous catastrophe! Alas! for the guilty rejected nation!

'Our temple hath not left a stone;
And mockery sits on Salem's throne.'

A vain attempt was made by the emperor Julian to re-build it. It was strangely defeated in a way which impressed even Gibbon; and, though Guizot and Milman would account for this by natural causes, yet the employment of natural causes at a critical time has often testified to the interference of the great First Cause (Decl. and Fall of the Rom. Emp., chap. xxiii. vol. iv. pp. 95-102, edit. 1838).

On the site of the temple is now a Mohammedan mosque. But in the walls of the enclosure are some of the huge stones bevelled or panelled which were part of the ancient sanctuary: there is a fragment of the bridge, mentioned above: there are subterranean passages and channels, which may have belonged to the first structure but certainly did to the last. And this is all. The temple, the glory of Jerusalem, is no more. But a yet more magnificent city is to rise, adorned with rarer beauty. And, if there shall be 'no temple therein,' it is because 'the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it' (Rev. xxi. 22).

TEMP, TEMPTATION. Temptation is a trial, proof, or allurements, often for an evil purpose, as when the natural lusts of men prompt them to sin (James i. 14), or when the devil places incentives before them, whence he is called 'the tempter' (Matt. iv. 3). But sometimes the word is used in a good sense, as when God would prove his people's faith and obedience, in order to their purification and to crown their steadfastness with his blessing (Gen. xxii. 1, 2; Deut. viii. 2, 3, 15, 16). We are taught to pray against the evil temptations of Satan (Matt. vi. 13), by which through our natural weakness we are liable to fall. But the afflictions and trials to which God subjects his people are for their good. They may be painful at first, but afterwards, if meekly endured and sanctified, they yield 'the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby' (Heb. xii. 11). Such temptations, then, may prove the richest mercies (James i. 2, 3; 1 Pet. i. 6, 7). In illustration of this it may be observed that the very purpose of God in revelation is for moral trial (see Garbett's Divine Plan of Rev., lect. ii. pp. 84, 85); and the happy result of it was never more remarkably exhibited than in the temptation of Abraham. In proportion to the severity of it—and how severe it was has been elsewhere shown: see ABRAHAM—was after its victorious endurance the blessing bestowed, the promise being made more definite than ever before of a Redeemer to the world. It was very fitting that such a promise should not be so explicitly given till the faith of him in whose line the Promised One was to appear had been fully tried. Of God's right to demand of Abraham the sacrifice of Isaac no thoughtful mind can have a question. The Creator, from whom life proceeds, may at his will take it away by any instrumentality he chooses. And Abraham would have been fully justified on such a command in slaying his son, had his hand not been arrested. True, he did not expect the mandate; but his faith bore him on. He still believed the Lord a God of mercy as well as of power, and did not doubt that in some way, inscrutable to him as yet, the seed should spring from Isaac even though he were slain. He 'believed God; and it was counted unto him for righteousness' (Rom. iv. 3).

Our first parents were overcome by the temptation which beset them in paradise (Gen. iii.). The history of their fall is related with the utmost plainness and simplicity: we cannot, therefore, hesitate in receiving it as a record of facts. The exact mode in which the tempter gained access to them, the kind of communication he held, the special weight which the inducements he urged possessed may be obscure; human language may be inadequate to represent fully the acting of a being of one kind upon one of another; so that we must not wonder if various minds of earnest men have differed in their conception of the facts recorded. Nor need we be solicitous to force them into precise agreement. Men may receive the same truth, and yet agree not in their aspect of it. But yet, while admitting a certain discordance of opinion in regard to circumstantial, we are not to doubt the historical reality of the event. The sacred writers of the New Testament, who are the most fitting and authorized expounders of the Old, expressly assert it. 'The serpent,' says St. Paul, 'beguiled Eve through his subtlety' (2 Cor. xi. 3); and again, 'Adam was not deceived; but the woman being deceived was in the transgression' (1 Tim. ii. 14).

Another mysterious event was our Lord's temptation (Matt. iv. 1-11; Mark i. 12, 13; Luke iv. 1-13). Some have been inclined to regard this as a mere vision, and some have supposed that, though the suggestions are represented in the narrative as external, they were really internal. Both these suppositions must be unhesitatingly rejected. The expressions of the evangelists seem specially chosen to mark the objective character of the whole transaction; and it is indeed a lowering of the purity of him in whom the Godhead was united to the manhood to believe that he was vexed with internal strugglings of evil against good. As to the nature of the temptations the admirable words of bishop Ellicott may properly be cited:—'I cannot think it an idle speculation that connects the three forms of temptation with those that brought sin into the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life; nor can I deem it unnatural to see in them three spiritual assaults directed against the three portions of our composite nature. To the body is presented the temptation of satisfying its wants by a display of power which would have tacitly abjured its dependence on the Father, and its perfect submission to his heavenly will. To the soul, the longing appetitive soul . . . was addressed the temptation of Messianic dominion (mere material dominion would seem by no means so probable) over all the kingdoms of the world, and of accomplishing in a moment of time all for which the incense of the one sacrifice on Calvary is still rising up on the altar of God. To the spirit of our Redeemer, with even more frightful presumption, was addressed the temptation of using that power which belonged to him as God to vindicate his own eternal nature, and to display by one dazzling miracle the true relation in which Jesus of Nazareth stood to men, and to angels, and to God' (Hist. Lect., lect. iii. pp. 112, 113). See PINNACLE.

TEN COMMANDMENTS, THE. The precepts of the decalogue (Deut. iv. 13), more properly expressed as the 'ten words' (Exod. xxiv. 38, marg.; Deut. x. 4, marg.), the solemn authoritative utterance of the Deity, originating as no other words have originated from him alone. They were proclaimed from the top of Sinai, amid mighty thunderings and lightnings (Exod. xx. 1-22), and were graven on tablets of stone by the finger of God (xxx. 18, xxxii. 15, 16, xxxiv. 1, 28). Ten was a significant number, the symbol of completeness; and in these 'ten words' was comprised that moral law to which obedience for ever was to be paid. On these, summed up as our Lord summed them up, hung all the law and the prophets (Matt. xxii. 36-40). There were two tables, the commandments of the one more especially respecting God, those of the other man. These are usually divided into four and six. Perhaps they might better be distributed into five and five. The honour to parents enjoined by the fifth commandment is based on the service due to God, the Father of his people. And it is observable that St. Paul, enumerating those which make up love to a man's neighbour, includes but the last five (Rom. xiii. 9). See LAW.

TENT. Some of the earliest habitations were tents (Gen. iv. 20). These were specially fitted for warm climates and pastoral life, where the dweller in them might locate himself according to his convenience by some springing well or under some shady tree (xviii. 4, xxv. 11; Judges iv. 5). Skins may have been used for the covering of tents (Exod. xxvi. 14); but more generally that cloth made of goats' hair of which we read (xxxv. 26, xxxvi. 14; Acts xviii. 3), and which is still in general use. Hence they are described as black (Sol. Song i. 5). The modern Arabian tents are of an oblong shape, varying in size according to the means and wants of the owner. Some are from twenty to twenty-five feet in length, ten feet broad, and probably eight or ten feet high in the middle, the sides sloping to throw off the rain. They are supported on poles, and kept steady by cords fastened to pins driven into the ground. An encampment is usually of a circular form, within which the cattle are secured at night, the centre being occupied by the tent—or often more than one—of the sheikh. He will probably have at least one tent himself, and another for his wives, besides those for servants or strangers. But, if a single tent is to accommodate a family, it is divided by curtains into two or more apartments. Carpets are spread upon the ground; and the various articles of property are distributed, much being heaped about the central pole. The tents of great personages are large and magnificent (Jer. xliii. 10). Nadir Shah, for instance, had a superb pavilion, covered on the outside with scarlet cloth, and lined within with violet-coloured satin, ornamented with various figures of animals, flowers, &c., formed of pearls and precious stones: see Pict. Bible, note on Sol. Song i. 5.

TENT-MAKER (Acts xviii. 3). It was the precept of the Jewish rabbis that a father was bound to teach his son a trade. Hence, though St. Paul had received a liberal education, we find him acquainted with a 'craft,' by means of which he could earn his living. References are frequently made to this (xx. 34; 1 Cor. ix. 12, 15; 2 Cor. vii. 2, xi. 9; 1 Thess. ii. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 8). The apostle's particular occupation was that of a tent-maker. Tents were most commonly constructed of hair-cloth of Cilician goats, which we may readily imagine was an article of commerce, and easily procurable even in distant markets.

TENTATION (Exod. xvii. 7, marg., in some copies). Temptation.

TENTH DEAL (Lev. xiv. 10, and elsewhere). The original word signifies a tenth part, used as a measure for things dry, specially grain and meal. It was doubtless the tenth of the ephah. And so in Numb. xv. 4 the Septuagint supplies 'ephah': comp. Lev. v. 11; Numb. v. 15.

TER'AH (station). The son of Nahor, and father of Abraham, Nahor, and Haran. His original dwelling-place was Ur of the Chaldees; and he was, according to Jewish tradition, an idolater. This tradition receives some countenance from Josh. xxiv. 2, 15. One of his sons, Haran, died at Ur. And afterwards Terah took Abram (most likely his youngest son), and Lot his grandson, and migrated, intending to go into Canaan. But they tarried at Haran; where Terah spent the rest of his life, and died at the age of 205 years (Gen. xi. 24-32; Josh. xxiv. 2; 1 Chron. i. 26).

TER'APHIM (guardians and givers of prosperous life?). Images kept in the houses and honoured with a certain kind of reverence. Laban had some of them; and Rachel took these when leaving Padan-aram with her husband for Palestine (Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, 32-35). So we find that they were employed for purposes of divination among the Babylonians (Ezek. xxi. 21). It is possible that Rachel, who was both impulsive and superstitious, imagined that some augury of the future might be obtained from them; and she must have considered them as having a tutelary power. The notion that she intended to check the idolatry of her father is groundless: instead of concealing, she would in that case rather have destroyed them. These images were probably some of the strange gods of which Jacob subsequently cleansed his household (Gen. xxxv. 2, 4). But it is singular that the use of them prevailed long among the Hebrews, apparently without consciousness that it must be displeasing in God's sight as a breach of the second commandment. Thus Micah who had them in his house felt sure that Jehovah would bless him when he had a Levite to minister before them (Judges xvii. 5, 13). These the Danites eagerly carried off (xviii. 14-21). It is still more perplexing to find them in David's house (1 Sam. xix. 13, 16). And it does not seem that they were altogether put away till the thorough reformation of Josiah's days (2 Kings xxiii. 24). Then, indeed, they were classed with abominable things. The word is used (1 Sam. xv. 23, rendered in our version 'idolatry') in expressing the truth that obstinacy was sinful, 'iniquity and teraphim-worship.' We find them also censured in Zech. x. 2; and Hosea employed the term to signify the state of Israel with no kind of worship either of the true God or of false deities (Hos. iii. 4).

We may gather that they were made of various materials, as of silver (Judges xvii. 4), and that they resembled a human figure sometimes of the natural size (1 Sam. xix. 13). Perhaps they were like the Roman Penates or household gods. Small figures of baked clay, some with a human head and a lion's body, and others with a human body and lynx head have been found under the pavement of the porch of the Khorsabad palace. These were, no doubt, intended to avert evil.

TE'RESH (austere). One of the two chamberlains or eunuchs who conspired against Ahasuerus (Esth. ii. 21, vi. 2).

TER'TIUS (the third). The amanensis who wrote as St. Paul dictated the epistle to the Romans (Rom. xvi. 22).

TERTUL'LUS (diminutive of Tertius). An advocate employed by the Jews to accuse St. Paul (Acts xxiv. 1-9).

TESTAMENT (Heb. ix. 16, 17). See COVENANT.

TESTAMENT, NEW (Matt. xxvi. 28; Mark xiv. 24; Luke xxii. 20; 1 Cor. xi. 25; 2 Cor. iii. 6; Heb. ix. 15, xii. 24, marg.). See BIBLE, NEW TESTAMENT, SCRIPTURE.

TESTAMENT, OLD (2 Cor. iii. 14; comp. Heb. ix. 15). See BIBLE, SCRIPTURE. Notice is elsewhere given (see MANUSCRIPTS) of written copies of the Old Testament: it may here be added that soon after the invention of printing the Hebrew scriptures were committed to the press; at first in detached portions. The most ancient edition of the whole was printed at Soncino, in 1488: it was followed by an edition at Brescia in 1494. In 1502-1517 the Complutensian Polyglott was printed at Alcalá (Complutum) in Spain. In 1525-26 the second edition of Bomberg's rabbinical bible appeared at Venice, edited by Jacob Ben Chayim. The three last-named are the standard texts which later editions have followed.

TESTIMONY. Besides the ordinary meaning of this word as witness or evidence (2 Thess. i. 10), it designates particularly the tables of stone on which were inscribed the laws or conditions of God's covenant with Israel (Exod. xxv. 16, 21, xxxi. 18); hence the ark where these tables were deposited was called the 'ark of the testimony' (xxv. 22), and sometimes the 'testimony' itself (xxvii. 21, xxx. 6; Lev. xvi. 13): the tabernacle similarly was termed the 'tabernacle of testimony' (Exod. xxxviii. 21). Also the whole revelation of God's will, the scripture or a part of it, bears this name (2 Kings xi. 12; Psal. xix. 7, cxix. 88; Isai. viii. 16, 20).

TE'TA (1 Esdr. v. 28). Hatita (Ezra ii. 42).

TETRARCH (ruler of a fourth part). A title given to various princes under Roman supremacy. The sons of Antipater, Herod and Phasael, were constituted tetrarchs, the first in Palestine, by Mark Antony. Herod had afterwards authority over all Palestine and Idumea, with the title of king. This was the sovereign misnamed 'the Great.' After his death, his sons Antipas and Philip were tetrarchs, the first of Galilee and Perea, the other of Iturea and Trachonitis (Luke iii. 1), with some other districts, while Archelaus a third son had the title of ethnarch. Lysanias is also (ibid.) mentioned as tetrarch of Abilene. The name lost after a while its significance as designating the ruler of the fourth part of a country, and was given as a title generally.

THADDEUS (breast?). The surname of Lebbeus or Jude, one of the apostles (Matt. x. 3). See JUDE.

THA'HASH (a badger, or seal). One of the sons of Nahor, Abraham's brother, by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii. 24).

THA'MAH (daughter) (Ezra ii. 53). See TAMAH.

THA'MAR (Matt. i. 3). Tamar, 1.

THAM'NATHA (1 Macc. ix. 50). Timnah, probably the present Tibneh.

THANK-OFFERING. An eucharistic sacrifice or peace-offering. See OFFERINGS.

THA'RA (Luke iii. 34). Terah.

THAR'SHISH (a breaking). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 10).

THAR'SHISH (id.?) (1 Kings x. 22, xxii. 48). See TARSHISH.

THAR'RA (Rest of Esth. xii. 1). Teresh (Esth. ii. 21).

THAS'SI (1 Macc. ii. 3). The surname of Simon, son of Mattathias.

THEATRE. This, according to its Greek meaning, was a place where spectacles, dramatic and others, were exhibited. It would be out of place to describe here the construction of Greek or Roman theatres, and the mode in which dramatic entertainments were conducted: reference must be made to works explanatory of classical antiquities, as Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiquities. But it may be noted that the Greek theatre was generally used as a place for the transaction of public business; it was senate-house, town-hall, forum, &c. &c. War was proclaimed there, peace announced, and sometimes even criminals executed. It was in the theatre at Casarea that Herod received the deputies of Tyre and Sidon (Acts xii. 20-23). The position of the theatre at Ephesus would tend to exasperate the riot described in xix. 29-41: it was within view of the temple of Diana whose worship was supposed to be endangered by the preaching of the gospel. Its site is now occupied by ruins testifying that it was 'the largest known of any that have remained to us from antiquity.' See Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul, vol. ii. p. 83, note, 2nd edit. There are some other allusions in the New Testament to the spectacles of the theatre, as in 1 Cor. iv. 9, where the apostles are represented as set forth last, perhaps like the ancient bestiarii, who were to fight with and be torn by wild beasts, a spectacle to which the universe directed its gaze. There is perhaps also a reference to the same subject in Heb. x. 33.

THE'BEZ (brightness). A town not far from Shechem, where Abimelech was killed (Judges ix. 50; 2 Sam. xi. 21). It is now called Tubás, and said to be a thriving place.

THECO'E (1 Macc. ix. 33). Tekoah.

THEFT. See DEPOSIT, THIEF.

THELAS'AR (Assyrian hill) (2 Kings xix. 12). See TELASSAR.

THELER'SAS (1 Esdr. v. 36). Tel-harsa (Ezra ii. 59).

THE'MAN (Bar. iii. 22, 23). Teman.

THEOCA'NUS (1 Esdr. ix. 14). Possibly Tikvah (Ezra x. 15).

THEOD'OTUS (2 Macc. xiv. 19). A commissioner sent by Nicanor to Judas Maccabeus.

THEOPH'ILUS (lover of God). A Christian of distinction to whom St. Luke inscribed his Gospel and apostolic Acts (Luke i. 3; Acts i. 1). Conjectures have been endless about his country and history, some of which are noted by Winer (Bibl. RWL), art. 'Theophilus'. He was probably a Gentile; but nothing certain is known of him.

THEOPH'YLACT (Mark vii. 3, marg.). Archbishop of Acridia in Bulgaria, about 1077 A. D. He wrote commentaries on many of the sacred books. He is cited for the explanation of ceremonial washing.

THERAS (1 Esdr. viii. 41, 61). A corruption of Ahava (Ezra viii. 15, 21, 31).

THERMELETH (1 Esdr. v. 36). Tel-melah (Ezra ii. 59).

THESSALO'NIANS, THE EPISTLES TO THE. When St. Paul was obliged to quit Thessalonica he went to Athens. Anxious to visit the Thessalonians again, he found himself unable (1 Thess. ii. 18) and in consequence sent Timothy (iii. 1, 2). When Timothy rejoined him at Corinth (Acts xviii. 1-5; 1 Thess. iii. 6), he wrote the first epistle. The subscription therefore is in error in stating that it was addressed from Athens.

Of the genuineness of this letter there can be no reasonable doubt. It is distinctly cited by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian; and its authority was never seriously questioned till of late years. The arguments produced against it have been most satisfactorily disproved. The occasion of writing is easily gathered from notices in the epistle. St. Paul was gratified at the report he received from Timothy (6-10). Nevertheless there were some drawbacks. Opposition from the Jews as well as Gentiles (Acts xvii. 5-8; 1 Thess. ii. 14-16, iii. 2-4) had been experienced. And the Thessalonians were disquieted in regard to the Lord's appearance: they were restless, neglecting the daily duties of life, a conscientious discharge of which is the needful preparation for that day, and they imagined that believers who were already dead were somehow likely to be excluded from the full blessing of the manifestation of Christ's kingdom (iv.). Now notions of this kind would materially interfere with that sober, circumspect, holy walk and conversation in which graces are more valued than gifts, and victory is obtained in the spiritual conflict. The apostle therefore wrote to confirm the Thessalonians in the faith, to strengthen them against persecution, to rectify mistakes, and to inculcate purity of life.

The epistle consists of two main parts. I. After an inscription (i. 1) Paul celebrates the grace of God in their conversion and advancement in the faith (2-ii. 16), and then expresses his desire to see them and his affectionate solicitude for them (17-iii. 13). II. In the hortatory part he calls to holiness and brotherly love (iv. 1-12), he speaks of Christ's advent (13-v. 11), and adds various admonitions (12-24). He then concludes with a charge that the epistle be generally read, with greetings, and a benediction (25-28).

This is the earliest of St. Paul's letters, and may be dated at the end of 52 or beginning of 53 A.D.

The second epistle was written not long after the first; for Silas and Timothy were still with him (2 Thess. i. 1), probably in 53 A.D., and from the same place, Corinth. The evidence for it is even yet more conclusive than for the first. It is alluded to by Polycarp, cited by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, and, indeed, has never been doubted till (very groundlessly) in the present century. This letter is supplementary to the first. That had been in some measure misapprehended; and the coming of Christ was taken to be close at hand. Moreover, an unauthorized use had been made of the apostle's name. He therefore wrote to correct the mistake, and to check the evil results which had flowed from it in disorderly conduct.

This letter comprises, besides the inscription and conclusion, three sections. I. A thanksgiving and prayer for the Thessalonians (i. 3-12). II. The rectification of their mistake, and the doctrine of the man of sin (ii.). III. Sundry admonitions (1) to prayer, with a confident expression of his hope respecting them (iii. 1-5); (2) to correct the disorderly (6-15). He then concludes with salutation and apostolical benediction, adding a remarkable authentication of his letters (16-18).

The style of these epistles is generally the same; and attempts to make out a diversity have failed. It is for the most part plain and quiet, save, as might be expected, in the prophetic section (ii. 1-12). For the interpretation of this prophecy other works must be consulted.

Of special commentaries on these epistles that of bp. Jewel, 1583, 1584, 1594, of which there are modern re-prints, and that of bp. Ellicott, 2nd edit, 1862, may be mentioned.

THESSALONICA. A large and populous city and sea-port of Macedonia, the capital of the second of the four districts into which the Romans divided that country after its conquest by Paulus Æmylius, and the seat of a Roman prætor. It was situated on the Thermaic bay, and was nearly, if not exactly, on the site of the ancient Therme. It had its name from Thessalonica, the wife of Cassander, who built it. She was the daughter of Philip, father of Alexander the Great, and so named because he heard of her birth the day of his victory over the Thessalians. Many Jews had settled here, where they had a synagogue. In this St. Paul preached on his second missionary journey (52 A.D.), soon after his first entrance into Europe. The foundations of a church were laid by him and Silas; most of the persons who believed being Gentiles, and Jewish proselytes (Acts xvii. 1-4; 1 Thess. i. 9). The apostle was, after a short stay, driven from the city by the violence of the Jews, who followed him even to Berea, and stirred up a persecution against him there (Acts xvii. 5-10, 13). No doubt he visited Thessalonica at least once again (xx. 1-3). A note may well be here made of the accuracy of the sacred historian. He calls the 'rulers of the city' (xvii. 6, 8) politarchai, a singular word. But it appears to this day on an ancient arch which spans the street of modern Thessalonica. Thessalonica continued an important city; it was regarded as the capital not only of Macedonia but of all Greece till the building of Constantinople; it had a large trade, and it exists still under the name of Saloniki, a considerable place with a population of 70,000. Jews are numerous, and have much influence. The principal antiquities are the propylæa of the hippodrome, and the triumphal arches of Augustus and Constantine. See Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Thessalonich.'

THEUDAS. An insurgent to whom Gamaliel alludes in his prudent speech to the council at Jerusalem (Acts v. 36). Josephus (Antiq., lib. xx. 4, § 1) mentions an out-break under a person of this name who pretended to be a prophet, and carried forth a multitude of followers to the Jordan. He was unexpectedly attacked, taken, and put to death by the Romans. This, however, occurred 44 A.D., eleven or twelve years after Gamaliel's speech. Various conjectures have been devised to explain the discrepancy. Wieseler believes that the allusion is to one Matthias who in the last days of Herod the Great was a noted insurgent. At the head of a band whom he had gathered, he demolished the Roman eagle which the king had set up over the great gate of the temple. They were, however, soon overpowered; and Matthias was burnt alive (Joseph., ubi supr., lib. xvii. 6, §§ 2, 3, 4). Now the Hebrew name Matthias is in Greek Theodotus, and this is equivalent to Theudas (Chronol. Synops., pp. 101, &c.). If this explanation be not satisfactory, it must be considered that, to take the lowest ground, it is most improbable that Luke would put a false piece of history in Gamaliel's mouth, that Josephus is frequently inaccurate, as has been abundantly proved, and, besides, that it is known that various insurgents appeared within no great space of time, and that there were several of the same name. See Alford's note on Acts v. 36.

THICK CLAY (Hab. ii. 6). This is often interpreted as signifying riches. Henderson translates, 'And ladeth himself with many pledges,' supposing that the Chaldean power is represented as a rapacious usurer, accumulating the property of others of which he would be himself plundered (Minor Prophets, p. 305). Ewald's idea is somewhat similar: 'He loads himself with a burden of debts' (Die Proph. des A. B., vol. i. pp. 381, 382): comp. Isai. xxxiii. 1.

THIEF. The Mosaic law prescribed that a thief should make restitution. He was to pay five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep, that he had killed and sold, or double if he had not made away with his booty. And, if he was not able to do this, he might be sold for his theft. If he committed it in the night, and was guilty of what we call burglary, he might be killed with impunity by the person whose property he was plundering (Exod. xxii. 1-4). There seem, however, to have been some modifications of this law. For, on the one hand, in Solomon's time the restitution was seven-fold (Prov. vi. 31); and, on the other, if a man pricked in conscience came to offer a trespass-offering for his fault, the return was to be the principal and one fifth part more (Lev. vi. 1-5).

Some question has been made in respect to the thieves crucified with our Lord; and a discrepancy has been imagined between Matt. xxvii. 44 and Luke xxiii. 39-43. In reply it has been said that St. Matthew spoke indefinitely, and therefore used the plural, while St. Luke more precisely employed the singular; the one never intending to deny what the other affirms. It may be so. But we may well remember that our Lord hung several hours on the cross, that his meekness of endurance must have made a deep impression, and that several portents occurred during the time. The minds of many of the spectators seem to have changed; and the howls of malice and derision with which he had been first assailed gave place to compassion and reverent awe (48). What marvel then—save a marvel of divine grace—if he, who, crucified justly, had at first with callous heart joined his comrade and the mocking mob in reviling the great Sufferer, found by degrees the conviction growing that that Sufferer, to whom even nature bore witness, was a Saviour, and cried to him with new-born faith, 'Lord, remember me?' Some have suggested that this man was comparatively innocent, perhaps a patriot, who had plundered the Romans, or that he became penitent before his execution. It is enough to say that these are unfounded guesses.

THIMNA'THAH (portion assigned) (Josh. xix. 43). See TIMNAH, 1.

THIRST. See WATER.

THIS'BE (Tob. i. 2). A city of Naphtali, by some conjectured to be the birth-place of Elijah, thence called the 'Tishbite.'

THISTLE. A well-known thorny plant, of which several kinds are found in Palestine. The Hebrew word dardar, implying luxuriant growth, is the Tribulus terrestris, the thistle growing in fields and among grain (Gen. iii. 18; Hos. x. 8). 'Thistle' occurs in our version in 2 Kings xiv. 9; 2 Chron. xxv. 18; Job xxxi. 40; the original word is elsewhere rendered 'thorn,' 'thicket.' The Greek term for 'thistles' (Matt. vii. 16) is translated 'briers' in Heb. vi. 8. See BRIER, THORN.

THOMAS (twin). One of the twelve whom our Lord selected as his apostles. He is also called Didymus, a Greek term with the same signification as his Hebrew name (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). In the first three lists Thomas is enumerated with Matthew, in the last with Philip. In spite of a differing tradition, there can be little doubt that this apostle was a native of Galilee (John xxi. 2). In the character of Thomas we observe a desire for the clear understanding of things and sufficient evidence of facts (xiv. 5; xx. 24, 25). He was of a thoughtful mind: his affection for his Master was warm and disinterested (xi. 16); and his faith was not, as some have characterized it, inconsiderate, running easily from one extreme to the other. He had doubted the resurrection, and described the kind of proof he required; but, when the Lord appeared, and showed by his address to him that he knew his thoughts, then the apostle naturally desired nothing more. His reason was convinced: it was his Lord and his God (xx. 26-29). And, though we may very well say that he ought to have believed before on evidence, and not sceptically have set experience, his single experience, in opposition thereto, yet there is nothing in Thomas's behaviour to surprise those accustomed to analyze the workings of the human mind. The scripture is afterwards silent as to this apostle. According to earliest tradition, he preached in Parthia, and was buried at Edessa: later histories say that he went to India, and was martyred there; and the Syrian Christians in that country claim him as the founder of their church.

THOMOT (1 Esdr. v. 32). Thamah (Ezra ii. 53).

THORN, THORNS. Thorns, thistles, brambles, and briars are frequently mentioned in scripture. Rabbinical writers say that there are not fewer than twenty-two Hebrew words which indicate thorny or prickly plants and shrubs. It would be difficult, perhaps in the present state of our knowledge impossible, to identify and describe all these; and such a minute investigation would be little suitable to the character of this work. Let it be enough to illustrate some of those passages where the mention of thorns has some peculiar interest.

All travellers speak of the prickly pear as abounding in Palestine at the present day, and forming hedges well-nigh impenetrable. Dr. Bonar scrambled through such a fence on mount Zion (The Land of Promise, p. 145), and found plenty of this plant at Nablous (Shechem): he suggests, therefore, that it may have been the bramble of Jotham's parable (Judges ix. 14, 15): he found it also abounding at Shunem and Nazareth (pp. 371, 392, 400). Jotham's bramble has been otherwise supposed to be the Lycium Euro-pæum, which is common in hedges (comp. Prov. xv. 19). We find mention of the 'lily among thorns' (Sol. Song ii. 2); and Dr. Thomson tells us that in gathering the Hülch lily he 'sadly lacerated his hands' (The Land and the Book, p. 256). There is frequent reference to the burning of briars and thorns, which Dr. Thomson remarkably illustrates. He says that the matted thorn-bush is the fuel with which lime is burned. 'And thus it was in the days of Isaiah, "The people shall be as the burnings of lime: as thorns cut up shall they be burned in the fire" (Isai. xxxiii. 12). Those people among the rocks yonder are cutting up thorns with their mattocks and pruning-hooks, and gathering them into bundles to be burned in these burnings of lime. It is a curious fidelity to real life that, when the thorns are merely to be destroyed, they are never cut up, but set on fire where they grow. They are only cut up for the lime-kiln' (p.

59). Again, 'This lad who is setting fire to these briars and thorns is doing the very same act which typified to Paul the awful state of those apostates whom it was impossible to renew again unto repentance' (Heb. vi. 4, 8) (p. 341). Once more, 'In Nahum i. 10 the prophet has a striking comparison, or rather double allusion to thorns and fire. . . . Now these thorns, especially that kind called bellan, which covers the whole country, and is that which is thus burned, are so folden together as to be utterly inseparable, and, being united by thousands of small intertwining branches, when the torch is applied, they flash and flame instantly, like stubble fully dry; indeed the peasants always select this bellan, folden together, when they want to kindle a fire from their matches' (p. 342).

The Christian would naturally be desirous of identifying the thorn of which the crown was plaited that was placed in mockery on the Redeemer's brow (Matt. xxvii. 29; Mark xv. 17; John xix. 2, 5). No absolute cer-eyes and given them to him well accords. But this is but a conjecture: others are enumerated by Dr. Alford, note on 2 Cor. xii. 7.

THRA'CIA (2 Macc. xii. 35). Thrace, the country between the Ægean, the Propontis, and Euxine, and the rivers Strymon and Danube, now Bulgaria and Roumelia.

THRASEAS (2 Macc. iii. 5). Father of Apollonius, governor of Cæle-syria and Phenice.

THREE TAVERNS, THE. See TAVERNS, THE THREE.

THRESH, THRESHING. The Israelites used different modes of threshing, according as they were suited to the different kinds of grain. A level spot was selected for the threshing-floor, generally in an exposed situation where advantage might be taken of the wind for winnowing or separating the corn from the chaff when the threshing process was completed. Dr. Robinson tells us that he observed several of these floors near together of a circular form hardened by beating down the earth, and tainty can be arrived at; still the Zizyphus spina Christi, which grows to a considerable height, and spreads its branches widely, has been supposed, and with much probability, the thorn in question. 'This plant was very suitable for the purpose, as it has many sharp thorns, and its flexible, pliant, and round branches might easily be plaited in the form of a crown; and what, in my opinion, seems to be the greatest proof is that the leaves much resemble those of ivy, as they are a very deep green. Perhaps the enemies of Christ would have a plant somewhat resembling that with which emperors and generals were used to be crowned, that there might be calumny even in the punishment' (Hasselquist, Travels, p. 288).

Threshing-floor, Armenia.

'Thorn' was sometimes used symbolically, as by St. Paul (2 Cor. xii. 7; comp. Gal. iv. 14, 15). Many have puzzled themselves to discover what the apostle's particular affliction was. There is an ingenious letter, printed in Hannah More's life (vol. iii. pp. 419-425), by Mr. Stephen, who believes it was some disorder in the eyes, with which certainly the expression that the Galatians would willingly have plucked out their own about fifty feet in diameter, the sheaves being thickly spread on them. 'Here,' near Jericho, he says, 'were no less than five such floors, all trodden by oxen, cows, and younger cattle, arranged in each case five abreast, and driven round in a circle, or rather in all directions, over the floor. . . . By this process the straw is broken up and becomes chaff. It is occasionally turned up with a large wooden fork having two prongs, and when sufficiently trodden is thrown up with the same fork against the wind in order to separate the grain, which is then gathered up and winnowed. The whole process is exceedingly wasteful' (Bibl. Res., vol. i. p. 550). This practice is alluded to in scripture; and it was provided that the oxen should not be muzzled when so employed (Deut. xxv. 4). This kindly custom is with some exceptions still observed. 'The precept of Moses,' Robinson proceeds, 'was not very well regarded by our Christian friends; many of their animals having their mouths tied up; while among the Mohammedans I do not remember ever to have seen an animal muzzled' (ibid.). Dr. Thomson, however, says that it is only the most niggardly peasants that muzzle their oxen (The Land and the Book, pp. 540, 541).

Flails or rods were sometimes used for threshing, but only for the lighter kinds of grain, or for small quantities (Ruth ii. 17; Isai. xxviii. 27, 28).

A threshing-instrument or sledge was very generally employed. The Hebrew word barkânim, rendered 'briers' (Judges viii. 7, 16), perhaps denoted such instru-

Henderson with greater probability interprets of the eagerness with which the servants of the great rushed out to seize the property of others and thereby increase the wealth of their masters (Minor Prophets, p. 331).

THRONE. The special seat of a monarch. It was raised higher than an ordinary seat, which in the east is often but a cushion or carpet on the ground, and therefore it re-ments. There were two kinds, one called môrag (2 Sam. xxiv. 22; 1 Chron. xxi. 23; Isai. xli. 15), which was a cart or sledge of thick planks, the bottom being studded with sharp stones or pieces of iron: the other, 'agâlah, rendered 'cart-wheel' (xxviii. 27), consisted of rollers of wood, iron, or stone, roughened and fastened together in the form of a sledge or dray, perhaps with a seat upon it. Both these quired a foot-stool. Hence the force of words expressing God's majesty: 'The heaven is my throne; and the earth is my foot-stool' (Isai. lxvi. 1; Acts vii. 49). A throne was generally ascended by steps; for an example see the description of Solomon's throne (1 Kings x. 18-20). So the Lord's throne is said to be 'high and lifted up' (Isai. vi. 1). A throne is the emblem of regal power (Gen. xli. 40); hence used among instruments were dragged by oxen over the sheaves. Such instruments are still in common use in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria; and the name mowrej yet survives (Thomson, ubi sup., pp. 538-541). Similar modes of threshing are also common in Spain.

Threshing-floor, Egyptian. From ancient painting, Thebes.

Modern mode of threshing in Egypt with the mowrej.

THRESHOLD. The phrase of Zeph. i. 9 has been thought to allude to the Philistine superstition in consequence of the misfortune to their god Dagon (1 Sam. v. 5).

angelic orders (Col. i. 16). To 'sit upon the throne of the kingdom' is to reign (Deut. xvii. 18; 2 Kings x. 30); and to sit upon a person's throne is to succeed to his sovereignty (1 Kings i. 13). Relics of an Assyrian throne have been discovered at Nineveh, composed of wood overlaid with bronze elaborately engraved. The legs were of ivory skilfully carved.

THRUM (Isai. xxxviii. 12, marg.). The threads which tied a web to the beam of a loom; ends of weavers' threads.

THUM'MIM (perfections, truth). See URIM.

THUNDER. See LIGHTNING.

THYATIRA. A town of Lydia previously called Pelopia and Euhippia, seated on the river Lycus between Pergamos and Sardis, the Roman road leaving it a little to the left. Thyatira was a Macedonian colony; and its chief trade was the dyeing of purple. It is a remarkable confirmation of the sacred history, that we find Lydia of Thyatira a seller of purple in the Macedonian city of Philippi (Acts xvi. 14). There are inscriptions, too, yet existing of the guild of dyers at Thyatira. One of the apocalyptic epistles is addressed to the Christian church here (Rev. i. 11, ii. 18-29), in which a female termed 'Jezebel' is specially threatened. Conjectures about her are numerous; but, as nothing certain is known, more cannot be here said. Thyatira is still a considerable town with many ruins, called Akhisar.

THYINE-WOOD. A costly aromatic wood mentioned among the merchandise of the mystical Babylon (Rev. xviii. 12). It was used in various ornamental carvings, sometimes inlaid with ivory. It appears to have been called citrus by the Romans, very likely the white cedar, Cupressus thuyoides, which grows to the height of from sixty to of a famous academy, and to the present day it is one of the four holy cities. Near to Tiberias are the celebrated baths of Emmaus (Hammam), which may have been the ancient Hammath. See HAMMATH. The present city, Tubariyeh, stands about four miles from the southern extremity of the lake at the north-east corner of a small plain. The walls enclose an irregular parallelogram, and are strengthened by round towers, ten on the west, five on the north, and eight on the south. There were also some towers along the shore. It is described as a filthy place, fearfully hot in summer, and, according to Dr. Thomson, contains about 2000 inhabitants. It suffered much by the earthquake of Jan. 1, 1837, when the houses and walls were shattered, and 600 persons perished in the ruins.

TIBERIAS, SEA OF (John xxi. 1). See GENNESARET, LAKE OF.

TIBERIUS. Claudius Tiberius Nero, the third Roman emperor, in the 15th year of whose reign John the Baptist commenced his public ministry (Luke iii. 1), and under whom our Lord taught and suffered. He was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia Drusilla. He was born in Rome 712 A.U.C., 41 B.C., and was in his ninth year when his father died. The emperor Augustus married his mother Livia; and thus eighty feet, or Thua articulata, also called Callitris quadrivalvis. The wood is of a dark colour, close-grained and fragrant.

Coin of Tiberius.

TIBERIAS. A town in Galilee, on the western shore of the lake or sea of Genesaret, sometimes also called from this place the sea of Tiberias (John vi. 1, 23). There was probably a more ancient city on or near the site (and there are various conjectures as to what this might be); for Herod Antipas cleared away the ruins of sepulchres in order to find room for the new town, which he named after the emperor Tiberius. It was from his time till that of Herod Agrippa II. the chief city of the province. And it was adorned with buildings, a royal palace, and a stadium. But the population were a motley race. Herod brought in strangers and slaves. It may be that hence, as Tiberias must have been, so to speak, ceremonially unclean, our Lord never visited it. He was often in the immediate neighbourhood; but we never read of his entering Tiberias. The inhabitants were occupied in fishing and the navigation of the lake. In the Jewish war Tiberias was an important military station. Nor did it lose its repute after the destruction of the Jewish polity. It was the seat for centuries Tiberius had a career of distinction opened before him. He was formally adopted by Augustus, in 757 A.U.C., and after various inferior honours succeeded his step-father as emperor 767 A.U.C., 14 A.D. His administration, somewhat promising at first, soon degenerated into a gloomy despotism; and after a reign of twenty-three and a-half years he died at the age of 78. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Tiberius.' He is frequently alluded to in the New Testament under the title of Cæsar (Matt. xxii. 17, 21; Mark xii. 14, 16, 17; Luke xx. 22, 24, 25, xxiii. 2; John xix. 12, 15). It may be added that the fifteenth year of Tiberius commenced Aug. 19, 28 A.D. But Mr. Savile (Introd. of Christ. into Britain, pp. 12-14) argues that Tiberius's government must be reckoned from the time when he was made colleague with Augustus, 12 A.D. If this be admitted, the fifteenth year commenced 26 A.D.

TIB'HATH (butchery). A city of Zobah, from which David, after subduing the country, brought away much brass (1 Chron. xviii. 8). In the corresponding account (2 Sam. viii. 8) we find Betah. Perhaps it may be Taibeh, between Palmyra and Aleppo.

TIB'NI (building of Jehovah). The son of Ginath, whom half the people of Israel elected king when the military nominated Omri to the crown on the treason of Zimri, 928 B.C. The struggle continued about four years (1 Kings xvi. 21-23), as it was not till the 31st of Asa that Omri obtained full possession of the sovereignty. The sacred historian says that Tibni 'died': it is likely, as Josephus (Antiq., lib. viii. 12, § 5) asserts, that he was slain.

TID'AL (fear, veneration). One of the princes who were allied with Chedor-loamer in his expedition against the king of Sodom and his confederates (Gen. xiv. 1-9). Tidal is called the 'king of nations': it may be supposed that he ruled over several nomad tribes that had been gradually subjugated, and in some degree amalgamated.

TIG'LATH-PILE'SER (lord of the Tigris? adoration to the son of the zodiac, i.e. Nin?). A king of Assyria. So far as we can gather an account of him from the scripture, we find that he was contemporary with Ahaz king of Judah. Pekah king of Israel had leagued himself with Rezin king of Syria to attack and dethrone Ahaz. They were successful in some great battles; and Ahaz was further distressed by the incursions of the Edomites and Philistines. In his extremity he applied to Tiglath-pileser, who marched against Damascus and took it, killing Rezin, and deporting many of the inhabitants to Kir. But for this service he received large contributions from Ahaz, both out of the treasures of the temple and from the royal palaces. The Assyrian had his head-quarters at Damascus, where Ahaz visited him. He sent thence troops, probably under the command of his lieutenants, who over-ran great part of the kingdom of Israel, plundering the northern districts and those of the eastern tribes beyond the Jordan, and sending the population into Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29, xvi. 5-10, 17, 18; 1 Chron. v. 6, 26; 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, 6, 16-21; Isai. vii. 1, 4-6). Some imagine that Tiglath-pileser invaded Palestine twice. In Chronicles the name is written Tilgath-pilneser.

From the deciphered inscriptions it may be inferred that Tiglath-pileser, the second of the name, was a man of low extraction, and dethroned his predecessor. He made many conquests, and is thought to have reigned from 747 to 729 B.C.

TIGRIS (Judith i. 6). A very noted river of the east, the Hiddekel of scripture.

TIK'VAH (expectation).—1. The father of Shallum, husband of the prophetess Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 14). He is called Tikvath in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22.—2. Father of a person whom Ezra employed (Ezra x. 15).

TIK'VATH (id.). See TIKVAH, 1.

TIL'GATH-PILE'SER (1 Chron. v. 6, 26; 2 Chron. xxviii. 20). See TIGLATH-PILESER.

TIL'ON (gift). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

TIMBREL. A musical instrument of percussion (Exod. xv. 20; Judges xi. 34; 2 Sam. vi. 5; 1 Chron. xiii. 8; Job xxi. 12; Psal. lxxviii. 25, lxxx. 2, cxlix. 3, cl. 4). The Hebrew word toph (frequently rendered 'tabret') may be taken to signify a drum, or tambourine. It was known in very early ages (Gen. xxxi. 27): it was common in religious festivities and seasons of joy, and is noted as an accompaniment of luxury (Isai. xxiv. 8). We nowhere find it used with martial music. And it seems to have been generally played by females, often accompanied by dancing. In the Egyptian pictures it is always in the hands of women. The form was various, sometimes circular: it was composed of a simple rim or frame of wood, over which parchment or some other membrane was stretched. The jingling pieces of metal fastened to this rim are probably a modern addition. The instrument is still in common use among the Arabs, and is called doff, and by the Spaniards aduffa.

TIME'US (perhaps polluted). The father of a blind man whom our Lord restored to sight (Mark x. 46).

TIM'NA or TIM'NAH (one withheld, inaccessible).—1. The concubine of Eliphaz, Esau's son, by whom she had Amalek (Gen. xxxvi. 12). She may be the same person who is said to be sister to Lotan, son of Seir the Horite (20, 22; 1 Chron. i. 39).—2. A son of Eliphaz (36). He it is who was one of the dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Chron. i. 51); probably ruling a district so called.

TIM'NAH (portion assigned).—1. A town on the border of Judah and Dan (Josh. xv. 10), but belonging apparently to the last-named tribe. In the time of king Ahaz it was occupied by the Philistines (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). It is most likely the same with Timnath, and Thimnathah. It is now known by the name of Tibneh.—2. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 57).

TIM'NATH, TIMNA'THAH (id.) (Gen. xxxviii. 12, 13, 14; Judges xiv. 1, 2, 5). This is probably identical with Timnah, 1. It was the residence of Samson's wife. It lies below Zorah, not far from the Wady Surar (see Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 566, 567).

TIM'NATH-HE'RES (portion of the sun). The name of a city (Judges ii. 9), called more generally

TIM'NATH-SE'RAH (portion of abundance). A city in mount Ephraim which was given to Joshua; he built it and dwelt there (Josh. xix. 50), and there he was buried (xxiv. 30). His grave was still pointed out in the time of Eusebius, who was inclined to identify this city with Timnah in the territory of Dan.

TIM'NITE. An inhabitant of Timnah, 1 (Judges xv. 6).

TIM'ON (honouring). One of the seven appointed by the apostles to administer the secular matters in the early church (Acts vi. 5). Nothing more is certainly known of him.

TIMO'THEUS (honouring, i.e. worshipping, God) (1 Cor. iv. 17, xvi. 10; 2 Cor. i. 19; Phil. i. 1, ii. 19; Col. i. 1; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1). See TIMOTHY.

TIMO'THEUS (1 Macc. v. 6, 11, 34-44; 2 Macc. viii. 30, 32, ix. 3, 24, 32, 37, xii. 10, 18-21, 24). A captain of the Ammonites, repeatedly defeated by Judas Maccabeus. Possibly the same person is not intended in all the places referred to.

TIM'OTHY (id.). One of St. Paul's most noted fellow-labourers. He was a Lycaonian, a native of Derbe or Lystra, son of a Greek father and Eunice a Christian Jewess. His grandmother Lois was also a woman of piety. The apostle calls Timothy his 'own son in the faith' (1 Tim. i. 2): he was therefore probably converted at St. Paul's first visit to Lycaonia (Acts xiv. 6, 7). On his second visit, finding him well reported of by the brethren, Paul resolved to take him as one of his companions in travel. He circumcised him (xvi. 1-3) as being by one parent of the stock of Israel, and as thereby he would have freer access to Jews. It was perhaps not long after that Paul solemnly ordained him by laying his own hands on him in conjunction with the presbytery or elders; and it would seem that some divine intimation had pointed Timothy out for the weighty charge he thus received (1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6). Perhaps his subsequent history will be best exhibited by the following table constructed by Dr. Alford, with which the account given by Bleek (Einleitung in das N.T., pp. 478, 479) may be compared.

A.D.
45	Converted by St. Paul, during the first missionary journey, at Lystra.
51	Taken to be St. Paul's companion and circumcised (Acts xvi. 1, &c.).
Autumn	Sent from Berea to Thessalonica (xvii. 14; 1 Thess. iii. 2).
52	With Silas joins St. Paul at Corinth (Acts xviii. 5; 1 Thess. iii. 6).
Winter	With St. Paul (i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1).
57	With St. Paul at Ephesus (Acts xix. 22); sent thence into Macedonia and to Corinth. (Acts ibid. ; 1 Cor. iv. 17, xvi. 10).
Spring	With St. Paul (2 Cor. i. 1).
Winter	With St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 21).
58	} With St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 21).
beginning
Spring	Journeying with St. Paul from Corinth to Asia (Acts xx. 4).
62 or 63	With St. Paul in Rome (Col. i. 1; Philem. 1; Phil. i. 1).
63-66	Uncertain.
66 or 67	Left by St. Paul in charge of the church at Ephesus (1 Epist.).
67 or 68	(2 Epist.). Sets out to join St. Paul at Rome.
Afterwards	Uncertain.

The reference to Timothy in Heb. xiii. 23 is not easily explained.

The dates given by Dr. Alford vary from who those adopted by some other critics, place St. Paul's martyrdom in 66 or 67. According to tradition Timothy was the first bishop of Ephesus; and he is said to have been martyred for the faith under Domitian. We may gather from the scriptural notices of him that Timothy was earnest and affectionate in his disposition. His willingness to leave his home and accompany Paul proves his zeal; and we find that he was abstemious (1 Tim. v. 23). It is clear also that he was not a man of strong health; and this, added to his being entrusted while yet young with important commissions, with perhaps some constitutional shyness, may account for the admonitions given in 1 Cor. xvi. 10, 11; 1 Tim. iv. 12; 2 Tim. i. 6-8, iv. 1, 2, without imputing to him that wavering which some imagine they discover, but which surely, if it existed, would have prevented the apostle from so frequently employing him on occasions where judgment and stedfastness were indispensable.

TIMOTHY, THE EPISTLES TO. The two epistles to Timothy and that to Titus are termed pastoral epistles, as containing directions for the ministry and superintendence of churches.

In the early church they were unhesitatingly received as written by the apostle Paul: allusions to them are found in Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and others: they are expressly cited as Paul's by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, &c.: they are contained in the Peshito Syriac version; and in short it was only by heretics such as Marcion that their authority was disputed. But of late years critics have again opened the question. It is alleged that they show a state of things, especially in church government, later than the times of the apostles, that the mode of thought and the diction are in marked contrast to those of Paul's recognized epistles, and that it is well-nigh impossible to find any place in his history to which we can suppose these letters to belong (see Bleek, Einleitung in das N.T., pp. 464, 465). The objections ought to be very strong to overcome the force of the external evidence, which, as just observed, is very early and very decided. And it must be noted that those who think these epistles spurious rest their opinion mainly upon the supposed necessity of bringing them down to a later period than St. Paul's life-time, to a period in fact almost close upon the testimony given of their genuineness. It would obviously be more difficult for a forger of the second century to escape detection, than for one of an earlier date. So that it is hard indeed, if the letters be spurious, to account for their immediate and general reception by all but heretics, who on the supposition would be more gifted with spiritual discernment than the orthodox. But in truth the objections will not bear examination. It is impossible to institute such an examination here: it must suffice to refer the reader to authors where he may find the matter at large discussed, as Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, vol. ii. pp. 553-557; Davidson, Introduction to the New Testament, vol. iii. pp. 100-153; Alford, The Greek Testament, Prolegomena, vol. iii. pp. 69-86. The result alone can be stated that the best-qualified critics believe the external evidence most satisfactory, and that the objections that have been urged are not sufficient to raise even a doubt of the genuineness of these letters. It is fair to say that some critics, such as Bleek (ubi supr., pp. 485-497), admit that St. Paul wrote the second epistle to Timothy and that to Titus, though they assign the first to Timothy to a later penman.

The time when these pastoral epistles were composed has been the subject of keen dispute. Some fix them to the Roman imprisonment mentioned in the Acts, and deny that St. Paul was ever liberated. But certainly it would be hard to make the directions, e.g. in 2 Tim. iv., fit in with such a theory. The state of things, too, at Ephesus, which may be gathered from what the apostle says, betokens a later period, when the 'grievous wolves' of which he forewarned the church there (Acts xx. 29, 30) were beginning to appear, with the 'perverse' men of their own body. Besides, the testimony of ecclesiastical history to St. Paul's liberation and a second imprisonment which was terminated by martyrdom seems too strong to be set aside. It is not unreasonable therefore to suppose that the apostle paid a visit to Ephesus, where he left Timothy, that after passing through Macedonia he was in Crete, assigning Titus a charge there, that he thence went into Asia Minor, and intended to winter at Nicopolis, but, being there very probably seized, was sent again a prisoner to Rome. If his death be placed in 66 A.D., the first epistle to Timothy might be written from Macedonia (or after quitting it) in 64 or 65, that to Titus soon after, perhaps from Asia, and the second to Timothy from Rome in the later part of 65. Dr. Alford as noted above places the dates still later.

The first epistle to Timothy, after an inscription (1 Tim. i. 1, 2), reminds him of the charge entrusted to him to preserve the purity of the gospel in opposition to false teachers who perverted God's law (3-11). Having mentioned the gospel, the apostle dilates on the mercy which made him a minister of it (12-17), and reiterates his charge to Timothy (18-20): he next gives directions respecting the order of public worship (ii.), prescribes the qualifications of ministerial officers (iii.); and then, after foretelling the corruptions of the latter days (iv. 1-5), he instructs Timothy how to behave himself in his office (6-16), how to admonish and direct others (v. 1-vi. 2): a censure of false teachers follows, with a warning against the love of money (3-10); then, with a reiterated charge to Timothy himself, and a benediction, he concludes (11-21). The reference to Timothy's youth (iv. 12) has been supposed to militate against the late date of the epistle. But he could hardly, on any supposition, be more than thirty-four or thirty-five, young to be placed over such a church as Ephesus.

In the second epistle, after the inscription (2 Tim. i. 1-5), there are exhortations to diligence and firmness in holding sound doctrine (6-18), to fortitude under affliction, and purity of life (ii.), with a warning against false teachers and corrupters who should abound in the last times (iii. 1-13): Paul next exhorts to diligence in ministerial labour, and touches on his own good hope (14-iv. 8), then charges Timothy to join him shortly, and concludes with various directions, salutations, and a blessing (9-22). The style and tone are just what might be expected from an affectionate father to a beloved son.

Of commentaries, bp. Ellicott's Comment. on St. Paul's Pastoral Epistles, 3rd. edit. 1864, may be specially named.

TIN. A well-known metal (Numb. xxxi. 32; Ezek. xxii. 18, 20). It is mentioned as one of the articles of Tyrian trade with Tarshish, procured it may be supposed from the Phœnician colonies in Europe (xxvii. 12), and most probably by them from the British Isles. The same word occurs in Isai. i. 25; but there it must be taken to mean some base alloy of inferior metals, combined with silver ore and separated from it by smelting. The 'plummet' (Zech. iv. 10), 'stone of tin' (marg.), was probably an alloy of lead or tin.

TIPH'SAH (passage, ford, i.e. of the Euphrates).—1. A city on the west bank of the Euphrates, the frontier of Solomon's dominions (1 Kings iv. 24). It was the Greek Thapsacus, the place where armies crossed the river, and the landing-place or point of embarkation for merchandise brought to or from Babylon, from which it was said to be six hundred miles distant. In later days, from the time of Seleucus Nicator, it was called Amphipolis. From the fourth century it decayed; and the village ed-Deyr has been supposed to mark the site. But as there is no ford there Rawlinson would place it at Suriyeh, higher up the stream.—2. A place, it is thought near Tirazah, sacked by Menahem (2 Kings xv. 16). Keil, however, maintains, though hardly with success, that this is the Tiphrah on the Euphrates (Comm. on Kings, vol. ii. pp. 25, 26).

TIRAS (desire?). One of the sons of Japheth (Gen. x. 2; 1 Chron. i. 5). It is very generally supposed that his descendants peopled the regions of Thrace. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Thiras,' where other opinions are noted. But Kalisch, looking at the connection in which the name stands with Tubal and Meshech, thinks that the seat of this people must be near Armenia. He identifies Tiras, therefore, with the great Asiatic mountain-chain of Taurus, and believes that it 'comprises all those Asiatic tribes the territory of which is traversed by the Taurus proper, and that it includes, therefore, Cilicia and Pamphylia, Pisidia and Lycia, and, with the extension usual in almost all the names of the Japhethites, embracing likewise most of the nations of Asia Minor and of the interior' (Comm. on the Old Test. Gen., pp. 246, 247).

TIRATHITES. A family of scribes who dwelt at Jabez (1 Chron. ii. 55). The word from which this designation is derived signifies a gate; but no place of the name is known.

TIRE. An ornament enumerated among the articles of female dress (Isai. iii. 18). These tires appear to have been in the shape of crescents, hung upon a neck-chain. They were not peculiar to women; for we find them worn both by men and by camels (Judges viii. 21, 26, where the same word occurs, rendered in our version 'ornaments,' and in the margin 'ornaments like the moon'). The 'tire' of Ezek. xxiv. 17, 23, was an ornamental head-dress, a turban. The original word for this is the same as that used in Isai. iii. 20, in our version 'bonnets.'

TIR'HAKAH (exalted?). A king of Cush, or Ethiopia, who marched against Sennacherib while invading Judah (2 Kings xix. 9; Isai. xxxvii. 9). Sennacherib, when he heard of the approach of this formidable foe, was naturally anxious to secure Jerusalem: he therefore dispatched forces at once to alarm Hezekiah into submission. Tirhakah was a powerful monarch, sovereign of Ethiopia and Thebais: he must be identified with the Tarakos of Manetho, the third king of the twenty-fifth dynasty of Ethiopian kings, and the Tearkon of Strabo, with whom the Ethiopian dynasty in Egypt came to an end. He is variously said to have reigned eighteen or twenty years, 714-696 B.C., or 717-696 B.C., or even longer. We are told that he penetrated as far as the pillars of Hercules westward, and deserved to be ranked, like Sesostris, with the great conquerors of the ancient world.

TIR'HANAH (a scourge). A son of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 48).

TIR'IA (fear). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 16).

TIRSHA'THA (severe, your severity). The title of the Persian governor of Judea. It has invariably the article, and is given to Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65, 70), and to Nehemiah (viii. 9, x. 1); who in xii. 26 has another title, rendered 'governor' in our version.

TIR'ZAH (delight). One of the five daughters of Zelophehad, who were to have their father's inheritance, but to marry only in their own tribe (Numb. xxvi. 33, xxxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3).

TIR'ZAH (id.). A Canaanitish city, the king of which was one of those destroyed by Joshua (Josh. xii. 24). It appears to have been proverbial for its beauty (Sol. Song vi. 4). Tirzah, shortly after the disruption of the kingdom, became the residence of Jeroboam and his successors, till, the royal palace having been burnt by Zimri, and probably the city despoiled, Omri chose out another metropolis and built Samaria (1 Kings xiv. 17, xv. 21, 33, xvi. 6, 8, 9, 15, 17, 23, 24). We have afterwards only a brief notice of Tirzah in the time of Menahem (2 Kings xv. 14, 16). Its site has not yet been identified, though some would fix on Tell'azah, a thriving place in the mountains north of Nablus.

TISH'BITE. The designation of the prophet Elijah (1 Kings xvii. 1, xxi. 17, 28; 2 Kings i. 3, 8, ix. 36). See ELIJAH, p. 255.

TIS'RI (expiation? beginning?). See MONTH.

TITANS (Judith xvi. 7). According to classical legend the children of Uranus (heaven) and Gaia, or Terra (earth), vanquished by the gods of Olympus.

TITHE. There are some instances in patriarchal history of the dedication of a tithe or tenth part of property to the Deity, or to his priest. Such we find in regard to Abram and Jacob (Gen. xiv. 20, xxviii. 22). And examples may readily be produced, whether derived from scripture or sanctioned by some original tradition, of similar offerings among heathen nations.

The first command given to the Israelites respecting tithes was shortly after the deliverance from Egypt (Lev. xxvii. 30-33; comp. Numb. xviii. 21-28). Here a general principle is laid down. The tenth of the cattle and of the produce of the earth was to be devoted to the Lord, and to become the property of the Levites, a tribe which had no territorial inheritance as the rest had; and a tenth of the Levites' tithe was to be devoted to the priests. Of this tithe that of cattle must be paid in kind: that of fruits might be redeemed on addition of one-fifth to the estimated value.

As the Israelites approached the promised land, more particular legislation became necessary. Accordingly it was prescribed that the tithes (especially those of the produce of the land) were to be carried to the place God intended to choose 'to put his name there,' and there to be eaten by the whole family with the Levites in rejoicing thankfulness before the Lord (Deut. xii. 5-18). If, however, the sacred place were too far distant, then the tithes and firstlings might be turned into money, and that money laid out in the chosen place for the purchase of meat and drink, in which as before the family and the Levites might participate and rejoice (xiv. 22-26). Further, every third year (the sabbatical year) would be left out of the computation) this tithe was to be laid up in a man's gates, as distinguished from the place of the sanctuary, and there it was to be shared with the poor, the stranger, and the Levite (28, 29). And, as it would seem that the tithes were not collected or reckoned by any officer, but were to be carried as a glad offering to the Lord, it was further commanded that a man bringing his basket should profess before the priest that he had truly tithed the increase with which God had blessed him (xxvi. 12-14). The institution, then, appears to have embraced two objects: there must be a grateful acknowledgment of God in the dedication of a tenth to the support of the sacred tribe who were specially engaged in holy services; and there must be another similar portion set apart for the promotion of social intercourse in a holy festival, the Levite being invited also thereto; and, that this might not degenerate into a mere worldly feasting of friends, every third year the festival was to be held at home for the special benefit of the needy. Some biblical critics, indeed, suppose that the last-mentioned was an additional tithe, so that there were three every third year: it is more reasonable, however, to imagine that there were but two, as above stated.

Samuel warned the Israelites that a king would exact a tenth for his royal establishment (1 Sam. viii. 15, 17): it has been imagined that this was the poor man's tithe: more likely the prophet meant that, whereas there had previously been but ecclesiastical offerings, there would now, in addition, be a tenth exacted for purposes of state. If it were merely a transference, not a fresh burden, Samuel's warning could have had little weight.

Through the deterioration of the people the proper offerings of the tithes were neglected. Hezekiah therefore re-imposed the obligation; and the produce was under certain officers (2 Chron. xxxi. 4-19; comp. Neh. xii. 44). The prophets censure the prevalent neglect (Amos iv. 4; Mal. iii. 8-10). In New Testament times some ran into the opposite extreme, and tithed the most trifling articles, though, while they thus attended to the form, they disregarded the substance of religion (Matt. xxiii. 23; Luke xi. 42, xviii. 12).

Various regulations in regard to tithes insisted on by rabbinical writers may be seen in Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Zehent.'

TITTLE. The point or fine stroke by which one letter differs from another (Matt. v. 18; Luke xvi. 17). Some of the Hebrew characters have a close resemblance: thus, those equivalent to our d and r are distinguished only by the shoulder of the one being rounded, while the other has a slight projection—a 'tittle.'

TITUS. One of St. Paul's companions and fellow-labourers. He was a Greek or Gentile by birth, and as such uncircumcised. It is presumed that he was converted by the instrumentality of St. Paul, who addresses him (Tit. i. 4) as his 'own son,' and whom, with Barnabas, he accompanied probably from Antioch to Jerusalem at the time that the council of apostles and elders was held there (Gal. ii. 3 compared with Acts xv. 2). Afterwards, on St. Paul's third missionary journey, at the close of his long stay at Ephesus, he sent Titus to Corinth to promote the collection for the saints at Jerusalem, and to ascertain the temper with which the apostle's first letter to the Corinthian church (which possibly Titus had himself with another disciple carried) was received (2 Cor. viii. 6, xii. 18). At Troas Paul had expected to meet Titus; but not finding him there he went into Macedonia (ii. 12, 13); where he met him, and was cheered with the news he brought (vii. 6, 7, 13); he subsequently sent him again to Corinth with the second epistle, to complete the collection (viii. 6, 16-18, 22-24). We then lose sight of Titus; and it is singular that he is nowhere mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles. Some have imagined he may be in that book under another name; but there is no name there to which we can well fit what we know of his history. We afterwards learn from the letter to him that he was left in Crete (Tit. i. 5), but that when Tychicus or Artemas should arrive he was to hasten to join the apostle at Nicopolis (iii. 12, 13), most likely the city so called in Epirus. Titus probably did rejoin him, and subsequently left him for Dalmatia (2 Tim. iv. 10), whether or no with St. Paul's sanction has been doubted. Nothing more of him is certainly known; but we may gather from the notices already referred to that he was zealous, with steadiness of purpose, and judicious mind: no other surely would the apostle have placed among the Cretans, or sent to Corinth at the time he did Titus. According to tradition, after preaching in Dalmatia, he returned to Crete, lived long as bishop there, and there died in extreme old age.

TITUS, THE EPISTLE TO. The short letter to Titus, after an inscription (Tit. i. 1-4) explains why the apostle had left him in Crete, and gives him instructions for his behaviour there in ordaining elders (5-9), in censuring the evil-disposed (10-16), in ad-monishing various classes, being himself an example to all, and enforcing his counsels with the highest sanction (ii.). He was also to urge obedience to constituted authorities, and holiness of life generally, from the consideration of God's infinite love in Christ (iii. 1-8): foolish questions were to be avoided, and heretics rejected (9-11). An invitation to join the apostle at Nicopolis, and some special directions and salutations, conclude the letter (12-15). The inhabitants of Crete were noted for their avarice, fraud, mendacity, and general depravity. It was no light charge, therefore, that was committed to Titus; and very precious to him would be the fatherly counsels of the apostle for his guidance among such a people.

The date of this epistle and the place of writing have been much controverted. Some would assign it to a comparatively early period, while others with more probability suppose that it was penned nearly at the close of St. Paul's life. It very much resembles the first epistle to Timothy; and the reasons which indicate the time of writing that will decide in regard to this letter. See TIMOTHY, THE EPISTLES TO. Perhaps we may suppose it written, about 65 A.D., in Asia Minor, while the apostle was on his way to Nicopolis. Its genuineness is amply established. Besides earlier references, we have the distinct testimonies of Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian; and in fact, if the epistles to Timothy be received, it is impossible to reject that to Titus.

Bp. Ellicott's Comment. on the Pastoral Epistles, 3rd edit. 1864, of course includes that to Titus.

TITUS MANLIUS. See MANLIUS.

TI'ZITE. The designation of one of David's heroes (1 Chron. xi. 45); it is not known whence derived.

TO'AH (inclined, lowly). A Levite (1 Chron. vi. 34); but in 26 the name of Nahath is substituted, and in 1 Sam. i. 1 that of Tohu.

TOB (good). The place or district to which Jephthah fled when expelled by his brethren (Judges xi. 3, 5). It was probably to the north-east of Palestine, and identical with the place noted in 2 Sam. x. 6: comp. 1 Macc. v. 13, where the Jews of Tobie are said to have been put to death. We can only conjecture its exact position.

TOB-ADONI'JAH (good is my Lord Jehovah). A Levite sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

TOBI'AH (pleasing to Jehovah).—1. One whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel; but they could not prove their pedigree (Ezra ii. 60; Neh. vii. 62).—2. An Ammonite, who joined with Sanballat and other enemies of the Jews in obstructing Nehemiah's purpose of re-building the wall of Jerusalem. He is called 'the servant': he perhaps had been a slave, but had risen to influence (ii. 10, 19, iv. 3, 7, vi. 1, 12, 14, 17-19). He was allied to some of the chief Jews; and therefore many favoured him. There was even a connection between him and Eliashib the high priest. So that while Nehemiah was absent from Jerusalem opportunity was taken to allot Tobiah an apartment in the buildings belonging to the temple. At the governor's return this sacrilege was put an end to, the chambers purified and restored to their proper use (xiii. 4-9).

TOBI'AS.—1 (Tob. i. 9, and elsewhere). The book of Tobit, and hero of the apocryphal book so called.—2 (2 Macc. iii. 11). The father of one Hircanus, a man of note.

TO'BIE (1 Macc. v. 13). Tob.

TOB'IEL (Tob. i. 1). The father of Tobit.

TOB'IAH (pleasing to Jehovah).—1. A Levite whom Jehoshaphat sent forth to teach (2 Chron. xvii. 8).—2. One to whom a memorial crown was to be given after the return from captivity (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

TO'BIT. A person who, according to the apocryphal book which bears his name, was an Israelite of the tribe of Naphtali, and was carried captive by Enemessar or Shalmaneser to Nineveh.

TO'BIT, THE BOOK OF. It is questioned whether the account of Tobit is historically true—whether it has a basis of truth with legendary stories grafted thereupon, or whether it is altogether fabulous. But the improbabilities, the inconsistencies of the narrative, and contradictions to what authentic history proves and to what we know of geography, are so great and glaring that it is not easy to arrive at any other conclusion than that the whole is a fiction (see Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1858, pp. 373-382).

The object of this work is to show that a truly-pious man, who relies on God and is diligent in prayer and good works, will secure the divine favour and be delivered out of difficulties. The author was in all probability a Jew of Palestine; and, though no certainty can be arrived at as to the date of the composition, it may not unreasonably be placed before our Lord's time—perhaps about the Maccabean period, or even still earlier. And very likely the language in which this book was originally written was Hebrew. Several translations were made, some of them at an early date; and various texts, more or less differing, are now extant. Of these may be enumerated (1) Jerome's Latin, rendered as he says from the now-lost Chaldee. But he probably consulted also some other text. This is the Vulgate, adopted by the Roman-catholics; Luther translated from it; (2) The Greek of the LXX., which some have believed to be the original; (3) A revised incomplete Greek text, printed by Tischendorf in 1846; (4) The Syriac, made from the Greek, in the London Polyglott; (5) The ante-Hieronymian Latin, published by Sabatier, of which some variations have since appeared; (6) The Hebrew text of Sebastian Munster, first printed at Basil in 1542; (7) The Hebrew of Paulus Fagius, of the same date, but which appeared originally at Constantinople in 1517.

The natural air of this story and the curious incidents it relates have always made it popular; and it was referred to or cited with respect by many of the early fathers. But it was not deemed to have a place in the sacred canon. The ancient lists almost unanimously are silent, or expressly exclude it. The small evidence which has been produced in its favour is very dubious. So that it was not till the council of Trent (1546) that a solemn decree was pronounced for it, and it became authoritatively canonical in the Romish church.

TO'CHEN (a measure). A village or town of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 32).

TOGAR'MAH (breaking bones? Armenian tribe?). A son of Gomer of the family of Japheth (Gen. x. 3; 1 Chron. i. 6). His descendants are represented as an agricultural tribe, breeding horses and mules, in which they traded with Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 14), also as a well-armed and military nation (xxxviii. 6). The inhabitants of the Tauric peninsula answer in the different divisions of their population to both these characteristics: we may therefore with much probability identify Togarmah with the Taurians. See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 238, 239. Others would connect Togarmah with Armenia, and suppose the Phrygians descended from this stock.

TO'HU (perhaps inclined or lowly) (1 Sam. i. 1). See TOAH.

TO'Í (error). King of Hamath (2 Sam. viii. 9, 10). He is called Tou in 1 Chron. xviii. 9, 10.

TO'LA (a worm).—1. One of the sons of Issachar (Gen. xli. 13; Numb. xxvi. 23; 1 Chron. vii. 1, 2).—2. A judge of the tribe of Issachar, who dwelt and was buried in Shamir in mount Ephraim. His administration lasted twenty-three years (Judges x. 1, 2).

TO'LAD (birth, generation). A city of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 29). It is identical with Eltolad (Josh. xv. 30, xix. 4). See ELTOLAD.

TO'LAITES. A family of Issachar, descended from Tola (Numb. xxvi. 23).

TOL'BANES (1 Esdr. ix. 25). Telem (Ezra x. 24).

TOMB. See BURIAL, SEPULCHRE.

TONGUE. Besides the literal meaning of this word (Judges vii. 5; Mark vii. 33), it is sometimes personified (Isai. xlv. 23), sometimes used for speech generally (1 John iii. 18), sometimes for a language (Acts ii. 11), or for the people speaking a language (Isai. lxvi. 18). The phrases 'scourge of the tongue' (Job v. 21), i.e. a slanderer, 'double-tongued' (1 Tim. iii. 8), i.e. a deceiver, 'the tongue of the learned' (Isai. l. 4), i.e. the ability to speak wisely, are easily intelligible. The word is also used for anything resembling a tongue in shape: a 'tongue of gold' (Josh. vii. 21, marg.), a 'tongue' of the sea (xv. 2, marg.), i.e. bay, a 'tongue of fire' (Isai. v. 24, marg.; Acts ii. 3).

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF. The different nations of the world are at the present day yet more separated by the diversity of their speech than they are by geographical distance and position. There is a natural tendency in tongues to diverge. The habits, the wants, the productions of one people vary from those of another; and therefore words and phrases are needed and will be formed by the one which, as unnecessary, are never even conceived by the other. Thus we see continually new words establishing themselves in our own language, keeping pace with the progress of invention: 'photograph,' 'telegram' are familiar examples. Again, if there is a commingling of different tribes, there will be in course of time a tongue compounded of the dialects they severally spoke. Thus of modern English the Roman, Saxon, and Norman ingredients may yet be distinguished.

Seeing that there is such a variety of languages in the world, it is a question whether they have been produced in the ways just indicated, or whether at any period there was a more sudden development of change. Those best qualified to form a judgment agree in reducing the almost-innumerable existing dialects to a very small number of families. In a previous article it was shown that, excluding certain American and African languages, the rest might be arranged in three families, called, as Max Müller and many other philologists denominate them, the Semitic, the Arian, and the Turanian families. See LANGUAGE. Dr. Bunsen is very nearly of the same mind, and deduces tongues from the Semitic, the Iranian, and the Turanian stocks. Moreover, he thinks that there are mutual material affinities perceptible, which seem to imply a common descent. And there are indications, too, that American and African tongues, not formally ranked under the three great families, exhibit types not altogether dissimilar, which point to one or other of them as a source. The examination, therefore, of the existing phenomena of language would seem to corroborate the scripture assertion that for some time after the deluge 'the whole earth was of one language and of one speech' (Gen. xi. 1).

Many philologists, however, maintain that for the developments and diversities now existing a vast succession of ages—far more than the scripture chronology allows—must have elapsed. To meet this acknowledged difficulty the scripture alleges the supernatural interference of God (2-9). Those who object to miraculous intervention at all of course cavil at the statement. They must be replied to on the broad ground of principle: see MIRACLE, SCRIPTURE. But such as see nothing incongruous in God's moral government of the world he has formed, and who deem the scripture credible when it relates supernatural equally with ordinary events, will acknowledge the harmony of the inspired record with the results of investigation—one original tongue, an impulse of change by the divine touch, the natural ramifications of that change in the vast variety of existing tongues. And that there was time for these so far to diverge as they have done from the stock to which they belong is proved by the fact that in modern times, in our own days, a new dialect is known to establish itself in the course of a few years, or sometimes even months.

The matter is well discussed by Duns in his Bibl. Nat. Science, vol. i. pp. 280-291; and his conclusions are: '1st, that human language was originally the direct gift of God to man; 2nd, that at Babel he showed his sovereignty over his own gift in interfering with it, that it might subserve his purposes after the flood as it had done before;

3rd, that language was originally one; and 4th, as a sound and legitimate deduction from this, that the human race was from the beginning one.' Kalisch agrees so far as to say that 'the linguistic researches of modern times have more and more confirmed the theory of one primitive Asiatic language, gradually developed into the various modifications by external agencies and influences' (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 318).

It was God's purpose when the families of Noah's descendants multiplied that they should overspread the earth; and, according to an old tradition, Noah was to command their migration, and to divide, as it were, the world among them. But they did not choose so to separate. In the plain of Shinar multitudes of them resolved to settle, and to establish there a proud sovereignty. Nothing was better fitted; to disappoint their plans than to confound their speech: they were compelled to leave unfinished the vast tower they had commenced, round which Babylon afterwards clustered, and to go forth apart, dwelling, according to their generations, in the various regions of the globe: see an interesting paper on the dispersion in Kitzo's Daily Bibl. Illust., first series, sixth week, fifth day. The ruin now called Birs Nimrud has been supposed to be the remnant of the mighty tower commenced in the plain of Shinar. It may occupy the same site; but the existing fragments are of a less ancient building—one, it would seem, erected or completed by Nebuchadnezzar. See BABEL, pp. 84, 85. It may be added that a cuneiform inscription by this king at Borsippa, where the tower stood, has been interpreted by Dr. Oppert. It comprises a notice of the confusion of tongues: 'Since a remote time people had abandoned it, without order expressing their words': see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1554, 1555.

It is well to observe that we must not class the three families of languages according to the three sons of Noah: those of Hamitic descent are sometimes found using what are called Semitic tongues. But to discuss this part of the subject is impossible in the present work. It must suffice to say that the confusion at Babel did not regard tribes as such; for it cannot be satisfactorily shown that the Semitic families received one form of speech, the Japhetic another, the Hamitic a third.

TONGUES, GIFT OF. A promise was given by the Lord that his disciples should in his name 'speak with new tongues' (Mark xvi. 17). This was first fulfilled on the day of pentecost, when the Holy Spirit descended; and a multitude of Jews of various countries, gathered at Jerusalem to the feast, heard the apostles speak in the vernacular dialects of the different lands where these, Parthians, Medes, Elamites, &c. &c., resided. This wonderful event was declared to be the accomplishment of Joel's prophecy (Joel ii. 28-32; Acts ii.). And subsequently others, too, received the same supernatural power (x. 44-46).

It is evident that it was no inarticulate sound that was thus uttered; for the foreign Jews understood the apostles: it was not merely a mystical phraseology that was used; for each man recognized the tongue of the country in which he was born: a linguistic power was actually imparted. It is necessary to enquire whether this was permanent—whether, in fact, it was intended to enable the first preachers of the gospel, visiting the different regions of the earth, to converse with each nation they came to in languages which they had never learned.

Now, first of all, so far as we have accounts of the propagation of the gospel in scripture, there was little need of such a faculty. The extraordinary prevalence of the Greek language through the civilized world was one of those preparations which the providence of God had ordered, and which contributed to render the time when Christ appeared so fit for the purposes of his advent. Wherever the apostles went through the Roman dominion, Greek was understood, not merely by the educated but really by the masses of men, to whom they could thus freely make known their message. And, besides, there were Jews in every city, to whom they first applied themselves. Most of the Jews, no doubt, rejected the gospel; but generally there were some individuals whose hearts God touched, and who thus could be the means of explaining in the vernacular tongue of the district the teaching of the apostles and evangelists.

Again, we find no hint in scripture of any of the first preachers using such a power for access to those to whom they spoke: rather, there are indications of their sometimes being ignorant of what persons around them said. Thus, when Paul and Barnabas were at Lystra, the circumstances that occurred are not easily explained if we suppose that they could speak Lycaonian. For immediately on the healing of the cripple there was a shout, in Lycaonian, 'The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men.' Had the apostles understood this, they would surely have interfered at once; whereas it was not for some time, till the priest of Jupiter came forth, and oxen and garlands were brought, that they understood what was going to be done (xiv. 8-18).

Still further, the description of the speaking with tongues on the day of pentecost does not agree with the notion that the disciples had acquired a new faculty of conversing at their pleasure in one or more languages hitherto unknown to them. It is expressly said that they spoke 'as the Spirit gave them utterance' (ii. 4), evidently implying that they gave utterance to sounds (possibly not understood by themselves: comp. 1 Cor. xiv. 3) dictated by the Holy Spirit.

Besides, such manifestations of divine power usually, if not exclusively, occurred (so far as we read) in Christian assemblies, in which men so gifted uttered words of prayer or praise. On the day of pentecost it was not that the disciples went forth to search out foreigners: they were engaged in a private assembly in a house; and it was only at the news of something extraordinary occurring there that the crowd collected whom Peter seized the opportunity of addressing, evidently in Greek. When the supernatural gift was bestowed on the Gentiles, this also was in the house of Cornelius, where but a few were assembled (x. 44-46). And St. Paul, discussing the matter, speaks of it as occurring in a Christian congregation (1 Cor. xiv.). The gift, he says, was to be repressed if there was no power of interpretation. Else it was very likely that such utterances would make plain unlearned persons believe the speakers mad. The people who did not understand on the day of pentecost had similarly charged the apostles with drunkenness (Acts ii. 13).

Where, then, it will be asked, served the gift of tongues? It may be replied, that the benefit was two-fold. 'He,' says St. Paul, 'that speaketh in a tongue edifieth himself' (1 Cor. xiv. 4): his spirit holds high communion with God, as that of Paul himself did when, whether in the body or out of the body he could not tell, those charmed words fell into his opened ear which with human tongue he could not utter. So man may be brought in near appulse to the Deity: his soul may be filled with mystic power; and from his lips there may issue some lofty strain as the Spirit moves them, of the full meaning of which he is himself unaware, though he feels to his joy that he is brought into the secret place of the Most High. In some measure this was the case with the prophets. They lost not their individual consciousness, but they comprehended not all that 'the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify' (1 Pet. i. 10-12). Then, again, the gift of tongues was a sign, an authentication of the divine mission not alone to those who exercised the gift, who felt in themselves the energy of the Holy Ghost, but to those also in whose language they uttered prayer or praise. As before said, to such as understood not the language spoken it would seem confusion, but to one who heard in his own tongue the wonderful works of God a weighty testimony was afforded (Acts ii. 5-12). And so, as St. Paul says, 'tongues are for a sign . . . to them that believe not' (1 Cor. xiv. 22). Dr. Alford's note on Acts ii. 4-8 may be consulted with advantage.

TOOTH. The tooth is instanced as one of the particulars in which, in the public administration of justice, a retaliatory punishment was to be inflicted (Exod. xxi. 24; Lev. xxiv. 20; Deut. xix. 21). For the loss of a tooth, too, a bondman was to be set free (Exod. xxi. 27). Several common phrases or proverbial expressions were in use in regard to the teeth. Thus to 'gnash the teeth' implies rage, suffering, or despair (Matt. viii. 12; Acts viii. 54). 'Cleanness of teeth' indicates famine (Amos iv. 6). The action of an acid substance on the teeth is alluded to in Ezek. xviii. 2. 'To escape with the skin of the teeth' (Job xix. 20) is sometimes explained as escaping just with life. But, probably, Job describing his emaciation means to say that the only part of his flesh which did not adhere tightly to his bones was the integument covering the teeth.

TOPAZ. The Hebrew word piddah is supposed to be derived from the Sanscrit pita, yellowish, pale. It occurs several times in scripture (Exod. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10; Job xxviii. 19; Ezek. xxviii. 13). In the passage referred to in Job the gem intended is called the 'topaz of Ethiopia' or Cush; and, according to Pliny, there was an island named Topazos on the western coast of the Red sea, and another called Cytis, at the entrance of the sea, both noted for topazes. A 'topaz' was one of the foundations of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20). But in all probability the so-called 'topaz' is our chrysolite.

TO'PHEL (lime). A place to the east of the Arabah (Deut. i. 1). It is now called Täfilah.

TO'PHET, TO'PHETH (place to be spit upon? tabret-grove? according to some, pleasant) (2 Kings xxiii. 10; Isai. xxx. 33; Jer. vii. 31, 32, xix. 6, 11, 12, 13, 14). See GEHENNA, HINNOM. Tophet at the extremity of the valley of Hinnom, placed by some to the south, and by others more to the east, near the mouth of the Tyropæon, was probably once a place of recreation, a part of the royal gardens; afterwards it was defiled, and became an abomination.

TOR'MAH (fraud). If this be a proper name, it must be that of a place not far from Shechem (Judges ix. 31, marg.).

TORTOISE. One of the reptiles prohibited to the Hebrews for food (Lev. xi. 29). Probably a species of lizard, Lucerta Libyca, living in deserts, may be intended. The Psammosaurus Scincus or Monitor terrestris has also been suggested. See LIZARD.

TO'Û (error). A king of Hamath (1 Chron. xviii. 9, 10). See TOI.

TOWER. The Hebrew for tower is derived from a word signifying 'to be great'; it was so called from its altitude (Gen. xi. 4, 5). It generally signified the towers or citadels of fortified towns (Judges viii. 9, ix. 46, 47, 49, 51, 52; 2 Chron. xiv. 6), sometimes a fortress itself (1 Chron. xxvii. 25, where in our version 'castles'; Prov. xviii. 10). Again, it is put for a watch-tower (2 Kings ix. 17, xvii. 9), or the watch-turret of a vineyard (Isai. v. 2: comp. Matt. xxi. 33). The word is figuratively used, as when God is said to be 'a strong tower' to his people (Psal. lxi. 3), and probably for proud ungodly men (Isai. ii. 15, xxx. 25).

TOWN. See CITIES.

TOWN-CLERK. The officer so called in Acts xix. 35 was keeper of the archives, and public reader of decrees. He presided over popular assemblies, and put matters in them to the vote. Other functions were sometimes assigned to him. The post therefore was one of dignity and influence.

TRACHONI'TIS (Luke iii. 1). A region called Argob in the Old Testament: see ARGOB. Augustus placed the country under the authority of Herod the Great, that he might clear it of the banditti with which it was over-run. It was afterwards a part of the tetrarchy of his son Philip.

TRADITION. A delivery or handing down (Judges vi. 13). Tradition is usually considered to imply that which was taught by oral instruction, in opposition to that which had been committed to writing. At the beginning of the gospel the Christian doctrine was taught orally, there being as yet no written documents. Consequently St. Paul refers to 'traditions' which he commands to be held fast, being as binding as any commandments delivered in any other way (2 Thess. ii. 15, iii. 6). Instruction so conveyed through many intermediate persons was, however, liable to be corrupted. And so the Jews had really contradicted God's law by expositions which they pretended were of equal or even superior authority. For this our Lord reproved them (Matt. xv. 1-9). They attached more importance to their traditional exposition of the law than to the law itself, calling the latter water, the tradition the wine that must be mingled with it. Their traditions were subsequently collected into the Talmud. The Christian church has been divided on this subject. According to the Anglican confession, 'holy scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation' (Art. vi.), being the sole rule of faith. The church of Rome, on the other hand, allows a co-ordinate authority to unwritten traditions handed down in the church from the apostles (Concil. Trid., Sess. iv. Decret. April 8, 1546).

TRANCE. A supernatural state of body and mind, in which without the loss of consciousness the mind is borne aloft, and scenes are vividly represented to the internal eye, and divine communications made to the understanding (Numb. xxiv. 4, 16, 'lying,' in sleep probably, 'with open eyes' i. e. of the mind; Acts x. 10, xi. 5, xxii. 17). The 'deep sleep' of Adam (Gen. ii. 21) has been thought to be a trance.

TRANSFIGURATION. The glorious change in our Lord's appearance understood by this word is narrated by three of the evangelists (Matt. xvii. 1-8; Mark ix. 2-8; Luke ix. 28-36). It is also referred to by one of the eye-witnesses (2 Pet. i. 17, 18). The transfiguration occurred shortly, about a week, after Peter's remarkable confession (Matt. xvi. 16), and may fairly be supposed to have some connection with it, and with the announcement immediately after made of approaching suffering and death. The disciples could not bear to hear of events so mournful, which, if they should happen, would seem to quench all their hopes of Messiah's triumphant kingdom. They were to be taught, therefore, that, while the law and the prophets paid homage to the gospel, and Moses and Elijah, the representatives of the one and the other, were seen as Messiah's servants, the communion they held with him was, even while he was radiant with heavenly splendour, in regard to his decease which he should accomplish at Jerusalem. This, the death of Jesus, was the great event to which the finger of the past was pointing, and for which he had come into the world; and the lesson was designed to strengthen and comfort the apostles in the dark approaching hour, with the assurance that he that died in weakness was yet the power of God, heaven's mighty King, to whom all creation must do reverence. After this their faith ought not to have faltered.

The locality of the transfiguration is traditionally Tabor; but there was then a fortified town on its summit; and, as the place last named is Cæsarea Philippi (13), it is more reasonable to believe that the scene was on one of the spurs of Hermon.

TRANSGRESSION (Rom. iv. 15; 1 John iii. 4). See SIN.

TREASURE-CITY (Exod. i. 11). See PITHOM, RAAMES.

TREASURY (Luke xxi. 1; John viii. 20, and elsewhere). See TEMPLE, p. 870.

TREE. Both good and evil men are compared to trees (Psal. i. 3; Isal. lxi. 3; Matt. iii. 10; Jude 12). Fruit-trees were not to be destroyed in the siege of a city (Deut. xx. 19, 20).

Tree-worship has been a form of idolatry, extending over a large part of the world. Single trees were perhaps venerated for the beauty of their form; and under groves altars were erected and evil rites performed in the gloom of their shade (Isai. lvii. 5; Ezek. xx. 28); hence the prohibition against planting a grove near to the altar of God (Deut. xvi. 21). Oracular trees are mentioned in classic authors; and the Druidical reverence for oak-groves is well known.

TREE OF KNOWLEDGE, THE. See KNOWLEDGE, THE TREE OF.

TREE OF LIFE, THE. See LIFE, THE TREE OF.

TRESPASS-OFFERING. See OFFERINGS.

TRIAL. The earliest account we have of judicial proceedings in Israel is that which describes Moses as sitting daily to administer justice (Exod. xviii. 13-16). At the suggestion of Jethro, sanctioned by the divine command, he afterwards appointed inferior courts (17-26; Deut. i. 9-17). There appear to have been subsequently various smaller local or provincial courts, besides the highest tribunals. See COUNCIL, JUDGES. A trial was generally very summary. It was held, some suppose, in the morning (Jer. xxi. 12); but the text alleged can hardly be taken as sufficient authority for this. It is likely that anciently people pleaded their own causes (1 Kings iii. 16-28); but in later times the Jews were familiar with the practice of hiring advocates (Acts xxiv. 1-9). The courts were public, held occasionally at the gate of a city (Deut. xxi. 19). The judges were enjoined to act with impartiality (xvi. 18, 19); and the severest censures were passed on such as received bribes or perverted justice (e.g. Isai. i. 23, 24; Luke xviii. 2-6). The matter was investigated by witnesses and the oath of the parties, the accused himself being sometimes adjured to tell the truth (Matt. xxvi. 63). In criminal cases a single witness was not sufficient (Deut. xvii. 6, xix. 15); and, if the witnesses could be proved to have spoken falsely, the same punishment was inflicted on them as the accused, had he been guilty, would have suffered (ix. 16-21). When the charge was brought home to the criminal, judgment and execution followed immediately, the hands of the witnesses in capital cases being the first upon him (xvii. 7; 1 Kings xxi. 13; Matt. xxvii. 1, 2; Acts vii. 57, 58). On some occasions, however, there might be an appeal (Deut. xvii. 8-13). Sometimes the lot was employed to discover a culprit, but not to convict him (Josh. vii. 14-18; 1 Sam. xiv. 37-45). See Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., cap. 72, vol. ii. pp. 271-278.

In countries where the Romans established their authority they allowed the continuance of certain native courts; but the tribunal of the Roman prefect or other superior officer was supreme. And the Roman law prescribed that every accused person should have fair opportunity of defending himself (Acts xxv. 16). Neither might a Roman citizen be scourged or in any way tortured to force a confession (xxii. 24-29).

TRIBE. A distinction into families or tribes was very general among the nations of the east. And so we find that the twelve sons of Jacob were each the head of a clan or tribe in Israel. An enumeration of these twelve patriarchs and their children is given in Gen. xvi. 8-27; and a fuller list, when each tribe had become numerous, with the families of which it was composed, may be found in Numb. xxvi. 5-51. The number of tribes was indeed thirteen, because Joseph's two sons Ephraim and Manasse were each made a tribe-progenitor. But, as to the Levites the priesthood was assigned, and they were to have no separate territory but towns situated locally in all the different parts of the country, there were but twelve territorial divisions, and Israel was ordinarily regarded as composed of twelve tribes (Exod. xxiv. 4; Josh. iv. 4; 1 Kings xviii. 31; James i. 1). At the head of each tribe was a prince (Numb. i. 16, 44, ii. 3-31, vii. 2), a regulation which continued substantially in force under the monarchy (1 Chron. xxviii. 16-22). There were probably other inferior tribe-officers. The tribes, though forming one nation, and on great occasions acting collectively, yet exercised much independent power, and had their separate wars (Judges i. 3); remarkable instances of which occurred in the reigns of Saul and of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv. 41-43, v. 10, 18-22). Several of the judges, too, seem to have had their authority acknowledged only by certain tribes. When the kingdom was established, the unity of the whole was to a great extent consolidated; though we still find evidences of tribal jealousy (2 Sam. ii. 4-9, xix. 41-43). The two leading tribes of Judah and Ephraim were especially rivals; and so necessary was it felt for the king, though of Judah, to conciliate Ephraim, that Rehoboam went to Shechem to be inaugurated (1 Kings xii. 1). There, however, his folly produced a decided breach: an Ephraimite monarchy was established, in opposition to that of the house of David; and, while ten tribes banded together under Jeroboam, Judah and Benjamin alone, augmented by the Levites, and ultimately by portions of Simeon and Dan, continued to obey Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 1, 13, 14). The breach was never healed; and the nation was thenceforward two great bodies. Still, as before noted, the tribal divisions were kept in mind, and the brotherhood of the whole from time to time acknowledged. It was probably in reference to the twelve tribes that our Lord appointed twelve apostles (Matt. x. 1-4); and in the last book of the New Testament canon the extension of the church and her ultimate glory are set forth by illustrations taken from the twelve-fold division of Israel (Rev. vii. 4-8, xxi. 10-21).

TRIBUTE. See TAX, TAXING. The tribute-money demanded of our Lord (Matt. xvii. 24-27) was the temple-rate. It had been a question between the Pharisees and Sadducees, whether the payment was to be obligatory. Our Lord, in yielding to the demand in compliance with the dogma of the former, yet asserted the moral freedom of himself and his disciples, who belonged to a higher kingdom, from the impost.

TRINITY. This word does not occur in scripture: it has been devised by theologians to express that which the scripture plainly teaches, that in the unity of the Godhead there are three Persons, that in the mode of his subsistence the Divine Being is, in some way incomprehensible to us, three and yet one. In a book compiled by ordinary men some attempt would probably have been made to explain the mystery, at all events to define the terms of it. Scripture makes none. For human language is inadequate to such a task; or, even if language were not inadequate, the human understanding could not have grasped the full knowledge of a theme so high. But it by no means follows that we are to reject a thing as fact because it is above our comprehension. Continually in ordinary life we admit that to be true which we cannot explain. It is to the fact, then, as scripture teaches, that we must look. And as a fact the scripture reveals the doctrine of the Trinity in two ways, first in passages in which the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are mentioned together as God, and secondly in passages which speak of each as divine. A reference to some of the former class only can be made here. It is admitted that, though the Old Testament, read in the light of the New, is in perfect unison with it, yet the great doctrine there taught is the unity of God as opposed to polytheism. In the New Testament further and clearer evidence is given. See Matt. iii. 16, 17, xxviii. 19; 1 Cor. xii. 3-6; 2 Cor. xiii. 14; Eph. iv. 4-6; Tit. iii. 4-6; 1 Pet. i. 2; Jude 20, 21. These passages, carefully read and diligently pondered, are sufficient to prove that 'the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost is all one, the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal; such as the Father is, such is the Son, and such is the Holy Ghost; the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God; and yet they are not three Gods, but one God.' Among eminent authors who have vindicated the doctrine of the Trinity may be named bp. Bull in his Defensio Fidei Nicenæ; and Dr. Waterland, Works, vols. i. ii. iii. edit. 1843.

TRIPOLIS (2 Macc. xiv. 1). A Syrian city, the point of federal union for Aradus, Sidon, and Tyre. It was long an important place. It is represented by the modern Tarabulous; but the small fishing-place el-Myna is probably on the site of the ancient city.

TRIUMPH. We have repeatedly accounts in scripture history of rejoicings and triumphal processions when a victory had been obtained or some great national success achieved. The first noticeable occasion was when Abram returned from the slaughter of the eastern kings, bringing back the plunder which they had carried from the cities of the plain, and the recovered captives. Princes went out to meet him; and grateful offerings were made (Gen. xiv. 16-24). Another example is when Israel had safely passed through the Red sea, and their enemies the Egyptians lay dead upon the shore. Then indeed did Moses lead a noble song; and the people joined their voices with his; and the women took their part with timbrels and dances, in praise of him, the Lord Jehovah, who had so gloriously triumphed and given marvellous deliverance to his chosen, the seed of Jacob (Exod. xv. 1-21).

It was customary for victors to form a joyful procession, bearing with them and sometimes parading the booty they had taken and the captives they had brought (Numb. xxxi. 12; 1 Sam. xxx. 16, 20; 2 Chron. xx. 25-28). The returning troops were met by those who welcomed them and celebrated their praises (Judges xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7); congratulatory odes were composed (Judges v.); honours were heaped upon the general, presents given him, offerings made to the Lord, and a portion of the spoil bestowed on friends (Numb. xxxi. 48-54; Judges viii. 22, 24-27; 1 Sam. xxx. 26-31). It was natural that on such occasions there should be great joy; and accordingly the gladness of conquerors dividing the spoil passed into a proverb (Isai. ix. 3). Allusion seems to be made to such festal scenes in the Psalms (e.g. Psal. xxiv. 7-10, lxviii. 17, 18); the rather as the battle was the Lord's; and he gave his people victory; and, moreover, the prophetic eye looked forward to the complete conquest, to be obtained by Messiah over his and his church's foes, and his glorious return to his Father's throne (comp. Eph. iv. 8).

It is well known that what was emphatically termed a 'triumph' was a high honour conferred by the Romans on a successful general. A particular description of the ceremonies of it must be sought in other works. Here it can be only said that there was a magnificent procession, that the spoils taken from the enemy were exhibited, that the kings and commanders captured were made to walk in chains, and that the conqueror rode in a splendid chariot, clothed in a gorgeous robe, and attended by his troops from the gate of the city to the capitol. It was in such a way that the furniture of the temple was carried before Titus on the conquest of Jerusalem; and the figures of some of the sacred articles yet remain sculptured on his triumphal arch. To such a triumph there are allusions in the New Testament. Thus St. Paul thanks God for leading us in triumph as participators of Christ's victory (2 Cor. ii. 14). For, as Dr. Alford notes on the place, 'in our spiritual course our only true triumphs are God's triumphs over us.' Also the triumph of God in Christ, when he exhibited all principalities and powers as subject to his supremacy, is spoken of (Col. ii. 15).

TRO'AS. A sea-port town near to the Hellespont, between the promontories Lectum and Sigeum, south of the site of ancient Troy; sometimes considered as belonging to the Lesser Mysia. It was built by king Antigonus, and called Antigononia Troas; but afterwards the name was changed to Alexandria Troas, in honour of Alexander the Great. This town was made a colony with the jus Italicum by Augustus (see COLONY), and must, if we may judge by the ruins, have been of considerable extent. Indeed, it was of importance as the point of arrival and departure for those journeying between Macedonia and certain Asiatic districts. Two visits of St. Paul to Troas are recorded in the apostolic history (Acts xvi. 8, 11, xx. 5, 6). It was here that he had the heavenly vision which led him to cross over into Europe with the gospel message; it was here too that the fall and restoration to life of Eutyclus occurred. See also 2 Cor. ii. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 13. It is now called Eski Stamboul.

TROGYLIUM. A cape and town on the Ionian coast between Ephesus and the mouth of the Meander at the foot of mount Mycale over-against Samos. St. Paul in sailing along the coast stopped a night there (Acts xx. 15).

TROPH'IMUS (a person nourished, or a nourisher). An Ephesian Christian, who, on St. Paul's third missionary journey, having preceded him to Troas, went thence with him to Jerusalem (Acts xx. 4). It was on his account that the tumult against Paul was excited by the Jews (xxi. 29). He is afterwards mentioned as being left at Miletum sick (2 Tim. iv. 20); which cannot well have occurred till after the apostle's imprisonment at Rome. Trophimus was probably one of the brethren who carried the second epistle to the Corinthians (2 Cor. viii. 16-24).

Egyptian trumpeter.

TRUMPET. The Hebrew word shôphâr is frequently so rendered in our version, but occasionally CORNET, which see. Possibly it was a straight tube, as distinguished from the curved horn; but opinions differ. This is sometimes combined with another word (e.g. Josh. vi. 4), rendered 'trumpets of rams' horns; more probably it should be trumpets of loud sound or alarm. There is another word hhâtzôtz'erah, also translated a Roman trumpeter.

Roman trumpet.

'trumpet.' Two of these were made of silver by Moses, and they were to be used by the priests in calling an assembly of the people, or summoning the princes, or as the signal for a march, also in war, and on days of gladness, and on certain festivals, or at the beginnings of months. Solomon must have made many more for the temple-service.

Greek trumpeter.

For we find one hundred and twenty priests at once blowing with them at the dedication of the temple (2 Chron. v. 12, 13). We may conclude that the instrument, no doubt a long (according to Josephus nearly a cubit) straight tube, was thenceforth used on ordinary occasions of rejoicing and of sacred worship (xx. 23, xxiii. 13). These trumpets are figured on the arch of Titus.

TRUMPETS, THE FEAST OF. The first day of the seventh month was appointed to be a sabbath of rest, all servile business being suspended, and a holy convocation, accompanied by a continuous blowing of trumpets. This, therefore, was the feast of trumpets. It was the beginning of the civil year. The special sacrifices were to be a ram and seven lambs as a burnt-offering, with the appropriate meat-offering, also a kid as a sin-offering, all in addition to the regular daily and monthly sacrifices (Lev. xxiii. 23-25; Numb. xxix. 1-6). Psal. lxxxii. is used in the service of the day, by the modern Jews. Trumpets are still blown by them the first day of the seventh month, and on the morning of each preceding day for a month; also at sun-set on the day of atonement. This blowing of the trumpet is considered as a memorial of the joyous day of creation; it is a call to repentance, to remind men of the law, the prophets, the destruction of the temple, the binding of Isaac, the day of judgment, and the resurrection; it is also a call to prayer for the restoration of Israel. No Jew with any sense of religion neglects attendance at this solemn rite on the first of Tisri. For a full account of the ceremonies observed see Mills' British Jews, part ii. chap. vi. pp. 157-166, 173.

TRUTH. The conformity of words with things. God is described preeminently as true, one who cannot lie (Tit. i. 2; Heb. vi. 18). Our Lord declares himself 'the truth' (John xiv. 6), and is said to be 'full of grace and truth' (i. 14). Hence whatever comes from God is true; and the divine word or the gospel is called 'truth' (viii. 32; 1 John ii. 21). So any divine revelation is characterized (Dan. x. 21). Truth is enjoined (Zech. viii. 16), also as a Christian grace (Eph. iv. 25), and is to be the girdle of the Christian warrior's loins (vi. 14); and they that are not truthful are excluded from the celestial city (Rev. xxi. 27). Still we have remarkable examples of a want of truthfulness in many eminent persons (Gen. xii. 13, xx. 2, xxvi. 7, xxvii. 19, 24; 1 Sam. xxi. 2, and elsewhere). Their conduct, however, must not be taken in any way to authorize or excuse insincerity. It was certainly displeasing in God's sight.

There are two Greek words alēthes and alēthinos, both often rendered 'true.' The latter rather implies 'real,' 'genuine,' 'unfeigned,' as in Luke xvi. 11.

TRYPHENA (delicate). A Christian female at Rome whom with Tryphosa St. Paul commends and salutes (Rom. xvi. 12).

TRYPHON (1 Macc. xi. 39, 54, 56, xii. 39-53, xiii. 1, 12-24, 31-34, xiv. 1-3, xv. 10-14, 37-39). A native of Cariana, originally named Diodotus. After the death of Alexander Balas he professed to support the claim of Antiochus VI. his son to the Syrian throne, but before long he murdered Antiochus and seized the crown himself. His authority, exercised with violence, was not universally acknowledged; and at length he was expelled by Antiochus VII. and put to death; or, according to some accounts, he committed suicide.

TRYPHO'SA (living delicately) (Rom. xvi. 12). See TRYPHENA.

TSI'DON (Gen. x. 15, marg.). See SIDON.

TU'BAL (a flowing forth). One of the sons of Japheth (Gen. x. 2; 1 Chron. i. 5). Tubal and Meshech are frequently united in scripture, and are spoken of as distant nations, and as trading with Tyre (Isai. lxxvi. 19; Ezek. xxvii. 13, xxxii. 26, xxxviii. 2, 3, xxxix. 1). They must therefore be northern tribes, powerful hordes of Scythians. And, as Meshech denotes the Moschi, we may well suppose Tubal the Tibareni, once spreading over the country between the Caspian and Euxine, but in later days occupying a more restricted territory on the south-eastern shore of the Euxine. Copper is still abundant in the mountains of northern Armenia; and beautiful slaves have been furnished to the Asiatic markets from the neighbouring localities. These are just what Tubal is represented as dealing in with Tyre.

TU'BAL-CA'IN (worker of metallic ore?). One of the sons of Lamech of the line of Cain: he is said to have been the first artificer in brass, i.e. copper, and iron (Gen. iv. 22). Perhaps he was the original of the Vulcan of heathen mythology.

TUBI'ENI (2 Macc. xii. 17). A colony of Jews settled in the places of Tobie (1 Macc. v. 13), probably Tob.

TURBAN (Dan. iii. 21, marg.). The word so rendered, but in the text 'hats,' more properly signifies mantles. The turban is a well-known kind of head-dress in common use among oriental and Mohammedan nations. See HEAD-DRESS.

TURPENTINE-TREE (Ecclus. xxiv. 15). The terebinth, Pistacia terebinthus, very common in the east.

TURTLE-DOVE. See DOVE. There are several species of this bird enumerated by Mr. Tristram as common in Palestine, such as Turtur auritus, the turtle-dove, Turtur Egyptianus, the palm-dove or Egyptian turtle, Columba livia, the rock-dove, &c.

TY'CHICUS (fortunate). A Christian of Asia, possibly an Ephesian, who was St. Paul's companion in travel (Acts xx. 4). It would seem that he carried the epistles to the Ephesian and Colossian churches (Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 7). Later journeys of Tychicus are mentioned (2 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. iii. 12); and it is thought that he and Trophimus were associated with Titus in the mission to Corinth referred to in 2 Cor. viii. 16-24.

TYPE. This word is immediately from the Greek, which signified originally anything produced by blows, hence impression, print (John xx. 25), figure, form, as an image (Acts vii. 43), or, tropically, as the meaning of a letter (xxiii. 25), the purport of a doctrine (Rom. vi. 7); also, with a more exact reference to the thing which makes the impression, counterpart (v. 14); and hence, generally, pattern, example to be followed or to be avoided (Acts vii. 44; 1 Cor. x. 6, 11; Phil. iii. 17). If, then, we take type as denoting a rough draught or model from which a more complete image is made, we may define a type theologically considered as the symbol of some future person or thing, the example prepared and designed to pre-figure that future person or thing. What is so pre-figured is commonly called the anti-type.

The reality of a type depends on the truthfulness of the supposed relationship. It is not enough to discover a resemblance. The typical relation must be intended, that is, the type must be designed and prepared by God. The belief in an intended relationship must not be stigmatized as fanciful. It prevails through various departments of the natural as well as the moral world, the law of growth and progress in organized life. 'In the typical system of nature, says Dr. McCosh (The Supernatural in relation to the Natural), 'the earlier is a sort of pre-figuration of the later. The seed contains what is to become the full-grown plant. The embryo has already what is to expand into the full-grown animal.'

Now, in examining this relation theologically (for we may well suppose that the pre-natural operations of God will be governed by laws similar to those which rule the order of nature), we have to see whether there is a sufficient basis furnished by scripture itself; for, if not, typical interpretation can be but an imaginary thing. That there is such a basis, examination of the divine word will sufficiently show. There are a multitude of illustrations, as when the Baptist was to go before Messiah 'in the spirit and power of Elias' (Luke i. 17), and was actually designated as Elias by Christ (Mark ix. 12, 13). Again, according to the lifting up of the brazen serpent was to be the elevation of Christ upon the cross (Numb. xxi. 8, 9; John iii. 14, 15). So, too, Adam is termed 'by way of antithesis) a figure or type of Christ (Rom. v. 14). And, not to accumulate examples, through a great part of the epistle to the Hebrews the writer expressly asserts that there was an ulterior meaning in the ritual of the old dispensation, so that it was introductory to and pre-significative of the new and better covenant. He that misses the understanding of this must have a most inadequate conception of the Mosaic law. Its ceremonies must appear to him burdensome and well-nigh useless rules: he must read scripture without a plan: he cannot see the consistent march of God's purposes; nor is his ear open to the harmonies of revelation. For in truth, though the Jews could not perceive it, Christianity lay in Judaism as leaves and fruit lie in the seed. There was an unity in the religious design of the two dispensations, which as time rolled on was continually developed, every divinely-given rite, and promise, and prophecy disclosing more and more God's counsels, even to the completion of the whole plan in Christ. Setting out from this truth, and taking always the New Testament as the key to the full understanding of the Old, we conclude that type was connected with anti-type, not by an accidental similarity of outward circumstances, but by a divinely-appointed inward relation of one to the other, involving the idea of fulfilment. The teaching by sensible objects was intended and was calculated to make a broad impression. It is true the whole purpose of God was probably not comprehended at the time. The person who was a type, or the writer who made mention of a typical thing, might not always be aware of the fact. Still typical persons and things, pointing surely to the future, were not without their present use: they were institutions in the existing worship, or events in the current providence of God, with a purpose to accomplish at the time, apart from the prospective reference to the future. In this prospective aspect type was a kind of prophecy, distinguished indeed from ordinary prophecy, because it pre-figured while prophecy predicted, but yet serving in a manner the same purpose, and admitting illustration on similar principles. This, then, the real and designed connection between the Old Testament and the New, is the basis of typical interpretation.

There have been various arrangements proposed of types: perhaps they may most conveniently be classified as ritual, prophetic, and historical types. (1.) If we compare the history and economy of Moses with the New Testament, we shall see pre-figurations of better things to come in the gospel. The rites and ceremonies prescribed were typical of Messiah's work and of the blessings thence obtained. This (as before remarked) is fully established by the epistle to the Hebrews. (2.) In using the term 'prophetic types' care must be taken to guard against misapprehension. A prophet may perform a symbolic action to convey more vividly the idea of what he predicts to the minds of those around him; and yet his action may not be a prophetic type. Isaiah was to walk naked and barefoot (Isai. xx. 2-4), to picture out the shameful captivity of the Egyptians—but this was symbolical, 'a sign and wonder,' nothing more. It is, however, easy to imagine a combination of type and prophecy, and to expect that, by means of the typical in action, a body and form might be supplied to the prophetic in word. Now this, according to Dr. Fairbairn (Typol. of Script., 2nd edit. vol. i. book i. chap. iv. pp. 100-127), may occur under four different modifications. (a.) When a typical action is historically mentioned in the prophetic word; and thus the mention, being that of a prophetic circumstance, comes to possess a prophetic character. Various instances may be found, as in Psal. xli. 9 compared with John xiii. 18; Exod. xii. 46 with John xix. 36. As they originally appear, these are of an historical cast; in the one case David's personal experience of treachery, the like to which might often occur. But it was not merely a casual reproduction of these facts, and a noting of the coincidence, which we find in the gospel history. Our Lord and his apostles see here a closer connection, a prophetic element, which must find its fulfilment in the personal experience of Christ. The utterances concern David and the paschal lamb, both bearing a typical relation to Messiah; so that their being descriptive in the one respect necessarily implied their being prophetic in the other. What had formerly taken place in the experience of the type must substantially renew itself in the experience of the great Anti-type, whatever inferior renewals it might find besides. (b). When something typical in the past or the present is represented in a distinct prophetic announcement as to appear again in the future; the prophetic in word being combined with the typical in act, into a prospective delineation of things to come. We have an example in Zech. vi. 12, 13; where in language taken from the literal re-building of the temple a like but more glorious work is predicted for the future. The building of the temple was itself typical of the incarnation, and of the raising up in Christ of that house which should be 'an habitation of God through the Spirit:' see John ii. 19; Eph. ii. 20-22. Another example is in Ezek. xxxiv. 23; where the future blessing on God's people is described as a return of the person and times of David. (c). When the typical, not expressly and formally, but in its essential relations and principles, is embodied in an accompanying prediction, which foretells things corresponding in nature, but far higher in importance. This modification is similar to the preceding one, but extends beyond it. We have examples in the song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1-10), which seems to have formed in some degree the groundwork of that of the Virgin (Luke i. 46-55); and in Psal. ii. (d). When the typical is itself future, and is partly described, partly pre-supposed in a prophetic word, as a ground for the delineation of other things yet more distant, to which it will hold a typical relation. Examples are to be found in those prophecies which, while Babylon yet held her supremacy, depicted her fall and the deliverance of captive Judah from thralldom, and the return of the banished to their own land. The deliverance accomplished from the yoke of Babylon was a fitting prelude to the main subject of the prophecy, which, by means of the imagery hence supplied, described a greater fall, and a happier rescue, and a more settled establishment of God's ransomed church in a better land, from which they should never be cast out. (3). Historical types are the characters, actions, and fortunes of some eminent persons whose history is recorded in the Old Testament, ordered by divine providence to be pre-figurations of the characters, actions, and fortunes of future persons who should live under the gospel dispensation. And here it is seen that 'Christ is the end of the history as well as of the law of the Old Testament.'

Many rules have been given for the interpretation of types. Only a few observations which appear most likely to be useful can be made here. 1. There must be a fit application of the type to the anti-type. It has been already shown that more is required than mere resemblance to constitute one thing the type of another. There must have been designed resemblance. The type and the anti-type must both have been pre-ordained, as constituent parts of the same general scheme of divine providence. It is the previous design and the pre-ordained connection which constitute the relation of type and anti-type. It is necessary to repeat and insist on this, because, obvious as the rule is, it is continually neglected; and fanciful expositors seeing types in everything have almost turned the scripture into a book of riddles. Thus some have declared that the oak in which Absalom was caught was a type of Christ's cross; and the long war between the house of Saul and the house of David (2 Sam. iii. 1) is said to typify the contest between the righteousness of works and that of faith (Muenscher, On Types and Typical Interpretation, in Amer. Bibl. Repos., Jan. 1841, pp. 93, &c., very well exposes this unwarrantable licence). 2. There is often more in the type than in the anti-type; so that we must not apply all the particulars of the one to the circumstances of the other. But he it observed, that it is only in accidental particulars, not belonging to the typical relation, that this can occur. A type as such can contain no more than the anti-type. But God may very well design one person or thing to be a shadow of somewhat to come, not in every particular but only in respect to some special feature; so that every circumstance in a type is not typical; and great care must be used in discovering the intended typical resemblance. For example, the ritual of the law generally points onward to Christ; but many things pertaining to the Levitical priests have no counterpart in Christ. The Mosaic priest was to sacrifice for his own sins (Heb. v. 3), an act in no respect applicable to Christ (vii. 27). 3. Frequently there is more in the anti-type than in the type. No single type can fully express the life and actions of Christ, who far transcends all adumbration of him by earthly things. One type, therefore, may signify one particular and another type another of him. And so from the imperfection of a single type we occasionally find two conjoined, as in the appointment of the two goats (Lev. xvi. 5-23). 4. A sinful person or a sinful act must not be made a type of Christ. That which is bad in itself cannot pre-figure that which is good. Neglecting this rule, some expositors have represented the adultery of David as having a typical reference to Messiah. And in the case of the relation of Jonah to Christ we must carefully observe that the point of resemblance consists not in the prophet's being in the belly of the fish, which was the punishment of disobedience, but in his coming forth alive after three days, a fact which pre-figured the resurrection of Christ. 5. Much difference of opinion has prevailed on the limitation of types. By some it has been held that, unless we have the express authority of the sacred writers, we cannot conclude with certainty that any person or thing mentioned in the Old Testament is a type of Christ, however great the resemblance which may appear to exist. But this is too restricted a view. The fanciful extremes into which some interpreters have run may teach us a salutary caution, but need not require us to deny the existence of types which all reason and analogy are ready to point out. The examples furnished by scripture may be taken as specimens rather than as exhausting the whole number of divinely-intended prefigurations. They are to establish a principle which may properly be acted on in other cases. Indeed, just as our Lord comprehended his disciples (Luke xxiv. 25) for failing to recognize largely enough the element of prophecy, so the author of the epistle to the Hebrews blames them for not having better appreciated the typical character of Melchizedek (v. 11, 12). 6. One other caution shall be added. No doctrine must be pressed as fundamental if grounded merely on typical analogy. This analogy may illustrate a teaching which is declared in plain language; but it cannot be taken as proof of anything not otherwise distinctly taught.

TYRAN'NUS (king). A person at Ephesus in whose 'school' St. Paul disputed (Acts xix. 9). This might have been a private synagogue; or, more probably, Tyrannus was a Gentile sophist.

TYRE (rock). An ancient and most celebrated maritime city of Phœnicia, about twenty miles to the south of Sidon. It was seated on an island. But there was also a city on the continent bearing the name of Palætyrus, that is, old Tyre; and questions have been raised which of the two was the more ancient. If the name is to be taken as an indication, we must suppose that the town upon the rocky island was the original.

Be this as it may, we find Tyre mentioned early in the sacred volume. In the division of Canaan the border of Asher is described as reaching to 'the strong city Tyre' (Josh. xix. 29). No attempt, however, was made by the Israelites to subdue it; and indeed for some centuries no further notice is taken of Tyre. Sidon, or Zidon, seems to have been the most important city; and the name 'Zidonians' is used for the inhabitants of Phœnicia (Judges i. 31, xviii. 7, 28). It is not till the reign of David that we again hear of Tyre. We then find it under the government of a king called Hiram, with whom David was in political alliance, and on terms of personal friendship. From Tyre both timber and skilled workmen were obtained for the buildings erected by the Hebrew monarch (2 Sam. vi. 11; 1 Chron. xiv. 1); and up to Tyre extended David's census (2 Sam. xxiv. 7). The alliance was continued in the reign of Solomon. It was to Tyre that that prince applied when about to commence the temple, and to carry out his other magnificent architectural plans. He met with a ready response. Hiram replied in terms which showed him to have some knowledge of the God of Israel; and, besides, it was greatly to the advantage of the Tyrian king to receive in the interchange of commerce the corn and wine and oil which were plentifully produced in Israel. Timber was cut in Lebanon, and conveyed by floats to Joppa by the Tyrians, whence it could be transported overland to Jerusalem. Tyrian workmen were also furnished; and the principal architect, though son of an Israelitish woman, had a Tyrian father, and had become in Tyre skilful in all the different branches of art for which his services were required. This fact, of course, speaks strongly for the perfection to which the arts were then carried in Tyre (1 Kings v., vii. 13, 14; 2 Chron. ii.). After Solomon's buildings were completed, he presented to the Tyrian king twenty cities in Galilee. The two monarchs met on this occasion; and the cities did not please Hiram. They were therefore restored to Solomon, who fortified them and colonized them with Israelites (1 Kings ix. 10-14; 2 Chron. viii. 2). This did not, however, interrupt the friendship; and the Tyrian fleets, in conjunction with those of Solomon, were in the habit of making trading voyages (1 Kings ix. 25-28, x. 11-22; 2 Chron. viii. 17, 18, ix. 21). It might be that it was from this close intercourse with the Phœnicians that Solomon was led to go after the Zidonian goddess, and to have Zidonian women in his harem (1 Kings xi. 1, 5).

We hear no more of Tyre for some time; but at length an alliance was contracted which proved of the most fatal consequence. Ahab, the king of Israel, married Jezebel, daughter of the king of Tyre. It is true that he is called 'king of the Zidonians' (xvi. 31); but there can be no reasonable doubt that the Eth-baal there mentioned was Ithobalus, king of Tyre and Sidon, and priest of Astarte, who raised himself to the throne after murdering the king Philetos (see Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. i. p. 259, note). Idol-worship was thus established in Israel, and introduced also into Judah by the marriage of Jehoram with Athaliah, Jezebel's daughter (2 Kings viii. 18, 26, 27). But whatever friendship there was with the Tyrians and the two Israelitish kingdoms would be ended by the revolution in Samaria which placed Jehu on the throne, and the deserved execution of Athaliah in Judah. There is, however, a notice of Tyre as hostile to Judah which has been supposed to be of an earlier date. It is contained in Psal. lxxxiii. 11, where the Tyrians are described as confederating with other nations against God's people. This is generally referred to the great war of Moab and others against Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 1). It is not easy to see why Tyre should join against a king who had allied himself with Ahab and Jezebel so closely connected with Tyre.

In later times unquestionably there was bitter enmity between the Tyrians and the Hebrews. Joel and Amos complain that the Tyrians had made bond-slaves of and had sold away the Israelites in the time of their distress, and therefore they denounce judgment against them (Joel iii. 4-8; Amos i. 9, 10); and Isaiah afterwards delivers a remarkable prophecy—'the burden of Tyre' (Isai. xxiii.). Various opinions have been held as to the interpretation of this prophecy. For there are three notable sieges of Tyre recorded in history, by Shalmaneser, by Nebuchadnezzar, and by Alexander the Great. Some critics think that the denunciation of Isaiah referred to the first of these: more likely it was fulfilled in the second (see Henderson, Isaiah, pp. 202, 203).

The first of these sieges is not mentioned in scripture. According to Josephus, it occurred when a king named Elulzus reigned at Tyre. It must have taken place after the Assyrians had subjected the rest of Phœnicia, about 721 B.C.; and it is said to have lasted five years; but though hardly pressed the city held out against the invader (Antiq., lib. ix. 14, § 2). Tyre after this flourished greatly, extending her commerce and planting her colonies in distant countries. Carthage, indeed, her most noble colony, is said by Josephus to have been founded a century and a half after the building of Solomon's temple (Contr. Apion., lib. i. § 18). The siege by Nebuchadnezzar was longer than the preceding one. Jeremiah predicts it (Jer. xxv. 22, xxvii. 2-6); also Ezekiel more particularly, who describes the splendour of Tyre with its peculiar privileges and its vast trade, and declares not only that Nebuchadnezzar shall come against it, but details minutely that ultimate ruin of it and desolation which modern travellers have found fulfilled (Ezek. xxvi., xxvii., xxviii. 1-19). The king of Babylon beleaguered Tyre for thirteen years; and the city which had rejoiced at the fall of Jerusalem was now herself to drink the cup of suffering. But it has been doubted whether Nebuchadnezzar actually took it. Stress is laid on the assertion of Ezekiel that he had no wages for his hard service against Tyre (xxix. 18-20), and it is argued that this could not have been said if he had really captured the city. But it has been alleged in reply that the continental city fell, while the inhabitants placed their riches in their vessels, and retreated to the island which the conqueror could not assail; consequently his prey was but the deserted habitations (see Ewald, Die Proph. des A. B., vol. ii. p. 324). Then perhaps it was that Tyre was forgotten (Isai. xxiii. 15). Yet it seems evident that Tyre must have become subject to the Babylonian king, a vassal prince being allowed to hold the government. For it afterwards passed under the Persian rule, and again, by the decree of Cyrus, supplied the materials of the temple at Jerusalem (Ezra iii. 7); when other trade with the Jews sprang up (Neh. xiii. 16). The Tyrians, too, furnished their contingent to the expedition of Xerxes against Greece (Herodotus, lib. vii. 98). In the course of Alexander's campaign, Tyre alone of the Phœnician cities resisted him. She depended on her insular position; and for seven months the great conqueror was engaged in the siege. The harbours of Tyre (there are said to have been two, north and south) were blockaded; and a mighty mound was constructed which joined the island to the continent. The city was taken, and multitudes of its inhabitants were put to death or sold for slaves; and ever since Tyre has stood upon a spit of land running out into the sea, with no appearance, so far as ordinary observation goes, of having ever been surrounded by the waters. Yet, after this catastrophe, Tyre revived, and was again flourishing, first under the Syrian monarchy, and then under the Romans, who professed to respect its freedom; though Augustus is said to have taken away some of its liberties.

Besides the incidental notices occurring in different parts of scripture, the prophet Ezekiel has in a chapter already referred to (Ezek. xxvii.) left a detailed account of the large amplification of Tyrian trade. In addition to the commodities from more distant countries, as metals from Tarshish or Spain, rams and goats from Arabia, precious stones, spices, and gold from Sheba and Raamah, it is said that of the fir-trees of Shenir or Hermon, of the cedars of Lebanon, and the oaks of Bashan, their ships were constructed, that Judah supplied wheat, and honey, and oil, and balm, and that from Damascus came the choice wine of Helbon, and white wool. Verily Tyre was indeed a mart of nations; and strangely must the warning voice have sounded which declared that all these riches should be dispersed, and the 'crowning city' be bare 'like the top of a rock . . . a place to spread nets upon.'

In our Lord's time Tyre was still a populous town; and he declared that, if the mighty works which were done in Chorazin and Bethsaida had been done in Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented (Matt. xi. 21, 22). Judgment was hanging over Tyre; but a worse condemnation awaited the cities which had had greater privileges. Christ visited once 'the coasts of Tyre and Sidon' (xv. 21), and performed there a deed of mercy; but it is not likely that he ever entered the city. Nevertheless the gospel was received there (Acts xxi. 3-6); and in subsequent times Tyre was an episcopal see. Then, surely, some at least of 'her merchandize and her hire' must have been 'holiness to the Lord' (Isai. xxiii. 18). It may be added that we have a remarkable illustration of Tyre's dependence on Palestine for corn in Acts xii. 20-22.

The final blow was given when the city was occupied by the Saracens in 1291 A.D.: since that time it has sunk to its present miserable state of ruin. The island Dr. Robinson describes as 'now unoccupied except by fishermen, as "a place to spread nets upon" . . . The present city (Sôr) stands upon the junction of the island and isthmus . . . nothing more than a market-town, a small sea-port, hardly deserving the name of a city . . . The houses are for the most part mere hovels . . . The streets are narrow lanes, crooked and filthy' (Bibl. Res., vol. ii. pp. 464, 466). Dr. Thomson observed at the extreme northern end of the island a vast stone nearly seventeen feet long, and six and a half thick, which was no doubt a portion of the ancient wall. He speaks also of granite columns, and of the ruins of 'a superb temple, possibly the remnant of the celebrated temple of Hercules. Referring to the apparent blending in the prophecies of the continental and insular city, he says that there is 'a propriety in their joining together continental and insular Tyre. The same people, guilty of the same vices, they deserved and received the same judgments, though in different degrees, and at various times. The one was totally destroyed, never to rise again; the other repeatedly overwhelmed, but again partially reviving, just as the whole drift of the prophecies would lead us to expect.' He thinks that there was some junction between the two cities, even in Solomon's time, and that 'continental Tyre extended along the shore from Ras el 'Ain (a fountain) to the island.' The measurement would then 'agree with the statement of Pliny that Tyre was nineteen miles in circumference, including old Tyre, but without it about four.' He adds: 'With but few exceptions, it is now a cluster of miserable huts, inhabited by about 3500 impoverished Metawelies and

Arab Christians, destitute alike of education, of arts, and of enterprise, carrying on with Egypt a small trade in tobacco from the neighbouring hills, and of lava mill-stones from the Hauran.' An attempt was made a while ago by Redschid Pasha to revive Tyre, but 'it is so sickly that not even a village of any size can be established there' (The Land and the Book, pp. 178-185).

TYR' IANS (Ecclus. xlvi. 18). Inhabitants of Tyre.

TY'RUS (rock) (Jer. xxv. 22, xxvii. 3, xlvii. 4; Ezek. xxvi. 2, 3, xxvii. 2, 3, 32, xxviii. 2, 12, xxix. 18; Hos. ix. 13; Amos i. 9, 10; Zech. ix. 2, 3). See TYRE.

TZOR (id.) (Josh. xix. 29, marg.). Tyre.

U

U'CAL (I shall prevail). One of the persons, otherwise unknown, to whom Agur addressed his maxims (Prov. xxx. 1).

U'EL (will of God). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 34).

U'KNAZ (1 Chron. iv. 15, marg.) See KENAZ, 3. The word Uknaz is Kenaz with a copulative conjunction prefixed. Perhaps a previous name was accidentally omitted.

U'LAI (strong water?). A river of Susiana, on the banks of which Daniel had one of his visions (Dan. viii. 2, 16). It would seem to be the Eulæus of the Greeks. Mr. Loftus has specially investigated it, and believes it to be a river or artificial channel which connected the Kerkhah (Choaspes) and the Kârûn (Pasatigris). The ancient channel may yet be traced, though now there is but a small runner of water in it. And, as the Eulæus is said to have surrounded the citadel of the Susians, the Kerkhah and this old channel were the two streams intended. This explains the words of Daniel, 'between the two banks of Ulai,' i.e. between the two streams (Loftus, Chaldea and Susiana, chap. xxxi. pp. 423-431).

U'LAM (in front).—1. One of the descendants of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 16, 17).—2. A Benjaminite, it would seem of the family of Saul (viii. 39, 40).

U'LLA (yoke). A chieftain of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 39).

UM'MAH (community). A city of Asher (Josh. xix. 30).

UNCIRCUMCISION, THE (Rom. ii. 26, 27; Gal. ii. 7). Gentiles, the heathen.

UNCLEAN. See CLEAN AND UNCLEAN. A person who had contracted ceremonial uncleanness was, according to the Mosaic law, deprived for a time of social privileges, and cut off from sacred functions. Thus the priests who were defiled must not eat of the holy things (Lev. xxii. 2-9); and one of the people generally, if unclean, must not take part in sacrificial offerings (vii. 20, 21) or hold his position as one of the congregation of the Lord. There were three degrees of uncleanness measured by time, and the kind of purification necessary, viz. that which lasted till even—such was contact with dead animals; that which defiled for seven days—such as resulted from the touching of the human corpse (Numb. xix. 11); that which was occasioned by certain diseases or infirmities—leprosy for example, by the menstrual flux, and child-birth; these cases of uncleanness lasted as long as the morbid state continued. Purification from the first-named was received by washing the clothes, from the second by the use of the water of separation (9), from the third by specified sacrifices. It is impossible to enter here into the details of personal uncleanness; but let it be noted that the disabilities and propagation of it marked in the most telling way the loathsomeness of sin, and the hatred which God had for everything which defleth. See PURIFICATION.

UNCTION. See ANOINT, OINTMENT. The word is used in 1 John ii. 20 in a spiritual sense as denoting a gracious divine communication: comp. Rev. iii. 18.

UNDERGIRD. The ship in which St. Paul sailed to Italy is said to have been undergirded (Acts xxvii. 17); that is, some turns of a cable were passed round the hull. Mr. Smith produces some examples of this undergirding in modern seamanship (Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, chap. iii. pp. 104-106).

UNICORN. The word by which the Hebrew rëëm is rendered in our translation (Numb. xxiii. 22, xxiv. 8; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Job xxxix. 9, 10; Psal. xxii. 21, xxix. 6, xcii. 10; Isa. xxxiv. 7). But it is clear that the animal intended had more than a single horn. For, though our version has 'horns of unicorns' (Deut. xxxiii. 17), yet in the margin we find 'an unicorn,' the word being really in the singular number. This fact renders it unlikely that either the rhinoceros, or the animal like a horse, with a single long curved horn growing out of the forehead, discovered in Thibet (Quart. Rev., vol. xxiv. pp. 120, 121), can be meant. Some would understand the Oryx leucoryx, a large species of antelope; and certainly the Arabic name by which it is known corresponds with the Hebrew rëem. But this animal may be tamed. Others, with much greater probability, fix upon the Bos bubalus, otherwise Bubalus bubalus, or oriental buffalo, which is still very common in Palestine. Mr. Carey in his Book of Job has examined the question with a great deal of care. He finds that the animal, whatever it is, is respectively associated and placed in parallelism with bulls or bullocks; he infers the high probability, therefore, that it was of the bovine species. He thinks, further, that the mention made of the rëem in Job xxxix. 9-12, is decisive of its being a wild ox. It is spoken of in relation to the stall, ploughing, harrowing, and carting, also in connection with other wild animals, certain species of which have been domesticated. 'The analogy then,' he proceeds, 'of the context would lead us to suppose that such as the wild goat, or the stag that is removed from the haunts of man, or the wild ass, is to the common goat, and stag, and ass respectively, such is the rëem to the common or domestic ox. Besides which, it is described . . . . as being manifestly an untamable animal, and one useless to man for any agricultural purpose. Judging from his outward appearance, anatomy, &c., we might have supposed him (such is God's intimation here) capable of ploughing, harrowing, &c.; but experience shows that such is his disposition that he cannot be brought under the yoke. In short, whilst in all outward appearance he is an ox, yet in untamableness of disposition he shows himself to be the wild ox' (pp. 391-394).

UNITY OF THE SPIRIT (Eph. iv. 3, 13). The holy fellowship in which the divine Spirit unites believers. See COMMUNION.

UN'NI (afflicted, depressed).—1. A Levite, said to be one of the porters, who was appointed to play on the psaltery (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20).—2. A Levite after the return from captivity (Neh. xii. 9).

UPHAR'SIN (Dan. v. 25). See MENE.

UPHAZ (Jer. x. 9; Dan. x. 5). Ophir?

UPPER ROOM. (2 Kings i. 2; Mark xiv. 15; Luke xxii. 12; Acts i. 13, ix. 37, 39, xx. 8). The larger houses in Palestine had upper apartments, which were those best fitted up, and the most desirable and quiet part of the establishment. The mode of arrangement is probably much the same now as it was in ancient times. The lower story, the ordinary residence of the family, is called ardiyeh, or ground-floor: the upper is 'alliyeh, and is still given to guests who are to be treated with honour. It was this chamber that was assigned to Elijah, at Zarephath, and not a meaner room, as implied by the word 'loft' in our version (1 Kings xvii. 19). See HOUSE.

UR (light, or possibly fortress). The father of one of David's heroes (1 Chron. xl. 35). But in 2 Sam. xxiii. 34 the same person apparently is called Ahasbai.

UR (light, land of light?). A city or place which has always the addition 'of the Chaldees,' where Abraham's family resided, and from which he with his father Terah and other relatives went forth to Haran (Gen. xi. 28, 31, xv. 7; Neh. ix. 7).

There are discordant opinions as to the locality of Ur. Some have identified it with Edessa, the modern Orfab, and some with a Persian fortress, so called, between Dura on the Tigris and Nisibis. Others suppose it to be Warka. But this is more probably the ancient Erech. On the whole it may be most reasonably imagined to be Mugeyer or Umghair, where considerable ruins exist. Dr. Kalisch indeed, whose authority is deservedly high, disagrees with this opinion, and believes Ur to be the name of a province to which Haran belonged. But his only reason is that Abraham, as he interprets the text, was at Haran when the divine summons came to him (Gen. xii. 1), whereas God is elsewhere said to have brought him from Ur (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 323). This can hardly be reason sufficient.

Mugeyer is unquestionably very ancient. It is situated on the right bank of the Euphrates near the marshes which the confluence of the Shat-el-Hie and the Shat-el-Kahr with the Euphrates has formed; and in periods of inundation the ruins are surrounded by water. They are of an oval shape, and measure about half a mile from north to south. The name Mugeyer is said to signify 'place,' or 'mother, of bitumen,' which is the cement used in the remarkable temple here built in stages, two of which remain. This temple is in the form of a parallelogram 198 by 133 feet. The lower story is supported by thick buttresses; and the height of the whole is 70 feet. The exterior is faced with red kiln-baked bricks; and the interior is constructed of bricks burnt or sun-dried. The name of Uruk, an early king, 2230 B.C., has been found upon the bricks; and the place was probably the capital of this monarch. The temple was dedicated to the moon-god Hurki: hence perhaps the town derived its name. The rest of the ruins are for the most part tombs (Kalisch, pp. 292, 293; Loftus, Chaldea, pp. 126-134).

UR'BANE (belonging to the city, polite). A Christian man in Rome to whom St. Paul sent a salutation (Rom. xvi. 9).

U'RI (fiery).—1. The father of Bezaleel, the artificer of the tabernacle: he was of the tribe of Judah (Exod. xxxi. 2, xxxv. 30, xxxviii. 22; 1 Chron. ii. 20; 2 Chron. i. 5).

—2. The father of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 19).—3. One of the Levite porters who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 24).

UR'IAH (flame or light of Jehovah).—1. One of the distinguished officers of David's army. He is called 'the Hittite,' possibly, born of Hittite race, he or some ancestor had become a Hebrew proselyte. He was husband of Bath-sheba, with whom David formed an adulterous connection while Uriah was in the field under Joab. David's discreditable attempts to conceal his crime, and, on their failure, cold-blooded murder of Uriah, are faithfully narrated by the sacred historian. Uriah is represented as a brave and high-minded man (2 Sam. xi. xii. 9, 10, 15, xxiii. 39; 1 Kings xv. 5; 1 Chron. xi. 41).—2 (Isal. viii. 2). See URIJAH 1.—3. A priest, father of that Meremoth who was one of those who weighed the vessels brought by Ezra (Ezra viii. 33). See URIJAH, 3.

URI'AS (Matt. i. 6). Uriah, 1.

URI'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 43). Urijah (Neh. viii. 4).

URIEL (flame of God).—1. A Levite of the family of Kohath (1 Chron. vi. 24). But see 36, where three descendants are given differently, and the name Zephaniah answers to Uriel.—2. The chief of the Kohathites in David's time (xv. 5, 11).—3. The father of Michaiah or Maachah, wife of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xiii. 2). But in xi. 20 Maachah is called the daughter of Absalom. It would seem that Uriel married Absalom's daughter Tamar (his sons not surviving him), and had Maachah by her (2 Sam. xiv. 27; 1 Kings xv. 2).

URIJAH (flame of Jehovah).—1. A high priest in the reign of Ahaz. He weakly complied with the order which the king sent him to make an altar like that used for idolatrous worship at Damascus, and to sacrifice upon it instead of on the one which Solomon had constructed after the divine pattern (2 Kings xvi. 10-16). He is also called Uriah (Isai. viii. 2).—2. The son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim who prophesied against Judah and Jerusalem in the reign of Jehoiakim. The king was enraged, and resolved to put him to death. Urijah, however, fled into Egypt; but, as Jehoiakim was Pharaoh's nominee, he had no difficulty in seizing the prophet there. Urijah was brought back to Jerusalem and executed (Jer. xxvi. 20-23).—3. A son of the family of Koz and father of Meremoth (Neh. iii. 4, 21). Perhaps it was the same who stood by Ezra when he read the law (viii. 4).

URIM AND THUMMIM. Few matters connected with the ancient Hebrew ritual have excited more curiosity than the Urim and Thummim. The scripture gives no description of the things meant. In the directions communicated to Moses for the high priest's garments it is simply said that the Urim and Thummim are to be put into the holy breast-plate, to 'be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the Lord' (Exod. xxviii. 30). But it is observable that, whereas certain skilled artists made the robes and the furniture of the tabernacle with the tabernacle also, there is no mention of any making of Urim and Thummim: it is Moses himself who, when all is finished, and Aaron arrayed, puts these into the breast-plate (Lev. viii. 8). By means of Urim and Thummim counsel from the Lord was to be delivered (Numb. xxvii. 21); and the possession thereof was the crowning glory of the priestly tribe (Deut. xxxiii. 8). In after times we find this mode of consulting God exercised (1 Sam. xiv. 18, 19, 36, 37, xxii. 2, 6, 9-12, xxviii. 6, xxx. 7, 8); and subsequently to the Babylonish captivity we have the impossibility noticed of discriminating the right descent of some who claimed the priesthood, until there stood up a priest with Urim and Thummim (Ezra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65). The most, then, that we can gather seems to be that the Urim and Thummim were no work of art, that they were connected with the breast-plate of the high priest's ephod, and that they were put in after this breast-plate with its rows of precious stones was completed.

These things duly considered, several of the theories of explanation are proved unfounded. Thus it has been imagined that Urim and Thummim were the stones on the shoulders of the priest; but they are expressly said to be upon his breast. They have been identified with the gems in rows in the breast-plate; but, after these gems were engraven and in their place, the Urim and Thummim were put in. It is needless, however, to enumerate all the theories or different guesses which have been excogitated.

The origin of Urim and Thummim has been traced to Egypt. The meaning of the words is lights and perfections; and it would seem that symbols of light and truth were worn by the Egyptian priesthood, an image representing truth, and the mystic scarabæus or beetle which denoted light. But, even granting that this notion were a just one, little progress would be made in elucidating Urim and Thummim, and in discovering how the divine response was obtained thereby.

The view adopted by archbishop Trench is curious and well worth attention. He sets out with the principle that, whatever the Urim and Thummim might be, two distinct things were not meant: they were two names for one and the same thing: hence Urim alone is repeatedly spoken of (Numb. xxvii. 21; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6). Now the breast-plate was doubled (Exod. xxviii. 16); that is, it was a bag, or purse, adorned with costly jewellery and of elaborate workmanship. It was made to contain something; and, as the outer case was so magnificent, that which was placed in it must have been more precious still. What was there which was of rarer value? The archbishop believes that, among the stones on the breast-plate externally, one was wanting, the one far more lustrous, and perfect, than all others—that priceless gem, the diamond. What if this were placed inside? What if thereon were engraved the ineffable Name? When the apocalyptic seer would describe the priestly dignity to which the faithful ones should be advanced, he says that each shall have a white stone—not dead milky white, but a sparkling colourless brilliant, on which there should be a secret name (Rev. ii. 17). It might be there was a reference intended to the Urim. If such a stone, inscribed with the great Name, were enclosed in the breast-plate, none but the high priest could read or know that name (Comm. on Epistles to Seven Churches, pp. 124-127).

But, if this were so, how was the divine response obtained? Was it that by gazing on the brilliant the priest's thoughts were concentrated and raised so that the words he uttered were not his own? It might be so, provided we do not suppose he was thrown into an ecstatic state in which personal consciousness was lost. Such a notion must not be entertained for a moment. And if an argument against it were wanting the address of Saul to Ahiah, 'withdraw thine hand' (1 Sam. xiv. 19), would be decisive. But here the matter must be left: it is shrouded with an awful veil.

USURY. The gain exacted above the principal, or what was lent, in consideration of the loan, now commonly understood as excessive profit. Lending for profit was forbidden among the Hebrews; though to a stranger it was allowed (Exod. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36, 37; Deut. xxiii. 19, 20, and elsewhere: comp. Matt. xxv. 27; Luke xix. 23). See LOAN.

U'TA (1 Esdr. v. 30).

U'THAI (whom Jehovah succours).—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ix. 4).—2. One of those who went from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 14).

U'THI (1 Esdr. viii. 40). Uthai, 2.

UZ (fertile land?).—1. The son of Aram (Gen. x. 23; 1 Chron. i. 17).—2. A descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 28; 1 Chron. i. 42). See for their posterity the next article. Huz (Gen. xxii. 21) is the same name.

UZ (id.). There has been much keen discussion as to the locality of Uz, the country in which the patriarch Job resided. The general opinion would place it in Idumea. We find Uz first mentioned in the table of nations (Gen. x. 23; 1 Chron. i. 17). It must have been exposed to marauding Sabeans and Chaldeans, and was probably not very far from Teman, the residence of Eliphaz (Job i. 15, 17, ii. 11); and Teman was near to Petra. Now the Septuagint translators render Uz as Ausitis; and according to Ptolemy (lib. v. 19) there was a tribe called Æsitaë in the northern part of the desert Arabian near the Euphrates. Hence we may not unreasonably conclude that Uz was a region between Idumea and the Euphrates (see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 285, 286). This view is confirmed by the notices we have of Uz in other parts of scripture. For the 'daughter of Edom' is described as dwelling in the land of Uz (Lam. iv. 21), an appropriate expression only if Uz were a province occupied by Edomites without their own boundary. And again Uz and Edom are specially distinguished (Jer. xxv. 20, 21). We are further led to consider, from the mention of Uz and Buz as sons of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 20, 21), the probability that some of Nahor's posterity had settled in the land of Uz, indicating a connection of the latter with Mesopotamia, or the vicinity of the two regions. And so with the Horite Uz (xxxvi. 28; 1 Chron. i. 42): a part of the Horites roamed north-eastward in the Arabian desert, and amalgamated with the tribe of Uz, which had spread in those tracts (Kalisch, ubi supr., p. 599). If this location would seem to place Uz too far from Eliphaz the Temanite, it may easily be conceived that a long journey would not unwillingly be made to comfort a great tribal chieftain. And indeed the mode of expression (Job ii. 11) might indicate that Job's friends had come from a considerable distance. Col. Chesney in his expedition to the Euphrates found reasons for adopting the opinion here advocated. He would place Uz in the neighbourhood of Orfah, where a brook and a well on the road to Diarbekr with other localities are consecrated to the memory of the great patriarch. See Horne's Introd., vol. ii. edit. Ayre, p. 676

U'ZAI (strong). The father of one who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii).

U'ZAL (a wanderer?). A son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chron. i. 21). His descendants appear to have settled in Yemen, the capital of which, now Sanaa, had long the name of Uzal, still perhaps to be traced in a suburb Oseir, where about 2000 Jews reside. This district was noted for its commercial importance. It traded with Tyre, and is thought to have had Javan as its port. See MEUZAL. Sanaa stands on a plateau 4000 feet above the level of the sea: the air is salubrious, and the temperature equable. But the district suffers from drought, and is consequently subject to famines. The inhabitants are celebrated for the manufacture of beautiful stuffs. See D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient., art. 'Sanaa'; Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Usal'.

UZ'ZA (strength).—1. The name of a man in whose garden Manasseh and Amon, kings of Judah, were buried (2 Kings xxi. 18, 26). This garden retained the name of its former owner, but had become a royal property (see Keil, Comm. on Kings, vol. ii. p. 130).—2. A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 29).—3. A Benjamite (viii. 7).—4 (xiii. 7-11). See UZZAH. One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 49; Neh. vii. 51).

UZZAH (id.). A son of Abinadab, in whose house at Kirjath-jearim the ark of God had rested. When David desired to bring it to Jerusalem, Uzzah and Ahio his brother guided the carriage on which the ark was placed. And, when the oxen stumbled or shook it, Uzzah presumptuously put out his hand to lay hold upon it. This, as contrary to the divine command (Numb. iv. 15), was punished by the immediate death of Uzzah (2 Sam. vi. 3-8). See 1 Chron. xiii. 7-11, where the name is given as Uzza.

UZZEN-SHE'RAH (ear of Sherah, or Sherah's corner). A town founded by Sherah, the daughter or descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 24).

UZZI (might of Jehovah).—1. A priest of the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. vi. 5, 6, 51; Ezra vii. 4).—2. A descendant of Issachar (1 Chron. vii. 2, 3).—3. A Benjamite, son of Bela (?).—4. Another Benjamite (ix. 8).—5. Overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 22).—6. A priest in the days of Joiakim (xii. 19, 42).

UZZI'A (id.). One of David's warriors (1 Chron. xi. 44).

UZZI'AH (id.).—1. The son and successor of Amaziah, king of Judah. He is also called Azariah (2 Kings xiv. 21, xv. 1, 6, 7, 8, 17, 23, 27). He was sixteen years old when he began to reign, and he reigned fifty-two years, 809-758 B.C. He was fond of the arts of peace, and was very prosperous in war. He strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem, built towers in various places, dug or re-constructed wells, bred cattle, and promoted the cultivation of the vine. He also defeated the Philistines, and curbed them with fortresses in their country. He was successful against the Arabians, and forced the Ammonites to pay him tribute: he also recovered the port of Elath on the Red sea; so that his reputation was widely spread. And, while so prosperous, he reigned in the fear of the Lord, and trod in the steps of pious predecessors. But his prosperity intoxicated him. He proudly desired to usurp the priest's office, and went into the temple and took a censer to burn incense with his own hand, in spite of the bold resistance of the high priest. But in his fancied hour of triumph the Lord smote him. Fearful leprosy rose at once in his forehead, which the priest beheld and pronounced him unclean. And then he was thrust out of the temple: indeed, a stricken man, he himself hurried forth, and lived ever after in a separate house; his son Jotham taking the administration of the kingdom (2 Kings xv. 1-7; 2 Chron. xxvi.). There is a chronological difficulty which must be noticed as to the year of Uzziah's accession. Amaziah, his father, survived Jehoash of Israel fifteen years (2 Kings xiv. 17). Yet Uzziah's reign is said to begin in the 27th year of Jeroboam II., successor of Jehoash (xv. 1). It is probable that 27 is by a transcriber's error put for 15, the Hebrew numerals for the one so nearly resembling those for the other that mistake might easily occur. Or it was the 27th year before the end of Jeroboam's reign. A few incidental notices of Uzziah are scattered through the prophets. A great earthquake occurred in his reign (Amos i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5): Josephus's assumption that it was at the moment of his sacrilege is groundless. Isaiah began to prophesy in the year of Uzziah's death (Isai. vi. 1): Hosea also (Hos. i. 1) and Amos were his contemporaries.—2. A Levite of the family of Kohath (1 Chron. vi. 24), called also (36) Azariah.—3. The father of one of David's officers (xxvii. 25).—4. A priest who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 21).—5. One of the descendants of Judah (Neh. xi. 4).

UZZIEL (might of God).—1. A son of Kohath and grandson of Levi (Exod. vi. 18, 22; Lev. x. 4; Numb. iii. 19, 30; 1 Chron. vi. 2, 18, xv. 10, xxiii. 12, 20, xxiv. 24).—2. A Simeonite captain (iv. 42).—3. A Benjamite, son of Bela (vii. 7).—4. One of the sons of Heman, the Levite musician (xxv. 4), perhaps the same with Azareel (18).—5. A Levite, descended from Jeduthun, in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 14).—6. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 8).

UZZIELITES. A family of Levites, descended from Uzziel (Numb. iii. 27; 1 Chron. xxvi. 23).

V

VA'HEB. This word is found as an extract from the book of the Wars of the Lord (Numb. xxi. 14, marg.). The passage is fragmentary and obscure. Perhaps it is the proper name of a place in the territory of Moab on the Arnon. But no satisfactory explanation has yet been given.

VAIL. See TEMPLE, VEIL, pp. 869, 902.

VAJEZA'THA (white, pure). One of the sons of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

VALLEY. Valleys, in the proper sense of the term, the hollow tracts between parallel ranges of hills, are seldom found in Palestine. Ravines, and those hollows through which streams flow in winter, while in summer their beds are almost or entirely dry, and which are now called wadies by the Arabs, occur from the structure of the country much more frequently. But our translators have unfortunately used the word 'valley' with little discrimination, not only for these, but also for what might more accurately be called plains. Thus they have termed the extensive district of low land between the mountains of Judah and the Mediterranean coast, in which the Philistine cities stood (the Shefelah), the 'vale' or the 'valley' (Deut. i. 7; Josh. ix. 1, x. 40, xi. 2, 16, xv. 33, and elsewhere). Several other words are also translated valley. 'Emek, implying 'deep,' most nearly corresponds with our English valley. This term is used to describe the valleys of Achor, Ajalon, Baca, Elah, Jezreel, Succoth, &c., &c. Ge, signifying a 'bursting' or a 'flowing together, that is, where waters congregate, is applied to a deep narrow ravine. Thus we have the word designating the ravines or glens of the son of Hinnan, of Salt, &c. This is the name given also to the secluded spot in Moab in which Moses was buried (Deut. xxxiv. 6). Nahhal is the term which describes the course of a stream, the modern wady, as above remarked. Sometimes the torrent itself is so designated, and sometimes, when it dries up, the bed through which it flowed. Our translators, therefore, have occasionally been uncertain in what way to render it (as in Numb. xiii. 23, 24, comp. marg.). Such wadies were Cherith, Eshcol, Sorek, Zered, &c. There is another word, bi'ah, which properly means a 'cleft' of the mountains, and often designates a wide plain, bounded, however, by mountains. The 'valleys' of Jericho, Megiddo, &c., are described by this word.

VANI'AH (weak). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 36).

VASH'NI. This name appears in 1 Chron. vi. 28 as the eldest son of Samuel. But (1 Sam. viii. 2) the name was Joel; as is implied also in 1 Chron. vi. 33. It seems then that Vashni is a mistake. By a very slight alteration the word would mean 'and the second.' We may suppose that 'Joel' has accidentally been omitted, so that the verse should be translated 'The sons of Samuel; the first-born [Joel], and the second Abiah.'

VASH'TI (a beauty). The queen of Ahasuerus, king of Persia, who refused to appear before the princes and people. She was consequently divorced, which made way for the marriage of Ahasuerus with Esther (Esth. i. 9-19, ii. 1, 4, 17). See ESTHER.

VEDA'N. This word does not occur in our version; but we find it in the original of Ezek. xxvii. 19; where our translators render 'Dan also.' Dan is here so manifestly out of place that critics are pretty generally agreed in considering the whole word a single name, instead of taking ve as the Hebrew copulative, 'and,' 'also.' Védan, then, may be said to be an Arabian city, whence iron, and cassia, and calamus were brought to Tyre. Gesenius and others are disposed to identify this city with the modern Aden, more especially because Aden appears to have traded in the very articles mentioned by Ezekiel. Aden, in the province of Yemen, is now a British possession, with an increasing commerce.

VEIL. Several words so rendered in our version rather mean cloaks or shawls. See DRESS. It is indisputable, however, that veils, properly so called, were not frequently used among the Hebrews. Thus it was a 'veil' with which Moses covered his face (Exod. xxxiv. 33-35). The word rendered 'mufflers' (Isai. iii. 19) designates a light veil. There is another term translated 'locks' (Sol. Song iv. 1, 3, vi. 7; Isai. xlvii. 2) which may reasonably be believed to mean a veil, worn by a female when fully dressed (see Ginsburg, Song of Solomon, p. 154, note). It is more doubtful whether the 'kerchiefs' (Ezek. xiii. 18, 21) were veils; some scholars of repute would decide in the affirmative; see KERCHIEF.

But the face was frequently veiled by covering it with the fold of another garment. This probably was the case with Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 65), and Tamar (xxxviii. 14, 19); they wrapped themselves altogether in a large mantle or shawl. It was evidently not the custom in ancient times for the Hebrew women and those of the neighbouring nations to veil their faces, except on occasions, as in the case of Rebekah just referred to (comp. xxix. 25), when natural modesty would prompt it, or for concealment, as Tamar, or for special ornament. This is sufficiently proved by such passages as Gen. xii. 14, xxix. 10; 1 Sam. i. 12; Prov. vii. 13. The veil, moreover, is not found in the Assyrian or Egyptian monuments. It is true that St. Paul reproves the females who attended and prayed or prophesied in Christian assemblies with uncovered heads (1 Cor. xi. 4-16); but this does not necessarily imply that their faces ought to be concealed by veils. The covering of the head was the decent token of subjection: a woman who threw off this seemed to proclaim herself independent, and so dishonoured her head, that is, her husband, the man being the head of the woman (3).

It is hardly necessary to say that in the east it has become a habit to veil the face; it being often deemed less indecent to expose almost any part of the person than the face. Some of the face-veils worn by ladies are highly ornamented and embroidered. They are made of white muslin, or occasionally black crape; and are often thrown over the horn worn in Syria.

VEIL OF THE TABERNACLE OR TEMPLE. The rich curtain which screened off the holy of holies. See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE. It was rent at the crucifixion (Matt. xxvii. 51; Mark xv. 38; Luke xxiii. 45). For access into God's presence, previously allowed only to the priest, was now obtained for all men by the great sacrifice.

VEIN, METALLIC. Mining and the working of metals were practised at an early date (Gen. iv. 22). For a remarkable example of scientific accuracy in speaking of metallic veins and ore (Job xxviii. 1, 6) see notice under GOLD.

VERMILION (Jer. xxii. 14; Ezek. xxiii. 14). See COLOURS.

VERSE. The origin of the small divisions of the bible so called is explained in a former article: see BIBLE, pp. 111, 112. It may be added that in an edition there mentioned by Xantes Pagninus, 1528, verses appear in the New Testament different from those introduced by Robert Stephen.

VERSIONS. Many translations have been made of the holy scriptures in both ancient and modern times. They are of the greatest service for both critical and hermeneutical purposes. They tend to show us the readings of the text which the translator used, and indicate the sense he put upon the words before him. The older the version, the more important obviously is its critical value, as it leads us to the state of the text so much closer to the time of its original composition; the evidence in this respect being near akin to that furnished by ancient manuscripts. And then, as there are many words, especially in the Old Testament, which occur but once, of which the signification is to us dubious, we learn from ancient versions how they were interpreted at a time when, peradventure, the original language had not ceased to be a living tongue. As to modern versions, now so greatly multiplied, it cannot but be a cause of thankful joy that the various tribes of the earth may read in their own tongues the wonderful works of God.

It is proposed to give here a compendious account of the principal versions of the scriptures: those of most importance shall be described as fully as the limits of this work will allow; others can be only named. Of the first class there are of ancient translations the Chaldee Paraphrases or Targums, the Greek, including the Septuagint and other versions, the Syriac, the Latin, both the Old Latin and the Vulgate; and of modern the English.

The Targums. Targum is a Chaldee word, which appears to signify 'version' or 'explication.' The captivity had necessarily an influence upon the national speech of the Jews. For, though they brought back with them from Babylon their own Hebrew, which they had kept during a much longer time while they were in Egypt, yet their ears had been accustomed to another tongue, and their diffusion through the Assyrian and Babylonian provinces bringing them into contact with divers nations—far different from that Egyptian pressure which had kept them compacted in Goshen—introduced naturally other forms, till by degrees the language in which their ancient books were written was changed, and for common use lost. The law, however, and afterwards other parts of scripture, continued to be publicly read. But, to make it intelligible, it had to be expounded. Some have imagined that on the return from captivity the change of speech had been accomplished. This cannot well be admitted; for the 'Jews' language' is expressly mentioned in Neh. xiii. 24; and the post-exilian prophets still used Hebrew; the Chaldee portions of Ezra being little more than some documents inserted into the history. Hence, then, in Ezra's teaching (viii. 8) it was rather exposition than translation that is meant. Be this, however, as it may, interpretation was soon required; and, as it became more and more needful, in process of time a body of interpreters sprang up, distinct from the public readers. And, though at first their interpretations were oral, yet at length they were committed to writing, and thus Targums have come down to us.

There are Targums to nearly the whole of the Old Testament. 1. The first to be mentioned is that which bears the name of Onkelos, and is on the Pentateuch. It is not known who Onkelos was. He has been represented as a disciple of Gamaliel: he has been supposed identical with Aquila, one who translated the Hebrew scriptures into Greek; and again it has been maintained that, as Aquila's Greek translation was literal, this Targum, if not exactly literal, yet faithfully giving the sense of the text, acquired, without reference to the author, the same name, and became the Chaldee Aquila, Onkelos corresponding with Aquila. The date is variously assigned. It has been thought contemporary with our Lord, and again it has been supposed to be begun in the second century and not completed till the fourth after Christ, and to be of Babylonian origin. It is a pretty close version of the Hebrew text, clear and well adapted for its purpose; and it is note-worthy that it interprets only two places (Gen. xlix. 10; Numb. xxiv. 17) of the Messiah. The language is a pure Chaldee. 2, 3. There are two other Targums on the Pentateuch. One is generally known as the Pseudo-Jonathan, so called because it has been untruly fathered on Jonathan Ben Uzziel, the other as the Jerusalem Targum. The last-named is fragmentary in its interpretation. These two are only different recensions of the same work, of Palestinian origin; the Jerusalem being the first, intended perhaps as notes and corrections to Onkelos, the other filling up and completing after the same manner what the earlier had left undone. This work is stored with legendary tales. It cannot be prior to the seventh or eighth century. 4. A Targum on the former and later prophets, i.e. Joshua, Judges, the books of Samuel and Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets, is ascribed to Jonathan Ben Uzziel, a disciple of Hillel the elder.

This is much in the style of Onkelos; and critics have supposed that one was acquainted with the work of the other, and have disputed which had the priority. Perhaps this of Jonathan was somewhat later; but, as it is doubtful whether there ever was an individual Onkelos, so it may be doubted whether this was the work of the real Jonathan. Possibly something that he did write may have formed a ground-work, and have been afterwards with other materials gathered in the third or fourth century at Babylon by some one person (there being a visible unity in the work) into the whole now existing, in which allegories, parables, and legends are embodied. 5, 6. Targums on Job, Psalms, and Proverbs, and on the five megilloth, i.e. Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, and Esther, have been ascribed to Joseph the Blind in the third century after Christ. They are probably by different hands of a far later date; some critics being inclined to place them as late as the tenth or eleventh century. 7, 8. There are two more late Targums on Esther, heretofore supposed to be three; but of the three two are but different recensions of the same work. 9. A Targum on Chronicles is of comparatively modern discovery, being first edited in 1680. It is of late date, of Palestinian origin. 10. There is also a Targum on Daniel, probably of the twelfth century. And it may be added that there is a Chaldee translation of some of the apocryphal additions to Esther.

Greek. From the time of the first captivity and onwards colonies of Jews were settled in Egypt. These had a temple of their own erected at Leontopolis, in the Heliopolitan nome, by Onias, son of the high priest Onias, who, despairing of the pontifical dignity himself, fled into Egypt in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and obtained permission from Ptolemy Philometor to raise a temple, and to consecrate priests and Levites for its service, under the plea that such an establishment had been predicted (Isa. xix. 18-21). A rallying-point was thus formed: the Egyptian temple was after the fashion of that at Jerusalem, and the rites were similar. Connection, however, with Palestine was by no means broken off: see ALEXANDRIA, IR-HA-HERES; and a natural result of the residence of so many Jews in Egypt under the dominion of the Greek-speaking Ptolemies was the translation of their sacred books into Greek.

1. The principal Greek version is called the Septuagint. The history of this is involved in much obscurity. The popular account is contained in a letter said to be written by Aristæus, an officer of the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus. Seventy-two persons, at that monarch's request, in order to furnish his library with the Hebrew sacred books, were commissioned by Eleazar, the high priest at Jerusalem. These, on their arrival at Alexandria, were shut up in the island of Pharos, and accomplished their translation in seventy-two days. From the number of the interpreters the name 'Septuagint' was derived. This story has been repeated with more or less embellishment, and was for long implicitly believed. But critical research has exposed its falsehood. The letter of Aristeas, though unquestionably of old date, is now admitted to be spurious. There is a more trust-worthy authority, that of Aristobulus (ap. Euseb. Præp. Evang., lib. xiii. cap. 12) who, writing in the second century before Christ, says that the Pentateuch was translated very early, for he supposes Plato to have drawn from it, and that Demetrius Phalereus, under Ptolemy Philadelphus, was the means of promoting the translation of the rest of the Old Testament. Without implicitly following this author, we may substantially accept his testimony, and we have corroboration of the fact that a translation of the entire Hebrew scriptures was early in existence in the second prologue to Ecclesiasticus, written probably about 130 B.C. It is clear from an examination of the version itself that it was made in Egypt; for we find several Coptic words; and ideas purely Hebrew are rendered in the Egyptian manner. Moreover, from the observable differences of style and of acquaintance with the original language, different individuals, probably at different times, must have been engaged in the work. And, sifting the whole matter, we may fairly conclude that the version made at Alexandria was begun in the time of the early Ptolemies, perhaps 280 or 285 B.C., and that the law alone was first translated, the other books following at uncertain intervals. There is, besides, no improbability in believing that a copy had its place in the royal library. But whether the version originated with the Jews, rendered necessary by the reading of the law and the prophets in their synagogues in a tongue they could understand, or whether one of the Egyptian kings, Soter, or Philadelphus, commanded the translation, is more in doubt. Considering, however, the attachment of the Jews to their own tongue, and considering how long a language is often preserved for ecclesiastical use after it has ceased to be the medium of common intercourse, it may be thought on the whole most probable that the version was produced, in some measure at least, by the sovereign's desire. It grew into high consideration. And we may well suppose that the object of the pretended letter of Aristeas was to exalt its credit. Philo believed in its inspiration: Josephus generally used it; as also the earlier Christian fathers. Its alleged miraculous origin is mentioned in the Talmud; and there is reason to conclude that it was read not only in Egyptian synagogues, but in those of Palestine and elsewhere. But, some time after Christ, the Jews, pressed by the arguments from prophecy, began to question and to deny the faithfulness of the Septuagint to the Hebrew original: they instituted a fast on the 8th of their month Tebeth, to show their sorrow for its having been made, and ultimately adopted in preference the literal version of Aquila.

It has been already hinted that some of the Septuagint translators were but imperfectly acquainted with Hebrew. There are many mistakes therefore; and there is a singular connection not yet fully explained between this and the text of the Samaritan Pentateuch. The Pentateuch is best rendered: the poetical portions are generally inferior to the historical. Of the prophets Jeremiah is the best given; yet there are remarkable variations in the version from the original. And generally many important predictions are obscured in the Septuagint. The translation of Daniel (supposed for long to be lost, but discovered and published at Rome in 1772) was considered so erroneous that that of Theodotion was substituted for it. Still, with all the errors, variations, misconceptions, and corruptions of the Septuagint, it is of inestimable value for both the criticism and the interpretation of the sacred book. It is evident that the translators had before them a text differing from that of our oldest manuscripts; and some corrections may be obtained from it which we cannot hesitate in pronouncing just ones. And then its language is the pattern of that of the apostles and evangelists. Hebrew idioms appear in a Greek form; and we are led therefrom to understand the sense in which many words and phrases of the New Testament are used. The theological student who would fully understand the original of the New Testament must give all diligent attention to the Septuagint version of the Old.

By the frequency of transcription many errors crept into the Septuagint text. Origen, therefore, in the early part of the third century, undertook to collate it with the Hebrew, and with other Greek versions, so as to produce a new and accurate recension. It is said that he spent twenty-eight years on this great work, which was called variously, Tetrapla, Hexapla, Octapla, and Enneapla. The Tetrapla comprised in four columns the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion: the Hexapla had two additional columns, the Hebrew text, and the same in Greek characters. Other columns were subsequently added, for two other Greek versions of some parts of the bible; hence the name Octapla, which, augmented by an additional translation of the Psalms and minor prophets, was ultimately the Enneapla. But it is not very probable that Origen himself edited more than the Tetrapla and Hexapla. He adjoined special marks and signs to indicate the variations of the Septuagint as compared with other versions and the Hebrew. This work was a large and cumbersome one. It lay half a century little noticed at Tyre, till discovered by Eusebius and Pamphilus, who placed it in the library of Pamphilus the Martyr at Cæsarea; where it was seen by Jerome in the later part of the fourth century. After this no more was heard of it: perhaps it perished in the capture of Cæsarea by the Arabs, 653 A.D. A few fragments alone now remain.

Two editions or exemplars of the Septuagint have been distinguished since Origen's time—that called the common text, such as it was before his collation, and the hexaplaric text, that produced by his corrections. Numerous errors being introduced by copyists, three recensions were under taken at nearly the same time. Eusebius and Pamphilus about 300 A.D. published the hexaplaric text with Origen's critical marks: these, however, by transcription became confused, and were afterwards omitted. This edition was adopted by the churches in Palestine. Lucian, a presbyter of Antioch, martyred 311 A.D., and Hesychius, an Egyptian bishop, conducted other recensions, it is not agreed whether independently of Origen's labours, or whether the hexaplaric text, amended after the Hebrew, was the basis of both. They obtained acceptance, and were used, the first by the churches of Constantinople, Asia Minor, and Syria, the other in Egypt. From these three principal recensions existing manuscripts and printed editions of the Septuagint are derived. That called the common text is the basis of the Vatican manuscript; while the Alexandrine has more of a hexaplaric character. Of printed editions there are reckoned four standards, the Complutensian, 1514, the Aldine, 1518, the Roman or Vatican, 1586, and the Alexandrine, 1707-9-19-20.

2. Aquila, a Jewish proselyte of Sinope, made a translation for the use of the Jews about the middle of the second century of our era. It is literal even to barbarism.

3. Somewhat later Theodotus, a Jewish proselyte of Ephesus, whom Jerome calls an Ebionite, produced another version. It is a kind of revision of the Septuagint, holding a middle place between the servile closeness of Aquila and the freedom of Symmachus.

4. Symmachus, an Ebionite, who lived about 200 A.D., executed a free version, expressing the sense rather than the words of the original.

5, 6, 7. Three other ancient translations of parts of the bible there were, of which the authors are not known. They are entitled the 'fifth,' 'sixth,' and 'seventh,' from the order in which Origen (if it were he) placed them in his columns.

8. There is yet another called the Venetian, because the MS. of it was preserved in St. Mark's library, Venice. It is uncertain when it was made. The MS. is considered to be of the fourteenth century; but it is not the original, merely a copy. It comprises the Pentateuch and several other books. This is a singular version: the style is a mixture of pure Attic with barbarisms; while the Chaldee of Daniel is rendered in Doric. The Pentateuch was published by Ammon at Erlangen in 1790-1791: the other books by Villosion had appeared at Strasbourg in 1784.

Syriac. Christianity was early preached in Syria; naturally, therefore, several versions of scripture were made into the language of that country.

1. The most celebrated of these is the Peshito or Literal, so usually called on account of its close adherence to the original text. That of the Old Testament, which appears not to have comprised the apocryphal books, was probably executed, by a Christian, at Edessa, about the middle of the second century after Christ. Perhaps the version of the New Testament was made about the same time, and at the same place. But the Revelation, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, John vii. 53 to viii. 11, also 1 John v. 7, are not found in the Peshito. It is a translation greatly and very justly valued. The New Testament was first printed at Vienna in 1555: the Old Testament appeared, not in a very perfect state, in the Paris Polyglott in 1645, and was re-printed with the addition of some apocryphal books of a later version in Walton's Polyglott, 1657. The whole bible was published under the care of Prof. Lee, London, 1816-23. Various recensions of this standard translation were made in process of time: that called the Nestorian exhibits little more than some variations in the points. Another is the Karkuphensian; because it is said to have been executed towards the close of the tenth century by David, a monk of the convent of St. Aaron on mount Sigara in Mesopotamia; karkupho signifying the 'summit of a mountain.' It does not differ much from the ordinary Peshito text.

2. Among the Syriac MSS. now in the British Museum, brought from the Nitrian monasteries, there is one containing large portions of the four Gospels in a version differing, as to the character both of the text and of the translation, from any Syriac version previously known. It is unquestionably of the highest antiquity. And there are linguistic differences in the different Gospels; that of St. Matthew varying from the rest. Hence it has been suggested by those who believe that the apostle wrote in Hebrew or Syro-Chaldaic that the version was made immediately from that original. It was published by the Rev. Dr. Cureton in 1857.

3. A Syriac translation of the New Testament was executed in 508 A.D. by Polycarp, a chorepiscopus or rural bishop, at the suggestion of Philoxenus or Xenaias, bishop of Hierapolis or Mabug. It is called the Philoxenian version, and was revised about a century later by Thomas of Harkel or Heraclea, also bishop of Hierapolis. Philoxenus would seem to have commissioned Polycarp to translate the Psalter likewise; but no translation of the entire Old Testament was made by any of the three persons just named. About the same time, however, that Thomas of Harkel was revising the Philoxenian, Paul bishop of Tella in Mesopotamia, in the instance of Athanasius, Monophysite patriarch of Antioch, made a very literal Syriac version of the Old Testament from the Greek hexaplaric text. A deacon, Mar Thoma, whom some have believed identical with Thomas of Harkel, is said to have been associated with Paul in his work. Portions of this translation have been lost: the rest has been printed at various times, with the exception of the apocryphal parts. The Philoxenian New Testament was published by Prof. White, 1778-1803.

4. There is a lectionary in the Vatican library at Rome containing a Syriac version of some portions of the Gospels. These follow the order of the festivals on which they were read; some occurring more than once; other parts being wanting, either as not included in the ecclesiastical order of reading or as now defective in the manuscript. The dialect of this version is peculiar, and has been thought to resemble that of the Jerusalem Targum: hence it has been called the Jerusalem Syriac. It is uncertain when it was executed, possibly between the fourth and sixth centuries. It is of considerable critical value; but only a few fragments have been published.

5. It was noted above that some portions of the New Testament were not found in the Peshito. There have, however, been translations made of them, at times not well ascertained. The Revelation was published in 1627 by De Dieu at Leyden, from a MS. in the university library of that city. The four catholic epistles were printed also at Leyden by Poccoke from a MS. in the Bodleian. And in 1631 De Dieu published Animadv. in quat. Evangelia, in which he inserted a Syriac translation of John vii. 53 to viii. 11, from a MS. belonging to archbishop Usher.

There are some other Syriac translations or recensions, of which but little is known.

Latin. It is certain that there existed in the second century a Latin version of the scriptures, made in Africa and used by the African fathers. It exhibited the characteristics of the Latin dialect of the Libyan province, and was probably the result of the fragmentary labours of different individuals. As a Latin translation became needed in other regions, this was more widely diffused. It can scarcely indeed be said that there was a standard text; for variations were introduced, and revisions seem to have been made in different churches. Yet there was but one acknowledged version; and copies, however much they disagreed, were but subordinate varieties of the single translation. This is proved by the peculiar words found in the citations of writers of far-distant provinces. The same staple of the text must have been everywhere in use. Yet the recension of Italy appears to have been the best; and to this the term Itala would seem to have been appropriated. The version of the Old Testament was made from the Septuagint; and it included some of the apocryphal pieces. That of the New Testament, on the other hand, did not probably at first comprise all the canonical books. But this fact is a corroboration of the high antiquity of the version.

In the course of time the text of the Latin version had become greatly confused and corrupted. To remedy the growing evil, Jerome, at the request of Damasus bishop of Rome, undertook a systematic revision. He began with the New Testament about 382 A.D., and in two years presented Damasus with the four Gospels, which chiefly required a correcting hand. He afterwards hastily revised the Psalter, producing what is called the Roman Psalter, because it was adopted at Rome. At a later period he corrected it again according to the hexaplaric text: this is termed the Gallican Psalter, being received by the churches in France. In a similar way he revised other books by comparison with the Greek. But most of his work perished, he himself says by fraud. The two Psalters and Job alone are extant. Flaminio Nobili professed to gather fragments of the Old Latin, which he printed in 1588. Sabatier published them more accurately and more completely at Rheims, in 1743, and at Paris, 1749-51. Some supplements have appeared since. Portions also, in various forms of text, are found in MSS.; and several of these have been printed. The remains of Jerome's revised text are in editions of his works.

As Jerome proceeded with his task of revising the old version, he was so strongly impressed with the inaccuracy of the Old Testament text as derived from the Septuagint that he resolved, urged too by friends, to translate it anew from the Hebrew. On this he was engaged from perhaps 385 to 405 A.D. He issued first the books of Samuel and Kings, to which he prefixed the Prologus galeatus, in which he gave an account of the Hebrew canon. The other books followed; some of the apocryphal ones not being translated. It was only by degrees that this version gained its place in public estimation: there was great opposition to it at first, and much hostile criticism; but at length, by the approbation of Gregory I., it acquired such authority that since the seventh century, with some mixture of other ancient translations, it has been exclusively adopted (the Psalter, as above noted, excepted) in the western church, and has borne the name of the Vulgate or current text. By the council of Trent it was ordained that the Vulgate alone should be esteemed authentic in the public reading of the scriptures, in preaching, and in expounding, and that no one should dare to reject it under any pretext whatever.

But, prior to this, corruption had again crept in. By the multiplication of copies, and errors of successive transcribers, the text, a mixture as has been just said, was in a very unsatisfactory state. Various scholars, as Alcuin, Lanfranc, cardinal Nicholas, and others attempted to correct it; but it still needed revision when it was first printed, without place or date, in 1455. This edition is the famous Mazarin bible, one of the noblest exemplars of typography. Another edition succeeded at Mayence, 1462. The council of Trent ordered that an amended edition should be prepared. And after much delay this was published under the sanction of Sixtus V., in 1590. It was soon, however, discovered to be very inaccurate; and another authentic Vulgate appeared in 1592, under Clement VIII. It was followed by the edition of 1593, in which a few alterations were made; and this is the standard of the Romish church. It is unfortunate for that church that the Sixtine and Clementine editions vary so remarkably. Dr. James, in his Bellum Papale, has exhibited numerous discrepancies and contradictions. But, with all its imperfections, the Vulgate is a noble version of Scripture, and can never be neglected by the theological student.

The very briefest notice must be taken of other ancient translations. They will be arranged in alphabetical order.

Anglo-Saxon. Several versions are enumerated. Adhelm, bishop of Sherborne, translated the Psalter about 706 A.D.; and Egbert or Eadfrid, bishop of Lindisfarne, is said to have rendered the Gospels soon after. A version of the entire bible from the Vulgate is ascribed to Bede, who died 735 A.D. King Alfred translated some portions; and Elfric, probably the same who was archbishop of Canterbury in 995 A.D., several books of the Old Testament. The Anglo-Saxon Gospels were printed in 1571, under the auspices of abp. Parker; and other parts of the bible have appeared at various times.

Arabic. Arabic versions, of the whole or portions of the scriptures, are numerous, and have been made from the Hebrew, from the Septuagint, from the Peshito, from the Vulgate, and from the Samaritan Pentateuch. Many of these have not yet been printed. But none of them can be very ancient. John bishop of Seville in the eighth century is said to have translated the scriptures into Arabic; and Junybol identifies the text of a MS. of the four Gospels in the library at Franeker as his work. This text was published at Rome in 1590-1. Saadias Gaon, a Jewish teacher at Sora in Babylonia, translated portions (possibly the whole) of the Old Testament in the tenth century. The Pentateuch of this version was printed at Constantinople in Hebrew characters in 1546. Erpenius published an Arabic Pentateuch at Leyden in 1622: it is a close translation of the Hebrew, and is ascribed to an African Jew of the thirteenth century. Erpenius also edited the New Testament at Leyden in 1616, from a manuscript of the thirteenth or fourteenth century. The whole bible in Arabic was printed by the Propaganda at Rome, in 1671.

Armenian. Miesrob, the inventor of Armenian letters, undertook an Armenian version in the fifth century. In conjunction with Isaac the Armenian patriarch, and some other helpers, he translated first from the Syriac. Afterwards a Greek copy was obtained, and a fresh version made from this. It was very imperfect; but on further study of the Greek language a better was subsequently executed. The whole bible was printed at Amsterdam in 1666 by Uscan, an Armenian bishop. His text is somewhat coloured from the Vulgate.

Egyptian. There are three Egyptian dialects: the Coptic or Memphitic in Lower Egypt; the Sahidic or Thebaic in Upper Egypt; and the Bashmuric or Oasitic, also called the Ammonian, prevailing probably in an eastern district of the Delta. There is reason to believe that versions of the scriptures existed in both Upper and Lower Egypt in the third or fourth century, made from the Septuagint. Wilkins published the Memphitic New Testament at Oxford in 1716, and the Pentateuch in 1731: the Psalter appeared first at Rome in 1744: the minor prophets were printed by archdeacon Tatman in 1836, Job in 1846, and the greater prophets in 1852. Bardelli published Daniel in 1849. Schwartz edited the Gospels at Leipzig, 1846-7; and after his death Boetticher put forth the rest of the New Testament. A beautiful edition of the New Testament appeared in 1848-52, under the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Of the Thebaic and Bashmuric only fragments have been printed.

Ethiopic. The Ethiopic version of the bible was made from the Greek. It probably dates from the fourth century, and may have been executed, in part at least, by Frumentius of Tyre, the first bishop of the country. The Psalter and Song of Solomon were published at Rome in 1513, and the New Testament at the same place in 1548-49. A revised text was edited by Platt for the Bible Society in 1826-30. A complete edition of the Ethiopic scriptures has been undertaken by Dillman, of which the first volume appeared in 1853.

Georgian. A Georgian translation in the ecclesiastical dialect of the country was executed from the Septuagint and the original Greek of the New Testament in the sixth century. The whole bible, corrected from the Slavonic, was printed at Moscow in 1743.

Gothic. This version was made from the Greek of both Testaments by Ulphilas, appointed bishop of the Mæso-Goths in 348 A.D. He subscribed the Arian confession; and here and there, especially in Phil. ii. 6, his theological views tinged his translation. The Gospels of this version were first published at Dort in 1665 from the Codex Argenteus, a MS. most probably of the sixth century, now preserved in the university library at Upsal. The researches of Knittel and of cardinal Mai brought almost all the epistles and some fragments of the Old Testament to light. All the portions discovered of the Gothic version have been published by Gabelentz and Loebe in 1836-45, by Massman in 1855-6, and by Stamm in 1858.

Persic. The scriptures were doubtless early translated into Persian; but the ancient version does not exist. A translation of the Pentateuch appeared at Constantinople in 1546. It was the work of Jacob Ben Joseph surnamed Tawosi or Tusi, and has been thought to be only of the sixteenth century. There are other portions of the bible in Persian, some yet unprinted.

Slavonic. The Slavonians settled in Great Moravia received Christianity in the ninth century, mainly through the missionary labours of two brothers, Cyril and Methodius of Thessalonica. These translated perhaps only the New Testament and the Psalter into the Slavonic language; but the version of the Old Testament was afterwards completed. Portions were printed at an early date, and the whole bible at Ostrog in 1581.

Some account must now be given of modern translations.

English. The Anglo-Saxon versions of scripture in this country have been briefly noticed above. When the language of the people began to assume the shape of what might be called English, the desire of having the gospel in it began soon to manifest itself. Metrical paraphrases of portions of the bible were made; and in the earlier part of the fourteenth century Richard Rolle of Hampole appears to have executed a version of the Psalms, and to have translated or paraphrased other parts of scripture. Labourers in the same field followed; and ere long the illustrious Wyclif in conjunction with Nicholas Hereford resolved to translate the whole bible. Their work is said to have been revised by Richard Purvey about 1388; and there cannot be a doubt that, in spite of the attempts to suppress it, it was repeatedly copied and widely circulated. The New Testament was printed in 1731 by Lewis, in 1810 by Baber, and the entire translation by Forshall and Madden at Oxford in 1850.

Earlier translations were based on the Vulgate. To Tyndale belongs the honour of first resorting to the original texts as the source of any satisfactory version. Tyndale's name deserves to be held in lasting remembrance. Some have praised him at the expense of Cranmer and Ridley, as setting to work while they were 'watching how the court-winds blew' (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1667), in hurried forgetfulness that Tyndale had done a large part of his work before Cranmer (much more Ridley) had emerged from obscurity. Such praise Tyndale does not need. His devotedness, his perseverance, his perils, his martyr's death, and dying prayer, 'Lord, open the king of England's eyes,' are enough to enshrine him in the affections of all who value an opened bible. He printed the Gospels of Matthew and Mark at Hamburg in 1524, and the whole New Testament at Cologne and Worms in 1525; and many other editions followed, while he was labouring upon the Old Testament, of which he printed portions in 1530-1. The entire English bible first appeared in 1535, executed by Coverdale. This was in some respects retrograde; for it was based on Latin and German versions, with a certain use of Tyndale's. That of Matthews succeeded in 1537. The name of Matthews was assumed: the real editor was John Rogers, martyred in queen Mary's reign. The whole of the New Testament, and the beginning of the Old to the end of 2 Chronicles, with parts of the prophetic books, were Tyndale's version: the rest was supplied from Coverdale with sundry corrections. Part of this book was printed abroad; the rest in London. It was brought under the notice of abp. Cranmer, and had his warm approval, and by him through Cromwell the king's licence was obtained, and an order issued that a copy should be provided for every parish church: see Cranmer's Works, Park. Soc. edit., vol. ii. pp. 344-347. This, therefore, was the first authorized English bible. Others followed, as those called Cranmer's, and Taverner's, both appearing in 1539. They were little more than revisions of Matthews'. The accession of Mary of course checked the circulation of the scriptures in England. But there were English exiles who heartily carried on the work abroad. Whittingham, with Gilby, Sampson, and others, produced a version of which Tyndale's was the basis. This was called the Geneva bible: the New Testament, the first in which the verses are marked by numerals, appeared in 1557, the entire bible in 1560. This translation was frequently reprinted. When the protestant faith was restored in England, abp. Parker promoted another version. This, called the bishops' bible, because eight of those engaged on the work were bishops, was avowedly based on Cranmer's, and was published in 1568.

But these various versions and editions did not give entire satisfaction. At the Hampton-court conference in 1604 objections were produced by the puritans to the bishops' bible. And king James I. yielded to the demand and sanctioned a new translation. The most learned men in the kingdom were to be engaged on it; and fifty-four were selected; but some of these died or were prevented by other causes: only forty-seven, therefore, actually laboured in the work. The bishops' bible was to be the basis; but other translations were to be followed when more conformable to the original. Suggestions were invited from every quarter; and any scholars might be consulted, and every means adopted that the whole might faithfully set forth the true word of God. The translators were divided into various companies who met at Cambridge, Oxford, and Westminster. Andrews, then dean of Westminster, Barlow, dean of Chester, and the king's professors of Hebrew and Greek at the two universities were appointed directors; and the final revision was entrusted to Bilson, bishop of Winchester, and Miles Smith, afterwards bishop of Gloucester: the last-named wrote the dedication and preface. The work was begun in the spring of 1607, and was completed at press in 1611. This is our present authorized version, which, whatever imperfections may be imputed to it, is one of the noblest in existence.

It may be added that the Roman-catholics printed an English translation of the New Testament at Rheims in 1582, and one of the Old at Douay in 1609-10.

French. Jacques le Fèvre of Etaples published a French version of the bible in consecutive portions between 1512 and 1530. Olivetan's appeared first in 1535; having been revised, it was printed in 1588 as the 'Geneva bible': corrected editions of which were put forth by Martin, 1696-1707, and by Ostervald, 1724.

Gaelic. In 1767 the New Testament was translated and printed by James Stuart of Killin, whose son Dr. John Stuart, and Dr. Smith, translated the Old Testament. This was published in portions, 1783-1801, and a revised edition issued in 1807.

German. The first German version from the Vulgate was printed in 1466. Luther's Testament appeared 1522; and his translation of the bible was completed in 1530.

Irish. The New Testament was printed in 1602 by William Daniel, or O'Donnell, archbishop of Tuam, assisted by Mortogh O'Cliona or King. With the same person's help, bishop Bedell completed a version of the Old Testament in 1640, printed 1685.

Italian. The earliest Italian translation is that of Malermi or Malherbi, printed at Venice in 1471. That of Bruccioli appeared 1532, Diodati's in 1607.

Latin. Several scholars put forth corrected editions of the Vulgate, as Clarius, in 1542, Paul Eber, 1565, Andrew Osiander the elder, 1522, Luke Osiander, 1574-86, Andrew Osiander the younger, 1600. The version of Pagninus was published in 1528. Protestant translations are those of Munster, 1534-5, Leo Juda, 1543, Castalio, 1551, Junius and Tremellius, 1575-9 (the New Testament appeared afterwards), Schmidt, 1696, Erasmus translated the New Testament in 1516, Beza in 1566.

Manx. Bishop Wilson commenced a translation; and St Matthew's Gospel was printed in 1748. Bishop Hildesley carried on the work; and the New Testament appeared in 1767, the Old in 1772.

Spanish. The Old Testament, translated by Spanish Jews, was printed at Ferrara in 1553. A version in the Valencian dialect had previously been set forth at Valencia in 1478. In Castilian the earliest edition was the New Testament of Enzinas, printed at Antwerp in 1543. The entire bible by Casiodoro de Reyna appeared in 1569.

Welsh. A Welsh Testament, chiefly translated by Salesbury, was printed in 1567. Dr. Morgan, afterwards bishop of St. Asaph, published the whole bible in 1588. A revised edition by bishop Parry appeared in 1620.

Of course there are a multitude of modern versions of the scriptures in these and many other languages, which cannot be noticed here. Much information on the subject will be found in The Bible of Every Land, 1848.

VIAL (1 Sam. x. 1). A flask. The same word is rendered 'box' in 2 Kings ix. 1, 3. Golden vials are spoken of in Rev. v. 8, xv. 7, xvi. xvii. 1, xxi. 9; see CENSER.

VILLAGE. The term is used to denote the unwall'd suburbs outside walled towns, as well as in the sense in which we employ it (Lev. xxv. 31, 34; Josh. xiii. 28; Esth. ix. 19; Ezek. xxxviii. 11). According to the Talmud a village was a place where there was no synagogue.

VINE. This tree, Vitis vinifera, is one of those most frequently mentioned in scripture; its plentiful produce, with corn and oil, indicating a fertile land (Gen. xxvii. 28, 37, xlix. 11, 12; Deut. vii. 13; Neh. x. 39; Psal. iv. 7). It is spoken of first in the history of Noah (Gen. ix. 20): it appears to have been abundantly cultivated in Egypt (xl. 9-11; Numb. xx. 5); and it flourished and was very productive in Palestine. When the spies were sent out by Moses to explore the promised land, they found clusters of grapes of such extraordinary magnitude at Eshcol that they carried with them a bunch as a specimen back to the camp, hanging it upon a staff borne by two men (xiii. 23, 24). We need not be surprised at reading of vines so prolific. Even in our own country huge bunches of large grapes may be produced. A bunch of the Syrian variety grown at Welbeck weighed 19½ lbs.: its length was 19½ inches, and breadth across the shoulders 19½ inches; and those who have seen the vine at Hampton-court palace, cultivated at disadvantage under cover and by artificial heat, may readily conceive what such trees would yield in a suitable soil and a congenial climate. Even in the present state of Palestine vines abound; and Dr. Stanley thus speaks of the vineyards of Beth-lehem: 'Here more than elsewhere in Palestine are to be seen on the sides of the hills the vineyards marked by their watch-towers and walls, seated on their ancient terraces, the earliest and latest symbol of Judah. The elevation of the hills and table-lands of Judah is the true climate of the vine. He "bound his foal to the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes" . . . "A vineyard on a hill of olives," with the "fence," and "the stones gathered out," and "the tower in the midst of it," is the natural figure which, both in the prophetic and evangelical records, represents the kingdom of Judah' (Sinai and Pal., pp. 163, 164).

It was necessary of course for a vineyard to be fenced off, to keep out the various wild animals, boars, foxes, or jackals (Numb. xxii. 24; Psal. lxxx. 12, 13; Sol. Song ii. 15), which would be likely to do damage. A sunny aspect would be chosen for a vineyard: hence we may suppose it often on a hill (Isai. v. 1); the ground being well cleared of stones. A tower or lodge was provided for the vine-dresser, and a wine-press made (2; Matt. xxi. 33); and it would seem from our Lord's parable in the place last referred to that it was not unusual for the owner to let out his vineyard, receiving at the vintage his rent in kind.

The vintage, in autumn, about September, was a joyous and festive season. The people turned out of their habitations, and dwelt in lodges and tents. The grapes were gathered amid shout and song, and carried in baskets to the wine-press (Judges ix. 27; Isai. xvi. 10; Jer. vi. 9, xxv. 30). See WINE-PRESS. But the gleanings were to be left for the poor and the stranger (Deut. xxiv. 21; Jer. xlix. 9); and persons who passed through a vineyard might eat there at their pleasure, provided they carried nothing away (Deut. xxiii. 24). The vineyard was not to be sown with divers seeds (xxii. 9); and it was to lie untended in the sabbatical and jubilee years (Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 11). Fig-trees were occasionally planted in vineyards (Luke xii. 6, 7); hence the dwelling quietly under a man's own vine and his own fig-tree was a proverbial expression for general peace and security (1 Kings iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4; Zech. iii. 10).

The produce of the vine was variously used. Some grapes were eaten fresh: others were dried as raisins (1 Sam. xxx. 12): for wine as a product of the grape see WINE: there was also a kind of syrup, the newly-expressed juice of grapes, boiled down to the third or half part. This was the 'honey' of Gen. xliii. 11. This syrup, called dibs, is in common use in Palestine at the present day (Robinson, Bibl. Res. in Palestine, vol. ii. pp. 80, 81).

The places mentioned in scripture, where vines appear to have specially flourished, are Elealeh, En-gedi, Eshcol, Heshbon, and Sibmah (Numb. xiii. 23, 24; Sol. Song i. 14; Isai. xvi. 8, 9, 10; Jer. xlviii. 32).

The vine is frequently spoken of figuratively. Thus Israel, when faithful, is represented as a fruitful vine, when ungodly, as yielding degenerate grapes (Psal. lxxx. 8-15; Isai. v. 1-7; Jer. ii. 21; Ezek. xix. 10-14; Hos. x. 1). The most remarkable example, however, is that in which our Lord represents himself as the vine, his disciples as the branches, and inculcates excellent lessons from the comparison on the little company who surrounded him on the last sad night of his bitter passion (John xv. 1-6). It has been imagined that the figure was suggested to him by the sculptured golden vine of the temple, or by the vineyards on the way to Gethsemane; perhaps such ideas are fanciful.

VINE OF SODOM (Deut. xxxii. 32). There have been many conjectures as to the tree meant. Among the more probable of these is that it is the 'usher of the Arabs, Asclepias (Calotropis) procera of botanists. The fruit resembling a beautiful orange explodes, on being pressed, like a puff-ball. Probably it is this which Dr. Bonar saw by the Dead sea. 'This fruit,' he says, 'the natives call Taffah-el-Mejânîn—that is the mad-apples—because they are said to make all who eat them mad' (Land of Promise, pp. 300, 301). Dr. Hooker, however, supposes that some plant, with the habits of a vine, must be intended, and suggests Cucumis colocynthis, bitter apple.

VINE-DRESSER (2 Kings xxv. 12; 2 Chron. xxvi. 10; Isai. lxi. 5; Jer. lii. 16; Joel i. 11; comp. Luke xiii. 6-9; John xv. 1, 2).

VINEGAR. Some question has been raised whether 'vinegar' (Numb. vi. 3; Ruth ii. 14; Psal. lxxix. 21; Prov. x. 26) is the right rendering of the original word; but Gesenius approves it. As made from the grape it was not to be touched by the Nazarite; but it would supply a refreshing drink for those engaged in labour. And it might be mixed with a little olive-oil; as Pitts says was the case with that he had when in slavery with the Algerines (True and Faithful Account of the Religion of the Mahometans, p. 6, edit. 1731). The vinegar of Matt. xxvii. 48; Mark xv. 36; Luke xxiii. 36; John xix. 29 was the posca, sour wine, or vinegar and water, the ordinary drink of the Roman soldiers.

VINEYARD. See VINE.

VINTAGE. See SEASON, VINE.

VIOL (Isai. v. 12; Amos vi. 5). See PSALTERY.

VIOLET (Esth. i. 6, marg., viii. 15, marg.). See COLOURS, p. 175.

VIPER (Isai. lix. 5; Matt. iii. 7). See ADDER.

VIRGIN. The virgin Mary; see MARY, 1. In respect to the prophecy that a virgin should conceive (Isai. vii. 14): see IMMANUEL. The Hebrews were in the habit of personifying the body of inhabitants in a place as a female; so the 'daughter' of a land (the people) is said to be a virgin (xxiii. 12, xlvii. 1; Jer. xlviii. 13). The term is also used to indicate moral purity (Rev. xiv. 4).

VISION. See PROPHECY.

VOLUME. See MANUSCRIPTS, WRITING.

VOPH'SI (my increase). Father of the spy chosen from Naphtali (Numb. xiii. 14).

VOW. The earliest recorded example of a vow would seem to be that self-imposed by Jacob when on his road as a fugitive to Padan-aram (Gen. xxviii. 20-22). It was recognized and accepted by God (xxxi. 13). Vows were not prescribed by the Mosaic law; for a vow is essentially a voluntary engagement; but they were carefully regulated. Essential provisions were that the person who vowed should be able independently to undertake the obligation, or be authorized by those to whom obedience was due (Numb. xxx. 2-15), that the vow should not respect that which was in its nature abominable (Deut. xxiii. 18), and that it should be expressed with the lips (23). Vows, then most binding, must be performed; the more because the party had been free to vow or to abstain from vowing, so that it was his own act and deed in binding himself (21, 22; Eccles. v. 4, 5).

Among vows may be reckoned the herem or irremissible curse (Lev. xxvii. 28, 29). This was uttered against a city to be wholly destroyed; the guilt of a broken vow being incurred by any one who spared an inhabitant or appropriated the spoil. There is a notable example in the case of Jericho, which was so devoted that a curse was pronounced on him who should venture to re-build it (Josh. vi. 17-19, 21-26, vii.). Very similar was the execration which Saul denounced against any of his army who should taste food before his victory over the Philistines was complete (1 Sam. xiv. 24-28).

Common vows were positive in which a person engaged to do something, or negative by which he bound himself to abstain from what otherwise was not unlawful. Examples of the neder or ordinary vow may be found in the case of Hannah consecrating her hoped-for son to the Lord (i. 11); and in Absalom's pretended determination to be a faithful servant of God (2 Sam. xv. 7, 8). It was provided in regard to things vowed as offerings to God that, if they were unclean beasts, they were to be priced by the priest, and then might be redeemed by him who made the vow on the addition of one-fifth of the value (Lev. xxvii. 11-13), if clean animals, such as were usually sacrificed, they were under no circumstances to be redeemed or exchanged (9, 10), if lands or houses, these might on certain conditions (see JUBILEE), be redeemed (14-24), if persons, redemption-money was to be paid (1-8). Nothing was to be so dedicated which already by right, as the firstling of an ox or sheep, belonged to the Lord (26). Examples of negative vows were those in which any one engaged to abstain from wine, or any kind of food, or other thing. Such a vow was taken by the NAZARITE, which see.

There are instances of vows in the New Testament (e.g. Acts xviii. 18, xxiii. 12-21).

VULGATE. The name by which the authorized Latin version of the Bible is known. See VERSIONS, p. 906.

VULTURE. A powerful bird of the family of the Vulturidae in the order Raptores

According to our version vultures were forbidden to the Hebrews as food (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13). But the word daah or dayyah, so translated, more properly signifies a kite. It occurs again in Isai. xxxiv. 15. There is another word, ayyah, rendered 'vulture' (Job xxviii. 7). This also occurs in Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13, where it is 'kite' in our translation. See KITE. But, as it is well known that there are several species of the vulture in Palestine, it may be reasonably believed that this bird is designated in scripture by some other word. It is probably, therefore, included in the term neshet, generally rendered 'eagle,' the rather because in some passages of scripture where neshet occurs the habits of the bird described agree more with those of the vulture than of the eagle. The Gyps or Vultur fulvus, or griffin vulture, is a powerful bird, four feet in length, bald on the head and neck (comp. Mic. i. 16); it builds its nests on elevated rocks or on high forest-trees: it has a keen eye, and preys on carcasses, being often known to appear where armies are contending (comp. Job xxxix. 27-30; Matt. xxiv. 28) even in districts where otherwise it is seldom seen. It inhabits the north of Europe, the Alps, the Pyrenees, Turkey the north of Africa, and is common in Palestine. The Gypaëtus barbatus, lammergeier, or bearded vulture, is a very rare bird, found only in mountainous regions. This too is known in Palestine. There is one other species which may be mentioned, the Neophron percnopterus, called Pharaoh's hen, and Maltese or carion vulture. It is said to be the only vulture found in a wild state in Britain. It is a filthy bird, abounding in the towns and villages of the east, where it is the common scavenger. This is very likely the râhhâm or râhhâmâh of Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 17, in our version the 'gier-eagle.'

W

WAFER (Exod. xvi. 31, xxix. 2, 23; Lev. ii. 4, vii. 12, viii. 26; Numb. vi. 15, 19). A thin cake. See BREAD.

WAGES. The wages first mentioned were paid in kind, or by the gift of a daughter in marriage (Gen. xxix. 15-20, xxx. 28, xxxi. 7, 8, 41). Money-wages occur in the New Testament (Matt. xx. 1-14). Strict injunctions were given by the Mosaic law as to the punctual payment of wages (Lev. xix. 13; Deut. xxiv. 15). And there were judgments threatened against those that disregarded these commands (Jer. xxii. 13; Mal. iii. 5; comp. Luke x. 7; James v. 4). See HIRELING.

WAGGON. This word does not often occur in our version. It is the rendering in several passages (Gen. xlv. 19, 21, 27; Numb. vii. 3, 7, 8) of the word elsewhere generally translated 'cart.' This was for peaceful purposes. But there is one place (Ezek. xxxiii. 24), where it represents another Hebrew word, and where it must be understood to denote the war-chariot.

WAIL, WAILING. See MOURNING.

WALL. For purposes of defence cities and towns were enclosed by walls, being thus distinguished from 'unwalled villages' (Ezek. xxxix. 11). According to the fact whether a place was so walled and therefore a city, or unwalled and a village, regulations were made as to the reversion of property to the original owner at the jubilee (Lev. xxv. 29-34). See JUBILEE. The walls of cities were made thick and strong (Numb. xiii. 28; Deut. iii. 5); so that houses were built upon them (Josh. ii. 15). There are remains existing in Assyria and Babylonia sufficient to show that the accounts of ancient historians of the vast size of city walls are not inaccurate. See BABEL. It was a matter of great importance for people who apprehended hostile attack to surround their dwellings with defences which could not easily be overthrown; and hence the jealousy manifested against permitting a suspected city to be walled (Neh. i. 3, ii. 8, 13, 15, 17, 18, iii. iv.). See FENCED CITIES.

The term is sometimes used metaphorically (1 Sam. xxv. 16); and the prophets describe thereby in glowing language the security of the restored Jerusalem (Isai. xxvi. 1, ix. 18; Rev. xxi. 12-20).

WANDERING. After the Israelites were delivered from Egypt, and had triumphantly passed the Red sea, it was intended, when a covenant had been made with them, and statutes were prescribed them, that they should proceed to occupy the land promised to their fathers (Numb. xiii.). But, in consequence of their rebellious fear to encounter the Canaanites, they were condemned to wander in the wilderness till the men of that generation perished (xiv. 26-35). The sentence was rigorously executed; and forty years (in the whole) expired before the Jordan was crossed, and the occupation of Palestine begun (Josh. iv. 19, v. 6).

The itinerary of their journeyings is given with much particularity in Numb. xxxiii. 1-49; and incidental notices of the direction they pursued, and the places at which they halted, are found in other parts of the Pentateuch. Generally it is clear that after passing the sea their course was south or south-east to Sinai, and then nearly due north to Kadesh; from which place they had to turn southward to Ezion-geber; and that it was by a circuit round the Edomitish territory that they at length came to the so-called 'plains of Moab,' nearly opposite to Jericho. But it is hard to identify many of the stations; the exact site of Sinai itself is disputed; and, as there are few notes of time, and nearly thirty-eight years of the whole period are passed over with the record of little that occurred in them, it is manifest that a writer must approach the topic with diffidence, and not attempt dogmatically to enforce the theory he adopts.

The present article can deal but briefly with the wanderings: it would demand a volume to discuss the various points of interest which present themselves.

The possibility of the Israelites spending so long a time in the region traversed may be first noticed. We find them repeatedly murmuring for want of water and of food. And, though a supply of both was supernaturally vouchsafed, yet, when we recollect that they possessed large herds and flocks, we must allow that the nation could not have subsisted in a region utterly desolate. Now, if we suppose that the fastnesses of Horeb are sterile—though even there the monks of St. Catherine at the present day have cultivated gardens, and early travellers speak of green plains where now everything is bare—if we admit that the Arabah is an arid region unfit for habitation, yet large tracts of the so-called wilderness were rather open downs, distinguished indeed from the abodes of settled nations, but yet suitable for and occupied by nomad tribes. All evidence goes to establish this. The wilderness is traversed still by large pilgrim-caravans; and there are unmistakeable traces in many parts of ancient fertility. There are the ruins of cities, and there is the memory preserved of many more: there are indications of water in different wadies, a proof that, had not the trees been so recklessly destroyed, as we know even of late they have been, vegetation could have flourished. Besides, various peoples inhabited the region, the Amalekites, for instance, when the Israelites passed along; so that, though there were districts wild and solitary enough, yet there was not through the whole sweep of country the utter desolation which some have imagined. See Drew's Scripture Lands, chap. iii. pp. 58, 59, 73, 76, 79, 80. And, be it observed, it was a wise providence which chose their way. The training Israel received in the desert told admirably on their future character.

The passage of the Red sea has been elsewhere discussed: see pp. 801, 802. They took their journey thence by the wilderness of Shur to Marah, perhaps ʿAin Howārah, and to Elim, Wady Ghurundel, or Wady Useit (Exod. xv. 22-27). They then reached the wilderness of Sin, el-Kāa, and proceeded by Dophkah and Alush to Rephidim, perhaps Feirān, and Sinai (xvi. 1, xvii. 1, xix. 1, 2; Numb. xxxiii. 9-15). The group of Sinaitic mountains is well known, though differences of opinion exist as to the exact summit on which the glory of God appeared: see HOREB, SINAI. It must be noted, however, that a writer in the Journ. of Sac. Lit., Apr. 1860, pp. 1-60, denies that the Israelites went so far south as they are generally supposed to have gone, and regards the Jebel el-Tih as the chain of Horeb. But his theory cannot easily be received.

After the giving of the law began the march to Kadesh, which was hard by the wildernesses of Zin and Paran (Numb. x. 33, xi. 3, 34, 35, xii. 16). There appear to have been sixteen halting-places between Horeb and Kadesh, the first and second of which are not named (x. 33, xxxiii. 16-30), Moseroth being near to Kadesh, and as some think another name for mount Hor. For the identification of Kadesh, on which opinions vary, see KADESH. It was from Kadesh (or shortly before reaching it) that the spies were sent into Canaan, and at Kadesh on their return that the fatal refusal to march on occurred, when sentence of penal wandering was passed upon the obstinate nation (xiii. 26, xiv. 25, 34). We know (as before said) little of the history of those years. The rebellion of Korah occurred during the period; and certain additional statutes were given (xv.—xix.). We have also a brief record of stations on the way from Kadesh to Ezion-geber and from Ezion-geber to Kadesh. It is probable that the time was occupied by marches and counter-marches between these points, till at last in the fortieth year, the fated time just closing, they came once more to Kadesh with better hopes, and encamped in the wilderness of Zin to the east of the city (xx. 1, xxxiii. 36).

There was still to be the tale of suffering, sin, and death. Miriam died. The people murmured for water; and Moses and Aaron offended, and were told they should not enter the promised land. But the march must not be delayed. Application was therefore made to Edom for a passage through their country, but was churlishly refused. Accordingly Israel 'turned away' from Edom; and when near mount Hor Aaron died (xx.). Surely the tradition is here at fault. If the Hor on which Aaron died be the mountain commonly so reputed, instead of turning away the Israelites penetrated into the very centre of the Edomitish territory: see HOR, 1. Be this however, as it may, from Hor they journeyed down towards the Red sea, much to the discomfort of the people, crossed the Arabah from west to east, perhaps somewhat above Ezion-geber, compassed the land of Edom, passed the brook Zerter to the east of Moab, and at length came north of the Arnon into a district that had once belonged to Moab, and still retained its name, though now appropriated by the Amorites (xxi. 4-13, 18-20, xxii. 1; Deut. ii. 8, 13, 14, 24; Judges xi. 16-18). Many eventful passages were there during this circuit, the plague of fiery serpents, and the destruction of Sihon and Og; their conquests being pushed through Gilead and Bashan, before the Israelites sat down by the Jordan opposite to Jericho (Numb. xxi. 21-35). And there was yet the attempted curse of Balaam, and the chastisement of Midian (xxii.—xxv.), and then the last solemn charge of Moses (Deut. i. 1), recapitulating God's law, and his wonderful dealings with his people; and then the great lawgiver died, the last event (the wandering being over) before they crossed the Jordan into their inheritance (xxiv.).

Little more can be added. It is but a general sketch which has been given of Israel's journeyings, of the country they traversed so long, and of the events that befel

G R E A T

31

30

29

28

E

G

Y

H

P

T

The Way of the Rameses?

Memphis

Canal of Necho

On Bellshemesh Helioopolis

MEMPHIS

R. Nile

Pi-hahiroth?

Suez

Atakah

W. Tawarick

Einan?

Baal Zephon

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

W. Arabia

Enlarged Map of SINAI

Jebel el Fureia

J. Sena

Wady Rahah

J. el Chubcheh

W. el Tih

J. el Hama

W. el Sissah

Jebel Musa

W. es Nebatveh

J. Katherin

W. el Hama

J. el Hama

W. el Hama

J. el Hama

W. el Hama

J. el Hama

W. el Hama

31

32

33

THE PENINSULA OF SINAI
 illustrating the
WANDERINGS OF THE ISRAELITES

them there. Great was their perverseness, and great the Lord's mercy towards them (Psal. xcvi. 7-11). And their history in the wilderness remarkably pre-signifies the future fortunes of the church, travelling through the wilderness of the world towards her heavenly home. In our pilgrimage we many times provoke the Lord; but O how graciously does he deal with us, sparing us like a kind father, providing us with bread to eat and giving us water for our thirst, continually beckoning us onward to a better Canaan. 'Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any should seem to come short of it' (Heb. iv. 1).

For further information the reader may consult Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Wüste, Arabische'; and Smith, Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1746-1771.

WAR. Much has been already said upon this topic; and the reader must be referred to previous articles, for a description of the weapons used to ARMS, ARMOUR, for the mustering and marshalling of troops to ARMY, for the mode of attacking and defending towns to ENGINES and FENCED CITIES, for the spoil and its distribution to BOOTY, for the treatment of the conquered to CAPTIVE. A few general notices only remain to be added here.

The Israelites were much engaged in war. At their entrance into Canaan they had to take possession of their allotted inheritance by conquest. And, as they spared many of the clans whom they were to exterminate, and frequently by their sins brought down God's chastisement upon them, generally in the shape of being subjected by some neighbouring nation, they were consequently seldom long without having recourse to arms. But, had they been faithful to the national holy covenant, they would have been sure to be victorious.

In advancing against an enemy terms of surrender were to be offered, except in the case of the devoted Canaanitish nations; and only if these terms were refused was the assault to be made (Deut. xx. 10-18). The impending onset of battle was announced by the sound of the sacred trumpets (Numb. x. 9), and by the shoutings of the troops (1 Sam. xvii. 20). Sometimes, too, the men were encouraged by an address from the commander-in-chief (2 Sam. x. 11, 12; 2 Chron. xx. 20). Stratagems were practised, spies sent out (Josh. ii. 1), and ambuscades contrived (viii. 4, 9). In besieging a city banks were cast up and military engines placed on these to batter the walls (2 Kings xix. 32; Isai. xxix. 3), or attempts were made by scaling-ladders to climb over them; while the besieged took all the precautions they could, stopping the supply of water, &c. (2 Chron. xxxii. 2-5). Sometimes fire was employed to destroy the gates of a town or fortress (Judges ix. 48, 49, 52). A victory was celebrated with great rejoicings (xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7; 2 Chron. xx. 26-28). And, as those who had distinguished themselves were specially praised, so for the dead in battle dirges were composed, and lamentations made (2 Sam. i. 19-27; 2 Chron. xxxv. 25). Trophies were set up when a victory was gained; and the arms of the vanquished were kept in the sanctuaries of the conquerors (1 Sam. vii. 12, xv. 12, xxi. 9, xxxi. 10). But the then customary ferocities were much mitigated in the case of the Hebrews, who were charged to show more mercy to their enemies during the hostilities, and afterwards, than could be obtained from other victors (Deut. xx. 14, 19, 20; 1 Kings xx. 31, 32).

Personal strength and skill were far more important in wars in which battles were rather a series of personal combats than in modern warfare carried on by means of fire-arms. Hence a single champion of great size and prowess might strike terror into a whole army (1 Sam. xvii. 23, 24); and even a campaign might be decided by the issue of a contest between two chosen warriors (8, 9, 51).

We very often find the incidents of war introduced with a figurative meaning. The Deity is described as a warrior, and Messiah predicted under the same symbol (e.g. Psal. xlv. 3, cx. 5, 6; Isai. xxvii. 1, xxxiv. 5, lix. 16-18, lxiii. 1-6). Further, the faithful are warned that they have a battle to fight, and enemies whom they are to subdue; and the Christian graces are occasionally represented as arms or pieces of armour (Eph. vi. 10-20; 1 Thess. v. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 3, 4), with a reference to those which decked Messiah himself (Isai. xi. 5, lix. 17). And the final blessedness of Christ's followers is described as attained by such as have been conquerors in a hard-fought battle (Rev. iii. 21).

WARS OF THE LORD, THE BOOK OF THE. Some book or writing so entitled is alluded to in Numb. xxi. 14, 15. Modern critics, for want of better arguments against the antiquity of the Pentateuch, have rashly pronounced it inconceivable that such a book could exist in the time of Moses, when the wars of God's people, some early victories over the Amalekites excepted, had begun only a few months before. Never was an argument hazarded of less solidity. A campaign may last a very short time; and yet its events be numerous and important. Moses was commanded to chronicle the war with Amalek (Exod. xvii. 8-16). Then there was the disastrous incursion which Israel adventured on the south of Canaan soon after the return of the spies (Numb. xiv. 40-45), the war with Arad (xxi. 1-3), then those with Sihon and Og (21-25, 33-35) and with the Midianites (xxxii.), besides, very possibly, military expeditions which might have occurred during the thirty-seven or thirty-eight years of which we have scarcely a record. Moreover, the deliverance of Israel from Egypt is always said to have been a conquest; it was emphatically a war of the Lord, when the Lord fought for Israel (Exod. xiv. 14). Again, there were wars in which some at least of the Israelites engaged while in Goshen; as the raid on the territory of Gath by the Ephraimites (1 Chron. vii. 20-22). There was also Abraham's victory over the eastern kings (Gen. xiv. 14-16). What the book of the wars of the Lord actually contained we know not; but we may see there were events enough which it might contain, and which might fill a volume, occurring before the death of Moses. What reliance then can be placed on the judgment of critics who would make the mention of such a book an objection against the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch?

WARD. This word, besides its ordinary sense of a prison or imprisonment (Gen. xl. 3, 4), signifies sometimes the place of a watch, or station (Isai. xxi. 8); and sometimes the guards themselves (Neh. xiii. 30).

WASH, WASHING. See BATHE, FEET. The washing of hands before eating was specially necessary in countries where the food was handled. But it appears to have become a ceremonial observance which our Lord felt it right to discountenance, provoking thereby the censure of the Pharisees (Mark vii. 1-13). There are different expositions of the phrase used in this passage, in our version 'wash off,' for which the margin supplies several suggestions. Perhaps the most literal rendering is to be preferred—'with the fist;' the hand first washed being closed before it was applied to cleaning the other. The ancient customs still exist in the east. The feet must be washed before Mohammedan prayer; and for washing the hands after eating a pitcher and ewer are brought, and an attendant pours the water over the hands of a guest (see 2 Kings iii. 11; and comp. John xiii. 4-15).

WATCH. Wherever there has been any sense of insecurity, it has naturally been the practice to keep a watch. Of course this is most necessary in warfare; and hence we find continually reference in scripture to the watchman whose business it was to give warning of the approach of an enemy, or to detect his motions (2 Sam. xviii. 24-27; 2 Kings ix. 17-20; Isai. xxi. 5-9). So ministers and teachers are likened to watchmen. They are to give notice of the dangers to be apprehended from spiritual foes, and are responsible if evil occurs through their neglect (Jer. vi. 17; Ezek. xxxiii. 2-9; Heb. xiii. 17). Watchmen were placed on towers for the purpose of obtaining an extended view; and such towers were frequently built in parts of the country away from the larger cities (2 Kings xvii. 9, xviii. 8). Perhaps chains of such posts were established. Warning of danger was given by the blowing of a trumpet, or a loud cry.

Besides watchmen against foreign enemies, the security of towns must be similarly provided for. In civilized communities the good order of society is preserved by those who watch against the nightly thief, or the seditious demagogue. So we find in scripture story that cities were watched (Psal. cxxvii. 1; Sol. Song iii. 3, v. 7). And hence very pertinent injunctions are given to God's servants to watch. They are not to be careless, like the slumberers whom destruction may surprise. They are to be always ready for their Master's approach; for he may come as a thief in the night (Matt. xxiv. 42-44, xxv. 13; Eph. vi. 18; 1 Pet. v. 8; Rev. iii. 3).

Of course there would have to be an organized system of watching; and those so employed must relieve each other. This would be at specified times. And therefore periods of the night were called 'watches' (Psal. xc. 4). These were originally three, 'the beginning of the watches' (Lam. ii. 19), from sunset to probably ten o'clock; 'the middle watch' (Judges vii. 19), from ten till two o'clock; 'the morning watch' (Exod. xiv. 24; 1 Sam. xi. 11), from two to sunrise. In after times there were four watches, according to the Greek and Roman custom, the 'even' from six to nine o'clock; 'midnight' from nine to twelve; 'cock-crowing' from twelve to three; 'morning' from three to six (Matt. xiv. 25; Mark xiii. 35; Luke xii. 38).

WATER. The vast importance of water in a warm climate can scarcely be exaggerated. The Israelites had ample experience of this in their wanderings through the desert; where their murmurings were checked and their thirst relieved by God's miraculous interference (Exod. xv. 22-26, xvii. 1-7; Numb. xx. 2-13). Hence in commendation of the promised land its plentiful supply of water is repeatedly noted (Deut. viii. 7, xi. 11); and the happiness of the righteous is described: 'bread shall be given him: his waters shall be sure' (Isai. xxxiii. 16). On the other hand, the miseries arising from failure of water and consequent famine and disease are often vividly depicted (1 Kings xvii. 7, xviii. 5; Lam. iv. 4; comp. Luke xvi. 24).

Water was supplied by fountains, brooks, or streams of running (in the original 'living,' as opposed to that which is stagnant) water, many of which became dry in hot seasons, cisterns or tanks, and wells. See CISTERN, FOUNTAIN, WELL.

It was natural that water should have a symbolical use. On certain solemn occasions the Israelites drew water and poured it out before the Lord (1 Sam. vii. 6). There was a custom of this kind at the feast of tabernacles, when for seven days a priest brought water in a golden vessel from the pool of Siloam, and poured it together with wine on the altar. To this Christ may be supposed to allude in John vii. 37-39 (see Alford, note on the place), symbolizing by water the refreshing and purifying influences of the Holy Spirit. Both spiritual graces and gospel blessings generally are frequently described by this term (Isai. lv. 1; Ezek. xxxvi. 25; Rev. xxii. 17). And the final happiness of God's people is said to be that they shall thirst no more (Matt. v. 6; Rev. vii. 16, 17, xxi. 6). For a notice of the water of jealousy see JEALOUSY.

WAVE-OFFERING (Exod. xxix. 24, 26, 27; Lev. vii. 29-34, viii. 27, ix. 21, x. 14, 15; Numb. vi. 20, viii. 11, marg., xviii. 11, 18, 26-29). The right shoulder of the victim in a peace-offering was to be 'heaved,' and the breast to be 'waved,' in token of a special presentation of the parts to God. They thus became the property of the priests. See OFFERINGS. In Lev. xxiii. 10-20 there is a provision that the first-fruits of the harvest, a sheaf at the passover, loaves at pentecost, should be waved before the Lord. The meaning was the same; and probably peace-offerings were in both cases a part of the ceremony.

WAX. The soft yielding substance formed by melting the combs of bees in which their honey is deposited. It is often mentioned by way of illustration (Psal. xxii. 14, lxxiii. 2, xcvi. 5; Mic. i. 4).

WAY. See HIGH-WAY.

WEAN. It was customary for Hebrew mothers to nurse their children (Exod. ii. 7-9; 1 Sam. i. 23; Sol. Song viii. 1), though a nurse is mentioned in Gen. xxiv. 59, the mother being alive (53, 55). A child was weaned later than with us. Thus Samuel was not weaned till old enough to be carried to Eli; and it would seem probable that the suckling continued three years. A daily portion was not allotted to Levite children till that age (2 Chron. xxxi. 16): the reasonable inference is that they were not weaned till then. See also 2 Macc. vii. 27. The weaning was celebrated by a feast (Gen. xxi. 8), which is said still to be customary in the east.

WEAPON. See ARMS.

WEASEL. One of the animals pronounced unclean (Lev. xi. 29). The Hebrew name is derived from a root signifying to 'glide:' hence the weasel may be so called from its swift gliding motion, or its gliding into holes. Possibly, however, the mole may be meant.

WEAVE, WEAVER, WEAVING. Weaving was one of those arts which evidently were practised at a very early age. Thus it attained a great degree of perfection among the ancient Egyptians. For Joseph was clothed in a vesture of fine linen (Gen. xli. 42); and indeed there are still existing the woven cloths in which the bodies of their dead were thousands of years ago enveloped. The skill of the Egyptians is elsewhere alluded to (Isai. xix. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 7). So that some writers have attributed the invention of weaving to this people. From them the Hebrews, if otherwise unacquainted with it, would have derived the art. And accordingly we find that even in the wilderness woven articles were used from the coarser texture of the goats' hair curtains (Exod. xxvi. 7), and the woollen garment (Lev. xiii. 47) with which no linen or flax was to be woven, to the more delicate 'twined linen' (Exod. xxvi. 1) made of twisted threads, and the brodered raiment of the priests (xxviii. 4, 39), all wrought probably in the loom. It is true indeed that some of these fabrics were obtained elsewhere, and not actually manufactured by the Israelites on their journey; still we can hardly doubt that weaving to a certain extent was practised, and at all events the knowledge of the art preserved among them in order to their settlement in Canaan. Incidental notices of it afterwards occur (1 Chron. iv. 21); and there is the description of weaving as women's work (2 Kings xxiii. 7; Prov. xxxi. 13, 24), it being generally done by men in Egypt. The employment of gold tissue in costly garments is also mentioned (Psal. xlv. 13: comp. Josh. vii. 21); and coats woven without seam were not uncommon (John xix. 23: comp. Josephus, Antiq., lib. iii. 7, § 4).

The Egyptian loom was upright; the weaver often standing to his work. It consisted mainly of a strong beam, over which the warp was passed. The woof was drawn through the alternate threads by means of a shuttle, and pressed down by an iron bar. Sometimes, however, the weaving was upwards (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, vol. ii.

Weaving. Egyptian loom.

p. 60, vol. iii. pp. 134, 135). The loom is not mentioned in scripture. But we find the 'shuttle' with an allusion to its rapid motion (Job vii. 6); and the pin of the web (Judges xvi. 14, in our version 'pin of the beam'), the warp or thread (13, 14, 'web'), the 'beam'

Ancient Roman loom.

(1 Sam. xvii. 7; 2 Sam. xxi. 19), and the 'thrum' (Isai. xxxviii. 12, marg.), that is the ends of threads, or those which tied the web to the beam. The 'warp' and 'woof,' too, occur in Lev. xiii. 48, 49, 51-53, 56-59; but it may be questioned whether these are the exact meanings of the original words there.

WEDDING. See MARRIAGE.

WEEDS (Job xxxi. 40, marg.). See COCKLE.

WEEK. The week of seven days appears very early as a measure of time (e.g. Gen. vii. 10, viii. 10, 12, xxix. 27). See SABBATH. For feast of weeks see PENTECOST. Respecting the origin of this seven-fold division critics are not agreed. The most natural belief would be that the process of creation, six periods of working and one of rest, was at once made known to man (ii. 2, 3). In widely-separated nations the week has been acknowledged. And, though there are some in which it cannot be traced, yet it is as probable that among these the observance had passed away as that it never descended from a common ancestor. In the last century an attempt was made in France to abolish the weekly reckoning of time. In a barbarous and illiterate age this attempt would probably have in a while succeeded.

WEIGHTS. The subject of the Hebrew weights is one of considerable difficulty. It would require a lengthened treatise to describe the modes of calculation adopted, and to state the reasons of the conclusions arrived at. It must be sufficient here to notice the different weights mentioned, to show their relative proportions, and to exhibit, so far as learned men have been able to determine, their equivalents in the weights of our own time and country.

The weights mentioned in scripture are a 'gerah,' implying a grain or berry, a 'shekel,' signifying weight, with its subdivisions of half-shekel, and quarter-shekel, a 'maneh,' meaning part, and a 'talent,' the Hebrew equivalent for which means a globe or mass. There is reason to believe that anciently weights were of stone (Deut. xxv. 13, 15, marg.; 2 Sam. xiv. 26, Heb.; Prov. xvi. 11, marg.); subsequently perhaps of lead (Zech. v. 7). There have been found in the Nineveh ruins bronze weights in the shapes of lions and ducks, with certain marks upon them indicating how much they were; in Egypt also there were lions' heads and bulls' heads; and similarly elsewhere: see KESITAH, p. 509. The shekel of the sanctuary (Exod. xxx. 13: comp. 2 Sam. xiv. 26) was probably the standard, preserved in the tabernacle or temple.

The following table will show the proportionate weights:—

Gerah.	Bekah	1 or half-shekel.	10	1 Shekel.	20	2	1 Maneh.	1200	120	60	1 Talent.	60,000	6000	3000	50	1

But this talent was of silver: the gold talent was double in weight: it was equal to 100 manehs, each of which contained 100 shekels.

Then as to correspondence with our own weights:—

Gerah	=	11 grains.
Bekah	=	110 "
Shekel	=	220 "
Maneh	=	13,200 "
Talent	=	660,000 "

But the 10,000 shekels of a gold talent weighed 132 grains each; and consequently the talent 1,320,000 grains.

It has been elsewhere explained (see MONEY) that trading was originally according to weight; so much gold or silver being weighed out by a purchaser: hence the monetary system grew out of that of weights; and the same words (as is indeed in some degree the case among other nations) denoted both money and weights. It is therefore specially desirable to understand the relative weights of the Hebrew coinage. Perhaps the proportion was not always accurately observed. Some tables taken from Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1733, 1734, will be serviceable to the reader; and for further information he may consult the whole article (pp. 1727-1735).

Copper Coins.

	Average weight.	Supposed weight.
Half	. . . 235'4	250 gr.
Quarter	. . . 132'0	125
(Sixth)	. . . 81'8	83'3

Silver Coins.

	Average weight.	Supposed weight.
Shekel	. . . 220 gr.	id.
Half-shekel	. . . 110	id.
(Third)	. . . 73'3

Some of these weights differ from those given above, p. 605; but, as before observed, an accurate adjustment is very difficult.

Eastern Talents.

Hebrew gold	. . .	1,320,000 gr.
Babylonian (silver)	. . .	959,040
Egyptian	. . .	840,000
Hebrew copper?	. . .	792,000?
Hebrew silver	. . .	660,000
Babylonian lesser (silver)	. . .	479,520
Persian gold	. . .	399,600

The word 'dram' appears to be sometimes used as indicating weight: it corresponds with the Persian daric, 129 grains troy.

WELL. An adequate supply of water in a hot country is of the first necessity. And, as streams exposed to the summer sun frequently dry, it is of importance to have deep wells. Hence we find contention in which the patriarchs were frequently engaged, in order to establish their right to wells which they had digged; and, as it was necessary for an agriculturist to fix his abode near water, the means sometimes adopted of driving him from his settlement was to stop up the wells (Gen. xxi. 25-31, xxvi. 14-33). These wells were not mere tanks, the receptacles of stagnant water: they were fed by springs, and were carefully kept as the common property of the neighbouring inhabitants, who at particular times came to water their cattle there, the mouth of the well being often closed with a stone to prevent sand and extraneous matter from choking it (xxix. 2, 3, 7-10), there being also a low wall round the mouth to prevent accident (Exod. xxi. 33). 'Who,' says Dr. Thomson, 'that has travelled much in this country has not often arrived at a well in the heat of the day which was surrounded with numerous flocks of sheep waiting to be watered? I once saw such a scene in the burning plains of northern Syria. Half-naked fierce-looking men were drawing up water in leather buckets: flock after flock was brought up, watered, and sent away; and, after all the men had ended their work, then several women and girls brought up their flocks and drew water for them. Thus it was with Jethro's daughters when Moses stood up and aided them; and thus no doubt it would have been with Rachel, if Jacob had not rolled away the stone and watered her sheep. I have frequently seen wells closed up with large stones, though in this part of the country it is not commonly done, because water is not so scarce and precious. It is otherwise, however, in the dreary deserts' (The Land and the Book, p. 589). The same writer speaks of public wells in the Philistine country, where the water is raised by wheel-and-bucket-work called sákkeh, at the common cost, and for common use. One he noticed which was worked night and day by four mules allotted to it (p. 544). An ordinary rope and bucket, or pitcher, sometimes a water-skin, are also used, and the shadowf: see above, pp. 241, 242.

Wells were the usual places of halting for travellers (Gen. xxiv. 11), and for the encamping of armies (Judges vii. 1). And some of the very touching incidents of scripture have occurred at wells (John iv. 6).

WEN. Spoken of animals (Lev. xxii. 22). It probably means having running sores, or ulcers.

WEST. The Hebrew word for west properly signifies sea, i.e. the Mediterranean—a proof that the Hebrew language was developed in Palestine. Sometimes, indeed, the phrase 'where the sun goeth down' is used (Deut. xi. 30; Josh. i. 4). And there is another word signifying 'darkening' or 'sunset,' met with in alike sense (Isai. xlv. 6). A Hebrew regarded himself as looking towards the east; and therefore 'behind,' or 'backward,' implies westward (Judges xviii. 12; Job xxiii. 8; Isai. ix. 12). Hence also the western or Mediterranean sea is called the 'utmost,' 'uttermost,' or 'hinder' sea (Deut. xi. 24; Joel ii. 20; Zech. xiv. 8).

WHALE. The Cetacea is an order of aquatic mammals with fin-like anterior extremities, and a large horizontal caudal fin or tail. They have no external ear, or hair on the external integument; and the cervical bones are so compressed as to leave the animals without any outward appearance of a neck. To this order including different families and species belong the largest animated forms in existence. The Hebrew word tannîn, sometimes translated 'whales' (Gen. i. 21; Job vii. 12), would seem to comprise great marine creatures, mammifers, and non-mammifers. The 'great fish' which swallowed Jonah (Jonah i. 17) is called by our Lord kētos, a 'whale': probably the Greek term as well as the Hebrew is of a comprehensive character. But whales have been sometimes seen in the Mediterranean. The public prints gave an account of the Mæris steamer striking upon a whale in the straits of Messina, Oct. 12, 1864. This animal was 21 feet 4 inches long, with a maximum girth of 13 feet 9 inches. The white shark, Carcharias vulgaris, also frequents this sea. It is sometimes 30 feet in length. See DRAGON, JONAH, THE BOOK OF.

WHEAT. One of the best-known and most valuable species of corn. The various sorts of wheat, Triticum, have been cultivated from a very early period; and it is impossible to say where the most common sorts are indigenous. There are very many species of this genus of plants, and of many species several varieties. The vegetable principles contained in the flour of wheat are starch (carbonaceous) and gluten (in which is nitrogen). This flour, therefore, possesses both fattening and strengthening qualities, and is consequently admirably fitted for a staple article of diet. The various species of wheat are most abundantly produced in temperate climates.

Wheat is mentioned in scripture as grown in Egypt, Palestine, and other countries, and the Triticum vulgare, common wheat, also one or two other kinds, are cultivated now. There is an Egyptian species, Triticum compositum, many-spiked wheat, which appears to be that which Pharaoh saw in his dream (Gen. xli. 5); several ears being produced upon one stalk. Such expressions as 'the fat of kidneys of wheat' (Deut. xxxii. 14), 'finest of the wheat' (Psal. lxxxii. 16, cxlvii. 14, where 'fat,' marg.) mean the best and most nutritious. Palestine was very fertile, and was a wheat-exporting country. Thus Solomon supplied Hiram king of Tyre with it in return for the timber furnished to the Hebrew monarch (1 Kings v. 11: comp. Ezek. xxvii. 17; Acts xii. 20).

Egyptian Wheat.

Parched corn, grains of wheat roasted in a pan or on an iron plate, or green ears held in a blaze till the chaff is burnt off, was and is still a favourite article of food in Palestine (Ruth ii. 14; 1 Sam. xvii. 17; 2 Sam. xvii. 28); and persons are often seen now plucking the ears in the wheat-fields, rubbing them in their hands, and eating the grains unroasted, just as the disciples did (Matt. xii. 1; Mark ii. 23; Luke vi. 1). This was permitted by the Mosaic law (Deut. xxiii. 25). But neither parched corn nor green ears were to be eaten till the first-fruits had been presented before the Lord (Lev. xxiii. 14).

WHEEL. The Hebrew word galgal, rendered 'wheel' in Psal. lxxxiii. 13, and in Isai. xvii. 13 'a rolling thing,' is very reasonably supposed by Dr. Thomson to designate the wild artichoke. This plant, called by the natives 'akkab,' throws out numerous branches of equal size and length in all directions, thus forming a kind of globe about a foot in diameter. In autumn these break off, and being very light and dry trundle about before the wind. 'Thousands of them come scudding over the plain, rolling, leaping, bounding with vast racket, to the dismay both of the horse and his rider. . . . My eyes were half blinded with the stubble and chaff which filled the air; but it was the extraordinary behaviour of this "rolling thing" that invited my attention. Hundreds of these globes, all bounding like gazelles in one direction over the desert, would suddenly wheel short round, at the bidding of a counterblast, and dash away with equal speed on their new course.' Some proverbial expressions now in use are taken from the 'akkub (The Land and the Book, pp. 563, 564).

WHIP (1 Kings xii. 11). See PUNISHMENTS, SCOURGE.

WHIRLWIND. See WIND.

WHITE. The union of the various rays of light into one. White is used in scripture as the symbol of purity. Thus the Levites were arrayed in white (2 Chron. v. 12); also angels, and the redeemed. And so of the cleansing from sin and moral pollution (Isai. i. 18; Rev. iii. 18, vii. 14). Our Lord is described in his transfiguration as wearing raiment 'white as the light' (Matt. xvii. 21; Mark ix. 3; Luke ix. 29). There is a difference between dead white and the resplendent hue of heaven. It is this last that is attributed to Christ. See COLOURS.

WHITE STONE. See STONE, p. 853.

WIDOW. See MARRIAGE. A tender regard for widows was inculcated by the Mosaic law (Exod. xxii. 22; Deut. xiv. 29, xvi. 11, 14, xxiv. 17, 19-21, xxvi. 12, xxvii. 19; see also Job xxii. 9, xxiv. 3, 21; Psal. xciv. 6; Isai. i. 17, x. 2; Jer. vii. 6, xxii. 3; Ezek. xxii. 7; Zech. vii. 10; Mal. iii. 5). In the New Testament the same kindness was prescribed (Acts vi. 1-6; 1 Tim. v. 3-16). It is questioned whether, in the directions just referred to, a kind of religious order was intended. Probably not at first. The creditable Christian widows were just to be recipients of Christian charity; but afterwards some special duties were, it is likely, assigned to them.

WIFE. God created mankind male and female, sanctioning in paradise the ordinance of marriage, in which a man was to cleave to his wife, and they twain be one flesh (Gen. ii. 24; Matt. xix. 4-6). This would imply that each man should have a single wife. But polygamy commenced early in the world's history (Gen. iv. 19), and was subsequently carried to the most frightful excess (1 Kings xi. 3). The Mosaic law did not prohibit polygamy, but by various statutes it endeavoured to control it, and remedy some of the evils which naturally flowed from such a practice. See MARRIAGE.

A wife, among both the Hebrews and the neighbouring nations, was for the most part purchased; the treaty being made not with the woman herself but with her parents or brethren: occasionally we read of a man providing a wife for his son (Gen. xxiv. 1-9, 34-51, 53, xxix. 16-20, 26-28, xxxiv. 4, 6-12, xxxviii. 6; 1 Sam. xviii. 20-25; 2 Sam. xiii. 13). A man might have more than one wife; but no woman might have more than one husband. And, if a man had a plurality of wives, and loved one better than another, he was not to show his preference by assigning the birth-right to the son of her he loved, if he was really not the first-born (Deut. xxi. 15-17). The duties of a wife are illustrated in Prov. xxxi. 10-31; 1 Tim. v. 14; and her legal rights specified in Exod. xxi. 10. The duty also of a man to a wife that he chose to marry from captives or slaves was carefully defined (7-11; Deut. xxi. 10-14). Besides wives, a man might have concubines, who were in a secondary position (see COUCUBINE); but their children were not regarded as illegitimate. Sometimes indeed the wife, especially if barren, supplied her husband with a concubine, her own servant, and considered the children hence born as hers (Gen. xvi. 2, xxx. 1-13). A husband had the power of divorcing his wife, except in specified cases (Deut. xxii. 13-21); but we do not find that the wife had the reciprocal right of separating herself from her husband (Deut. xxiv. 1-4). See DIVORCE. From all these usages it appears that a wife was not really on a level with her husband. It is true he was to cherish and comfort her (5); but yet the power a man had over his wife, and the dissensions which were sure to arise where polygamy was practised, of which the households of Jacob and of Elkanah furnish sufficient proof (Gen. xxx. 1, 15; 1 Sam. i. 5-8), must have placed the woman at great disadvantage, and have destroyed domestic comfort. Yet by degrees a better state of things prevailed. Polygamy was less practised. Our Lord restricted divorce to the single case of adultery (Matt. xix. 3-9): the apostles prescribed the reciprocal duties of husbands and wives, and showed how the marriage-tie symbolized the union of Christ with his church (1 Cor. vii. 2-5; Eph. v. 22-33; Col. iii. 18, 19; 1 Pet. iii. 1-7). Officers of the church, too, were to be those who had but a single wife (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12; Tit. i. 6). Hebrew women lived under social restraint less than those of other eastern nations. Still they were to be notable house-wives, diligently attending to home affairs (Prov. vii. 11, xiv. 1, xxxi. 10-31). And the New Testament confirms this (1 Tim. v. 13, 14; Tit. ii. 3-5), and specially prescribes grave and modest behaviour to the wives of ministers of the church (1 Tim. iii. 11).

WILDERNESS. See DESERT, WANDERING.

WILL. The condition of mind freely choosing or refusing things is the will in exercise. That which moves or influences the will is the mind's view of the benefits to be obtained or the evils to be shunned.

By the will of God in scripture we may understand his absolute purpose (Rom. ix. 19), his free determination (Eph. i. 11), or his holy commandments (Matt. vii. 21).

Man's will may be influenced by motives, but it cannot be forcibly changed. The fault of our fallen state is that pointed out by our Lord, 'Ye will not (ye are not willing to) come to me that ye might have life' (John v. 40). And the condemning reason is given, 'Light is come into the world; and men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil' (iii. 19). The remedy for this is that divine operation which enables us rightly to appreciate things, and therefore to desire that which is really desirable. 'The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and good works, to faith and calling upon God: wherefore we have no power to do good works pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us, when we have that good will' (Art. x.).

'Will' in the sense of a testamentary disposition of property does not occur in scripture. But such wills were made (see 2 Sam. xvii. 23; 2 Kings xx. 1; Isai. xxxviii. 1).

WILLOW. There are two Hebrew words rendered 'willow' in our version. One occurs (Lev. xxiii. 40; Job xl. 22; Psal. cxxxvii. 2; Isai. xli. 4) only in the plural. It is perhaps the Salix Babylonica, weeping willow, with pendulous boughs; or, still more likely, the oleander. The 'brook of the willows' (Isai. xv. 7) is supposed to be that elsewhere called the brook Zered, the boundary between Moab and Idumea, now the Wady el-Ahsi, (comp. Pusey, Minor Prophets, p. 209). Another word is used in Ezek. xvii. 5. Probably it denotes the Salix Aegyptiaca. The stems and twigs of this are long, thin, and of a pale yellow colour. On the twigs are shoots a span in length, which put forth in spring woolly flowers of a pale colour and fragrant smell. A kind of sweet water is distilled from these. After the captivity the willow was regarded as an emblem of sorrow.

WIMPLE (Isai. iii. 22). The same word is also rendered 'veil' (Ruth iii. 15). It is a woman's wide upper garment or shawl. See DRESS.

WIND. Air in motion. The scriptures frequently speak of the four winds blowing from the four quarters of heaven (Jer. xlix. 36; Ezek. xxxvii. 9; Dan. viii. 8; Zech. ii. 6). The Hebrews would therefore seem to have recognized the winds which blew from the four cardinal points, east, west, north, and south, and to have included under these names respectively those which we designate more precisely, north-east, south-west, &c. &c.

The north wind naturally was the coldest, yet not so cold as to be injurious, for we find it equally with the south invoked to blow upon the garden of the Spouse in order to promote luxuriant vegetation (Sol. Song iv. 16). The south traversed the Arabian peninsula, and was a hot wind (Job xxxvii. 17; Luke xii. 55). The destructive samoon in the desert, which, however, does not seem generally to have reached Palestine, was a south wind; and the khamsin of Egypt now blows from the south. The east wind was dry and parching (Ezek. xvii. 10, xix. 12); and as it blows strongly the word seems occasionally put for any strong wind (Job xxvii. 21; Isai. xxvii. 8), and also for any parching wind (Gen. xli. 6, 23, 27); for a blasting wind like that described in this place would in Egypt most probably be the khamsin just mentioned from the south and south-east. The western quarter was rainy (Luke xii. 54). At present westerly winds prevail in the Holy Land from November to February, easterly from February to June, north from June to the autumnal equinox, and north-west from the equinox to November.

Particular winds are sometimes spoken of, as whirlwinds, furious sweeping gales, which generally came from the east (Psal. lviii. 9; Prov. i. 27), violent squalls which drove down upon the lake of Gennesaret (Mark iv. 37), and which are not unfrequent in other lakes similarly surrounded by hills also the tempestuous wind which caught St. Paul's ship: see ETROCLYDON.

Winds occur in figurative language. Thus the rush of invaders is signified by the driving whirlwinds (Isai. xxi. 1): the striving of the four winds implies wild commotion among the nations of the world (Dan. vii. 2). The east wind, from its wasting character, denoted nothingness (Job xv. 2). The winds are described also as subject to the divine power (Psal. xviii. 10, cxxxv. 7); and by the blowing of the wind is illustrated the Spirit's operation, as its rushing sound indicated his descent on the apostles (John iii. 8; Acts ii. 2-4).

WINDOW. See HOUSE.

WINE. The use of wine as a product of the grape is of great antiquity. Thus we find it recorded that Noah planted a vineyard and drank of the wine he procured from it to intoxication (Gen. ix. 20, 21).

There are several different words used in the original languages of scripture which are rendered 'wine' by our translators. The account of them which follows is condensed from an article in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1775. Yayin is the most general term, clearly the same with the Greek oinos, the Latin vinum, and our own wine. Tirosh is also of frequent occurrence. Derived from a root which signifies to 'get possession of,' it is perhaps applied to wine as indicating its inebriating qualities, whereby it gets possession of the brain. Astis, found in Sol. Song viii. 2; Isai. xlix. 26; Joel i. 5, iii. 18; Amos ix. 13, is derived from a word denoting to 'tread'; it refers, therefore, to the method of expressing the liquor from the fruit. It may properly mean new wine, as recently trodden out, but not necessarily unfermented wine. Sobe occurs but thrice, viz. in Isai. i. 22; Hos. iv. 18; Nah. i. 10: its root signifies to 'soak' or drink to excess. The cognate verb and participle are constantly used in the latter sense (Deut. cxi. 20; Prov. xxiii. 20, 21; Isai. lvi. 12; Nah. i.

10). Hhamer (Deut. xxxii. 14), in Chaldee hhamar and hhamrâ, conveys the notion of 'foaming' or ebullition; which may apply equally to the process of fermentation or to the frothing of a liquid, fermented or unfermented, on being poured out. Mesech (Psal. lxxv. 8), mezeg (Sol. Song vii. 2), and mîmsâch (Prov. xxiii. 30; Isai. lxx. 11) are all connected with the idea of 'mixing,' and imply a mixture with some other substances, as water or spices. Shêcâr, 'strong drink,' is a generic term applied to all fermented liquors, such as those obtained from barley, apples, honey, dates, all of which according to Jewish authorities were known in Palestine. It is sometimes distinguished from wine (e.g. Deut. xiv. 26), but certainly sometimes, as in Numb. xxviii. 7, includes it; occasionally it is a mixture (Isai. v. 22). Hhometz was a weak sour wine or vinegar: âshshâh (2 Sam. vi. 19; 1 Chron. xvi. 3; Sol. Song ii. 5; Hos. iii. 1, where our version gives 'flavons of wine') was a solid cake of pressed raisins; and shêmârim, properly implying the 'lees' or 'dregs of wine', is sometimes, as in Isai. xxv. 6, used of wine kept on the lees in order to increase its body. In the New Testament the following terms occur; oinos, the general designation of wine; gleukos (Acts ii. 13), sweet wine; sikera, from the Hebrew shêcâr; occos, vinegar, and in Rev. xiv. 10, a strange expression, kekerasmênos akrotos, literally 'mixed un-mixed,' in our version 'poured out without mixture.'

It has been questioned whether some of these words do not apply rather to the fruit than to the wine which might be produced from it. And undoubtedly yayin and tîrôsh are found connected with expressions (e.g. Isai. xxiv. 7; Jer. xl. 10, 12) which more properly belong to fruit. But it has been well replied that it is not fruit simply as fruit that is intended in such places, but rather as the raw material from which wine comes. Thus in Mic. vi. 15 the drinking of wine is referred to as the result of treading, and in Judges ix. 13; Psal. civ. 15 the exhilarating effects of the product are distinctly noticed. Besides, whatever kinds of liquor may be understood by yayin and tîrôsh, it is clear that they were liquors, because they are generally said to be drunk (e.g. Gen. ix. 21; Isai. lxii. 8, 9). And, though tîrôsh is often connected with corn, no argument can be thence derived that both were solids more than for changing the usual signification of our own 'drink,' because it is often coupled with 'meat'—'meat and drink' (see FRUIT, p. 304). The evidence is conclusive when we consider the effects of indulgence in yayin and tîrôsh. 'To the former' says the writer of the article already referred to, 'are attributed the darkly-flashing eye (Gen. xlix. 12), the unbridled tongue (Prov. xx. 1; Isai. xxviii. 7), the excitement of the spirit (Prov. xxxi. 6; Isai. v. 11; Zech. ix. 15, x. 7), the enchained affections of its votaries (Hos. iv. 11), the perverted judgment (Prov. xxxi. 5; Isai. xxviii. 7), the indecent exposure (Hab. ii. 15, 16), and the sickness resulting from the heat of wine (Hos. vii. 5). The allusions to the effects of tîrôsh are confined to a single passage; but this a most decisive one, viz. Hos. iv. 11, "Whoredom, and wine (yayin), and new wine (tîrôsh) take away the heart," where tîrôsh appears as the climax of engulfing influences in immediate connection with yayin' (p. 1776).

It is hence of little consequence to determine whether the ordinary wine of the Hebrews was fermented or unfermented. Still it is the fair inference that the fermenting process did take place. Our Lord's comparison (Matt. ix. 17) is well-nigh conclusive; and, if exception be taken to that, none can be made to Job xxxii. 19, where new wine is described as likely to burst new bottles. Besides, the eye of the wine (Prov. xxiii. 31, where in our version 'colour') must be the air-bubble which is one of the tokens that fermentation has taken place.

Special notice has been taken of the two words which occur most frequently in Hebrew for wine: a similar proof might be offered in regard to the other words: for example, the power of intoxicating is ascribed to âsîs (Isai. xlix. 26; Joel i. 5). And indeed we may reasonably infer that, if some kinds of wine produced intoxication, while others did not, then a distinction would be made in the scripture warnings. Whereas, instead of allowing one kind as innocuous, and censuring another as dangerous, the prohibition is in all cases the same—against excess. And even the gleukos, which, according to its name, must have been sweet rather than new wine, seeing that it was at pentecost that the reference was made to it (Acts ii. 13, 15), when the jeering populace ascribed the utterance of the inspired apostles to drunkenness, must have had intoxicating power. Sweetness or a luscious flavour would seem to have been agreeable. The inspissated juice of the grape obtained by boiling must down to one-half or one-third of its original bulk was anciently (as at the present day) much in use. By the Hebrews it was termed âlbash (Gen. xliii. 11, where in our version 'honey'); and it is now known as dibs. A sweet beverage was also obtained by macerating grapes, probably referred to as 'liquor of grapes' (Numb. vi. 3).

Of the mixing of wine a word must be said. Some of the Hebrew terms given above imply this. But it was not always to lower its strength, by adding water; more generally to increase it. Thus we find mixed wine provided for festivals, and occasions of revelry (Prov. ix. 2, 5, xxiii. 30; Isai. v. 22); and, when wine is symbolically used for the severity of God's judgments, the cup in the divine hand is described as 'full of mixture.' Doubtless also the flavour was to be increased: we may well suppose, therefore, that, as among the Greeks and Romans, so by the Hebrews, spices and aromatics were mingled with the wine. The mixture of wine and myrrh offered to our Lord (Mark xv. 23) was intended to stupefy and deaden the sense of pain; but he who for our sake drank the cup of sorrow to the very dregs refused the alleviation.

Enough has been said to show that wine was in general use in Palestine (Gen. xxvii. 28); some kinds being more prized than others, as the wine of Helbon (Ezek. xxvii. 18), still notable, and the aromatic wine of Lebanon (Hos. xiv. 7). Our Lord provided it miraculously when the ordinary supply failed at a marriage-feast (John ii. 1-11); and those only of whom we read as refusing wine were the Rechabites, on whom their father laid the charge, in order the better to secure their persistence in a nomad life (Jer. xxxv.); for, had they built houses, or sowed fields, or cultivated vineyards, their whole manner of living would have been changed. The Nazarites indeed were to abstain from wine during the period for which their vow extended (Numb. vi. 1-4, 20); and those who were so dedicated from their birth were to abstain perpetually (Judges xiii. 4, 5; Luke i. 15, vii. 33). The priests, too, when performing their sacred functions, were to take neither wine nor church see Bingham, Orig. Eccles., book xv. chap. ii. sect. 7.

There are many admonitions in scripture against excess in the use of wine: particularly those who held office in the church were to be sober and temperate (Luke xxi. 34; Rom. xiii. 13; Eph. v. 18; 1 Tim. iii. 3, 8; Tit. i. 7).

WINE-PRESS. There were two parts in the wine-press; a trough in which the grapes were bruised, and a vat or receptacle into which the liquor was received. The Hebrew terms for these are respectively gath, which implied 'striking,' and yekeb, implying 'excavation.' The two are clearly distinguished in Joel iii. 13: 'the press is full: the vats overflow.' The latter word, indicating the most essential part, was occasionally put for the whole wine-press, as in Job xxiv. 11; Isai. v. 2; the last-named place showing that this receptacle was sometimes hollowed out of a rock. There is another word, parah, strong drink; it being possibly under the influence of liquor that Nadab and Abihu had committed their fearful sin (Lev. x. 1, 8-11). These were all exceptional cases.

A. Wine-press. From ancient Egyptian painting, Thebes.

Besides the social use of wine, it was an accompaniment of sacred rites. A drink-offering must be presented with the daily sacrifice (Exod. xxix. 40, 41), also when the first-fruits were brought (Lev. xxiii. 13), and with burnt-offerings and sacrifices, vowed or free-will, generally (Numb. xv. 5, 7, 10): see OFFERINGS. The priests received tithe of wine, and had also the first-fruits of it (Exod. xxii. 29; Deut. xii. 17, 18, xviii. 4; Neh. x. 37, 39; Prov. iii. 9, 10). For a notice of wine used at the celebration of the pass-over see PASSOVER, p. 662. It was with this wine, together with the leavened bread, that our Lord instituted the sacrament of the holy supper. There is an elaborate proof that this was fermented wine in the American Bibl. Repository, Oct. 1836, pp. 285-308. For the mixing of water with the wine of the eucharist as practised in the early it implies 'breaking in pieces': it is not quite clear with what exact meaning it was used. From Hagg. ii. 16, where it seems to designate measure, Saalschütz (Arch. der Hebr., cap. x. vol. i. p. 114) is inclined to believe it smaller than the gath and yekeb. In the New Testament there are also two terms, lenos, the trough (Rev. xiv. 19, 20, xix. 15), and hupolênion, the lower vat (Mark xii. 1). Our translators have rendered the words, without much precision, 'press' (Isai. xvi. 10; Joel iii. 13), 'wine-press' (Deut. xv. 14, Lam. i. 15), 'wine-fat' (Isai. lxiii. 2; Hos. ix. 2, marg.), 'press-fat' (Hagg. ii. 16), and 'fat' (Joel ii. 24).

The mode of pressing grapes is figured in the Egyptian monuments. There is a beam with short ropes attached, for the treaders to hold by. See A. They were also placed in a bag, apparently of flags or rushes, suspended in a frame. This bag was compressed by turning a handspike, and the juice forced out. See B. Dr. Robinson saw an ancient wine-press near Gilgal. He describes it as complete with the upper shallow vat, eight feet square, for treading the grapes, and the lower deeper one, four feet square, to receive the liquid, and says it might be used now, were there here grapes to tread (Bibl. Res., vol. iii. p. 137). This method is still pursued. There is a kind of cistern or tank with holes near the bottom. Into this the fruit is heaped; and several men, with bare feet and legs, dance upon it, with shout and song. The expressed juice runs through the holes into a vat placed below.

The legs and feet of the grape-treaders are of course stained, as with blood: hence the symbolical use of the term 'wine-press' (Isai. lxiii. 2, 3; Rev. xiv. 19, 20, xix. 15).

It would seem that monarchs and great men had their winter-houses (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Amos iii. 15). These in their aspect and construction promoted warmth; and provision was made for fires, as in the brazier which was brought in before Jehoiakim.

WISDOM. In reference to the Deity wisdom may be said to be one of those perfections which go to form his character. In his infinite wisdom he decides on that which is most fitting, in the best way, at the most suitable time. The scripture frequently extols the divine wisdom, and, drawing the contrast between that and the wisdom of the world—the reliance of men upon their own imperfect and perverted

B. Wine-press. From ancient Egyptian painting, Thebes.

WINNOW (Ruth iii. 5; Isai. xxx. 24). The same word is used figuratively in Psal. cxxxix. 3, marg. The winnowing succeeded the threshing of corn. See THRESH. This was a process especially needful in consequence of the slovenly way in which the threshing was performed. The general mode of it has been briefly explained before: see AGRICULTURE, p. 16. It may be added that evening appears to have been the best time for winnowing, as a breeze then usually sprung up. A fork was occasionally employed, as in Palestine at present, to toss the heaps of intermingled corn and chaff. An apt illustration is taken from the agricultural use of the fan to describe the Lord's separation of his people from the ungodly (Matt. iii. 12).

WINTER. One of the seasons which we find indicated in scripture (Gen. viii. 22). It was considered as extending from the beginning of December to the beginning of February. See SEASON. Dr. Kitto (Pict. Bible, note on Gen. viii. 22) says, 'The climate necessarily varies with the situation of the country; but in general it becomes very cold as the season advances, particularly in the mountains, which are covered with snow, and where the cold, accompanied by the biting north wind, can scarcely be borne even by natives of our northern climate. Vehement rains, hail-storms, and falls of snow distinguish this season. In the low plains the season is comparatively mild; and at the worst days occur in which it is warm in the open air when the sun shines and the wind does not blow.'

judgment—shows us that, if we would be truly wise, we must learn of him who gives wisdom without upbraiding to those who ask it at his hand (Job xxviii. 12-28; Prov. iii. 13-18; Rom. i. 22, xvi. 27; 1 Cor. i. 17-21, 24, 25, 27, ii. 6-8, 13; James i. 5).

It is not necessary to multiply observations of this kind: let it rather be remarked that so high is the estimation of true wisdom that we find it personified in scripture, and described as uttering a voice to incite men to listen to the message which God has conveyed to the world (Prov. i. 20, viii. 1, ix. 1-5). Indeed we may regard this as more than a mere personification, and may with reason believe that we have here the word of that divine Person who is elsewhere emphatically called 'the wisdom of God' (1 Cor. i. 24).

The question has been keenly debated among biblical critics; and it is freely conceded that there is a high propriety in personifying one of Jehovah's attributes, especially in a book of poetical structure. Thus the righteousness of faith is represented as speaking (Rom. x. 6); and the scripture is said to foresee (Gal. iii. 8); and our Lord himself not only, when quoting the Old Testament, introduces the citation, 'Therefore also said the wisdom of God' (Luke xi. 49), but speaks of wisdom having children and being justified of them (Matt. xi. 19), where certainly nothing higher than a personified principle can be intended. This is admitted. But, when we read not merely of wisdom's expostulations, and reproofs, and her originating thoughts and purposes, 'witty inventions' (Prov. viii. 12), but also of her promise to pour forth her Spirit (i. 23), the case is very different.

Let us then briefly examine Solomon's description of wisdom (20-33, viii. 1-ix. 12). These two passages may properly be taken together; for, though some expositors have doubted, they are both from the same pen. According to the able disquisition of Prof. Burrows (Biblioth. Sacr., Apr. 1858, pp. 353-381) 'the divine wisdom . . . is not the Son of David according to the flesh, but David's Lord according to the Spirit of holiness; not the Messiah in his simple personal presence, as the Word made flesh, but the eternal Word himself, whose being and activity are not limited by time, who, both before and since his incarnation, is always present with his church, as the centre and source of her spiritual light and life.' It is indeed objected that the expressions (Prov. viii. 22, 24) are incompatible with this view; and there are scholars who translate the word rendered in our version 'possessed' by the term 'create'; but, by a comparison of passages where it occurs, it appears that this is not the just meaning; and these verses may well be understood as designating the 'eternal generation of the Logos from the Father, in such a sense that he is himself of the same substance with the Father, and co-eternal with him.'

Without entering into a critical examination of the language here used, which would certainly afford strong proof that not a mere passive quality is intended, but an active power, it must be sufficient to note the remarkable similarity of the description in this place to the way in which the divine Word is spoken of in the New Testament. 'Is Wisdom,' says Prof. Burrows, 'set forth as a person, dwelling from eternity with God? The divine Word, also, was "in the beginning with God" (John i. 1, 2), as a true personality. He dwelt in glory, with God, before the foundation of the world (xvii. 24). Is Wisdom before all things? So also is Christ, (Col. i. 17). Is Wisdom the eldest child of God, brought forth before the existence of all created things? So also Christ is "the only-begotten of the Father" (John i. 14), and "the first-born of the whole creation" (Col. i. 15). Was Wisdom present at the formation of the earth and heavens, as God's counsellor and co-worker? The New Testament develops the idea, here contained in the germ, in all its fulness, teaching us that by the Word "all things were made, and without him was not anything made that was made" (John i. 3); that "by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers; all things were created by him and for him; and he is before all things; and by him all things consist" (Col. 1, 16, 17). Is Wisdom the delight of God, dwelling always with him, and exulting always before him? Christ is his well-beloved Son, in whom he is well-pleased (Matt. iii. 17), and who dwells in his bosom (John i. 18). Did God associate with himself Wisdom as his darling child in the work of creation, so that she was present at the whole, saw the whole understood the whole, and had a part in the whole? There is a remarkable correspondence between this and the following words of our Lord: "The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do; for, what things soever he doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise. For the Father loveth the Son, and showeth him all things that himself doeth" (v. 19, 20). And, finally, is Wisdom's delight with the sons of men, and has she been constantly labouring to recall them to the paths of holiness and happiness? The heart of Christ has been set on the salvation of men from the beginning. They are in a peculiar and emphatic sense the objects of his divine love; and from the fall of Adam to the present hour he has spoken in every communication from God to man, calling sinners to repentance and salvation.'

Considerations of this kind are surely of great weight. For there is no safer mode of interpreting the scripture than to lay its declarations side by side; and, when we see the coincidence of one part with another, we may reasonably infer that, the same mind inspiring both, the same thing is taught. And therefore the conclusion is most reasonable 'that the full personality here ascribed to Wisdom, as well as her several relations to God and man, is something more than poetic drapery; that it has for its author, not the luxuriant imagination of the sacred writer alone, but the prescient mind of the Holy Ghost, who moulds and controls the thoughts of inspired men as he pleases.' See Horne's Intro., edit. Ayre, vol. ii. pp. 736-738).

WISDOM OF JESUS THE SON OF SIRACH, THE. See ECCLÉSIASTICUS.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON, THE BOOK OF. One of the books rightly placed among the apocryphal writings. For, though it bears the name of Solomon, it cannot possibly have been written by that monarch. There can be little doubt that the original language was Greek. The style is free, and not at all like a version; and there are examples of paronomasia, or play upon words, to which Hebrew expressions would not correspond. And there are passages (e.g. Wisd. xv. 14) evidently betokening a later time than that of Solomon.

The real author it is impossible to identify. Some have ascribed the book to the celebrated Philo, who lived about our Lord's time, and some (as in Philo's time the Alexandrian philosophy was more developed than in this work) to an older person of the same name. Then again it has been surmised (from iii. 13, &c., xvi. 28) that the writer belonged to the ascetic sect of the Therapeutæ; but the grounds alleged are not sufficient to support the notion. Wilder conjectures have been indulged in. But all that can be said with any show of certainty is that the work was composed by an Alexandrian Jew, probably about 120 B.C., or some time in the reign of Ptolemy Physcon, or Euergetes II., 145-116 B.C. (see De Wette, Einleit., § 314).

This book has always been (and with justice) highly regarded. It has been called Panaretos, or 'the treasury of virtue'. Mr. Westcott characterizes it as 'the noble expression of a mind which might have sought rest and joy in meditative life' (Introd. to Gosp., chap. i. pp. 75, 76). It was called forth by the circumstances of the times when many of the Jews were located in Egypt under a foreign lord, and required the comfort which the remembrance of God's dealings with their fathers was well calculated to impart. Hence the writer dilates on the perfections of God, and the ways of his providence, in order to confirm the faithful, and give them hope of deliverance from their trials. The precepts are of excellent moral tendency; and the whole work a valuable exhibition of the contemporary Jewish religious mind, tinged with Alexandrianism, and possibly in a degree evincing an oriental cast of thought. Some have imagined the book of Wisdom the production of more than one author, or that it has come down to us in a fragmentary shape; but careful investigation will demonstrate its unity and completeness. It falls naturally into three divisions.—I. An encomium on wisdom, with an earnest exhortation to strive after it (Wisd. i.—vi.).—II. An instruction concerning the means of obtaining it, its source, its nature, and its blessings (vii.—ix.).—III. A recommendation of it by the examples of Israelitish history (x.—xix.). Some divide it into two parts, i.—ix., x.—xix.; and some distribute the three, i.—v., vi.—ix., x.—xix. The writer speaks in the person of Solomon, perhaps not intending a forgery, but because the wise king was pre-eminently regarded in after ages as the fount and teacher of wisdom. The style is unequal, sometimes turgid, sometimes simple, and occasionally even sublime.

It has been asserted that the book of Wisdom is cited or alluded to in the New Testament. Some of the instances produced will be found by comparing Wisd. iii. 7 with Matt. xiii. 43; ii. 18 with Matt. xxvii. 43; xiii. 1 with Rom. i. 20; v. 18, 19, vii. 26, ix. 13 with Rom. xi. 34, Eph. vi. 13, 14, 17, Heb. i. 3; &c., &c. Many of these, however, are doubtful; still, as profane authors are cited in the New Testament, it cannot be thought incongruous or surprising if allusion is made to Jewish uninspired literature. Clement of Rome cites the book (Epist. i. ad Cor., 3, 27); and other fathers treat it with great respect. There are versions of it, Latin, Syriac, Arabic, &c. &c.

WISE MEN (Gen. xli. 8; Exod. vii. 11; Esth. i. 13; Jer. i. 35; Matt. ii. 1, 7, 16). The expression implies not merely men renowned for wisdom, but astrologers, diviners, magicians. Comp. 2 Sam. xiv. 2, xx. 16. See DIVINATION, MAGI.

WIST (Exod. xvi. 15; Acts xii. 9, xxiii. 5). Knew.

WIT (Gen. xxiv. 21; Exod. ii. 4). Know. To do to wit (2 Cor. viii. 1). To let know.

WITCH (Exod. xxii. 18; Deut. xviii. 10). See WIZARD.

WITCHCRAFT (1 Sam. xv. 23; 2 Kings ix. 22; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6; Mic. v. 12; Nah. ii. 4; Gal. v. 20). See DIVINATION, ENCHANTMENT, WIZARD.

WITNESS (Numb. xxxv. 30; Deut. xvii. 6, 7; Acts vii. 58, and elsewhere). See TRIAL. Sometimes inanimate things were appealed to as witnesses (e.g. Gen. xxxi. 44-53; Josh. xxiv. 26, 27). Witnesses were first to be the executioners of those whom their testimony had condemned (Deut. xiii. 9, xvii. 7; Acts vii. 58). False witnesses were to suffer that which those they slandered would have suffered. See OATH, p. 641.

A witness may be opposed for standing to the truth. Those who had witnessed the works of Christ, and maintained his cause, were so opposed, sometimes even to the shedding of their blood. Hence the term in the New Testament comes to signify 'martyr' (Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13, xx. 4).

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT. St. Paul, speaking of the blessedness of those who are led by the Spirit of God, describes them as being made 'sons of God,' so that with filial confidence, being adopted into his family, they call God 'Abba, Father.' He adds: 'The Spirit itself beareth witness with (or perhaps to) our spirits, that we are the children of God' (Rom. viii. 14, 16). The following remarks of Dr. Alford on the passage may properly be cited here. 'What is this witness of the Spirit itself? All have agreed, and indeed this verse is decisive for it, that it is something separate from, and higher than, all subjective inferences and conclusions. But, on the other hand, it does not consist in mere indefinite feeling, but in a certitude of the Spirit's presence and work continually asserted within us. It is manifested, as Olshausen beautifully says, in his comforting us, his stirring us up to prayer, his reproof of our sins, his drawing us to works of love, to bear testimony before the world, &c. And he adds with equal truth, "On this direct testimony of the Holy Ghost rests ultimately all the regenerate man's conviction respecting Christ and his work. For belief in scripture itself (he means, in the highest sense of the term "belief," conviction personally applied) has its foundation in this experience of the divine nature of the (influencing) Principle which it promises, and which, while the believer is studying it, infuses itself into him." The same commentator remarks that this is one of the most decisive passages against the pantheistic view of the identity of the Spirit of God and the spirit of man. However the one may be renovating power be rendered like the other, there still is a specific difference. The spirit of man may sin (2 Cor. vii. 1): the Spirit of God cannot, but can only be grieved (Eph. iv. 30), or quenched (1 Thess. v. 19); and it is by the influence of this highest principle of holiness that man becomes one spirit with the Lord himself (1 Cor. vi. 17)' (note on Rom. viii. 16).

WIZARD (Lev. xix. 31, xx. 6, 27; Deut. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 9; 2 Kings xxi. 6, xxiii. 24; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6; Isai. viii. 19, xix. 3). The original word properly signifies 'wise,' 'knowing,' hence a wizard or sorcerer; just as our word 'wizard' is derived from wise. Sometimes the spirit by which wizards were supposed to be attended is meant. See DIVINATION.

WOLF. A well-known wild animal, repeatedly mentioned in scripture for its rapacity (Gen. xlix. 27), and its fierce prowling about by night (Jer. v. 6; Hab. i. 8). The name is also figuratively used to designate cruel adversaries of the church (John x. 12; Acts xx. 29). The wolf, Canis lupus (with varieties), is still abundant in Asia Minor; and it is very possible that it may anciently have been common in Palestine. At this day, though some deny that wolves are found there, yet others speak of occasionally meeting with them.

WOMAN. The woman, according to the inspired history, 'was taken out of man' (Gen. ii. 23). St Paul refers to this narrative in order to distinguish the proper place of woman. 'The head of the woman is the man.' 'For the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man; neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man' (1 Cor. xi. 3, 8, 9). Still the pre-eminence of the man is not to be strained to lordly authority; but honour is to be given to the wife 'as unto the weaker vessel' (1 Pet. iii. 7). It is observable that, generally speaking, women are allowed their due place of honour only where the truths of divine revelation are known. In countries ignorant of God they are subjected to degradation, and regarded by men as their slaves. The progress of the gospel is peculiarly a boon to the female sex.

It is very true that we have in heathen story traces of God's original disposition. Ignorant as men must have been in the Greek heroic age of the material appliances of civilization, we yet find them, as represented by Homer, with a certain dignity and delicacy of mind and character. Still more is this apparent in the women. Polygamy seems to have been unknown: the relations between husband and wife were tender, the marriage-tie inviolable; so that, though surrounded with rude and boisterous men, Penelope, holding to the belief that her husband still lived, had no force to dread but that of persuasion. The manners of Greeks of those times show in favourable contrast to those of the Hebrews. No such foul deeds as that of Amnon and Tamar are met with. Was it that the religion then was of a higher type? nay, for it was peculiarly anthropomorphic; debased from the first principle, and likely from its character to deteriorate further. As the Greek religious element was developed, not bringing down god-like virtues to men, but carrying up, as was natural from its falsity, human vices to the deities, though civilization spread, yet the earlier purity was lost, and in the historic ages of their literature we read little of virtuous women, much of courtesans, and thus the sex was degraded; and to repair that degradation is one object of the gospel, and it is, as experience shows, only by Christian principles that woman is re-placed in the condition for which she was created.

Our Lord uses the narrative of the creation to show the indissoluble nature of the marriage-tie betwixt the man and the woman (Matt. xix. 3-8). This, with the near equality of the sexes, is a strong argument against polygamy. See MARRIAGE, WIFE.

Much greater social liberty seems to have been anciently allowed to the Hebrew women than is now customary in the east. We find also in scripture story several mentioned who were endowed with prophetic gifts, such as Deborah (Judges iv. 4, 5), Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 14), Anna (Luke ii. 36, 37), the four daughters of Philip the evangelist (Acts xxi. 8, 9), and others. Rules are given for the exercise of such gifts in Christian assemblies (1 Cor. xi. 5). But generally by the gospel women are peremptorily forbidden to teach publicly (xiv. 34, 35; 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12). Unless, therefore, commissioned by special revelation, women would in so teaching directly disobey the holy law.

WOOD. See FOREST.

WOOD-OFFERING. The offering of wood in order to keep up a sufficient supply of fuel for the fire on the altar is not mentioned till after the return from captivity (Neh. x. 34, xiii. 31). It appears that there was a solemn feast appointed, called aylophoria: this was held according to some authorities on the 22nd day of the month Ab; and the Talmudists say that every family when they brought their wood sacrificed a voluntary burnt-offering called the 'korban of wood.' But the accounts we have of this do not agree.

WOOL. See DRESS, SHEEP. Wool has always been of high value (2 Kings iii. 4), and the first-fruit of it was to be offered to the priests (Deut. xviii. 4). The white wool of Damascus was brought to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 18); and the purity of this whiteness often serves for illustration (Psal. cxlviii. 16; Isai. i. 18; Dan. vii. 9; Rev. i. 14). Yet dyeing of it was then understood by the Hebrews.

A garment of linen and woollen was not to be worn (Deut. xxii. 11). This was a warning against incongruous mixtures, and had a spiritual meaning, doubtless. But it is also said that such garments were worn by idolatrous priests.

WORD OF GOD. A name, in Greek Logos, given to Him who 'was made flesh and dwelt among us' (John i. 14), as the Messiah, the Lord Jesus Christ.

There were fore-shadowings of this term in the Old Testament (e.g. Psal. xxxiii. 6, cvii. 20, cxix. 89; Isai. xl. 8). In such passages we can scarcely limit the meaning to an uttered word or command. Many truths were announced indistinctly in the earlier revelation, which received by degrees a fuller embodiment, and were at length brought into thorough prominence in the gospel. Thus names that at first seemed but to express a divine attribute were seen afterwards to indicate a divine Person. See WISDOM. So the 'word' was taken up by Jewish writers with perhaps somewhat of a Messianic application: see Wisd. xvi. 12, xviii. 15. The term is adopted by the Chaldee paraphrasts. Thus on Deut. xxvi. 17, 18, it is said, 'Ye have appointed the word of God a king over you this day, that he may be your God.' The Alexandrian Jew Philo continually speaks of the Logos. But his philosophy, a mixture of Platonism and Judaism, was imperfect, and his language far from precise.

When great religious truths are to be unfolded to men, existing words must be used as the instruments of such teaching. They very probably will require a heightening or a limitation of their sense; and this a divinely-instructed teacher will take care to supply. St. John, appropriating the term Logos or Word, as fitly describing One from whom the divine utterances proceeded, shows at once what he means by declaring, 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made' (John i. 1-3). There is an unmistakable difference between the idea thus conveyed and that of Philo. The Word here spoken of is not merely an attribute, he is a Person, existing before all creatures from the beginning, the Former of created things, eternally with God, God himself. He manifested in flesh, developed, that fulness of grace and truth which ancient sages, in whom nevertheless he spoke, had but partially proclaimed (17). He was essentially the life of the world, from whom all the illumination and vivifying principle in man must proceed (4).

Words could not more emphatically express the dignity of the Only-begotten, or the transcendent glory of the manifestation of the 'Word of Life' (1 John i. 1, 2); and truly indeed are we taught to desire to receive out of his fulness 'grace for grace' (John i. 16).

The matter can be but most briefly treated here; and the barest outline given: there are some valuable remarks in Dr. Alford's note on John i. 1-5, which may be advantageously consulted.

WORKS. This word occurs sometimes in the sense of ordinary labours; as in Exod. v. 13; sometimes as indicating miracles (Numb. xvi. 28; John v. 20, x. 25). By the 'works' or conduct of men their character is known. For, as our Lord teaches, grapes cannot be gathered of thorns, or figs of thistles, the productions of a tree testify to its nature and quality, so men are known by their fruits (Matt. vii. 16-20). The 'works of the law' (Gal. ii. 16, iii. 2, 10) are those which the law of God requires. But a sinless performance of them is nowhere found with fallen man (1 John i. 8, 10); hence justification before God is not by the works of the law (Rom. iii. 20, 28). The 'works of the flesh' are those which naturally flow from the corrupted heart of men (Rom. viii. 8; Gal. v. 19-21). These the law condemns; and for these God's just judgments are inflicted. But a holy principle will yield its appropriate fruit. There are works of faith: that is, if a man believes in Christ for the remission of his sins, he will give proof of the reality of his faith by his conduct. And, if he does not seek to please God in his actions, honouring the Saviour by a holy walk and conversation, his faith is a mere name, of no value or efficiency (James ii. 17, 18, 26). This doctrine is summed up in the 12th article of the Anglican church: 'Albeit that good works, which are the fruits of faith, and follow after justification, cannot put away our sins, and endure the severity of God's judgment, yet are they pleasing and acceptable to God in Christ, and do spring out necessarily of a true and lively faith; inasmuch that by them a lively faith may be as evidently known as a tree discovered by the fruit.'

WORLD. Several Hebrew and Greek words are thus rendered in our translation. Thus hadedel is the place of rest for the dead, hades (Isai. xxxviii. 11): hheled, translated 'age' (Psal. xxxix. 6), means life or the world regarded as transient, fleeting (xvii. 14, xlix. 1): olam implies worldly things (Eccles. iii. 11); but, in another passage where the same word occurs (Psal. lxxiii. 12), the better rendering would be 'ever secure,' i.e. prosperous so long as they live: tebel comprises different shades of meaning, as the fertile and inhabited part of the world, as opposed to a desert (Job xviii. 18; Prov. viii. 31, where the idea is precisely given in our version; Isai. xiv. 17), again, the whole earth or world in general, specially where the founding of it is referred to (1 Sam. ii. 8; Psal. xviii. 15, xliiii. 1; Prov. viii. 26; Isai. xiv. 21, xxvii. 6); also it is sometimes put for the inhabitants of the world (Psal. ix. 8, xcvi. 13, xcvi. 9); sometimes hyperbolically for a kingdom or country, as that of Babylon (Isai. xlii. 11), of Israel (xxiv. 4). This last-named word is a poetical term, and does not seem to extend beyond our globe; the Hebrews, when they wished to express that larger sense of the 'world' comprehending created things generally, used a periphrasis, 'heaven, and earth, the sea, and all that in them is' (Exod. xx. 11).

In the New Testament several Greek words are found to which 'world' corresponds in our translation. Aion, implying 'duration,' signifies the material world as created by the Deity (Heb. xi. 3), more generally an age with the notion of time, a period of time, that which men live in (Matt. xii. 32, xiii. 22), that before the Messiah, or the Jewish dispensation, and that after, or the Christian (1 Cor. x. 11; Heb. vi. 5, ix. 26). Kosmos has a large signification, as we say the 'universe' (Matt. xiii. 35), designating sometimes the earth as man's abode (38), and sometimes the beings dwelling in the great universe, or in our world (v. 14; John i. 29; 1 Cor. iv. 9), the mass of the people (John vii. 4, xii. 19), the possessions of the world (Matt. xvi. 26; 1 Cor. iii. 22); the heathen people (Rom. xi. 12, 15), worldlings, men of the world as opposed to Christ's disciples (John xv. 19; 1 Cor. iii. 19), and sometimes perhaps the Jewish dispensation (Eph. i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 20). There is yet another word, oikoumenē, implying the 'inhabited earth' (Matt. xxiv. 14), the people of it (Acts xvii. 31), sometimes the Roman empire (xvii. 6, xxiv. 5), and sometimes perhaps Palestine and the parts adjacent (Luke ii. 1; Acts xi. 28).

These are the principal meanings which the term 'world,' as found in our translation, bears. It will be observed that, when used in a moral sense, that is, as implying the inhabitants of the material frame, an unfavourable idea is conveyed (e.g. John i. 10; 1 John v. 19). Satan is called the 'prince' and the 'god of this world' (John xii. 31, xiv. 30; 2 Cor. iv. 4); and the faithful are exhorted not to be conformed to this world (Rom. xii. 2), the wisdom of which is 'foolishness with God' (1 Cor. iii. 19), and not to 'love the world, neither the things that are in the world'; seeing that, 'if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him' (1 John ii. 15). And Christ's true followers are not of the world, but chosen out of the world; and therefore the world hateth them (John xv. 19). These are lessons which ought to be deeply pondered. And hence the great mercy of God in man's salvation is eminently displayed. 'For God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life' (iii. 16): hence, too, the largeness of Christ's mediatorial work is illustrated: 'He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world' (1 John ii. 2).

WORM. There are several Hebrew words so rendered in our version; some of them improperly so. Thus zôhhâ'îm, implying 'creeping' or crawling (Mic. vii. 17), is more accurately translated elsewhere 'serpents' (Deut. xxxii. 24). Sâs, also, a word signifying the 'leaper' (Isai. li. 8), must mean some species of moth. But besides these there are two other words, rimmâh, signifying rotting or putridity, and tô'â, tô'â'ath, or tô'ê'ah, so called from 'licking' or 'swallowing'. The first of these seems to describe the maggots bred in any putrefying substance, as in the manna (Exod. xvi. 24). The second is used for any maggot, worm, or caterpillar. Sometimes it designates the worm or insect, Coccus ilicis, from which the scarlet or crimson dye is obtained (Isai. i. 18). Also it is used for the maggots bred in the manna kept beyond the proper time (Exod. xvi. 20); and described as gnawing plants (Deut. xxviii. 39; Jonah iv. 7); where probably it was a caterpillar, some kinds of which are peculiarly destructive. The words rimmâh and tô'â are often employed indiscriminately. Thus both are represented as feeding on the bodies of the dead (Job xxi. 26, xxiv. 20; Isai. lxvi. 24). From the last-named passage our Lord seems to have adopted his striking metaphor of the eternal worm which torments the lost in the future world (Mark ix. 44, 46, 48). In Job xix. 26 there is no word in the original expressing 'worms.' In the New Testament we have the fearful death related of Herod Agrippa I., who was 'eaten of worms' (Acts xii. 23). Josephus describes Herod the Great as dying in a similar way (Antiq., lib. xvii. c. 5); and an apocryphal writer uses the same language in regard to Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. ix. 9).

WORMWOOD. A plant belonging to the genus Artemisia, remarkable for the intense bitterness of many of its species. This genus is distinguished by the multitude of fine divisions into which the leaves are usually separated, and the numerous clusters of small round drooping greenishyellow or brownish flower-heads with which the branches are loaded. Artemisia absinthium, wormwood, is said by Kitto not to exist in Palestine. Artemisia abrotanum, southernwood, is widely scattered over the south of Europe, Palestine, Persia, and other parts of Asia and elsewhere. But there is another species, Artemisia Judaica, which has been found in Palestine, Arabia, and the deserts of Numidia. It is erect and shrubby, with a stem about 18 inches high. Its taste is very bitter; and both leaves and seeds are used in the east in medicine, as a tonic. Probably the scripture term is general, comprising various bitter plants; but, if an individual be intended, we may fairly suppose it to be the Artemisia Judaica.

The term is commonly employed in a figurative sense for a bitter lot, or calamity, or curse (Deut. xxix. 18; Prov. v. 4; Jer. ix. 15, xxiii. 15; Lam. iii. 15, 19), and for injustice (Amos v. 7, vi. 12; where our version gives 'hemlock'). It also aptly represents the disastrous nature of an anti-christian power which should corrupt and embitter the pure water which it touched (Rev. viii. 11, 12). For more information see Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Wermuth.'

WORSHIP. This word is properly used to express the homage which was to be paid to the Deity, and which it was sinful to offer to any other being (Exod. xxxiv. 14; Isai. ii. 8, and elsewhere); see IDOLATRY. Thus we find St. Peter and an angel refusing such tokens of reverence (Acts x. 25, 26; Rev. xxii. 8, 9). The case of Nebuchadnezzar worshipping Daniel (Dan. ii. 46) is peculiar. The Chaldee word used and its Hebrew cognate indicate everywhere else the paying of divine honour; and it seems most probable that this is the sense here. If so, Daniel no doubt (though the fact is not expressly stated) directed the king's reverence to the Most High; for in the very next verse Nebuchadnezzar declares his belief that the God of Israel was 'God of gods.' For notice of the mode of public worship among the Hebrews see OFFERINGS, SYNAGOGUE, TEMPLE.

WORSHIPPER (Acts xix. 35). Comp. marg., and see EPHESUS, p. 268.

WRATH. See ANGER.

WRESTLE (Eph. vi. 12). See GAMES.

WRIED or WRYED (Psal. xxxviii. 6, marg.), altered in many modern copies into 'wearied.' Curved, crooked.

WRITING. The origin of writing is of unknown antiquity. Doubts, indeed, have heretofore been expressed whether it was practised at the time of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt; and it was hence questioned if the Pentateuch could have been really the work of Moses. All such doubts have been set at rest by the discovery of Egyptian writing certainly as ancient as the early Pharaohs.

When the art was known to the Hebrews is not so clear. Judah is described as having a signet (Gen. xxxvii. 18, 25); but whether there was a legend or merely a device upon it is uncertain. In Exod. xvii. 14 Moses is commanded to record the attack of Amalek 'in the book,' some memorial well known; and afterwards mention is frequently made of writing (xxviii. 11, 21, 29, 36, xxxi. 18, xxxii. 15, 16, xxxiv. 1, 28, xxxix. 6, 14, 30). It is observable that in none of these places is writing spoken of as a new invention; nor is surprise expressed at the commands. The likening, too, of the engravings upon the precious stones and the mitre of the high priest to the engraving of a signet is a presumption at least that the signet, previously spoken of, of Judah had some word or words upon it. It is very probable that the knowledge of the art was confined to a few persons; and the name of 'writer' or scribe appears, not long after, to be one of distinction (Judges v. 14). It has been thought that the title borne by the officers of the Israelites in Egypt (Exod. v. 6) was equivalent to writers; if so, it was probably their knowledge of this kind that qualified them for the posts they filled. When the Hebrews entered Canaan, they came among a people among whom writing was unquestionably practised. For the earlier name of the city Debir was Kirjath-sepher (Josh. x. 38, xv. 15; Judges i. 11), 'book-town,' in which we may reasonably suppose that there was some school of literature.

It is unnecessary to produce further ancient examples of writing. Books were no doubt by degrees multiplied; but we do not find letters as a mode of ordinary correspondence till the time of David, who wrote to Joab for the purpose of securing Uriah's destruction (2 Sam. xi. 14, 15). Uriah was himself the bearer of the fatal missive; it was perhaps known that he could not read; else David would have hesitated to trust it tion. It is not likely that a change in the letters used would be suddenly made by any nation. More reasonably may it be supposed that the process was gradual. Modifications of an original type would be introduced in order to promote facility and swiftness in writing, and also to secure beauty and regularity of form. Now, there are inscriptions in the old Phœnician character, rude and irregular, but yet exhibiting the type from which more finished letters were developed. And some of the inscriptions show the progress of the modification. The degree varied under different circumstances. The Samaritans preserved with little change the characters in which they received the Pentateuch; while the Jews formed from them in the course of time those Hebrew letters which are now so denominated. Still it is uncertain when they came into customary use. We cannot fix upon a precise date, but can only say generally that the commencement of the change was not earlier than the second century before Christ, and that it made gradually its way till the end of the first century after Christ. It may be added that from these ancient Phœnician characters those of many other languages would seem to have been derived. Aramæan, Persian, Greek are traced to this source; and from these proceeded the alphabets of daughter or kindred tongues.

The following table is given by Madden (Hist. of Jewish Coinage, p. 315) from Gesenius to indicate the channel through which the square Hebrew character has been derived from the early Phœnician.

to his hands. Letters are subsequently often mentioned (1 Kings xxi. 8, 9, 11; 2 Kings x. 1, 2, 6, 7, xix. 14; 2 Chron. xxi. 12-15, xxix. 1, 6-9, xxxii. 17; Ezra iv. 6-23; Neh. vi. 5-7, 17, 19; Esth. iii. 12-14, viii. 5, 9, 10, ix. 29, 30; Jer. xxix.).

The alphabet used by the Hebrews was probably of Phœnician origin. This Hebrew alphabet has varied in the shape of the letters. The square characters now employed are not of very remote antiquity; for it is demonstrably proved by the inscriptions on Jewish coins yet existing that the characters formerly in use were those now called Samaritan. And it has been commonly said that they lapsed down to the captivity; and that Ezra introduced on the return the more modern square letters usually termed Chaldee. This account, however, is not borne out by careful examination. But, though Phœnician characters are of great antiquity, it is by no means clear that that maritime people were the inventors of them. Letters were originally of a pictorial cast; and their names indicated the objects which they were intended to represent. Now, taking a few of the letters, aleph is an ox, beth a tent, gimel a camel, daleth a tent-door, vau a tent-peg, &c. &c. (comp. Saalschütz, Arch. der Hebr., vol. i. taf. iv.), the forms being a rude likeness of the things signified by the names. But such names would be given by an agricultural population, and from such must have passed to the Phœnicians, through whom they became widely disseminated. Perhaps they had an Aramæan origin, and hence prevailed among western Shemitic tribes.

The Phœnician alphabet, so far as we can trace it upwards, comprised twenty-two letters; and the writing was written from right to left. There were the same number in Hebrew, as we can conclude from the alphabetic psalms, some of them perhaps composed by David. But according to the Greek legend the alphabet as brought from Phœnicia into Greece had but sixteen letters; and some scholars are inclined to believe that there were originally no more in Phœnician. Be this as it may, the letters are taken to have been consonants only; though it is not impossible that some of them represented long vowels. For, while Hebrew was a living tongue, it was not necessary to express the vowels generally by letters or signs. But when it had ceased to be spoken some means must be found of fixing the vowel-pronunciation of the language. The fundamental idea of a word in this and kindred dialects was conveyed by its consonants, while the modifications of this idea were indicated by the vowels. Hence the comparatively-small need of expressed vowels to the language so long as it was vernacular. The pronunciation was known. But afterwards external signs, points, and accents were employed, not to form a new mode of reading, but to preserve as far as possible that which was then in use, that according to which the speaking had previously been modified, though with little or no development in writing. It would seem that this system was gradually brought to the state in which we now have it, perhaps between the sixth and tenth centuries after Christ. But in different regions different modes of writing vowels were probably adopted. The same process appears in regard to other languages. Thus Arabic and Syriac, with consonantal letters, introduced before the seventh century vowel-points above or below the line.

It has been said that the Phœnician letters were very likely pictorial. Pictorial signs, we know, have been used by some nations; and pictorial representation was the basis of the Egyptian hieroglyphics. Egyptian monuments are covered with paintings exhibiting warlike and domestic scenes, accompanied by inscriptions, composed of men and animals, astronomical and geographical figures, plants, instruments, and utensils, together with a variety of imaginary forms, winged snakes and globes, griffins, &c., &c. It was long a problem hopeless of solution how to discover the meaning of these inscriptions. Valuable information, unknown facts of history, might be contained therein; but there was no key to this, the supposed sacred mode of Egyptian writing. At length a remarkable monument, usually called the 'Rosetta stone,' was dug up by a French officer named Bouchart in 1799. By Lord Hutchinson's victory and the capitulation of Alexandria this was obtained by the British, and was brought to England in 1802: it is now in the British Museum. It contains an inscription in hieroglyphic, in what has been called enchorial or demotic popular Egyptian—a running hand, derived from the hieroglyphic, but by a later deterioration—and in Greek; and the three were reasonably supposed to be copies of the same document. The Greek text was found to be a decree by certain functionaries at Memphis for the coronation of Ptolemy Epiphanes, 196 B.C. Scholars now anxiously set themselves with this most important help to decipher the hieroglyphic characters. Dr. Young was the first to publish a conjectural translation, in 1816; and his researches were extended by M. Champollion, who interpreted other inscriptions, and prepared a grammar and dictionary. The results, hitherto obtained, are interesting and important. It would seem that hieroglyphic signs are employed in three classes of signification: '1. Pictorially, as denoting simply the object represented. 2. Symbolically, for some other object or idea conventionally connected with the figure, as an eye for seeing, a sceptre for a king, two arms in an attitude of repulsion for the negative conjunction, &c. &c. '3. Phonetically, as the syllabic or initial sound of the name of the object represented, or of that which it symbolizes,' just as if in English there were to be drawings of a captain, an archer, and a butcher to denote the word 'cab' (see Trevor's Ancient Egypt, chap. iv.). From the hieroglyphics, so interpreted, light has been thrown upon the Egyptian annals; and, as further researches are made, more information may be reasonably expected. It is, however, to be carefully observed that much uncertainty still prevails upon the subject. The existing Coptic is considered the representative of the ancient Egyptian tongue, and is made the basis of interpretation. But eminent scholars have questioned the soundness of this proceeding. Results must, therefore, be at present received with caution, and further discoveries be patiently waited for.

By a very similar process the inscriptions in Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia, have been interpreted. The kind of writing found there is called cuneiform, i.e. wedge-shaped or arrow-headed, the characters being much like slender wedges, or heads of arrows. At Persepolis tri-lingual inscriptions were found; and by the study of these Grottefend was able between 1800 and 1815 to ascertain that they were written from left to right, to read the names of Cyrus, Darius, Hystaspes, and Xerxes, and to discover a considerable number of the letters of an alphabet. Other explorers in the same field, among whom may specially be named Lassen and Rawlinson, followed; and most important results have been already obtained. This cuneiform writing appears to have been confined to sculptures and impressions, while a cursive character (read from right to left) was used for ordinary purposes. The language first discovered was an ancient Persian, with many analogies in the modern Zend and in Sanscrit. The Persepolitan inscriptions were also in a Scythian language, which has been expounded; and the knowledge acquired has been successfully applied to the deciphering of the writing on the Assyrian monuments. According to Rawlinson, cuneiform writing may be divided into three groups, Babylonian, the oldest, Assyrian, and Elymæan; and in these groups there are varieties. The primitive signs, like the Egyptian hieroglyphics, 'were originally mere pictures of natural objects; but gradually by far the greater part of them assumed a phonetic or alphabetical value; for, it is probable that cuneiform writing was first introduced into Chaldea by a Hamite race cognate with the Egyptians. The Assyrian language, which consists of upwards of 600 characters or elements, has indeed some peculiarities in common with the Egyptian, but is, in many roots, very nearly allied to the Hebrew and Chaldee, thus affording another reason why Asshur is represented to be of Shemitic origin (Gen. x. 22).' So it is that the progress of discovery tends to corroborate the records we have in the sacred volume (see Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., pp. 303-305).

It is to be observed that certain Hebrew letters are extremely similar, scarcely in coarse writing to be distinguished, also that letters are used as numerals. Hence mistakes readily occur. And it is to the mistakes of transcribers, arising from this source, that many of the discrepancies now existing in the sacred text may undoubtedly be traced.

Ancient writing-materials.

The materials of writing, either referred to in scripture, or known to be anciently in use, are various. Stone tablets, on which documents were incised, are mentioned in Exod. xxxi. 18, xxxii. 15, 16, 19, xxxiv. 1, 4, 28, 29. So Egyptian and Assyrian inscriptions are many of them on stone. Frequently also they were stamped or cut upon moist clay, which was afterwards baked into bricks. Some of the earliest existing specimens are the bricks of Nineveh and Babylon on which inscriptions are found. Papyrus was used from a very remote age by the Egyptians. Skins were frequently employed, sometimes made into the finest leather, and sometimes in the shape of parchment or vellum (2 Tim. iv. 13). Peculiar directions are given by Jewish authorities that the skins used for the sacred books should be those of clean animals. There were other substances on which things were occasionally written, just as in certain cases among ourselves, e.g. the rods on which the names of the tribes were placed (Numb. xvii. 2, 3), the gates on which holy words were to be imprinted (Deut. vi. 9), tablets of box-wood (2 Esdr. xiv. 24) and of brass (1 Macc. viii. 22, xiv. 27), and also plaster on which Joshua was to inscribe certain portions of the law (Deut. xxvii. 2 4; Josh. viii. 32). The writing on gates and doors is still most common in the east. The Moslems 'never set up a gate, cover a fountain, build a bridge, or erect a house, without writing on it choice sentences. . . Christians also do the same' (Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 98). The same author says that he has seen numerous specimens of writing on plaster still perfectly distinct, though more than 2000 years old. He supposes that what Joshua did was 'to write in the still-soft cement with a style, or, more likely, on the polished surface when dry with red paint, as in ancient tombs (pp. 471, 472). Occasionally, when letters were cut in stone, lead (and also copper) was poured in. To this practice probably allusion is made in Job xix. 24: see Carey, Job, p. 264. Writing on linen and on palm-leaves, now common in India, does not seem to have been practised by the Hebrews.

When the material to be written on was hard, a pointed style was used, sometimes of iron, or a graving-tool (Job xix. 24; Psal. xlv. 1; Isai. viii. 1; Jer. viii. 8, xvii. 1). For skins or parchment there was ink applied with a reed (xxxvi. 18; 2 Cor. iii. 3; 2 John 12; 3 John 13). The ink, it is said, was to be of lamp-black dissolved in gall juice, or sometimes gall and vitriol; and it was carried by a writer in an ink-horn suspended at the girdle (Ezek. ix. 2, 3). It was customary to write not in books, as we usually do, but in rolls which could easily be secured by a seal (Rev. v. 1). The synagogue copies of the law are still rolls. See MANUSCRIPTS, p. 560.

Egyptian scribe.

The modern custom of writing in the east is described by Dr. Thomson. 'We are always struck with their writing materials, and their mode of using them. They do not carry ink-horns now, as the prophets and scribes of old did, but have an apparatus consisting of a metal or ebony tube for their reed pens, with a cup or bulb of the same material, attached to the upper end, for the ink. This they thrust through the girdle, and carry with them at all times. When they are to write a letter, for example, they open the lid of the ink-bulb, draw out a long reed pen from the tube, double over the paper, and begin from the right side of the page, holding the paper in the hand without any other support. . . . If you wish to be very respectful, you must take a large sheet; and the lines should incline upward toward the left corner of the paper. It must be folded long, like documents on file, placed within a nicely-cut envelope made for the occasion, and the address written across the letter. It must be sealed. The open letter, or paper sent by Sanballat to Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 5) was an insult' (pp. 131, 132). See EPISTLE.

---

X

XANTHICUS (2 Macc. xi. 30, 33, 39). See MONTH.

XERXES. This monarch is not mentioned in scripture by the name by which he was known to the Greeks. But there can hardly be a doubt that he was the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther. See AHSUERUS, 2, ESTHER, THE BOOK OF. XERXES is referred to in Dan. xi. 2.

---

Y

YARN. See LINEN, WEAVING. It is questionable whether our version of 1 Kings x. 23 can be justified. Various interpretations of the words are proposed. Gesenius would render 'a troop of royal merchants always fetched a troop of horses at a fixed price'; and Keil approves (Comm. on Kings, vol. i. pp. 180, 181).

YEAR. A division of time, of which the Hebrew name, shânâh, signifies 'repetition' or revolution, very early noted in scripture (Gen. i. 14, v. 3). Being plainly marked by the heavenly bodies and by the recurrence of the seasons, it must have forced itself at once upon the observation of mankind. Doubtless the measure of the years was at first roughly taken, as comprising an exact number, or being a definite multiple of the lesser periods of months and weeks. But, as astronomical science advanced, certain discrepancies would be noticed. And, as in fact a single solar year, measured by the revolution of the earth around the sun, is 365d. 5h. 48m. nearly, means had to be found of adjusting the calendar, so that the seasons should not go round till midsummer fell in what was called mid-winter. For a brief account of the means adopted see CHRONOLOGY.

The Hebrew year was regulated and characterized by the orderly succession of the sacred festivals, the passover marking the commencement (Exod. xii. 2), the other feasts, as that of weeks, and that of tabernacles, following at specified intervals. But it is observable that two reckonings seem to have been simultaneously observed. For the feast of in-gathering is said to be at the year's end (xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22); and, besides, the year of jubilee, and by consequence the sabbatical year, commenced in what, ac-ording to the sacred computation, was the seventh month. This (so-called) seventh month, or Tisri, is now the beginning of the Jewish year. See Browne's Ordo Sæcl., Append. §§ 403, 409, pp. 465, 467. The year, besides being divided into months and weeks, was also distributed into seasons: see SEASON.

YEAR, NEW. According to the Jews the destiny of every individual is at this time determined. The Creator sits on his throne, and on the first day of the first month weighs the merits and demerits of all: those whose demerits preponderate are sealed to death: those whose merits preponderate are sealed to life; while the cases of those whose merits and demerits are equally balanced are delayed till the day of atonement. See Mills, British Jews, part ii. chap. vi. pp. 155, 167, 168.

YEAR, SABBATICAL. Just as every seventh day was a day on which no work should be done, so every seventh year the land of Israel was to have its rest. The provisions, as we find them laid down in the law, are these. The fields were to be left to their own spontaneous yield, no seed being sown, and likewise the vineyards and the oliveyards were not to be pruned or tended. And whatever grew of itself was to be public property: the owner of the soil was not to gather it: the poor and the stranger and even the beasts of the field might feed on it at will (Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 2-7). Moreover, there was to be a general release: all debts must be then forgiven save to a foreigner (Deut. xv. 1-11). We must not, however, confound with this year that seventh in which a Hebrew servant was to become free (12-18), this last might fall at any time, being the seventh year from the date of his being sold.

There was a close connection between the sabbatical year and the weekly sabbath, a larger increase being yielded the preceding year (Lev. xxv. 20-22), just as an increased quantity of manna was gathered on the sixth day in the wilderness. God would impress on the people the great lesson that the land was his, and would inculcate the principle of loving fellowship, by showing that an owner, his steward, was not to keep in a hard and grudging spirit everything to himself. The land, too, would be benefited: it would have its season of lying fallow, and would the better thereafter yield its increase. And, to stamp more evidently the holy purpose of this season, it was then especially at the feast of tabernacles that the law was to be publicly read to the people (Deut. xxxi. 10-13): see some good remarks in Fairbairn's Typol. of Script., book iii. chap. iii. sect. 9, vol. ii. pp. 423-425.

We have little notice of the observance of this year in the sacred history: the Jewish writers infer from 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21 that it had been neglected seventy times seven, i.e. 490, years. It is referred to in an apocryphal book (1 Macc. vi. 49), and sneered at by a heathen author (Tacitus, Hist., lib. v. 4).

YELLOW (Lev. xiii. 30, 32, 36; Psal. lxxviii. 13). See COLOURS.

YOKE. Several Hebrew words are rendered 'yoke' in our version. 'Ol is the curved piece of wood upon the necks of animals of draught, by which they are fastened to the pole or beam (Numb. xix. 2; Deut. xxi. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 7). Metah, properly a 'staff' or 'bar,' for bearing on the shoulder, signifies also a yoke (Jer. xxvii. 2, xxviii. 10, 12). Both these words are symbolically used as the emblem of servitude (1 Kings xii. 4, 9-11), also of suffering or calamity (Lam. i. 14, iii. 27). An iron yoke implies severe bondage (Deut. xxviii. 48; Jer. xxviii. 14). And hence to 'break a yoke' is to become free (Gen. xxvii. 40; Isai. ix. 4; Jer. ii. 20). Similarly in the New Testament the term 'yoke' indicates subjection or servitude (Matt. xi. 29, 30; Acts xv. 10; Gal. v. 1). There is another Hebrew word, tzemed, embodying the idea of 'fastening' or 'yoking together,' as beasts are yoked together to the plough, and hence signifying a pair. It is used of oxen (1 Sam. xi. 7; 1 Kings xix. 19, 21); of asses (Judges xix. 10, in our version 'two asses'); of riders (Isai. xxi. 7, in our version 'a couple of horsemen'). Hence it is occasionally applied to land, meaning as much as a yoke of oxen could plough in a day (1 Sam. xiv. 14).

YOKE-FELLOW (Phil. iv. 3). Most likely reference is made to some one of the apostle's fellow-labourers; which it is impossible to say.

Z

ZAANA'IM (removals). A plain where Heber the Kenite had pitched his tent (Judges iv. 11). See ZAA'ANNIM.

ZAA'ANAN (place of flocks). A place mentioned only once (Mic. i. 11): perhaps it is identical with Zenan, a town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 37).

ZAA'ANAN'NIM (removals). A plain (so-styled) on the border of Naphtali not far from Kedesh (Josh. xix. 33). It is called also Zaanaim (Judges iv. 11). But the word rendered 'plain' is more properly an oak, and two places are not indicated in Josh. xix. 33, Allon and Zaanannim, but rather the oak at or near Zaanannim.

ZAA'AVAN (unquiet). One of the descendants of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 27); called also Zavan (1 Chron. i. 42).

ZAB'AD (whom God gave).—1. A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 36, 37).—2. An Ephraimite slain by the men of Gath (vii. 21).—3. One of David's warriors (xi. 41), very probably identical with No. 1.—4. One of the persons who murdered king Joash (2 Chron. xxiv. 26): he is also called Jozaehar (2 Kings xii. 21).—5, 6, 7. Three who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 27, 33, 43).

ZABADAI'AS (1 Esdr. ix. 35). Zabad (Ezra x. 43).

ZABADE'ANS (1 Macc. xii. 31). An Arab tribe attacked by Jonathan Maccabeus. A writer in Dr. Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol.

iii. p. 1809, thinks that their settlements were on the slopes of Anti-Libanus, where are still the villages Kejr Zebad, and Zebadany.

ZAB'BAI (perhaps erroneously for Zaccai, pure).—1. A person who married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 28).—2. The father of one who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 20). The name is Zaccai in the margin.

ZAB'BUD (given). One who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 14). In some copies the name is Zaccur.

ZABDE'US (1 Esdr. ix. 21). Zebadiah (Ezra x. 20).

ZAB'DI (gift of Jehovah).—1. A descendant of Judah, the grandfather of Achan (Josh. vii. 1, 17, 18): he is probably the person called Zimri in 1 Chron. ii. 6.—2. A Benjamite (viii. 19).—3. The superintendent of David's vineyards (xxvii. 27).—4. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph (Neh. xi. 17), perhaps and identical with Zaccur, 3, Zichri, 5.

ZAB'DIEL (gift of God).—1. The father of one of David's officers (1 Chron. xxvii. 2).—2. An overseer of the priests, said to be son of one of the great men (Neh. xi. 14). See HAGGEDOLIM.

ZAB'DIEL (1 Macc. xi. 17). An Arabian, who put Alexander Balas to death.

ZAB'BUD (given). An officer of Solomon said to be 'the king's friend': he was the son of Nathan, possibly the well-known prophet (1 Kings iv. 5). It is not improbable that Zabud was identical with Zabab, 1, also the son of a Nathan.

ZABULON (Matt. iv. 13, 15; Rev. vii. 8). A Greek form of Zebulun.

ZAC'CAI (pure, innocent).—1. One whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 9; Neh. vii. 14).—2 (iii. 20, marg.). See ZABBAI.

ZACCHÆ'US, or ZACCHE'US (id.). A Jew who held the office of chief tax-collector at Jericho. Dr. Alford imagines him administrator of the revenue derived from balsam which abounded in the neighbourhood. He had accumulated wealth in his post. When Jesus was passing through Jericho on his last journey to Jerusalem, Zacchæus was anxious to see him, to distinguish his person from those who clustered round. But, being a short man, he had little opportunity in the crowd: he therefore ran on, and climbed a tree. And great was his joy when the Lord looked up as he came to the place and told him he intended to abide that day at his house. The dissatisfaction of the people was loudly expressed: Jesus was gone (they said) to be guest with a man that was a sinner. But the merciful Saviour was come 'to seek and to save that which was lost.' And Zacchæus' heart was touched. If he had done any one wrong, he would restore fourfold; and the half of all his wealth he would give to the poor. True child of Abraham, he was rich towards God. And Jesus stayed there, and uttered in his house a striking parable (Luke xix. 1-27). Of Zacchæus nothing more is certainly known.

ZACCHE'US (2 Macc. x. 19). An officer of Judas Maccabeus.

ZAC'CHUR (mindful). A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 26).

ZAC'CUR (id.).—1. The father of the Reubenite spy (Numb. xiii. 4).—2. A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron. xxiv. 27).—3. One of the sons of Asaph, head of a course of singers (xxv. 2, 10; Neh. xii. 35): he is possibly the same with Zichri (1 Chron. ix. 15).—4 (Ezra viii. 14, marg.). See ZABUD.—5. One who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 2).—6. A Levite who sealed the covenant (x. 12).—7. The father of one of the treasurers appointed by Nehemiah (xiii. 13).

ZACHARI'AH (whom Jehovah remembers).—1. A son of Jeroboam II., who reigned over Israel for six months, 772 B.C., and was killed by Shallum, who succeeded to his throne (2 Kings xiv. 29, xv. 8-12). He was the last sovereign of the family of Jehu; and thus was fulfilled the prediction made to Jehu that his children to the fourth generation should sit upon the throne of Israel (x. 30; Hos. i. 4). Zachariah was an ungodly prince. There is some difficulty in adjusting the date of his reign. For, as Amaziah outlived Jehoash fifteen years (2 Kings xiv. 17-23), Uzziah must have begun to reign in the fifteenth or sixteenth year of Jeroboam's monarchy (see UZZIAH); and, therefore, as Zachariah reigned in the thirty-eighth year of Uzziah, there must have been a period, about eleven years, after Jeroboam's death before his son was actually seated upon his throne, or 'reigned' according to the general scripture use of the term. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Zacharias;' Browne, Ordo Sacclorum, p. 239. Or Jeroboam may have reigned a longer time, a copyist having introduced an incorrect number.—2. The father of Abi or Abijah, king Hezekiah's mother (2 Kings xviii. 2): he is also called Zechariah (2 Chron. xxix. 1).

ZACHARI'AS (id.).—1. A person mentioned by our Lord as unjustly slain by the Jews 'between the temple and the altar' (Matt. xxiii. 35; Luke xi. 51). There is a difficulty in deciding who it was that our Saviour meant. It can hardly be imagined that he referred to a then-future martyr, the Zacharias son of Baruch who, according to Josephus (Bell. Jud., lib. iv. 5, § 4), was killed in the temple just before the destruction of Jerusalem. The father of John the Baptist, too, is said to have so perished; though the story rests on little solid ground. Possibly the Zacharias in question was the prophet, who is called 'the son of Barachiah' (Zech. i. 1); but of his death the scripture says nothing—or, with still greater likelihood, the son of Jehoiada the priest who at the commandment of Joash king of Judah was stoned 'in the court of the house of the Lord' (2 Chron. xxiv. 20-22), of whose blood it was said that it was not washed away till the burning of the temple at the captivity. And, as the books of Chronicles are placed last in Hebrew bibles, there is a propriety in the fixing upon this Zacharias at the close, as Abel's murder is recorded at the beginning of the sacred book. He, however, is not mentioned as connected with Barachiah. Some have imagined, therefore, that the words which are found only in St. Matthew's narrative are interpolated. The perplexity will never, it is likely, be fully cleared up.—2. The father of John the Baptist. He was of the course of Abia or Abijah, and resided in a city among the mountains of Judah (as some say, Hebron). When he was executing in his turn his office in the temple, he was apprised by an angel that his wife Elisabeth should have a son. Zacharias hardly believed the announcement, and was struck with dumbness till John's birth and circumcision. Then his mouth was opened, and he uttered that noble strain of praise with which ever since the church has honoured the Lord (Luke i.). Nothing more is certainly known of him.

ZACHARI'AS.—1 (1 Esdr. i. 8). Zechariah (2 Chron. xxxv. 8).—2 (1 Esdr. i. 15). A perversion of Heman (2 Chron. xxxv. 15).—3 (1 Esdr. v. 8). Seraiah (Ezra ii. 2).—4 (1 Esdr. vi. 1, vii. 3). The prophet Zechariah.—5 (1 Esdr. viii. 30). Zechariah (Ezra viii. 3).—6 (1 Esdr. viii. 37). Zechariah (Ezra viii. 11).—7 (1 Esdr. viii. 44). Zechariah (Ezra viii. 16).—8 (1 Esdr. ix. 27). Zechariah (Ezra x. 26).—9 (1 Macc. v. 18, 56). The father of Joseph, a captain in the Maccabean wars.

ZACH'ARY (2 Esdr. i. 40). The prophet Zechariah.

ZACH'ER (memorial, praise). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 31). He is also called Zechariah (ix. 37).

ZADOK (just).—1. A high priest, son of Ahitub of the line of Eleazar (2 Sam. viii.

17). Zadok first joined David at Hebron (1 Chron. xii. 28), and continued ever loyal to him, being associated with Abiathar in the priesthood. In Absalom's rebellion the two would have carried the ark of God along with David; but the king desired them to remain with it in Jerusalem, trusting that he should be brought back thither; and, besides, they would be able to give him intelligence, by means of their sons, from the city (2 Sam. xv. 24-37, xvii. 15-21). Abiathar afterwards joined the party of Adonijah; but Zadok was faithful to David, and anointed Solomon (2 Kings i.); he was subsequently put by Solomon in Abiathar's place (ii. 35). Some difficulty has been felt as to the relative position of these two; and it has been imagined that Zadok was high priest at Gibeon, while Abiathar succeeded his father Ahimelech, high priest at Nob. It is not reasonable to believe that there were two high priests in Saul's reign, or indeed, in spite of some fanciful conjectures, at any time; it seems more likely that, as the high-priesthood had, we do not know how, been transferred to the family of Ithamar in the house of Eli, Abiathar, the representative of that family, was really chief till deposed by Solomon, while Zadok, the head of the elder house, to whom the high-priesthood was to revert (1 Sam. ii. 27-36), would naturally hold a very prominent position. Zadok is frequently mentioned in genealogies of the family of Aaron (e.g. 1 Chron. vi. 8, 53).—2. The father of Jerusha, king Jotham's mother (2 Kings xv. 33; 2 Chron. xxvii. 1).—3. Another in the line of priests (1 Chron. vi. 12). As he also is said to be son of Ahitub, some have imagined that the names are introduced a second time by an error of transcription. The Zadok of ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11 is either this person or No. 1.—4, 5. Two who helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (ii. 4, 29).—6. One who sealed the covenant (x. 21), possibly identical with No. 4 or 5.—7. A scribe (xiii. 13).

ZA'HAM (loathing). One of the children of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 19).

ZA'IR (small). A place in Idumea where, when the Edomites revolted from king Joram of Judah, he defeated them in a night-attack upon their troops (2 Kings viii. 21). Its locality can be only conjectured.

ZA'LAPH (fracture, wound). The father of a person who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 30).

ZAL'MON (shady). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 28). He is elsewhere (1 Chron. xi. 29) called Ilai.

ZAL'MON (id.). A hill near to Shechem (Judges ix. 48). It has been imagined that the same hill is intended by the psalmist: 'When the Almighty scattered kings in it (the land), there was snow on Salmon, or Zalmon' (Psal. lxxviii. 14), i.e. the fields were whitened with the bones of the slain. But the Zalmon by Shechem could not have been high: snow would first appear on loftier summits. Hence some expositors suppose the word not a proper name, and render 'there was snow in the darkness,' i.e. light in calamity. See Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. Zalmon. Mr. Grove suggests that there might be some allusion in the sacred writer's mind, the key to which is now lost (Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1094, 1095).

ZALMON'NAH (id.). One of the stations in the march of the Israelites next after mount Hor (Numb. xxxiii. 41, 42). Possibly it was here, or at Punon, that the brazen serpent was erected: comp. xxi. 4-6.

ZALMUN'NA (shelter is denied him). One of the Midianitish kings who, with Zebah having escaped from the first onset of Gideon, and passed the Jordan safely, was lying secure in Karkor with about 15,000 men, when Gideon unexpectedly came up, attacked them, took and afterwards slew the chiefs (Judges viii. 5-21; Psal. lxxxiii. 11). Zalmunna and Zebah are distinguished in the narrative from Oreb and Zeeb. The first are styled 'kings'; the latter 'princes.'

ZAM'BIS (1 Esdr. ix. 34). Amariah (Ezra x. 42).

ZAMB'RI (1 Macc. ii. 26). Zimri (Numb. xxv. 14).

ZAMOTH (1 Esdr. ix. 28). Zattu (Ezra x. 27). ZAMZUM'MIMS (noisy people). A gigantic tribe, like the Anakim, who originally occupied a district beyond the Jordan between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, and were extirpated by the Ammonites (Deut. ii. 20, 21). They were probably the same with the Zuzim.

ZANO'AH (marsh, bog).—1. A town in the plain country of Judah (Josh. xv. 34; Neh. iii. 13, xi. 30): it is to the south-east of Zorah, still bearing the name of Zan'á'a.—2. Another town of Judah in the mountains (Josh. xv. 56); perhaps Zaná'tah, ten miles south of Hebron.

ZAPH'NATH-PAANE'AH. A name or title given by Pharaoh to Joseph when appointed to the dignity of ruler next under the king of the land of Egypt (Gen. xli. 45). The signification of it is little more than conjectural; and scholars have widely differed in the derivations they have proposed. Those who prefer a Hebrew origin say it means 'the revealer of mysteries.' But surely, as an Egyptian title, it must have an Egyptian derivation. Osburn (Israel in Egypt, p. 57) makes it equivalent to 'the sage enemy of adultery.' But, as reference would thus be made to Joseph's private character, it seems more reasonable to interpret it as designating some public benefit derived from him to the kingdom. Gesenius believes that it may mean 'the preserver or rescuer of the age or world.' See Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 653. Mr. Poole's opinion is not easily gathered from his article in Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. pp. 1814-1816. He seems to suggest as the meaning 'Sesertasen-lives.'

ZA'PHON (north). A city in the low level of the Jordan in the kingdom of Sihon, allotted to the tribe of Gad (Josh. xiii. 27).

ZARA (Matt. i. 3). Zarah.
ZAR'ACES (1 Esdr. i. 38). A person (evidently not Zedekiah: comp. 46) said to be brother to Jehoiakim.

ZARAH (a rising of light). One of the sons of Judah by Tamar (Gen. xxxviii. 30, xlvi. 12). He is also called Zerah (Numb. xxvi. 20; Josh. vii. 1, 18, 24, xxii. 20; 1 Chron. ii. 4, 6, ix. 6; Neh. xi. 24).

ZARAFAS. 1 (1 Esdr. viii. 2). Zerachiah (Ezra vii. 4). 2 (1 Esdr. viii. 31). Zerachiah (Ezra viii. 4). 3 (1 Esdr. viii. 34). Zebadiah (Ezra viii. 8).

Z'AREAH (hornets' town) (Neh. xi. 29). See ZORAH.

Z'AREATHITES. The inhabitants of Zareah or Zorah (1 Chron. ii. 53).

Z'ARED (exuberant growth, sc. of trees) (Numb. xxi. 12). See ZERED.

ZAR'EPHATH (smelting-house?). A Phœnician town situated about midway between Tyre and Sidon, whither Elijah was sent to reside with a widow in the famine after the drying up of the brook Cherith (1 Kings xvii. 8-24). It is once more mentioned in the Old Testament (Obad. 20): in the New it is called Sarepta (Luke iv. 26); and it must have been, if not here, at least in a neighbouring district, that our Lord healed the Canaanitish woman's daughter (Matt. xv. 21-28). The modern village Sarafend represents the ancient Zarephath: there are considerable ruins in the neighbourhood, indicating a place of no mean size or importance.

ZAR'ETAN (cooling?) (Josh. iii. 16). See ZEREDA.

Z'ARETH-SHA'HAR (splendour of the dawn). A city allotted to Reuben: it was on a hill in a valley (Josh. xiii. 19). It has not been identified.

ZAR'HITES.—1. A family of Simeon, descendants of Zerah (Numb. xxvi. 13). See ZERAH, 2.—2. A family of Judah, descended from Zarah or Zerah (20; Josh. vii. 17; 1 Chron. xxvii. 11, 13). See ZARAH.

ZAR'TANAH (cooling) (1 Kings iv. 12). See ZEREDA.

ZAR'THAN (id.) (1 Kings vii. 46). See ZEREDA.

ZATH'OE (1 Esdr. viii. 32).

ZAT'THU (a sprout). One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 14).

ZAT'TU (id.). One whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 8; Neh. vii. 13). Several of this family had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 27). Probably Zattu and Zathu are identical.

ZAVAN (unquiet) (1 Chron. i. 42). See ZAAYAN.

ZA'ZA (plenty?). A descendant of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 33).

ZEAL. An earnest temper which may spring from either commendable or imperfect and evil motives. It is often ascribed to God (2 Kings xix. 31; Isai. ix. 7, xxxvii. 32; Ezek. v. 13). And men are sometimes commended for the zeal they show, when it is an enlightened zeal, and evinces itself in exertions for God's glory (Numb. xxv. 11-13; 2 Cor. vii. 11, ix. 2). But sometimes zeal for God is assumed as a cloak for selfishness, as in the case of Jehu (2 Kings x. 16), who desired to gain the crown of Israel, but 'took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord' (31). Ignorant or misdirected zeal may incline men even to persecute the church and true servants of Christ (Rom. x. 2; Phil. iii. 6). Zeal, to be a Christian grace, must be grounded on right principles, directed to a right end, and must not be a mere transient emotion (Gal. iv. 18).

ZEALOTS. A name given to a sect or faction of the Jews. It originated with Judas the Galilean or the Gaulanite (Acts v. 37), who headed an insurrection: see JUDAS, 5. His followers, when he perished, were only dispersed, and were conspicuous afterwards under the name of Zealots. They were distinguished by a fearless desire for independence. They deemed the paying of tribute to the Romans a violation of the theocratic principle that God alone was the king of Israel. This principle they maintained against the Roman government, and made it the pretext of unrestrained violence; so that in the latter days of the Jewish polity the Zealots were no better than lawless brigands, carrying everywhere devastation and death. After the death of Judas and his sons they were headed by Eleazar, one of his descendants, and were often called Sicarii, from their use of the dagger, the Roman sica.

ZEBADI'AH (Jehovah gave).—1, 2. Two Benjamites of different families (1 Chron. viii. 15, 17).—3. Another, also it would seem a Benjamite, who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 7).—4. A Levite porter (xxvi. 2).—5. A son of Asahel, who succeeded his father in his military command (xxvii. 7).—6. One of the Levites whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 8).—7. Another person, ruler of the house of Judah under the same king (xix. 11).—8. One who joined the caravan of Ezra when proceeding to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 8).—9. A priest who married a foreign wife (x. 20).

ZE'BAH (slaundering, sacrifice). One of the kings of Midian, taken and put to death by Gideon (Judges viii. 5-21; Psal. lxxxiii. 11). See ZALMUNNA.

ZEB'A'IM (the roes). This is probably part of a man's name (Ezra ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59). See POCHERETH.

ZEB'EDEE (Jehovah gave). A Galilean fisherman, husband of Salome, and father of the two apostles James and John. He appears to have been a man of substance, as he had hired labourers in his business, and his wife was one of those who ministered to Jesus (Matt. iv. 21, x. 2, xx. 20, xxvi. 37, xxvii. 56; Mark i. 19, 20, iii. 17, x. 35; Luke v. 10; John xxi. 2). After the call of his sons by Jesus we hear no more of Zebedee himself. Possibly he did not live much longer.

ZEBINA (bought). One who had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 43).

ZEBO'IIM (roes?) (Gen. xiv. 2, 8). Another form of ZEBO'IM (id.). One of the cities in the vale of Siddim, destroyed with Admah, Sodom, and Gomorrah (Gen. x. 19; Dent. xxix. 23; Hos. xi. 8).

ZEBO'IM (hyenas). A town or place of Benjamin, standing in or near a valley or gorge (1 Sam. xiii. 18; Neh. xi. 34). Mr. Grove suggests Shuk ed-Dubb'a, a ravine between Jericho and Michmash, as the locality (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1819); but he has apparently overlooked the fact that Zeboim is coupled with Hadid, Neballat, Lod, and Ono, and was probably in a different direction.

ZEBU'DAH (given). The mother of Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiii. 36).

ZEBUL' (a habitation). The governor of Shechem for Abimelech (Judges ix. 28-41). He over-reached and ejected Gaal, apparently a Canaanite chief.

ZEBU'LONITE (Judges xii. 11, 12): see ZEBULUNITES.

ZEBU'LUN (a habitation). The sixth son of Jacob by his wife Leah, so called because after bearing her husband so many sons she trusted that he would live with her (Gen. xxx. 19, 20). Nothing is recorded of Zebulun's personal history, save that he had three sons, heads of the families of the tribe (xlv. 14; Numb. xxvi. 26); according to Jewish tradition, he was one of those whom Joseph presented to Pharaoh (Gen. xlvii. 2), Dan, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher being the others. The prophetic blessing of Jacob on Zebulun declared that he should dwell on the coast of the sea and the coast of ships, his border extending unto Zidon (xlix. 13); and this, as we shall see, was remarkably fulfilled in the location of the Zebulunites.

The tribe multiplied fast. At the first census in the wilderness they numbered 57,400 (Numb. i. 30, 31): their position in the encampment was to the east of the tabernacle (ii. 5, 6), and on march they followed third under the standard of Judah (x. 14-16). At the second census they had still further increased: they were then 60,500 (xxvi. 26, 27). In the blessing of Moses Issachar and Zebulun were conjoined, reference being made to their geographical position and its advantages, with the service they might render in inviting the heathen to offer sacrifice on God's holy mountain (Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19). Zebulun's lot was cast in the north-eastern districts of Palestine, between Asher and Naphtali on the north, and Issachar on the south. It is doubtful whether it touched the lake of Gennesaret eastward (Matt. iv. 13), but in the west it must have reached to Carmel, Kishon, and, if not to the Mediterranean, at least to the Phœnician territory denominated Zidon, from the mother-city. The frontier-line is described in Josh. xix. 10-16; but several of the cities there enumerated have not been identified (see Thornley Smith's Hist. of Joshua, chap. xv. p. 232: comp. Kalisch, Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 753; Thomson, The Land and the Book, pp. 425-428). Within the borders of this tribe lay Gittah-hepher or Gath-hepher, the birth-place of Jonah, and also certain towns most noted in our Saviour's history, such as Nazareth and Cana. Of the cities allotted from Zebulun to the Levites four are mentioned, Jokneam, Kartah, Dimnah, and Nahalal (Josh. xxi. 34, 35); but elsewhere there are said to be only two, Rimmon and Tabor (1 Chron. vi. 77); the original apportionment perhaps being afterwards changed.

The people of Zebulun, like many of their brethren, were slow to possess themselves of the whole of their inheritance (Judges i. 30). Still they appear to have been a brave and enterprising people. We find them joined with Naphtali under Barak (iv. 6, 10); and their prowess is celebrated in the song of Deborah (v. 18). And at a later period a large number of them, evidently experienced warriors, 50,000, joined David at Hebron (1 Chron. xii. 33). They applied themselves also to other pursuits. Dr. Kalisch says of this tribe: "It extensively engaged in commercial enterprises, venturing on distant sea-trade, and greatly enlarging its revenues and connections: the chief articles of their commerce seem to have been the costly purple-dyes prepared from the juice of the shell-fish, a source of wealth ascribed to Zebulun by later tradition also; besides which they may have applied themselves to the manufacture and exportation of glass. Their maritime expeditions compelled them, further, to study the arts and sciences indispensable for successful navigation: they thus at an early period acquired the reputation of literary accomplishment; and the poet sang of them (Judges v. 14): "from Zebulun are the men who handle the pen of the scribe" (ubi supr., pp. 752, 753).

Besides the prophet Jonah, Zebulun gave birth to one, most probably two, eminent men. Elon the Zebulunite was an Israelitish judge (Judges xii. 11, 12); and Ibzan who preceded him was in all likelihood a native of the Zebulunite Beth-lehem (8-10).

David appointed a ruler over this tribe (1 Chron. xxvii. 19); but it is not distinctly stated under what commissariat department of Solomon it was comprehended (1 Kings iv. 7-19). The proximity of Zebulun to the idolatrous Phœnicians doubtless contributed to introduce into Israel the worship of the gods of the Zidonians. Retribution, however, overtook them: the northern tribes were first carried away captive into Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29); and, though divers of Zebulun humbled themselves and repaired to Jerusalem to keep the passover under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx. 11), yet ere long the eastern conqueror again appeared, and the land lay desolate. But God will not always afflict his people. Through Zebulun the footsteps of the Saviour trod; and the prophecy of Isaiah was fulfilled in the bright shining of gospel light upon those pleasant hills and fruitful valleys (Isai. ix. 1, 2; Matt. iv. 15, 16).

ZEBU'LUNITES (Numb. xxvi. 27). The descendants of Zebulun. But we find Zebulonite in Judges xii. 11, 12.

ZECHARIAH (whom Jehovah remembers).—1. A Reubenite chief (1 Chron. v. 7).—2. A Levite, one of the porters (ix. 21), apparently identical with the one mentioned in xxvi. 2, 14.—3. A Benjamite (ix. 37), called also Zacher (viii. 31).—4. A Levite who took part in the musical service (xv. 18, 20, xvi. 2); he may be identical with No. 2.—5. A priest who blew with the trumpet before the ark (xv. 24).—6. A Kohathite Levite (xxiv. 25).—7. A Merarite Levite (xxvi. 11).—8. The father of Iddo, ruler of Manasseh in Gilead (xxvii. 21).—9. One of the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 7).—10. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (xx. 14).—11. One of the sons of king Jehoshaphat (xxi. 2).—12. The son of the high priest Jehoiada. He bore his faithful witness against the declension of Joash, king of Judah, and his people, and was stoned at the command of the wretched king in the court of the house of the Lord (xxiv. 20-22). He may be the person whose death is referred to by our Lord. See ZACHARIAS, 1.—13. An eminent person said to have 'understanding in the visions of God' in the reign of Uzziah (xxvi. 5).—14. The father of Abi or Abijah, Hezekiah's mother (xxix. 1); he is called also Zachariah (2 Kings xviii. 2).—15. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chron. xxix. 13).—16. A Kohathite Levite, an overseer of those who repaired the temple in Josiah's reign (xxxiv. 12).—17. One, probably a noted priest, called 'ruler of the house of God' (xxxv. 8).—18. A prophet, the author of the book bearing his name. He is called sometimes the son of Iddo, sometimes the son of Barachiah, the son of Iddo (Ezra v. 1, vi. 14; Zech. i. 1, 7, vii. 1, 8); probably Barachiah was his father, Iddo his grandfather, or more distant ancestor. He seems to have been a young man at the time when he prophesied after the return from Babylon (ii. 4), stirring up the people, in conjunction with Haggai, to persevere in the re-building of the temple. We know nothing further with certainty of him; but see No. 27.—19, 20. Two of the chiefs who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 3, 11).—21. A distinguished person whom Ezra sent to summon some of the Levites to accompany his caravan (16). He might be one of the two named just before.—22. One who had married a foreign wife (x. 26).—23. One who stood by Ezra when expounding the law (Neh. viii. 4), possibly identical with No. 21.—24, 25. Two descendants of Judah; the first of the line of Perez or Pharez, the other a Shilonite or of the family of Shelah (xi. 4, 5).—26. A priest (12).—27. A priest, the representative or descendant of Iddo in the days of Joiakim (xii. 16). It is not unlikely that this may have been the prophet, No. 18.—28. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (35, 41). It is possible that some two or more of the names here mentioned separately, as of those living after the return from Babylon, may belong to the same individual.—29. A witness whom the prophet Isaiah took for his denunciation in regard to Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Isai. viii. 1, 2). Attempts have been made to identify him with some one of those bearing the same name who lived in the days of Hezekiah, Nos. 14, 15; but nothing certain can be affirmed in the matter.

ZECHARIAH, THE BOOK OF (520-518 B.C.). This book has been variously divided into two, three, or four parts. Perhaps we may most conveniently distribute it into two principal sections, in each of which are some minor divisions. I. The first comprises Zech. i.—viii., in which we have, after an introductory message (i. 1-6), 1. A series of visions with which the prophet was favoured on the night of the twenty-fourth day of the eleventh month in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (7—vi. 15), closely connected with the then state of Jerusalem, symbolically describing the four great Gentile empires, and exhibiting with comfortable promises the establishment of a new theocracy, also pointing onward to the future glory of God's people under the great King and Priest, the Messiah, who would purge away iniquity, and rule his chosen; 2. A response of happy prediction delivered in the fourth year of Darius to certain enquirers, showing how times of mourning for past calamities should be turned into seasons of joyful praise (vii., viii.). II. In the second part (ix.—xiv.) there are far-reaching prophecies, which leaving present events stretch onward to Messianic times. Included here we have, 1. The struggle of worldly powers with God's chosen people, while Messiah's office is foreshadowed (ix.—xi.); 2. The last onset of foes upon Jerusalem, the repentance of the Jewish nation for their rejection and murder of Messiah, with the final glory of that new kingdom of righteousness which shall never pass away (xii.—xiv.).

The general scope and purport of this book will be seen from the analysis just given. The more precise interpretation of the visions and symbolical actions must be sought in commentaries. Here it will suffice to say that the comparative calmness of the world under Persian rule is exhibited by lively representations, as confirming the holy purpose of Joshua and Zerubbabel in re-building the temple; and, though the severance of Judah from Israel is mentioned, and the rejection of Messiah foretold, yet enough is revealed of the Maccabean conquests and the still more extended victories of the church in the latter days to strengthen and comfort all those that waited for salvation in Israel.

The style of Zechariah is for the most part prosaic; though in the later chapters the grandeur of the subject has given an elevation to the language which describes it. Several references to Zechariah occur in the New Testament (e.g. Matt. xxi. 4, 5, xxvi. 31; John xii. 15, xix. 37).

But the most perplexing matter respecting this book is the doubt felt by many critics whether it is all by a single hand. It is no new thing indeed to find this question started, since there is scarcely one of the Old Testament writings which has not been supposed more or less a conglomerate of divers pieces. Different hypotheses have been propounded. The first part (Zech. i.—viii.) is pretty generally ascribed to the prophet of the restoration; but it is questioned whether the rest was not the work of one or two persons of an earlier date. It is suggested, too, that at least one such earlier prophet may have been named Zechariah, and hence his composition would be the more easily attached to what another Zechariah wrote.

Now against such theories there is, first, an enormous improbability. Certainly the Old Testament canon was complete no long time after the captivity, if not while Zechariah himself, possibly while those who had known him, were yet alive. It is hard indeed to imagine such men attributing the productions of those who lived centuries before to their own contemporary.

But it is urged that in the former chapters symbolism is largely employed, in the later ones scarcely at all; that in the two portions different introductory formulas appear; and that in the latter part of the book we do not find the prophet's name. It is said that the historical position in the two parts varies; that Damascus, Tyre, Philistia, Assyria, and Egypt are described in the latter portion as enemies of Judah; that the references to idolatry and false prophets be taken an earlier date than the exile (ix. 1-6, x. 2, 10, 11); and further that the continued existence of the monarchy is implied (xi. 6), with other indications which contradict the notion that the whole was written at the same time—also that the style of the latter sections is of a more archaic cast than that of the rest.

Doubtless these objections have considerable weight, and if established, be it remarked, would not impair the canonical authority of the book. But there must be set against them the facts that various expressions, not usual, occur in both portions (e.g. iii. 9, iv. 10, ix. 1, 8) with occasional Chaldaisms; that there are passages in both that bear a close resemblance (e.g. ii. 10, ix. 9); above all, that through the book there are allusions to previous writers, writers of the time of the exile, so that no part can be held posterior to that time. Thus comp. Zech. vii. 14 and ix. 8 with Ezek. xxxv. 7; Zech. ix. 5 with Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. xi. 3 with Jer. xii. 5, xlix. 19, l. 44; Zech. xi. 4, 5 with Jer. l. 6, 7, Ezek. xxxiv. 4; Zech. xiii. 8, 9 with Ezek. v. 12; Zech. xiv. 8 with Ezek. xlvii. 1-12; Zech. xiv. 10, 11 with Jer. xxxi. 38-40; Zech. xiv. 20, 21 with Ezek. xliii. 12, xlv. 9; to which other passages might be added. It is true indeed that some critics have imagined, conversely, that there were already-existing portions of Zechariah, which the prophets of the captivity imitated. But this can be put down only as conjecture; and it may be said that De Wette, who at one time believed the latter sections prior to the former, changed his opinion from the comparison of which some specimens have been given, and admitted that the whole book was most probably of the same date (Einleit., § 250 b). In addition surely Zech. ix. 12, x. 6, 9 pre-suppose the exile.

The greatest difficulty is in the reference of Matt. xxvii. 9, 10 to Jeremiah instead of to Zechariah. But Dr. Lee shows that the evangelist very probably desired to explain that Jeremiah was to be regarded as the original author of a well-known prediction, to whose words (Jer. xviii. 1-3, xix. 2) the expression of Zech. xi. 12, 13 refers; Jeremiah standing to Zechariah in the same relation as Ezekiel and Daniel to the Apocalypse (Insp. of Holy Script., lect. vii. pp. 339, 340).

On the whole, allowing due weight to the objections urged, it may be thought that the arguments in favour of the unity of the book preponderate. But doubtless many able conscientious critics reach a different conclusion.

Of commentaries on Zechariah, besides those on the minor prophets generally, Dr. Moore's Prophets of the Restoration, New York, 1856, may be mentioned. There is much curious matter in Kimchi's Commentary, translated by Dr. McCaul, 1837.

ZEDA'D (mountain-side). A place on the northern frontier of Palestine (Numb. xxxiv. 8; Ezek. xlvii. 15). It is probably the large village east of the road from Damascus to Hums, now called Sādā.

ZEDECHI'AS (1 Esdr. i. 46). King Zedekiah.

ZEDEKI'AH (justice of Jehovah).—1. A false prophet who encouraged Ahab to go against the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead, promising him victory, and by the symbol of artificial horns declaring that he should push the enemy till they were consumed. Zedekiah opposed the faithful prophet Micaiah, and struck him, with a taunting question. He was rebuked and told to expect a day of shame and fear (1 Kings xxii. 11, 24, 25; 2 Chron. xviii. 10, 23, 24). We are told nothing more of him.—2. The last king of Judah, son of Josiah. He was originally called Mattaniah; but his name was changed when Nebuchadnezzar placed him on the throne at the time that his nephew and predecessor Jehoiachin was carried captive to Babylon (2 Kings xxiv. 17; Jer. xxxvii. 1). Zedekiah's reign of eleven years, 598-588 B.C., was evil and unfortunate. He was unfaithful to his suzerain the king of Babylon, and thus brought destruction upon Judah and Jerusalem (2 Kings xxiv. 18-20; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11-13). His lot was cast in miserable times. The people were thoroughly demoralized. False prophets deceived them (Jer. xxviii., xxxvii. 19): the priests misled them (xx. 1-6); the great men were insubordinate (xxxiv. 8-11). And Zedekiah was too weak to exert his authority, and too careless to act on any but selfish and worldly motives. He had not the spirit to protect Jeremiah. He sent for the prophet secretly, listened to his remonstrances, but did not dare to decide according to the admonitions he received (xxxviii.). It would seem that Zedekiah in the fourth year of his reign went to Babylon (ii. 59), either at the command of Nebuchadnezzar or else to seek some alleviation of his oppressive vassalage (Winer, Bibl. R.W.B., art. 'Zedekias'; Ewald, Die Proph. des A. B., vol. ii. p. 505; comp., however, Henderson, Jeremiah, p. 266). In dependence upon Egypt (Jer. xxxvii. 5; Ezek. xvii. 15), and probably in correspondence with surrounding nations equally impatient of the Chaldean yoke (Jer. xxvii. 2, 3), Zedekiah rebelled against Babylon. But Nebuchadnezzar's armies overran his kingdom, and in spite of a temporary check by the movement of Pharaoh (xxxvii. 5) laid siege to Jerusalem. And two remarkable predictions were delivered against the unhappy prince, that he should be carried to Babylon (xxxiv. 3), and yet that he should not see it (Ezek. xii. 13). They were both exactly fulfilled: when Jerusalem was broken up, Zedekiah endeavoured to escape; but he was seized, and taken to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, where he received his sentence. His sons were slain before his eyes: then he was blinded, conveyed to Babylon, according to tradition condemned there to the labour of the mill, and there he died. Yet his end was not without honour. There were lamentations and burnings at his death (2 Kings xxv. 1-7; Jer. xxxiv. 4, 5, lii. 1-11). In one place we find Zedekiah called the 'son' of Jeconiah: the word is doubtless used with latitude for 'relative' or 'success-sor' (1 Chron. iii. 15, 16).—3. A false prophet put to death by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxix. 21, 22).—4. One of the princes of Jehoiakim's court (xxxvi. 12).

ZEE'B (wolf). A prince of Midian slain by the Ephraimites after the rout of the Midianitish army by Gideon (Judges vii. 25, viii. 3; Psal. lxxxiii. 11).

ZEE'B (id.). A wine-press, so called because the Ephraimites killed Zeeb there (Judges vii. 25).

ZE'LAH (a rib, the side). A town of Benjamin, where Saul and Jonathan were buried (Josh. xviii. 28; 2 Sam. xxi. 14).

ZE'LEK (fissure). One of David's warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 37; 1 Chron. xi. 39).

ZELOPH'EHAD (first fracture, perhaps first-born). A descendant of Manasseh, who died in the wilderness leaving only daughters. To them therefore his inheritance was allotted; and certain regulations were in consequence made in regard to heiresses (Numb. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1, 7, xxxvi. 2, 6, 10, 11; Josh. xvii. 3; 1 Chron. vii. 15).

ZELOTES. A surname of Simon, one of the apostles (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). It is equivalent to the Kanaites ('Canaanite' in our translation), an appellation by which the same apostle is elsewhere distinguished (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 18). He was probably before he followed Jesus one of the sect called Zealots. See SIMON, 2, ZEALOTS.

ZEL'ZAH (shade from the sun). A place by the border of Benjamin, not far from Rachel's sepulchre (1 Sam. x. 2).

ZEMARA'IM (double hill?).—1. A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 22), possibly es-Sumrah, four miles north of Jericho.—2. A hill or summit in mount Ephraim, which extended to or into the territory of Benjamin, and might have its name from No. 1 (2 Chron. xiii. 4).

ZEM'ARITES. Descendants of Canaan (Gen. x. 18; 1 Chron. i. 16). They were most probably located in Phœnicia or Syria; and a town named Simyra by ancient geographers has been supposed to be the place of their habitation. There are considerable ruins still called Sumrah, surrounded by fruit-tree plantations, about 24 miles south-east of Tortosa, near the river Eleutherus. Here it is possible Simyra stood. The Zemarites may have migrated southward and given name to Zemaraim.

ZEM'IRA (a song). A descendant of Benjamin (1 Chron. vii. 8).

ZENA'N (place of flocks) (Josh. xv. 37). See ZAANAN.

ZE'NAS (probably contracted from Zenodorus). A Christian, whom Paul, writing to Titus, wished him to bring with him (Tit. iii. 13). He was, we may imagine, a Hebrew jurist, or teacher of the law; to whom the title of his old profession was still given.

ZEPHANI'AH (Jehovah hides).—1. The second priest in the reign of Zedekiah, who had succeeded in the place of Jehoiada, and was slain at Riblah after Jerusalem was taken (2 Kings xxv. 18-21; Jer. xxi. 1, xxix. 25-29, xxxvii. 3, lii. 24-27).—2. A Kohathite Levite (1 Chron. vi. 36).—3. A prophet ordinarily reckoned as ninth in order of the minor prophets. Nothing more is certainly known of him than what can be gathered from his book. His ancestors are there enumerated for four generations (Zeph. i. 1); and in the genealogy given is found the name 'Hizkiah,' identical with that of Hezekiah king of Judah. It is probable that it was this sovereign from whom Zephaniah was descended; and the fact may explain the unusual length of the pedigree. The date would be found to agree very well, as Zephaniah prophesied in the days of Josiah. There is indeed a tradition that he was of the tribe of Simeon; but this is of no authority; more especially because it can hardly be doubted that he prophesied in Jerusalem. Of his death nothing is known.—4. The father of one or more persons concerned in a symbolical action (Zeph. vi. 10, 14).

ZEPHANI'AH, THE BOOK OF (628-620 B.C.). There is no division in this short book; and, though some have distinguished in it different prophecies, yet it seems best to consider it as a whole, one part in it apparently referring to another, as Zeph. iii. 8 to ii. 1-3. It might be written in order to give a kind of summary of the prophet's ministry. It commences with denunciations for the sin of Judah, for which repentance is enforced (i.); and, after threatenings against heathen nations (ii.), as also against Jerusalem, a time of blessed deliverance for Israel is predicted, to have its full accomplishment, doubtless, in the times of Messiah's happy reign (iii.).

It was said in a preceding article that Zephaniah prophesied in the time of Josiah: it is questioned whether earlier or later in that monarch's government. Perhaps we may most reasonably believe that it was between the twelfth and eighteenth years of his reign. Some progress might have been made in reformation; but it is evident, from i. 4, 5, 9, that many of the most flagrant abuses were yet unchecked. The chief argument urged against this view is that Josiah's sons were at that time too young to merit the denunciation of i. 8. But it by no means follows that 'the king's children' were the sons of Josiah. There were probably other princes then alive. The expression, however, might be used only generally; the prophet's purpose being to include all classes from the very highest. It may be added that the prediction against Nineveh (ii. 13-15) must have been delivered before that city was taken, the date of which is usually fixed as 625 B.C., the fifteenth year of Josiah. We may therefore place the career of Zephaniah somewhat prior to that of his contemporary Jeremiah. The desolation described as impending is that of the Chaldeans. Some, indeed, have believed that he alluded to the Scythian invasion; but that most probably did not touch the kingdom of Judah. Zephaniah predicts the same judgment as Jeremiah (Jer. iv.-xi.); where certainly the Chaldeans are meant.

The style of this prophet is dignified and energetic, yet not remarkable; he has poetic power, but of no high degree. He occasionally uses paronomasia, and has in several places adopted and repeated the utterances of other prophets. Commentaries on this book are included in those on the minor prophets.

ZEPHATH' (watch-tower) (Judges i. 17). See HORMAH.

ZEPHA'THAH (id.). A valley where king Asa met and overcame the Ethiopian host (2 Chron. xiv. 10). It was by Mareshah in the territory of Judah.

ZEPHI', ZEPHO' (id.). One of the sons of Eliphaz, Esau's son (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15; 1 Chron. i. 36).

ZEPHO'N (a looking-out). One of the sons of Gad (Numb. xxvi. 15), called also Ziphion (Gen. xlvi. 16).

ZEPHON'NITES. A family of Gad, descendants of Zephon (Numb. xxvi. 15).

ZER (mint). A city of Naphtali (Josh. xiv. 35).

ZER'AH (a rising of light).—1. A son of Reuel and grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 13, 17, 33; 1 Chron. i. 37, 44).—2. One of the sons of Judah by Tamar. See ZARAH.—3. A son of Simeon (Numb. xxvi. 13; 1 Chron. iv. 24), from whom one of the families of the tribe were called Zarhites. He is also named Zohar (Gen. xlvi. 10).—4. A Levite of the line of Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 21, 41).—5. An Ethiopian or Cushite king, who invaded Judah with a mighty host in the reign of Asa, and was entirely defeated in the valley of Zephathah at Mareshah, the rout being so complete that the Jewish king pursued his foe to Gerar, and plundered all the cities round, which had doubtless been subjected by Zerah. The result of this battle to Asa was that, having seen the hand of God assisting him, he carried out a fuller reformation, and had his power augmented by many who fell to him from other tribes (2 Chron. xiv. 9-15, xv.). There is every reason to believe that Zerah is identical with Osorkon, or Osorthon, of the twenty-second Egyptian dynasty. There were more than one of the name; and scholars differ whether Zerah was Osorkon I. or II.

ZERAHI'AH (whom Jehovah caused to be born).—1. A priest of the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. vi. 6, 51; Ezra vii. 4).—2. One whose son headed a party who returned from Babylon with Ezra (viii. 4).

ZE'RED (exuberant growth, sc. of trees). A stream that flowed through a valley in the territory of Moab on the east of the Dead sea (Deut. ii. 13, 14), also called Zared (Numb. xxi. 12). According to Robinson it is the modern Wady el-Ahsi; but others would identify it with some other wady.

ZERE'DA, ZEREDA'THAH (cooling). A town of Ephraim in the plain of the Jordan, the birth-place of Jeroboam I. (1 Kings xi. 26; 2 Chron. iv. 17). Possibly it may be identical with Zaretan (Josh. iii. 16), Zererath (Judges vii. 22), Zartanah (1 Kings iv. 12), Zarthan (vii. 46). But Zarthan was not far from Beth-shan. See, however, Miss Corboux in Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp. 384, 385, who would place it east of the Jordan.

ZERE'RATH (probably a corruption of Zereda) (Judges vii. 22). See ZEREDA.

ZE'RESH (gold). The wife of Haman (Esth. v. 10, 14, vi. 13).

ZE'RETH (splendour). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 7).

ZERI' (probably for Izri) (1 Chron. xxv. 8). See IZRI.

ZEROR' (a bundle, or purse). A Benjamite, one of Saul's ancestors (1 Sam. ix. 1).

ZERU'AH (leprous). The mother of Jeroboam I. (1 Kings ix. 26).

ZERUB'BABEL (begotten in Babylon). An eminent descendant of the royal line of David, born, as his name indicates, in Babylon during the captivity. He is generally called in scripture the son of Salathiel or Shealtiel (Hagg. i. 1; Matt. i. 12). Elsewhere, however, he is said to be the son of Pedaiiah, the brother or son of Salathiel (1 Chron. iii. 17-19). Perhaps he might be, according to a common usage of the word 'son,' Salathiel's grandson, or reckoned as his son, though really his nephew, by virtue of the levirate law. Zerubbabel, termed in Persian Sheshbazzar (Ezra i. 8, 11, v. 14, 16), was the leader of the Jews who returned from captivity under the decree of Cyrus (ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7, xii. 1). He, in conjunction with the high priest Joshua, erected an altar (Ezra iii. 2), and began to re-build the temple (8). The mixed people that inhabited Samaria desired to associate themselves with the Jews; but Zerubbabel refused their advances (iv. 2, 3); on which by their intrigues at the Persian court the work was suspended. Ultimately, however, in the reign of Darius Hystaspis, renewed permission was obtained for building; and therefore, encouraged by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, Zerubbabel resumed his labours, and completed the holy house (Ezra v. 2; Hagg. i. 12, 14, ii. 2, 4; Zech. iv. 6, 10). He appears to have been provincial governor under the Persian rule (Neh. xii. 47), and to have typically represented his divine descendant (Hagg. ii. 20-23).

Nothing further is related of Zerubbabel in scripture: the story of him in the Apocrypha (1 Esdr. iv. 13-63) is undeserving of credit. He is called Zorobabel in the New Testament (Matt. i. 12, 13; Luke iii. 27).

ZERU'IAH (clef, wounded). The mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel (1 Sam. xxvi. 6; 1 Chron. ii. 16). She was therefore sister to David and to Abigail. Abigail, however, is said to have been daughter of Nahash (2 Sam. xvii. 25). See JESSE, NAHASH, 2.

ZE'THAM (olive-tree). A Levite (1 Chron. xxiii. 8; xxvi. 22).

ZE'THAN (id.). A Benjamite chieftain (1 Chron. vii. 10).

ZE'THAR (star). One of seven chamberlains or eunuchs at the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

ZI'A (motion). A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 13).

ZI'BA (statue). A servant of the house of Saul, who apprised David that Mephibosheth, Jonathan's son, was living, and who was appointed by David to administer Saul's family-property for the benefit of Mephibosheth (2 Sam. ix.). In the rebellion of Absalom Ziba joined David with provisions, and reported that Mephibosheth was hoping, in the tumults of the time, to be called to his grandfather's throne. David, therefore, bestowed all his property on Ziba (xvi. 1-4). On David's return to his capital Ziba was with him; and then Mephibosheth appeared, and complained that he had been slandered by his servant. The king did not, however, seem altogether to admit his excuse, for he divided the estate between him and Ziba (xix. 17, 24-30). See MEPHIBOSHETH.

ZIB'EON (died). A son of Seir the Horite, called a Hivite (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 14, 20, 24, 29; 1 Chron. i. 38, 40).

ZIB'IA (a roe). A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 9).

ZIB'IAH (id.). The mother of Jehoash or Joash king of Judah (2 Kings xii. 1; 2 Chron. xxiv. 1).

ZICH'RI (remembered, renowned).—1. A Levite, son of Izhar (Exod. vi. 21). In many editions the name is incorrectly printed Zithri.—2, 3, 4. Three Benjamite chiefs (1 Chron. viii. 19, 23, 27).—5. A Levite, son of Asaph (ix. 15); in Neh. xi. 17 he appears to be called Zabdai.—6. A Levite, descended from Moses (1 Chron. xxvi. 25).—7. A Reubenite, father of the ruler of Reuben in David's time (xxvii. 16).—8. The father of one of Jehoshaphat's captains (2 Chron. xvii. 16).—9. One whose son Jehoiaada associated with him in making Joash king (xxiii. 1).—10. An Ephraimite who in a war between Pekah and Ahaz slew the king of Judah's son, and some of his high officers (xxviii. 7).—11. A Benjamite whose son was overseer at Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. xi. 9).—12. A priest in the days of Joiakim (xii. 17).

ZID'DIM (the sides). A city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35), possibly Hattin at the foot of the noted hill so called.

ZIDKI'JAH (justice of Jehovah). One who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 1). His name appears immediately after that of Nehemiah.

ZI'DON (a fishery) (Gen. xlix. 13; Josh. xi. 8, xix. 28, where Zidon-rabbah, marg.; Judges i. 31, xviii. 28; 1 Kings xvii. 9; Jer. xvii. 4; Ezek. xxviii. 21; Zech. ix. 2, and elsewhere). See SIDON.

ZIDO'NIANS (Judges x. 12, xviii. 7; 1 Kings xi. 1, 5, 33, xvi. 31; 1 Chron. xxii. 4; Ezek. xxxii. 30). Inhabitants of Zidon. See SIDONIANS.

ZIF (brightness, beauty, q. d. flower-month) (1 Kings vi. 1, 37). See MONTH.

ZI'HA (dry).—1. One whose descendants, Nethinim, returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 43; Neh. vii. 46).—2. A person, perhaps the representative or descendant of No. 1, who was a ruler of the Nethinim (xi. 21).

ZI'IM (Isai. xlii. 21, marg., xxxiv. 14, marg.). This word, from a root signifying dryness, means inhabitants of the desert, both men, as 'they that dwell in the wilderness' (Psal. lxxii. 9; and perhaps Isai. xxiii. 13), and animals, various kinds of wild beasts (Psal. lxxiv. 14; Isai. xlii. 21, xxxiv. 14; Jer. l. 39).

ZIK'LAG (out-pouring of a fountain?). A city in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 31) afterwards allotted to Simeon (xix. 5), but still held by the Philistines. Achish king of Gath gave it to David while living in the Philistine country (1 Sam. xxvii. 6); 'wherefore,' it is added, 'Ziklag pertaineth unto the kings of Judah unto this day,' that is, it was re-incorporated with Judah, becoming probably the special demesne of the sovereign, instead of returning to Simeon. Ziklag is generally mentioned afterwards in connection with David (1 Sam. xxx. 1, 14, 26; 2 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. xii. 1, 20). It was inhabited after the return from the captivity (Neh. xi. 28). There is some uncertainty as to its position; but in all probability it may be identified with the ruined site 'Astağ or Kaslağ. See Wilton, The Negeb, pp. 206-209.

ZIL'LAH (shade). One of the wives of Lamech of the line of Cain (Gen. iv. 19, 22, 23).

ZIL'PAH (a dropping). The handmaid of Leah, whom she gave as a concubine to Jacob. Her sons were Gad and Asher (Gen. xxix. 24, xxx. 9, 10, 12, xxxv. 26, xxxvii. 2, xli. 18).

ZIL'THAI (shadow, i.e. protection, of Jehovah).—1. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 20).—2. A chieftain of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 20).

ZIM'MAH (mischievous).—1. A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 20, 42).—2. A Gershonite Levite: perhaps the same person as No. 1 is intended (2 Chron. xxix. 12).

ZIM'РАН (sung, celebrated in song). One of the sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chron. i. 32). Probably the Zamereni, a tribe in the interior of Arabia, were descended from him.

ZIM'RI (id.).—1. A Simeonite chief slain by Phinehas for his open sin with a Midianitish woman (Numb. xxv. 14).—2. A captain under Elah king of Israel, who conspired against his master, and slew him in Tirzah. Zimri ascended the throne, and destroyed all the house of Baasha; but he reigned only seven days. For the soldiery made Omri king, who marched against Tirzah; and Zimri, finding resistance vain, shut himself in the palace, fired it, and perished 928 B.C. (1 Kings xvi. 9-20). His fate served to point a sarcasm of Jezebel against Jehu, as he, having slain two kings, was entering Jezreel (2 Kings ix. 31).—3. A descendant of Judah, of the family of Zerah (1 Chron. ii. 6). He is the person called Zabdai in Josh. vii. 1, 17, 18.—4. One of Saul's posterity (1 Chron. viii. 36, ix. 42).

ZIM'RI (id.). Some place or district whose kings are threatened (Jer. xxv. 25). It has been supposed to be Zabram, a city between Mecca and Medina; but, as Kalisch observes, it is mentioned with Elam and Media, and is clearly distinguished from Arabia (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 474).

ZIN (a low palm-tree). A part of the Arabian desert on the southern frontier of Palestine (Numb. xiii. 21, 22, xxxiv. 3), adjoining the territory of Judah (Josh. xv. 1, 3), and on the west of Idumea, wherein Kadesh lay (Numb. xx. 1, xxvii. 14, xxxiii. 36). But Kadesh was in the wilderness of Paran (xiii. 26), which extended to the Elanitic gulf; consequently Zin was a part (the northern part) of Paran, the district stretching from the Ghor south-westward in high masses of rock, but sinking down towards Jebel el-Helal. It must be distinguished from the wilderness of Sin. Mr. Wilton considers Zin the eastern portion of Wady Murreh (The Negeb, p. 129).

ZI'NA (ornament?). (1 Chron. xxiii. 10). See ZIZAH.

ZI'ON (dry, sunny mount). The strong citadel of Jerusalem, or upper city, retained by the Jebusites till the reign of David, by whom it was stormed, and hence called 'the city of David' (2 Sam. v. 6-9; 1 Chron. xi. 4-7). The height of Zion above the level of the Mediterranean is 2537 feet. See JERUSALEM. An endeavour has been made to identify Zion with the temple-hill. But there are two objections which seem fatal to the theory. Solomon is said to have brought the ark out of Zion, when conveying it to the temple (1 Kings viii. 1). The one, then, must have been apart from the other. Again, Zion was to be 'ploughed as a field' (Mic. iii. 12). This prophecy has not been fulfilled with the temple-hill: it has been with that generally considered Zion.

Zion, called in the New Testament Sion, is used symbolically to express the glorious habitation of the redeemed (Heb. xii. 22; Rev. xiv. 1).

ZI'OR (smallness). A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 54).

ZIPH (a flowing). One of the posterity of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 16).

ZIPH (id.).—1. A city enumerated among those in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 24). Mr. Wilton supposes the name an interpolation (The Negeb, pp. 85, 86).—2. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 55). The neighbouring district was the wilderness of Ziph, which David frequented when pursued by Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15, 24, xxvi. 2). It is probably this town that is intended in 1 Chron. ii. 42: it was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 8). A low hill three miles south of Hebron is called Zif; it is probably the site of the ancient town.

ZI'PHAH (id.). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 16).

ZI'PHIMS. The inhabitants of Ziph (Psal. liv. title).

ZI'PHION (a looking-out). One of the sons of Gad (Gen. xli. 16). He is called Zephon in Numb. xxvi. 15.

ZI'PHITES. The inhabitants of Ziph (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1).

ZI'PHRON (sweet odour). A city in the north of Palestine (Numb. xxxiv. 9), said (Porter, Handbook for Syria, vol. ii. p. 621) still to bear its ancient name. It lay south-eastward of Hamath, towards Palmyra.

ZI'PPOR (a little bird). The father of Balak king of Moab (Numb. xxii. 2, 4, 10, 16, xxiii. 18; Josh. xxiv. 9, xi. 25).

ZI'PPORAH (id. fem.). The daughter of the prince or priest of Midian married to Moses, to whom she bore two sons (Exod. ii. 21, 22). When Moses was commissioned to return to Egypt, and to stand before Pharaoh, he took Zipporah and his sons with him; but at their halting-place a mysterious event occurred in relation to the circumcising of his (probably) youngest child (iv. 20, 24-26). 'The blood of circumcision,' says Kalisch, 'confirmed the personal covenant; hence the boy was on the day when the rite was performed called "a bridegroom of blood"; and the resected foreskin, which was considered unclean, typified both the abnegation of lasciviousness, and, like the offering of the firstlings, the acknowledgment of God's sovereignty (Comm. on Old Test. Gen., p. 390). See MOSES. Zipporah seems then to have returned to her father; and it was not till after the deliverance of Israel that Jethro took her and her sons to join Moses in the wilderness (Exod. xviii. 1-6). We hear nothing subsequently of Zipporah: some have thought that she did not long survive, and that the 'Cushite,' in regard to whom Aaron and Miriam murmured, must have been another wife (Numb. xii. 1). But Cush had a wide signification and one born in the Arabian peninsula might be termed a Cushite.

ZITH'RI (protection of Jehovah). A Levite, son of Uzziel (Exod. vi. 22). The introduction of the name into the verse preceding is a mistake: see ZICHRI, 1.

ZIZ (a flower). A pass, probably not far from En-gedi, the modern 'Ain Jidy, where Jehoshaphat met the Moabites and others who were marching to attack him (2 Chron. xx. 16).

ZI'ZA (full breast, abundance).—1. A chieftain of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 37).—2. One of the sons of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 20).

ZI'ZAH (id.). A Gershonite Levite (1 Chron. xxiii. 11). He is also (10) called, probably by corruption of the name, Zina.

ZO'AN (low region? place of departure?). A very ancient city of Lower Egypt, called by the Greeks Tanis; both the Hebrew and Greek names being derived from the same Egyptian word which has the meaning above given. Zoan, the Avaris of Egyptian history (see Smith's Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1855), was seated on the eastern side of the Tanitic arm of the Nile. We are told that it was built seven years later than Hebron (Numb. xiii. 22). It is further mentioned as having been 'the scene—at least the district around it, 'the field of Zoan'—of the marvellous deeds performed in order to the deliverance of Israel (Psal. lxxviii. 12, 43). Its importance appears by the way in which the prophets speak of it (Isal. xix. 11, 13, xxx. 4; Ezek. xxx. 14). Zoan was the chief town of a nome or province, and would seem to have been the metropolis of some (the 21st and 23rd) of the dynasties of Egyptian kings (Winer, Bibl. RWB., art. 'Zoan'). There are extensive ruins yet existing at a place called Sân or Zân, which are the remains of this great city (See Wilkinson, Handbook for Egypt, pp. 234-236).

ZO'AR (smallness). One of the five cities of the plain, originally called Bela (Gen. xiii. 10, xiv. 2, 8). When the other cities were destroyed, this was spared on Lot's intercession—it was but small, and it would give him shelter (ix. 20-30). Zoar was the limit of Moses' view in one direction (Deut. xxxiv. 3). It once belonged to Moab (Isal. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34); but in post-exilic times it was seized by the Arabs; and it probably formed part of the dominion of Aretas. Its position was according to some south-east of the Dead sea, where ruins have been noted by late travellers. But, though there must yet rest an uncertainty upon the matter, it is more probable that Zoar was at the northern end of the sea, on the eastern side. It was near Sodom, within a moderate walk, which Lot performed in a morning (Gen. xix. 15, 20, 23). The country round could be seen from a hill by Beth-el (xiii. 10), which (the information is obtained from an eye-witness) is not the case with the country about the southern part of the Dead sea; and, further, it was the 'plain of Jordan,' the Jordan valley, that Lot chose for his residence, an appellation which would not have been given to a district miles away from the river.

ZO'BA, ZO'BAH (station). One of the smaller kingdoms forming part of the land of Aram generally. When fully expressed it is Aram-zobah. It was on the north of Damascus, extending north-eastward, and comprehended the city Hamath; hence Hamath-zobah (2 Chron. viii. 3), to distinguish it from the more celebrated Hamath. The king of Zobah made war with Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 47), with David (2 Sam. viii. 3, 5, 12, x. 6, 8; 1 Chron. xviii. 3-9, xix. 6), and with Solomon (2 Chron. viii. 3). One of David's warriors is said to be the son of Nathan of Zobah (2 Sam. xxiii. 36), and, if the title to Psal. lx. may be trusted, that psalm was composed during David's wars with this northern kingdom. See HADAREZER.

ZO'BEBAH (the slow-moving). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8).

ZO'HAR (whiteness).—1. The father of Ephron the Hittite (Gen. xxiii. 8, xxv. 9).—2. One of the sons of Simeon (xvi. 10; Exod. vi. 15). He is also called Zerah (Numb. xxvi. 13; 1 Chron. iv. 24).

ZO'HELETH (serpent). A stone by Enrogel (1 Kings i. 9).

ZO'HETH (the meaning is uncertain). One of the descendants of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

ZO'PHAH (a cruse). A chief of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 35, 36).

ZO'PHAI (honey-comb). A Kohathite Levite, ancestor of the prophet Samuel (1 Chron. vi. 26).—He is called also Zuph (35).

ZO'PHAR (sparrow). One of Job's friends, called 'the Naamathite.' His speeches are rough and cutting; and he has less to say than the other interlocutors (Job ii. 11, xi. 1, xx. 1, xlii. 9).

ZO'PHIM (watchers). A place whither Balak brought Balaam, from which only the extremity of the Israelitish camp could be seen (Numb. xxiii. 14). Mr. Grove suggests its identity with Mizpah of Moab (Dict. of the Bible, vol. iii. p. 1860). See also RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM, or RAMAH, 2.

ZO'RAH (nest of hornets, hornets' town). A town first assigned to Judah, afterwards to Dan (Josh. xix. 41). It was the birth-place of Samson (Judges xiii. 2, 25, xvi. 31); the place, too, from which the marauding expedition set out which seized Laish (xviii. 2, 8, 11). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 10), and inhabited after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 29); where it is called Zareah, also Zoreah (Josh. xv. 33). It still exists as a secluded mountain-village named Sur'a.

ZO'RATHITES (1 Chron. iv. 2). A family of Judah, possibly inhabitants of Zorah.

ZO'REAH (Josh. xv. 33). See ZORAH.

ZORITES (1 Chron. ii. 54). Probably inhabitants of Zorah.

ZOROBABEL (Matt. i. 12, 13; Luke iii. 27). See ZERUBBABEL. This form occurs also in the Apocrypha (e. g. 1 Esdr. iv. 13).

ZU'AR (smallness). The father of Nethaneel prince of Issachar (Numb. i. 8, ii. 5, vii. 18, 23, x. 15).

ZUPH (flag, sedge) (Deut. i. 1, marg.). See SEA, RED SEA.

ZUPH (honey-comb). A Levite (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 35). See ZOPHAI.

ZUPH (id.). The district about RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM, which see (1 Sam. ix. 5). Possibly the name is preserved in Söba, five or six miles west of Jerusalem.

ZUR (a rock, shape, form).—1. One of the Midianitish kings or chiefs slain by the Israelites (Numb. xxv. 15, xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21).—2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 30, ix. 36).

ZU'RIEL (my rock is God). The chief of the families of Merari (Numb. iii. 35).

ZURISHAD'DAI (my rock is the Almighty). The father of Shelumiel prince of Simeon (Numb. i. 6, ii. 12, vii. 37, 41, x. 19).

ZU'ZIMS (sprouting, or restless). A tribe overcome by Chedor-laomer and his confederates (Gen. xiv. 5). They were of the same class as the Rephaim, an ancient people occupying the country between the Arnon and the Jabbok, and were no doubt identical with the Zamzummim, whom the Ammonites extirpated in a later age (Deut. ii. 20, 21). The position of their principal town Ham is unknown. Miss Corbaux believes that the Zuzim were that branch of the Rephaim who took the lead in the wars with Egypt. She considers them the same with the Shasu, whence Shittim had its name: see SHITTIM. But for details of her theory her own dissertation must be consulted (Journ. of Sac. Lit., Jan. 1852, pp 375-392).

A Concise Chronological Table.

A.M.	B.C.	B.C.
The creation of the world . . . . .	4004	Jerusalem taken, and Judah carried captive to Babylon . . . . . 583
1056 Birth of Noah . . . . .	2948	Return of the Jews under Zerubabel, according to the decree of Cyrus . . . . . 536
1656 The deluge . . . . .	2348	The second temple begun . . . . . 534
2008 Birth of Abraham . . . . .	1996	Death of Cyrus . . . . . 529
2083 Call of Abraham . . . . .	1921	Accession of Darius Hystaspis to the throne of Persia . . . . . 521
2108 Birth of Isaac . . . . .	1896	The temple finished and dedicated . . . . . 516
2168 Birth of Jacob . . . . .	1836	Accession of Xerxes . . . . . 485
2298 Jacob and his family go into Egypt	1706	Artaxerxes Longimanus . . . . . 465
2433 Birth of Moses . . . . .	1571	Ezra proceeds to Jerusalem . . . . . 458
2513 The Exodus . . . . .	1491	Nehemiah appointed governor . . . . . 445
2514 The giving of the law . . . . .	1490	Death of Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia, and end of the Persian monarchy . . . . . 330
2553 Entrance of Israel into Canaan . . . . .	1451	Death of Alexander the Great . . . . . 323
2561 Death of Joshua . . . . .	1443	Antiochus Epiphanes obtains the crown of Syria . . . . . 175
2909 Appointment of Saul as king . . . . .	1095	The statue of Jupiter Olympius set up in the temple at Jerusalem . . . . . 167
2949 Accession of David as king of Judah . . . . .	1055	The temple cleansed by Judas Maccabeus . . . . . 164
2990 Accession of Solomon . . . . .	1015	Jonathan succeeds his brother Judas Maccabeus . . . . . 161
3001 Dedication of the temple . . . . .	1004	Simon succeeds Jonathan . . . . . 143
The dates hitherto given are according to the computation of abp. Ussher: for leading dates according to other chronologers see CHRONOLOGY, p. 167; and for the perplexed period of the rule of judges see JUDGES, p. 503, where Mr. Browne's dates will be found. The table will proceed according to Winer: for a slightly-different computation in regard to the reigns of the monarchs of Israel and Judah see KING, p. 510: also small differences may be observed in the dates adopted from other authorities in some articles in this work.
Accession of Rehoboam . . . . .	B.C.	John Hyrcanus succeeds . . . . . 135
Jeroboam I. . . . .	975	Aristobulus I., first of the Asmonean family who had the title of king . . . . . 107
Abijam . . . . .	957	Alexander Jannæus . . . . . 70
Asa . . . . .	955	Alexandra . . . . . 107
Nadab . . . . .	954	Hyrcanus II. . . . . 70
Baasha . . . . .	953	Aristobulus II. . . . . 69
Elah . . . . .	930	Hyrcanus restored . . . . . 63
Zimri . . . . .	928	Antigonus . . . . . 40
Omri, Tibni } . . . . .	918	Herod called the Great declared king of Judea by the Roman senate . . . . . 21
Ahab . . . . .	914	Herod begins to re-build the temple at Jerusalem . . . . . 6?
Jehoshaphat . . . . .	897	Birth of JESUS CHRIST . . . . . 4
Ahaziah of Israel . . . . .	896	Death of Herod . . . . . A.D.
Joram of Israel . . . . .	896	Archelaus dethroned . . . . . 6
Joram of Judah . . . . .	889	Insurrection of Judas of Galilee . . . . . 14
Ahaziah of Judah . . . . .	885	Death of Augustus Cæsar . . . . . 25
Jehu . . . . .	884	Pontius Pilate procurator of Judea . . . . . 31?
Athaliah . . . . .	878	The crucifixion . . . . .
Joash of Judah . . . . .	856	The dates of the birth and death of our Lord are variously given by different chronologers: see JESUS, pp. 463, 469.
Jehoahaz of Israel . . . . .	840	Pontius Pilate deprived of his government . . . . . 36
Joash of Israel . . . . .	838	Death of Tiberius: Caligula becomes emperor . . . . . 37
Amaziah . . . . .	825	Conversion of St. Paul . . . . . 38
Jeroboam II. . . . .	809	For the chronology of St. Paul's life see PAUL, pp. 670, 671
Uzziah . . . . .	809	Herod Antipas banished to Gaul . . . . . 39
Zachariah . . . . .	772	Claudius emperor . . . . . 41
Shallum . . . . .	771	Death of Herod Agrippa I. . . . . 44
Menahem . . . . .	760	Council of apostles and elders in Jerusalem . . . . . 51
Pekahiah . . . . .	758	Felix procurator of Judea . . . . . 52
Pekah . . . . .	741	Death of Claudius; Nero emperor . . . . . 54
Jotham . . . . .	729	Felix removed, Festus procurator . . . . . 60
Ahaz . . . . .	725	Vespasian emperor . . . . . 68
Hoshea . . . . .	725	Jerusalem taken by Titus . . . . . 70
Hezekiah . . . . .	721
Samaria taken, and the kingdom of Israel ended . . . . .	721
Accession of Manasseh . . . . .	696
Amon . . . . .	641
Josiah . . . . .	639
Jehoahaz of Judah . . . . .	609
Jehoiakim . . . . .
Jehoiachin . . . . .
Zedekiah . . . . .	598

[MARCH 1872.]

GENERAL LIST OF WORKS

PUBLISHED BY

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN, AND CO.

PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

History, Politics, Historical Memoirs, &c.

The HISTORY of ENGLAND from the Fall of Wolsey to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada. By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE, M.A. late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.

LIBRARY EDITION, 12 VOLS. 8vo. price £8 18s.

CABINET EDITION, in 12 vols. crown 8vo. price 72s.

The HISTORY of ENGLAND from the Accession of James II. By Lord MACAULAY.

STUDENT'S EDITION, 2 vols. crown 8vo. 12s.

PEOPLE'S EDITION, 4 vols. crown 8vo. 16s.

CABINET EDITION, 8 vols. post 8vo. 48s.

LIBRARY EDITION, 5 vols. 8vo. £4.

LORD MACAULAY'S WORKS. Complete and Uniform Library Edition. Edited by his Sister, Lady TREVELYAN. 8 vols. 8vo. with Portrait, price £5 5s. cloth, or £8 8s. bound in tree-calf by Rivière.

VARIETIES of VICE-REGAL LIFE. By Sir WILLIAM DENISON, K.C.B. late Governor-General of the Australian Colonies, and Governor of Madras. With Two Maps. 2 vols. 8vo. 28s.

On PARLIAMENTARY GOVERNMENT in ENGLAND; its Origin, Development, and Practical Operation. By ALPHEUS TODD, Librarian of the Legislative Assembly of Canada. 2 vols. 8vo. price £1 17s.

A HISTORICAL ACCOUNT of the NEUTRALITY of GREAT BRITAIN DURING the AMERICAN CIVIL WAR. By MOUNTAGUE BERNARD, M.A. Chichele Professor of International Law and Diplomacy in the University of Oxford. Royal 8vo. 16s.

The CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY of ENGLAND, since the Accession of George III. 1760—1860. By Sir THOMAS ERSKINE MAX, C.B. Second Edition. Cabinet Edition, thoroughly revised. 3 vols. crown 8vo. price 13s.

The HISTORY of ENGLAND, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1865. By C. D. YONGE, B.A. Regius Professor of Modern History in Queen's College, Belfast. New Edition. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.

- The OXFORD REFORMERS—John Colet, Erasmus, and Thomas More; being a History of their Fellow-work. By FREDERIC SEEBOHM. Second Edition, enlarged. 8vo. 14s.
- LECTURES on the HISTORY of ENGLAND, from the earliest Times to the Death of King Edward II. By WILLIAM LONGMAN. With Maps and Illustrations. 8vo. 15s.
- The HISTORY of the LIFE and TIMES of EDWARD the THIRD. By WILLIAM LONGMAN. With 9 Maps, 8 Plates, and 16 Woodcuts. 2 vols. 8vo. 28s.
- The OVERTHROW of the GERMANIC CONFEDERATION by PRUSSIA in 1866. By Sir ALEXANDER MALET, Bart. K.C.B. With 5 Maps. 8vo. 18s.
- WATERLOO LECTURES; a Study of the Campaign of 1815. By Colonel CHARLES C. CHESNEY, R.E. late Professor of Military Art and History in the Staff College. New Edition. 8vo. with Map, 10s. 6d.
- HISTORY of the REFORMATION in EUROPE in the Time of Calvin. By J. H. MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ, D.D. VOLS. I. and II. 8vo. 28s. VOL. III. 12s. VOL. IV. 16s. VOL. V. price 16s.
- ROYAL and REPUBLICAN FRANCE. A Series of Essays reprinted from the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and British and Foreign Reviews. By HENRY REEVE, C.B. D.C.L. 2 vols. 8vo. price 21s.
- CHAPTERS from FRENCH HISTORY; St. Louis, Joan of Arc, Henri IV. with Sketches of the Intermediate Periods. By J. H. GURNEY, M.A. New Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 6s. 6d.
- MEMOIR of POPE SIXTUS the FIFTH. By Baron HUBNER. Translated from the Original in French, with the Author's sanction, by HUBERT E. H. JERNINGHAM. 2 vols. 8vo. price 24s. [Nearly ready.]
- IGNATIUS LOYOLA and the EARLY JESUITS. By STEWART ROSE. New Edition, revised. 8vo. with Portrait, price 16s.
- The HISTORY of GREECE. By C. THIRLWALL, D.D. Lord Bishop of St. David's. 8 vols. fcp. 8vo. price 28s.
- GREEK HISTORY from Themistocles to Alexander, in a Series of Lives from Plutarch. Revised and arranged by A. H. CLOUGH. New Edition. Fcp. with 44 Woodcuts, 6s.
- CRITICAL HISTORY of the LANGUAGE and LITERATURE of Ancient Greece. By WILLIAM MURE, of Caldwell. 5 vols. 8vo. £3 9s.
- The TALE of the GREAT PERSIAN WAR, from the Histories of Herodotus. By GEORGE W. COX, M.A. New Edition. Fcp. 3s. 6d.
- HISTORY of the LITERATURE of ANCIENT GREECE. By Professor K. O. MÜLLER. Translated by the Right Hon. Sir GEORGE CORNEWALL LEWIS, Bart. and by J. W. DONALDSON, D.D. 3 vols. 8vo. 21s.
- HISTORY of the CITY of ROME from its Foundation to the Sixteenth Century of the Christian Era. By THOMAS H. DYER, LL.D. 8vo. with 2 Maps, 15s.
- The HISTORY of ROME. By WILLIAM IHNE. English Edition, translated and revised by the Author. VOLS. I. and II. 8vo. price 30s.
- HISTORY of the ROMANS under the EMPIRE. By the Very Rev. C. MERIVALE, D.C.L. Dean of Ely. 8 vols. post 8vo. 48s.

- The FALL of the ROMAN REPUBLIC; a Short History of the Last Century of the Commonwealth. By the same Author. 12mo. 7s. 6d.
- THREE CENTURIES of MODERN HISTORY. By CHARLES DUKE YONGE, B.A. Regius Professor of Modern History and English Literature in Queen's College, Belfast. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- A STUDENT'S MANUAL of the HISTORY of INDIA, from the Earliest Period to the Present. By Colonel MEADOWS TAYLOR, M.R.A.S. M.R.I.A. Crown 8vo. with Maps, 7s. 6d.
- The HISTORY of INDIA, from the Earliest Period to the close of Lord Dalhousie's Administration. By JOHN CLARK MARSHMAN. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 22s. 6d.
- INDIAN POLITY: a View of the System of Administration in India. By Lieutenant-Colonel GEORGE CHESNEY, Fellow of the University of Calcutta. New Edition, revised; with Map. 8vo. price 21s.
- RECREATIONS of an INDIAN OFFICIAL. By Lieutenant-Colonel MALLESON, Bengal Staff Corps; Guardian to His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore. Crown 8vo. price 12s. 6d.
- HOME POLITICS; being a consideration of the Causes of the Growth of Trade in relation to Labour, Pauperism, and Emigration. By DANIEL GRANT. 8vo. 7s.
- REALITIES of IRISH LIFE. By W. STEUART TRENCH, Land Agent in Ireland to the Marquess of Lansdowne, the Marquess of Bath, and Lord Digby. Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. price 6s.
- The STUDENT'S MANUAL of the HISTORY of IRELAND. By MARY F. CUSACK, Author of 'The Illustrated History of Ireland, from the Earliest Period to the Year of Catholic Emancipation.' Crown 8vo. price 6s.
- CRITICAL and HISTORICAL ESSAYS contributed to the Edinburgh Review. By the Right Hon. LORD MACAULAY.
- CABINET EDITION, 4 vols. post 8vo. 24s. | LIBRARY EDITION, 3 vols. 8vo. 36s.
PEOPLE'S EDITION, 2 vols. crown 8vo. 8s. | STUDENT'S EDITION, 1 vol. cr. 8vo. 6s.
- SAINT-SIMON and SAINT-SIMONISM; a chapter in the History of Socialism in France. By ARTHUR J. BOOTH, M.A. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- HISTORY of EUROPEAN MORALS, from Augustus to Charlemagne. By W. E. H. LECKY, M.A. Second Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. price 28s.
- HISTORY of the RISE and INFLUENCE of the SPIRIT of RATIONALISM in EUROPE. By W. E. H. LECKY, M.A. Cabinet Edition, being the Fourth. 2 vols. crown 8vo. price 16s.
- GOD in HISTORY; or, the Progress of Man's Faith in the Moral Order of the World. By Baron BUNSEN. Translated by SUSANNA WINKWORTH; with a Preface by Dean STANLEY. 3 vols. 8vo. price 42s.
- ESSAYS on HISTORICAL TRUTH. By ANDREW BISSET. 8vo. 14s.
- The HISTORY of PHILOSOPHY, from Thales to Comte. By GEORGE HENRY LEWES. Fourth Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 32s.
- An HISTORICAL VIEW of LITERATURE and ART in GREAT BRITAIN from the Accession of the House of Hanover to the Reign of Queen Victoria. By J. MURRAY GRAHAM, M.A. 8vo. price 14s.
- The MYTHOLOGY of the ARYAN NATIONS. By GEORGE W. COX, M.A. late Scholar of Trinity College, Oxford, Joint-Editor, with the late Professor Brande, of the Fourth Edition of 'The Dictionary of Science Literature, and Art,' Author of 'Tales of Ancient Greece' &c. 2 vols. 8vo. 28s.

- HISTORY of CIVILISATION in England and France, Spain and Scotland. By HENRY THOMAS BUCKLE. (New Edition of the entire Work, with a complete INDEX. 3 vols. crown 8vo. 24s.
- HISTORY of the CHRISTIAN CHURCH, from the Ascension of Christ to the Conversion of Constantine. By E. BURTON, D.D. late Prof. of Divinity in the Univ. of Oxford. New Edition. Fcp. 3s. 6d.
- SKETCH of the HISTORY of the CHURCH of ENGLAND to the Revolution of 1688. By the Right Rev. T. V. SHORT, D.D. Lord Bishop of St. Asaph. Eighth Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- HISTORY of the EARLY CHURCH, from the First Preaching of the Gospel to the Council of Nicæa. A.D. 325. By ELIZABETH M. SEWELL, Author of 'Amy Herbert.' New Edition, with Questions. Fcp. 4s. 6d.
- The ENGLISH REFORMATION. By F. C. MASSINGBERD, M.A. Chancellor of Lincoln and Rector of South Ormsby. Fourth Edition, revised. Fcp. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- MAUNDER'S HISTORICAL TREASURY; comprising a General Introductory Outline of Universal History, and a series of Separate Histories. Latest Edition, revised and brought down to the Present Time by the Rev. GEORGE WILLIAM COX, M.A. Fcp. 6s. cloth, or 9s. 6d. calf.
- HISTORICAL and CHRONOLOGICAL ENCYCLOPÆDIA; comprising Chronological Notices of all the Great Events of Universal History: Treaties, Alliances, Wars, Battles, &c.; Incidents in the Lives of Eminent Men and their Works, Scientific and Geographical Discoveries, Mechanical Inventions, and Social, Domestic, and Economical Improvements. By the late B. B. WOODWARD, B.A. and W. L. R. CATES. 1 vol. 8vo. [Nearly ready.

Biographical Works.

- AUTOBIOGRAPHY of JOHN MILTON; or, Milton's Life in his own Words. By the Rev. JAMES J. G. GRAHAM, M.A. Crown 8vo. price 5s.
- A MEMOIR of DANIEL MACLISE, R.A. By W. JUSTIN O'DRISCOLL, M.R.I.A. Barrister-at-Law. With Portrait and Woodcuts. Post 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- MEMOIRS of the MARQUIS of POMBAL; with Extracts from his Writings and from Despatches in the State Papers Office. By the CONDE DA CARNOTA. New Edition. 8vo. price 7s.
- LORD GEORGE BENTINCK; a Political Biography. By the Right Hon. BENJAMIN DISRAELI, M.P. Eighth Edition, revised, with a New Preface. Crown 8vo. price 6s.
- REMINISCENCES of FIFTY YEARS. By MARK BOYD. Post 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- The LIFE of ISAMBARD KINGDOM BRUNEL, Civil Engineer. By ISAMBARD BRUNEL, B.C.L. of Lincoln's Inn; Chancellor of the Diocese of Ely. With Portrait, Plates, and Woodcuts. 8vo. 21s.
- The ROYAL INSTITUTION; its Founder and its First Professors. By Dr. BENCE JONES, Honorary Secretary. Post 8vo. price 12s. 6d.
- The LIFE and LETTERS of FARADAY. By Dr. BENCE JONES, Secretary of the Royal Institution. Second Edition, thoroughly revised. 2 vols. 8vo. with Portrait, and Eight Engravings on Wood, price 23s.

- FARADAY as a DISCOVERER. By JOHN TYNDALL, LL.D. F.R.S.
Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Royal Institution. New and Cheaper Edition, with Two Portraits. Fcp. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- RECOLLECTIONS of PAST LIFE. By Sir HENRY HOLLAND, Bart.
M.D. F.R.S. &c. Physician-in-Ordinary to the Queen. Second Edition.
Post 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- A GROUP of ENGLISHMEN (1795 to 1815); Records of the Younger Wedgwoods and their Friends, embracing the History of the Discovery of Photography. By ELIZA METEYARD. 8vo. price 16s.
- The LIFE and LETTERS of the Rev. SYDNEY SMITH. Edited by his Daughter, Lady HOLLAND, and Mrs. AUSTIN. New Edition, complete in One Volume. Crown 8vo. price 6s.
- SOME MEMORIALS of R. D. HAMPDEN, Bishop of Hereford.
Edited by his Daughter, HENRIETTA HAMPDEN. With Portrait. 8vo. price 12s.
- The LIFE and TRAVELS of GEORGE WHITEFIELD, M.A. By JAMES PATERSON GLEDSTONE. 8vo. price 14s.
- LEADERS of PUBLIC OPINION in IRELAND; Swift, Flood, Grattan, O'Connell. By W. E. H. LECKY, M.A. New Edition, revised and enlarged. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- DICTIONARY of GENERAL BIOGRAPHY; containing Concise Memoirs and Notices of the most Eminent Persons of all Countries, from the Earliest Ages to the Present Time. Edited by W. L. R. CATES. 8vo. 21s.
- LIVES of the QUEENS of ENGLAND. By AGNES STRICKLAND.
Library Edition, newly revised; with Portraits of every Queen, Autographs, and Vignettes. 8 vols. post 8vo. 7s. 6d. each.
- LIFE of the DUKE of WELLINGTON. By the Rev. G. R. GLEIG, M.A. Popular Edition, carefully revised; with copious Additions. Crown 8vo. with Portrait, 5s.
- HISTORY of MY RELIGIOUS OPINIONS. By J. H. NEWMAN, D.D.
Being the Substance of Apologia pro Vita Sua. Post 8vo. 6s.
- The PONTIFICATE of PIUS the NINTH; being the Third Edition of 'Rome and its Ruler,' continued to the latest moment and greatly enlarged. By J. F. MAGUIRE, M.P. Post 8vo. with Portrait, 12s. 6d.
- FATHER MATHEW: a Biography. By JOHN FRANCIS MAGUIRE, M.P. for Cork. Popular Edition, with Portrait. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- FELIX MENDELSSOHN'S LETTERS from Italy and Switzerland, and Letters from 1833 to 1847, translated by Lady WALLACE. New Edition, with Portrait. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 5s. each.
- MEMOIRS of SIR HENRY HAVELOCK, K.C.B. By JOHN CLARK MARSHMAN. Cabinet Edition, with Portrait. Crown 8vo. price 3s. 6d.
- VICISSITUDES of FAMILIES. By Sir J. BERNARD BURKE, C.B.
Ulster King of Arms. New Edition, remodelled and enlarged. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 21s.
- ESSAYS in ECCLESIASTICAL BIOGRAPHY. By the Right Hon. Sir J. STEPHEN, LL.D. Cabinet Edition, being the Fifth. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- MAUNDER'S BIOGRAPHICAL TREASURY. Thirteenth Edition, reconstructed, thoroughly revised, and in great part rewritten; with about 1,000 additional Memoirs and Notices, by W. L. R. CATES. Fcp. 6s.

LETTERS and LIFE of FRANCIS BACON, including all his Occasional Works. Collected and edited, with a Commentary, by J. SPEDDING. Trin. Coll. Cantab. VOLS. I. and II. 8vo. 24s. VOLS. III. and IV. 24s. VOL. V. price 12s.

Criticism, Philosophy, Polity, &c.

- The INSTITUTES of JUSTINIAN; with English Introduction, Translation, and Notes. By T. C. SANDARS, M.A. Barrister, late Fellow of Oriel Coll. Oxon. New Edition. 8vo. 15s.
- SOCRATES and the SOCRATIC SCHOOLS. Translated from the German of Dr. E. ZELLER, with the Author's approval, by the Rev. OSWALD J. REICHEL, B.C.L. and M.A. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- The STOICS, EPICUREANS, and SCEPTICS. Translated from the German of Dr. E. ZELLER, with the Author's approval, by OSWALD J. REICHEL, B.C.L. and M.A. Crown 8vo. price 14s.
- The ETHICS of ARISTOTLE, illustrated with Essays and Notes. By Sir A. GRANT, Bart. M.A. LL.D. Second Edition, revised and completed. 2 vols. 8vo. price 28s.
- The NICOMACHEAN ETHICS of ARISTOTLE newly translated into English. By R. WILLIAMS, B.A. Fellow and late Lecturer of Merton College, and sometime Student of Christ Church, Oxford. 8vo. 12s.
- ELEMENTS of LOGIC. By R. WHATELY, D.D. late Archbishop of Dublin. New Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d. crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- Elements of Rhetoric. By the same Author. New Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d. crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- English Synonymes. By E. JANE WHATELY. Edited by Archbishop WHATELY. 5th Edition. Fcp. 3s.
- BACON'S ESSAYS with ANNOTATIONS. By R. WHATELY, D.D. late Archbishop of Dublin. Sixth Edition. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- LORD BACON'S WORKS, collected and edited by J. SPEDDING, M.A. R. L. ELLIS, M.A. and D. D. HEATH. New and Cheaper Edition. 7 vols. 8vo. price £3 13s. 6d.
- The SUBJECTION of WOMEN. By JOHN STUART MILL. New Edition. Post 8vo. 5s.
- On REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT. By JOHN STUART MILL. Third Edition. 8vo. 9s. Crown 8vo. 2s.
- On LIBERTY. By JOHN STUART MILL. Fourth Edition. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d. Crown 8vo. 1s. 4d.
- PRINCIPLES of POLITICAL ECONOMY. By the same Author. Seventh Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s. Or in 1 vol. crown 8vo. 5s.
- A SYSTEM of LOGIC, RATIOCINATIVE and INDUCTIVE. By the same Author. Seventh Edition. Two vols. 8vo. 25s.
- UTILITARIANISM. By JOHN STUART MILL. Fourth Edition. 8vo. 5s.
- DISSERTATIONS and DISCUSSIONS, POLITICAL, PHILOSOPHICAL, and HISTORICAL. By JOHN STUART MILL. Second Edition, revised. 3 vols. 8vo. 36s.

- EXAMINATION of Sir W. HAMILTON'S PHILOSOPHY, and of the Principal Philosophical Questions discussed in his Writings. By JOHN STUART MILL. Third Edition. 8vo. 16s.
- An OUTLINE of the NECESSARY LAWS of THOUGHT: a Treatise on Pure and Applied Logic. By the Most Rev. W. THOMSON, Lord Archbishop of York, D.D. F.R.S. Ninth Thousand. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.
- The ELEMENTS of POLITICAL ECONOMY. By HENRY DUNNING MACLEOD, M.A. Barrister-at-Law. 8vo. 16s.;
- A Dictionary of Political Economy; Biographical, Bibliographical, Historical, and Practical. By the same Author. VOL. I. royal 8vo. 30s.
- A COLONIST on the COLONIAL QUESTION. By JOHN MATHEWS, of Toronto, Canada. Post 8vo. price 6s.
- The ELECTION of REPRESENTATIVES, Parliamentary and Municipal; a Treatise. By THOMAS HARE, Barrister-at-Law. Third Edition, with Additions. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- SPEECHES of the RIGHT HON. LORD MACAULAY, corrected by Himself. People's Edition, crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Lord Macaulay's Speeches on Parliamentary Reform in 1831 and 1832. 16mo. 1s.
- A DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. By R. G. LATHAM, M.A. M.D. F.R.S. Founded on the Dictionary of Dr. SAMUEL JOHNSON, as edited by the Rev. H. J. TODD, with numerous Emendations and Additions. In Four Volumes, 4to. price £7.
- THESAURUS of ENGLISH WORDS and PHRASES, classified and arranged so as to facilitate the Expression of Ideas, and assist in Literary Composition. By P. M. ROGET, M.D. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- LECTURES on the SCIENCE of LANGUAGE. By F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A. &c. Foreign Member of the French Institute. Sixth Edition. 2 vols. crown 8vo. price 16s.
- CHAPTERS on LANGUAGE. By FREDERIC W. FARRAR, F.R.S. Head Master of Marlborough College. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.
- MANUAL of ENGLISH LITERATURE, Historical and Critical. By THOMAS ARNOLD, M.A. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- THREE CENTURIES of ENGLISH LITERATURE. By CHARLES DUKE YONGE, Regius Professor of Modern History and English Literature in Queen's College, Belfast. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- SOUTHEY'S DOCTOR, complete in One Volume. Edited by the Rev. J. W. WARTER, B.D. Square crown 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- HISTORICAL and CRITICAL COMMENTARY on the OLD TESTAMENT; with a New Translation. By M. M. KALISCH, Ph.D. VOL. I. Genesis, 8vo. 18s. or adapted for the General Reader, 12s. VOL. II. Exodus, 15s. or adapted for the General Reader, 12s. VOL. III. Leviticus. PART I. 15s. or adapted for the General Reader, 8s. VOL. IV. Leviticus, PART II. 15s. or adapted for the General Reader, 8s.
- A HEBREW GRAMMAR, with EXERCISES. By M. M. KALISCH, Ph.D. PART I. Outlines with Exercises, 8vo. 12s. 6d. KEY, 5s. PART II. Exceptional Forms and Constructions, 12s. 6d.

- A LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY. By JOHN T. WHITE, D.D. Oxon. and J. E. RIDDLE, M.A. Oxon. Third Edition, revised. 2 vols. 4to. pp. 2,128, price 42s. cloth.
- White's College Latin-English Dictionary (Intermediate Size), abridged for the use of University Students from the Parent Work (as above). Medium 8vo. pp. 1,048, price 18s. cloth.
- White's Junior Student's Complete Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary. New Edition. Square 12mo. pp. 1,058, price 12s.
- Separately { The ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY, price 5s. 6d.
The LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY, price 7s. 6d.
- An ENGLISH-GREEK LEXICON, containing all the Greek Words used by Writers of good authority. By C. D. YONGE, B.A. New Edition. 4to. 21s.
- Mr. YONGE'S NEW LEXICON, English and Greek, abridged from his larger work (as above). Revised Edition. Square 12mo. 8s. 6d.
- A GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. Compiled by H. G. LIDDELL, D.D. Dean of Christ Church, and R. SCOTT, D.D. Dean of Rochester. Sixth Edition. Crown 4to. price 36s.
- A Lexicon, Greek and English, abridged from LIDDELL and SCOTT'S Greek-English Lexicon. Fourteenth Edition. Square 12mo. 7s. 6d.
- A SANSKRIT-ENGLISH DICTIONARY, the Sanskrit words printed both in the original Devanagari and in Roman Letters. Compiled by T. BENFEY, Prof. in the Univ. of Göttingen. 8vo. 52s. 6d.
- WALKER'S PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Thoroughly revised Editions, by B. H. SMART. 8vo. 12s. 16mo. 6s.
- A PRACTICAL DICTIONARY of the FRENCH and ENGLISH LANGUAGES. By L. CONTANSEAU. Fourteenth Edition. Post 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- Contanseau's Pocket Dictionary, French and English, abridged from the above by the Author. New Edition, revised. Square 18mo. 3s. 6d.
- NEW PRACTICAL DICTIONARY of the GERMAN LANGUAGE; German-English and English-German. By the Rev. W. L. BLACKLEY, M.A. and Dr. CARL MARTIN FRIEDLÄNDER. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- The MASTERY of LANGUAGES; or, the Art of Speaking Foreign Tongues Idiomatically. By THOMAS PRENDERGAST, late of the Civil Service at Madras. Second Edition. 8vo. 6s.

---

Miscellaneous Works and Popular Metaphysics.

- The ESSAYS and CONTRIBUTIONS of A. K. H. B., Author of 'The Recreations of a Country Parson.' Uniform Editions:—
- Recreations of a Country Parson. By A. K. H. B. FIRST and SECOND SERIES, crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.
- The COMMON-PLACE PHILOSOPHER in TOWN and COUNTRY. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. price 3s. 6d.
- Leisure Hours in Town; Essays Consolatory, Æsthetical, Moral, Social, and Domestic. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

- The AUTUMN HOLIDAYS of a COUNTRY PARSON; Essays contributed to Fraser's Magazine and to Good Words. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- The Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson. By A. K. H. B. FIRST and SECOND SERIES, crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.
- Critical Essays of a Country Parson, selected from Essays contributed to Fraser's Magazine. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Sunday Afternoons at the Parish Church of a Scottish University City. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Lessons of Middle Age; with some Account of various Cities and Men. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Counsel and Comfort spoken from a City Pulpit. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. price 3s. 6d.
- Changed Aspects of Unchanged Truths; Memorials of St. Andrews Sundays. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Present-day Thoughts; Memorials of St. Andrews Sundays. By A. K. H. B. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- SHORT STUDIES on GREAT SUBJECTS. By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE, M.A. late Fellow of Exeter Coll. Oxford. 2 vols. 8vo. price 24s.
- LORD MACAULAY'S MISCELLANEOUS WRITINGS:—
LIBRARY EDITION. 2 vols. 8vo. Portrait, 21s.
PEOPLE'S EDITION. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- LORD MACAULAY'S MISCELLANEOUS WRITINGS and SPEECHES.
STUDENT'S EDITION, in crown 8vo. price 6s.
- The REV. SYDNEY SMITH'S MISCELLANEOUS WORKS; including his Contributions to the Edinburgh Review. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- The Wit and Wisdom of the Rev. Sydney Smith; a Selection of the most memorable Passages in his Writings and Conversation. 16mo. 3s. 6d.
- The ECLIPSE of FAITH; or, a Visit to a Religious Sceptic. By HENRY ROGERS. Twelfth Edition. Fcp. 5s.
- Defence of the Eclipse of Faith, by its Author; a rejoinder to Dr. Newman's Reply. Third Edition. Fcp. 3s. 6d.
- Selections from the Correspondence of R. E. H. Greyson. By the same Author. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- FAMILIES of SPEECH, Four Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain. By the Rev. F. W. FARRAR, M.A. F.R.S. Head Master of Marlborough College. Post 8vo. with Two Maps, 5s. 6d.
- CHIPS from a GERMAN WORKSHOP; being Essays on the Science of Religion, and on Mythology, Traditions, and Customs. By F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A. &c. Foreign Member of the French Institute. 3 vols. 8vo. £2.
- UEBERWEG'S SYSTEM of LOGIC and HISTORY of LOGICAL DOCTRINES. Translated, with Notes and Appendices, by T. M. LINDSAY, M.A. F.R.S.E. Examiner in Philosophy to the University of Edinburgh. 8vo. price 16s.
- ANALYSIS of the PHENOMENA of the HUMAN MIND. By JAMES MILL. A New Edition, with Notes, Illustrative and Critical, by ALEXANDER BAIN, ANDREW FINDLATER, and GEORGE GROTE. Edited, with additional Notes, by JOHN STUART MILL. 2 vols. 8vo. price 28s.

- An INTRODUCTION to MENTAL PHILOSOPHY, on the Inductive Method. By J. D. MORELL, M.A. LL.D. 8vo. 12s.
- ELEMENTS of PSYCHOLOGY, containing the Analysis of the Intellectual Powers. By the same Author. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- The SECRET of HEGEL: being the Hegelian System in Origin, Principle, Form, and Matter. By J. H. STIRLING. 2 vols. 8vo. 28s.
- SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON; being the Philosophy of Perception: an Analysis. By J. H. STIRLING. 8vo. 5s.
- The SENSES and the INTELLECT. By ALEXANDER BAIN, M.D. Professor of Logic in the University of Aberdeen. Third Edition. 8vo. 15s.
- MENTAL and MORAL SCIENCE: a Compendium of Psychology and Ethics. By the same Author. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE and INDUCTIVE. By the same Author. In Two PARTS, crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. Each Part may be had separately:—
PART I. Deduction, 4s. PART II. Induction, 6s. 6d.
- TIME and SPACE; a Metaphysical Essay. By SHADWORTH H. HODGSON. (This work covers the whole ground of Speculative Philosophy.) 8vo. price 16s.
- The Theory of Practice; an Ethical Inquiry. By the same Author. (This work, in conjunction with the foregoing, completes a system of Philosophy.) 2 vols. 8vo. price 24s.
- The PHILOSOPHY of NECESSITY; or, Natural Law as applicable to Mental, Moral, and Social Science. By CHARLES BRAY. Second Edition. 8vo. 9s.
- A Manual of Anthropology, or Science of Man, based on Modern Research. By the same Author. Crown 8vo. price 6s.
- On Force, its Mental and Moral Correlates. By the same Author. 8vo. 5s.
- The DISCOVERY of a NEW WORLD of BEING. By GEORGE THOMSON. Post 8vo. price 6s.
- A TREATISE on HUMAN NATURE; being an Attempt to Introduce the Experimental Method of Reasoning into Moral Subjects. By DAVID HUME. Edited, with Notes, &c. by T. H. GREEN, Fellow, and T. H. GROSE, late Scholar, of Balliol College, Oxford. [In the press.]
- ESSAYS MORAL, POLITICAL, and LITERARY. By DAVID HUME. By the same Editors. [In the press.]

Astronomy, Meteorology, Popular Geography, &c.

- OUTLINES of ASTRONOMY. By Sir J. F. W. HERSCHEL, Bart. M.A. Eleventh Edition, with 9 Plates and numerous Diagrams. Square crown 8vo. price 12s.
- ESSAYS on ASTRONOMY. By RICHARD A. PROCTOR, B.A. Hon. Sec. R.A.S. (Dedicated, by permission, to the Astronomer Royal.) 8vo. with 10 Plates and 20 Wood Engravings, price 12s.

- The SUN; RULER, LIGHT, FIRE, and LIFE of the PLANETARY SYSTEM. By RICHARD A. PROCTOR, B.A. F.R.A.S. With 10 Plates (7 coloured) and 107 Figures on Wood. Crown 8vo. 14s.
- OTHER WORLDS THAN OURS; the Plurality of Worlds Studied under the Light of Recent Scientific Researches. By the same Author. Second Edition, with 14 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- SATURN and its SYSTEM. By the same Author. 8vo. with 14 Plates, 14s.
- SCHELLEN'S SPECTRUM ANALYSIS, in its application to Terrestrial Substances and the Physical Constitution of the Heavenly Bodies. Translated by JANE and C. LASSELL; edited, with Notes, by W. HUGGINS, LL.D. F.R.S. With 13 Plates (6 coloured) and 223 Woodcuts. 8vo. price 28s.
- A NEW STAR ATLAS, for the Library, the School, and the Observatory, in Twelve Circular Maps (with Two Index Plates). Intended as a Companion to 'Webb's Celestial Objects for Common Telescopes.' With a Letterpress Introduction on the Study of the Stars, illustrated by 9 Diagrams. By RICHARD A. PROCTOR, B.A. Hon. Sec. R.A.S. Crown 8vo. 5s.
- CELESTIAL OBJECTS for COMMON TELESCOPES. By the Rev. T. W. WEBB, M.A. F.R.A.S. Third Edition, revised, with a large Map of the Moon, and several Woodcuts. 16mo. 7s. 6d.
- NAVIGATION and NAUTICAL ASTRONOMY (Practical, Theoretical, Scientific) for the use of Students and Practical Men. By J. MERRIFIELD, F.R.A.S and H. EVERS. 8vo. 14s.
- DOVE'S LAW of STORMS, considered in connexion with the Ordinary Movements of the Atmosphere. Translated by R. H. SCOTT, M.A. T.C.D. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- A GENERAL DICTIONARY of GEOGRAPHY, Descriptive, Physical, Statistical, and Historical: forming a complete Gazetteer of the World. By A. KEITH JOHNSTON, LL.D. F.R.G.S. Revised Edition. 8vo. 31s. 6d.
- A MANUAL of GEOGRAPHY, Physical, Industrial, and Political. By W. HUGHES, F.R.G.S. With 6 Maps. Fcp. 7s. 6d.
- MAUNDER'S TREASURY of GEOGRAPHY, Physical, Historical, Descriptive, and Political. Edited by W. HUGHES, F.R.G.S. Revised Edition, with 7 Maps and 16 Plates. Fcp. 6s. cloth, or 9s. 6d. bound in calf.
- The PUBLIC SCHOOLS ATLAS of MODERN GEOGRAPHY. In 31 Maps, exhibiting clearly the more important Physical Features of the Countries delineated, and Noting all the Chief Places of Historical, Commercial, or Social Interest. Edited, with an Introduction, by the Rev. G. BUTLER, M.A. Imp. 4to. price 3s. 6d. sewed, or 5s. cloth.

Natural History and Popular Science.

- TEXT-BOOKS of SCIENCE, MECHANICAL and PHYSICAL. Edited by T. M. GOODEVE, M.A. The following may now be had, price 3s. 6d. each:—
1. GOODEVE'S Mechanism.
  2. BLOXAM'S Metals.
  3. MILLER'S Inorganic Chemistry.
  4. GRIFFIN'S Algebra and Trigonometry.
  5. WATSON'S Plane and Solid Geometry.
  6. MAXWELL'S Theory of Heat.
  7. MERRIFIELD'S Technical Arithmetic and Mensuration.

- ELEMENTARY TREATISE on PHYSICS, Experimental and Applied. Translated and edited from GANOT's Eléments de Physique (with the Author's sanction) by E. ATKINSON, Ph.D. F.C.S. New Edition, revised and enlarged; with a Coloured Plate and 726 Woodcuts. Post 8vo. 15s.
- NATURAL PHILOSOPHY for GENERAL READERS and YOUNG PERSONS; being a Course of Physics divested of Mathematical Formulæ, expressed in the language of daily life, and illustrated with Explanatory Figures, familiarly elucidating the Principles and Facts. Translated and edited from GANOT's Cours de Physique, with the Author's sanction, by E. ATKINSON, Ph.D. F.C.S. Crown 8vo. with Woodcuts, price 7s. 6d.
- SOUND: a Course of Eight Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain. By JOHN TYNDALL, LL.D. F.R.S. New Edition, crown 8vo. with Portrait of M. Chladni and 169 Woodcuts, price 9s.
- HEAT a MODE of MOTION. By Professor JOHN TYNDALL, LL.D. F.R.S. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. with Woodcuts, 10s. 6d.
- RESEARCHES in MOLECULAR PHYSICS by MEANS of RADIANT HEAT; a Series of Memoirs collected from the Philosophical Transactions. By JOHN TYNDALL, LL.D. F.R.S. 1 vol. 8vo. [In the press.]
- RESEARCHES on DIAMAGNETISM and MAGNE-CRYSTALLIC ACTION; including the Question of Diamagnetic Polarity. By the same Author. With 6 Plates and many Woodcuts. 8vo. price 14s.
- NOTES of a COURSE of SEVEN LECTURES on ELECTRICAL PHENOMENA and THEORIES, delivered at the Royal Institution, A.D. 1870. By Professor TYNDALL. Crown 8vo. 1s. sewed, or 1s. 6d. cloth.
- NOTES of a COURSE of NINE LECTURES on LIGHT delivered at the Royal Institution, A.D. 1869. By the same Author. Crown 8vo. price 1s. sewed, or 1s. 6d. cloth.
- FRAGMENTS of SCIENCE. By JOHN TYNDALL, LL.D. F.R.S. Third Edition. 8vo. price 14s.
- LIGHT SCIENCE for LEISURE HOURS; a Series of Familiar Essays on Scientific Subjects, Natural Phenomena, &c. By R. A. PROCTOR, B.A. F.R.A.S. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- LIGHT: Its Influence on Life and Health. By FORBES WINSLOW, M.D. D.C.L. Oxon. (Hon.). Fcp. 8vo. 6s.
- A TREATISE on ELECTRICITY, in Theory and Practice. By A. DE LA RIVE, Prof. in the Academy of Geneva. Translated by C. V. WALKER F.R.S. 3 vols. 8vo. with Woodcuts, £3 13s.
- The CORRELATION of PHYSICAL FORCES. By W. R. GROVE, Q.C. V.P.R.S. Fifth Edition, revised, and followed by a Discourse on Continuity. 8vo. 10s. 6d. The Discourse on Continuity, separately, 2s. 6d.
- VAN DER HOEVEN'S HANDBOOK of ZOOLOGY. Translated from the Second Dutch Edition by the Rev. W. CLARK, M.D. F.R.S. 2 vols. 8vo. with 24 Plates of Figures, 60s.
- Professor OWEN'S LECTURES on the COMPARATIVE ANATOMY and Physiology of the Invertebrate Animals. Second Edition, with 235 Woodcuts. 8vo. 21s.
- The COMPARATIVE ANATOMY and PHYSIOLOGY of the VERTEBRATE Animals. By RICHARD OWEN, F.R.S. D.C.L. With 1,472 Woodcuts. 3 vols. 8vo. £3 13s. 6d.

- The ORIGIN of CIVILISATION and the PRIMITIVE CONDITION of MAN; Mental and Social Condition of Savages. By Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart. M.P. F.R.S. Second Edition, with 25 Woodcuts. 8vo. price 16s.
- The PRIMITIVE INHABITANTS of SCANDINAVIA: containing a Description of the Implements, Dwellings, Tombs, and Mode of Living of the Savages in the North of Europe during the Stone Age. By SVEN NILSSON. With 16 Plates of Figures and 3 Woodcuts. 8vo. 18s.
- BIBLE ANIMALS; being a Description of every Living Creature mentioned in the Scriptures, from the Ape to the Coral. By the Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A. F.L.S. With about 100 Vignettes on Wood. 8vo. 21s.
- HOMES WITHOUT HANDS; a Description of the Habitations of Animals, classed according to their Principle of Construction. By the Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A. F.L.S. With about 140 Vignettes on Wood. 8vo. 21s.
- INSECTS AT HOME; a Popular Account of British Insects, their Structure, Habits, and Transformations. By the Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A. F.L.S. With upwards of 700 Illustrations engraved on Wood (1 coloured and 21 full size of page). 8vo. price 21s.
- STRANGE DWELLINGS; a description of the Habitations of Animals, abridged from 'Homes without Hands.' By the Rev. J. G. WOOD, M.A. F.L.S. With about 60 Woodcut Illustrations. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- A FAMILIAR HISTORY of BIRDS. By E. STANLEY, D.D. F.R.S. late Lord Bishop of Norwich. Seventh Edition, with Woodcuts. Fcp. 3s. 6d.
- The HARMONIES of NATURE and UNITY of CREATION. By Dr. GEORGE HARTWIG. 8vo. with numerous Illustrations, 18s.
- The SEA and its LIVING WONDERS. By the same Author. Third (English) Edition. 8vo. with many Illustrations, 21s.
- The TROPICAL WORLD. By Dr. GEO. HARTWIG. With 8 Chromoxylographs and 172 Woodcuts. 8vo. 21s.
- The SUBTERRANEAN WORLD. By Dr. GEORGE HARTWIG. With 3 Maps and about 80 Woodcuts, including 8 full size of page. 8vo. price 21s.
- The POLAR WORLD; a Popular Description of Man and Nature in the Arctic and Antarctic Regions of the Globe. By Dr. GEORGE HARTWIG. With 8 Chromoxylographs, 3 Maps, and 85 Woodcuts. 8vo. 21s.
- KIRBY and SPENCE'S INTRODUCTION to ENTOMOLOGY, or Elements of the Natural History of Insects. 7th Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s.
- MAUNDER'S TREASURY of NATURAL HISTORY, or Popular Dictionary of Zoology. Revised and corrected by T. S. COBBOLD, M.D. Fcp. with 900 Woodcuts, 6s. cloth, or 9s. 6d. bound in calf.
- The TREASURY of BOTANY, or Popular Dictionary of the Vegetable Kingdom; including a Glossary of Botanical Terms. Edited by J. LINDLEY, F.R.S. and T. MOORE, F.L.S. assisted by eminent Contributors. With 274 Woodcuts and 20 Steel Plates. Two Parts, fcp. 12s. cloth, or 19s. calf.
- The ELEMENTS of BOTANY for FAMILIES and SCHOOLS. Tenth Edition, revised by THOMAS MOORE, F.L.S. Fcp. with 154 Woodcuts, 2s. 6d.
- The ROSE AMATEUR'S GUIDE. By THOMAS RIVERS. Ninth Edition. Fcp. 4s.

- LOUDON'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA of PLANTS; comprising the Specific Character, Description, Culture, History, &c. of all the Plants found in Great Britain. With upwards of 12,000 Woodcuts. 8vo. 42s.
- MAUNDER'S SCIENTIFIC and LITERARY TREASURY. New Edition, thoroughly revised and in great part re-written, with above 1,000 new Articles, by J. Y. JOHNSON, Corr. M.Z.S. Fcp. 6s. cloth, or 9s. 6d. calf.
- A DICTIONARY of SCIENCE, LITERATURE, and ART. Fourth Edition, re-edited by W. T. BRANDE (the original Author), and GEORGE W. COX, M.A. assisted by contributors of eminent Scientific and Literary Acquirements. 3 vols. medium 8vo. price 63s. cloth.

Chemistry, Medicine, Surgery, and the Allied Sciences.

- A DICTIONARY of CHEMISTRY and the Allied Branches of other Sciences. By HENRY WATTS, F.R.S. assisted by eminent Contributors Complete in 5 vols. medium 8vo. £7 3s.
- Supplement; bringing the Record of Chemical Discovery down to the end of the year 1869; including also several Additions to, and Corrections of, former results which have appeared in 1870 and 1871. By HENRY WATTS, B.A. F.R.S. F.C.S. Assisted by eminent Scientific and Practical Chemists, Contributors to the Original Work. 8vo. price 31s. 6d.
- ELEMENTS of CHEMISTRY, Theoretical and Practical. By W. ALLEN MILLER, M.D. late Prof. of Chemistry, King's Coll. London. Fourth Edition. 3 vols. 8vo. £3. PART I. CHEMICAL PHYSICS, 15s. PART II. INORGANIC CHEMISTRY, 21s. PART III. ORGANIC CHEMISTRY, 24s.
- OUTLINES of CHEMISTRY; or, Brief Notes of Chemical Facts. By WILLIAM ODLING, M.B. F.R.S. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- A Course of Practical Chemistry, for the use of Medical Students. By the same Author. New Edition, with 70 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- Lectures on Animal Chemistry, delivered at the Royal College of Physicians in 1865. By the same Author. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.
- SELECT METHODS in CHEMICAL ANALYSIS, chiefly INORGANIC. By WILLIAM CROOKES, F.R.S. With 22 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo. price 12s. 6d.
- CHEMICAL NOTES for the LECTURE ROOM. By THOMAS WOOD, F.C.S. 2 vols. crown 8vo. I. on Heat &c. price 5s. II. on the Metals, 5s.
- The DIAGNOSIS, PATHOLOGY, and TREATMENT of DISEASES of Women; including the Diagnosis of Pregnancy. By GRALLY HEWITT, M.D. Second Edition, enlarged; with 116 Woodcut Illustrations. 8vo. 24s.
- On SOME DISORDERS of the NERVOUS SYSTEM in CHILDHOOD; being the Lumleian Lectures delivered before the Royal College of Physicians in March 1871. By CHARLES WEST, M.D. Crown 8vo. price 5s.
- LECTURES on the DISEASES of INFANCY and CHILDHOOD. By CHARLES WEST, M.D. &c. Fifth Edition, revised and enlarged. 8vo. 16s.

- A SYSTEM of SURGERY, Theoretical and Practical. In Treatises by Various Authors. Edited by T. HOLMES, M.A. &c. Surgeon and Lecturer on Surgery at St. George's Hospital, and Surgeon-in-Chief to the Metropolitan Police. Second Edition, thoroughly revised, with numerous Illustrations. 5 vols. 8vo. £5 5s.
- The SURGICAL TREATMENT of CHILDREN'S DISEASES. By T. HOLMES, M.A. &c. late Surgeon to the Hospital for Sick Children. Second Edition, with 9 Plates and 112 Woodcuts. 8vo. 21s.
- LECTURES on the PRINCIPLES and PRACTICE of PHYSIC. By Sir THOMAS WATSON, Bart. M.D. Fifth Edition, thoroughly revised. 2 vols. 8vo. price 36s.
- LECTURES on SURGICAL PATHOLOGY. By Sir JAMES PAGET, Bart. F.R.S. Third Edition, revised and re-edited by the Author and Professor W. TURNER, M.B. 8vo. with 131 Woodcuts, 21s.
- COOPER'S DICTIONARY of PRACTICAL SURGERY and Encyclopædia of Surgical Science. New Edition, brought down to the present time. By S. A. LANE, Surgeon to St. Mary's Hospital, assisted by various Eminent Surgeons. VOL. II. 8vo. completing the work. [In the press.]
- On CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, especially as connected with GOUT, EMPHYSEMA, and DISEASES of the HEART. By E. HEADLAM GREENHOW, M.D. F.R.C.P. &c. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- The CLIMATE of the SOUTH of FRANCE as SUITED to INVALIDS; with Notices of Mediterranean and other Winter Stations. By C. T. WILLIAMS, M.A. M.D. Oxon. Assistant-Physician to the Hospital for Consumption at Brompton. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- REPORTS on the PROGRESS of PRACTICAL and SCIENTIFIC MEDICINE in Different Parts of the World. Edited by HORACE DOBELL, M.D. assisted by numerous and distinguished Coadjutors. Vols. I. and II. 8vo. 18s. each.
- PULMONARY CONSUMPTION; its Nature, Varieties, and Treatment: with an Analysis of One Thousand Cases to exemplify its Duration. By C. J. B. WILLIAMS, M.D. F.R.S. and C. T. WILLIAMS, M.A. M.D. Oxon. Post 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- CLINICAL LECTURES on DISEASES of the LIVER, JAUNDICE, and ABDOMINAL DROPSY. By CHARLES MURCHISON, M.D. Post 8vo. with 25 Woodcuts, 10s. 6d.
- ANATOMY, DESCRIPTIVE and SURGICAL. By HENRY GRAY, F.R.S. With about 400 Woodcuts from Dissections. Fifth Edition, by T. HOLMES, M.A. Cantab. with a new Introduction by the Editor. Royal 8vo. 28s.
- OUTLINES of PHYSIOLOGY, Human and Comparative. By JOHN MARSHALL, F.R.C.S. Surgeon to the University College Hospital. 2 vols. crown 8vo. with 122 Woodcuts, 32s.
- PHYSIOLOGICAL ANATOMY and PHYSIOLOGY of MAN. By the late R. B. TODD, M.D. F.R.S. and W. BOWMAN, F.R.S. of King's College. With numerous Illustrations. VOL. II. 8vo. 25s.
VOL. I. New Edition by Dr. LIONEL S. BEALE, F.R.S. in course of publication, with many Illustrations. PARTS I. and II. price 7s. 6d. each.
- COPLAND'S DICTIONARY of PRACTICAL MEDICINE, abridged from the larger work and throughout brought down to the present State of Medical Science. 8vo. 36s.

On the MANUFACTURE of BEEET-ROOT SUGAR in ENGLAND and IRELAND. By WILLIAM CROOKES, F.R.S. Crown 8vo. with 11 Woodcuts, 8s. 6d.

DR. PEREIRA'S ELEMENTS of MATERIA MEDICA and THERAPEUTICS, abridged and adapted for the use of Medical and Pharmaceutical Practitioners and Students; and comprising all the Medicines of the British Pharmacopœia, with such others as are frequently ordered in Prescriptions or required by the Physician. Edited by Professor BENTLEY, F.L.S. &c. and by Dr. REDWOOD, F.C.S. &c. With 125 Woodcut Illustrations. 8vo. price 25s.

The Fine Arts, and Illustrated Editions.

IN FAIRYLAND; Pictures from the Elf-World. By RICHARD DOYLE. With a Poem by W. ALLINGHAM. With Sixteen Plates, containing Thirty-six Designs printed in Colours. Folio, 31s. 6d.

HALF-HOUR LECTURES on the HISTORY and PRACTICE of the Fine and Ornamental Arts. By WILLIAM B. SCOTT. New Edition, revised by the Author; with 50 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.

ALBERT DURER, HIS LIFE and WORKS; including Autobiographical Papers and Complete Catalogues. By WILLIAM B. SCOTT. With Six Etchings by the Author, and other Illustrations. 8vo. 16s.

The CHORALE BOOK for ENGLAND: the Hymns translated by Miss C. WINKWORTH; the Tunes arranged by Prof. W. S. BENNETT and OTTO GOLDSCHMIDT. Fcp. 4to. 12s. 6d.

The NEW TESTAMENT, illustrated with Wood Engravings after the Early Masters, chiefly of the Italian School. Crown 4to. 63s. cloth, gilt top; or £5 5s. elegantly bound in morocco.

LYRA GERMANICA; the Christian Year. Translated by CATHERINE WINKWORTH; with 125 Illustrations on Wood drawn by J. LEIGHTON, F.S.A. 4to. 21s.

LYRA GERMANICA; the Christian Life. Translated by CATHERINE WINKWORTH; with about 200 Woodcut Illustrations by J. LEIGHTON, F.S.A. and other Artists. 4to. 21s.

The LIFE of MAN SYMBOLISED by the MONTHS of the YEAR. Text selected by R. PIGOT; Illustrations on Wood from Original Designs by J. LEIGHTON, F.S.A. 4to. 42s.

CATS' and FARLIE'S MORAL EMBLEMS; with Aphorisms, Adages, and Proverbs of all Nations. 121 Illustrations on Wood by J. LEIGHTON, F.S.A. Text selected by R. PIGOT. Imperial 8vo. 31s. 6d.

SACRED and LEGENDARY ART. By Mrs. JAMESON.

Legends of the Saints and Martyrs. New Edition, with 19 Etchings and 187 Woodcuts. 2 vols. square crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

Legends of the Monastic Orders. New Edition, with 11 Etchings and 88 Woodcuts. 1 vol. square crown 8vo. 21s.

SACRED and LEGENDARY ART. By Mrs. JAMESON.

Legends of the Madonna. New Edition, with 27 Etchings and 165 Woodcuts. 1 vol. square crown 8vo. 21s.

The History of Our Lord, with that of his Types and Precursors. Completed by Lady EASTLAKE. Revised Edition, with 31 Etchings and 281 Woodcuts. 2 vols. square crown 8vo. 42s.

The Useful Arts, Manufactures, &c.

HISTORY of the GOTHIC REVIVAL; an Attempt to shew how far the taste for Mediæval Architecture was retained in England during the last two centuries, and has been re-developed in the present. By C. L. EASTLAKE, Architect. With 48 Illustrations (36 full size of page). Imperial 8vo. price 31s. 6d.

GWILT'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA of ARCHITECTURE, with above 1,600 Engravings on Wood. Fifth Edition, revised and enlarged by WYATT PAPWORTH. 8vo. 52s. 6d.

A MANUAL of ARCHITECTURE: being a Concise History and Explanation of the principal Styles of European Architecture, Ancient, Mediæval, and Renaissance; with a Glossary of Technical Terms. By THOMAS MITCHELL. Crown 8vo. with 150 Woodcuts, 10s. 6d.

HINTS on HOUSEHOLD TASTE in FURNITURE, UPHOLSTERY, and other Details. By CHARLES L. EASTLAKE, Architect. Second Edition, with about 90 Illustrations. Square crown 8vo. 13s.

PRINCIPLES of MECHANISM, designed for the Use of Students in the Universities, and for Engineering Students generally. By R. WILLIS, M.A. F.R.S. &c. Jacksonian Professor in the University of Cambridge. Second Edition, enlarged; with 374 Woodcuts. 8vo. 18s.

LATHES and TURNING, Simple, Mechanical, and ORNAMENTAL. By W. HENRY NORTHCOTT. With about 240 Illustrations on Steel and Wood. 8vo. 18s.

URE'S DICTIONARY of ARTS, MANUFACTURES, and MINES. Sixth Edition, chiefly rewritten and greatly enlarged by ROBERT HUNT, F.R.S. assisted by numerous Contributors eminent in Science and the Arts, and familiar with Manufactures. With above 2,000 Woodcuts. 3 vols. medium 8vo. price £4 14s. 6d.

HANDBOOK of PRACTICAL TELEGRAPHY. By R. S. CULLEY, Memb. Inst. C.E. Engineer-in-Chief of Telegraphs to the Post Office. Fifth Edition, with 118 Woodcuts and 9 Plates. 8vo. price 14s.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA of CIVIL ENGINEERING, Historical, Theoretical, and Practical. By E. CRESY, C.E. With above 3,000 Woodcuts. 8vo. 42s.

TREATISE on MILLS and MILLWORK. By Sir W. FAIRBAIRN, Bart. F.R.S. New Edition, with 18 Plates and 322 Woodcuts. 2 vols. 8vo. 32s.

USEFUL INFORMATION for ENGINEERS. By the same Author. FIRST, SECOND, and THIRD SERIES, with many Plates and Woodcuts, 3 vols. crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. each.

The APPLICATION of CAST and WROUGHT IRON to Building Purposes. By Sir W. FAIRBAIRN, Bart. F.R.S. Fourth Edition, enlarged; with 6 Plates and 118 Woodcuts. 8vo. price 16s.

- IRON SHIP BUILDING, its History and Progress, as comprised in a Series of Experimental Researches. By the same Author. With 4 Plates and 130 Woodcuts. 8vo. 18s.
- A TREATISE on the STEAM ENGINE, in its various Applications to Mines, Mills, Steam Navigation, Railways and Agriculture. By J. BOURNE, C.E. Eighth Edition; with Portrait, 37 Plates, and 546 Woodcuts. 4to. 42s.
- CATECHISM of the STEAM ENGINE, in its various Applications to Mines, Mills, Steam Navigation, Railways, and Agriculture. By the same Author. With 89 Woodcuts. Fcp. 6s.
- HANDBOOK of the STEAM ENGINE. By the same Author, forming a KEY to the Catechism of the Steam Engine, with 67 Woodcuts. Fcp. 9s.
- BOURNE'S RECENT IMPROVEMENTS in the STEAM ENGINE in its various applications to Mines, Mills, Steam Navigation, Railways, and Agriculture. Being a Supplement to the Author's 'Catechism of the Steam Engine.' By JOHN BOURNE, C.E. New Edition, including many New Examples; with 124 Woodcuts. Fcp. 8vo. 6s.
- A TREATISE on the SCREW PROPELLER, SCREW VESSELS, and Screw Engines, as adapted for purposes of Peace and War; with Notices of other Methods of Propulsion, Tables of the Dimensions and Performance of Screw Steamers, and detailed Specifications of Ships and Engines. By J. BOURNE, C.E. New Edition, with 54 Plates and 287 Woodcuts. 4to. 63s.
- EXAMPLES of MODERN STEAM, AIR, and GAS ENGINES of the most Approved Types, as employed for Pumping, for Driving Machinery, for Locomotion, and for Agriculture, minutely and practically described. By JOHN BOURNE, C.E. In course of publication in 24 Parts, price 2s. 6d. each, forming One volume 4to. with about 50 Plates and 400 Woodcuts.
- A HISTORY of the MACHINE-WROUGHT HOSIERY and LACE Manufactures. By WILLIAM FELKIN, F.L.S. F.S.S. Royal 8vo. 21s.
- PRACTICAL TREATISE on METALLURGY, adapted from the last German Edition of Professor KERL's Metallurgy by W. CROOKES, F.R.S. &c. and E. RÖHRIG, Ph.D. M.E. With 625 Woodcuts. 3 vols. 8vo. price £4 19s.
- MITCHELL'S MANUAL of PRACTICAL ASSAYING. Third Edition, for the most part re-written, with all the recent Discoveries incorporated, by W. CROOKES, F.R.S. With 188 Woodcuts. 8vo. 28s.
- The ART of PERFUMERY; the History and Theory of Odours, and the Methods of Extracting the Aromas of Plants. By Dr. PIESSE, F.C.S. Third Edition, with 53 Woodcuts. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- LOUDON'S ENCYCLOPEDIA of AGRICULTURE: comprising the Laying-out, Improvement, and Management of Landed Property, and the Cultivation and Economy of the Productions of Agriculture. With 1,100 Woodcuts. 8vo. 21s.
- Loudon's Encyclopædia of Gardening: comprising the Theory and Practice of Horticulture, Floriculture, Arboriculture, and Landscape Gardening. With 1,000 Woodcuts. 8vo. 21s.
- BAYLDON'S ART of VALUING RENTS and TILLAGES, and Claims of Tenants upon Quitting Farms, both at Michaelmas and Lady-Day Eighth Edition, revised by J. C. MORTON. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

Religious and Moral Works.

- AUTHORITY and CONSCIENCE; a Free Debate on the Tendency of Dogmatic Theology and on the Characteristics of Faith. Edited by CONWAY MOREL. Post 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- REASONS of FAITH; or, the ORDER of the Christian Argument Developed and Explained. By the Rev. G. S. DREW, M.A. Second Edition, revised and enlarged. Fcp. 8vo. price 6s.
- CHRIST the CONSOLER; a Book of Comfort for the Sick. With a Preface by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Carlisle. Small 8vo. price 6s.
- The TRUE DOCTRINE of the EUCCHARIST. By THOMAS S. L. VOGAN, D.D. Canon and Prebendary of Chichester and Rural Dean. 8vo. price 18s.
- CHRISTIAN SACERDOTALISM, viewed from a Layman's standpoint or tried by Holy Scripture and the Early Fathers; with a short Sketch of the State of the Church from the end of the Third to the Reformation in the beginning of the Sixteenth Century. By JOHN JARDINE, M.A. LL.D. 8vo. price 8s. 6d.
- SYNONYMS of the OLD TESTAMENT, their BEARING on CHRISTIAN FAITH and PRACTICE. By the Rev. ROBERT BAKER GIRDLESTONE, M.A. 8vo. price 15s.
- An INTRODUCTION to the THEOLOGY of the CHURCH of ENGLAND, in an Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles. By the Rev. T. P. BOULTBEE, LL.D. Fcp. 8vo. price 6s.
- FUNDAMENTALS; or, Bases of Belief concerning MAN and GOD: a Handbook of Mental, Moral, and Religious Philosophy. By the Rev. T. GRIFFITH, M.A. 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- PRAYERS SELECTED from the COLLECTION of the late BARON BUNSEN, and Translated by CATHERINE WINKWORTH. PART I. For the Family. PART II. Prayers and Meditations for Private Use. Fcp. 8vo. price 3s. 6d.
- The STUDENT'S COMPENDIUM of the BOOK of COMMON PRAYER; being Notes Historical and Explanatory of the Liturgy of the Church of England. By the Rev. H. ALDEN NASH. Fcp. 8vo. price 2s. 6d.
- The TRUTH of the BIBLE: Evidence from the Mosaic and other Records of Creation; the Origin and Antiquity of Man; the Science of Scripture; and from the Archæology of Different Nations of the Earth. By the Rev. B. W. SAVILE, M.A. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- CHURCHES and their CREEDS. By the Rev. Sir PHILIP PERRING, Bart. late Scholar of Trin. Coll. Cambridge, and University Medallist. Crown 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- CONSIDERATIONS on the REVISION of the ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D. Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. Post 8vo. price 5s. 6d.
- An EXPOSITION of the 39 ARTICLES, Historical and Doctrinal. By E. HAROLD BROWNE, D.D. Lord Bishop of Ely. Ninth Edit. 8vo. 16s.

- The LIFE and EPISTLES of ST. PAUL. By the Rev. W. J. CONYBEARE, M.A., and the Very Rev. J. S. HOWSON, D.D. Dean of Chester:—
- LIBRARY EDITION, with all the Original Illustrations, Maps, Landscapes on Steel, Woodcuts, &c. 2 vols. 4to. 48s.
- INTERMEDIATE EDITION, with a Selection of Maps, Plates, and Woodcuts. 2 vols. square crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.
- STUDENT'S EDITION, revised and condensed, with 46 Illustrations and Maps. 1 vol. crown 8vo. price 9s.
- The VOYAGE and SHIPWRECK of ST. PAUL; with Dissertations on the Life and Writings of St. Luke and the Ships and Navigation of the Ancients. By JAMES SMITH, F.R.S. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- A CRITICAL and GRAMMATICAL COMMENTARY on ST. PAUL'S Epistles. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D. Lord Bishop of Gloucester & Bristol. 8vo.
- Galatians, Fourth Edition, 8s. 6d.
- Ephesians, Fourth Edition, 8s. 6d.
- Pastoral Epistles, Fourth Edition, 10s. 6d.
- Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, Third Edition, 10s. 6d.
- Thessalonians, Third Edition, 7s. 6d.
- HISTORICAL LECTURES on the LIFE of OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST: being the Hulsean Lectures for 1859. By C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D. Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. Fifth Edition. 8vo. price 12s.
- EVIDENCE of the TRUTH of the CHRISTIAN RELIGION derived from the Literal Fulfilment of Prophecy. By ALEXANDER KEITH, D.D. 37th Edition, with numerous Plates, in square 8vo. 12s. 6d.; also the 39th Edition, in post 8vo. with 5 Plates, 6s.
- History and Destiny of the World and Church, according to Scripture. By the same Author. Square 8vo. with 40 Illustrations, 10s.
- An INTRODUCTION to the STUDY of the NEW TESTAMENT, Critical, Exegetical, and Theological. By the Rev. S. DAVIDSON, D.D. LL.D. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s.
- HARTWELL HORNE'S INTRODUCTION to the CRITICAL STUDY and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, as last revised; with 4 Maps and 22 Woodcuts and Facsimiles. 4 vols. 8vo. 42s.
- EWALD'S HISTORY of ISRAEL to the DEATH of MOSES. Translated from the German. Edited, with a Preface and an Appendix, by RUSSELL MARTINEAU, M.A. Second Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 24s. VOLS. III. and IV. edited by J. E. CARPENTER, M.A. price 21s.
- The HISTORY and LITERATURE of the ISRAELITES, according to the Old Testament and the Apocrypha. By C. DE ROTHSCHILD and A. DE ROTHSCHILD. Second Edition, revised. 2 vols. post 8vo. with Two Maps, price 12s. 6d. Abridged Edition, in 1 vol. fcp. 8vo. price 3s. 6d.
- The SEE of ROME in the MIDDLE AGES. By the Rev. OSWALD J. REICHEL, B.C.L. and M.A. 8vo. price 18s.
- The TREASURY of BIBLE KNOWLEDGE; being a Dictionary of the Books, Persons, Places, Events, and other matters of which mention is made in Holy Scripture. By Rev. J. AYRE, M.A. With Maps, 16 Plates, and numerous Woodcuts. Fcp. 8vo. price 6s. cloth, or 9s. 6d. neatly bound in calf.

- The GREEK TESTAMENT; with Notes, Grammatical and Exegetical.
By the Rev. W. WEBSTER, M.A. and the Rev. W. F. WILKINSON, M.A.
2 vols. 8vo. £2 4s.
- EVERY-DAY SCRIPTURE DIFFICULTIES explained and illustrated.
By J. E. PRESCOTT, M.A. VOL. I. Matthew and Mark; VOL. II. Luke and John. 2 vols. 8vo. 9s. each.
- The PENTATEUCH and BOOK of JOSHUA CRITICALLY EXAMINED.
By the Right Rev. J. W. COLENSO, D.D. Lord Bishop of Natal. People's Edition, in 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.
PART VI. the Later Legislation of the Pentateuch. 8vo. price 24s.
- The FORMATION of CHRISTENDOM. By T. W. ALLIES. PARTS I. and II. 8vo. price 12s. each Part.
- ENGLAND and CHRISTENDOM. By ARCHBISHOP MANNING, D.D.
Post 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- A VIEW of the SCRIPTURE REVELATIONS CONCERNING a FUTURE STATE. By RICHARD WHATELY, D.D. late Archbishop of Dublin. Ninth Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 5s.
- THOUGHTS for the AGE. By ELIZABETH M. SEWELL, Author of 'Amy Herbert' &c. New Edition, revised. Fcp. 8vo. price 5s.
- Passing Thoughts on Religion. By the same Author. Fcp. 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- Self-Examination before Confirmation. By the same Author. 32mo. price 1s. 6d.
- Readings for a Month Preparatory to Confirmation, from Writers of the Early and English Church. By the same Author. Fcp. 4s.
- Readings for Every Day in Lent, compiled from the Writings of Bishop JEREMY TAYLOR. By the same Author. Fcp. 5s.
- Preparation for the Holy Communion; the Devotions chiefly from the works of JEREMY TAYLOR. By the same Author. 32mo. 3s.
- THOUGHTS for the HOLY WEEK for Young Persons. By the Author of 'Amy Herbert.' New Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 2s.
- PRINCIPLES of EDUCATION Drawn from Nature and Revelation, and applied to Female Education in the Upper Classes. By the Author of 'Amy Herbert.' 2 vols. fcp. 12s. 6d.
- SINGERS and SONGS of the CHURCH: being Biographical Sketches of the Hymn-Writers in all the principal Collections; with Notes on their Psalms and Hymns. By JOSIAH MILLER, M.A. Post 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- LYRA GERMANICA, translated from the German by Miss C. WINKWORTH. FIRST SERIES, Hymns for the Sundays and Chief Festivals. SECOND SERIES, the Christian Life. Fcp. 3s. 6d. each SERIES.
- 'SPIRITUAL SONGS' for the SUNDAYS and HOLIDAYS throughout the Year. By J. S. B. MONSELL, LL.D. Vicar of Egham and Rural Dean. Fourth Edition, Sixth Thousand. Fcp. 4s. 6d.
- The BEATITUDES: Abasement before God; Sorrow for Sin; Meekness of Spirit; Desire for Holiness; Gentleness; Purity of Heart; the Peacemakers; Sufferings for Christ. By the same. Third Edition. Fcp. 3s. 6d.

- HIS PRESENCE—not his MEMORY, 1855. By the same Author, in Memory of his SON. Sixth Edition. 16mo. 1s.
- ENDEAVOURS after the CHRISTIAN LIFE: Discourses. By JAMES MARTINEAU. Fourth Edition, carefully revised. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- WHATELY'S INTRODUCTORY LESSONS on the CHRISTIAN Evidences. 18mo. 6d.
- FOUR DISCOURSES of CHRYSOSTOM, chiefly on the Parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus. Translated by F. ALLEN, B.A. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.
- BISHOP JEREMY TAYLOR'S ENTIRE WORKS. With Life by BISHOP HEBER. Revised and corrected by the Rev. C. P. EDEN, 10 vols. price £5 5s.

---

Travels, Voyages, &c.

- HOW to SEE NORWAY. By Captain J. R. CAMPBELL. With Map and 5 Woodcuts. Fcp. 8vo. price 5s.
- PAU and the PYRENEES. By Count HENRY RUSSELL, Member of the Alpine Club, &c. With 2 Maps. Fcp. 8vo. price 5s.
- SCENES in the SUNNY SOUTH; including the Atlas Mountains and the Oases of the Sahara in Algeria. By Lieut.-Col. the Hon. C. S. VEREKER, M.A. Commandant of the Limerick Artillery Militia. 2 vols. post 8vo. price 21s.
- The PLAYGROUND of EUROPE. By LESLIE STEPHEN, late President of the Alpine Club. With 4 Illustrations engraved on Wood by E. WHYMPER. Crown 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- CADORE; or, TITIAN'S COUNTRY. By JOSIAH GILBERT, one of the Authors of 'The Dolomite Mountains.' With Map, Facsimile, and 40 Illustrations. Imperial 8vo. 31s. 6d.
- HOURS of EXERCISE in the ALPS. By JOHN TYNDALL, LL.D. F.R.S. Second Edition, with 7 Woodcuts by E. WHYMPER. Crown 8vo. price 12s. 6d.
- TRAVELS in the CENTRAL CAUCASUS and BASHAN. Including Visits to Ararat and Tabreez and Ascents of Kazbek and Elbruz. By D. W. FRESHFIELD. Square crown 8vo. with Maps, &c. 18s.
- PICTURES in TYROL and Elsewhere. From a Family Sketch-Book. By the Authoress of 'A Voyage en Zigzag,' &c. Second Edition. Small 4to. with numerous Illustrations, 21s.
- HOW WE SPENT the SUMMER; or, a Voyage en Zigzag in Switzerland and Tyrol with some Members of the ALPINE CLUB. From the Sketch-Book of one of the Party. In oblong 4to. with 300 Illustrations, 15s.
- BEATEN TRACKS; or, Pen and Pencil Sketches in Italy. By the Authoress of 'A Voyage en Zigzag.' With 42 Plates, containing about 200 Sketches from Drawings made on the Spot. 8vo. 16s.

- MAP of the CHAIN of MONT BLANC, from an actual Survey in 1863—1864. By A. ADAMS-REILLY, F.R.G.S. M.A.C. Published under the Authority of the Alpine Club. In Chromolithography on extra stout drawing-paper 28in. x 17in. price 10s. or mounted on canvas in a folding case, 12s. 6d.
- WESTWARD by RAIL; the New Route to the East. By W. F. RAE. With Map shewing the Lines of Rail between the Atlantic and the Pacific and Sections of the Railway. Second Edition. Post 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- HISTORY of DISCOVERY in our AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES, Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand, from the Earliest Date to the Present Day. By WILLIAM HOWITT. 2 vols. 8vo. with 3 Maps, 20s.
- ZIGZAGGING AMONGST DOLOMITES. By the Author of 'How we Spent the Summer, or a Voyage en Zigzag in Switzerland and Tyrol.' With upwards of 300 Illustrations by the Author. Oblong 4to. price 15s.
- The DOLOMITE MOUNTAINS; Excursions through Tyrol, Carinthia, Carniola, and Friuli, 1861-1863. By J. GILBERT and G. C. CHURCHILL, F.R.G.S. With numerous Illustrations. Square crown 8vo. 21s.
- GUIDE to the PYRENEES, for the use of Mountaineers. By CHARLES PACKE. 2nd Edition, with Map and Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- The ALPINE GUIDE. By JOHN BALL, M.R.I.A. late President of the Alpine Club. Thoroughly Revised Editions, in Three Volumes, post 8vo. with Maps and other Illustrations:—
- GUIDE to the WESTERN ALPS, including Mont Blanc, Monte Rosa, Zermatt, &c. Price 6s. 6d.
- GUIDE to the CENTRAL ALPS, including all the Oberland District. Price 7s. 6d.
- GUIDE to the EASTERN ALPS, price 10s. 6d.
- Introduction on Alpine Travelling in General, and on the Geology of the Alps, price 1s. Each of the Three Volumes or Parts of the Alpine Guide may be had with this INTRODUCTION prefixed, price 1s. extra.
- VISITS to REMARKABLE PLACES: Old Halls, Battle-Fields, and Stones Illustrative of Striking Passages in English History and Poetry. By WILLIAM HOWITT. 2 vols. square crown 8vo. with Woodcuts, 25s.
- The RURAL LIFE of ENGLAND. By the same Author. With Woodcuts by Bewick and Williams. Medium 8vo. 12s. 6d.

---

Works of Fiction.

- POPULAR ROMANCES of the MIDDLE AGES. By GEORGE W. COX, M.A. Author of 'The Mythology of the Aryan Nations' &c. and EUSTACE HINTON JONES. Crown 8vo. price 10s. 6d.
- HARTLAND FOREST; a Legend of North Devon. By Mrs. BRAY, Author of 'The White Hoods,' 'Life of Stothard,' &c. Post 8vo. with Frontispiece, price 4s. 6d.

NOVELS and TALES. By the Right Hon. B. DISRAELI, M.P.
Cabinet Edition, complete in Ten Volumes, crown 8vo. price 6s. each, as follows:—

LOTHAIR, 6s.
CONINGSBY, 6s.
SYBIL, 6s.
TANCRED, 6s.
VENETIA, 6s.

HENRIETTA TEMPLE, 6s.
CONTARINI FLEMING, &c. 6s.
ALROY, IXION, &c. 6s.
The YOUNG DUKE, &c. 6s.
VIVIAN GREY, 6s.

The MODERN NOVELIST'S LIBRARY. Each Work, in crown 8vo. complete in a Single Volume:—

MELVILLE'S GLADIATORS, 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth.
GOOD FOR NOTHING, 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth.
HOLMBY HOUSE, 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth.
INTERPRETER, 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth.
KATE COVENTRY, 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth.
QUEEN'S MARIES, 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth.
TROLLOPE'S WARDEN, 1s. 6d. boards; 2s. cloth.
BARCHESTER TOWERS, 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth.
BRAMLEY-MOORE'S SIX SISTERS of the VALLEYS, 2s. boards; 2s. 6d. cloth.

IERNE; a Tale. By W. STEUART TRENCH, Author of 'Realities of Irish Life.' Second Edition. 2 vols. post 8vo. price 21s.

The HOME at HEATHERBRAE; a Tale. By the Author of 'Everley.' Fcp. 8vo. price 5s.

CABINET EDITION of STORIES and TALES by MISS SEWELL:—

AMY HERBERT, 2s. 6d.
GERTRUDE, 2s. 6d.
The EARL'S DAUGHTER, 2s. 6d.
EXPERIENCE of LIFE, 2s. 6d.
CLEVE HALL, 3s. 6d.

IVORS, 3s. 6d.
KATHARINE ASHTON, 3s. 6d.
MARGARET PERCIVAL, 5s.
LANETON PARSONAGE, 3s. 6d.
URSULA, 4s. 6d.

STORIES and TALES. By E. M. SEWELL. Comprising:—Amy Herbert; Gertrude; The Earl's Daughter; The Experience of Life; Cleve Hall; Ivors; Katharine Ashton; Margaret Percival; Laneton Parsonage; and Ursula. The Ten Works, complete in Eight Volumes, crown 8vo. bound in leather, and contained in a Box, price 42s.

A Glimpse of the World. By the Author of 'Amy Herbert.' Fcp. 7s. 6d.

The Journal of a Home Life. By the same Author. Post 8vo. 9s. 6d.

After Life; a Sequel to 'The Journal of a Home Life.' Price 10s. 6d.

UNCLE PETER'S FAIRY TALE for the NINETEENTH CENTURY.

Edited by E. M. SEWELL, Author of 'Amy Herbert,' &c. Fcp. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE GIANT; A Witch's Story for English Boys. By the same Author and Editor. Fcp. 8vo. price 5s.

WONDERFUL STORIES from NORWAY, SWEDEN, and ICELAND.

Adapted and arranged by JULIA GODDARD. With an Introductory Essay by the Rev. G. W. Cox, M.A. and Six Woodcuts. Square post 8vo. 6s.

A VISIT to MY DISCONTENTED COUSIN. Reprinted, with some Additions, from Fraser's Magazine. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.

BECKER'S GALLUS; or, Roman Scenes of the Time of Augustus: with Notes and Excursuses. New Edition. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

BECKER'S CHARICLES; a Tale illustrative of Private Life among the Ancient Greeks: with Notes and Excursuses. New Edition. Post 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CABINET EDITION of NOVELS and TALES by G. J. WHYTE

MELVILLE:—

DIGBY GRAND, 5s.

KATE COVENTRY, 5s.

GENERAL BOUNCE, 5s.

HOLMBY HOUSE, 5s.

The QUEEN'S MARIES, 6s.The INTERPRETER, 5s.

GOOD FOR NOTHING, price 6s.

TALES of ANCIENT GREECE. By GEORGE W. COX, M.A. late Scholar of Trin. Coll. Oxon. Crown 8vo. price 6s. 6d.A MANUAL of MYTHOLOGY, in the form of Question and Answer. By the same Author. Fcp. 3s.OUR CHILDREN'S STORY, by one of their Gossips. By the Author of 'Voyage en Zigzag,' 'Pictures in Tyrol,' &c. Small 4to. with Sixty Illustrations by the Author, price 10s. 6d.*Poetry and The Drama.A VISION of CREATION, a POEM; with an Introduction, Geological and Critical. By CUTHBERT COLLINGWOOD, M.A. and B.M. Oxon. F.L.S. &c. Author of 'Rambles of a Naturalist on the Shores and Waters of the China Seas,' &c. Crown 8vo. price 7s. 6d.The STORY of GAUTAMA BUDDHA and his CREED; an Epic. By RICHARD PHILLIPS. Square fcp. 8vo. price 6s.BALLADS and LYRICS of OLD FRANCE; with other Poems. By A. LANG, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. Square fcp. 8vo. price 5s.SONGS of the SIERRAS. By JOAQUIN MILLER. New Edition, revised by the Author. Fcp. 8vo. price 6s.THOMAS MOORE'S POETICAL WORKS, with the Author's last Copyright Additions:—

SHAMROCK EDITION, crown 8vo. price 3s. 6d.

PEOPLE'S EDITION, square crown 8vo. with Illustrations, price 10s. 6d.

LIBRARY EDITION, medium 8vo. Portrait and Vignette, 14s.

MOORE'S IRISH MELODIES, Maclise's Edition, with 161 Steel Plates from Original Drawings. Super-royal 8vo. 31s. 6d.

Miniature Edition of Moore's Irish Melodies with Maclise's Designs (as above) reduced in Lithography. Imp. 16mo. 10s. 6d.

MOORE'S LALLA ROOKH. Tenniel's Edition, with 68 Wood Engravings from original Drawings and other Illustrations. Fcp. 4to. 21s.SOUTHEY'S POETICAL WORKS, with the Author's last Corrections and copyright Additions. Library Edition, in 1 vol. medium 8vo. with Portrait and Vignette, 14s.LAYS of ANCIENT ROME; with Ivry and the Armada. By the Right Hon. LORD MACAULAY. 16mo. 4s. 6d.

Lord Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome. With 90 Illustrations on Wood, from the Antique, from Drawings by G. SCHARF. Fcp. 4to. 21s.

Miniature Edition of Lord Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome, with the Illustrations (as above) reduced in Lithography. Imp. 16mo. 10s. 6d.

- GOLDSMITH'S POETICAL WORKS, with Wood Engravings from Designs by Members of the ETCHING CLUB. Imperial 16mo. 7s. 6d.
- POEMS OF BYGONE YEARS. Edited by the Author of 'Amy Herbert' &c. Fcp. 8vo. price 5s.
- The ÆNEID of VIRGIL Translated into English Verse. By JOHN CONINGTON, M.A. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 9s.
- HORATII OPERA. Library Edition, with Marginal References and English Notes. Edited by the Rev. J. E. YONGE. 8vo. 21s.
- BOWDLER'S FAMILY SHAKSPEARE, cheaper Genuine Editions. Medium 8vo. large type, with 36 WOODCUTS, price 14s. Cabinet Edition, with the same ILLUSTRATIONS, 6 vols. fcp. 3s. 6d. each.
- POEMS. By JEAN INGELOW. Fifteenth Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 5s.
- POEMS by Jean Ingelow. With nearly 100 Illustrations by Eminent Artists, engraved on Wood by the Brothers DALZIEL. Fcp. 4to. 21s.
- A STORY OF DOOM, and other Poems. By JEAN INGELOW. Third Edition. Fcp. 5s.
- JOHN JERNINGHAM'S JOURNAL. Fcp. 8vo. price 3s. 6d.
- The MAD WAR PLANET, and other POEMS. By WILLIAM HOWITT, Author of 'Visits to Remarkable Places' &c. Fcp. 8vo. price 5s.
- EUCCHARIS; a Poem. By F. REGINALD STATHAM (Francis Reynolds), Author of 'Alice Rushton, and other Poems' and 'Glaphyra, and other Poems.' Fcp. 8vo. price 3s. 6d.
- WORKS by EDWARD YARDLEY:—
FANTASTIC STORIES. Fcp. 3s. 6d.
MELUSINE and OTHER POEMS. Fcp. 5s.
HORACE'S ODES, translated into English Verse. Crown 8vo. 6s.
SUPPLEMENTARY STORIES and POEMS. Fcp. 3s. 6d.

Rural Sports, &c.

- ENCYCLOPÆDIA of RURAL SPORTS; a complete Account, Historical, Practical, and Descriptive, of Hunting, Shooting, Fishing, Racing, and all other Rural and Athletic Sports and Pastimes. By D. P. BLAINE. With above 600 Woodcuts (20 from Designs by JOHN LEECH). 8vo. 21s.
- The DEAD SHOT, or Sportsman's Complete Guide; a Treatise on the Use of the Gun, Dog-breaking, Pigeon-shooting, &c. By MARKSMAN. Revised Edition. Fcp. 8vo. with Plates, 5s.
- The FLY-FISHER'S ENTOMOLOGY. By ALFRED RONALDS. With coloured Representations of the Natural and Artificial Insect. Sixth Edition; with 20 coloured Plates. 8vo. 14s.

- A BOOK on ANGLING; a complete Treatise on the Art of Angling in every branch. By FRANCIS FRANCIS. New Edition, with Portrait and 15 other Plates, plain and coloured. Post 8vo. 15s.
- The BOOK of the ROACH. By GREVILLE FENNELL, of 'The Field.' Fcp. 8vo. price 2s. 6d.
- WILCOCKS'S SEA-FISHERMAN; comprising the Chief Methods of Hook and Line Fishing in the British and other Seas, a Glance at Nets, and Remarks on Boats and Boating. Second Edition, enlarged; with 80 Woodcuts. Post 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- HORSES and STABLES. By Colonel F. FITZWYGRAM, XV. the King's Hussars. With Twenty-four Plates of Illustrations, containing very numerous Figures engraved on Wood. 8vo. 15s.
- The HORSE'S FOOT, and HOW to KEEP IT SOUND. By W. MILES, Esq. Ninth Edition, with Illustrations. Imperial 8vo. 12s. 6d.
- A PLAIN TREATISE on HORSE-SHOEING. By the same Author. Sixth Edition. Post 8vo. with Illustrations, 2s. 6d.
- STABLES and STABLE-FITTINGS. By the same. Imp. 8vo. with 13 Plates, 15s.
- REMARKS on HORSES' TEETH, addressed to Purchasers. By the same. Post 8vo. 1s. 6d.
- A TREATISE on HORSE-SHOEING and LAMENESS. By JOSEPH GAMGEE, Veterinary Surgeon, formerly Lecturer on the Principles and Practice of Farriery in the New Veterinary College, Edinburgh. 8vo. with 55 Woodcuts, price 15s.
- BLAINE'S VETERINARY ART; a Treatise on the Anatomy, Physiology, and Curative Treatment of the Diseases of the Horse, Neat Cattle and Sheep. Seventh Edition, revised and enlarged by C. STEEL, M.R.C.V.S.I. 8vo. with Plates and Woodcuts, 18s.
- The HORSE: with a Treatise on Draught. By WILLIAM YOUATT. New Edition, revised and enlarged. 8vo. with numerous Woodcuts, 12s. 6d.
- The DOG. By the same Author. 8vo. with numerous Woodcuts, 6s.
- The DOG in HEALTH and DISEASE. By STONEHENGE. With 70 Wood Engravings. Square crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- The GREYHOUND. By STONEHENGE. Revised Edition, with 24 Portraits of Greyhounds. Square crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- The OX; his Diseases and their Treatment: with an Essay on Parturition in the Cow. By J. R. DOBSON. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 7s. 6d.

Works of Utility and General Information.

- The THEORY and PRACTICE of BANKING. By H. D. MACLEOD, M.A. Barrister-at-Law. Second Edition, entirely remodelled. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s.

- A DICTIONARY, Practical, Theoretical, and Historical, of Commerce and Commercial Navigation. By J. R. M'CULLOCH. New and thoroughly revised Edition. 8vo. price 63s. cloth, or 70s. half-bd. in russia.
- The LAW of NATIONS Considered as Independent Political Communities. By Sir TRAVERS TWISS, D.C.L. 2 vols. 8vo. 30s.; or separately, PART I. Peace, 12s. PART II. War, 18s.
- The CABINET LAWYER; a Popular Digest of the Laws of England, Civil, Criminal, and Constitutional; intended for Practical Use and General Information. Twenty-third Edition. Fcp. 8vo. price 7s. 6d.
- PEWTNER'S COMPREHENSIVE SPECIFIER; a Guide to the Practical Specification of every kind of Building-Artificers' Work; with Forms of Building Conditions and Agreements, an Appendix, Foot-Notes, and a copious Index. Edited by W. YOUNG, Architect. Crown 8vo. price 6s.
- COLLIERIES and COLLIERS; a Handbook of the Law and Leading Cases relating thereto. By J. C. FOWLER, of the Inner Temple, Barrister. Second Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- The MATERNAL MANAGEMENT of CHILDREN in HEALTH and Disease. By THOMAS BULL, M.D. Fcp. 5s.
- HINTS to MOTHERS on the MANAGEMENT of their HEALTH during the Period of Pregnancy and in the Lying-in Room. By the late THOMAS BULL, M.D. Fcp. 5s.
- HOW to NURSE SICK CHILDREN; containing Directions which may be found of service to all who have charge of the Young. By CHARLES WEST, M.D. Second Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.
- NOTES on LYING-IN INSTITUTIONS; with a Proposal for Organising an Institution for Training Midwives and Midwifery Nurses. By FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE. With 5 Plans. Square crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.
- NOTES on HOSPITALS. By FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE. Third Edition, enlarged; with 13 Plans. Post 4to. 18s.
- CHESS OPENINGS. By F. W. LONGMAN, Balliol College, Oxford. Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d.
- A PRACTICAL TREATISE on BREWING; with Formulæ for Public Brewers, and Instructions for Private Families. By W. BLACK. 8vo. 10s. 6d.
- MODERN COOKERY for PRIVATE FAMILIES, reduced to a System of Easy Practice in a Series of carefully-tested Receipts. By ELIZA ACTON. Newly revised and enlarged Edition; with 8 Plates of Figures and 150 Woodcuts. Fcp. 6s.
- WILLICH'S POPULAR TABLES, for ascertaining, according to the Carlisle Table of Mortality, the value of Lifehold, Leasehold, and Church Property, Renewal Fines, Reversions, &c. Seventh Edition, edited by MONTAGUE MARRIOTT, Barrister-at-Law. Post 8vo. price 10s.
- MAUNDER'S TREASURY of KNOWLEDGE and LIBRARY of Reference: comprising an English Dictionary and Grammar, Universal Gazetteer, Classical Dictionary, Chronology, Law Dictionary, a Synopsis of the Peerage, useful Tables, &c. Revised Edition. Fcp. 8vo. price 6s.

INDEX.

ACTON'S Modern Cookery .....	28	CARNOTA'S Memoirs of Pombal .....	4
ALLEN'S Four Discourses of Chrysostom ..	22	CATES'S Biographical Dictionary .....	5
ALLIES on Formation of Christendom ....	23	—— and WOODWARD'S Encyclopædia ..	4
Alpine Guide (The) .....	23	CATS' and FARLIE'S Moral Emblems .....	16
ARNOLD'S Manual of English Literature ..	7	Changed Aspects of Unchanged Truths ...	9
ARNOTT'S Elements of Physics .....	11	CHESNEY'S Indian Polity .....	3
Authority and Conscience .....	19	—— Waterloo Campaign.....	2
Autumn Holidays of a Country Parson ....	9	Chorale Book for England.....	16
AYRE'S Treasury of Bible Knowledge.....	20	Christ the Consoler .....	19
BACON'S Essays, by WHATELY .....	6	CLOUGH'S Lives from Plutarch .....	2
—— Life and Letters, by SPEDDING ..	6	COLENZO (Bishop) on Pentateuch .....	21
—— Works, edited by SPEDDING .....	6	COLLINGWOOD'S Vision of Creation.....	25
BAIN'S Logic, Deductive and Inductive ....	10	Commonplace Philosopher .....	8
—— Mental and Moral Science .....	10	CONINGTON'S Translation of the Aneid ....	26
—— on the Senses and Intellect .....	10	CONTANSEAU'S French-English Dictionaries ..	8
BALL'S Alpine Guide .....	23	CONYBEARE and HOWSON'S St. Paul .....	20
BAYLDON'S Rents and Tillages .....	18	COTTON'S (Bishop) Life .....	5
Beaten Tracks .....	22	COOPER'S Surgical Dictionary.....	15
BECKER'S Charicles and Gallus .....	24	COPLAND'S Dictionary of Practical Medicine ..	15
BENFEY'S Sanskrit Dictionary .....	8	Counsel and Comfort from a City Pulpit....	9
BERNARD on British Neutrality .....	1	COX'S Aryan Mythology.....	3
BISSET on Historical Truth .....	3	—— Manual of Mythology .....	25
BLACK'S Treatise on Brewing .....	28	—— Tale of the Great Persian War .....	2
BLACKLEY'S German-English Dictionary ..	8	—— Tales of Ancient Greece.....	25
BLAINE'S Rural Sports .....	26	—— and JONES'S Popular Romances ...	23
—— Veterinary Art .....	27	CRESY'S Encyclopædia of Civil Engineering ..	17
BLOXAM'S Metals .....	11	Critical Essays of a Country Parson .....	9
BOOTH'S Saint-Simon .....	3	CROOKES on Beet-Root Sugar .....	16
BOULTBEE on 39 Articles .....	19	——'s Chemical Analysis .....	14
BOURNE on Screw Propeller .....	18	CULLEY'S Handbook of Telegraphy.....	17
BOURNE'S Catechism of the Steam Engine ..	18	CUSACK'S History of Ireland.....	3
—— Handbook of Steam Engine ....	18	D'AUBIGNE'S History of the Reformation ..	2
—— Improvements in the Steam ..	18	in the time of CALVIN .....	2
Engine .....	18	DAVIDSON'S Introduction to New Testament ..	20
Treatise on the Steam Engine ..	18	Dead Shot (The), by MARKSMAN .....	26
Examples of Modern Engines ..	18	DE LA RIVE'S Treatise on Electricity .....	12
BOVDLER'S Family SHAKSPEARE .....	26	DENISON'S Vice-Regal Life .....	1
BOYD'S Reminiscences .....	4	DISRAELI'S Lord George Bentinck .....	4
BRAMLEY-MOORE'S Six Sisters of the ..	24	Novels and Tales .....	24
Valleys.....	24	DOBELL'S Medical Reports .....	15
BRANDE'S Dictionary of Science, Litera- ..	14	DOBSON on the Ox .....	27
ture, and Art.....	14	DOVE on Storms .....	11
BRAY'S Manual of Anthropology .....	10	DOYLE'S Fairyland .....	16
—— Philosophy of Necessity.....	10	DREW'S Reasons of Faith .....	19
—— on Force .....	10	DYER'S City of Rome .....	2
—— (Mrs.) Hartland Forest .....	23	EASTLAKE'S Hints on Household Taste ...	17
BROWNE'S Exposition of the 39 Articles....	19	Gothic Revival.....	17
BRUNEL'S Life of BRUNEL .....	4	Elements of Botany .....	13
BUCKLE'S History of Civilization .....	4	ELLICOTT on the Revision of the English ..	19
BULL'S Hints to Mothers .....	28	New Testament .....	19
Maternal Management of Children ..	28	Commentary on Ephesians ...	20
BUNSEN'S God in History .....	3	Commentary on Galatians ...	20
Prayers .....	19	Pastoral Epist. ....	20
BURKE'S Vicissitudes of Families.....	5	Philippians, &c. ....	20
BURTON'S Christian Church.....	4	Thessalonians .....	20
Cabinet Lawyer .....	28	Lectures on the Life of Christ..	20
CAMPBELL'S Norway .....	22

Essays and Contributions of A. K. H. B. ....	8, 9	HÜBNER's Memoir of Sixtus V. ....	2
EWALD's History of Israel. ....	20	HUGHES's (W.) Manual of Geography ...	11
FAIRBAIRN on Iron Shipbuilding. ....	18	HUME's Essays. ....	10
—'s Applications of Iron. ....	17	— Treatise on Human Nature. ....	10
— Information for Engineers. ..	17	IHNE's Roman History. ....	2
— Mills and Millwork. ....	17	INGELOW's Poems. ....	26
FARADAY's Life and Letters. ....	4	— Story of Doom. ....	26
FARRAR's Families of Speech. ....	9	JAMESON's Saints and Martyrs. ....	16
— Chapters on Language. ....	7	— Legends of the Madonna. ....	17
FELKIN on Hosiery and Lace Manufactures	18	— Monastic Orders. ....	16
FENNELL's Book of the Roach. ....	27	JAMESON and EASTLAKE's Saviour. ....	17
FITZWYGRAM on Horses and Stables. ....	27	JARDINE's Christian Sacerdotalism. ....	19
FOWLER's Collieries and Colliers. ....	28	John Jerningham's Journal. ....	26
FRANCIS's Fishing Book. ....	27	JOHNSTON's Geographical Dictionary. ....	11
FRESHFIELD's Travels in the Caucasus. ...	22	JONES's Royal Institution. ....	4
FROUDE's History of England. ....	1	KALISCH's Commentary on the Bible. ....	7
— Short Studies on Great Subjects	9	— Hebrew Grammar. ....	7
GAMGEE on Horse-Shoeing. ....	27	KEITH on Fulfilment of Prophecy. ....	20
GANOT's Elementary Physics. ....	12	— Destiny of the World. ....	20
— Natural Philosophy. ....	12	KERL's Metallurgy. ....	18
GILBERT's Cadore, or Titian's Country. ...	22	— RÖHRIG. ....	18
GILBERT and CHURCHILL's Dolomites. ....	23	KIRBY and SPENCE's Entomology. ....	13
GIRDLESTONE's Bible Synonymes. ....	19	LANG's Ballads and Lyrics. ....	25
GLEDSTONE's Life of WHITEFIELD. ....	5	LATHAM's English Dictionary. ....	7
GODDARD's Wonderful Stories. ....	24	LAWLOR's Pilgrimages in the Pyrenees. ...	24
GOLDSMITH's Poems, Illustrated. ....	26	LECKY's History of European Morals. ....	3
GOODEVE's Mechanism. ....	11	— Rationalism. ....	3
GRAHAM's Autobiography of MILTON. ....	4	— Leaders of Public Opinion. ....	5
— View of Literature and Art. ...	3	Leisure Hours in Town. ....	8
GRANT's Home Politics. ....	3	Lessons of Middle Age. ....	9
— Ethics of Aristotle. ....	6	LEWES' History of Philosophy. ....	3
Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson. ....	9	LIDDELL and SCOTT's Two Lexicons. ....	8
GRAY's Anatomy. ....	15	Life of Man Symbolised. ....	16
GREENHOW on Bronchitis. ....	15	LINDLEY and MOORE's Treasury of Botany	13
GRIFFIN's Algebra and Trigonometry. ...	11	LONGMAN's Edward the Third. ....	2
GRIFFITH's Fundamentals. ....	19	— Lectures on the History of Eng-
GROVE on Correlation of Physical Forces. ..	12	— land. ....	2
GURNEY's Chapters of French History. ....	2	— Chess Openings. ....	28
GWILT's Encyclopædia of Architecture. ....	17	LOUDON's Agriculture. ....	18
HAMPDEN's (Bishop) Memorials. ....	5	— Gardening. ....	18
HARE on Election of Representatives. ....	7	— Plants. ....	14
HARTWIG's Harmonies of Nature. ....	13	LUBBOCK on Origin of Civilisation. ....	13
— Polar World. ....	13	Lyta Germanica. ....	16, 21
— Sea and its Living Wonders. ..	13	MACAULAY's (Lord) Essays. ....	3
— Subterranean World. ....	13	— History of England. ..	1
— Tropical World. ....	13	— Lays of Ancient Rome. ....	25
HERSCHEL's Outlines of Astronomy. ....	10	— Miscellaneous Writings. ....	9
HEWITT on Diseases of Women. ....	14	— Speeches. ....	7
HODGSON's Theory of Practice. ....	10	— Complete Works. ....	1
— Time and Space. ....	10	MACLEOD's Elements of Political Economy	7
HOLLAND's Recollections. ....	5	— Dictionary of Political Eco-
HOLMES's System of Surgery. ....	15	— nomy. ....	7
— Surgical Diseases of Infancy. ....	15	— Theory and Practice of Banking	27
Home (The) at Heatherbrae. ....	24	MCCULLOCH's Dictionary of Commerce. ...	28
HORNE's Introduction to the Scriptures. ...	20
How we Spent the Summer. ....	22
HOWITT's Australian Discovery. ....	23
— Mad War Planet. ....	26
— Rural Life of England. ....	23
— Visits to Remarkable Places. ...	23

MAGUIRE'S Life of Father Mathew .....	5	NEWMAN'S History of his Religious Opinions .....	5
———— Pope Pius IX.....	5	NIGHTINGALE'S Notes on Hospitals .....	23
MALET'S Overthrow of the Germanic Con- federation by Prussia.....	2	———— Lying-In Insti- tutions.....	28
MALLESON'S Recreations of an Indian Official .....	3	NILSSON'S Scandinavia .....	13
MANNING'S England and Christendom ....	21	NORTCOTT'S Lathes and Turning .....	17
MARSHALL'S Physiology.....	15	ODLING'S Animal Chemistry .....	14
MARSHMAN'S Life of Havelock .....	5	———— Course of Practical Chemistry..	14
———— History of India .....	3	———— Outlines of Chemistry.....	14
MARTINEAU'S Christian Life .....	22	O'DRISCOLL'S Memoirs of MACLISE.....	4
MASSINGBERD'S History of the Reformation	4	Our Children's Story.....	25
MATHEWS on Colonial Question .....	7	OWEN'S Lectures on the Invertebrata.....	12
MAUNDER'S Biographical Treasury.....	5	———— Comparative Anatomy and Physio- logy of Vertebrate Animals ....	12
———— Geographical Treasury .....	11	PACKE'S Guide to the Pyrenees .....	23
———— Historical Treasury .....	4	PAGET'S Lectures on Surgical Pathology ..	15
———— Scientific and Literary Treas- ury.....	14	PEREIRA'S Elements of Materia Medica ..	16
———— Treasury of Knowledge.....	28	PERRING'S Churches and Creeds .....	19
———— Treasury of Natural History	13	PEWTNER'S Comprehensive Specifier .....	23
MAXWELL'S Theory of Heat.....	11	PHILLIPS'S Story of Buddha.....	25
MAY'S Constitutional History of England..	1	Pictures in Tyrol.....	22
MELVILLE'S Novels and Tales .....	24 & 25	PIESSE'S Art of Perfumery .....	18
MENDELSSOHN'S Letters .....	5	PRENDERGAST'S Mastery of Languages....	8
MERIVALE'S Fall of the Roman Republic..	3	PRESCOTT'S Scripture Difficulties .....	21
———— Romans under the Empire	2	Present-Day Thoughts.....	9
MERRIFIELD'S Arithmetic & Mensuration .	11	PROCTOR'S Astronomical Essays .....	10
———— and EVER'S Navigation.....	11	———— New Star Atlas .....	11
METEYARD'S Group of Englishmen.....	5	———— Plurality of Worlds .....	11
MILES on Horse's Foot and Horseshoeing ..	27	———— Saturn and its System .....	11
———— Horses' Teeth and Stables .....	27	———— The Sun .....	11
MILL (J.) on the Mind.....	9	———— Scientific Essays .....	12
MILL (J. S.) on Liberty .....	6	Public Schools Atlas (The) .....	11
———— on Representative Government	6	RAE'S Westward by Rail.....	23
———— on Utilitarianism.....	6	Recreations of a Country Parson.....	8
MILL'S (J. S.) Dissertations and Discussions	6	REEVE'S Royal and Republican France ..	2
———— Political Economy .....	6	REICHEL'S See of Rome .....	20
———— System of Logic.....	6	REILLY'S Map of Mont Blanc .....	23
———— Hamilton's Philosophy.....	7	RIVERS' Rose Amateur's Guide .....	13
———— Subjection of Women.....	6	ROGERS' Correspondence of Greyson.....	9
MILLER'S Elements of Chemistry .....	14	———— Eclipse of Faith .....	9
———— Hymn-Writers .....	21	———— Defence of ditto.....	9
———— Inorganic Chemistry .....	11	ROGET'S English Words and Phrases.....	7
———— Songs of the Sierras.....	25	RONALD'S Fly-Fisher's Entomology .....	26
MITCHELL'S Manual of Architecture .....	17	ROSE'S Ignatius Loyola .....	2
———— Manual of Assaying .....	18	ROTHSCHILD'S Israelites.....	20
MONSELL'S Beatitudes.....	21	RUSSELL'S Pau and the Pyrenees.....	22
———— His Presence not his Memory	22	SANDARS'S Justinian's Institutes .....	5
———— 'Spiritual Songs'.....	21	SAVILLE on the Truth of the Bible .....	19
MOORE'S Irish Melodies .....	25	SCELLEN'S Spectrum Analysis.....	11
———— Lalla Rookh .....	25	SCOTT'S Lectures on the Fine Arts .....	16
———— Poetical Works .....	25	———— Albert Durer .....	16
MORELL'S Elements of Psychology .....	10	SEEBOHM'S Oxford Reformers of 1498 .....	2
———— Mental Philosophy.....	10	SEWELL'S After Life.....	21
MULLER'S (MAX) Chips from a German Workshop .....	9	———— Amy Herbert .....	24
———— Lectures on Language	7	———— Cleve Hall.....	21
———— (K. O.) Literature of Ancient Greece .....	2	———— Earl's Daughter.....	24
MURCHISON on Liver Complaints.....	15	———— Examination for Confirmation ..	21
MURE'S Language and Literature of Greece	2
NASH'S Compendium of the Prayer Book..	19
New Testament, Illustrated Edition .....	6

SEWELL'S Experience of Life .....	24	TYNDALL'S Hours of Exercise in the Alps..	22
Gertrude.....	24	Lectures on Light.....	12
Giant .....	24	Molecular Physics.....	12
Glimpse of the World .....	24
History of the Early Church ....	4	UEBERWEG'S System of Logic.....	9
Ivors.....	24	UNCLE PETER'S Fairy Tale .....	24
Journal of a Home Life.....	24	URE'S Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.....	17
Katharine Ashton.....	24
Laneton Parsonage .....	24
Margaret Percival .....	24
Passing Thoughts on Religion ..	21	VAN DER HOEVEN'S Handbook of Zoology	12
Poems of Bygone Years .....	26	VEREKER'S Sunny South .....	22
Preparations for Communion....	21	Visit to my Discontented Cousin .....	24
Principles of Education.....	21	VOGAN'S Doctrine of the Eucharist .....	19
Readings for Confirmation .....	21
Readings for Lent.....	21
Tales and Stories .....	21	WALCOTT'S Traditions of Cathedrals .....
Thoughts for the Age.....	21	WATSON'S Geometry .....	11
Ursula.....	24	Principles & Practice of Physic ..	15
Thoughts for the Holy Week....	21	WATTS'S Dictionary of Chemistry .....	14
SHORT'S Church History.....	4	WEBB'S Objects for Common Telescopes ..	11
SMART'S WALKER'S Dictionary .....	8	WEBSTER and WILKINSON'S Greek Testa-
SMITH'S (J.) Paul's Voyage and Shipwreck	20	ment .....	21
(SYDNEY) Miscellaneous Works..	9	WELLINGTON'S Life, by GLEIG .....	5
Wit and Wisdom .....	9	WEST on Children's Diseases.....	14
Life and Letters.....	5	Nursing Sick Children.....	28
SOUTHEY'S Doctor .....	7	Lunleian Lectures .....	14
Poetical Works .....	25	WHATELY'S English Synonymes .....	6
STANLEY'S History of British Birds .....	13	Logic .....	6
STATHAM'S Eucharis .....	26	Rhetoric .....	6
STEPHEN'S Ecclesiastical Biography .....	5	WHATELY on a Future State .....	21
Playground of Europe.....	22	Truth of Christianity .....	2
STIRLING'S Secret of Hegel .....	10	WHITE'S Latin-English Dictionaries .....	8
Sir WILLIAM HAMILTON .....	10	WILCOCK'S Sea Fisherman.....	27
STONEHENGE on the Dog .....	27	WILLIAMS'S Aristotle's Ethics .....	6
on the Greyhound.....	27	WILLIAMS on Climate of South of France	15
STRICKLAND'S Queens of England.....	5	Consumption .....	15
Sunday Afternoons at the Parish Church of		WILLICH'S Popular Tables .....	28
a Scottish University City (St. Andrews)..	9	WILLIS'S Principles of Mechanism .....	17
		WINSLOW on Light .....	12
TAYLOR'S History of India .....	3	WOOD'S Bible Animals .....	13
(Jeremy) Works, edited by EDEN	22	Homes without Hands .....	13
Text-Books of Science.....	11	Insects at Home .....	13
THIRLWALL'S History of Greece.....	2	Strange Dwellings .....	13
THOMSON'S Laws of Thought .....	7	(T.) Chemical Notes.....	14
New World of Being .....	10
TODD (A.) on Parliamentary Government	1	YARDLEY'S Poetical Works.....	26
TODD and BOWMAN'S Anatomy and Physi-		YONGE'S English-Greek Lexicons.....	8
ology of Man.....	15	Horace .....	26
TRENCH'S Ierne, a Tale .....	24	History of England .....	1
TRENCH'S Realities of Irish Life .....	3	Three Centuries of English Lite-
TROLLOPE'S Barchester Towers .....	24	rature .....	7
Warden .....	24	Modern History .....	3
TWISS'S Law of Nations.....	28	YOUATT on the Dog .....	27
TYNDALL on Diamagnetism.....	11	on the Horse .....	27
Electricity.....	12
Heat .....	12	ZELLER'S Socrates .....	6
Sound .....	12	Stoics, Epicureans, and Sceptics..	6
's Faraday as a Discoverer.....	5	Zigzagging amongst Dolomites .....	23
Fragments of Science .....	12

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process.
Neutralizing agent: Magnesium Oxide
Treatment Date: May 2005

Preservation Technologies
A WORLD LEADER IN PAPER PRESERVATION

111 Thomson Park Drive
Cranberry Township, PA 16066
(724) 779-2111

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 014 240 071 6

